The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that as far as his information went, there was not a drop of water in the Barrier Ranges, whatever might be their geological formation, and therefore any party going out there now, when the summer was coming on, would run the greatest risk of their lives He saw in the papers a statement that runs had been taken out, but such was not the case for the simple reason that there was not a drop of water When the winter advanced a party might go out and sufficient water might be collected to enable them to sink wells in order to test whether water could be procured in summer

Mr REYNOLDS said his information was from Sturt's book, who said that though there were no creeks or rivers, the water was sufficient for his party, which was not a small one, with all their cattle Sturt was there about this time of the year, so that he (Mr Reynolds) could scarcely accept the statement of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works

Mr BARROW was sorry to hear that there was no water, but with reference to there being no runs taken out, he should ask the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether there were not runs taken out within a short distance of the Barrier Ranges, whether the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Halett), for instance, had not a run in the neighborhood, or even if no runs were taken out, had not some been applied for?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was not aware of any applications having been made As to Mr Hallett's run, it must be a long way from the Barrier Ranges

Mr REYNOLDS said as the ranges were not in South Australia, the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands might not have heard of applications having been made for land there, but he had heard that Mr Hallett had a run within 50 miles of the Barrier Ranges

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that 50 miles would be rather a long distance for a man to go for a drink of water He thought it only right to state when the public money was proposed to be expended on an undertaking of this kind the difficulties which he knew stood in the way

Mr LINDSAY said so far as he recollected the Rocky Glen was the spot where Sturt encamped whilst explorations were made by detached parties through the desert country There was permanent water in Rocky Glen when there was none anywhere else This was before the discovery of the Cooper Rocky Glen was in the Grey Ranges

The ATTORNEY GENERAL suggested that the sum should be not exceeding £750, and that the following words should be added, "and that His Excellency be immediately requested to make all necessary communications to the Government of New South Wales on the subject"

Mr Reynolds adopted the amendment

Mr Solomon trusted the question would not be decided on the statement that there was no water, but that it would be left to those to whom the amount was to be entrusted for fitting out the expedition to withold it if perfectly satisfied that its expenditure would be injurious It was not necessary for this colony to find gold in large quantities, it would be sufficient to prove that it existed in order to cause a rush to the locality, and it was only by that means the place could be properly tested Echunga would have been fairly tested but from its too near proximity to Adelaide

Mr Peake—As he considered that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had put a stopper on the motion, would like to hear how that hon member proposed to deal with the money it it were voted

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that if the House voted the money, it would be his duty to make accurate enquiries from those who could give the best information on the subject There were still many of Mr Sturt's party to be found in South Australia, and amongst them a most intelligent gentleman, Dr Browne His (the hon Commissioner's) information respecting the Barrier Ranges was derived from a gentleman named Ball, who might be known to some hon members, as he was noted for the long rides which he took through the country, he being in fact as good a bushman as there was in the colony Last year Mr Ball, with a stockman, crossed Lake Torrens, where Mr Gregory crossed it, and went into the Barrier Ranges, and they found no appearance of any water there which was likely to remain during the summer He had not seen Dr Browne, but he would be a very competent person to give an opinion on the subject

Mr Neales hoped the hon member would also consult Mr Davenport a most intelligent man—whose statement was quite of a contrary description Mr Davenport said there was water in the ranges when he was there, and he was quite prepared to go into the country at the present season with a party in search of gold He believed a party could be formed of Sturt's people alone, many of whom had since been active gold-diggers He was sure that the nucleus at least of a party could be found consisting of Sturt's people, if properly headed

The motion as amended was then put and passed, and the House having resumed the report was adopted

CAMEL TROOP CARRYING COMPANY

The House having again gone into Committee,

Mr Solomon rose to move—

"Consideration in Committee of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place the sum of £1,200 upon the Estimates in aid of the Camel Troop Carrying Company with a view of enabling that Company to import camels into South Australia, in accordance with the prayer of their petition to this House."

He trusted hon members would not be under any mistaken notion as to the meaning of the request of the company They did not mean that the amount should be at once placed at their disposal, but that the money should be handed over in the event of their importing a number of camels as they stated they would do in their petition to the House He was not so wedded to the interests of the company but that he was prepared if any hon member moved, as an amendment, that an amount be placed on the Estimates as a bonus for whoever should first introduce the camel, to give his vote for it He would leave the question to the House, merely remarking that he had no interest in the company nor did he know of its existence until within a few days of placing the notice on the paper

Mr Strangways thought the question was not whether it was desirable to introduce the camel or not, that could be properly considered at a future time, but whether they should subsidise this company with the curious title—(a laugh)—or not They had nothing before them, but the signatures of 77 gentlemen who would start a company if they got this money He could start a company for carrying elephants instead of camels—(laughter)—and get 700 names instead of 77 at Green's Exchange next day on similar terms These gentlemen should have started the company first If it was desirable to import camels, the House should decide what sort of camels, as there was as much difference between camels as horses Anything with four legs, a head and a tail, and of the equine species was a horse, but if the Government were to import a number of the first that came to hand, many of them would come more under the definition of "screws" than horses (A laugh) Hon gentlemen should tell first what kind of camels to introduce and then the House could say whether it was desirable to introduce them, and whether they would give, not to any particular persons but to the first company who would introduce them, a bonus He knew from enquiry that camels were over-rated by the House and out of doors The outside load they could carry was 400 lbs, and their general weight going across the desert was six mail-boxes, whilst many carried but four He had often seen them loaded with three or four ordinary portmanteaus and a few carpet bags, and nick-nacks to fill up the space

Mr Burford was glad to notice the moderate tone of the House on the question, and on a little reflection was induced to agree with one or two of the speakers On principle and at all times he was opposed to monopoly, and as the manner in which this subject was introduced was in the character of a monopoly, he would move an amendment He moved that all the words after the word "estimates" be struck out with the view of inserting the words "with a view of affording a bonus of £20 each to the parties who should import the first sixty camels" This would bring the thing forward in a new shape, and deprive it of a character generally somewhat odious—that of a monopoly There would be no difficulty at all about the united action of horses and camels That was a point generally conceded

Mr Hawker should oppose both the motion and amendment, for the mover of neither the one nor the other had shown the slightest utility of the camel, if introduced Indeed, these hon members acknowledged their great ignorance of everything connected with the camels, and likewise with the company He thought the hon members would have shown the utility of the camel for exploring purposes, but he believed it was shown by the expedition now out that we had spent enough in this way for many years to come One hon member said that horses and camels would work together, and that the horse rather liked the camel He had seen a horse tethered up with a camel for four or five weeks, and the brute was more frightened in the end, than he was the first day (Laughter) They would get on very well together in a country where they were bred together, but not otherwise If we sent away all the horses of the country except 60, and then introduced 60 camels, their increase might get used to each other, but otherwise, we would require an army of Rareys (Laughter) As he had said before, he believed camels would be the greatest nuisance that could be brought into the country, and he thought the hon member who proposed the motion would be the first to desire that they should be destroyed

Mr Solomon said he had acknowledged in introducing the subject that he knew little of the habits of the camel, but he was sorry to find that the hon member for Victoria, who professed to know so much knew so little He had made enquiries within the last few days as to the utility of the camel and he had it on the word of Captain Bagot, who spent many years in India, and had seen some thousands of them, that camels and horses were placed close to each other in the armies of India, that he had known camels when employed in the nature of a flying battery—(laughter)—go at the rate of 14 miles an hour—(renewed laughter) having at each side a battery of rockets—(increased laughter)—with a native driver mounted on their necks, and a European soldier behind to work the rockets—(great laughter)—and after a time the European soldiers petitioned that the native drivers should be discontinued, and that they should be allowed to drive, and they had since been allowed to do so This evidence had more weight with him than all that had been said by the hon member for Victoria He did not speak from his own knowledge but from what he had learned from others who were acquainted with the subject, and he was sorry to hear the hon member for Victoria speak on a subject which the hon member did not understand

The Attorney-General objected to voting money for animals which were to be employed by individuals as distinguished from the public Camels might be useful, but not more so than alpacas, or than sheep were in the commencement of the colony

The amendment and original motion were successively put and negatived without a division

The House resumed and the Chairman reported the decision of the Committee

GOLD DISCOVERY REWARD

The House having again resolved itself into Committee

Mr Neales rose to move—

"Consideration in Committee of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to revive the reward for the discovery of a gold-field, on terms likely to induce a greater number of persons to proceed with an efficient search for the same"

It was known to hon members that in 1854 there was a reward placed upon the Estimates and also gazetted for the discovery of a gold-field, but it was attended by conditions not likely to tend to a good result All he now wished was that a notice should be issued that the same amount then offered would be payable upon certain conditions which he would leave to the Government, as they were now better acquainted with the subject than they were in 1854, or he would be happy to render them any advice he could give in the matter He believed this was a more legitimate mode of testing the existence of gold than fitting out very small expeditions, but it would supplement the other method and it was of so much consequence to us now to discover a gold-field that we should adopt every possible means

The motion was then agreed to

The House resumed, and the Chairman reported the decision of the Committee

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The Treasurer moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House on the Supplementary Estimates be received These Estimates had been a long time before the House, and it was highly desirable that some of the works for which votes had been passed should be proceeded with immediately He was aware there were some motions on the paper for reopening the discussion of some items, but he hoped the House would see that it was time the Estimates should be passed, more especially as in a very few days the General Estimates would come under consideration, and any items not in the Supplementary Estimates could be introduced in the General Estimates

Mr REYNOLDS said no one regretted more than he did that the Supplementary Estimates had been so long before the House, but if it had not been for the recommittal of the item for the boat jetty at the Semaphore, they would have been passed more than a week ago, so that he as an individual was not responsible for the delay He should move that the further consideration of these Estimates be postponed to Friday, as he wanted further information on one or two points First of all the House had agreed to have a jetty at the Semaphore He did not want to interfere with that decision, but he wanted something more than the assurance of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works that it would not cost more than £5,000 This jetty was to be 1,900 feet long Now the Willunga jetty was 347 feet long, and it cost near £3,000, and how was the hon the Commissioner of Public Works to construct one of 1,900 feet for £5,000 If the House voted money for a structure which a good gale of wind or a good swell of the ocean or sea would prostrate, he could only say they could do something with their money better than that No structure of this kind, 9 feet wide and 1,900 feet long could stand He asserted from information before the House, that it was monstrous and he was justified in saying that he had no faith in the estimate of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works It was true the hon the Commissioner of Public Works had assured the House that if the work could not be done for £5,000, it should not be done at all He (Mr Reynolds) had faith in the hon gentleman, but he said "let us have a jetty which will stand, and not one which we can look at for a few days and which will then disappear" Otherwise the hon gentleman might be accused of putting up a structure which was too weak, as he (Mr Reynolds) had been charged with building a bridge which was too weak, that he had yet to find out, that it was insufficient for its purpose Then there was a sum of £1,300 for a Colonial Hansard, and some hon gentlemen were in a mist as to whether this was to pay for the old Hansard, and the balance only to go to the current Hansard If he rightly understood the Attorney-General, according to the specifications of the present Hansard, the contractors were permitted to charge for corrections If so he had no hesitation in saying that it was contrary to the original specifications, nor did he believe that it was in accordance with the understanding of the parties who contracted He also thought that in making arrangements with the parties who printed the Hansard they should make better arrangements for correcting the slips sent to hon members than merely leaving them in a certain place on the morning after the speech to be delivered at twelve o'clock next day There should also be better arrangements made in the House as to the place in which the parties contracting should deposit the slips for correction There was also a rumor that another party had not been properly dealt with, that a preference had been given to the gentleman who now had the publication of the Hansard, and that he had been put in possession of information which was not furnished to other parties He had intended to move the recommittal of the vote for the new Registry offices also, but would not now do so He moved that the Estimates be postponed to Friday

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion There was another matter with regard to the Hansard which had not been looked to He gathered from the hon the Treasurer that out of the £1,300 on the Estimates £500 was for the Hansard of last year, and he learned from the editor of the Advertiser that £1,300 was to be paid for the present Hansard His object was to add to the vote the words "for the present session only," in order to oblige the Government to apply for a supplemental sum for the Hansard of last year He believed that no tenders were asked for that "Hansard," but that the work was given to a person who offered to do it, and he had heard reports that the work was not done in a satisfactory manner He understood from the hon the Treasurer that he would have to pay for that "Hansard" a sum of £500 out of the £1,300 on the Supplementary Estimates, and to apply for a further sum for the "Hansard" of the present year He believed if the Government could not give a proper explanation of the course taken in reference to the "Hansard" of last year, that the money would be refused He understood there were printers ready to bring out a "Hansard," and that they went to expense in preparing reports, but owing to the course taken of giving the "Hansard" to a person to print for £500, these reports were not availed of With regard to the exquisite structure at the Semaphore, it appeared that this was the cause of the Estimates being delayed Why did the Government consent to it being recommitted before The hon the Commissioner of Public Works said that if the jetty could not be constructed for £5,000, he would not go about it at all That was a good guarantee, but he (Mr Strangways) would like a "material guarantee." (Laughter) If the hon the Chief Secretary ordered the hon the Commissioner of Public Works to construct the jetty or resign—was the hon gentleman prepared to resign? ("Hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works, and much laughter) He understood the hon gentleman to say "hear, hear" That made a slight alteration in the guarantee, but only very slight (Renewed laughter) The hon gentleman might get a tender for £5,000 and get the work done, but how would it be done? 1,900 feet was one-half as long again as the Glenelg Jetty, and whilst the contractors were constructing one portion of the 1,900 feet they would probably find that 600 feet of the inner end was gone altogether How this jetty, half as long again as the jetty at Glenelg, was to be constructed at one-fifth the cost of the latter he could not tell

Mr COLE rose to address the House, amidst loud cries of "Divide," which were persisted in, and the House divided with the following result, the original motion being carried by a majority of 11 Ayes, 21, Noes, 10 —

AYES, 21—Attorney-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Burford, Solomon, McDermott, Duffield, Glyde, Scammell, Collinson, Hart, Young, Hallett, McEllister, Neales, Shannon, Hawker, Milne, Lindsay, Barrow, the Treasurer (Teller)

NOES, 10—Messrs Wark, Harvey, Dunn, Hay, Cole, Rogers, Strangways, Mildred, Peake, Reynolds, (Teller)

MESSRS BAKER AND WATERHOUSE

Upon the motion of Mr NEALES the petition of Messrs Baker and Waterhouse recently presented to the House was ordered to be printed

POLICE REGULATIONS

Mr MCELLISTER, in accordance with notice, asked the Attorney-General whether there were any regulations in force governing the procedure in investigating charges against subordinate officers in the civil service of this colony, and whether those regulations had been acted upon in the case of Sergeant Nolan recently dismissed from the Police Force? His object in putting the question was to remedy any evils which existed He had known many policemen dismissed without being apprised for what they were dismissed Sergeant Nolan had been many years in the service, in fact, he believed he had been with Captain Sturt The hon member was proceeding when reminded by the SPEAKER that he must not argue the question

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, in reply to the question that there were regulations in force which applied to all departments of the service except the Police force, and with regard to the Police force there were special regulations in order to afford the Commissioner or head of that force an opportunity of maintaining proper discipline There were special regulations in reference to the dismissal of officers of the Police force, and, so far as he knew, all who entered that force were informed of those regulations which gave the Commissioner power to dismiss where the continuance of parties in the force would be calculated to impair its efficiency He was informed that Sergeant Nolan entered the force with a knowledge of those regulations, and that they had been acted upon in his case The House would probably be of opinion that there should be a distinction between the police and other branches of the civil service, and, in reply to the question, he would say that there were regulations affecting the civil service generally, and special regulations affecting the police, which had been acted upon in the case of Sergeant Nolan

The House adjourned at 20 minutes past 4 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 14

At a quarter-past 1 o clock by the Post Office clock there were only six members in attendance Several of these gentlemen drew the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the clock was four minutes too slow, and the bell to summon members from the lobby was rung, but the Speaker observed that he was bound by the clock in the Chamber, and could not adjourn the House in consequence of there not being a quorum present until that clock indicated that the grace allowed had expired, and that it was a quarter-past 1 o'clock Four hon members subsequently entered but still there was not a sufficient number present to constitute a quorum

FRIDAY OCTOBER 15

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after one o'clock

SLAUGHTERING WITHIN THE CITY

Mr SOLOMON presented a petition from the Butchers of Adelaide against a proposition to alter a clause in the District Councils Act which gives power to slaughter within one mile of the City The petitioners prayed that the existing law might not be altered

BALANCES IN THE BANKS

The TREASURER laid upon the table a return which had been asked for showing the balances belonging to the Treasury in the various Banks

PETITION OF MR DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL in reference to the motion standing in his name—

"That the petition of John Finlay Duff be referred to a Select Committee, for the purpose of examining into his claim, and reporting on the same to this House"

said that he found there were so many Select Committees sitting that it would be a physical impossibility for a fresh committee to be formed for some time He would therefore move that the motion be an Order of the Day for 3rd November next

Carried

THE TANUNDA ROAD

Mr BAKEWELL put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether it is the intention of the Government to take measures for complying with the petition of the inhabitants of Tanunda"

The petitioners complained that a main line of road from Gawler had been permitted to get into disuse and disrepair, and they now asked that the road referred to might be declared a main road, and that a sufficient sum might be placed on the Estimates for its repair and maintenance It appeared there had been something like a breach of faith on the part of the Government, for when the township of Tanunda was formed the road referred to was regarded as a main line He was desirous of obtaining the information now asked for prior to taking further action

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that the main lines of road were defined by Act of Parliament, and that the line of road to which the hon member for Barossa had referred had never been included in any Act The Government would shortly be in a position to bring forward a new Road Act with a schedule of main lines attached, and then the whole question would be discussed as to what ought to be the main lines of road in the colony There were he thought cases in which there should be main lines where there were not, and there were other cases in which the reverse was the case, but the fullest consideration would be given to the whole subject when the schedule was brought before the House

LICENSED SCHOOLS

Mr ROGERS moved—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return of schools licensed by the Central Board of Education within the City of Adelaide, also, as near as possible, the number of schools licensed within a radius of ten miles of Adelaide, the number of scholars attending such schools, and the amount paid to each teacher, and the total amount paid, also the number of schools licensed in the colony beyond the above radius, the number of children attending, and the amount paid to each teacher, and the total amount paid to such teachers"

He was induced to move for the return solely for the purpose of obtaining information upon the subject, as he had often thought that so far as Adelaide was concerned fewer and larger schools would be better He had found in travelling the country districts that the present system did not succeed, but greater consideration might be given to the districts if the course which he had suggested in reference to Adelaide were adopted He had no wish to create any antagonistic feeling between the country districts and Adelaide but his only desire was to extend the present system of education There was a great difficulty in the country districts in obtaining efficient teachers in consequence of the smallness of the remuneration—only some £40 or £50 a year In the country districts the children were to a great extent uneducated, and the information which he asked for might he thought assist the House in determining how to amend the existing Act, which at present did not prescribe at what distance in the country one school should be from another

Mr LINDSAY, in seconding the motion, remarked that he believed the information asked for would tend materially to shew the necessity of amending the present educational system In a country where the form of Government was essentially republican, as it was here, it was highly desirable that the masses should be educated, otherwise they would degenerate into something worse than the American States, probably into a state of despotism He might instance Utah as an example

The motion was carried

ENGINEER TO THE WATERWORKS

Mr STRANGWAYS put the question standing in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether the late Engineer to the Waterworks Commissioners has been taken into the service of the Railway Commissioners"

He had heard, upon what he considered reliable authority, that Mr Hamilton, late Engineer to the Waterworks, was about to be or had been taken into the employ of the Railway Commissioners under the Chief Engineer It appeared to him remarkably strange that an officer should be permitted to resign his office in connection with one department in consequence of not being competent, and should shortly afterwards be taken into the service of another department

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that owing to the very great number of people out of employment, the Government took every means of furnishing employment to as many as possible On the passing of the Kapunda Railway Bill it was considered exceedingly desirable that the works should be commenced at as early a period as possible and he communicated that fact to the Railway Commissioners It was necessary that some party should be employed to mark out the line, and Mr Hamilton tendered to do so at a very reasonable rate He (the Commissioner of Public Works) accepted that offer

RAILWAYS EXPENDITURE

Mr REYNOLDS moved—

"That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing how the sum of £73,000, voted last session for the completion of the South Australian Railways, has been applied"

He was induced to ask for the return, because it would be remembered that when the money was voted, certain sums were set down for increasing the accommodation afforded by the goods sheds for coke-sheds and additions to the engine-sheds, but he found that these works had not been completed, and if he remembered rightly when he asked the Commissioner of Public Works what had been done with the money which had been voted for the goods-sheds, the hon gentleman informed him that it had been expended in laying down some rails But there was a sum included in the sum of £73,000 specially for laying down rails, and consequently he thought there should be further information upon the subject The House ought to know why and wherefore certain works were not carried out after money had been voted for them In the £73,000 there were sums for the cost of an engine and trucks, which he found had not been bought, and he thought the House were consequently entitled to ask what had become of the amount

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that of course there could be no possible objection to give the information asked for, but the hon member had misunderstood him in reference to the amount which had been expended upon rails When the sum of £7 000 for the goods sheds was under discussion he had stated that there was a sum of £2,000 available for the purpose, which would about pay for the alteration in the rails The House was quite right in knowing how the sums which they voted were applied, and the information which was asked for should be supplied as early as possible

THE RIVER WEIR

Mr REYNOLDS put the question standing in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) what are the remedial measures which he considers should be adopted to secure the river weir and promote its permanent usefulness, and which he refers to in his letters to the Waterworks Commissioners on the 27th September, 1858"

The Government were doubtless aware of the great interest which was felt in the stability of the River Weir and he desired to know what course it was proposed to adopt for the purpose of remedying its defects The House were aware that a Commission had been appointed to examine into the character of the structure, and to report upon it and the best means of remedying its defects, but he found by the report that the Commission declined to give an opinion, because there had not been that thorough examination of the structure which was necessary in order to enable them to give an opinion upon its present condition, and what was necessary to make it useful, he might say, secure it from destruction He found that the Government were in possession of information which the Commissioners did not appear to be in possession of No doubt the Commissioner of Public Works had taken the opinion of some high authority, because it was well known, notwithstanding the great abilities of the Commissioner of Public Works, that he was not a professional gentleman The hon. member concluded by reading the extract referred to in the motion from the letter of the Commissioner of Public Works to the Waterworks Commissioners

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was obliged to plead guilty to the statement that he was not a civil engineer, nor was he gifted with any great ability in connection with that profession The hon member should have read the whole of the passage or paragraph to which he had referred, and he would then have seen that the Board had asked that the information now asked for should be withheld till the new Engineer had been consulted upon the subject The whole of the papers had been placed in the hands of that gentleman

Mr REYNOLDS asked if he understood the hon gentleman to refuse to give the information

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS did not think it could be of any service, particularly as the Waterworks Commissioners had asked that it might be withheld till the matter had been referred to the new Engineer

Mr REYNOLDS remarked that the hon gentleman seemed to think the Commissioners of more importance than members of that House

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had said not so, but the fact was that he thought so little of his own abilities in connection with the subject—less even than the hon member for the Sturt

RIVERTON AND CLARE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH

The House resolved itself into Committee for the consideration in Committee of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for 1859, for the purpose of extending the electric telegraph from Riverton to Clare, by way of Auburn and Watervale

Mr HAWKER remarked that the subject had been so fully discussed he would not go further into it He would however allude to one remark which had been made during the discussion, that some grand scheme in connection with telegraphs should be initiated. This could not be done at present as extension must be determined by population. It was impossible to lay down a scheme for telegraphs, except it was based upon population.

Mr McEllister seconded.

Mr Strangways believed that nothing would prove of greater service than telegraphic communication, but thought it would be much better that some definite plan should be laid down for the extension of telegraphic communication. He should like the Commissioner of Public Works to state to the House the general principle upon which the Government would advise the House to grant telegraphic extension, so as to render it unnecessary for specific motions to be brought forward by hon. members. He believed that the telegraphs would be far more profitable if the charges were reduced. The charge of 2s. for every ten words from Adelaide to Goolwa practically prevented the use of the telegraph. He had heard that on the intercolonial line the Government had acted upon the expressed views of other colonies but he thought it would be better that each colony should make what charge it thought proper. The charge of 6s. for ten words from Adelaide to Melbourne was far too much. He did not know if the extension now proposed was likely to be remunerative, but he should wish the following addition:—"Telegraph to be constructed as soon as the Superintendent of Telegraphs considers advisable."

Mr Hawker remarked that the Superintendent of Telegraphs had been consulted by himself before the motion was placed upon the paper.

The Commissioner of Public Works said that in the former discussion the hon. member for Victoria had stated that he had had communication with the Superintendent of Telegraphs upon the subject, and on that occasion the general policy of the Government in reference to electric telegraphs was fully stated by the Attorney-General. The Government felt that the telegraphic system was peculiarly suited to the wants of this community, and the Government would be glad to extend the telegraph wherever there was a reasonable probability of the line paying working expenses. Arrangements had been made with the neighboring colonies as to the charges which were made in connection with the intercolonial telegraph. He agreed that the charges were too high, and he should be glad to see them slightly reduced, but it was not for the Government to do so without communicating with the neighboring colonies. The colony of Victoria took a different view, their charges being rather higher than ours, and that colony had manifested a disinclination to reduce them. He might mention that between London and Edinburgh the charge for ten words was five shillings and sixpence.

Mr Reynolds did not like to oppose the motion because Clare had asked for a daily mail, and as that was not granted, perhaps this would serve as a substitute. Where there was a probability of a line paying, he thought it should be constructed, but he did not think they should go on extending lines anywhere and everywhere without having a written statement from the Superintendent of Telegraphs as to the probable result of the extension. At present the House were in a state of ignorance upon the point.

The Commissioner of Public Works said the motion was merely for an address to His Excellency, and before subsequent action was taken, he would take care to supply the information alluded to from Mr Todd.

Mr Lindsay did not oppose the motion but agreed to some extent with the observations of those who had spoken against it. If the argument in reference to the population in the neighbourhood of Burra and Clare were good, no doubt equally good arguments might be adduced for the construction of lines in various other parts of the country. If the general question as to where lines would pay were submitted to Mr Todd, no doubt that gentleman would point out many other places.

Mr Hawker said the hon. member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) appeared to have suddenly discovered that it was necessary to have a written statement from Mr Todd, but he was surprised that the other day, when thousands were being voted away for telegraphs to Mount Barker, Goolwa, and various other places, the hon. member had not said a single word about the necessity of having Mr Todd's written opinion. As to the telegraph being a substitute for a daily mail that was preposterous, he could not imagine any man of common sense entertaining such an idea. Where a telegraph was established there was an increase of postal revenue. The post-offices on the north line, between Adelaide and Clare, and Adelaide and Kooringa, were the only two which were paying any revenue to the colony. A short time ago it was resolved to establish a daily mail to Truro, though the revenue was deficient on that line, and he was convinced that the daily mail to Clare would more than pay expenses. When telegraphic communication was understood, he felt assured it would pay a revenue to the colony.

Mr Young felt bound to oppose the motion, on the ground of it being detached from one general system of telegraphic communication. Notwithstanding the remarks which had been made in reference to the population in the vicinity of Burra and Clare, those districts were only of very recent formation and settlement. Before sanctioning the extension of the telegraph to new districts, he should prefer ascertaining what was the result of telegraphic communication with older districts. The expense was very great, and he believed that in many instances the posts would in a few years tumble to the ground. He should like to know the use already made of the telegraph in districts which had been settled for twenty years.

Mr Peake remarked that the hon. member must have been asleep to speak of Clare as having been recently settled. Large surveys in that locality had been purchased 14 or 15 years ago, and he could not think what the hon. member meant by such an assertion as he had made. He had made an attempt to get a daily mail for Clare, but it was stated by the Treasurer that this could not be afforded, though he thought it ought to be. The House, he hoped, would not refuse telegraphic communication between Adelaide and a thickly populated district, such as that now referred to.

Mr McEllister supported the motion on account of the large population in the districts to which it was proposed to extend the telegraph. The population of Clare was greater than that of Gawler Town.

Mr Hay believed if there were any district in the colony which could lay claim to telegraphic communication it was Clare. He quite agreed that the telegraph should be used to save the expense of the Post-Office. If by establishing telegraphs they could at the same time establish a less expensive system of letter-carrying, let them do so by all means. Clare was the third town in the colony. ('No, no.') Taking Adelaide and the suburbs as the first, Burra was second, and Clare the third. Clare was in fact the place at which the traffic from Mount Remarkable centred.

Mr Neales supported the motion, but not for the reasons which had been urged by the last speaker. He could not coincide with an hon. member who, in giving a list of Corporations, omitted Port Adelaide. If the hon. member looked to where the docks and warehouses were, he thought he would admit that Port Adelaide was a little before Clare. He thought it rather a stretch to say what had been urged during the debate, that Clare contained a greater population than Gawler Town. He thought that the claim for the wire was undoubted, but not upon the ground which had been stated.

The motion for the address was carried, the House resumed, and the report was adopted.

MOUNT GAMBIER

The House resolved itself into Committee for the consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting His Excellency will take such steps as may be necessary for the immediate survey of the country between Mount Gambier and the seaboard, for the purpose of constructing a tramway between these localties.

Mr Hawker said before going into the subject he would like to make a slight alteration at the suggestion of the Attorney-General, so that the motion would read "for the immediate examination of the country before survey." He thought the subject had been so well ventilated that the House would have no difficulty in agreeing to the proposition. A very large sum of money had been taken out of the district by the purchase of lands, and it was essential roads should be constructed. From the character of the district macadamised roads were out of the question, and it was necessary that they should adopt a survey for the purpose of determining what roads would be best. The district was rising in importance every day, and he had seen several influential gentlemen and landholders who had informed him that the unanimous wish of the district was that the road should be made to Guichen Bay instead of Rivoli Bay.

Mr Milne thought it necessary that there should be an addendum to the motion, to the effect that Rivoli Bay should be examined, as it was possible that Rivoli Bay might be found the most available port. It was desirable the House should be in possession of every information on the point.

Mr Hawker had no objection to the addition, and the address as amended being agreed to, the House resumed, and the report was adopted.

COLONIAL DEFENCES

On the motion of the Treasurer the time allowed to the Select Committee on this subject for bringing up their report was extended to Friday, 22nd instant.

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

On the motion of Mr Bakewell the second reading of this Bill was made an order of the day for Wednesday, November 3rd.

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Commissioner of Public Works asked leave to introduce this Bill. It had been brought under the notice of the Government that where level-crossings existed gates might be done away with, and by this means a saving of £3,000 a year could be effected. It was no new principle, inasmuch as in the Act to extend the Gawler Town line to Section 112 it was embodied in the 9th clause. But as it was held in another place to be inconsistent with the Bill and that therefore the principle should be embodied in a separate measure, the clause containing it did not receive the assent of Parliament. The Government thought that the principle should be carried out, as a saving of £3,000 a year would be effected with no extra danger to any one If the House allowed him to introduce the Bill there would be an opportunity of discussing the matter very fully on the second reading

MR STRANGWAYS wished to know whether the Bill, if passed, would be a perfect Bill in itself, and would have the old Railway Act incorporated in it

MR LINDSAY was opposed to the abolition of gates and gatekeepers, and the leaving of the crossings unprotected, especially as there seemed a strong desire on the part of our engineers to make every crossing, if possible, on the level With regard to the saving of £3000 a year, when our railway matters were placed on a proper footing we would be able to construct and maintain our lines for perhaps one-half what they cost at present

The TREASURER (in reply to the hon member, Mr Lindsay), said that the object of the Bill was not totally to repeal the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, but only the three clauses of that Act which had reference to the subject of crossings By that Act gates and gatekeepers were required, and it was proposed to alter this by the present Bill

Leave was then given to introduce the Bill, which was accordingly introduced and read a first time, and the second reading fixed for Thursday next

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that when he obtained leave to introduce this Bill, he stated that he would allow a considerable time to hon members to look into it It had now been in their hands a fortnight, and he was sure must have obtained, especially from the country members, the attention it demanded The District Councils were exceedingly valuable institutions, and calculated to do still more good in future as every person travelling through the country must have observed It was some years since these bodies were called into existence, and there were many Acts affecting matters which the Councils had control over Various difficulties had arisen in working the institutions, and amongst others local jealousies, and a feeling, sometimes well and sometimes ill-founded, that the money should be spent where it was raised This feeling had led to a desire to introduce what was called the "ward system" The old Act threw certain impediments in the way of introducing this system which he regarded as a valuable one, and it was one of the objects of the present Act to simplify the introduction of this system or the division of District Councils into wards It also conferred upon the Governor increased power for the alteration of districts when such alteration was properly asked for It would also give the Councils greater power for the recovery of rates, and a simpler and cheaper plan of compelling members to occupy their seats when once properly elected This was a matter which had already occupied the attention of the law courts, and which should therefore be speedily settled The question of the validity of rates, and as to whether they had been assessed at a proper rate meeting, was also one which had occupied the attention of the law and one object of the Bill was to simplify and cheapen trials on these points Another object of the Bill, and one which would alone commend itself to the consideration of hon members, was that it was a codification of previous Acts and the arrangement of the Bill seemed very well devised He thought all hon members connected with districts, or who had observed their working, would agree that these were steps in the right direction With these few remarks he moved that the Bill be read a second time

DR WARK said it was not his intention to oppose the second reading, but at the same time he did not at all coincide in all that had been said in favor of the Bill In fact he would rather have the old Bill as it stood than this one, for though the present measure would render the Councils easier in working in some respects, it would greatly increase their difficulties in others It seemed that when a Councillor was elected he must take office and in taking office he resigned the rights and privileges of an Englishman If a person, for instance, was a merchant he might be called upon to go to another colony, and if he left for that purpose he would be subject to an enormous fine unless he went away with the consent of his brother Councillors These gentlemen might wish to know his private business, and if the unfortunate individual did not choose to explain it, he would be liable to a fine Or a man might not be able to spare time, he might have to go by the first vessel and then he should pay a heavy fine The Chairman also might be in a fine fix, as it might not be he who presided over a meeting when Councillors were elected, and if he did not serve a notice through the Post Office within two days on the persons elected, he was in again for a very heavy fine Why was a notice through the Post Office better than any other? Would it not be more certain that the Clerk of the Council should leave a note with each person elected, considering that many persons liable to be elected seldom went to the Post Office? Under this Bill persons would not only surrender their rights and privileges as Englishmen, but they also subjected themselves to heavy fines if they failed to do just what they were told to do Again, many cases could be referred to the Local Courts Formerly all such appeals were settled by two justices on the spot, and he had never heard any objection to this mode of proceeding The Local Court might be 50 miles away, or the case might be tried in the Adelaide Court, and a man compelled to come down from the Burra or Clare He considered it a tyrannical Act, and such as he trusted the House would never assent to As far as the ward divisions were concerned he would go with the Government, as he knew of such injustice having been done from the fact of money being spent away from the localities in which it was raised He also approved of the facilities for altering the boundaries and extent of district

MR STRANGWAYS would not oppose the second reading, but would endeavour in committee to have all the manifold improvements of the hon Commissioner of Public Works struck out or modified, as he believed that almost every one of them would prove highly injurious in its operation The first point in the Bill was that a person elected as a Councillor, and being absent for a certain period, was to be fined Looking at the exemption clause, he found that members of that or the other House were not exempt from election It was very possible, or rather probable, that a member of either House might be elected to a district Council, and as he could not attend in both places, he would be liable to a fine of £20 Further on there was a most remarkable clause which would deprive the owners of all cattle and horses of their property (Calls of number) By the 117th clause he found that "all cattle at large within a district, above the age of twelve months, and marked with any brand, shall be, and be held to be the property of the District Council" (Laughter) That was one of the improvements to which the hon gentleman so feelingly alluded, but which he would oppose and he knew that he would be strongly supported by the House in resisting so monstrous a clause Then any disputes as to how the Council should be chosen were to be referred not to a Court which could settle them, but knotty points of law were to be referred to a couple of country justices knowing nothing of law, and their decision was to be final or if not the appeal was to be made to the Local Court of Adelaide, composed probably of the same persons Then the Act was to be retrospective, and he believed it was the first time of an Act of the Legislature having ever been made retrospective without some special reason Again, the Council had power to sell land for rates On an unfenced and unoccupied section, as the rates would seldom exceed 1s in the pound of rent, there might be 4s due and the Council would be entitled to sell land enough to pay that amount How much land were they to sell in such a case? This clause was only introduced because it was in the Corporation Act of the City of Adelaide There had been numerous instances in which the Corporation had endeavoured to enforce their right, but it had always been found inoperative It would also be inoperative now, and if so, what was the use of introducing it There were many other objectionable points in the Bill, which was evidently framed with the intention of conferring as much power as possible on those who framed it, and conferring as little benefit as possible on the public

MR NEALES would support the second reading, and only rose for the purpose of remonstrating with those hon members who, though they were not going to oppose the Bill at this stage availed themselves of the opportunity of making set speeches Such a course was merely wasting the time of the House

MR BARROW would also support the second reading, but trusted there would be no attempt to carry the Bill into Committee that afternoon He would not at present urge any of the objections which he was prepared to bring forward when the Bill was in Committee He had been in communication with some of his constituents on the measure, and he knew it was their opinion that many amendments were wanting in it

MR LINDSAY said, in reply to a remark of the hon member for the city (Mr Neales), that he found that unless the attention of hon members was called to the objectionable clauses of a Bill on its second reading, it was liable to be hurried through Committee before hon members noticed the defects This measure showed how easily a bitter pill could be gilded, and an Anglo-Saxon population induced to swallow it The District Council system was what Sir Henry Young had introduced under the title of the District Road Board System It was then rejected, but by altering the title, it was swallowed by the public The whole system was an ingenious dodge to shift from the Central Government their most important duty, to impose it upon the people and to induce the people to tax themselves to carry it out (Cries of no, no) He had a right to speak on the subject, having been himself a District Councillor Possibly he might be wrong, but if the principle were sound why was not the Central Government carried out in the same way If the District Councillors worked for nothing he did not see why the Government officers did not carry on the Government for nothing (Laughter) And why a Chief Secretary for instance should not be fined £500 if he refused to perform the duties of his office gratuitously (Laughter) This would be only an extension of the principle of District Councils

MR BAKEWELL differed from the hon member for the city in one point He thought there was a great advantage in hon members discussing the clauses of a Bill on the second reading as it directed the attention of the member in charge of the Bill to the clauses before going into Committee He considered the point as to the power of the Councils to sell lands for rates very important, and he hoped the hon member for Encounter Bay would consider it before giving his vote With regard to ousting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court he thought it was very proper to do so, as the object was to save expense As to the remark of the hon member for Encounter Bay, (Mr Strangways) that all the cattle in a district would become the property of the Council it was clearly a mistake in the printing The clause referred to all the unbranded cattle and how the hon member could have discovered such a mare's nest he (Mr Bakewell) could not understand With regard to the remarks of the hon member for the Murray about resigning the privileges of an Englishman in order to be fined, he (Mr Bakewell) did not know that it was the privilege of an Englishman to neglect his duty (Hear, hear) He should attend to his duty, and if he was fined he should discharge his fine

The TREASURER supported most cordially the second reading, as he considered the Bill a great improvement upon the existing law One observation must have been made by an hon, member without due consideration He meant that of the hon member for Encounter Bay, with regard to cattle becoming the property of the Councils The hon member could not have exercised his usual acumen, or he would have seen that the clause referred to unbranded cattle If the hon member did see the matter in that light, he (the Treasurer) must only judge of the sincerity of the hon member's other objections by this one Then the hon member for Encounter Bay, had said that there had been merely a change from the District Road Board, into the District Councils but he (the Treasurer) thought it was of the greatest utility in introducing local government, and that it was a feather in the cap of Sir Henry Young, It was not intended to divest the central Government of part of their duty, but to confer upon the inhabitants of the districts local powers which the central Government could not exercise so advantageously It would be impossible for the central Government to expend the money as wisely and judiciously as local bodies, for local knowledge was wanted for the purpose, and more than all, that self interest which induced people to spend money in their own localities The hon member referred to the inexpediency of asking members of Councils to serve without salaries and asked why the same principle was not applied to the central Government But there was a wide distinction, for the members of the District Councils had only to give a portion of their time, whilst the members of the central Government were supposed to give the whole of theirs As to the power to sell land for rates, it would be carefully sifted in Committee, but it was not a new power, as it existed many years ago in the Corporation Act of Adelaide There was a great safeguard in the Act against improper sales which might damage absentees for such a sale could only take place after an appeal to the Supreme Court, and the Government had sufficient reliance upon the judgment of that Court to believe that it would take no steps which could prove harsh, but that justice would be done to all parties An hon member also objected to the appeal to the Local Court of Adelaide, but that was one of the great advantages of the Act, as that Court would be uniform in all its decisions He supported the second reading

Mr BURFORD said if he thought the opinion of the House was like that of the hon member (Mr Lindsay) he should look upon it with great uneasiness Self-control and self-taxation were the great features in the system of the Councils, and he hoped the time was long distant before we would retrograde from these principles As to the remark of the hon member for Encounter Bay respecting the cattle being the property of the Council, it was evident that the word "not" had been left out, but as the hon the Treasurer remarked it was an accident But formerly the unbranded cattle were the property of the Government, and to show that this Bill was an improvement he would point out that they would now be the property of the Councils As to the propriety of asking persons to work without pay, he believed local government and taxation could not be carried out without that principle, and he was sure that for the benefit of the country any reasonable man would rather submit to the system than be deprived of his voice in the raising and expenditure of taxation As to the lien on land, as the hon the Treasurer said, it was not a new feature, for it formed part of the first Act of the Corporation of Adelaide, of which he (Mr Burford) had the honor of being a member, and he had no doubt if the hon member for Encounter Bay had been a citizen at the time he would have been a most strenuous supporter of the system, for there were absentee proprietors who would evade payment if they could, but they could not do so owing to this clause He hoped this was not one of the improvements against which the hon member would level his great gun

Mr REYNOLDS would not have addressed the House, but that the hon member for the City had said, if he (Mr Reynolds) remembered rightly, that to speak on the clauses of a Bill on the second reading was not usual

Mr NEALES rose in explanation What he had said was, that it was not desirable It was far too usual

Mr REYNOLDS said that the second reading was the time for the great discussion He made this remark in order that hon members who had lately come into the House might know what was the practice He was obliged to the hon member on his right (Mr Strangways) for calling his attention to the omission in one of the clauses, as it might otherwise have escaped his observation and that of other hon members and they might have passed a most monstrous clause It would greatly assist hon members if the Government adopted the system followed in the Electoral Act of last year, and marked the clauses taken from previous Bills There was another power conferred in the Bill not given by other Acts that of raising money by loan, which could be of no possible use, as people would not advance money on the security of a District Council It would be well if this portion of the Bill were struck out He would support the second reading, and reserve his objections to a future time

Mr PEAKE expressed his pleasure in supporting the Bill, generally, as it tended to uphold one of the most valuable portions of Constitutional Government—the municipal system But he would call attention to clauses 67 to 81, which conferred the power of raising loans by pledging the rates He was aware how valuable this power might be if judiciously used, but he asked the hon Commissioner of Public Works and the Government to reflect before giving this power to the Councils as at present constituted It would be scarcely safe to entrust the Councils with such power as that of pledging the rates, which might be exercised in a moment of haste, rashness, or cabal If the Councils were required to apply to the House for permission before pledging the rates, it would be a great safeguard

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the clause in reference to loans was copied from the Act in force at present and which had been in force since the commencement of the Councils generally Hon members would find that there was a provision that the power could not be exercised without the consent of two-thirds of the ratepayers The Bill also limited the amount which a Council could borrow Though the clause was inoperative at present the time might come when the Councils would have better credit He need not tell the House that the clause relating to the branded cattle was a mistake, but it was one of those which the Chairman of Committees had power to make an alteration in without the assent of the House as the marginal note pointed out the error But there was another very amusing error which he wondered had escaped notice. It was in the 29th clause, and it gave the Councils power to commit an assault —(laughter)—for the word "assault" was substituted for "default" With regard to the case of a man who would not pay his 4s for rates, and would have his land sold the House should remember that it was not legislating for such persons, but for South Australia If the rates were properly levied, and the man would not pay then he (the hon Commissioner) had very little sympathy with him if his land was sold He hoped hon members would not oppose the second reading, but after the expression of opinion from some hon members he would not press the Bill into Committee

The Bill was then read a second time, without a division, and its consideration in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday, 19th inst

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the second reading of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday next

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

On the motion of the TREASURER the consideration of the Matrimonial Causes Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

CUSTOMS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

In Committee

On the motion of the TREASURER the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Customs Acts Amendment Bill were taken into consideration

The amendments, which were merely verbal, were passed

The House resumed

The SPEAKER reported the Bill The report was adopted, and the House agreed that a message should be sent to the Legislative Council to the effect that the amendments had been agreed to

IMPOUNDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

In Committee

Mr HAWKER proposed amendments to render it imperative upon poundkeepers to give notice to the owners (if known) of cattle impounded, within 24 hours after the impounding had taken place He also moved that notices should be given in two weekly newspapers instead of the Government Gazette, because few persons had the opportunity of seeing the Gazette while almost every one took a weekly newspaper

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed that a penalty of £5 should be inflicted for misdescription of the cattle impounded

Mr NEALES suggested that the words inserted should be "not sufficiently described" in addition to misdescription

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS proposed that instead of twenty-four hours, forty eight should be allowed to give notice to the owners when known of the impounding of their cattle

The amendment was carried

Mr MILDRED having seen three columns of impoundings in the Register newspaper wished to know by whom the expense of those advertisements was to be paid He thought it would be an expensive mode of publication if owners of impounded cattle had to pay for insertion in the daily papers as well as in the Government Gazette

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, that the newspapers received no remuneration whatever for inserting those notices The object of inserting them in the Gazette was, that there should be an official record of the impoundings and of the brands which could be produced in Court He thought it advisable that the impounding notices should be published in the newspapers and that the proprietors should be remunerated but on the other hand to compel the poundkeepers to advertise in both papers would add very considerably to the expense of releasing impounded cattle He should be glad of the opinion of the House on the subject

Mr NEALES thought there was no doubt of the advisability of advertising in the newspapers instead of in the Gazette The hon member for Noarlunga seemed to think that everybody could see the Gazette, but he (Mr Neales) thought there were several districts in which there was scarcely a Gazette at all In fact, he believed the circulation of the Gazette was confined principally to the town With regard to the expense being increased much by advertisement in the papers, he doubted that, for it appeared that they could be put into both papers for a small advance on what the Government paid for one paper If they were not paid for they would only be put in for convenience He would suggest that the words in the clause should be "in two weekly papers, if they existed"

Mr PEAKE thought there were scarcely two opinions with regard to the relative amount of publicity between advertisements in the public papers and in the Gazette But he questioned how far such advertisements would be evidence in the Supreme Court He should have liked to have heard the opinion of the Attorney-General on that head

Mr BARROW said that when hon members wished to recommend their remarks to the House they often said they were perfectly disinterested in the observations they were about to make In those which he would offer, he must however, say, that being connected with one of the public newspapers he was to a certain extent interested, although his interest in the question before them was infinitesimally small On grounds of public policy, and in spite of that personal interest, he felt it right to make a few remarks in reference to the clause in question It had been stated that if persons, whose cattle were impounded, had to pay for advertisements, the expense would be very heavy and to prove this it was alleged that there were two or three columns of those advertisements But he would ask among how many persons would that expense be divided? If, instead of three, there were 33 columns, the amount, however great in the aggregate, would be distributed among so large a number of persons that each would only have to pay a very small sum Were those advertisements required simply to preserve an official record of the impoundings, or to give information to people whose cattle were detained in it? He presumed for the latter purpose—that the farmers and graziers, and stockholders and others, should know when their cattle were impounded (Hear, hear) But the circulation of the Government Gazette was so very limited that it might be said to have no circulation at all, and if the hon member for Noarlunga (who appeared to differ) would ask for a return of the numbers of the Gazette sold, and of the persons into whose hands it went, he would find that those impounding notices might as well be published in Chinese as in the Gazette Such an arrangement was very different when all such notices were published in one broad sheet, when the Gazette formed part of the Register newspaper, which was the case in the early days of the colony, then they were a legal record, and had the benefit of publicity besides But it was no longer so The papers circulated, the Government Gazette did not circulate, but the owners of lost cattle were made to pay for advertising in the Gazette, which was scarcely ever seen It had been stated that impounding notices would be inserted gratuitously in the newspapers because they formed a portion of news To those whose cattle were impounded no doubt such "news" was interesting, but to others they were very dry reading indeed (A laugh) A lady once read Johnson's Dictionary through, and being asked how she liked it, said it really was very clever but rather unconnected, (loud laughter) and he thought most people would have the same opinion of the impounding notices if they went through them for any other than business purposes But if they were business advertisements, why should the newspapers be expected to publish them for nothing? The papers were under no obligation to put those notices in type, and the only reason why they had done so was because they thought the public needed the information, although the Legislature had omitted to provide for it Some time ago lists of unclaimed letters were published in the newspapers To those interested, that might be considered "news," but not to the community in general Those lists were no longer published, and the impounding notices might not be inserted much longer if so unjust a system were persisted in, for it was impossible to publish those purely commercial advertisements free of charge, when other and more interesting matter to the general reader had to be excluded to make room for them That House ought not to legislate under the idea that the charity of the newspapers would gratuitously advertise notices which the legislation of that House made needful (Oh, oh) An hon member said "Oh, oh" but he (Mr Barrow), would repeat that if the House passed a clause which made advertising desirable, and refused to legalise the payment of that advertising they were legislating upon the chances of newspaper charity (Hear, hear) He believed 4d a line was paid to the Government Gazette which did not circulate, and if instead of this a maximum were given of 6d a line, he thought (although speaking in behalf of only one of the newspapers) that the impounding notices might for that amount, be published in both the weekly papers, and perhaps in the daily papers also They would then be circulated through the length and breadth of the colony There appeared to be no general principle introduced into the Bills brought under the consideration of that House, with regard to official advertisements Sometimes provision was made for the publication of notices in the Government Gazette Sometimes in the public journals, but no rule had been laid down as to what sort of notices should be gazetted, and what should be advertised He thought it was time that that should be decided It had been stated that the insertion of a notice in the ordinary journals was not evidence in a court of law He was present, however, in the Supreme Court, when a person at Moorundee was charged with having stolen a horse, and the gentleman who defended him produced a copy of the Observer newspaper in which he had caused to be stated that the animal having strayed, had come into his possession When the Crown Solicitor was made aware of the existence of such evidence, he rose and said that after that evidence he should proceed no further with the case It would, however, be easy to insert a clause to the effect that an advertisement in the public papers should be admissible as evidence in the courts of law He had felt it right to make those observations on the ground of public convenience, and of common justice, although, in his peculiar position, he should not exercise his vote

Dr WARK thought the last speaker had made out a good case He thought the best means should be adopted for giving publicity, for the longer cattle were in the pound, the greater the expense incurred, and it appeared the only extra expense by publishing in the weekly papers was about one-third more than the expense of the Gazette

Mr STRANGWAYS should oppose the alteration The only official record was the Government Gazette He proposed that every poundkeeper should be compelled to file the Government Gazette, and produce it when called upon The question was whether the newspaper proprietors should be allowed to tax the public to the amount of £2,000 or £3,000 a year for advertising He supposed they would soon be asked to pay for the reports of trials in the Supreme Court He ridiculed the idea of the "charity" of the newspapers The hon member moved an amendment to the clause for imposing a penalty upon misdescription of brands, and for compelling every poundkeeper to keep a file of the Government Gazette

Mr DUNN did not consider the impounding notices dry reading They were eagerly read by the inhabitants in the country districts They were, however, only read in the weekly newspapers, never in the Gazette

Mr LINDSAY thought it necessary that they should be published in both the weekly papers and the Gazette

Mr BARROW asked if the entries in the Poundkeepers-book could be received as evidence

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS would rather the Attorney-General would answer that question

Mr NEALES considered that an Act of the House would render advertisements in the daily papers legal evidence

Mr HAY would support the proposition that notices should be inserted in the newspapers instead of the Gazette, for it would give them greater publicity although it might District be true the Gazette might be in the hands of the District Chairman, few people had the opportunity of seeing it He thought the proposition of Mr Strangways that the Gazette should be kept by poundkeepers in addition to the poundbooks was ridiculous Why place all descriptions of information in the hands of one man He thought it would be sufficient to send a copy of his books to the Resident Magistrate, and the district could see an account of the expense incurred As for the amount paid, it was a matter of indifference so far as the public were concerned, but the advertisements of impounding were really necessary, and he thought the best means should be taken to give those advertisements publicity

The TREASURER thought the further consideration of the clause had better be postponed

Agreed to

Clause 25 was postponed

Clause 26 defining how the pound fees and charges were to be accounted for, was carried with some amendment

Clause 27 "Release of cattle on payment of damages"

This clause was passed with the following words inserted in the 35th line, after the word "penalty," "for every such offence, a sum not exceeding"

Clause 28, "Penalty to Poundkeepers"

Passed with the omission of the words, "not less than one pound"

Clause 29 "Proceedings of Poundkeepers prior to sale"

Postponed

Clause 30, "Poundkeepers may sell without order of Justices"

Several amendments were proposed on this clause, but it was eventually struck out

Clause 31, "Time and mode of sale of impounded cattle and who may not sell"

Mr MILNE said this clause provided for the cattle being sold separately He thought it would be wise that there should be some restriction in case, for instance of a cow with a calf, where a separation would not be expedient

Postponed

Clause 32, "Poundkeepers to act as auctioneers"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said this clause was an alteration from the old Act. The intention of it was that the sale of cattle should be entrusted to persons of undoubted honesty. He did not wish to cast any slur upon the poundkeepers, who generally were, no doubt, respectable men, but the clause provided for a contingency

Mr MILDRED asked if the "duly licensed auctioneer" would have to pay a license-fee

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said it was not proposed to charge any fee. He thought the clause would have a very wholesome effect as every poundkeeper would know that it would be in the power of the Government to revoke his licence in cases of misconduct. He had heard of cases where there was every reasonable suspicion for believing the poundkeeper had acted most dishonestly, but who could not be convicted, as there was not sufficient evidence to be found against him

Mr SOLOMON asked the Treasurer whether he considered he had any power to issue licences without the usual fees being paid

The TREASURER stated that he would have that power given him by the passing of the Bill before them

After an amendment was proposed by Mr MILNE,

Mr SOLOMON said he was not satisfied with the answer of the Treasurer. His opinion was, that under the auctioneers' Act the licenses could not be granted without the payment of the fees

Mr STRANGWAYS agreed with the last speaker, and thought special powers would be required to alter the intent of the Auctioneer's Act

Mr LINDSAY would like to have the opinion of the Attorney General. He thought the statement of the Commissioner of Crown Lands went to prove that the poundkeepers were not the persons with whom a license might be entrusted. The present Impounding Bill was of a piece with the former as to its uselessness, but he supposed it was all that could be expected from the present Administration

Mr NEALES thought they were under obligations to the Ministry in introducing this improvement, by which respectable country auctioneers would be empowered to sell, and he thought more confidence would be established in such persons than in the poundkeepers, who frequently sold the cattle at a great sacrifice, either from negligence or to suit their own ends. The intention of this clause was thoroughly a good one. The time was come when trucking should be put a stop to

Several amendments were proposed and withdrawn again

Mr STRANGWAYS called the attention of the Government to the necessity there would be under this clause for a separate auction licence to be issued for each day's sale, and perhaps for each head of cattle

Mr SOLOMON would ask for the postponement of the clause, as he had not been satisfied as to the Government having the power to issue licences without charging the usual fees. He believed that the gentleman referred to by Mr Neales as selling at the Government land sales, could be fined for selling without a license on each occasion

The clause was postponed

Clauses 33 and 34 were also postponed

The CHAIRMAN reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Tuesday next

THE RUNS IN HACK'S COUNTRY

Mr MILDRED said that before he asked the questions standing in his name, he would have, he supposed, to preface them by a few remarks. It was well known to the House that a party was some time ago deputed to report upon Hack's Country. After the examination had taken place, a most brilliant description was given of the country, which induced certain parties to take leases. The persons taking the leases had gone to considerable expense in fitting out parties to proceed to their newly purchased runs, on the faith of the assertion that the country referred to would graze 225,000 sheep. He was aware of one party himself, who had engaged a vessel, purchased an iron house, and bought 5,000 sheep, solely on the strength of proceeding to their newly-discovered runs. They had been there, and had sunk three wells with the view of finding water, to enable them to stock the country. The sequence was, that the description given of the runs was found to be totally false, and instead of being capable of carrying 225 000 sheep, it was not capable of carrying even 5,000. The buyers of the leases had to return with their stock and sacrifice the whole of the expenses. The remarks of Major Warburton in his report as to the small number of sheep the runs would carry (that gentleman having said that instead of there being pasturage for 225,000, there was not sufficient for that number with the two first figures cut off), was a sufficient proof of the barrenness of the country. This was some authority for the statement that the persons in question had been totally deceived. He would therefore ask the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration (Mr Dutton) whether the Government have received applications from the persons who took up three runs in Hack's Country for a return of the rent paid, on the grounds of misdescription and unsuitableness of the country for depasturing stock? Also, whether the Government is satisfied, from the reports of Major Warburton and others, and the bona fide exertions and expense incurred by the persons who took up the runs in question, that their request is a proper one and ought to be complied with?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated, in reply to the question that he had received application from the persons purchasing the leases. It might be in the recollection of the House that after Mr Hack's return, certain runs represented to have been discovered by him were after due notice put up for sale and purchased by various parties. These parties had since inspected these runs, were dissatisfied with their bargains, and had applied for a return of their money. With reference to the second question it had occupied the attention of himself and his colleagues, and they had come to the decision not to return the money. They had published whatever information they were possessed of with respect to the runs. The runs had been advertised for many months before the sale, so that intending purchasers might have the opportunity of inspecting them. For these reasons the Government thought it not right that the money should be returned. He might state, however, that the Government had intimated to the purchasers of the lease that every facility would be given them for rendering the country available. For this purpose he had proposed to some of those gentlemen that the Government would recognise the annual lease, for which they had paid, as an equivalent for a three years' lease. That was if they would endeavour by all means in their power to open up and make the country available. As regarded one of the purchasers referred to, Mr Brown, that gentleman had discovered country to the north-east of Adelaide, which was only available for stock by sinking wells. He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had arranged with that gentleman that if he would put stock on it, the money he had previously paid towards the runs in Hack's country should go towards paying for his new license. This showed, he thought, that the Government had every disposition to act fairly. The country would never be occupied if they allowed any one who liked to throw up his purchases. The principle was the same with a purchased section of land. A party buying a section of land and becoming dissatisfied with it might just as well throw it up and ask for his money back again

ADELAIDE AND HOLDFAST BAY RAILWAY

Mr NEALES would not detain the House long, as he merely wished to move—

"That this House will on Wednesday next resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of moving an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to introduce a Bill to guarantee 6 per cent on the capital of £25,000 proposed to be raised by the Adelaide and Holdfast Bay Railway Company"

He would, if necessary, however, go into some brief explanation. The guarantee system under which it was proposed to establish this Company was a good one. In England they were availing themselves of it to a considerable extent. The guarantee was asked for only against an absolute and stated amount, which was a very different thing from the Government themselves going into the market with their bonds. They asked only for a guarantee on a stipulated amount, and they were ready to agree to any reasonable limitation which might be proposed by the Government. He wished it as a principle to be proved whether some other system for constructing works of this nature could not be devised without the Government being compelled to carry on a Government workshop. Another point he wished to get some information upon was the difference there was in the working of low priced railways and the more expensive ones. The latter, no doubt, were expedient in certain cases, but for the traffic from here to Glenelg, he thought light rails would be amply sufficient. He was confident the line could be accomplished for the amount stated. He believed after all, the profits would be such that the guarantee would not be needed, and as to a limitation, he should have no objection to agree to the surplus profits going to pay back any portion of the guarantee which was required to be advanced. All they wanted was the assurance of the Government, and with that he felt convinced the Manager of the Company could go into the Melbourne market at once, and raise the whole amount of capital required, and if not, it would be easily obtainable in the English market

Mr LINDSAY advocated the matter being referred to a Select Committee, by which they would probably have some valuable information on the subject of cheap railways in general. He believed, however, the system proposed by the advocates of this scheme would have to be considerably modified. While seconding the motion, therefore, he did not lend himself to vote for the question in Committee. If the Government could not execute lines of railway on economical principles, they should allow other parties to step in and try their hand

The SPEAKER was about to put the question, when

Mr MILNE asked if voting for the motion would bind him to support the question in Committee

The SPEAKER replied, "Certainly not"

The TREASURER would not oppose the motion, though he would not bind himself to vote for it in Committee. The question was a very important one, it involved a principle which deserved to be enquired into, that they might know whether it was a proper and true principle or not It was also a question irrespective of the foregoing, whether this was the best mode and time for introducing it

Mr Solomon had not yet had an opportunity of inspecting the prospectus of the Company, and to determine what advantages it was likely to confer upon the community He should reserve his remarks for a future occasion, but the subject was certainly one which called for enquiry, and he should consequently vote for going into Committee

Mr Neales said that the reason the Bill was not before the House was that, being a money Bill, he applied to the Government to bring it forward, but the Government wished before taking action that there should be an address to His Excellency That was one of the impediments, but the Bill was all ready With regard to the objections to a guarantee, he need scarcely refer to a high authority, the Lords of the Treasury, who after mature consideration, recommended that a guarantee upon such works should be given to the extent of 4½ per cent, which was fully equal to 6 per cent here It was no new principle The East India Company had found it necessary, and it was better that the Government should gurantee a small annual amount than that it should force sales of land to carry out public works There could be no doubt it was better for a Government to guarantee a small amount annually than to divest itself of the freeholds of the people He believed the system to be an admirable one, and that the more it was extended the greater would be the blessing to the country He particularly wished this railway to be carried on, because it would come under the observation of 70 or 80 per cent of the whole community, and would be the means of testing the relative merits for particular descriptions of traffic of light and heavy rails If it were successful, instead of making a mile of railway for £15,000, they would be enabled to make seven miles He wished to test the question whether they must continue to pay from £15,000 to £30,000 per mile for railways, or whether they could construct something which wonld answer the purpose for £2,000 to £3,000

The motion was carried, and the House adjourned at 10 minutes past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on Tuesday

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Tuesday, October 19

The President took the Chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Mr Morphett, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon the Surveyor-General, the Hon E C Gwynne

STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The Hon A Forster, before the business upon the Notice Paper was proceeded with, would ask the Hon the Chief-Secretary a question which probably the hon gentleman would be prepared to answer without notice It was whether the Government had received any information relative to a contract having been entered into for the conveyance of mails to the Australian Colonies He alluded to a temporary contract. If such a contract had been entered into, he wished to know the terms, and whether the concurrence of South Australia was necessary to complete it.

The Hon the Chief Secretary would take an early opportunity of laying on the table a despatch which would give the hon gentleman all the information he required

DATE OF ACTS BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon Mr Morphett this Bill was permitted to take precedence of the other business upon the paper, and the Bill, the object of which is to prevent Acts passed by the Parliament of South Australia from taking effect prior to the passing thereof, was read a third time and passed The Bill was ordered to be transmitted by message to the House of Assembly, desiring their concurrence therein

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

The Hon the Chief Secretary, in moving the second reading of this Bill, would briefly observe, as hon members were no doubt aware, that the holder of a bill of exchange under the existing law could generally, after the issue of a writ, obtain judgment against the acceptor within eight days, whilst, with respect to the endorser, a frivolous pretence and defence might be set up involving the claimant in a protracted law suit and considerable expense The object of the Bill, which he had now the honor of introducing, was to give the holder of a bill of exchange the same power against all parties connected with the bill, whether acceptor, drawer, or endorser By the provisions of this Bill all were equally liable, in fact it placed all parties in the same position as if they had signed a warrant-of attorney and prevented endorsers or acceptors from raising fictitious defences The present Bill was the law of England, and had been for some time It had been found to work most beneficially, and he had no doubt that hon members would uphold the principle that any one endorsing an acceptance, or being the drawer, should be placed in the same position as the acceptor, that is, that the holder should not be prevented from recovering his money by frivolous pretexts, involving litigation and heavy expenses

The Hon A Forster seconded the motion, which was carried, and, upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, the House resolved itself into Committee of the whole for the consideration of the Bill

A verbal alteration was made in the first clause, "Supreme Court Procedure Amendment Act" being substituted for "Common Law Procedure Act of 1853"

The succeeding clauses having been assented to,

The Hon the Chief Secretary observed that some amendments were required in the schedule, and he would, therefore, move that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again on Thursday next

The Hon H Ayers suggested to the Chief Secretary the propriety of adjourning till the following Tuesday as he was aware that several members were engaged on the following day, and there was very little business upon the paper

The Hon A Forster also suggested that the Council adjourn till Tuesday

The Hon the Chief Secretary had no objection to this course if it were the wish of the House, and, upon the motion of the Hon A Forster, seconded by the Hon H Ayers, the House adjourned till that day

WASTE LANDS BILL

Upon the motion of the Chief Secretary the second reading of the Waste Lands Bill, which appeared as an Order of the Day for the following day, was postponed till Tuesday next

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

The President announced the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor, informing the Legislative Council, in reply to address No 4 relative to monthly mail communication, that he would take the necessary steps to carry into effect the subject therein mentioned

MESSAGES FROM THE ASSEMBLY

The President announced the receipt of message No 14, from the House of Assembly, intimating that the Assembly had agreed to the Execution of Criminals Bill without amendment Also, message No 15, intimating that the Assembly had agreed to the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Customs Act Amendment Bill

The Council adjourned at 20 minutes to 3 o'clock till 2 o'clock on Tuesday next

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, October 19

The Speaker took the Chair at 5 minutes past 1 o'clock

PETITION

Mr Mildred presented a petition from a number of landed proprietors in the neighborhood of Noarlunga, with respect to the relative advantages of the two surveyed lines of road to Port Willunga and Port Onkaparinga, and praying the House to adopt the latter as being most conducive to the public good

The petition was received and read

REPORT ON PETITION OF JOHN HINDMARSH

Mr Neales brought up the report of the Select Committee on the petition of John Hindmarsh, which was received and read The report stated that the allegations in the petition had been proved to the satisfaction of the Committee, and it suggested certain means by which justice might be accorded to the petitioner

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

Mr Barrow rose and moved "That the House at its rising do adjourn until Thursday next" He proposed the adjournment on account of the important public meetings which were to be held on the following day and he thought it would be consulting the convenience of many hon members if it were agreed to He was further induced to move the adjournment he had named, because he felt certain that if the House attempted to meet, the result would only be a "count out"

Dr Wark seconded the motion

Mr Strangways would like to know, before he consented to the adjournment, what the public meetings were which were to be held within the next two days He had certainly heard of the breakfast to be given to the Rev Mr Binney, but even supposing that there were other engagements, he thought it would have been only courteous in the hon mover to have consulted the Ministry on the subject, and have ascertained their views as to how the adjournment would affect the transaction of the Government business But the hon member had not consulted with any one, but had merely stated it as desirable, because that hon member had, he supposed, a desire to attend Mr Binney's breakfast, and perhaps the hon member for the Murray (Dr Wark) would like to go too But he (Mr Strangways) would like to know the nature of these meetings, and also if, when the citizens of Adelaide took it into their heads to give a public breakfast, the business of the country should be made subservient to the wish of hon members to attend He must oppose the motion, unless some better reason for the adjournment were given

Mr Mildred supported the motion, on the ground that it would be very inconvenient to those hon gentlemen who attended their legislative business as usual to meet with a "count out," and therefore have their trouble for nothing

Mr REYNOLDS was in favor of the adjournment, but he thought the engagement principally referred to occupied only one day—that was the breakfast to Mr Binney He was one of those who were anxious to attend, and no doubt other hon members would wish to do so also

The SPEAKER put the motion—"That the House on its rising do adjourn to Thursday next, which was carried

CLERKS' SALARIES BILL

This Bill, recommended by message from His Excellency, was read a first time

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The preamble was postponed

Clause 1, "Short title to Act," passed as printed

Clause 2, "Repeal of Acts in the schedule, and exceptions"

The following words were inserted in the 19th line after the word "repealed," "which it would be lawful for such person to hold under the provisions of this Act" The other alterations were merely verbal ones The clause was passed as amended

Clause 3, "Interpretation of certain terms"

In the 35th line of this clause "rateable land" was altered to "rateable property"

Mr REYNOLDS wished to know whether "rateable property" would include "glebe lands?"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that if by glebe land was meant any property invested for the private use of the incumbent of a church or chapel, such property would be considered rateable

Mr STRANGWAYS called attention to an indistinctness in the term "common lands" which would include in its present sense the waste lands of the Crown

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained the difference between the "waste lands of the Crown" and the "common lands of the Crown," and said that as the two definitions were not co existive they were therefore both required

In the 43rd line of the clause, "this province" was altered to "the said province," and with another verbal alteration the clause was passed as amended

Clause 4, "Public notice, how to be given"

Mr BARROW asked whether it was really considered sufficient to publish notices of important meetings, or to make any important public announcement in the Government Gazette alone? In questions involving public interest to a very great extent, it was surely desirable that the ratepayers were made thoroughly informed of the time and place of the meetings where such questions were to be considered but this they could not be by the simple publication of an announcement in the Gazette Certainly the publication in the Gazette was supplemented by the permission given to post handbills in addition But these handbills were to be either in writing or print, and they all knew how trifling would be the publicity given by means of a written handbill, which plan might probably be often resorted to He would, therefore, like to know from the Attorney-General whether the publicity given by means of a notification in the Gazette would be deemed sufficient

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the hon member for East Torrens was troubled with a disease which might be appropriately called an "advertising mania" The seat of the disease might he thought be very well attributed to that hon member being manager of one of the local newspapers, his name as such having been appended to a circular which had been sent to members of that House The hon member wanted them to allow the newspapers to tax the public —("No" from several hon members)—to suit the interests of those connected with the newspapers There might be other persons in that House who, although having nothing to do with the conduct of the two journals in question, might have some interest in them, and their support in some measure might be attributed to this fact He did not know who they were, but perhaps he should be able to find them out before long (Laughter) What the House wanted to know was, whether the publication of notices in the official organ, the Government Gazette, was sufficient, or was it not? And this they should ascertain before they commenced to tax the public to the extent of from £2,000 to £3,000 per annum more He had no doubt that the Attorney-General would, when he answered the question put to him, say that the publication of the notices referred to in the Government Gazette was necessary as an official record, and therefore could not be dispensed with This, with the handbills that would have to be posted, would be publicity enough He should support the clause as it stood

Mr SCAMMELL said the District Councils were already taxed to some extent by the insertion of their official announcements in the newspapers, which were paid for Then the notices published in the Government Gazette were always regarded by the District Councils as necessary for official records, but he had always noticed that it was the practice not to consider these as sufficient for publicity In the case of balance-sheets, although not required to be published in any other print than the Government Gazette, they were usually inserted in the local newspapers, and in the case of some notices, this was not even considered sufficient, as slips of these were printed for distribution through the district He thought the suggestion of Mr Barrow, although well-meant, was superfluous

Mr PEAKE would be happy to hear the opinion of the Attorney-General before the clause was put He would, therefore, ask the hon and learned Attorney-General whether if they dispensed with official notices of this kind in the Government Gazette, their publication elsewhere would be considered as evidence in the courts of law

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the statement of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), that the publication of such notices in the Government Gazette was necessary as an official record, was correct, and one reason which made it necessary was that the Government Gazette was always at hand for reference when the local newspaper, could not be had This was, however, apart from the question as to whether they should impose upon the District Councils the necessity of giving more extended publicity to their announcements When it was thought that sufficient publicity was not given by these means, then the District Councillors, who, no doubt, studied the interest of the ratepayers whom they represented, would not be debarred by this clause from taking the proper means to meet the deficiency But in his opinion it should not be made compulsory With respect to the course which it was implied might probably be taken by the managers of the newspapers in withholding such notices as were not paid for, he might say in answer to that, that when the question was mooted in that House as to the non-advisability of having a free postage in this colony for newspapers, he felt that the public received so much advantage from the free insertion of matter, such as the impounding notices, interesting to the country people, that it would be unfair to inflict what would be a tax upon their generosity, in compelling them to pay for the circulation of their newspapers He had felt that while the public obtained this advantage they should allow the newspaper proprietors to reap any advantage they could by the free circulation of their newspapers It might, in fact, be considered in the light of a compromise But if it came to this, that the newspaper proprietors would not publish these notices gratuitously, then the Legislature would have to consider whether it was advisable to continue the present system of free postage on newspapers He hoped the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) would on reconsideration feel that the newspapers and the public are in this respect placed on a fair footing

Mr BARROW said the hon member for Encounter Bay had accused him of being imbued with an advertising mania That hon member had, however, appeared of late so determined in his opposition to the newspapers, that he could not attribute it to aught else than that the newspapers had failed hitherto to appreciate that hon gentleman's wonderful versatility (laughter), as the hon member was always ready to oppose anything and everything He (Mr Strangways) delighted in contradiction, and it mattered not to him whether it was against a friend or foe that he raised his arm, opposition was his fort and slaughter was his delight (Great laughter) In his (Mr Barrow's) mind the question was one quite apart from the private interests of newspapers, it was whether a bona fide publication of official notices should be provided for, on only a pretended publication, which few persons would ever see There was no provision for such notices being given in cases where full publicity was of immense importance There was provision, however, that before a person shot his neighbour's stray pigeon, he should advertise the trespasser in the newspapers But so important an announcement as that of a public meeting for levying a rate, or negotiating a loan was considered sufficiently advertised if buried in the columns of the Government Gazette As to the public press, its conductors were in a position to use their own discretion in the matter, but it remained for that House to say whether proper publicity should be given or not to intended movements of so highly important a character as those referred to

After some additional conversation, the clause was passed as previously amended

Clause 5, "Division of Act into six parts"

Passed as printed

Clause 6, "Proclamation by Governor, new districts, alteration of boundaries, wards formed and re-arranged," &c.

Passsed as printed

Clause 7, "What required in petition and in what manner shall be signed"

Passed as printed

Clause 8 'Petition to be published in Gazette"

Passed as printed

Clause 9, "Cause may be shewn against petition"

Passed as printed

Clause 10, 'Proclamation may issue"

The word "publication" was substituted for "proclamation" in the second line, and the clause was passed as amended

Clause 11, "Proclamation to be published in the Gazette, and to describe boundaries"

Passed as printed

Clause 12, 'Part of a District to which the Corporation Acts are extended shall cease to belong to the District"

Passed as printed

Clause 13, "Part of a town included in a district, shall cease to belong to the town'

Passed as printed

Clause 14, "Number of members of Council"

Passed as printed

Clause 15, "Members of wards to be equal in number"

Struck out

Clause 16, "Qualification of Councillors"

Passed as printed

Clause 17, In the division of this clause, which referred to the "Disqualification of Councillors,"

Mr MILNE proposed an amendment, which was to strike out the exception in favor of persons holding storekeepers' licences He would also include brewers, and persons holding slaughtering licences, as disqualified from being District Councillors

Mr ROGERS said, many persons in country districts took out licences for killing cattle for their own purposes and not with a view of selling the meat

Mr LINDSAY said several persons doubted whether it would be legal to exchange meat with a neighbor unless they held licences to kill cattle, they, therefore, in order to be safe, took out slaughtering licences, and if those were excluded from becoming Councillors, almost every person would be disqualified

Mr DUFFIELD said almost every settler killed meat for himself, and since a bullock was too much for immediate consumption, it was found necessary to exchange with others The licences were not taken out with a view to their becoming butchers, but for protection under such circumstances

Mr SHANNON considered if brewers were disqualified as District Councillors distillers should be so to

Mr MILNE was desirous of assimilating the law in respect to District Councillors with that in regard to Justices of the Peace, as both officers exercised similar powers in granting licences

Mr PEAKE thought the word "distiller" should be defined so that every one might know who might be considered "distillers"

MESSAGES

The House resumed for the purpose of receiving messages from His Excellency the Governor and from the Legislative Council

The SPEAKER stated that he had received from His Excellency the Governor a copy of the Estimates for the year 1859, and also a Bill for the regulation of the salaries of Clerks and subordinate Officers in the service of the Government, and from the Legislative Council, a Bill to prevent Acts of Parliament taking effect prior to the date thereof

ESTIMATES FOR 1859

On the motion of the TREASURER it was resolved that the House go into Committee on the Estimates for 1859 on Tuesday next

REGULATION OF SALARIES

The Bill for the Regulation of the Salaries of Clerks and Subordinates in the Service of the Government was read a first time and passed, and the second reading made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Bill for prevention of Acts of Parliament taking effect prior to the date thereof was read a first time, and the second reading made an Order of the Day for Friday

DISTRICT COUNCILS BILL—IN COMMITTEE

The further consideration of the District Councils Bill in Committee was resumed

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL considered that the terms of the Licensed Victuallers' Act should be the guide by which they should regulate the disqualifications under that Bill If they went beyond that, so many persons would be excluded as seriously to limit the efficiency of District Councils, The licensing of public-houses was but a small portion of the duties of a District Councillor He should think it very unwise to exclude persons such as brewers, who, from their intelligence and business habits, were qualified for the office, and who were objectionable only in one particular respect If brewers were excluded, the principle should be carried out by excluding all persons directly or indirectly interested in a licence

Captain HART would vote against the amendment for the reason assigned by the hon the Attorney-General The clause in the Licensed Victuallers Act did not preclude brewers being Justices of the Peace, but only prohibited them deciding in reference to licences He thought that the same latitude allowed to brewers who were Justices of the Peace might be allowed to brewers who were District Councillors

Mr MILNE would be satisfied with a clause being inserted to prevent brewers being present when licences were being granted

Dr WARK would rather go for the amendment, for no person had more direct influence on the publicans than the brewer, and therefore no man capable of exerting such power should be put in such a position He thought the amendment excellent, and trusted the hon member for Onkaparinga would press it

Mr REYNOLDS wished him to press the amendment also He considered brewers more interested in public-houses than distillers, and no inconvenience could arise from excluding them, for they were not very numerous If they were elected District Councillors they would have direct influence on public-houses

Mr STRANGWAYS could not see any advantage to be derived from the exclusion of brewers It was true they were interested in public-houses, but they had no direct influence on the inhabitants of a district, while the innkeepers and licensed victuallers had Storekeepers, in consequence of giving credit to small farmers, possessed considerable power, because many of them would be much inconvenienced if called upon to pay immediately He thought probably a brewer might be the best qualified person in the district for the office of District Councillor

Mr SCAMMELL thought the only effect of the amendment would be to exclude, in certain instances, a class of men from the District Councils who were signalised both here and perhaps at home by a greater degree of enterprise than many other classes, and he thought the object of the hon member for Onkaparinga would be attained by a provision in the Bill for preventing the brewers in such a case of having a voice in the quarterly licensing meeting

Mr DUFFIELD said there was a clause in the Licensed Victuallers Act providing that parties interested should not be present on the licensing Bench He had on one occasion a consignment of liquors for sale which prevented him sitting on such an occasion.

Mr HAY hoped the amendment would be withdrawn He believed the matter would be met by the suggestion being adopted that persons interested should have no voice in the granting of licences

The clause then passed

Clause 18, exempting certain parties from serving as Councillors, passed with verbal amendments

On clause 19, stating how vacancies are occasioned, being proposed,

Mr BARROW stated that he had received a communication from one of the District Councils in the Electoral District which he represented calling attention to that and some other clauses He should like to be informed why the old form of three consecutive meetings had been abandoned, and six weeks substituted in its stead In the communication he had received, it was suggested that the old system would be the best

Mr SCAMMELL agreed with the hon member for East Torrens

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had heard no reason assigned for the alteration He did not oppose the alteration, but had other amendments to propose He proposed to insert the word "some" in the ninth line, and the word "District" before Councils in the 10th, 12th, and 13th lines He wished to be shewn why "three consecutive meetings" would be better than "six weeks" The latter was a shorter period than the other, for to render three consecutive meetings as short as six weeks the District Council would have to hold two meetings a month

Mr BARROW thought the Commissioner of Public Works should shew a reason for the change that he was proposing to introduce He (Mr Barrow) did not feel himself called upon to give a reason for retaining the old law, which he had a right to assume had been passed after due consideration

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Chairmen of District Councils, who had more experience in the working of the Bill than the members of the Government, had recommended it It was believed such a change would be advisable The Government were not supposed to speak of their own knowledge on matters of that sort, and they had invited the Chairmen of District Councils to give their opinion in regard to that clause, and other persons who had the greatest opportunity of understanding the working of the old measure That was the reason why the Government proposed it; but if the feeling of the House was against it the Government were not prepared to press it, although it would be sacrificing the opinion of the Associated Chairmen They would ask to have the opportunity of bringing the clause again under the attention of the House by having it recommitted

Mr BARROW moved that in the 9th line, the words "six weeks" be struck out, and "three consecutive meetings" be inserted in their stead, and also in the 11th line

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, supposing three meetings occurred in a very short time, and a person was away for a fortnight, a meeting might be called, and then two others, and that person might lose his seat

Mr BARROW thought the contingency might be provided for by inserting the words "three ordinary consecutive meetings"

The amendment was adopted

Clause 20, providing for the retirement of Councillors by rotation, was carried

Clause 21, defining who shall retire, was carried

Clause 22 was carried with slight alteration

Clause 23 was carried

On clause 24, providing that the Chairman shall not be required to ballot, being read,

Mr HAY proposed the striking out of the words "but for his position as Chairman that he should ballot," in order to render the sense of the clause clearer

Mr BARROW said it was one of the clauses which some of his constituents considered thoroughly incomprehensible It was impossible to understand the meaning of it (Laughter)

Mr SCAMMELL pointed out an error in the 19th line

Mr STRANGWAYS thought, instead of members balloting for those who should retire, they should take some money and toss up to decide, for everything was left entirely to chance

The clause was amended and carried

The 25th clause was carried with verbal amendments

On clause 26, providing for the supply of vacancies at the annual meeting, being put

Mr STRANGWAYS said he could not see the object of the clause If it was provided that a meeting need not be held at a particular time, why not strike out the former clause at once, and provide that a meeting should be held at any time

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there might be causes to prevent the holding of the annual meeting on a particular day, and lest the District Council should lapse because of its not being re-elected at the particular time, the clause had been introduced

Dr WARK thought it highly necessary

The clause was carried

The 27th clause, providing for filling up extraordinary vacancies, was passed

A clause providing for the election of Councillors was substituted for clause 28

The 29th clause was carried with verbal amendments

On clause 30, providing that retiring Councillors shall hold office until successors are appointed, being read,

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed as an addition, "providing that no retiring Councillor shall be called upon to act for more than one month after the annual general meeting"

Dr WARK thought the clause answered the purpose as far as it went, but wished to know in what position the Chairman was placed His position was a queer one between the retirement of the old and the election of a new Council It was an unsettled point whether the Chairman held office until the election of a new Chairman He himself had acted as Chairman, and had found the legal difficulty He thought it should be stated that the Chairman should hold office until a successor was appointed As it stood, he was one of the Councillors, but not the Chairman

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS considered that the insertion of that would empower the Council to take action in matters of importance which was not desirable at the termination of their office

Dr WARK was surprised that the Commissioner of Public Works should take that view, he having been a Chairman

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had signed documents when Chairman under those circumstances

Mr BAKEWELL said it was only re-enacting the old laws He thought it would be a very dangerous step to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for Encounter Bay, as it might wholly break up a District Council

Mr STRANGWAYS said if it was merely the old Act the whole thing might be laid aside at once, but he thought great alterations had been made in it, especially one in clause 20 providing that if the annual meeting had not been held it might be held at a future time The object he had in view was that no person should be called upon to act for more than a given time

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was not aware that in practice anything had occurred that should lead the House to adopt a clause of that sort for preventing Councillors suffering inconvenience If it had been shown that inconvenience had resulted from the existing laws, it might have been a reason for introducing some alterations, but it would be necessary to cast about in order that those alterations might not cause further inconvenience than that which they were designed to remedy But no existing inconvenience had been shown, and inconvenience might arise from the adoption of the amendment He therefore considered that a reason for not agreeing to it It was possible some members of a Council might be desirous of breaking up the District Council, and they might contrive to prevent a meeting being called for a month, when the Council would be broken up But inasmuch as now that District Council could insure the proper holding of a meeting for the election of fresh Councillors, no injury could be done by slight delay, for the old members could go on until the appointment of a new Council

Mr STRANGWAYS said it had been stated there was no alteration of the preceding Act Was the 26th clause no alteration?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought the hon gentleman had a singular notion of what would affect an argument, or he himself had The present law was to the effect that the existing District Councillors, in case of no new election taking place, were compelled to serve another year Now it was proposed to remove that inconvenience by giving opportunity of holding a meeting for re-election of members, although it might not be on the proper day He should have thought that any hon member would have seen that it was a diminished burden on the Councillors, but the hon gentleman seemed to imagine that because the burden was lessened it was more intolerable

Clauses 31 to 38 inclusive were carried with merely verbal amendments

In clause 39 the following marginal note was adopted — "Business of District Council may be carried on notwithstanding vacancy"

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired what number constituted a quorum It would appear that any two members might transact the business

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that this was provided for in another clause

The clause was then put and carried

Clause 40—"Councillor or Chairman may be re elected" was carried without amendment

On clause 41, "Auditors to be elected"

In reply to Mr MILNE,

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that the qualification of auditors was the same as that of District Councillors, namely, that they must be ratepayers of the district, as was provided in the 45th clause A man could not be an auditor and a councillor at the same time The Bill had been sent round to the District Councils, and very few amendments were proposed by those bodies

The clause was then agreed to

Clauses 42, "Auditors, how to be elected at ward meetings," 43, "Persons having the largest number of votes shall be auditors," 44, Omission to elect auditors may be remedied," and 45, "Qualification, &c, of auditors," were agreed to with verbal amendments

On the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the House then resumed, and the Chairman having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again on Thursday

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES AND DIVORCE BILL

Upon the Order of the Day for the further consideration in Committee of this Bill -

Mr STRANGWAYS said that he had seen by the English papers that it had been found necessary to introduce a Bill to amend the Act of which the present measure was a copy He would therefore ask the hon the Attorney-General whether he had received a copy of the English amended Act, and if so, whether the hon member would have any objection to place that copy in the library, or on the table of the House, for the information of hon members

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that he had received no copy of the amended Act referred to, but he thought as one object of the Bill was to keep the law here similar to that of England, that it was desirable to pass the Bill in its present shape, and then if any of the amendments of the English Act should prove to be necessary to facilitate the working of the measure, the House could avail itself of them

Mr BAKEWELL had received a copy of the English Act, and had found that the alterations introduced were unimportant The main alterations were intended to protect the wife's present as well as her future property

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the Chairman report the Bill

The motion was carried, and the House resumed accordingly

Mr REYNOLDS enquired whether that was the proper time to move the recommittal of a clause in which he wished to introduce an amendment

The SPEAKER replied that the hon member ought to have made his motion before the Chairman of the Committee left the chair It was too late now

The report on the Bill was then adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The House went into Committee on this Bill, resuming its consideration at clause 33—"Purchasers not bound to prove regularity of sale"

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the addition of the words "Provided that each purchaser be required to see the advertisements required by the Act" He wished this as a security that the cattle were properly advertised

Mr SHANNON thought that the purchasers should be compelled to produce their receipts

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked to have the clause read over, which was accordingly done.

Mr BARROW could not see how it would be possible to compel purchasers to see the advertisements, though the advertisements might be shown to these persons. There was a difference between taking horses to water and making them drink, and he was quite at a loss to know how they were to compel persons to see

Mr LINDSAY said it was evident that the clause had been inserted solely because it was in the old Act, for he was satisfied that if any member of the Government were to consider the effect of the clause he would not have inserted it, inasmuch as it would take away every security at present left to the owners of stolen cattle If this clause were passed a horse worth 100 guineas might be stolen one day and sold the next for £5, and the only remedy which the owner would have would consist in fining the poundkeeper, perhaps £5 for neglect of duty Most of the animals now sold from pounds were stolen A brother of his own had had a valuable horse stolen from Hindmarsh Valley, and found it in the hands of a poundkeeper at Gawler Town

Mr GLYDE said that if the hon member looked through the Act he would see that cattle could not be sold within 10 clear days after they had been impounded, in all cases where notice had been given to the owner or his agent or overseer, and in all other cases cattle could not be sold in less than 24 days from the time of their being impounded

Mr DUFFIELD proposed to strike out the words "by any licensed auctioneer"

Mr BAGOT contended that the effect of this would be to take away all the safeguards at present left to the owners of stolen cattle

The Attorney-General said the striking out of the words would not affect the security which the Act gave to the persons referred to, but the House had not yet decided by whom the cattle were to be sold, whilst this clause presumed that they were to be sold by a licensed auctioneer

The amendment was then put and lost, and the clause as originally moved was agreed to

On clause 34, "As to the application of money arising from sale of cattle impounded,"

Mr Bagot moved that before this clause a short clause should be inserted in the Bill to the following effect, "That no poundkeeper shall be compelled to deliver up any cattle on a Sunday" Many persons residing in the country districts were in the habit of going to the pounds to look after their cattle on Sundays He made the proposal at the suggestion of some persons who had mentioned the matter to him

The Attorney-General suggested that the clause should be introduced in another portion of the Bill

Mr Bagot did not press his motion

The Commissioner of Crown Lands moved that after the word "Governor" the words "by warrant under his hand" be struck out

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was then put and carried

On clause 35, "Application of surplus proceeds of sale where pound situate within a district"

The Commissioner of Crown Lands moved that in the second, fourth, and tenth lines, before the words "District Council," the words "Municipal Corporation or" be inserted

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was then put and carried

On clause 36,

The Commissioner of Crown Lands moved that the marginal note of this clause be "Governor or District Council may close pound"

The amendment was agreed to

The Commissioner of Crown Lands also moved that the words "Municipal Corporation or" be inserted before the words "District Council"

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was then put and carried

Clause 37, "Pound rescues or breaches," was agreed to without amendment

On clause 38, "Penalty on any bull or entire horse at large,"

Mr Shannon thought there should be a penalty for ill-using cattle whilst driving them to the pound

Mr Milne suggested that there should be a power conferred of licensing bulls He proposed to add at the end of the clause the following words, "except those licensed by the District Councils"

Mr Mildred moved that the words "of not less than two pounds nor more than" be omitted, and the words "not exceeding" be substituted

Mr Lindsay could not allow the clause to pass without calling attention to the inconsistency between this clause and the interpretation clause He was not surprised at this inconsistency' as the whole Bill was drawn so carelessly (Laughter from the Ministerial benches, especially from the Attorney-General) But the interpretation clause enacted that "words denoting the masculine gender shall apply to persons and animals of the feminine gender, ' so that persons would be liable to penalties not only for allowing bulls and entire horses to be at large, but also for cows and mares (Laughter) The clause would be quite ridiculous unless they were to alter the custom of the colony as it had existed for 20 years, inasmuch as bulls are commonly left at large although such was not the case with entire horses

The amendment of Mr Milne was put and lost

The amendment of Mr Mildred was carried, and the clause as amended was put and carried

On clause 39, "Ranger appointed by Government or District Councils, may impound off Crown Lands or roads in the district"

Mr Mildred proposed to insert before the word "ranger" the word "constable"

The Attorney-General pointed out that a constable was not necessarily a person qualified to carry out this clause The existing law recognised that this power should only be given to a person qualified to exercise it

The Commissioner of Crown Lands pointed out that it would be competent for a District Council to appoint a constable a ranger in case they thought fit to do so

The Commissioner of Crown Lands moved the insertion before the words "District Councils," of the words "Municipal Corporations"

Dr Wark moved as an amendment the insertion in the 19th line, after the word "straying, ' of the words, "being fed, although tailed" Great grievance resulted from the practice of allowing cattle to feed on the roads Cattle were sent out this way in charge of children, and the children frequently neglected them, and then the cattle broke down fences, and went upon people s lands

Mr Hay opposed the insertion of the words

Mr Harvey supported the amendment Persons would not impound the cattle if the amendment was carried, unless the cattle were breaking the fences or trespassing

Mr Mildred moved that the words "immediately adjacent to or fronting the fenced-in land of such occupier" be struck out

Mr Shannon suggested that the House should specify what constituted a fence under the Act

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said there was a good deal of force in the remark of the hon member (Mr Shannon), and it was his intention, in a subsequent portion of the Bill, to deal with the subject referred to He had a clause already sketched for the purpose, but he thought it more convenient to leave the matter to a later period

The Attorney-General supported the clause as it stood The person whose land abutted on a district road should have the right to impound cattle straying upon it, but to say that any man who owned fenced land should have power to impound cattle straying upon any district road would not be fair

Mr Mildred explained that he wanted to have the words "whether" and "or not" also struck out

The Treasurer enquired whether the clause would not have the effect of enabling persons to impound "tailed" cattle which were being driven to water

Mr Mildred's amendment was lost

The Attorney-General moved that in the 16th line, after the word "Crown," the words "or upon any roads' be inserted

Agreed to

The clause, as amended, was then put and passed

The 40th clause related to cattle trespassing after notice, and provided that the owner of unfenced land should be authorised to recover by action as and for ordinary damage by trespass of cattle, one-third only of the rate specified in the schedule

The Commissioner of Crown Lands stated that at the suggestion of the Association of District Chairmen, he was desirous of altering this proportion to one-fourth instead of one third

The Attorney-General suggested that the latter portion of the clause should be struck out, as there was an inconsistency in saying that after a person had proved a certain amount of damage, he should only be enabled to recover one-fourth the amount A person who had sustained injury should not be placed in a position to recover only one-fourth of the amount to which he had sustained injury

Mr Lindsay was happy to hear the Attorney-General admit there were some inconsistencies in the Bill there were indeed a great many more than those which had been alluded to by the hon gentleman The whole clause under discussion was a mass of the extremest absurdity How persons possessed of common sense could have brought such a measure before the House he could not imagine Had he not known from whom the Bill emanated, he should have said that they were perfectly imbecile and incompetent to deal with the subject Declaring land protected by notice in the Government Gazette alone was worse than even the protection-board system of Governor Grey If they admitted the principle that compensation should be awarded to those parties whose land was trespassed upon, and that punishment should be awarded to those who so trespassed, no difference should be made between land which was fenced and that which was unfenced If the object were to protect unfenced property, there should be no distinction in the penalty between fenced and unfenced land He hoped the Government would postpone the clause for the purpose of reconsidering it

The Attorney-General said it was not often that he troubled himself to reply to the remarks of the hon member who had just sat down The House must be convinced if they attached any weight to the hon member's remarks, either that the Government were perfectly imbecile and incompetent, or that the hon member was so himself There was no alternative He could not agree with the remark that the fact of the fence being knocked down was evidence of it being insufficient In the neighborhood of Adelaide one of the greatest nuisances to which the proprietors of land were subjected, was from persons residing in the neighborhood perhaps having an acre or two of ground or it might be a section, the whole of which they devoted to agriculture, yet kept a number of cattle which they turned out well knowing, that the animals could only obtain food by trespassing That was a wrong for which the Legislature should devise a remedy It was systematic intentional trespass on the part of others, and the Legislature were bound to interfere He had known the time when the principle which had been asserted that the fact of a fence being broken down was evidence of its being an insufficient one, was recognised by Magistrates, who had held that the fact of cattle having got upon fenced land was proof that the fence was not sufficient, and consequently that the parties trespassed upon could only recover the amount for trespass upon unfenced land The absurdity and injustice of this was so great that when it was brought under the attention of the Legislature a provision was framed similar to that now under discussion, and the good effects of such a provision were so universally recognised by the great majority who had had experience in the matter, that he had no doubt the House would assent to the clause under discussion that contained the provision which he had referred to

Mr Strangways said that though this clause would be productive of great benefit in the neighbourhood of towns, yet he had no doubt that this and other clauses would operate most prejudicially in more thinly populated districts where there were large quantities of land unfenced used as commonage. There was as much necessity for a difference in law relative to impounding in thickly and thinly populated districts, as there was for a distinction in the municipal law in different localities. He confessed there was a good deal of difficulty in the matter, but he hoped an opportunity would be afforded hon. members of considering all the clauses which had been amended before the Bill was taken out of Committee. He hoped that the Bill would be printed with the amendments, as there were some clauses that had been passed, which if construed to the letter would, he was satisfied, operate most injuriously to thinly populated districts.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL felt the importance of what had fallen from the hon. member who had just sat down, and thought an addition might be proposed when the Bill was printed with the amendments, to the effect that the clause under discussion should not apply in cases where the cattle were lawfully upon the land from which they escaped to the unfenced land. There were many cases where parties should not, by merely giving notice, be in a position to recover this special damage. The intention of the clause was, he thought, that it should apply to cases where cattle had no right to be upon the land adjacent to the unfenced land. He should be prepared with an amendment or addition to that effect before the Bill was taken out of Committee.

Mr. ROGERS drew attention to the fact that, where District Councils were established, parties were obliged to take out licences for depasturing cattle upon Crown lands, and under such circumstances he thought it would be unjust if such parties were called upon to pay when their cattle strayed upon private unfenced property.

Mr. DUNN fully agreed with the necessity which existed for two Acts, the one applicable to the town, and the other to the country. He felt that the clause as it at present stood would operate most injuriously to the outer districts, for parties were in the habit of having traps for catching cattle by sowing a small piece of land, and the moment cattle were enticed upon it they drove them to the pound.

Mr. LINDSAY hoped the Government would consent to withdraw the clause, and substitute one with the improvements which had been referred to by the Attorney-General. The clauses in the Bill clashed with each other, for whilst one protected the cabbage-garden the other protected the cattle-owner. If the Bill as it at present stood came into force, any vagabond in the vicinity of a squatter might ruin him. Nothing more was necessary to ruin the squatter than a stringent carrying out of this Bill throughout the colony.

Mr. HARVEY pointed out that unless there were a plough-furrow, or some mark round a section, it would be impossible to tell whether cattle were trespassing or not. He thought it very essential that there should be some mark so as to let parties know when they were trespassing.

The clause, with the amendments proposed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the Attorney-General, was passed.

Clause 41 provided that parties should be liable to a penalty of not less than £10, or to imprisonment with hard labor, for any period not exceeding three calendar months, for taking down rails, or opening gates to let cattle into fenced land.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS particularly directed the attention of hon. members from the country districts to this clause, believing that there were slip panels across many of the district roads.

Mr. STRANGWAYS thought the difficulty was that they did not know where the district roads were, and he questioned if the hon. gentleman opposite could inform the House. In some instances where the road was disputed, fences had been put up.

Mr. MILDRED believed this was the case in the neighborhood of the Dry Creek in eight different sections.

Dr. WARK observed that in many instances roads had been fenced in by permission of District Councils, but he much questioned if the District Councils possessed power to give any such permission. If parties for their own convenience put fences across the road, it was a hard case to compel parties travelling the road, not only to take down the rails but to put them up again. For his part he never did so, nor did he see why any traveller should be put to any such trouble. (Laughter.)

Mr. YOUNG said it was quite true that there were many roads enclosed by fences with slip panels, but he did not see how that circumstance could at all affect the operations of this Act, because the wording of the clause was "any person who shall unlawfully remove or take down any rail or slip panel." Now it was quite clear that a party would not be acting unlawfully by taking down a fence which had been placed across a public road. Whilst he was a member of a District Council numerous applications were made by parties to fence across public roads, but the invariable answer given by the Council was that they could give no such sanction, and that the parties who put up the fence would be entirely at the mercy of the public.

Mr. LINDSAY said that when he had occasion to pass through such panels, he invariably put them up, but generally speaking he found that these panels were really not upon the roadway, but had been left because it had been found impossible to go over the road which had been laid out. He was afraid that the clause if passed would work as badly as it had hitherto, for after all it was merely a precise copy of a clause in the Act of 1856. Under that very clause an unfortunate man had been fined at Port Elliot for taking down his own slip panel, and letting out his cattle to water. If his land had not been fenced at all he would not have been liable to be fined. The clause, it was quite clear required alteration, but he would not suggest any, being determined to throw upon the Government the whole onus of bringing this at present unworkable Act into working order.

Mr. DUNN said the hon. member who had just sat down, took credit to himself for putting up rails, through which he passed, erected upon private property, but surely he was bound not only to do this, but to feel much obliged to the owner of the land for allowing him to pass through. When he was connected with a District Council, a number of parties applied for permission to erect fences across public roads, but the invariable answer was, that the Council could not afford protection in such cases.

The clause was passed as printed.

The 42nd clause imposed a penalty upon cattle found astray in the streets of towns.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that it be struck out, remarking that he did so at the suggestion of the Association of District Councils, as the District Councils would be able to frame the necessary bye laws to meet such cases.

Mr. MILDRED thought there might be many difficulties in reference to this matter being left with the District Councils, as where private townships had been laid out, the roads, &c., had not been conveyed to the District Councils as trustees. He would remark, in reference to the various District Councils having been made familiar with this and the District Councils Act, that he believed the opportunities which had been afforded to the Chairmen of the various District Councils of discussing these bills had been very limited indeed, and that the measures had not had that attention which they should have received. He had several times attended meetings of the Association since these measures had been introduced to the Assembly, and only once had they been brought under the notice of the Association; in fact, they were actually under discussion in that House before copies were forwarded to the Chairmen of District Councils. He moved the omission of the words in the clause "not less than five shillings."

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved the insertion of the words "such penalty to be recovered by a person duly appointed for that purpose." He thought the Commissioner of Crown Lands should have given the House some better reason for withdrawing the clause than that it was the wish of the Associated District Councils. They might as well allow the District Councils Association to pass their own Act at once. He should support the clause because he contended the District Councils had no power to pass bye-laws which affected streets or reserves in any private townships, unless indeed such roads became public roads and vested in the District Councils.

Mr. LINDSAY opposed the clause, remarking that Port Adelaide was laid out as a township by private individuals, and that goats were permitted to browse upon the vacant lands, and thus supply the inhabitants with the luxury of milk, which they would not otherwise enjoy.

Mr. HAY supported the Government in the proposition to strike out the clause.

Mr. DUFFIELD thought it would not be right that parties after laying out a township and selling one or two allotments should be allowed to impound cattle found upon the unsold portions.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would prefer having the clause struck out but ultimately proposed the following addition:—"Providing that this clause shall not apply to any town or village not brought under the operations thereof by proclamation in the South Australian Government Gazette."

Clause 43 provided that nothing in the Act should prevent the driving of cattle along customary lines of road.

Mr. LINDSAY wanted to know what was to be understood by customary lines of road, as many customary roads were trespass roads.

Mr. STRANGWAYS was desirous of moving the insertion of the following words, "Provided that nothing in the clause shall allow persons to remove or injure any fence."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not object to the addition.

Mr. ROGERS observed that in many districts, roads were fenced in, and he thought that parties ought to be allowed to take the fences down.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the proposed amedment did not limit the power which persons possessed under the law as it at present stood. If a fence were across a public road, parties had a perfect right to remove it. The clause as amended was passed.

Clause 44, giving to Justices of the Peace jurisdiction in all matters arising out of the impounding of cattle in causes under £20, was passed without discussion.

Clause 45, provided that if excessive damages were claimed the owner might pay under protest.

Mr. MILDRED suggested the insertion of the word "written" before protest.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said that in many of the country districts, it frequently occurred that parties could not write.

Mr. MILDRED was convinced if there were not a written protest there would be endless squabbling.

Mr LINDSAY moved that the clause be struck out, and suggested that instead of a number of complicated clauses, there should be a right of replevy, such as mentioned in the amendment marked "H" in the list which he had had printed

Dr WARK suggested that instead of proceedings being instituted before a Court of Full Jurisdiction, they should be before two Justices of the Peace or any Court of Full Jurisdiction. Two Justices could try any case, not involving more than £20, and he was satisfied that there would be very few cases in which a larger amount would be involved

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was not aware of any objection to give the power to two Justices of the Peace if there were no Local Court within a certain distance

Dr WARK suggested five miles

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would not consent to that, but suggested ten miles

Mr STRANGWAYS thought as this would simply be a debt from the owner to the poundkeeper, there was no reason for departing from the ordinary course. Whilst the system of Local Courts held good all questions within their province should be decided by them

Mr LINDSAY pointed out that although this was only a debt, it must be first paid before there could be an appeal

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the insertion of the words, "in a summary way before two or more Justices of the Peace, where there is no Local Court within a distance of ten miles" The hon gentleman subsequently said that he thought ten miles too short a distance, as it would cause a great number of cases to be tried by a jurisdiction, which should only be resorted to where it would be exceedingly inconvenient to resort to the ordinary course. On further reflection he thought, the distance should be twenty miles

Mr DUFFIELD would certainly oppose the amendment, considering that parties should go to the Court of Full Jurisdiction. They all knew the working of the Impounding Act, and if a man got appointed poundkeeper in an unsettled district, he would, in fact, get a nice little freehold, and the greater distance he was from a Local Court the more profitable to himself

The clause was carried as originally proposed

At the suggestion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS, the Chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday next

MYPONGA

Mr STRANGWAYS put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) why accommodation for shipping has not been afforded to the settlers at Myponga, the sum of £2,500 having been voted for that purpose in the year 1856?" In 1856 or 1857 the sum of £2,500 was voted for the purpose, but the work had not been carried out and the settlers in the vicinity were in consequence subjected to great inconvenience

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS found, upon looking over the records of his office, that the District Council of Myponga were applied to by his predecessor to point out the proper site for a jetty at Myponga, and the District Council then passed a resolution stating that, in their opinion, a jetty would not then be a public benefit. The District Council upon after consideration rescinded that resolution, and his predecessor visited the locality for the purpose of seeing if the work was really required, but he (Mr Blyth) was unable to state what opinion his predecessor arrived at. Under the circumstances, he did not feel justified in commencing the work until he had visited the spot

TAXATION.

The following notice of motion in the name of Mr PEAKE was made an Order of the Day for Friday next —

"That in the opinion of this House, no Bill for imposing a tax on the people should be proceeded with unless the same be founded on a resolution of this House, and that the rules and orders of the Commons House of Parliament with respect to all Bills for imposing a tax on the people be in future acted on by this House"

The House adjourned at 20 minutes past 5 o clock till 1 o'clock on Thursday

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

POST-OFFICE RETURNS

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS, in the absence of the Attorney-General, laid upon the table of the House returns which had been asked for relative to the number of letters transmitted through certain Post-Offices. The returns were ordered to be printed

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, observed that when he sought leave to introduce it, he stated very nearly all that he could state in favor of the second reading. The action of the Government in this matter had been taken in consequence of the subject of the Bill having been brought under the notice of the Government by the Railway Commissioners. It was believed that a saving of at least £3 000 per annum would be effected if the American system were adopted in reference to level crossings—that is, if the gates which were considered necessary by the Act of 1847 were abolished, and ditches were constructed for the purpose of preventing cattle from trespassing upon the line. The Bill involved a principle which, if successful in railways at present in operation, would be carried out in railways hereafter constructed, and further economical results would ensue. The Government felt us hon members would no doubt feel, that the matter was of sufficient importance to warrant them in coming to the House and bringing it prominently forward. He believed that many persons who had spoken upon the subject were not thoroughly acquainted with the American system. He had hoped to have been furnished by the Railway Commissioners with a drawing which would have very clearly shown the plan which was adopted in America, which it was proposed to adopt here. It was proposed to have ditches constructed at the level crossings, or at the sides of them, for the purpose of preventing cattle from straying upon the lines. They would by this system be enabled to do away with gates, which involved considerable expense, and also gatekeepers, who involved considerable monthly and yearly expense. The Bill proposed to repeal the Acts which provided that gates should be erected at level crossings, and should be kept at the expense of the Railway Commissioners, and consequently the public. He felt that there was no danger in the system that was adopted in America, and which it was proposed to adopt here. He was sure that if hon members would look at the records of railway accidents in America they would find that there were few, if any, arising from the adoption of this economical course upon those lines. The Government had introduced the Bill entirely upon economical grounds. No extra risk to life and limb was involved in seeking to adopt here the system which was adopted in America. No new principle was involved in the Bill, as the House had already sanctioned it in the original Railway Bill of last session, which empowered the insertion of a clause to this effect on the extension of the railway from Gawler Town. Subsequent action prevented that from becoming law, but it was now again prominently brought before the House, and the House by refusing or assenting to the second reading, would say whether they would affirm or reject a principle which would undoubtedly effect a considerable saving without involving any extra risk to life and limb

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS seconded the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped that the Commissioner of Public Works would afford some better explanation of the operations of this Act. There was one part most curiously worded. He particularly referred to the second clause, which stated that it should be lawful for the Commissioner of Public Works to direct the removal of gates from level crossings, provided that none should be removed from the level crossings now existing. He wanted to know what was the meaning of that clause? Was it intended that it should only operate upon the railways hereafter to be constructed, or did it mean that after the passing of the Bill all level crossings were to be abolished? The Commissioner of Public Works left the House entirely in the dark upon that point. He had heard it stated that it was not intended the Bill should refer to railways already constructed, and if that were the object the Bill was entirely superfluous, as railways could only be constructed by Act of Parliament, and a clause could be introduced in the Act having the same effect as this Bill would have. It would be better to deal with every railway separately and consider whether it was desirable that level crossings should be abolished there or not. Such a course would be far better than introducing such a sweeping measure as the present. If the Bill were intended to apply to all the railways now constructed he should feel bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill, for it would be exceedingly dangerous that it should be brought into operation upon the City and Port roads, for instance, and other places. Where the population was thin there would probably not be a very large amount of danger from the removal of gates at level crossings, but near the centre of large populations, where trains were constantly running, the danger would be very great. The Commissioner of Public Works had stated that no danger would arise from the adoption of the course proposed by the Bill, and had stated that no accidents arose in America, where the system was in operation, but if the hon gentleman read the English papers and the extracts from the American papers, he would find that there was scarcely a mail which arrived in England which did not bring an account of some distressing railway accident, and a large majority of these arose from the level crossings which were unprotected, and the railways were unprotected also. If it were intended that the clause should operate as the last portion would induce him to believe, it was, as he had shewn, entirely superfluous, and if it were to operate as the first portion would lead him to imagine, he should oppose it

Mr REYNOLDS had much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill (Hear, hear) He regarded it as a move in a very proper direction. It would be a great saving to the public to adopt the system of ditches at the sides of level crossings. The Government were, he considered, bound to introduce this Bill from the promise which they gave last session, and he was glad to find they had redeemed that promise On looking over the clause which had been referred to by the hon member for Encounter Bay he did not see that it was contradictory, or that it would be so inoperative as the hon member seemed to imagine It would not be safe to remove the gates and take away the gatekeepers till the level-crossings had been properly secured by the construction of ditches and he believed that was what the clause really meant, at all events he could place no other construction upon it The hon member read the clause and stated that he considered it very proper that such a provision should be made With regard to railway accidents in America, he was in the habit of reading American papers, and, although he frequently observed that accidents had occurred upon the American lines, he had yet to learn that they arose from the adoption of ditches at level-crossings No doubt whatever system were adopted accidents would occur, but he believed that the chances of accidents would be less under the system which was proposed than that which was at present in operation, and he should give the Bill his hearty support

Mr Lindsay had only just entered the House, and had not had an opportunity of hearing all the arguments for and against the Bill, but in looking over the Bill he had come to the conclusion most decidedly to oppose it The Bill proposed to adopt what he had always considered a very objectionable feature in the American railway system Accidents were constantly occurring upon the American lines from the very cause which it was now proposed to introduce here, although in America there was a protection invariably resorted to, for which no provision was made in this Bill, he alluded to what was termed a cow-catcher in front of the engine to catch up anything upon the line, and from this instrument being in general use it might be fairly assumed that the ditches did not prevent animals from getting upon the line The House were aware that accidents had occurred upon the Port line even with the precautions of a gate and a gatekeeper, and if so, how much more likely were accidents to happen without such precautions Ditches were very imperfect protections from trespasses at any time No person would think of including ditches amongst good and substantial fences against cattle The saving which had been alluded to by the Commissioner of Public Works was very little consideration compared with the safety of life and limb He believed that the amount involved in damages awarded in consequence of accidents which would occur from the adoption of the American system would be far more than any apparent saving which would be effected The American system, however, deserved examination, and, perhaps, copying in some instances, though certainly not in the respect referred to in this Bill The Americans had adopted many good and economical plans which might with great advantage be copied, but the saving which would be effected by doing away with gates and gatekeepers would be a very small item and not worth a moment's consideration compared with the additional work If hon members, instead of taking this one point alone, would look at the whole American system and find where a saving could be effected without additional risk, it would be well, but he believed that in this instance if a saving of £3,000 were effected an additional expenditure of ten times that amount would be involved from the additional accidents which would occur He believed that some saving might be effected by adapting to our circumstances some arrangements which were made by the Americans

Mr Cole cordially supported the second reading of the Bill, having always viewed gates upon the railway as very objectionable He was glad to find that the Ministry had taken action in the matter, and had introduced the present Bill The hon member who had last spoken had very forcibly dwelt upon the fact that accidents happened upon the American railways in consequence of the level crossings, but the hon member had forgotten to state that a large proportion of the accidents upon the American lines arose from the construction of the carriages and the rate at which the trains were in the habit of travelling That had been entirely lost sight of by the hon member It was not merely the present saving which he looked at in supporting the Bill, but he took a prospective view, for as the lines advanced there would of course be an additional saving by the adoption of this plan The feasibility of the system was so apparent that it required very little argument to prove its advantages and necessity

Mr Collinson would venture to support the Bill, and did so from a conviction that it would not only do away with a very heavy expense, but a very great inconvenience, without in any way increasing the risk to life and limb He might state that at Alberton the services of a gatekeeper had been dispensed with the public opened and shut the gate, and he was not aware that any accident had occurred or that any stray cattle got upon the railway The Station master saw that the gate was closed up

Mr Neales supported the Bill It was a very small move towards economy, but as he always studied economy he should certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill If there were a division it appeared to him it would be the hon members for Encounter Bay against South Australia (Laughter)

Dr Wark would support the second reading of the Bill, considering it a step in the right direction, and a good one too He was not surprised at the opposition of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), as there were certain members who would oppose anything and everything whether right or wrong, no matter whether the proposition opposed were brought forward by the Ministry or any one else He thought it would be better to allot those hon members a place to themselves (Laughter) Upon a railway near which he was brought up, a train started of its own accord and carried a gate a distance of six or eight miles Great alarm was created in consequence of the gate, which would of course have been avoided if the plan proposed by this Bill had been in operation

Mr Duffield moved that the House divide

The Speaker put the question that the Bill be read a second time, and declared it carried

Mr Lindsay—Divide (No, no)

The Speaker—Does the hon member call for a division?

Mr Lindsay—Simply——

The Speaker—The hon member can only state whether he calls for a division or not

Mr Lindsay—I do

The House divided, and the second reading was carried by a majority of 17, there being—ayes, 19, and noes, 2, as below —

Ayes—Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Reynolds, Mildred, Wark, MacDermott, Duffield, Harvey, Glyde, Cole, Neales, Hawker, Rogers, Barrow, Collinson, Hay, Shannon, McEllister, Milne, Commissioner of Public Works (Teller)

Noes—Messrs Strangways, Lindsay (Teller)

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works the House went into Committee upon the Bill

The first clause was passed as printed Upon the second clause being read,

Mr Lindsay thought it highly desirable that an addition should be made to the clause for the purpose of adopting a system which was in force in America He alluded to an instrument called a cow-catcher, being placed in front of the engine He was quite sure that if this precaution were necessary in America it was necessary here, for in America everything was so economically managed that he was satisfied the expense of the cow-catcher would not be incurred unless it were absolutely necessary In support of his statement that there were necessities for this precaution, he might refer to a book with which some hon members were no doubt familiar, called "Our Iron Roads" It was there stated that upon a railway leading to Washington, a cow was caught in the cow-catcher, and upon the train being stopped for the purpose of removing the animal, a passenger asked why not take the cow on to Washington, where something could be got for it "Oh," said the engineer "we want to make room for the next," shewing that ditches did not prevent cattle from getting on the lines

The Commissioner of Public Works referred to a dreadful accident which occurred upon the Trent Valley Railway, where gates and every precaution against accidents were adopted He had no objection to the introduction of cow-catchers, and would suggest that the hon member for Encounter Bay should prepare a clause especially for that purpose

Mr Reynolds thought this hardly necessary, and would suggest that in the first instance experiments should be made without cow-catchers

Mr Strangways said the question was merely one of expense It was probable when the Bill came into operation that instead of a saving of £3000 per annum, there would be an additional expenditure of £30,000 A single accident would swamp the whole saving for years, anticipated by the Commissioner of Public Works The Commissioner of Public Works had referred to accidents which occurred in England where every precaution was taken, and there could be no doubt that notwithstanding all the precautions which could be taken accidents would occur All that could be done was to make such arrangements as should leave the least possible chance of accident. It appeared that the Commissioner of Public Works was prepared to run any risk for the purpose of making an apparent saving of £3,000

Mr MacDermott suggested that if cow-catchers were considered desirable, the Commissioner of Public Works might issue instructions to have them added to the engines, without an additional clause

Mr Glyde asked the Commissioner of Public Works if the House were to understand that he would issue instructions to have cow-catchers attached to the engines, as if so, he would not offer any opposition to the clause

Mr Shannon supported the proposition to have cow-catchers attached to the engines, as the additional expense would not be very serious

Mr Cole could not conceive that the precaution was really necessary, but at the same time mentioned that upon the present railways, so well protected by gates, he had seen three horses upon the rails within 200 yards of the station, and a short distance of the engine

The Commissioner of Public Works had not the least objection to give a pledge that every precaution should be taken against railway accidents It was satisfactory to know that hitherto railways had been conducted in such a manner that no serious accident had occurred He would communicate with the parties who were connected with railways, and would take care that every precaution was taken

The various clauses having been assented to, the report was adopted, and the third reading of the Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following day

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS observed that there were some matters in a further state of progress than this Bill, with which he preferred proceeding, and he would therefore move that the second reading of the Bill be postponed till Tuesday next

Carried

ESTIMATES

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS believed that the Estimates appeared upon the paper for consideration in Committee by mistake The hon the Treasurer originally intended that the Estimates should be an Order of the Day for Tuesday next.

Mr REYNOLDS hoped that the Estimates would be postponed till next Tuesday week, instead of next Tuesday, as a very important Bill relating to Assessment on Stock had been referred to a Select Committee, and it was possible the report of that Committee might affect the action of the House upon the Estimates He considered the House should be in possession of the report of the Committee before the Estimates were proceeded with

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the proposition to postpone the consideration of the Estimates till next Tuesday week, as he found upon looking over them, a column relating to Good Service Pay, under an Act of 1858 Now that Act had not been read a second time, and its fate was very doubtful If the House were to vote those items upon the supposition that that Act would pass, it was quite possible that the House would have to reconsider the Estimates, in consequence of there being some modification of the Act to which he had referred

The TREASURER (who had just entered the House) stated that he had not expected to have had to meet any discussion upon the Estimates on the present occasion, as he was under the impression that the consideration of the Estimates had been made an order of the day for Tuesday next He was somewhat surprised to find them upon the notice paper, and could only account for their appearance there by the haste with which the House broke up on its last meeting, when they were engaged in a very interesting discussion He had no wish whatever to proceed with the Estimates, and would ask the House to postpone the consideration of them till Tuesday next With respect to the objection of the hon member for the Sturt, that Tuesday next would be premature, that it would be too early a day, he would state that he was not desirous on Tuesday next of proceeding at any length with the Estimates, but merely to make that statement to the House which would enable them to judge better than they otherwise could of the course which it was advisable to pursue, but he was quite prepared to defer to the wish of the House, if they thought that even to that extent it was not desirable he should proceed with the Estimates on Tuesday next He believed, however, that the majority of the House were disposed to make some progress with the Estimates, at least to the extent of getting them into Committee As to the various Committees which were sitting, he would say it was the duty of the Government to explain to the House the ways and means upon which they relied for the public expenditure, whilst the Estimates were under consideration He wished the House to see exactly the financial position of the colony, before a conclusion was arrived at by the several Committees which had been referred to The hon member for Encounter Bay had referred to the Superannuation Bill, and the difficulty there would be in dealing with the Estimates until that Bill had been disposed of, but he might mention it was his intention to move the second reading of the Superannuation Bill, and carry it through before the Estimates were passed, because the Estimates could not proceed properly until that Bill had first been determined It was quite his intention to take the course which the hon member for Encounter Bay thought that he should There were indeed columns upon the Estimates which could not be allowed to have effect until the Superannuation Act had been agreed to He saw no reason for delaying the financial statement which he had purposed making to the House on Tuesday next, but he should defer to the wish of the House.

Mr NEALES hoped the hon the Treasurer would act upon the opinion expressed by previous speakers, and not make his financial statement on Tuesday next, because he apprehended that statement must be affected by the report of the Committees which were sitting He thought the objection of the hon member for Encounter Bay relative to the Superannuation Bill rather a valid one All things considered, he thought it desirable that the hon the Treasurer should not make his statement on Tuesday next, particularly as that statement might have to be made in other words a week afterwards The statement should contain or indicate a course which the House would follow in reference to ways and means, and he did not think in the absence of the reports of some of the Committees to which he had referred, this could be done on Tuesday next He would recommend the hon the Treasurer to take another week, indeed he considered the question so important that if there were a division upon it he should certainly divide with the postponement Some delays were a waste of time, but delay in this case would he believed, be an actual saving

Mr SHANNON would like to ask the House if there would be sufficient business before the House to occupy it for another week in the absence of the Estimates?

The TREASURER was not aware whether there was sufficient work before the House to keep it employed till next Tuesday week in the absence of the Estimates If there should not be, perhaps the House would like to adjourn for a week

Mr HAWKER would support the member for Encounter Bay for the reasons which that hon member had mentioned, and the reasons which had been mentioned by the hon the Treasurer He could not understand how the Treasurer could advance the proposition that the Committees were to come to a decision because the Estimates shewed the financial position of the colony It amounted to this, that the Estimates as placed before the House, were to have a bearing upon the Committees That was not the way to put the matter to the Committees, who should be perfectly unbiassed by any statement which appeared upon the face of the Estimates

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the Government had no objection to postpone the consideration of the Estimates till next Tuesday week, but it was the duty of the Government to let the House know if there was sufficient work before the House in the absence of the Estimates, in order that members, after being dragged in from the country, might not find that there was only half-an-hour's work to do If, in the course of a few days, they found that business was running close, it would be for the House to consider whether it would not be better to adjourn for a week It was considered a few days ago, that it would be desirable to adjourn the House for a week, for the special purpose of allowing the Committees to get on with their labors The Treasurer had no objection to postpone his statement till next Tuesday week

The consideration of the Estimates in Committee was then made an Order of the Day for next Tuesday week

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was proceeding with the 47th clause, when

Mr MILDRED observed that he believed the 46th clause had not been disposed of It was only——

The CHAIRMAN—The hon member must take the Chairman's statement that the 46th clause was passed

Clause 47 was passed as printed

Clause 48 was passed with mere verbal amendments

Mr REYNOLDS remarked upon the great many alterations which it was found necessary to make in the Bill, notwithstanding the small quantity of new matter which it contained It would have been better to pass a short Bill introducing the new matter than to have gone to the expense of printing and preparing the present voluminous Bill If he had thought it would have been necessary to make so many alterations in the Bill he should have been the first to throw it out

Mr NEALES said it must be becoming more convincing than ever that they should have some authority to whom Bills should be submitted before being presented to that House If there had been such an authority all the alterations which they were now engaged in making, would have been made before the Bill was presented to the House He brought forward a motion for such an appointment last year, but the House generally were against it He felt satisfied that they lost more thousands in time than, they saved hundreds by omitting to appoint a first-class man to whom to submit the Bills

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Commissioner of Public Works had informed the House that it was not a Government measure but that it had emanated from the Associated Chairmen of District Councils, and had been prepared by their solicitor, having been merely sent to the Commissioner of Public Works to introduce

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS did not recollect having made any such statement, but the necessity which existed for the measure had been pointed out to him by the Association of District Chairmen, and he had received thanks from the various District Councils for having introduced the measure. He could not consider the alterations trifling, they were in many instances weighty and important, and it was desirable that the Acts relating to such important bodies as District Councils should be consolidated

Mr MILDRED said that there was a general desire on the part of the District Councils that the Acts affecting them should be consolidated, but he must again state that neither this Act nor the Impounding Act had had the consideration of the District Councils which they ought to, and this might account for the defects which were apparent in almost every clause As a member of the Association of Chairmen he might state that the Bill had not been placed in the hands of those for whom it was intended till it had been read a first time in that House. It had not had the consideration which it should have had, and the Impounding Act had been only once mentioned when reference was made to that clause, by which parties were compelled to drive cattle to the nearest pound

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in reply to the hon member for Noarlunga, said that he had received letters and remarks from much the larger number of District Councils in reference to the Bill, and although the measure had been unfortunate in the district which the hon member represented, it had received more attention in others The amendments proposed by the Councils were all, like those which he (the hon the Commissioner of Public Works) had brought before the House, of a verbal nature

The amendment was then agreed to, and the clause as amended was put and carried

On clause 49, "List of persons qualified to act as constables to be made,"

Mr MILDRED suggested that the word "clerk" should be substituted for "collector"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that the clerk and collector were generally the same person, but he had no objection to the amendment

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL considered that in the event of clerk and collector being different persons the collector would be best qualified to make out the list If they were both the same person it did not matter which title was used

Mr MILDRED moved the insertion of the words 'clerk or" before collector

Amendment carried

Mr GLYDE moved that in the 3rd and 5th lines the word "qualified' be struck out, and the word 'liable" inserted

The ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the amendment The trouble to a person who was exempt involved in claiming exemption was less to be considered than the risk of allowing the clerk to omit the names of persons who were really liable.

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the clause as amended

Mr NEALES thought it ridiculous to encumber the list with the names of persons not liable If a man wanted to know who was to be the constable, where was the use of his looking at a list of those who were not likely to be constables If the clerk knowingly omitted the names of persons liable to be constables, the case should be provided for by another clause

Amendment put and carried

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked what was to be done with the concluding portion of the clause

Mr GLYDE moved that all the words after the word "liable," in the fifth line, be struck out

Agreed to

The clause as amended was then put and carried

Clauses 50 and 51 were passed as printed

On clause 52, 'District Councils to meet and settle list,'

Mr GLYDE moved the insertion, after the word "oath," of the words 'or affirmation"

Agreed to

Mr STRANGWAYS considered the power of examining persons on oath too great to place in the hands of the Councils If an oath was necessary it should be administered by a Justice of the Peace

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated that, under the present law the Council had the power to examine witnesses on oath

The clause as amended was then agreed to

On clause 53, "Council to choose constables"

Mr MILNE objected to the compulsory nature of this clause If hon members looked to the object of the provision, it seemed to imply that the expense of the constables was to be saddled on the Councils, and if this were to be the the case, the expense of the police in the towns should fall upon the Corporations He would not be sorry to see this principle carried out, and it must be adopted ultimately Again, if the Councils were to have the machinery of the police in their hands, they must also have 'lock-ups" for the custody of prisoners, and this again would put them in a difficult position He proposed to insert, instead of the word "shall" the word "may"

Mr DUFFIELD had intended to make some remarks on this clause, in connection with the 58th clause The 60th clause pointed out what payments were to be made by the Councils He quite agreed with the hon member who had just sat down, that if the police expenses of the country districts were to be borne by them, it was only fair to expect that the City of Adelaide should pay for itself He knew this was not the opinion which hon gentlemen on the Ministerial benches held, as they had told the Corporation of Gawler Town that they had not the same claim for police protection as the city of Adelaide or the Port It was pretty evident that Philip Dixon was aware of this opinion, as he went straight to Gawler Town to carry out the practices which he had previously indulged in, though he (Mr Duffield) did not know whether Dixon was influenced in this course by a knowledge of the opinion of the Government But as the country districts had not the means to pay constables, and the Government would not pay them, the country districts must do without them altogether It was hardly just that this expense should be thrown on the Councils if the city and Port were provided for at the cost of the general revenue The time had not yet arrived when all the districts could pay for their own police protection, but until then it should be paid from the general revenue

Mr ROGERS could not see why the districts should be called on to pay for police protection It should be a claim on the general revenue It would be well if all parties were to pay for their own, but unless this was done generally he should object to the districts paying

Mr STRANGWAYS said the hon member for Barossa seemed to forget that the people of the country districts were quietly disposed, whilst those of the town were turbulently inclined As a proof of this, on the previous day, when there was a public breakfast at White's Rooms, it was found necessary to have 6, or 8, or 10 police troopers on the spot to keep order He thought some allowance should be made for the disorderly disposition of the townspeople—(laughter)—for he presumed no other cause but this could exist for the presence of the 6 or 8 troopers The hon member for Barrossa seemed to forget that in the country districts there were but one or two troopers for a district of 20 or 25 miles in diameter, but the people of Adelaide could not conduct themselves properly, or, at all events, if they could, it was self evident that the hon the Attorney-General was afraid to trust them

Mr NEALES said that the question of police protection was not to be viewed in reference to area, but to population The country had a far larger percentage of police than the city (No, no) Hon members said "no, no," but he (Mr Neales) said "yes, yes," and hon members would find it so if they counted heads He thought he could account for the presence of the eight policemen on the previous day mentioned by the hon member for Encounter Bay It was owing to the fact of a number of country gentlemen being present on the occasion (Laughter) He believed the police were fairly distributed, for the bulk of the people were in town, and the bulk of the property was also in town If the people in the country districts wanted more police protection they must pay for it If the police were increased generally, the town police would be increased in the same proportion as at present

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS preferred the word "shall to "may," as there was no power to compel the Councils to employ police The clause meant that they should do so if they thought it necessary, and he certainly hoped they would in the district in which he lived, for he thought a general system of constables was wanting in the country

Mr SOLOMON said the remarks of his hon colleague the member for the city (Mr Neales) brought to his mind the discussion which took place some years ago as to the way in which the police should be paid He fully approved of the police being paid by the district in which they served, but he saw a difficulty in carrying out the principle, as the Government had not yet conceded to the districts or to the city the privilege of licensing their own public-houses, and keeping the fees derived from the issuing of these licences When he was a member of the City Corporation this was one of the privileges which they asked for, but it was denied them Had it been granted the Corporation would have had no objection to undertake the finding of the city in police protection In the other colonies—at least in Sydney—the police were not paid from the general revenue, but from the licence fees derived from the escort The hon member for the city shook his head in denial of this, but it was the case when he (Mr Solomon) was in Sydney He thought it was a very proper plan that each district should pay for its own police, and that all fees derived from local sources should be given to the City Corporation or Council for the purpose If there was a very turbulent districts it might be necessary to license a greater number of public houses, in order to pay the police (Laughter) But each district should pay for a number of police suitable for its own wants.

Mr GLYDE agreed with the hon member for the city (Mr Neales), that police protection should be given, not according to area but according to population, and he (Mr Glyde) could name a township containing one-fourth the population of Adelaide in which the inhabitants never saw a policeman At present they had to pay for their own police, but on the ground of population Kensington and Norwood were clearly entitled to police protection

Mr DUFFIELD said the hon member for the city had said that police were only for the protection of population, but he (Mr Duffield) understood that they were also for the protection of property

Mr NEALES had not made the statement referred to by the hon member

Mr DUFFIELD had taken down the words as they fell from the hon member's mouth

Mr NEALES said what he had stated was that police protection should not be in proportion to area, but to population

Mr DUFFIELD said such was not the principle adopted by the Government Several years ago Gawler Town had three policemen The district was not then as populous as it was now, and now it had only three policemen Moreover, these three were almost useless, for in the event of a disturbance they were not to be seen in the streets They were mounted men, and thought their proper position was on horseback, and not to protect the property or persons of the people He thought that when an Act affecting so intimately the interests of the country was before the House was the proper time to place this question on a proper footing

Mr SCAMMELL agreed with the hon member who had last spoken, and not with the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) who was always denouncing the amount of money expended in the country districts So long as the city and Port were provided with police out of the general revenue, so long the District Councils had claims for the purpose The district to which he belonged, with a population of 3,000 or 4,000, had no police protection whatever During the last session, a resolution was agreed to that if any portion of a Council's revenue should be devoted to any purpose but public improvements—and he believed the support of the police was not considered a public improvement—the Council should receive no subsidy from the Government. In clause 58, however, there would be an opportunity of amending this clause, as in the former a reasonable sum might be paid for police protection out of the general revenue.

Mr LINDSAY could not see why the Councils should be called upon to pay for what the central Government was already paid for doing.

Mr MILDRED supported the clause. His district was in a peculiar position, as they had frequently to send offenders from among the men employed on the waterworks to Adelaide, for want of a place on the spot to confine them in. On these occasions the constables lost their time, as the Council had no authority to pay them. Yet the constables were not employed for the district but for the province. The fact of cases being tried in the Local Court of Adelaide was also a great drawback, as otherwise the Councils would have an opportunity, by imposing fines, of paying the constables. No district would be compelled to employ constables under the clause, and therefore he would support it.

Mr REYNOLDS said it appeared there was no objection to the principle of the Councils employing constables for protection, but the objection seemed to be that the Corporation of Adelaide and other towns were not in possession of the privilege of paying their own police. When the Estimates or an amended Corporation Bill were under consideration, hon members might bring in an amendment and so settle this difference, and then, having dispensed with our metropolitan police, we could keep up a mounted force, for which the squatters would no doubt be most happy to pay, as it would be for the benefit of the outlying districts. (Laughter.)

Mr BURFORD did not see much advantage in altering the word from "shall" to "may." The question as to the police had assumed too serious a form to be lightly decided in connection with a clause of this Bill. He held that the police should be a provincial force and not attached to any city or town. It should be a compact body, subject to proper discipline, and therefore the ideas now broached with regard to localities were foreign to the character of the institution and ought not to be entertained by the House. The matter was provided for in the safest way in the clause and it was better the clause should be passed in its present form, especially seeing it was optional with the Council to act under it. He hoped the House would not be led astray by the remarks which had been made with reference to the police, but he would say nothing with regard to their distribution.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said as it was clearly the intention of the clause to leave it to the Council to say whether any constables were wanting, the amendment was immaterial. The Council might do what they thought proper and it appeared to him that the very circumstance of the phraseology of the clause afterwards showed conclusively that such an alteration as that proposed was not necessary. It would be a very ill advised proceeding, after having agreed to the various objects for which the public money was to be expended, to undertake the payment of district constables—though at the same time he did not mean to say that the distribution of the police constables was the wisest or best that could be made. Still in reference to some remarks which had been made he would say that everybody must feel that Port Adelaide was an exceptional case, and it would be unfair to throw upon it the burthen of supporting police for looking after not only persons from all quarters but also for watching the vessels in the harbor. With regard to the city and the country the city had 57 police with an inspector, and the country 93 or 94 persons connected with the police. He thought the House would admit that this was not such a disproportion between the city and the country as might be assumed to exist from the remarks which had been made. But further he would say, that if the House should be of opinion that there was a disproportion, it would be wiser to diminish the number of constables in town, and throw upon the town the burthen of providing an additional force, than to throw the whole cost upon the general revenue. He would support the clause as it stood, though he would not object to the amendment if hon members desired it. With regard to licences, it would be remembered that a larger portion of the general revenue went to the District Councils than was raised from this source, and the reason which weighed with the old Legislature in refusing to allow the Councils to retain the money raised from licences was, that it was opposed to a principle of legislation to confer the power of granting licences upon those who derived a direct benefit from them. If the Councils received the revenue derived from the licensed victuallers, it would be a great temptation likely to outweigh any consideration as to the fitness of the applicants, and the result of which might be that any person who came for a licence and so to contribute to the revenue would obtain a licence. Such would be the case with the Councils if every Council knew that each licence-fee paid would go directly to them, and thus they would grant more licenses than would be advantageous to the community or to the interests of morality. In the place of this it was understood now that the money raised for local purposes would be supplemented from the general revenue. If the licences were handed over to the Councils it would be not merely an injury to the public, but a loss to the Councils, inasmuch as they would forfeit their claim to have their votes supplemented from the general revenue. He had taken up these topics because, though not immediately connected with the question before the House, he thought they were such as should not be passed over.

Mr MILNE did not read the clause in the same way as some hon members. He desired to do away with the compulsory principle, and would press his amendment.

Capt HART called attention to what he considered a misrepresentation with regard to the facts. The police of Port Adelaide were almost exclusively employed for the general interests of the colony. They were not merely required for the purposes of keeping quiet a seaport, where a vast number of disturbances took place that did not occur in other parts of the country, but for the purpose of protecting the revenue. The principal part of the seizures made were effected by the police. He thought, therefore, Port Adelaide should not be called upon to find police protection for other places, for on the Peninsula, with 2000 inhabitants, there was not a policeman at all. There never was one required. Hon members had spoken as if the police at Port Adelaide should be supported by the Corporation there. The Corporation received no funds whatever that were applicable for such a purpose. In every way the police there were exceptional as compared with other parts of the colony. No question there was a reason why some alterations should be made in the Police Act. He should be glad to see that every place paid in proportion to the number of the inhabitants. He thought there should be a rural police, a city police, and a water police. If that was arranged he thought that one solitary policeman would be sufficient for Port Adelaide. He should vote for the clause as it stood, as it would be imperative that each district should find for themselves the police protection that was required.

Mr MILNE could not allow the remarks of the hon member (Mr Hart) to pass without remark. It had been said the population of places such as Port Adelaide and the City did not get their fair proportion of police. (No, no.) He said the District Councils did not get their share. The hon member for Hindmarsh said there was not one constable in his district. There was none in the district he represented. He considered that in the distant districts the squatters had more than their share.

Mr NEALES said he had frequently taken up district reports, and from those reports serjeants were said to have attended in the Onkaparinga district, and therefore he thought it must be a mistake to assert that there was no constable there.

The TREASURER agreed with the views expressed by the hon member Captain Hart with regard to the way in which the police force should be distributed. He considered that each locality should maintain sufficient for its own protection, and that there should be a provision for the whole. To some extent that prevailed at present. The Mounted Police circulated over the whole colony. As to the country versus town, the Attorney-General had stated the proportionate number of police in the country and in the city, and proved that there was no great disparity. The amount of revenue paid by the city was £27,000, and by the country £7,700. The cost of the City and Port police was £21 000. The amount received from country districts was £2,000 altogether, and the expenses of country police were £12,000.

Mr STRANGWAYS considered that the Treasurer had made a singular calculation. He believed the hon member included other things in his estimates than the cost of police. Did he include in his statatements merely the small item of police—if so, that item formed a very small portion of the expenditure of the city of Adelaide. There were other large sums——

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon member was going beyond the question.

The clause was carried as amended.

On clause 54 being proposed,

Mr GLYDE asked what penalty would be inflicted on a person who did not appear on being chosen constable. He had looked at clause 156, but did not see that a District Council or a Corporation was empowered to levy a fine.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was provided for in the Bill, and they would arrive at it afterwards.

Mr SOLOMON asked if the substitution of an affirmation for an oath was provided for. He moved, as an addition to clause 54, that provision should be made for a person chosen as constable making an affirmation instead of taking an oath.

The CHAIRMAN put the amendment, which was carried.

The clause then passed.

Clause 55, providing that a person chosen may provide substitute, was passed.

Clause 56, providing for the publication of lists of constables passed as printed.

Clause 57, defining how vacancies shall be filled up, was passed.

Clause 58, providing remuneration for constables, passed with slight amendment.

On clause 59, providing for the revenue of District Councils being put,

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS proposed to add in the 3rd line, revenue arising from "Jetties."

Mr STRANGWAYS objected to the jetties being handed over to the District Councils, and thought that the sense of the House should be taken by specific resolution on the subject He objected to the Commissioner of Public Works endeavoring to hand those jetties over by a side wind

Mr BURFORD though the jetties should be placed under the Trinity Board

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had put the clause in that form that would allow him to bring forward a specific resolution He proposed to insert the words "jetties, piers, and breakwaters"

Mr REYNOLDS asked if a correspondence had not been entered into with the District Councils on that subject He was sorry to say that District Councils did not value jetties so much as they ought to do Even when a truck got out of repair an application had been made to the Government to repair it He thought a clause could be embodied in the District Council's Bill, making it a matter of duty to take charge of those works He considered it would be a great saving to the country

Mr LINDSAY asked, as the power of District Councils was to be extended, whether it would not be better to abolish the two Houses and govern the country by means of District Councils

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was not intended to propose that District Councils should be compelled to take charge of those jetties He could not understand the objection to the amendment, inasmuch as it only proposed that District Councils should have the same power of maintaining and repairing the jetties which they already possessed The hon member for Sturt had said that District Councils did not appear inclined to spend money in repairs of jetties, but that resulted from doubt as to their power, and the object was to give them express power to spend money in that way He thought it unwise to mix up the question of obligation with the question of their doing it if they felt inclined Great doubt might arise as to the House passing laws compelling them to spend money in that way, but no question could arise as to the advisability of empowering them to do so if they chose

Mr MILDRED asked if it was the intention that District Councils should have the jetty fees? He was prepared to say that jetty fees had never remunerated the Government for the outlay in those works Many vessels would put goods in boats rather than pay the jetty fees, but he believed if such a charge was made as would remunerate for the outlay, it would be a great benefit to the public

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was the intention to do so He would say further there had been a correspondence such as had been alluded to by the hon. member for Sturt, but it was of varied character Some Councils would have nothing to do with the jetties Some had not replied After some further correspondence, there appeared no general objection to handing over the jetties to the District Councils

Mr ROGERS wished to know whether, in case of improving the roads of the district, it would be necessary for a District Council to employ an attorney in arbitrations regarding the properties necessary to be taken for those roads

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that there must always be, from the very nature of things, some difficulty in taking a person's property against his will for the public benefit, and there must arise the necessity for taking advice to see that the proper measures were maintained They were therefore in a dilemma, for if they intended to give minute directions as to properties in those circumstances they would run the risk of handing over a person's property without his consent to a municipal board, and by the present law it must be expedient to employ a person to give advice as to the public duties to be performed

Mr ROGERS said that it was an expensive process, and wished it could be simplified

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, at any rate, as there were no provisions in the Act for the purpose of effecting an exchange of roads, and for the construction of new roads, the more convenient time for discussing that question would be when the new Road Act came under discussion

Captain HART thought it hardly necessary to insert the word "jetties," inasmuch as during the time he held office he had made application to the District Councils, enquiring whether they would take jetties under their management, having all tolls, on condition of keeping them in repair, and, with the exception of one, all District Councils to whom application was made declined to take the jetties on these conditions

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had already said that some of the District Councils that had declined to take the roads in the first instance, but ultimately had agreed to take them In fact almost all had agreed to do so

The clause passed

On the motion of Captain HART, the Chairman reported progress and obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday next

The House resumed

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

On the third reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill being proposed,

Mr REYNOLDS said when that Bill was taken out of Committee, he was taken somewhat by surprise, and must confess that by his own carelessness he had allowed the opportunity to pass of moving an amendment He believed it was then competent to move the recommittal of the Bill, in order that the 12th clause might be amended by striking out "incestuous," in the 12th line His object was to place a female on the same footing as a man The Bill certainly drew a particular distinction between man and wife, and while they looked at the act of adultery to be morally the same, in both he thought they were not acting fairly towards females in not allowing them the same privilege as was allowed to the male He moved that the Bill be recommitted

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion, and would also move that the Attorney-General should place on the table of the House the Amended English Act, which he believed had been laid before him by the hon member for Barossa No notice had been taken of that Act,, He did not know in what the amendments consisted He believed, however, that so pressing were they, that a great portion of the amendments at first proposed had been withdrawn, in order that the remainder might pass It was considered so essential to pass that amended Bill that all doubt-doubtful clauses were withdrawn He therefore hoped the Attorney-General would feel himself bound to adopt the English policy, and have the English Act printed and supplied to hon members, so that they might see how the Bill before the House required amendment It seemed to him that many matters required amendment There were no means provided for dealing with properties in cases of divorces, when marriage settlements were involved, or of survivorship, where money was secured by death or will Now in the English amended Act those cases were provided for There were also other questions affecting the position of the children of divorced parents He thought the Attorney-General might give some information on these points, on which some difficulty had been found in England With the hope that those point would be attended to he would second the motion of the hon member for Sturt

Mr BAGOT regretted not being in his place during the second reading of the Bill, and hoped the House would not vote for the amendment of the hon member for Sturt, because it might have the effect of delaying the passing of the Bill It appeared to him that Bill was one of those measures which a country so far advanced in civilisation as South Australia ought to be ashamed of not having passed before (Laughter, by Mr Reynolds) That expression seemed to amuse the hon member for Sturt, but had he seen the grievous results in many cases which came under the notice of persons of his profession on account of not having had a Bill of that nature, by means of which facilities were given for divorce, and also, by means of which, married women treated improperly by their husbands, could enforce some alimony, he would not have treated it it so lightly Cases of that sort occurred every day With regard to the questions of the hon member, Mr Strangways, it would not be expected that the Bill should be perfect It would be necessary, in fact, to amend a Bill of that kind as soon as it was found there was a difficulty in working it It would be better if it could be managed that the amendments passed in the English Bill should be introduced at once, but the time was so short during which those amendments could be considered, and the decisions of the Courts at home brought forward, so as to enable them to work the measure smoothly, that he hoped the House would agree not to postpone the Bill for making the amendments proposed It appeared to him that the 17th clause gave the Court power to secure to the wife a certain gross sum of money according to the ability of the husband to pay it Perhaps it did not go far enough with respect to settlements, but they did not often come within the circuit of the Court Settlements in the colony were not settlements in England, and he hoped the House would pass the third reading without further comment, as the passing of that Bill would give great advantage to a numerous body of people

Mr LINDSAY rose amid loud and continued cries of "divide" He should not have spoken until the Bill went into Committee had it not been probable that the vote of that House would prevent its being re committed He had given great attention to the Bill, and thought it very objectionable He considered they were about to pass it because it had passed the British Legislature He did not think that a sufficient reason He was not opposed to the principle of divorce, but could not go the length of that Bill He thought, considering the grave objections brought forward by the mover and seconder of the motion, the Bill required serious consideration The French Legislature, after the revolution, decided in favour of divorce, and passed a law in 1803 which they repealed in 1816 The French law sanctioned divorce by mutual consent under stringent regulations The man must be 25 years of age, and the woman 21 They must have lived two years together, and the separation must be with the consent of parents and relations No person divorced could be married to another party for the space of three years afterwards, and the guilty parties divorced for adultery were not permitted to marry ("Divide, divide, divide") The French law treated adultery as a crime, and punished it He wished hon members would give him the same liberty to speak he was willing to accord to them (Hear, hear) He would simply remark that the law he had endeavoured to explain was infinitely preferable to the Bill before them The first law had been tried 13 years, and then the French abolished it He thought the Bill very objectionable

The motion for the third reading was carried by a majority of 5, the votes upon a division being as follows —

Ayes, 18—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Burford, Wark, Macdermott, Glyde, Hawker, Bagot, Hart, Hallett, Shannon, Hay, Rogers, Mildred, Townsend, Collinson, and the Attorney-General (Teller)

Noes, 13—Messrs. Strangways, Lindsay, Peake, Dunn, Harvey, Duffield, Scammell, Cole, Solomon, McEllister, Neales, Milne, and Reynolds (Teller)

Upon the motion that the Bill do now pass,

Mr. Peake again called for a division, with the following result:—Ayes 18, noes 12. The Bill was consequently passed by a majority of 6.

Ayes, 18—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Burford, Wark, MacDermott, Bagot, Glyde, Hawker, Hart, Collinson, Hallett, Shannon, Hay, Rogers, Mildred, Townsend, and the Attorney-General (Teller)

Noes, 12—Messrs. Strangways, Lindsay, Reynolds, Harvey, Neales, Dunn, Solomon, Cole, Scammell, Milne, McEllister, and Peake (Teller)

THE IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The further consideration in Committee of this Bill was postponed till the following day.

LAPSED MOTIONS.

Upon the motion of Captain Hart it was determined to proceed with the lapsed motions.

GRANTS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. Reynolds asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether since the waste lands have been placed under colonial control any officer, either on half-pay or on the retired list, has received any grants of the public lands, and (if any) the names of the officers obtaining such grants.

The Commissioner of Crown Lands stated that one officer (Captain Dashwood) had received a grant of land in fulfilment of an engagement made by the Crown before the passing of the Waste Lands Act.

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE ACT.

Upon the motion of Mr. Strangways the lapsed Orders of the Day for the previous day were proceeded with, and the hon. member then moved that the Supreme Court Procedure further amendment Bill be read a second time. The effect of the Bill would be to repeal two clauses of the Supreme Court Procedure Act, the 182nd clause of which empowered the Judge to direct a Jury to give a special verdict. The Judge might put any question he thought necessary, and direct the Jury to answer it, and the full Court could then enter a verdict. The Jury were prevented from giving a verdict upon the merits of the case. This clause the present Bill proposed to repeal, and the law would then stand as in England—where the Judge might put a special question upon the consent of counsel. The other clause which it repealed was the 183rd, which enabled a Judge to direct a reference at the trial. The Judge at present was enabled to order a reference, and in the event of either party refusing to appoint an arbitrator, the Judge could do so. The Bill, which he now moved be read a second time, provided that after a cause was set down for hearing it could only be referred by the consent of the parties, as in England. He might mention that the Bill met the general approval of the members of the legal profession.

Mr. Peake seconded the motion.

The Attorney-General had had an opportunity on a previous occasion during last session of stating what were his opinions in reference to this Bill. If it had been introduced in the way in which the former Bill left that branch of the Legislature during last session, he should have had no objection to it. There were two questions involved—the one was the power of the Judge to refer questions, and the other with regard to the power of the Judge to call upon Juries to find facts specially. Very few who had been in the habit of attending Courts of Law prior to the passing of the Act, at present in force, had not heard the Judges express regret that the power to refer did not exist. His own feeling was in favor of retaining the power as at present, and with regard to the power of referring at nisi prius, he believed it was most useful and necessary. In England whenever a Judge expressed an opinion that a case should be referred, the deference paid by the profession to the Bench, generally, indeed almost invariably, caused the suggestion to be acquiesced in. He did not remember an instance in which that suggestion had been made that it had not been carried out, but in this colony he had known many instances in which one or the other party had refused to refer the case after the suggestion of the Judge, and the case had consequently gone to trial with the feeling of every one that the result to be arrived at would be unsatisfactory to all concerned in the procedure, and inadequate to the attainment of that justice which should be the object of proceedings in the Supreme Court. He objected to do away with reference at nisi prius, but whether the Judge should have the power to direct a reference of the matters in dispute might be a question for consideration. He thought the hon. member for Encounter Bay had introduced this Bill under a misapprehension relative to the existing state of the law in this colony. Since the Act at present in force had been passed he did not think there had been one case, or certainly not more than one, in which the power referred to as being possessed by the Judge had been exercised, but he thought there had been cases in which if a Jury could have found a fact specially, it would have been beneficial. That, in fact, was merely what was done daily in England, instead of the Jury finding facts specially the Judge eliminated one or two points which he considered decisive of the whole matter, and required them to give their answer. That was a power which the Judges claimed in accordance with a practice which had prevailed ever since the Restoration. It was impossible to open a single volume or to attend a Civil Court without seeing the power exercised. The only effect of the clause in the Act which it was proposed to repeal was that it gave power to the Judges in all cases where it appeared to them that the justice of the case required that power to be exercised. He should have preferred seeing the Bill in the form in which it was last session, but would leave it to the House to determine whether it was expedient to deprive Judges of the power to direct a reference or to call upon a Jury to find facts specially.

Mr. Solomon should oppose the second reading of this Bill, for, if he understood the hon. mover rightly it proposed to do away with that which had been found by the mercantile community a very great desideratum. He understood the hon. mover to state that the Bill would take from the Judges the power of referring cases to arbitration. (No, no.) It would be a great disadvantage to the mercantile community if in matters of account brought before the Supreme Court the Judges were to be deprived of the power of sending the case to arbitration particularly when it was one which no Jury could decide with such evidence as was placed before them. In all cases of accounts one or other must be wrong, and a private arbitration was the proper tribunal for deciding such; but if the reference were to be made entirely dependent upon the consent of the advocates, the advocate who had the weakest cause would not consent. For this and other reasons which occurred to him, he must oppose the Bill.

Mr. Strangways said the hon. member for the city had misunderstood the object of the Bill. Clause 183 of the present Act gave the Judge power, after a case had been set down for trial, without the consent of either party, and perhaps against their wishes or intentions, or either of them, to send the case to arbitration. Any case might be referred without the consent of either party. The mercantile community had felt the injury of the clause which the Bill proposed to repeal. With respect to the other clause which the Bill sought to repeal he merely wished to assimilate the law to that of England. The hon. member was proceeding to read a case recently decided, to show that the existing law sometimes operated prejudicially, when

The Attorney-General thought the hon. member should not be permitted to introduce original matter, as there would be no opportunity of reply.

The Speaker suggested that the hon. member for Encounter Bay should not read the paper to which he had referred.

Mr. Strangways, in conclusion, stated that the Bill had received the support of a large portion of the mercantile community and nearly all of the legal profession.

The motion for the second reading having been carried,

The Attorney-General suggested that the hon. member should not put the Bill in Committee, as he wished to take the opinion of the House in reference to the amendments which he had introduced in the Bill of last session.

The consideration of the Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday next.

GUARANTEED RAILWAY BONDS.

Mr. Neales brought forward the lapsed motion for the consideration in Committee of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to introduce a Bill to guarantee 6 per cent. on the capital of £25,000 proposed to be raised by the Adelaide and Holdfast Bay Railway Company.

The proposition was negatived.

CAPT. JOHN FINNIS.

Upon the motion of Mr. Neales, seconded by Capt. Hart, the petition recently presented from Capt. John Finnis was ordered to be printed.

GAWLER TOWN.

Mr. Duffield moved—

"That on Wednesday, 27th October, this House will resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the purpose of considering an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief requesting that he will be pleased to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for the purpose of granting the prayer of the petition of the Mayor and Corporation of Gawler Town, presented to this House on 15th September last."

The petition had been in the hands of hon. members who had no doubt read it. The arguments used in the petition rendered it unnecessary that he should make use of many remarks to bring the case fully before the House. The Mayor and Corporation of Gawler had, he considered, made out a good case for assistance to make the street through their town. The residents of Gawler Town asked to be erected into a Corporation without knowing what the effect would be, and the consequence was that the formation of the street had been taken from the Central Road Board and cast on the shoulders of the Corporation If they had been aware of the effect of their act, they would not have asked to be constituted a Corporation until the street had been placed in a state of repair It was well known to every one who had travelled to the northward, that this street in Gawler Town was peculiarly situated, the whole traffic of the Northern District having to pass through there The street had never been thoroughly made, it had been partly made by the Central Road Board, but by the act of the inhabitants its completion had been thrown upon themselves, and they now asked that justice might be done them, by such a sum being placed upon the Estimates as would be sufficient to place it in a passable state of repair He might mention that when the railway was extended north of Gawler Town, it would not relieve this street from the very large amount of traffic to which it was now subjected

Mr Solomon seconded the motion, which was carried

FIRE BRIGADE

Mr Solomon put the question standing in his name—

"That he will ask the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure into the Parliament, during the present session, for the formation of a Fire Brigade for the City of Adelaide, also, if any arrangements will be made with the Railway Commissioners by which fire engines may be forwarded from Adelaide to the Port in case of fire, also, if any arrangements are to be made by which the intelligence of fire at the Port can be conveyed to Adelaide during the night"

He was induced to ask the question, as on several occasions the city had narrowly escaped being burnt to the ground It was highly necessary some arrangement should be made for a Fire Brigade

The Commissioner of Public Works said the Government had received information that the Corporation of Adelaide were considering a scheme for the formation of a Fire Brigade after the model of one of the most successful brigades in England The Government would give every consideration to the matter It would be very much better that a fire engine should be provided at the Port as the expense of keeping a locomotive with her steam up would be very great By 1859 arrangements would be made by which messages could be conveyed between Adelaide and the Port during any hour of the night

FOWLER'S BAY

Captain Hart moved—

"That the instructions to the naval officer for the late survey to the westward, together with that officer's report on his return, be laid on the table"

The object which he had in asking for the papers was that the report of the naval officer with reference to the anchorage at Fowler's Bay might become public He believed it was a subject which was every day becoming more interesting Recent discoveries had placed them in possession of facts in reference to the interior of Fowler's Bay which would render it necessary at a very early date that something should be done He had the honor, on a former occasion, when certain despatches were laid upon the table in reference to the application for that portion lying between the boundary of Western Australia and this colony, to call attention to some facts in reference to the formation of the coast in that particular direction It was a matter which for the last 20 years had been of deep interest to him The changes in the formation of the coast in the vicinity of Fowler's Bay indicated important changes, not only in the coast, but in the interior He believed that large lagoon country, which was such an impediment to discoveries in the North, would be found to terminate where the lime formation extended into the interior When they considered that the cliffs were 600 feet high, and that there was a table country which presented the appearance of as good a sheep country as the colony could afford, and when they considered that there was no water drainage to the sea, it showed to him to a demonstration that there must be a drainage to the interior The recent discoveries showed that the view which he previously entertained and expressed was not a fallacious one and bore out the views which he had expressed as Treasurer, and the instructions which he had issued to Captain Douglas He believed he might say that the Government were not at present in a position to state what discoveries had been made of late by private individuals in the neighbourhood of Fowler's Bay but he believed they were of such a nature that the importance of that locality would become apparent to the House and the whole colonies It would be found from the papers which he now asked for that there was good anchorage in Fowler's Bay, and water in the immediate neighbourhood Applications for runs had been made in the immediate neighbourhood of Fowler's Bay, and the Naval Officer had marked out where a township might be placed with advantage He believed the House would not only agree to the motion, but that there should be a depot for provisions established at Fowler's Bay, for in every instance parties had been compelled to turn back from their inability not to procure water, but provisions If a depot had been established there, he had no doubt they would have been in possession of important discoveries The termination of the lagoon country to the westward was almost certain Fowler's Bay was the most western portion of this country From there to Cape Arid, a distance of between 400 and 500 miles, there was no other port He believed, the table land which Eyre skirted was the Moreton Bay country of South Australia and it would become still more important if, from the limestone formation they could enter that new country, abounding with lakes, &c, of which they had heard It was desirable not only that a depot should be established, but that a township should be laid out, and every encouragement afforded to private enterprise If a depot had been established there, Major Warburton, Stewart, Foster, and others would have been able to prosecute their search hundreds of miles further Twenty-five years ago, when engaged upon the coast, and seeing the extraordinary changes in the coast line, he felt satisfied there must be great changes in the interior as well, and everything which had since occurred had tended to show that his impression was a correct one

Mr Strangways, in seconding the motion, said he was sorry to hear that the country which was at the back of that referred to was so valuable, because it would diminish our chance of getting it He saw by the New South Wales papers that there was a difficulty in separating Moreton Bay, because it was pledged for the loans which had been raised by New South Wales, and he apprehended the same difficulty would exist in reference to that portion which this colony was desirous of annexing

Captain Hart remarked that the question was not whether the country belonged to New South Wales or this colony, but the question was, whether there was really a good country there It was immaterial whether the sheepfarmers paid their license and assessment to New South Wales or to this colony, but he much questioned whether New South Wales would not make a bad spec by receiving the licenses, and in return affording the squatters that protection which they were bound to extend to them If there were a country which would supply thousands and millions of sheep it would surely be better for the whole community South Australia must, under any circumstances, benefit, as the port was in our province, and the trade must centre in this province. It would be short-sighted policy indeed to say that they should stop the onward progress of things because it was possible the New South Wales Government might claim the country New South Wales had made discoveries for us, but according to the arguments of the hon member for Encounter Bay, he would say that New South Wales had done foolishly to make those discoveries

Mr Strangways did not object to the onward progress of things, but objected to their being too much talked about

The motion was carried

SERGEANT NOLAN

Mr McEllister moved—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a copy of the rules by which the Police Force of this province is regulated, also, a return showing the date on which Sergeant Nolan joined the Police Force, the offences (if any) noted in the charge-book against that officer during the period of his service, together with a copy of the charge preferred against him which caused his dismissal, and a copy of his reply thereto, with such other information as it may be in the power of the Government to afford relative to the charge preferred, and the defence (if any) set up in this case"

Carried

PORT LINCOLN

6 Mr MacDermott moved—

"That this House will, on Friday, 22nd October, go into Committee, for the purpose of considering an address to His Excellency the Governor in-Chief requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for 1859, for the purpose of extending the Jetty at Port Lincoln, in conformity with the prayer of the petition of the inhabitants of that place"

Mr Duffield seconded the motion, which was carried

MR G E HAMILTON

7 Mr Strangways put the question in his name—

"That he will ask the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether any person other than Mr G E Hamilton had an opportunity of tendering for the work required in laying out the Kapunda Extension Railway, and, if not, why not? also why the person who surveyed the line was not employed to lay it out on the ground?"

The Commissioner of Public Works said that upon the Kapunda Railway Bill being passed, the Government were anxious to proceed with the work as rapidly as possible, and he communicated with the Railway Commissioners upon the subject, as it was necessary the line should be pegged out The Assistant Engineer was fully engaged, and he asked the Commissioners to recommend some person to him to peg out the line The first application which was not from Mr Hamilton, he considered too high and rejected Mr Hamilton then tendered at a very reduced rate, and his tender was accepted He believed he acted rightly in so doing, and hoped he had explained the transaction to the satisfaction even of the hon member for Encounter Bay

WILLUNGA

Upon the motion of Mr Milne, the memorial of the settlers from the neighbourhood of Willunga presented a few days since, was ordered to be printed

The House adjourned at twenty minutes past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 22

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o clock

MAIN ROADS

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Public Works when the Government intended to introduce the series of resolutions or scheme which had been spoken of for the purpose of maintaining the main lines of road in the province

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS intimated that he should give notice on Tuesday next

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr MILNE asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether, since the report of the Select Committee upon Railway Management had been laid before the House, the Government had sold a portion of the land upon which the Committee had recommended a station should be erected, and thus prevented the recommendation of the Committee from being carried out

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could not at the moment lay his hands upon the papers which he required, but would remark that immediately upon the report being sent in he communicated with the Railway Commissioners, and upon a careful examination of the country it was ascertained that the sum of £2,000 would not be anything like sufficient to place a station upon the spot which was recommended by the Committee. The Committee recommended that the erection of the station should not exceed that sum There was also a question about a lawsuit involved in carrying out the recommendation of the Committee, and the Government, after taking the matter very carefully into consideration, determined upon not carrying out the recommendation of the Committee so far as the site of the station was concerned The land would not have been sold if it had been felt that the matter was at all in abeyance, but the Government felt it was desirable that the station should be constructed where it was originally proposed The last part of the report of the Committee would be attended to in the further construction of railways

WATERWORKS

Mr NEALES wished to ask the Commissioner of Public Works, as the hon gentleman had postponed the consideration of the Waterworks Bill, to lay upon the table the various reports which had been rendered by the Commissioners to the Government, as it did not appear to him that the Bill contained the whole of the recommendations of the Commissioners He wished to have the papers laid upon the table before the second reading of the Bill, in order that he might compare the recommendations made by the Commissioners with the course proposed by the Government, as indicated in the Bill He particularly wished to compare the recommendations of the Commissioners in reference to the repayment of the loan with the action taken by the Government

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had no objection to produce the papers connected with this or any other matter, and if the hon member would furnish him with a list of the papers he required, they should be provided at an early opportunity

Mr COLE was desirous of asking the Commissioner of Public Works if the approach to Port Lincoln Jetty was upon public or private property

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could not positively state, but believed that it was upon Government land He would prefer that the hon member should give notice of the question, and he would then give an absolute and positive answer

HARBOR TRUST

Mr PEAKE moved—

"That in the opinion of this House, the expenditure by the Port Adelaide Harbor Trust has not been in conformity with the purposes for which the vote of £100,000 was granted by this House "

He did not know if any hon members would scruple at the expression which he had made use of—"this House' —as he believed the amount was granted by a former Legislature, but if exception were taken to the term he would with the permission of the House alter "this House" to "the Legislature of the Province " He had been induced to table the motion in consequence of perusing returns which had been laid upon the table in September last, showing the expenditure by the Harbour Trust It appeared by that return, that £3,369 had been expended by the Board in deepening the outer bar at the entrance to Port Adelaide, and £35,974 in deepening various wharf frontages inside the harbour These items appeared to stand in strange, striking juxta-position The proportion in which the money had been expended upon the two points of the harbour appeared to him so strange, that he felt the Board should be afforded some opportunity of explaining the proportion in which the money had been expended and their reasons for doing so He had occasionally visited Port Adelaide, and had seen an extensive amount of dredging going on opposite various wharves belonging to parties with whom he was not acquainted He found the harbour very materially and beneficially deepened for the proprietors of these wharves, and no doubt to the advantage of the shipping interest generally He would allude, however, to the objects for which the money had been voted It would be found that it was voted for general and specific purposes, and that it should not have been dealt with in this disproportionate manner Looking back to the title of the Bill he found it was an Act to raise 100,000*l* for deepening and improving the harbor and for other purposes By the head and front of this Bill it appeared that the Legislature had voted this money for the purpose of deepening the outer and inner bar so as to make Port Adelaide available for the general purposes of commerce The money was voted for the purpose of improving the harbour generally It would have been consistent, natural, and in accordance with the views of many competent shipmasters visiting the Port if the money had been expended strictly in the spirit in which it was voted by the Legislature The House would observe that the first purpose to which the money was to be applied was to deepen the outer and inner bar, and make Port Adelaide a place of refuge for ships visiting the Port, and diminish the expenses to which shipping were subjected by lying at the Lightship and the increased cost of lighterage On August 5, 1857, a paper was laid upon the table of that House, in which it was stated by the Engineer to the Harbor Trust that to enable ships of deep draught of water to enter, and to effect a greater depth of water at the outer bar, it was absolutely essential to remove the inner bar That was the opinion of the Engineer to the Harbor Trust, and yet not sixpence had been spent upon the inner bar If he said not another word he thought he had stated sufficient to show that there was ample room for enquiry, and that the House would not be going too far in censuring the manner in which the money had been spent Probably gentlemen who were connected with the Harbor Trust, and who had sanctioned the expenditure of the money as he had stated, would at no remote period go to the Executive and say that they wanted more money, and when they did so, if they were asked if Port Adelaide was a better place of refuge for vessels, had a deeper draught of water, or possessed increased facilities for vessels discharging their cargoes, now that £100,000 had been spent, they would be compelled to reply in the negative The effect desired had not been attained, the recommendation of the Engineer had not been attended to, and all that he had recommended yet remained to be done He did not know that there was any necessity to go further into the matter, as he had merely to refer hon members to the evidence of the Engineer, of 1st December, 1856 That officer stated that the first work which he considered it advisable to execute, was the removal of the inner bar It was quite evident that nothing had been done to the inner bar, that the Engineer s recommendations had been neglected, and that Port Adelaide was little better than it was in 1852 It afforded no greater accommodation to ships of heavy tonnage drawing a heavy draught of water He had been on board many ships coming up to the Lightship, and had heard the heavy complaints of those connected with the shipping interest, relative to the expenses to which vessels were subjected by being compelled to lie there It was right that the House should see why the £100,000 which had been voted for expenditure in this part of the colony, had been expended in such serious disproportion, and with such little regard to the Act The House would consider whether it had been expended to afford a shelter for shipping, and render it a place of refuge for them, and afford accommodations for vessels of deep draught of water It was clear that the recommendations of the Engineer had not been carried out nor had the views of the Legislature in voting the money been carried out in the way in which the money had been expended He would therefore call upon the House to go with him in censuring the course which had been pursued by the Harbor Trust

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion

Mr COLLINSON said the motion which had been brought forward by the hon member for the Burra and Clare appeared to him to reflect in a manner so undeserved upon the Harbor Trust that he trusted he should have the indulgence of the House whilst he endeavoured to explain some points which had been alluded to by the hon member He had obtained from the Harbor Trust a written statement of the causes which had induced them to pursue the course which they had, and he thought that statement would sufficiently satisfy even the hon member for the Burra and Clare, that the Harbor Trust had done the best they could under the circumstances He would read extracts from the statement which he had received from the Harbor Trust, and comment upon them as he went along In the first place, it appeared that when the Trust was first formed there were no appliances in the colony of the nature required, and the first subject to which the Board directed their attention was to procure the necessary apparatus to deepen the harbor They forwarded instructions to England to send out the best dredging-machine that could be procured for the purpose, but a delay of 18 months unfortunately occurred in procuring it The first work which that machine was put to was to deepen the outer bar, and during last season an additional depth of water was obtained there of four feet and a-half (No, no) The Board considered that the old dredge could be advantageously employed in widening the channel more particularly at the upper part where the greatest depth of water could be obtained by the dredging-machine then in the colony. Whilst this work was going on no dredging charges were incurred at the expense of the Government within a hundred feet of any private property. Whilst the operations of the Harbor Trust were going on in front of properties, the proprietors of those properties were employing dredging barges outside to meet the work which was going on. At Maclaren's Wharf, Princes Wharf and Levi's, excavations went on in the same way, till they were met by the work which was going on by the Government. These operations were carried on till May last, when the Board deemed the channel sufficiently widened. In reference to the removal of the bar, it would be seen that the very first work to which the steam-dredge was put was deepening the outer bar, although by a misprint in the papers which had been alluded to by the hon mover, the outer was by a printer's error termed the inner bar. The dredge was kept at that work till her removal to the inner bar was rendered necessary by the winter setting in. To remove the inner bar effectually would be a work of at least six, seven, or eight years. There was at least a mile to accomplish, and a channel would have to be cut 300 feet in length and 8 feet in depth. The work which had been done in the inner harbor since the arrival of the new steam-dredge had occupied four months, and during that period 30,000 cubic yards of limestone crust had been removed, about 30,000 tons of crust had been removed at a cost of half-a-crown per ton. He presumed that the amount which would have to be expended upon the inner bar would be between £30,000 and £40,000. In the early part of the summer, so soon as the weather was settled, the steam-dredge would resume operations at the outer bar, so as to enable large ships to shelter in Light's Passage. When there, vessels could be lightened of their cargoes before crossing the inner bar. The necessary moorings were shortly expected from England.

Mr REYNOLDS rose to order. It appeared to him that the hon member was reading his speech.

The SPEAKER said the hon member for the Port was in order, he had asked permission to read some extracts from a statement which he had received from the Harbor Trust, and to comment upon them as he proceeded.

Mr COLLINSON continued. As regarded the removal of the inner bar the Board did not think they were justified in proceeding with a work of such magnitude as would occupy six, seven, or eight years. The work which had been effected in the inner harbour enabled vessels to swing round at any period of the tide. In raising silt in the inner harbour the amount expended had been £26,840 15s 10d, and the expense incurred by the Board in getting rid of this silt had been £3,565 5s 11d. It had been urged that this expenditure of £26,000 was inconsistent with the provisions of the 5th clause of the Act under which the Trust was constituted, but upon reference to that clause it would be found that the expenditure was fully authorised, and that Prince's Wharf was even named in that clause, as indicating where operations should be carried on. Hon members, upon reading the clause, would find that its provisions had been most explicitly attended to. The Trust were as bound to put the silt away after it had been raised as they were to raise it out of the harbour. The Board had severely felt the want of storehouses and other buildings. A blacksmith's shop was found essential, although that was one of the items which was now objected to. The old dredge had done some little work, but only in the way of clearing up those portions which had been deepened by the spoon-barges employed by the Trust. He found that opposite Levi's Wharf 56,970 tons of silt had been raised, opposite McLaren's, 4,368 tons, opposite Queen's, 24,233 tons, opposite the North-parade, 96,408 tons and opposite Prince's Wharf, 56,111 tons. The reason the last quantity was so small was, that the depth of water was so much greater at that end of the harbor than anywhere else. If the silt had been at the same level at Prince's Wharf as at other points, there would have been a much larger expenditure at Prince's Wharf in order to obtain the depth of water which was there. Hon members should remember that these operations had been carried on for the purpose of clearing the fairway channel. It was true that but a small quantity of silt had been raised by the new dredge at the outer bar, but the fact was that the current had done good service, for it had washed away at a rapid rate the sand which had been held in solution. He should certainly oppose the motion.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the hon member for the Burra and Clare in his opening remarks had ventured to say that no improvement had been effected in Port Adelaide since 1852.

Mr PEAKE said he had never stated anything of the kind.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS did not often mistake the observations of the hon member, but on this occasion he felt bound to take his disclaimer. On the few occasions which he had visited the Port he felt perfectly satisfied there had been very considerable improvements in Port Adelaide. If the hon member for Burra and Clare on visiting the Port had not observed these improvements he must have gone down on his own business and been so intent upon it that he had failed to observe the improvements which were apparent to every one else. The House was asked to support a motion to the effect that the money which had been expended by the Harbor Trust had not been expended for the purpose for which the money was granted. If he were a stranger to the purposes for which the money was really granted, he should refer to the Bill, and looking at the title, he would there find that the money was granted for the purpose of deepening and improving the harbor of Port Adelaide and other purposes. The title of the Bill clearly set forth the objects for which the money was granted, and here he would observe that the £100 000 had not yet been spent, and it was impossible to say to what purpose the balance might be appropriated. Any person who would carefully read the fifth clause—he liked the clause read in its entirety—would see that the Board had not at all exceeded their authority. Whatever the engineer might at one time have recommended in reference to the improvement of the harbor, he would simply state that the opinion of an engineer was frequently very materially altered when he was acquainted with the full particulars. He was perfectly satisfied, as every other hon member who would take the trouble to satisfy himself must be, that the harbor had been very considerably improved. He believed that the expenditure opposite Prince's Wharf had been a most judicious expenditure. The House should bear in mind that the expense of removing limestone crust was much greater than removing silt, and he would ask where had all the large ships been in the habit of lying? Where did the Frenchman, the General Hewitt, and the Bee lie? Where were the greatest facilities for large ships? Hon members and very many colonists of South Australia talked about the Port without looking at what had recently been done. Only the other day, when the House happened to be counted out, he visited the Port, and was much pleased with what he saw. He found the steam dredge operating a little below the Maclaren Wharf, as he believed it was called, where the limestone crust was very much nearer to the surface than in other portions of the harbor. To remove the limestone crust was a very expensive operation, but the dredge was very useful in doing this, as it brought up large quantities. A very large portion of the expenditure by the Harbor Trust had been in introducing this very useful machine, which he trusted would continue to keep the harbor in its present state, if it did not improve it. The House had been told that it was necessary there should be enquiry, and although he did not like to oppose enquiry where any considerable section of the House required it, he would direct the attention of the House to the Council Paper which had been alluded to during the debate, and the circumstances under which it came to be laid upon the table of the House. The Board was on one occasion termed a disgracefully managed Board, and the Board then voluntarily forwarded to him a full statement of the whole of their works from the commencement of their operations. When that paper was forwarded to him, he had it printed and laid on the table of the House, in order that hon members might see what had been done with the money. On looking carefully into the matter, it appeared to him that a very great deal of very useful work had been done. He was aware that captains of vessels generally complained of the Port, because the harbour he would admit was not to be compared to Port Jackson, or Rio, or other harbours, but still it was a very good harbour, and they ought to be thankful that they had got such a good one. Captains who had visited Sydney and some other ports were likely to think unfavourably of Port Adelaide, and if the captains visiting the Port said, as it might be assumed they would, from the speech of the hon member for Burra and Clare—"you have got a dredge, but you are doing nothing with it," he should then say there was room for enquiry, but so far from that being the case, all the captains with whom he had conversed, and he perhaps met with as many as the hon member for Burra and Clare, expressed their astonishment at the great improvements which had been effected in the harbour. On his last visit he had been very much struck with a dock which had been recently constructed, and felt satisfied it would not be long before ships of a considerable draught came up near the railway station. He strongly recommended the hon member for Burra and Clare to take another look at the Port, satisfied that he would then alter his opinion. They had been told by the hon member (Mr Collinson) what was perfectly true, that as soon as winter had thoroughly passed away, the large steam-dredge would resume operations at the outer bar. In the winter season there were frequently severe gales of wind, and it was not safe that the dredge should be at work at the outer bar. He believed the course shadowed forth by the remarks of the Harbor Trust to deepen the passage over the outer bar, and not to expend the whole money in effecting alterations in the inner bar, most judicious. He believed they had expended the money wisely and judiciously. There had been no shirking on their part any information which it was in their power to afford. He had the testimony of every person directly interested in the accommodations afforded at Port Adelaide to convince him that Port Adelaide had been very greatly improved, and in accordance with the provisions of the Act under which the Trust was constituted.

Mr HAY said before the motion was put he would state that unless some more information and better arguments were brought forward to defend the Harbor Trust and show that the money had been expended in accordance with the Act, he should have to vote for the motion. He should be sorry to do so because he believed that the members of the Harbor Trust had done what they believed to be right, but in the face of the Act, and the 5th clause which prescribed the purposes for which the money was borrowed he could come to no other conclusion than that the bars which obstructed the entrance to the harbor should be removed He agreed with the hon member for the Port (Mr Collinson) that the Harbor Trust were quite justified in using the old dredging-machine and the barges before they had the proper appliances, but when he found that by that agency the depth of water was in a short time increased to the extent of three feet, the House were certainly justified in expecting that more would have been done since the introduction of the new steam-dredge In alluding to the works at the outer bar, it had been stated that in addition to the sand which had been raised a considerable quantity was swept out of the channel, but what could be expected whilst there was such a shallow place as the inner bar but that the sand from the outer bar would be swept on to the inner? Unless free action were given to the ebb tide, instead of any good being done to the harbour by the adoption of the course which had been alluded to, a positive injury would be inflicted It was distinctly stated in the fifth clause of the Act, from which the members of the Trust derived their powers, that the bars were to be deepened to a depth of 18 feet at low water, but instead of this having been done at low water over the outer bar the depth was only 14 feet The House had a right to ask how much money was to be expended in the inner harbor before those works were proceeded with, which were prescribed by the Act Allusion had been made to the dock recently constructed by the South Australian Company, and it had been intimated that vessels would shortly be able to come up nearly to the Railway Station That dock was an honor to the South Australian Company, and if those who were possessed of private properties in the locality had been possessed of the same enterprise, probably there would have been no necessity for the discussion which had taken place that day It appeared to him that if operations were to continue as they hitherto had, and it were deemed essential that the bars should be deepened, they must pass a Bill to raise £100,000 more It was clear to him that no efforts had been made to remove those obstacles for which the Act was intended, and he should, therefore, support the motion

Mr BURFORD thought the force of testimony was in favor of the Harbor Trust having spent the money in the most wise, prudent, and efficient manner, and he himself had ascertained this from persons who were acquainted with the subject He was confident that if hon members made themselves acquainted with what had been done, and the reasons of its having been done, they would be as satisfied on the subject as he was The position of the Harbor Trust when they commenced operations was very peculiar They had not a machine capable of effecting the work for which the Harbor Trust Act was passed, and under these circumstances what were they to do—to leave the money unused, or to apply it to the improvements of the Harbor? They commenced at the north end of the Queen's Wharf, and worked upwards, as they could only use the "spoon blades," and these they kept constantly in operation They kept them in the centre of the stream—(No, no, from the Opposition benches)—in order to make room for ships to swing, which he understood from nautical men there was not previously room for them to do The Harbor Trust went on deepening and widening the creek until they came past Collinson's Wharf, but he had reason to believe from enquiries which he had made that none of the money had been wasted in improving the private property of wharfowners at the Port None of the money had been expended outside the prescribed distance—that was near the wharf The deepening of the Harbor in proximity to the Prince's Wharf had been accomplished by private funds, and even now there was a bank between the deep waters and the centre of Collinson's Wharf which made it necessary for vessels to warp round it in order to come in to the wharf This fact in itself would prove that the charges preferred against the Harbor Trust were not well founded In considering questions of this sort it was unfortunate that they were all landsmen (Laughter) But the hon member for the Port would correct him if he was wrong when he expressed his belief that the deepening of the inner bar would be an Herculean work, that bar being many hundred yards in width of hard limestone crust They should not find fault with the Harbor Trust for not making rapid progress with such a work, even leaving out of consideration the fact that they had to await the proper seasons for working They had now the assurance of the Harbor Trust that they would employ the new dredge upon this work He did not know that it was necessary to say more in order to show that there were not sufficient grounds for the motion He opposed the motion, which he regarded as an attempt to cast censure where it was not deserved, but where on the contrary a decided vote of thanks was called for He would remind the House that out of the £100,000, £30,000 had to be spent for machinery to carry out the Act

Mr MACDERMOTT would not join in the motion before the House He recollected some time since when the fire took place at the Port, that the shipping were aground, and great apprehensions were in consequence entertained for their safety That fact alone showed that the expenditure incurred in making a fair channel in the Port was wise He also thought the first object to be attained was to enable the largest class of shipping to get over the outer bar into a place of safety where they could be discharged or lightened at any time in still water The motion could scarcely be considered as called for, and he should therefore oppose it

Captain HART would vote against the motion, and he did so because if the motion passed it would be a very severe censure on the Board appointed by a former Legislature for the purpose of carrying out the very extensive works which he believed any man who knew anything of the subject must admit were carried out, not only well but in a most satisfactory manner, as enquiry would fully prove The great bulk of members of the House could not understand the question now before it though he said this not with the desire of throwing any doubt on the ability of hon members to judge of matters when placed fairly before them, but hon members had not this question fairly before them Many hon members who would under present circumstances vote for the motion, if they had the opportunity of seeing the improvements which had been effected, and of asking the engineer what had been done, and what ought to have been done, would change their votes on the subject All he could say was that he had never known a man who went to Port Adelaide and looked at matters there for himself, whose views were not greatly changed, if they had previously been adverse to the Port. An hon member had, that very morning, one who was probably as well acquainted with the Port as most hon members, on his (Captain Hart's) referring him to the map, and explaining the very strange views taken on the subject of the Port, changed his mind in consequence of the explanations which he then received He believed there was not a member of the House except his colleague, the hon member for the Port, who would not have his views changed if he visited the Port and made the enquiries which would be necessary before giving a vote of censure against the Harbour Trust, such as that now proposed Probably the strongest proof that such was the case, and which clearly proved the unfairness of a censure of this kind under present circumstances, was to be adduced from the fact that the hon mover of the motion had himself shown considerable ignorance of the subject The hon member for Gumeracha also had fallen into a mistake which, if he had been acquainted with the subject, would have been impossible Many mistakes had been made with respect to the inner bar The object was to make a harbour of refuge at Light's Passage, which was between the two bars, and it was the removal of the outer and not the inner bar which would enable ships to reach this locality The late Harbour-Master, Captain Lipson, continually pointed out the advantage of clearing away the outer bar, by means of which ships could partially discharge outside, and then come in to Light's Passage, and there discharge such cargo as would be necessary to enable them to come to the wharf He found also that the engineer who penned the report, quoted by hon members, was not as well acquainted with the subject as those who had practical experience of the Port He (Captain Hart) looked at the inner bar as a mere bugbear which had been raised up, and not at all as the difficulty in navigating the Port, which some persons imagined It was in smooth water where there there was not a ripple, and if a vessel touched upon it it was of no consequence Besides, when there was water to go to the wharf there was water over this bar, and a vessel from it could reach the wharf in 20 minutes It had been said by Mr Burford, and it was a fact, which any one examining the locality must be aware of, that the removal of the inner bar was not to be accomplished for £100,000 There was a half mile of solid rock to be removed Indeed to call it a bar was misnaming it It was a piece of rock half a mile long, and there was no silt on it at all The hon member for Gumeracha was altogether wrong in supposing from the explanation of the hon member for the Port that the sand held in solution, or floating from the action of the dredge on the outer bar could be deposited on the inner bar How could the sand removed from the outer bar on the ebb tide come to the inner bar?

Mr HAY explained What he alluded to was that the sand stirred up in deepening the inner harbor, was deposited on the inner bar

Captain HART regretted having misunderstood the hon member But with reference to the possibility of any silt having been carried to the inner bar from the deepening of the inner harbor, that in itself was a mistake which must be apparent, inasmuch as the bar itself was of rock and there was no deposit on it at all On referring to the Engineer's report, he saw, and hon members would no doubt admit, that the scouring process was the first thing to be attained, and that process the Engineer pointed out was to be attained by building sea-walls, which would prevent the water from losing itself over flats and creeks and places of the kind The report went on to state that by deepening the inner bar the wash would have the effect of scouring the outward bar But he would ask was it intended that the cost of these sea-walls was to be included in the £100,000 The cost of this work should be first ascertained, and he was satisfied if an enquiry were made it would be found that without the sea-wall the removal of this portion of the bar would be of no value The removal of the outer bar had been persevered in whenever the weather would permit, not a moment of time had been lost since the proper appliances came to hand, and the result was that four feet and a half of water had been gained But the carrying out of the work to its fullest extent was yet to be accomplished, and it was only possible to work at certain times and seasons There was still however, a sum of about £28,000 left for working on the inner harbor, but if the House required the evidence of an engineer, they would find that the removal of the inner bar could not be accomplished if the whole £100,000 were available for the purpose With regard to the deep water and shallow water of the Port, it was one of the points which hon members, if they considered the matter of sufficient interest, would do well to go and look into for themselves The depth of the water was a matter not well understood The upper part of Port Adelaide was further down the Gulf than the lower part The fact was as the upper part of the Port was further down the Gulf than the lower part therefore the limestone crust which gradually descended towards Kangaroo Island was further from the surface at the upper than at the lower part, and, therefore there was a depth of water in the upper part which could not be obtained in the lower part without removing the limestone crust An hon member had said that large ships all lay near the Queen's Wharf, and that they could lie and swing there, but that was not always the case though there were deep holes, for there was not a sufficient length of deep water, and the vessel's heels grounded whilst their bows remained afloat The removal of a very small amount of silt, however, enabled the seven or eight large ships now there to remain perfectly water borne at all times of the tide. He would ask hon members to look on this matter in a common sense point of view He would ask whether a ship would be likely to sustain more damage by being detained owing to the difficulty of crossing a limestone rock, or by having a passage opened which would enable her to lie upon that limestone rock He could compare the proposed mode of dealing with the bars to nothing but a man laying down his feather bed to enable him to walk to his couch, and then lying down upon the carpet If hon members visited the Port, they would be able, with their own good common sense, to view the subject, and he was satisfied that they would not then vote for this motion

Mr Reynolds said the hon member (Capt Hart) had advised hon members to take a common-sense view, and as he (Mr Reynold) wished to be a common sense man, he would endeavour to do so, and to view the matter according to clause 5 of the Act of 1854 This was a subject to which he had turned his attention for a long time He had not been led to notice it by the hon member (Mr Peake) He himself when in office had called the attention of the Harbor Trust to the fact that they were not carrying out the provisions of the Act He thought the Commissioners were like a man who having a horse and cart, put the cart in front of the horse (Laughter) The clause of the Act was—"and this Trust shall from time to time expend the moneys received by them with authority hereof in deepening the outer and inner bars of the harbor of Port Adelaide, &c" But it appeared that the Trust began by deepening the inner harbor and then they thought of the outer bar Now for the first time in his life he had heard from one hon gentleman what he thought that hon gentleman had never stated before that the inner bar was a bugbear When the Harbor Trust Bill passed the Legislature, he (Mr Reynolds) understood that both the inner and outer bars were very important matters, that the inner one was a very serious obstacle, and that everything which obstructed the stream should be removed For this purpose £100,000 was voted and now the inner bar was a bugbear The fact was that the Harbor Trust had spent so much money at Collinson's, or rather, he begged pardon, at the Princes' Wharf, that the inner bar was now of no consequence So long as the Princes' Wharf monopolised the money, it was not wanted for the inner bar, but no doubt after a while the hon member for the Port—the two hon members for the Port—would ask for a larger sum to deepen the inner bar, which instead of a bugbear, these hon gentlemen would represent as very important ("Hear, hear," from Mr Burford) "Hear, hear," said the hon member, who had got additional light on this matter He (Mr Reynolds) had expected that that hon member would be able to enlighten him and other hon members, but instead of that he was more in the dark than ever (Laughter) The Harbor Trust had ordered a very superior dredging machine, and he would like to know if that machine which had cost so much, and upon which so much engineering skill had been expended, was quite up to the mark He believed the Commissioners had been continually patching and patching at it, and that great expenses had been incurred, and he questioned whether even an ignorant Commissioner of Public Works would make such mistakes as the nautical gentlemen who composed the Commission had fallen into It was understood that when the Harbor Trust got the dredging machine they were to go to work on the bars, but instead of that, a great deal of time had been spent on the inner harbor and in the cracking of crusts, and it was not until the attention of the Commissioners was called to the matter that they went to work on the outer bar He would go with the motion, believing that the Commissioners did not carry out the spirit of the Act If the hon the Commissioner of Public Works had shown the precise quantities of silt which had been removed and the localities from whence taken, he would have been better pleased but if that hon gentleman would look into the matter, he would find that the Princes Wharf ought to be debited with a larger amount than the 56,000 tons He believed that 169,000 tons out of the 220,000 raised altogether had been taken from the North Parade, Copper Company, and close to the Princes' Wharf (Much laughter from the Ministerial benches)' Had the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands an interest there that made him laugh so loudly (Laughter) The hon member for the Port lived there, so he had a laugh on the right side Upwards of 100,000 tons of silt had been raised near the Princes Wharf, and he certainly thought that was never meant to be the case He had no objection to seeing the money spent fairly over the inner harbour but he did not think the Trust acted fairly in expending so much in one spot He was quite sure that though the inner bar was a bugbear now, when the £100,000 was all spent another £50,000 would be wanted for the inner bar, and at present there was very little left either for the inner or the outer bar

Mr Neales believed if the parties who spoke so much respecting the Harbor Trust placed a little more reliance upon their own judgments, their decision would be in favor of the Trust The first thing they heard was that £20,000 had been spent opposite the Princes' Wharf He would say if the Harbor Trust had not spent that money there, they would not have spent it in the right place, for in that spot they could do a vast deal of good with such a sum, whereas it would be merely thrown away upon the inner bar They were not to measure the Port as so many feet from the Princes' Wharf to the inner bar, and to distribute the money according to the area If the £100,000 were to be spent in this way over the whole harbor, it would be better to take the large vote for the amount and throw it into the gutter He was satisfied no unprejudiced man could go to the Port and not believe that to pass this motion would be an insult to a body of respectable gentlemen who, with no recompense but a few paltry fees, had conducted the works of the Harbor Trust. It was a style of motion which, if persisted in, would drive all respectable men out of that House and out of the Government service. (Hear, hear) This was one of those one-sided motions brought in to turn out the Government if they backed up the Trust or, if not, to censure the members of the Trust (Hear, hear, and No) He was sure that no set of men had ever done their duty better than the members of the Harbor Trust, and it was for that reason he had taken the part which he did in the discussion of the Public Works Bill. It was a farce to talk of spending the money equally over the harbor, for there were many spots where the whole £100,000 would not do any good and if they attempted to put up the sea-walls which had been spoken of, a much larger sum would be requisite It was extraordinary that the hon member for the Sturt should have held an office which gave him great influence over the Board, and yet never complained of their management until now when he was out of office The hon member said he had remonstrated with the Board but could he show the despatches which he sent them? ("Yes," from Mr Reynolds) The hon member said yes, but he (Mr Neales) could not see any directions as to the operations of the Board, and if the hon gentleman had given any he should have provided the £200,000 which would be requisite to carry them out There was no pretence for saying that the money had not been spent in the best place (Cries of "Oh, oh") He repeated that there was no pretence for the statement, and he (Mr Neales) would be ready to move for a commission the next day to enquire into the matter, and, if such an enquiry were granted, it would prove that the money was properly spent (Hear, hear) A sufficient sum might not have been voted, and he was not inclined to vote any more money for the Port at present, but the money voted had been properly spent The money had not been laid out at the wharves, but in the stream according to the Act As to the remarks of the hon member for the Sturt, if the first thing mentioned in an Act was to be the first done, he could only say they would be perpetually doing most ridiculous things The Harbor Commissioners had done their best, and any gentlemen who voted that day without examining for himself would do a most unhandsome thing towards the gentlemen of the Trust The course pursued by them was the carrying out of a design which the hon. member, Captain Hart, had proposed to execute many years ago for a given sum, but the Government preferred taking the matter into their own hands With regard to the outer bar, he believed all had been done which could be done, for it was impossible to work with that "tub" of a machine in very bad weather The Harbor Trust did not invent the machine They sent home for one, and if it did not quite answer its purpose they were not to blame They might as well say that if he was appointed Commissioner of Railways next day he was to blame for the heavy carriages now used upon the line He did not believe that if the motion was carried it would affect the Government, and he did not care whether it did or not, but he felt that in voting for it he would be throwing an insult upon the Harbor Commissioners If these motions were persevered in, which struck at the respectability of persons in the public service, they would soon have different men in such positions If they wished to effect this, let them do it in God's name, but he would be no party to it

The Treasurer would oppose the motion It was asserted by the hon mover and other hon members that the Harbor Trust were to blame for the manner in which they carried out their operations, inasmuch as they had not commenced at the outer instead of the inner bar He would show presently that it was impossible to commence at the outer bar, but he would first dispose of some matters of a personal nature, which he felt must have influenced hon members in bringing forward and supporting the motion. It was said that a large sum had been spent at a particular wharf, and certain names had been mentioned which he would not repeat. That was the under current which influenced hon members, especiallly the hon member for the Burra and Clare, who said that the Port depended on the interests of the proprietors, and the hon member for the Sturt followed this up by certain insinuations.

Mr PEAKE rose to explain. What he had said was, that the effect would be to benefit the proprietors, but that the works did not make the Port as effectual a place of refuge for ships deeply laden as it might be.

The TREASURER said that this statement completely bore out what he had stated. If the hon member chose to deny his words, he (the hon the Treasurer) was prepared to accept the withdrawal, but he had taken down the words, and they were "beneficially deepened for the benefit of the proprietors." The names of certain proprietors were mentioned, but he would not repeat them, but there was clearly some under current which guided the motion. He was sure the House would not be influenced by any such feeling, and that they would not for the sake of damaging the Government, or a member of the Government, throw a slur upon the Harbor Trust. The hon member for the Sturt said that in the beginning of the year he urged on the Trust that they should spend the money elsewhere. The hon member (Mr Reynolds) was Commissioner of Public Works on the 1st October, and at that time there was a report before the House which was published on the 5th of August. That report contained details of the operations, in which it was stated that nothing had been done to deepen the outer bar. Why did not the hon member then impeach the Commissioners and say that they were proceeding contrary to the Act, and that they ought to have began at the outer bar. No, the hon member dealt with less severity than he evinced now. But he now found that these gentlemen were in the wrong, and that they should incur the heaviest of all censures, the censure of that House.

It being now 3 o'clock, at which hour according to the Standing Orders, the Orders of the Day should be proceeded with,

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the suspension of the Standing Orders, in order that the debate might be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER said the debate could only be continued in a case of urgency. He would be prepared to take the opinion of the House on the matter.

The TREASURER moved that this was a case of urgent necessity, as he thought it better that a question of this kind should be fully discussed.

The question was then put and carried, and the Standing Orders suspended accordingly.

The TREASURER was glad the House had resolved upon that course, for he was satisfied that the conclusion to which they would come would do justice to the Harbor Trust, as to the way in which they had carried out their work. He would now allude to the actual conduct of———

Mr REYNOLDS explained that he drew the attention of the Harbor Trust to the matters spoken of in the debate early in January.

The TREASURER said if the hon member had done so, to a certain extent he must acquit him of the remarks which had been made, but if the Harbor Trust had committed an offence, which ought to have brought on them the censure of the House, he should have brought them before another tribunal to answer for it. But the Harbor Trust could not have done otherwise than they had done. The report he had quoted stated the steam-dredge which had been ordered was launched on the 6th June, and it was estimated the preparations would be completed by the end of September. But the dredge was not ready to work until November. The next report—for the first half of the present year—states that before the dredge being finished, they had succeeded in removing the inner bar. It was impossible to employ the dredge in the harbor when she was not in the colony, but when she arrived she was employed in removing the outer bar, and continued to do so until tempestuous weather caused them to desist. What then were the charges against the Harbor Trust that the House should be induced to pass such a censure as was implied in the motion? The spirit of the Act was, that the Harbor Trust should do all they could to deepen the outer harbor, to the terminus fixed by the Act, namely, a point higher up than Princes Wharf. They did so. Being without machinery they commenced operations where their work would be of the greatest benefit to the harbor. At the point they had deepened the largest vessel might float at low water and discharge her cargo at all times. They then turned their attention to the outer harbor when they obtained the means of doing so, and therefore, he could not see the slightest ground for the charges brought against that Trust.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would only say a few words on the subject, for it had been perfectly explained to the House that there was no ground for passing that motion. He regretted that the motion should have been brought on at all. The discussion must have shown that the charges were utterly groundless. It seemed strange that that motion should have been tabled without some stronger grounds than were put forth. Of all the hon members who had spoken in favor of the motion, there was not one connected with the mercantile portion of the community for the hon member for Gumeracha, although connected with the mercantile portion of the community in a certain sense, had never to his (Mr Dutton's) knowledge, had a consignment made to him. He had never heard a complaint from the Chamber of Commerce, who were probably the most competent to judge of the manner in which the Harbor Trust performed their duties. He had been for some years past connected with mercantile matters, and had had many ships of considerable draught of water, drawing 18 feet, consigned to him, and he found no difficulty in getting them over the two bars, but had found difficulty from their taking the ground in the lower parts of the harbor, and he therefore thought the Harbor Trust had properly expended their money in deepening those portions of the harbor which they had done. He would make one further remark with regard to the question. The hon member for Sturt who filled the office of Commissioner of Public Works for some months, never made a complaint on the subject till now. No doubt he did write to the Harbor Trust, asking to be informed why so much money was being spent on the upper part of the harbor, and in course of time he received a reply stating the "why" and the "wherefore," and the hon member never thought proper to make any remark, never found fault with the report from that day until the present when with a great deal of thumping on the table and theatrical action —(laughter)—he asserted that the Harbor Trust was quite incompetent to its duties, and had been spending a great of money with the base intention of improving private property. It was not the first occasion on which he had done so.

The SPEAKER called the hon member to order.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would only say that the motives for that motion were entirely understood by every member of that House, and therefore he did not think it needful to allude further to them. He thought, however, that the hon member for Sturt had little cause to support it, for although he had an opportunity of finding fault while in office, he had never done so.

Mr YOUNG rose to oppose the motion. He regretted that a motion calculated to reflect on gentlemen holding the offices held by the Harbor Trust, should have been brought forward with so little ground to support it. It was to be sincerely regretted that such a mode of procedure should emanate from the House in a country where funds were placed at the disposal of parties who were open to the charge of acting from individual interests. But what conclusion was to be drawn from the figures placed before them? From the £100,000 which the Harbor Trust had been authorised to raise, no less a sum than £25,000 had been applied to deepening the outer bar, of which complaint had been made. About one quarter of the amount had been spent in obtaining machinery. He thought, instead of there being cause for complaint, there was, rather, ground for satisfaction and confidence in those gentleman. He offered those few remarks as a ground for opposing the motion of the hon member for Burra and Clare.

Dr WARK, as an old colonist, remembered the fault found with the harbor, and it was the difficulty of getting over the bars. A few years ago the sum of £100,000 was voted for the purpose of removing those bars. That sum was voted in consequence of the sum being named by an eminent engineer. The question was, had that money been applied as by law directed. His opinion was, and ever had been, that it had not. It might have arisen from remissness or from inevitable delay that that machine was not got out earlier than it was. It might have been, he believed. All the work done on the outer bar had not been much. Instead also of using it on the inner bar, it had been taken up into the harbour, and employed opposite private wharves. One point struck him forcibly regarding the statement of the two hon members for the Port. Those gentlemen did their best to make out a good case, but one said the bar was a mile in breadth, and the other (Captain Hart) stated it was half a mile. It might have been expected that both those hon members being on the Harbor Trust—(no, no)—acquainted with the Port, however—they would have known better. He did not think Captain Hart's plan for deepening the harbor was quite philosophical. The Commissioner of Public Works had passed a high compliment on the hon member (Captain Hart), and that might be the reason why the Harbor Trust was not included in the Public Works Bill——

The SPEAKER called the hon member to order.

Dr WARK said it was evident that the Commissioner of Public Works was imbued with the same spirit, because that Trust was excluded from the Bill. What light he had on the subject he (Dr Wark) did not know, but his predecessor had expressed different views. With regard to their forming different opinions from those they then held, on going to the Port—doctors differed and so did engineers—and he was giving the opinion of an engineer when he stated that the work was not quite up to the engineering abilities of the day.

Mr STRANGWAYS would support the motion. The hon member (Mr Collinson) said that when the Trust first went to work they had no appliances to enable them to carry out the works according to the Act, but notwithstanding that they commenced the work and carried it out against the provisions of the Act to the extent of expending £50,000. That account came from an hon gentleman who was a member of the Harbor Trust. He said the Trust ordered the steam-dredge. Various statements had been made respecting that steam-dredge. It was said to be designed by one of the first engineers. It was indeed a most remarkable production. One of the first accidents to it was the breaking of one of the cog-wheels, and it cost something to have it repaired. Then it appeared that the steam-dredge of the first engineer—he imagined one of eighteen years experience—was fitted with a screw propeller in order to move it from place to place, and that was found to be useless and an expense entirely thrown away. The steam-dredge was shaped something like a horse-shoe, and the consequence was that, when the machine was set to work, the thing ran round and round, just like a dog running after its tail. That was the way in which the best machinery of the very eminent engineer did its work. The Trinity Board said the water on the outer bar had been deepened 4½ feet. Others said it never had been deepened. He went down one day to see the works. The steam-dredge was engaged in loading the barges, and these barges, when filled, were removing the silt to about a quarter of a mile off, where it was deposited. The consequence would be that at the first movement of the water, a considerable portion of the deposited silt would be removed back again to the place whence it had been taken. The expenditure might have been carried out according to the ideas of some of the framers of the Act, but any one reading the Act would see that the two bars should have been first removed, and the remainder of the money spent in improving the harbor. The hon. member (Mr. Collinson) stated that the crust must be removed to a depth of eight feet, for a considerable width, but it had been stated in an official document that the thickness of that crust was from 18 inches to 2 feet. It appeared to have suddenly grown to 8½ feet. But the best proof of the necessity for that motion was in Council Paper, No. 70, and he would ask how that expenditure had been authorized? There were no less than eight items. Those items were not for the dredge, but for making the streets of Port Adelaide. There were nearly £4,000 spent for the benefit of the Corporation of Port Adelaide, and that was one instance of the improper expenditure of public money which that motion would tend to prevent. Then that new dredging machine, that did not do its work properly, cost upwards of £22,000. The next items would be found in Appendix A. It would be found that instead of the expenditure taking place at Snapper Point, it had taken place at the wharf opposite, Mr. Collinson's, and the Steam Company's Wharf, and down Fairway Channel. Almost the whole of the expenditure which was stated to have been incurred in deepening the water in the inner bar, was spent opposite the wharves of private persons. Was it a blind for the people, or one of those typographical errors which were sometimes there when convenient? The hon. member, Mr. Collinson, said in consequence of those improvements vessels could swing at all times of the tide opposite those wharves. He did not say what sized vessels they were, but he had seen vessels lying aground there. He supposed the hon. member meant vessels of the size of a barge, and therefore the statement could not be correct. The hon. member (Capt. Hart) said it would be highly prejudicial to deepen the water on one bar, and it would cost £100,000. Why had that not been found out before? The Government had alluded to the 5th clause of the Act. He (Mr. Strangways) read the Act, which required plans, estimates, and specifications to be sent in to the Government, stating the mode of expenditure and the sum required. If those had been deposited, the Harbor Trust were not so much to blame.

Mr. Collinson would venture to say those plans and specifications had been forwarded according to the Act.

Mr. Strangways.—That partly exonerated the Harbor Trust, but the Government must bear the blame of the Harbor Trust not spending the money according to the Act. It had been said that no landsman ought to give an opinion on the question. It should be left to seamen. Why the whole affair was one of land, one of mud and silt, and nothing else. (Laughter.) But it was purely an engineer's question, and no merely nautical man could know anything about it. The hon. member (Captain Hart) said he had been informed by a competent engineer that the best way to deepen the water over the bar was to make a deep hole at some place higher up the harbour. He must have been an A1 engineer. On that principle the easiest way of removing the bar at the mouth of the Murray would be to make a reservoir at Albury. The real objection to removing the inner bar was that it would let the water out of Port Adelaide altogether. It was, in consequence, a vital question to those who took an interest in the Port. Mr. Neales, in alluding to the proper manner in which the money had been spent, said that, had it been expended otherwise, it would have been as profitable to take a note for £100,000, and throw it into the gutter, and trample on it. No doubt the hon. member thought it would have done more good, for he would quickly have gathered the fragments, and taken care of them. He also objected to the motion being introduced because it would tend to keep respectable men out of office and out of that House. If it kept respectable men of that kind out of office, it would be advisable to be continually passing motions of that kind, and then there would be no more jobbery and corruption in the public offices in the colony. In respect to no complaint having been made by the Chamber of Commerce, that was a favorite mode of argument made use of by members of the Government, who were in the habit of referring to one person or another as a reason for having no opinions of their own. But whether the Chamber of Commerce complained or not was a matter of indifference to the House. The House did not need to wait the condemnation of any of the public works by any one, if there were sufficient ground for enquiry into a question of the kind. Considering therefore that money had been spent in an improper manner, and considering that the whole of the plans and specifications had been approved by the Government, the censure implied in that motion would not fall upon the Harbor Trust only, but upon the Government, and he said distinctly that if they approved of the expenditure of the money, they deserve any amount of censure the House could pass upon them. No doubt the money had been misappropriated, and he should therefore support the motion.

Mr. Milne did not feel inclined to cast a sort of vote of censure on the Harbor Trust. But while saying so, he could not altogether absolve them from a certain amount of blame. He thought, however, the only blame was that of putting a wrong construction on the Act. In construing that Act they believed they possessed a certain amount of discretionary power in expending so large a sum of money in one part of the Harbor to the detriment of other portions. He believed that Act did not allow that construction. The first act of the deepening process should have been on the outer Bar; and seeing that there was a balance now in hand, it would be desirable to save that money for that purpose; he would therefore move an amendment to the effect that "In the opinion of this House the balance of money now in the hands of the Harbor Trust, should be expended in removing the two bars."

Mr. Townsend said it was clear when the discussion took place on the 5th clause, the whole of the money was expected to be expended in deepening the water on the bar. It was for removing the outer bar. The point of the discussion seemed to be whether the Harbor Trust was to go beyond the Prince's Wharf or not. They could not blame the Harbor Trust, for £38,000 had been spent in removing the bar, but still he thought the amendment correct, and he should support it.

Mr. Barrow would support the amendment, because he thought there were two constructions to be put upon the Act. The money was voted for the improvement of the harbor between the outer bar and Prince's Wharf. It might be argued that these were simply the limits within which the money was to be expended; or that the words referred to indicated the order of progress. Under any circumstances he considered that the intent of the Act included the improvement of the harbor, including the bars and the wharves. There was yet money remaining available for the deepening of the bars, and he thought with the hon. member for Onkaparinga, that if any error had been committed it arose from the construction put by the Harbor Trust on the Act. If it was really believed by hon. members who proposed and supported the motion that public monies had been knowingly and wilfully spent for the improvement of private property, they ought not to be satisfied with the motion on the paper, severe as it was. (Hear.) Had he (Mr. Barrow) thought that money had been so expended he would have called for a stronger vote of censure than that, and he considered it would hardly be just to arrive at such a decision without a minute and searching enquiry. There should be a Committee or Commission with special powers appointed to make that enquiry before such a conclusion should be arrived at. He, therefore, could not adopt a resolution implying a censure so severe, and he believed that the amendment of the hon. member for Onkaparinga would best meet the requirements of the case. He would, therefore, vote in favor of it.

Mr. McEllister would vote for the amendment because he did not feel justified in passing a vote of censure, and should be sorry to see a vote of censure passed upon a body of gentlemen so respectable as the Harbor Trust.

Mr. Rogers should vote for the amendment, for he could not go with those who would pass a vote of censure on the Harbor Trust. The money was voted for improving the harbor as a whole, and he considered they had done their duty. They had at first no machinery at work, and even if they had two-thirds of a season they were not able to work. He should support the amendment.

Mr. Cole would vote for the amendment. Although he did not think the Harbor Trust altogether to blame, they ought not to go free entirely. The charge against them appeared to be not having done what they ought to have done—remove the bar before going into the harbor. With regard to what the hon. member (Captain Hart) had said, he would observe that vessels now could lie and ride and swing round. The hon. member for Flinders said that vessels would soon find the ground, and at one time they were in a dangerous predicament on account of a fire at the Port. Of what use was deepening the water in the Port if there was no egress over the bar in such a case? If vessels were in danger from fire, they would run for the bar.

Mr. Hawker meant to oppose both the motion and the amendment. He would oppose them both on the same principle. He had heard no evidence to warrant such a motion. The amendment was merely a kind of trimming amendment, and if that passed, a vote of censure would still be cast on the Harbor Trust on account of the monies expended. He had heard no reason for believing that the money had not been expended in the best way. In clause 5, because the bar happened to be mentioned first, and the deepening last, there was no reason for taking that course in action He had enquired if the Harbor Trust had taken the best way, and he believed they had, and that the work had been done at the least possible expense Capt Lawrence, of the Orient, and others, complained, in times past, not of the difficulty of getting into harbor, but of the danger of getting aground when there, and of straining so as to damage the ships At one time the vessel alluded to grounded in the harbor, and was so severely strained that it was found necessary to put into the Cape and unload in order to be repaired That state of things was now removed, and the vessels could lie in safety Several hon members had said that nothing had been done to the outer bar at all (No no) He found on enquiry that the bar had been removed to the depth of 4½ feet (No, no) It was easy to say whether it was correct or not He had heard that it was It was a great thing to deepen the water to that extent, for now, instead of unloading into lighters, vessels were enabled to go into Light's Passage and there to enter a sheet of water as smooth as a mill-pond Instead of being aground now in the harbor, there were berths at low water for nine vessels drawing 16 or 17½ feet of water, so that the largest vessels bringing immigrants could lie without danger of grounding The captains of both the Bee and the Frenchman expressed their satisfaction at finding there was sufficient water for their vessels to swing at low water without the necessity of being in the mud He with the hon member (Mr Neales) had an objection to motions of that kind being brought before the House It was a kind of perpetual nagging at the Government The hon member for Encounter Bay said the Harbor Trust could not be considered to blame but the Ministers If blame was to be attached to any one, it was to the Harbor Trust for they were the responsible parties If hon members had no confidence in the Government they had better put a motion of want of confidence on the paper than take that method of annoying them He would then vote as an independent member, ("so will we all") as he thought right (hear, hear), either in favor of them or against them The hon member for Encounter Bay had been severe with regard to the steam dredge The best article that could be got was obtained from one of the first houses in England (Laird & Co), and it was understood to have had all the latest improvements The Trust ought not therefore to be blamed if it was not so good as was expected (Hear) With regard to Schedule A, paper 70, it appeared that the Harbour Trust made use of all available spaces to deposit the silt on the wharves close to the water They were obliged to issue tenders to get the silt away, and when carted off it was put down at different parts of the port where it would be made useful, such as in streets and other parts of the Port liable to be flooded The Harbour Trust could not therefore be to blame in that matter If the expenditure of the Harbour Trust had not been in conformity with the Act, he could hardly see how the House could say £27,000 should be expended on the outer bar It ought to have been proved that they had not expended their money judiciously He could not therefore support the amendment, and should vote against both it and the motion

The Attorney-General felt it his duty to oppose both the original motion and the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, and he did so because he thought if hon members considered what were the necessities and the requirements of the Harbor, and what accommodation was then at their disposal, they would not pass a resolution such as that now submitted to the House He remembered the discussion which took place in that House on the introduction of the Harbor Trust Act, and that the expression of opinion by the Government was then that the money should be devoted to providing access to the harbor rather than deepening the harbor itself But it was shown then that this would be an absurdity, and that instead of giving the facilities proposed it would have quite the reverse effect, for it was proved very clearly that although by these means a vessel might more easily be brought over the bar, yet on reaching the Port, accommodation was required for her during a period of perhaps several weeks It was thought to be idle to spend the greater proportion of the money voted in deepening the bars when immediately on the shipping being brought inside it was too shallow to float them in safety Mr Townsend, he thought, had very clearly shown them that the deepening of the harbor was an essential portion of the scheme, and not merely was this the opinion of members of that House, but it must be the opinion of all those who calmly considered the question on its independent merits What did they think would be said if, instead of following out this course, the deepening of Port Adelaide had been neglected, and a vessel coming in was, at low water, thrown full upon her side, and thereby, perhaps, inflicting great injury upon her owners That being the case, viz, that an essential portion of the scheme was the deepening of the harbor itself, how could they consent to a resolution such as that before the House? What evidence had been suggested by the hon member for Burra and Clare in favor of this motion, in spending the whole remainder of the money in deepening the bars, unless, indeed, the depth of water at present existing in the harbor was more than sufficient for their requirements in the accommodation of vessels There could not be any possible doubt but that the harbor contained, since this expenditure of money, a far greater amount of accommodation than it did formerly Certainly the hon member for Encounter Bay had said that vessels grounded in the harbor of Port Adelaide at present, and although that hon member was eminently qualified to form an opinion upon nautical matters by his extensive experience upon land (laughter), he (the Attorney General) would prefer taking the opinion of men whose competency to judge on a question of facts was the result of many years labour in their profession, and who considered it wise to spend some proportion of the money voted in deepening the harbor itself as well as in providing access to it Had it not been for the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Milne), he should have taken no part in the discussion, because he believed that the vindication which had been made by the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) and other gentlemen who had preceded him, would have prevented the possibility of any vote of censure, either upon the Harbor Trust or the Government With respect to the assertion that money had been spent in making approaches to certain wharfs, he would say that no money had been spent for such purposes, but for clearing the Fairway Channel for the convenience of the harbor and the shipping generally With regard to what had been said by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) he would state that the Harbor Trust Act was passed in 1854 It was in operation for one year and nine months before Responsible Government was introduced into this colony It was, until a year ago, subject to a Government which was not responsible ("Oh, oh," from Mr Strangways) That was one of the very emphatic oh s of the hon member for Encounter Bay, intended, no doubt, to carry conviction with it, but which so unfailingly left no impression behind it (Laughter) He repeated that up to a year ago the Harbor Trust was subject to a Government which was not responsible to the people During that time a Ministry other than the present existed, and during seven months of that period the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) was then Commissioner of Public Works He was quite sure that that hon member, during the tenure of his office, had exercised that vigilance and watchfulness over the interest of the community at large which would entirely free him from any implied censure—(laughter)—and that he (the hon member for the Sturt) could assure the House that no money had been spent in an unfair manner He said this sincerely, that he believed the hon member for the Sturt had never sanctioned any expenditure which was not strictly demanded With regard to the censure intended to be passed upon the present Government by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), all he could say was that such a censure would glance away as harmlessly as the shafts of that hon member ordinarily did, and whose joke was generally perpetrated at the expense of his argument (Laughter) He was glad to say, however, that the result generally, of that hon gentleman's effusions were not such as produced any injurious effect upon the Government or lowered their position in the estimation of that House He trusted the House would not sanction a principle involving a censure upon any branch of the Government, whether the Harbor Trust or any other public body, without having sufficient evidence to support or justify it

Mr Peake, in reply, indignantly denied that he had imputed unworthy motives to any member of the Harbor Trust or the Government, and this would be a sufficient answer to the remark of the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) that no gentleman would after that hold his place in the public service He had never imputed to any gentleman in the public service dishonest or unworthy motives, and he never would do so He took up the official return, and the item struck him at once as being contrary to the mode of expenditure provided for by the Act He would read the preamble of that Act, and then ask hon members whether they considered the provisions there indescribed had been carried out in their integrity (Preamble read) It was very clear from that that the money had not been spent in the manner detailed in that Act (Yes, yes) It struck him the money was passed to deepen the bars He had heard complaints from captains of vessels and others at their not paying more attention to the making of the approaches to the harbor, and although the hon member for the Port had said it was a trifling matter——

Mr Hart explained that he had been misrepresented

Mr Peake had understood the hon member to express himself so He should like to have been on board of the vessel under the command of that hon and gallant captain when she was bringing up at the Lightship instead of entering the harbour, and no doubt he (Mr Peake) would have heard in very strong terms what that hon gentleman's opinion was about it He would have prayed for the bars—(laughter) and have used the arguments against the expenditure of the money elsewhere which he did not adopt on the present occasion The hon member for the Port (Mr Collinson) had gone into the details of the return, but that was not at all the point He never disputed what that hon gentleman had submitted to them He did not imply any improper motives, but an infringement of duty He did not know even who were the members of the Harbor Trust until he came to that House He denied they had carried out the requirements of the Act ("Yes, yes," from Mr Neales) He considered it was a very proper thing on his part when he saw such a dereliction to submit it at once to the House, and he thought it was the duty of any other hon. member similarly placed to do the same. He threw back upon them the insinuation that he had imputed personal motives to any one. He recollected, however, a great heap of silt which lay once opposite Levi's Wharf at the Port, and that that same silt had suddenly disappeared by the operation of the dredging machine, although they could not find time to improve the entrance to Port Adelaide as the Act ordained. He thought they had had sufficient testimony as to the uselessness of deepening the outer bar, before scouring the inner one. It was a wasteful expenditure of the money which had been so appropriated, and it would be condemned by all those whose experience entitled them to judge on the question. He considered he had shown some reason for the course which he had adopted. So far from wishing to censure anybody, he would be contented to take the opinion of the House as to where the money which still remained should be expended. He did not wish to censure, but to ensure the work being done as quickly as possible. He would allude to the information kindly given them by the Commissioner of Public Works, first, that silt was harder to get up than limestone. He could not but thank that hon. gentleman for such a valuable piece of information. (Laughter.) Secondly, he had said that Port Adelaide was not Port Jackson. That was also a piece of information for which he must express his indebtedness. (Laughter.) With these few remarks he would leave the solution of the question in the hands of the House. To make Port Adelaide a port as they were making it at present, might be likened to a man who, having furnished a house in a most costly manner, locked it up, and having lost the key, was unable to enter it again. If it were thought desirable he should have no objection to withdraw his motion, and accept the amendment of the hon. member for Onkaparinga (Mr. Milne).

The Speaker then put the question, viz., "that the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the question," which was negatived.

On the question being put that the words proposed to be inserted, viz., "it be a recommendation of this House that the balance now in the hands of the Harbor Trust should be expended on the bars" be so inserted—

Mr. Hart rose and said he thought there was not such evidence before the House as would enable them to come to the conclusion suggested in the amendment, and he thought it would be the first instance of a resolution like it being passed in that House. It would be passing a censure upon the Harbor Trust without waiting to hear what they had to say in their defence, and without knowing what they were going to do with that money (no, no, hear, hear) which it was desired in the amendment should be expended on the entrance of the harbor. It would be a censure without one iota of evidence, and if the House took such a course, every member of the Harbor Trust would be bound to give in his resignation. He would ask whether it were possible for members of that House to have the same experience in these matters as gentlemen like Captain Hall, Captain Scott and others, whom he might mention. Who could be so well informed as men who had been shipmasters the greater portion of their lives? He would be willing to support a motion for a commission to enquire into the matter, but he could not agree to a censure such as that implied in the resolution before the House.

Mr. Neales, who rose amidst cries of "divide," said he rose to say a few words, and he was convinced that he would be able to say them, notwithstanding the cries of "divide" which generally proceeded from those hon. gentlemen who were at a loss for an argument. He did not approve of the proposed appropriation of the remaining £28,000 to the credit of the Harbor Trust without further information. If they agreed to this, no doubt when it was all lost, the Commissioner of Public Works would turn round and tell them, "Gentlemen, I am not responsible." Talk about responsible Government in such a case, it would be a farce. If Messrs. Scott, Tapley, and Hall, or others of the same experience, believed that the £28,000 could be judiciously spent in the manner indicated, then he would have no objection. It was well that they had got rid of the bias which had been disclaimed by the hon. member for the Burra and Clare (Mr. Peake), but so far as he (Mr. Neales) was concerned, the remarks of that hon. gentleman had left a stronger impression upon his mind than had formerly existed, because there seemed to have been a thorough determination to take up papers of returns and, without investigation, to submit merely the bald facts. This being the case, he begged to move the previous question.

Mr. Reynolds thought it was rather late in the day for the arguments used by the hon. member who had just sat down, as that hon. gentleman had only the other day voted for all the public Boards being made responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works. He (Mr. Reynolds) had been twitted with holding the office of Commissioner of Public Works when this unauthorised expenditure took place, but in reply to that he would inform the House that he had called the attention of the members of the Harbor Trust to the matter, and they in reply stated then that they were just on the point of turning their attention to the deepening of the outer bar.

The Speaker then put the previous question, viz., "Shall this question now be put," and declared the "noes" had it.

A division was then called for, of which the following is the result:—

Ayes, 15—Messrs. Barrow, Cole, Dunn, Hay, Lindsay, McEllister, Mildred, Milne, Reynolds, Rogers, Shannon, Strangways, Townsend, Wark, Peake (teller).

Noes, 14—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Burford, Collinson, Glyde, Hallett, Hart, Harvey, Hawker, MacDermott, Young, and Neales, (teller).

Making a majority of one in favor of the "ayes."

The Speaker then put the question "that the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted," and declared the "ayes" had it.

The motion in its amended form, viz., "That it be a recommendation of this House that the balance now in the hands of the Harbor Trust should be expended on the bars" was then put, when

Mr. Shannon rose and said he was really at a loss on which side to vote—(laughter)—and especially so as he considered that as much had been said in support of one side as the other. He could very well believe from a perusal of the official documents that the Harbor Trust had scarcely complied with their instructions, although still be believed they had acted honestly, and, therefore, he could not consent to the present question being put as it would be tantamount to a censure which they did not deserve. He should have preferred a motion for an enquiry, and with this view he would move an amendment to that effect. He was almost leaving the House a few minutes before, from the state of uncertainty in which he was, but perhaps his vote would have the effect of settling it one way or the other. He was prevented from leaving however by the Sergeant-at-Arms—(laughter)—and

The Speaker informed the hon. gentleman that he could not have been prevented from so doing by the Sergeant-at-Arms, as he had no authority for it.

Mr. Shannon did not know who the Sergeant at Arms was (great laughter), but he had certainly been stopped by some one from leaving the House, and he believed him to be the Sergeant-at-Arms. The door was locked. (Laughter.)

The Speaker—The hon. member has misapprehended. The Sergeant-at-Arms could not have prevented his leaving. If the door of the chamber was locked, which it always is during a division, the hon. member of course could not leave, and it was the duty of the doorkeeper to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. Shannon would, then, merely move as an amendment that the question be referred for enquiry.

The Speaker.—The hon. member cannot move an amendment of that nature on the question now before the House. All he can do is to move an amendment by adding other words to it.

Mr. Glyde made a remark or two.

Mr. Reynolds rose to speak, but was called to order as he had spoken already.

The Speaker then put the question involved in the hon. member for Onkaparinga, Mr. Milne's, amendment, and declared the "noes" had it.

A division was called for, the following being the result:—

Ayes 14—Messrs. Cole, Hay, McEllister, Rogers, Dunn, Reynolds, Lindsay, Wark, Mildred, Milne, Strangways, Townsend, Barrow, Peake (teller).

Noes, 14—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and Messrs. Collinson, Harvey, Young, Macdermott, Burford, Hawker, Hart, Glyde, Hallett, Neales (teller).

The Speaker gave his casting vote in favor of the "noes," stating that he did so because in his opinion the Harbor Trust had spent the money in the manner best calculated to promote the best interests of the province.

Mr. Reynolds rose to ask the Speaker a question on a point of order, viz., whether there were not rules to guide the Speaker in giving a casting vote?

The Speaker replied that it was understood that the Speaker generally voted against the Government when their conduct was under discussion, but that the matter in question was not the conduct of the Ministry, and that therefore he had voted according to the dictates of his conscience.

REPORT ON COLONIAL DEFENCES

The Report of the Select Committee on Colonial Defences was postponed and made an Order of the Day for Friday next.

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Commissioner of Public Works was anxious to proceed with the second reading of this Bill, but stated he was quite willing to postpone it in consequence of the lateness of the hour, if it were probable there would be any debate upon it.

Several members intimating a desire to adjourn, the House adjourned at 5 o'clock, till 1 o'clock on Tuesday.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Tuesday, October 26

The President took the chair at 2 o'clock.

Present—The Hon. the Chief Secretary, the Hon. Major O'Halloran, the Hon. the Surveyor-General, the Hon. S. Davenport, the Hon. Captain Scott, the Hon. Dr. Davies, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Mr Morphett the Hon H Ayers, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon A Scott

THE PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The SURVEYOR GENERAL presented a petition signed by 113 persons, comprising members of the District Council of Nairne and residents in the locality, praying the Council to amend the Public Works Bill by retaining the Central Road Board as at present constituted, except that it be made responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works The hon gentleman stated that though presenting the petition he did not pledge himself to support its prayer

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon H AYERS presented a petition from the District Council of East Torrens, praying the Council not to pass the Public Works Bill in its present form, but to exempt the Central Road Board from its operation

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon A FORSTER presented a petition from the District Council of Highercombe, praying the Council to delay the passing of the Public Works Bill until the public had had an opportunity of expressing their opinion of that portion of the Bill, which proposed to dissolve the Central Road Board The petition was received read, and ordered to be printed

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN was desirous of asking the Chief Secretary a question, which probably the hon gentleman would be prepared to answer at once On the 26th last month, he (Major O'Halloran) addressed a letter to the hon gentleman, with a request that the letter might be submitted to the Executive Council He wished to know if the letter had been so submitted, and if so, whether any reply had been received

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thought the course which the hon gentleman had pursued was rather unusual, but he might mention that a reply had been written to the hon gentleman on the preceding day, and he could not say why the hon gentleman had not received that communication

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of Message No 16 from the House of Assembly, intimating that the Assembly had agreed to the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill with amendments

The Hon A FORSTER wished to ask the Chief Secretary a question in reference to this Bill It had been pointed out lately that several important amendments had been introduced in the Bill in England, and he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to recommend His Excellency the Governor to assent to the Bill before further information in reference to the nature of these amendments had been obtained

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Government had no official information whatever of any alterations or amendments having been made in the Bill It was not the intention of the Government to advise the Governor to any other course than to assent to the Bill as assented to by both Houses of the Legislature

The Hon A FORSTER said perhaps he might be permitted to state, as the Government had no official information upon the subject—

The PRESIDENT was afraid the hon gentleman would be irregular in making any statement

EXPLORATIONS TO THE NORTH

The Hon Mr MORPHETT wished to ask the Chief Secretary if the Government had any information to lay upon the table in reference to explorations of country to the north and north-west Public interest had been strongly excited upon the subject, and if the hon gentleman could satisfy it he would probably do so

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Government had no official information upon the subject, but it was possible they might be in possession of some information in a few days, and on being so possessed they would make it public

THE INSOLVENT LAW

The Hon Mr MORPHETT wished to ask the Hon the Chief Secretary whether the Government were in possession of any despatch from the Secretary of State relative to the present Insolvent Law Rumours were abroad that the Secretary of State had intimated that Her Majesty could not be advised to assent to the Act He wished to know if there was any despatch upon the subject, and, if so whether the Chief Secretary had any objection to lay it upon the table of the House

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said there had been a despatch from the Secretary of State, but he would remind the hon gentleman who put the question, that the Queen's assent was not necessary After a Bill had been assented to by the Governor it became law, and the Queen might leave such Acts to their operation or otherwise, as she thought fit The despatch, which had been referred to, was receiving the serious attention of the law officers of the Crown, and after having been fully considered, would probably be laid upon the table of the House with the report

The Hon Mr MORPHETT said if there were any doubt about the despatch and report being laid upon the table of the House he would give notice of motion that the despatch and report of the law officers of the Crown be laid upon the table

JOINT STANDING ORDERS

The Hon Mr MORPHETT brought up the report of the Select Committee upon the Joint Standing Orders which had been sent to the Council by the House of Assembly The hon gentleman moved that the report be read

The Clerk of the Council read the report, which stated that the Committee could not advise the Standing Orders transmitted by the Assembly being adopted as the Joint Standing Orders of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, but recommended that the spirit of the Standing Orders referred to be embodied in distinct Standing Orders for the Legislative Council and House of Assembly

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the House went into Committee upon this Bill, some verbal alterations were made, the Bill was reported with amendments, the report was adopted and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

WASTE LANDS BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, briefly observed that there were very few novel features in the Bill The object of the Bill was principally to carry into effect regulations that had been in force for years, relative to the waste lands of the colony, and to give legal effect to what had been omitted in the Waste Lands Act of last session The first clause provided that the Governor should have power to grant annual leases to original lessees whose runs had been declared hundreds, such leases not to extend beyond the time for which the lease was originally granted The second clause gave power to justices to dispossess parties illegally in possession of waste lands, which provision was in the original Waste Lands Act, and in the Act of last year The third clause levied a penalty upon parties unlawfully in occupation, the object being to protect parties who paid rent against the aggressions of those who depastured their stock without paying any rent at all The fourth clause gave the Governor power to issue pastoral, mining, and timber licences, and the fifth clause gave the Governor power to fix a higher upset price for suburban lands The power in the original Waste Lands Act divided the lands into town, suburban, and waste lands, but under the Act of last year suburban were omitted The fifth clause, however, revived the power to which he had referred

The Hon A FORSTER seconded the motion for the second reading, which was carried and upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the Council went into Committee upon the Bill

The first four clauses were passed with verbal amendments

Upon the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moving the adoption of the fifth clause,

The Hon A FORSTER asked whether the clause would not interfere with the District Councils Act The District Councils had power to issue timber and depasturing licences, but not gold or mining licences

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY apprehended the District Councils had only power to issue licences within the hundred, but the clause under discussion gave the Governor power to issue licences in all parts of the colony

The Hon A FORSTER could not have objected to the clause if it had been clear that it extended only to lands beyond the hundreds He wished to know whether the clause would not come in conflict with the power given to District Councils It would be inconvenient that there should be as it were a double power

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY did not think that any difficulty was likely to arise and the clause was passed as printed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved the adoption of an additional clause, No 6, stating that the Act should have effect from the passing thereof

The clause was assented to, and the PRESIDENT having reported the Bill with amendments, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

The Council adjourned at 10 minutes to 3 o clock till 2 o clock on Tuesday

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 26

The SPEAKER took the chair at 10 minutes past 1 o'clock

MESSRS BAKER AND WATERHOUSE

Mr MILNE presented a petition from the Acting Manager of the South Australian Banking Company, in reference to the case of these gentlemen, which was received and read by the Clerk

HINDMARSH VALLEY

Mr LINDSAY presented a petition from Mr Young Bingham Hutchinson, of Hindmarsh Valley, praying that certain roads in that locality which the petition alleged to have been illegally stopped up by the Government should be opened

The petition was received and read by the Clerk

RAILWAY EXPENDITURE

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid on the table a return in reply to an address of the House, showing how the sum of £73,000, voted last session for the completion of a portion of the South Australian Railway, had been expended, and moved that it be printed

The motion was agreed to

CLARE AND MOUNT REMARKABLE

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS produced a letter from the Central Road Board in reference to some enquiries which had been made of that body respecting the main road from Clare to Mount Remarkable He thought the best mode of proceeding would be to read the letter, and moved that it be read accordingly

The motion was agreed to, and the letter was read by the Clerk It was to the effect that there was no main road between the localities in question, that the district was not within the jurisdiction of the Central Road Board, and that in the opinion of that body the making of a main line of road there was unnecessary

Mr PEAKE asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the Government would order the road in question to be defined through the few sections adjoining Clare, in order to enable the settlers to fence in their land

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS presumed there could be no objection to this being done, but the matter was not in his department He thought the matter should be decided by the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the Survey Office

MESSRS STUART AND FOSTER'S NEW COUNTRY

Mr REYNOLDS, with the permission of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, would refer to another matter It was rumoured out of doors that the Government were in possession of certain important information relative to the discoveries of new country by Messrs Stuart and Foster He wished to know whether the Government would lay this information before the House

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he had been in communication with Messrs Stuart and Foster, but the correspondence had not yet led to any result As soon as he was in possession of information he would lay it before the House

MONEY ORDERS BY TELEGRAPH

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid on the table a report from the Superintendent of Telegraphs relative to the transmission of money orders by telegraph

CUSTOMS RETURNS

The TREASURER laid upon the table certain Customs returns in continuation of returns previously presented The present returns had reference to the last quarter, and he moved that they be printed

Agreed to

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES BILL

The TREASURER said that, agreeable to notice, he now moved the second reading of this Bill The title implied that its main object was to repeal two Acts which now existed in the Statute Book, but which in reality were nullities, and to substitute another measure in their stead It also provided for the case of officers who had retired from the civil service under the provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Bill The first of the Bills proposed to be repealed, namely, the Clerks Salaries Bill, had become a nullity, in consequence, amongst other reasons, of the action of the Legislature during the last session The hon the Speaker would remember that during the last session the House passed the Estimates with the salaries differently classified from the manner in which they had previously been arranged, that instead of the three classifications in the Act now sought to be repealed there were five The present Bill divided the officers of the civil service into five classes having different rates of salary, so that it would be obviously impossible to work the Clerks Salaries Act together with the Estimates as now framed, as the Government continued to pay the clerks salaries in accordance with the Estimates as appropriated last year As there was no good-service pay which could be provided for under the Clerks Salaries Act, the several officers had been paid according to the amounts placed upon the Estimates of last year in the column headed "good-service-pay," and which was voted by the House for that purpose. When the Estimates were passing through the House last year, the Government had introduced a Bill almost identical with the present measure, and if that Bill had passed it would have effected what they wished to attain by the present Bill, viz, it would have repealed the Clerks Salaries Bill, and there would be no anomaly in the public service such as now existed But after that Bill had been fully discussed, and had passed its second reading and gone through Committee, it was thrown out on the third reading This had caused a complication in the Estimates which rendered the passing of the present Bill necessary He hoped the present Bill would be more likely to obtain the sanction of the House, inasmuch as it was precisely similar to that which the House had sanctioned last year Legislation on the point was absolutely necessary, inasmuch as otherwise the whole of the Estimates would have to be taken to pieces and the salaries transcribed in three classes instead of five as at present They would either have to injure many officers by making them receive much less than they got last year, or they must add greatly to the expenditure to protect these officers from being losers The present Estimates were founded on the assumption that the House would pass the Bill The Bill which he now held in his hand and which was similar to that of last year, provided for the classification of all officers into five classes In the lowest the minimum was £120, in the next £160, in the next, £200, in the next, £240 and in the highest, £280 In each class the salaries increased progressively by £40 so that in each the senior was better off than the junior clerk by that amount It was presumed that each officer on entering the service or being transferred to a new classification was not likely to be as useful as he would afterwards become when he had experience in that particular branch of the service, and it was, therefore, proposed to remunerate them by a good service pay of £10 additional each per year, so that in four years each officer would be brought up to the minimum of the next class above him This arrangement would also extend to officers who were not classified or who had upwards of £300 a year each, as it was thought in like manner that these officers would be more valuable as increased experience enabled them to fulfil their duties more efficiently One-half of the good service fund in the case of classified officers would go to form a retirement fund, and the whole in the case of non-classified officers, and from this fund would be paid retiring annuities to such officers as were entitled to them under the Act Officers would be entitled to retire on attaining the age of 60 years, but not otherwise unless disabled by ill-health or by some permanent incapacity which should represent with proper certificates to the Chief-Secretary, and would then be entitled to an annuity If an officer retired before attaining the age of 60, his annuity would be proportionate to the time he had been in the service If he retired in five years he would be entitled to one eighth of his salary, in ten years, to two eighths, and so on in like proportion There was by this plan ample means to provide against the possibility of the fund proving insufficient for the requirements of the case, for officers could not retire under this Act, as they could under the measure which it sought to repeal, viz, the 31st of 1854, an Act which was incomplete in its provisions and unsound in principle, inasmuch as the subtraction of 2½ per cent from the salary of every officer was not compulsory The result of this was that on the Act coming into operation not more than one half the officers availed themselves of the plan, and therefore the sum derived from it was much smaller than was anticipated, or than was necessary for carrying out the Act But there was another fault in the Act still more fatal in its operation than the smallness of the fund Officers after 14 years' service were allowed to retire though not disabled by sickness or bodily infirmity Many officers did retire as soon as they completed their 14 years' service, but this would not be the case under the present Act It was just and right that those who were most likely to derive the first benefit from the Act should contribute in a larger proportion than others to the fund, and hence it was that the superior officers contributed the whole of their good service pay, whilst the classified officers only contributed one half Last year there had been not only a new classification, but also an increase in the pay of officers, for whilst the pay of none had been reduced, that of many others had been increased The reason of this was, that since 1854 there had always been an allowance voted to each officer from year to year to meet the additional cost of living which arose from the discovery of the gold-fields This allowance was at first 50 per cent, but it was reduced to 25 per cent, and was so when the Estimates of last year were framed and passed It was thought a proper time when discontinuing that allowance to throw in some equivalent by the revision and classification of salaries This was effected, and considered a great reform, but it would all be lost now, and extra claims would arise, or injustice must be inflicted upon many officers, unless this Bill was carried The measure seemed to him to meet all the requirements of the case, and provided amongst other things for the payment of the annuities to officers who had retired under the previous Act, as the balance of the old fund would be brought forward, and a fund established, from which all all pensions would in future be paid

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL seconded the motion

Mr BURFORD objected to the second reading on principle, but as it was not the first or the second time that the matter was before the House, he felt called upon to say so much the less, as his remarks would chiefly serve to ratify what he had previously declared He did not see how, on principle, he could allow the second reading, inasmuch as all engagements in the different walks of life were made on the principle of rewarding persons according to the services rendered, in some fixed ratio The same principle should rule where there was a classification of officers, inasmuch as when an officer advanced from the second to the first class the promotion was sufficient to compensate the individual for improvement in the performance of his duties A man's own prudence should be his defence against falling into a condition which needed assistance in advanced age It was so in private employment, and he could not see why one section of the community should be exempted from a liability to which all others were subject The salary should be according to the work required and the ability demanded, and if the pay was not sufficient it should be increased but he could not recognise the principle of progression laid down in the Bill The fact that a different rule was followed by all employers of labor was sufficient to condemn the plan proposed, and to show which method was the most healthful If he as an employer of labor required efficient service he should give a salary accordingly, and if he found a person qualified to advance to the post of control or general management he would promote him and increase his salary Why then should we depart in the case of officers of the Government from a principle which prevailed everywhere out of doors This was the common-sense view of the matter, as was admitted in the Act itself, for the Act said in the 8th clause that officers dismissed or resigning forfeited their claims Now he maintained that that clause recognised the principle which he was arguing in favor of, and he would also take another view of the vicious nature of the principle, viz that advantage might be taken of it to dismiss public officers, so as to deprive them of the very privilege which the Bill professed to confer The prospect held out by the Bill was in his judgment of a very discouraging character to the junior officers, and if he was a clerk in the Government service he should be opposed to its passing It appeared that some few officers had already retired but there were many others now on the verge of 60, and these persons would be ready to take advantage of the Bill in order to retire also Take for instance the case of His Honor the Chief Justice If he and a few others a little below him in rank were to retire, £2,000 or £4,000 a-year would soon be made up which the country would be pledged to pay (Hear, hear) He set his face against the pension system, and if the House passed this Bill he felt that they would be sanctioning that system Again, they had had their attention called by the hon the Treasurer to the fact that those who received the highest salaries would probably be the first claimants of retiring allowances, and that, therefore, it was but reasonable that they should contribute their whole good service pay towards the retiring fund, whilst those below them were only to give a moiety of theirs There was evidence on the face of the Act, that it was not calculated to work well, as it was false in principle and likely to prove deleterious in action, and therefore he felt bound to vote against the second reading

Mr SOLOMON said if the object sought to be attained was to commence with all persons of a given age, and under equal circumstances, he could understand the necessity of carrying out the principle but under existing circumstances, by the passing of this Bill, a very great injustice would be done to many persons in the public service, or who might hereafter join it If the object was to induce persons in the public service to make a provision for hereafter, then there was a much cheaper and better mode of doing so by means of life assurance For instance, if a man of 30 years of age wished to provide for his family, he could without the risk of having to remain in the Government service until he was 60 years of age, but merely by putting by a paltry sum of £4 12s a-year, obtain £200 for his family in the event of his death Or if his object was to attain something for himself after he was 60 years old, if he went about it by paying £4 12s a year from the time he was 30 years of age until he was 60, when he reached the age of 60 he would have to pay no more, but would receive the annuity for which he had contracted He conceived that under this Bill great injustice might be done to the younger officers, and though the sum to be subscribed was to be paid to each in order as he retired, still the House would probably find that there were many only waiting the passing of the measure in order to take advantage of it For these reasons he should oppose the Bill He could understand that a man in the Government service should make provision for his old age, but this was not the way to foster such a desire Persons getting good salaries should make such provision out of their incomes, and there were now societies in existence—such was the progress made by English society—by which a man could secure an annuity at a certain age by paying even less than this measure proposed

Mr MILNE supported the second reading, though there was no member of the House more opposed to keeping up a pension-list than he was But hon members knew that to a certain extent Government officers were not the most provident individuals (Laughter) Unless that House grappled with this difficulty they would be constantly exposed to appeals for assistance when the incapacity of public officers rendered it necessary for them to retire He should support the Bill in order that heads of departments might be relieved from the odium which would otherwise attach to them of dismissing old officers in their days of feebleness or perhaps of illness The great defect of the old Act was that it was merely optional with officers whether they should avail themselves of it and consequently the £10,000 which the Legislature granted to supplement the Act, was quite inadequate for the purpose One great beauty of the present Act was that it took up the good service-pay just as it found it, and in some cases impounded the whole of it and put it into the fund to meet the necessary expenses Thus the country strictly speaking would not be burthened, but the Government would say "we will compel all officers to be provident for we will keep back a certain proportion of their salaries to make a fund for pensioning them when they retired from the service" This did away with all that could be said about saddling the country with pensions It was, in fact, an Assurance Company in the hands of the Government, and he was sure would work well The hon member, Mr Solomon, had said that a number of individuals were awaiting the passing of the Act in order to take advantage of it, and that, therefore, great injustice would accrue to the younger officers He would take this for granted but if the Bill did not pass, it would be necessary to make some provision for these persons (No, no) There were many gentlemen in this colony, as hon members were aware, who had been for many years in the public service, and whom it would be cruel to turn off without making some provision for them (Hear, hear, from the Commissioner of Crown Lands) By passing the Bill, this would be accomplished in the manner most practicable to the country, and he (Mr Milne) could see no injustice likely to arise Mr Solomon had also alluded to the advantage of Government officers availing themselves of insurance offices, by which means provision would be made for them, but the hon member seemed to lose sight of the fact that these offices only made provision in cases of death—("No, no," from Mr Solomon)—whereas this Bill provided for officers incapacitated by long service or by illness There were one or two matters which, when the Bill went into Committee, he should like to amend The 11th clause, for instance, retained the names of officers at present on the pension list under the old Act He objected to keeping the whole of these persons upon their present footing, for if it were allowed to go on, the £10,000 would be soon expended He would like to see some equitable arrangement come to which would get rid of these claimants altogether, and when the Bill was in Committee would move an amendment for that purpose He also preferred the schedule of the old Act to that of the present one

Dr WARK was obliged to oppose the second reading of the Bill He agreed with the hon member (Mr Milne) in one point, namely, that Government officers were not very provident The Treasurer said it was impossible to make them provide for old age, but why was it? Because when they entered the Government service they entered a service that it was believed would provide for old age, that it was not fashionable to enter a provident society, and that in entering the Government service they entered a superior service It was that more than anything else that made them improvident If the fact stared them in the face that they stood on the same footing as clerks in private service that they were neither more nor less than clerks, it would lead them to act as officers in private service would do It was the duty of the Government to foster a spirit of self-reliance rather than a spirit of dependence, and the Bill before the House fostered a spirit of dependence, destructive to the individual and injurious to the country He could conceive a young man entering the service at 18 years of age and another at 38 He thought it would be very hard for the the youngest to pay for the advantage of one who served perhaps only half the time that he had He thought it would be better to pay officers what they were entitled to in the same way as they were paid in private establishments He thought promotion ought to be in some degree by merit as well as by length of service He believed that the want of self dependence in the officers in the Government service, coupled with the fact that the Government proposed a couch for their old age, was the reason why there were so many ninnies, so many incapables amongst them He would not have it thought that the House was expected to give its energies and talents to think of ways to make laws of that kind for which the country had at last to pay He trusted that the House would not acknowledge the principle Pay public officers fairly, and let them look out for themselves, for if left to themselves they would find cheaper ways of making the necessary provision than was provided by the Government He thought the Bill just introduced better than the last, but objected to it on principle

At this stage of the proceedings a messenger was announced from His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief

The SPEAKER said that he had received the following messages from the Governor-in-Chief —

Message No 7 —That he will take the necessary measures for carrying into effect the resolution relative to the practicability of carrying a line of railway down the valley of the Sturt

Message No 8 —That he will take the necessary measures for carrying into effect the objects of the address relative to the examination of the Barrier and Grey Ranges in search of gold

Message No 9 —That he will take the necessary steps for carrying into effect the objects of the address relative to a survey of the country between Mount Gambier and the seaboard, and also for a survey of Rivoli Bay

DEBATE RESUMED

Mr HAY intended to support the second reading of the Bill because he thought the matter absolutely necessary to be considered by the House An arrangement was necessary to enable the Government to say to an officer, when too old, or when unable to perform the duties of his office—"it is time for you to retire" Allusion had been made to a number of officers said to be waiting for the passing of that Bill, in order to take advantage of its provisions By the Bill, however, it was required they should be 60 years of age, or that a certificate should be signed by a medical man, stating that they are physically incapable of performing the duties of their office. Consequently many of those officers would not be able to take advantage of it The grounds of the measure had been gone into during last session Some officers were receiving pensions—others would not retire without some provision of that kind, many might have made nothing and had nothing, perhaps, to fall back upon, and the Government must be in the unenviable position of telling them they must leave the service, although there was no provision for them, or take the other course of allowing them to remain, though no longer able to carry out the duties of their office, and thus the service must suffer The hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) stated that for four pounds a man of 30 years of age could insure his life and thus benefit his family, but the Bill provided for an officer himself who was incapable of duty from bad health, so that it was not intended to do away with the necessity of providing for a family in case of death It would be a great disadvantage to the Government service if they were to expect old servants to be always sticking to the service. He preferred the last Bill to the present one He thought no one ought to be able to fall back on the fund until he had been seven years in the service. From what he knew of hon members who had spoken in opposition to the Bill, if they knew that a public servant had become infirm and had nothing to fall back upon, he believed they would be the first to appeal to the benevolent feeling of the House by asking for something in lieu of it It was to do away with the necessity for those appeals that he supported that Bill It was better that good-service pay should be appropriated as proposed, and he trusted that hon members would not refuse to support the measure, and that the Government would not have to appeal to the House, session after session, to make that provision

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL supported the second reading of the Bill At present there were two laws existing on the subject before the House One was the 9th of 1852, and the other the 51st of 1854. The experience of the Government and of the House in the work they had before them in voting sums for the salaries of Government officers, showed that both measures were incomplete and inadequate to the object in view, and in accordance with those views a Committee was appointed last session to whom the whole question was referred With one exception, the clauses of that Bill were in accordance with the report of that Committee, and that consideration should suffice to show that the Government was justified in introducing the measure to the House With regard to the objects to be accomplished, it was intended in the first place to fix the salaries of officers in the civil service not merely on a fair basis, but on a basis adapted to the requirements of the service, and next that a systematic provision might be made that would spare the House the necessity of dealing with individual cases, which would certainly occur With regard to the first point—that of putting salaries on a footing to meet the requirements of the public service—the law as it stood divided the officers into three classes, with salaries appointed to each and regular rates of increase. The provisions of that Bill had placed several officers in anomalous positions, and the House had had to make exceptional cases with regard to particular persons, and therefore they would agree that the system required amendment With regard to the other system, the Estimates of last year passed by the House were according to the new classification of last session, and that was proposed to be carried out by the present Bill It considered that the practical working of that Bill had been such as to vindicate the suggestion of those hon gentlemen by whom the measure was first devised, and to secure the continuous adoption of their views He believed every one would say the present classification was a great and marked improvement on the old system With regard to the other portion of the Bill two hon members had spoken of persons who wished to avail themselves of a retiring allowance So far as he was aware there was only one person in the public service who was in a position to retire upon those provisions He considered it better not to mention names, but would state in that case that it was the Postmaster-General, an officer to whose excellent character every one would bear testimony He would ask the House deliberately to consider whether the fact of an officer being in a position to retire at three-eighths of his present salary was a reason for refusing to pass the Bill? Had there been a great many persons of the age of 60 waiting to retire it might have required consideration Hon members had not perhaps observed the essential difference between the present law and the cause which prevented the old Act from being so useful as it was hoped to have been The difference was that in that Bill the time of retirement was not fixed, so that persons entered into new pursuits in life and leaving the service were enabled to retire upon the provisions of that Act That was done away with, as the provision of the present Bill was that none should retire before the age of 60 The hon member for the city (Mr Burford) asked why the principle acted on by the Government should differ from the principle recognised out of doors, or in private establishments But it was a fact that the principle was recognised in establishments where a large number of clerks were kept In such establishments, for instance, as the Bank of England, or large breweries, in such houses as Baring Brothers, and a great number of institutions in England And was there nothing in the position of the Legislature of a country, nothing that required them to give a return for services of meritorious officers? In making a provision of that sort, they were preventing the necessity of the Legislature dealing with each individual case It was very easy to say, that the servants of the Government had an opportunity of providing for old age, but if hon members would look at the salaries of Government Officers, and at what they were expected to be in the way of appearance and station, they would see there was not such excess of salary over the daily wants of themselves and families as would enable them to make an adequate provision for old age A comparison had been drawn between persons in the employ of the Government and in private establishments. He thought there was an essential difference between their positions In the first place every one in private life might look forward to have acquired skill and habits which would enable them to become independent in their particular branches of industry and sometimes when a person had served a master well, he received a share in the business, or assistance to commence in business for himself, but there were no such opportunities for persons in the Government service—they did not take clerks into partnership there He did not think it necessary to go into the details of the measure The House was then only discussing the principles of it—whether it was wise to support the provisions of it, or whether the Legislature should make any provision of the sort He had forgotten one thing—he would ask the hon member for the Murray with regard to the former colonial storekeeper, Mr Gilbert if a person like him who had devoted so much time to the service of the public, and whose circumstances were well known, and who, in consequence of misfortunes, had lost his property, and had no opportunity of providing for his family—would be allow that gentleman, or any person similarly situated, to be thrown out of office without any support whatever? He would ask him or any other hon member whether he could harden his heart against an instance of that kind, and whether he did not feel he would make some provision for him? Was it not, therefore, just on the part of the Legislature to make some provision against instances of that kind occurring? The Government had introduced the Bill in such a form as to carry out the provisions of the Act of 1854 He thought no law should be passed that bore the semblance of breach of faith, but any clause complained of could be altered in Committee He hoped, therefore, there would be no objection to the Bill being read a second time

Mr PEAKE felt at a disadvantage after the pathetic appeal of the Attorney-General, and might perhaps incur some odium by the course he should take, but he could not disguise from himself that that was an attempt to introduce a pension list in another form He might have agreed to give a pension under the circumstances described by the Attorney-General, but he thought that it was a part of a system with which the country should have no connection It was not a case in point, and he therefore hoped hon members would not be persuaded by those pathetic appeals to their feelings, and that they would not be induced by such reasoning to consent to the second reading of the Bill It appeared the House had made one mistake, and they would make another if they passed that Bill Had hon gentlemen asked them to redeem the pledge of the House and carry it out, it would have been more honorable and respectful, and the House would have stood better in the public eye than thus to attempt to take from public officers their just rights Some are enjoying their pensions, some have been acting under the provisions of the Bill of 1854, and now the House was called upon to say they could not carry out the provisions of that Act, and would undo all that they had done before, and to say to those who had fallen in with the arrangements we will return you the money you placed in the Treasury, and pay you a small interest on it But the chief argument in favor of the measure was that the Government officers were improvident The hon member for Onkaparinga said the Government must provide them The Attorney-General said the same, others said the same He (Mr Peake) did not think it respectful to the Government officers Why should they not act on their own knowledge, without being told that they were improvident, and therefore the Government would take care of them He objected also to the desire to make Government officers servants for life in a country where there were such opportunities of pushing their fortunes The tendency was to make them machines instead of fostering a spirit of exertion, perhaps he might be wrong, but these pension-lists had been tried at home and had never given satisfaction there He would have them redeem the pensions under the Constitution Act, and would not have a pension left, and he not only objected to that, but he thought from what he had heard that day the passing of that Bill would do the Government officers a serious injustice A young man could easily make provision for himself by payment on a smaller scale than that At 25 he could purchase £100 a year, for a payment of 4 per cent He believed the rejection of the Bill would tend to improve the Government servants, and put a stop to a deal of unpleasant and invidious discussion in the House, and of complaint out of doors He would, therefore, move that the Bill be read that day six months

Mr NEALES would support the Bill, and thought if there were no better arguments against it than those of the last

speaker, the Bill would pass by a large majority. He went on to say, that he objected to pensions altogether, and yet would keep faith and allow individuals to claim under the old Bill

Mr PEAKE rose to explain The hon member had taken advantage of his words—he said, faith should not be broken with those who received pensions under that Bill, and the House should redeem its pledge by purchasing the value of their interests

Mr NEALES had taken the words down—"You must keep faith under that Bill," after the hon member had protested against pensions But he could not agree that those payments could be called pensions, and if any hon member who doubted it would look in the dictionary, he would find that he (Mr Neales) was right He believed if the system of such speakers were carried out they would have a number of raw boys in the Government service who would be shoved in to get a little discipline, before going into the world to push their fortunes He was not prepared to make the service like that If the Government servants were content to take a low salary, instead of reviling them, he thought they ought to be obliged to them and make provision for them in their old age It was no use telling them that at 4 per cent a man could get £100 a-year at the age of 60 He must have a certain salary to enable him to pay 4 per cent, and he had seen instances of some of the cleverest individuals in the colony who were not in a position to pay 4 per cent, and one he had heard of in the Government service who, when he first came into the country, did not receive any portion of his salary for three-quarters of a year He considered the Government right to bring in that Bill He thought the present Bill better than the first, and that it was so good he should feel inclined to support it

Mr LINDSAY had not heard any strong arguments in favor of the Bill, the chief merit of which seemed to be its complication He had made several efforts to understand it but was unable to do so It appeared to him that instead of giving an advance of £10 it was only intended to give £5 a year increase He considered it as the hon member for Burra and Clare stated, an attempt to establish a pension list He could not see the justice of the provisions of the Bill He considered that it would be the fairest plan to provide for a superannuation fund by a per centage on all salaries That would be just and fair to all in the public service He would second the amendment of the hon member for Burra and Clare

Mr YOUNG opposed the Bill when introduced last session, and thought in the second session of Parliament they should not retrace the steps they had made towards reform He had seen no reason to alter the vote he gave last session He had not heard even from the Attorney-General anything to convince him the arrangement was necessary It was evident that the colony had got one foot into the mire, and he thought instead of putting the other in they should make an effort to get it out He saw no reason why a young man leaving college and choosing the Government employ should have a provision made for life, while his schoolfellow might be exposed to all the contingencies of life, and in case of failure have to depend on the sympathies of his fellow-man A man in business who failed, or could no longer discharge his duties, had to dispose of his business, and he could therefore see no reason why the Government should interfere for their servants, and secure them that which no one would dream of doing for the other He thought it the duty of the House to resist every attempt to establish a pension list

Mr SCAMMELL felt, in common with some other hon members, that before hon members were called upon to record their votes it was very important they should know in what light this Bill was considered by the parties who would be principally affected by its provisions It had been stated that day that a memorial had been presented from a number of Government officers having relation to this Bill, and he would take the opportunity of asking what was the purport of that memorial?

The TREASURER would, with the permission of the House, answer the question A memorial had been presented to the Government from 75 junior officers in the Government service, claiming an increase to their salaries, under the Act which the Bill now before the House sought to repeal.

Mr BARROW would support the second reading of the Bill as a measure of public economy (Hear, hear) Whatever difficulties there might be in the adjustment of the matters referred to therein, he thought such adjustments might be effected in Committee It had been stated that they should apply the same rule to parties in the Government service that obtained in ordinary or private life, and leave every Government officer to provide for his own old age, but what if Government officers did not so provide? It might be said that if Government officers did not make a provision for old age they would suffer the consequences, but he contended it would be the public who in reality would suffer the consequences (Hear, hear) It was clear that the public to a great extent suffered when persons retained important situations under the Government, after having lost their energy and general capability for the duties of those offices When Government officers from old age, infirmity, or other causes, became incapable of efficiently discharging the duties which devolved upon them, the public suffered, and it was unreasonable to suppose that any Government whatever, or that House, would turn adrift an old officer simply because the infirmities of old age had overtaken him and left him without resources The humanity of the House would never sanction such a course as that, nor would the humanity of the country sanction it He contended that there should be some provision by which, when Government officers were unable from old age, infirmities, or other causes, efficiently to discharge the duties of their offices, they should be enabled to retire and make way for more fitting men The House had heard that certain junior officers in the Government service had expressed objections to certain portions of the Bill, but he thought it quite possible that these objections might be removed by a modification of certain clauses in Committee Admitting, however, that those objections could not be removed, he would ask was that House to legislate for junior members in the Government service or for the whole community? He thought the House should take a stand in reference to this question, and deal with it at least in such a manner as would prevent the subject being annually brought before the public gaze The good-service pay he looked upon as a kind of bonus, and he did not think that those gentlemen whose salaries were supplemented by good-service pay should dictate too stringently as to the manner in which that pay should be awarded He should be unwilling to sanction any clause by which the junior officers in the Government service would be called upon to pay the retiring allowances of the senior officers, but he thought it not improbable that when in Committee they might be enabled to remove all difficulties upon this point by effecting modifications in the 4th clause Upon principle they should settle the question, as it was clearly objectionable that Government officers should be permitted to remain in office when they were physically and intellectually prevented from filling those offices with credit to themselves or with satisfaction to the public He felt satisfied that no head of a department in that House would turn adrift an old public servant who had no means of support He should, therefore, on public grounds, support the second reading of the Bill, hoping in Committee to modify particular clauses so as to meet any objections that might be fairly raised

Mr REYNOLDS intended to take an independent course in this matter, not being influenced by anything which he might have done when on the opposite side of the House The course which he should take was that which he took when not on the other side of the House—an independent course, and one decidedly against this Bill He looked at the good service pay and the retiring fund as an ingenious way of fixing a pension list upon the country. (No, no) Hon members said "No, no," but that brought him to the question raised by the hon member for the city (Mr Neales), who had declared that this Bill was altogether at issue with pensions He (Mr Reynolds) thought he might be at fault in reference to his idea of the actual meaning of a pension, and, in consequence, he went to the library for the purpose of consulting the dictionary as advised by the hon member (Mr Neales) (Laughter) For the benefit of the House, he would state what Walker said upon the subject (Renewed laughter) Walker described a pension as an allowance to any one without an equivalent, and Webster described a pension to be an annual allowance from the Public Treasury for past services, on account of disabilities incurred in the public service or old age After that definition, he thought the House would have no difficulty in concluding that this was a pension list (No, no) He was at a loss to imagine how there could be any difference of opinion after the definitions he had read. How could hon members say that good service pay was not an annual sum of money set aside for persons who were disabled in the public service? What was good service pay? Would it be said that gentlemen in the Government service who had been represented as so superior to those engaged in mercantile pursuits required a bribe to do their duty? Either this must be admitted, or it must be admitted that they were not sufficiently paid In considering the Estimates it was a common thing for some hon members to contend that such and such an officer was not sufficiently paid, and not unfrequently the amount was in consequence increased, but if the Estimates did not give proper remuneration to Government officers, let the amount be increased Let the House, however, have nothing more to do with pensions It had been said by some hon members that Government officers were not over provident, and did not make provision for old age He could not allow, however, such an imputation to pass, for he believed Government officers to be provident, or if they were not, they ought to be If they were paid well for their services, he believed the proper course was to leave them to create a fund on which to retire in old age, or to make provision for their families If they received proper remuneration for their services, he could not understand the observations of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), who had stated that he should support the second reading of the Bill as a measure of public economy He could not see what economy there could be in laying by a large sum of money every year, for the purpose of being distributed in pensions The hon member had said that when Government officers arrived at a certain age, a fund should be provided on which they could be enabled to retire, instead of being retained in the public service. He had heard that when gentlemen had been so long in the public service, they knew so much that they did not require any large amount of energy or intellect, as they had merely to shew themselves and the Government machine went on. He repeated that he did not see any public economy in adopting this very ingenious way of introducing a pension-list. The Attorney-General had stated in referring to gentlemen who entered the public service, that they had not the same facilities of advancement as parties in private commercial establishments. But the hon. gentleman forgot that parties in the Government service received their pay without running any of those risks to which those who were connected with private establishments were subjected. Many of the latter devoted their lives and energies to certain pursuits, sacrificing their health and comforts and although some amassed wealth, there were others who at one fell swoop were bereft of all. Government officers did not run such risk as this, and he questioned if any Government officer devoted the time and energy to the duties of his department which would be essential were he connected with a private establishment. What were the duties after all, in connection with Government departments? Parties came at 10 o'clock and left at 4 o'clock, and on Saturday they were only required to work for two hours. They were allowed a six weeks' holiday annually, and until recently, after a certain term of service they were allowed 18 months' leave of absence. The duties were not arduous, and the parties were well paid for them. If they were a little more provident, they would be enabled to make provision for old age and incapacity. In opposing this Bill, he felt he was supporting the junior officers of the Government, and would carry with him the feelings of the great majority of that class.

Capt. Hart would support the second reading of the Bill. He had paid great attention to what had been urged by hon. members in opposition, but he confessed, so far as he had been able to understand them, he had not heard a great deal of argument against the Bill. In connection with two or three other hon. members who formed a Committee upon this subject, he had paid a great deal of attention to this matter, had taken a great deal of trouble with it, and had entered into numerous calculations for the purpose of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. He believed the result would be found satisfactory, at all events it had been to the Committee, who were unanimous in their report in recommending the proposal contained in the present Bill. He supported the Bill, considering the recommendation upon which it was based after the fullest consideration, the best that could be adopted. The hon. member for Burra and Clare objected to a pension list, but how he could do so when he wanted to keep faith with those officers of the Government who had already retired he was at a loss to conceive. It was a contradiction, if not a direct contradiction, it was very like one. It would be a gross injustice to those gentlemen who did not retire to pursue the course recommended by the hon. member for Burra and Clare, but probably the hon. member was not aware of the whole facts connected with the previous Bill, which had been found unworkable. If the hon. member compared the former Bill with the present one, he would find that a great many of the objections to which the former Bill was open had been got rid of. The former Bill had been brought in in consequence of a suggestion which emanated from himself when a motion passed the former Legislature, when it was proposed to pension the Storekeeper-General and the Harbor-Master. On that occasion a resolution was passed, which gave rise to the former Bill. The Government of a former day, however, did not carry out the views of those who desired the measure to be brought in. They brought in a Bill which had been spoken against as one which could not be worked. That being the case, it was quite clear that the old Bill at any rate must be got rid of. It was necessary that the Bill should be repealed, and that was what the present Bill proposed to do. The great feature of the present Bill was to provide a sum sufficient for the purpose, which the former Bill did not. There was no fear of the provision made in this Bill for the payment of pensions falling short, the principal reason being that under this Bill parties in the prime of life could not retire upon pensions. No man at an early age with all his energies about him would, if this Bill were passed, be enabled to retire upon a pension; he must wait till he had attained the age of 60 years, or from sickness or other incompetency was prevented from carrying out his work. It was only upon such occasions that parties would be entitled to pensions. If the House threw out this Bill and kept faith with the parties who were at present receiving pensions, what would be the result? Why, they would have men at the ages of 40, 41, or 42, who were at that moment enjoying pensions, continuing to do so, and yet the Postmaster-General, who was nearly 70 years of age and in the ordinary course of events would soon have to leave the service, would have no claim upon the fund which he had subscribed to. He was sure the House could not come to such a conclusion as would involve such a state of things as that. By the late Bill the House had put one foot in the mire, but the present Bill would enable them to draw it out. If this Bill were not passed what would be their position? Why, as soon as the £10 000 had been expended, parties who contributed would have no claim whatever upon the Government, because the money had all been appropriated to those who came before them. It had been said that junior officers in the Government service had strong objections to the Bill, and he could quite imagine such parties having objections to it, for young men of one-and twenty could see little advantage in a Bill of this sort which would not entitle them to a pension till they were 60 years of age, or were overtaken by sickness, which they did not anticipate. He could quite understand how it was that young men did not take a favorable view of the Bill, but he would ask the House whether they could say that any injustice would be done to them? When old age came on, parties would prefer their claims, as the Harbour-Master had, and the House could not put the claims of old servants of the Government aside, but must find the means of living for those who had spent the best portions of their lives in the Government service. The hon. member for the Sturt had ridiculed the argument of the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Barrow), but he contended that that argument was true to the letter for there was no question whatever that the public would be prejudicially affected by parties who were incapacitated for the offices which they filled, but who were retained in them in consequence of there being no fund upon which they could retire. Would any one say that the Postmaster-General, for instance, should be compelled to resign his office without a pension were provided for him? Would any one say that it would be to the interest of the public service that that gentleman should remain in office ten years longer? Such a position was not tenable. Another argument which had been used against this Bill had been this: it had been asked, why did not Government officers insure their lives, but if a man paid £4 a-year the £100 would not be payable till his death. An annuity of £100 at 60 years of age could not be purchased by a payment of £4 per annum, and no portion of the amount would be available if sickness intervened. It was quite possible that at the age of 40 years a man might be struck with paralysis, and in the absence of some such provision as that proposed by the present Bill, where was he to look for aid? A Bill identically the same as this Bill was introduced to the House last session, and was lost at the third reading. He believed it had been lost in consequence of a misapprehension on the part of several hon. members of that House, who were not present when the Government, at the desire of the House, included in the Bill a proposal to pay the pensions of those gentlemen who had retired under the former Bill. Those hon. members declared afterwards that they would have voted for the third reading of the Bill if they had known that principle was contained in it. Had they known it contained that principle, he had no doubt the Bill would have been carried by a large majority. In reference to the ingenuity contained in the Bill, which had been alluded to by the hon. member for Encounter Bay, if the hon. member would put forth in Committee anything not so ingenious, but more practical, he would meet the case. The Bill had been carefully and maturely considered, and the result was the arrangement which it contained, and to which he had alluded. Until the hon. member could shew him some more practical measure which would answer better, he should vote for the Bill as it stood. The present Bill, in fact, proposed to repeal two Bills, as it repealed the Good Service Pay Bill, which provided that there should be an increased payment of £10 per annum until the amount had reached £150. He thought no hon. member would deny that the classification now proposed was superior to that which was formerly obtained. By the proposed classification of Government officers there would be an increase of £5 per year till the salary had risen to within £5 of the officer of the next class. If an increase of £10 per annum were given, the party so raised would be equal in point of pay to the class above him in four years, there being a difference of £40 between the two classes, so that a subordinate officer after four years would be equal in point of pay to the class above him. This would be inconvenient and unfair, and the present Bill proposed that £5 per annum instead of being added to the salary should be carried to a fund for the purpose of this Act. Those officers not classified would have £10 a year good-service pay, the whole of which would be carried to this fund, and fairly so, as it might reasonably be supposed that the heads of departments above those who were classified were approaching the time when they would receive the benefits contemplated by this Bill. He was astonished at the hon. member for the Sturt opposing this Bill. If that hon. member was not an independent member when he occupied a seat on the Government Benches he (Mr. Hart) was, and would not have voted for any measure in or out of the Ministry which he did not believe for the public benefit. He should support this Bill to the fullest extent, and would remark that the views of the hon. member for the Sturt were altogether opposed to responsible Government which he so often talked about. He would ask was there not a great principle involved in the question of pensions? But it appeared the hon. member for the Sturt gave way sooner than resign his place for the purpose of supporting a conscientious view. That was not what he (Captain Hart) understood should be the course of action pursued by a responsible minister of the Crown. He would not support any great principle which he did not agree with merely because it was brought forward by a Government of which he was a member. He did not say that he would insist upon every little crotchet, but what he contended was that the hon. member had no right to support a great principle which he could not conscientiously support, no matter whether he was a member of the Government or not Let the House consider what would be the effect of throwing out the present Bill At present the whole affair was in an extremely complicated state There was a petition from 75 officers claiming good service pay, according to the old Act, and that was in some instances £10, and in others £15 a year The Bill merely provided that a certain portion of the income of Government officers should be set aside, to provide that which, if not provided in that way would have to be provided by a vote of that House Would any one say that the Postmaster-General, who had been alluded to during the debate, who had probably saved nothing, having a large family, upon retiring at 70 years of age in consequence of being unable to perform his duties should receive no allowance? He was satisfied that those who held that faith should be kept with those who were in the receipt of pensions, could not conscientiously say that the Postmaster-General had no claim, and if he had where were they to draw the line? How could they frame a measure which provided a more equitable mode of doing that which must be done by some means or other The Bill was the result of great deliberation and great calculation, and he felt assured was as good a measure as could be brought forward No one who had spoken against it had hinted how it could be amended

MONTHLY STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The SPEAKER announced the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor, enclosing despatch from the Secretary of State of 16th July last, relative to a temporary arrangement for a monthly mail service between Great Britain and Australia

CIVIL SERVICE BILL —RESUMPTION OF DEBATE

Mr STRANGWAYS opposed the second reading of the Civil Service Bill, as it would be tantamount on the part of the Government to a repudiation of certain claims upon them which were equitable and just He was not inclined to agree with the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) that this Bill was a sufficient remedy, and sufficient to satisfy all the claims upon the Government That hon gentleman had made an assertion but had not submitted any proof of it For his own part he believed that in four or five years hence the pensions which would be then payable would more than swamp the amount which was now appropriated in fact he knew that many persons in the Civil Service were merely waiting to take advantage of this Act when passed If this Bill were passed, he could not doubt but that they would have a pension list of some £4,000 to £5,000 per annum to provide for The measure was introduced plainly with a view to place a certain amount of patronage in the hands of the Government If the Government were to commence de novo, let them do so in a just manner without repudiating equitable claims which already existed upon them If the Government were desirous of benefitting those involved in the question, and of meting out to them equity and justice, let them make a list of persons having superannuation or other claims on the Civil Service, with a detail of all the circumstances connected with such claims, and refer them to some well-known actuaries in London to judge of their value so that the Government might in lieu of a pension award a sum of money in satisfaction There were some persons no doubt who would not accept this, and would claim their pensions Well, the only thing they could do in that case was to make the best terms they could with them and if necessary pay those pensions The Government had made a gross blunder when the Superannuation Act was introduced, and it was now attempted to free themselves from the consequences by repudiating to a great extent the liability which they had incurred He was opposed to any Act which opened the door for any possible call for pensions, and if this Bill was passed it would certainly have that effect and he felt assured that the £10,000 would be swallowed up long before the junior officers in the service got any good from it The effect was unjust in this case, that a clerk who got £300 per annum would in seven years be in a worse position in point of gratuities than a clerk of the first class who only got £280 per annum In seven years the former would have his salary increased by nothing, whereas, in the case of the latter, the gratuity would amount to £70 over and above his salary What principle of justice he would ask was this? He opposed this Bill because he thought it an attempt to repudiate all just claims made involved under a former Act of the Legislature He would support the amendment of the hon member for the Burra and Clare

The SPEAKER put the question "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the question," and declared the "ayes" had it

A division was called for, of which the following is the result —

AYES 19—The Attorney-General the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Bagot, Bakewell, Barrow, Collinson, Duffield, Hallett, Hart, Harvey, Hawker, Hay, Macdermott, McEllister, Milne, Neales, Scammell, Treasurer (teller)

NOES 10—Messrs Burford, Dunn Lindsay, Mildred, Reynolds, Solomon Strangways, Wark Young, Peake (teller) Majority of nine in favor of the ayes

The question that the Bill be now read a second time was put and carried, and its further consideration was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The second reading of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The further consideration of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

Mr MILNE in accordance with the leave granted by the House on the 13th October, introduced the Smillie Estate Bill, which was read a first time, and a ballot being taken the following gentlemen were elected as a Select Committee to consider and report to the House on the same on Tuesday next—Messrs Collinson Duffield, Blyth, Hay, Neales, Townsend, and Milne (mover)

POLICE REGULATIONS

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table police regulations and the correspondence which had taken place in respect to the dismissal of Sergeant Nolan called for by the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr McEllister) He would not move that they be printed, but would simply lay them upon the table

PETITION OF MESSRS BAKER AND WATERHOUSE

Mr NEALES, pursuant to notice, moved—

"That the petition of Messrs Baker and Waterhouse be taken into consideration with a view that this House resolve—That the purpose and intention of the House in voting the Address of the 11th of June 1857 praying His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief to place on the Supplementary Estimates for 1857 the sum of £10,000, on account of the claim of the assignees of Borrow & Goodiar was not to recognise the existence of a debt from the Government to the assignees, but that the moneys therein mentioned were intended as a free vote of the House to the petitioners, and to put an end to further litigation, and as to £2 000, part of the said vote, on condition that the same should be paid to Borrow & Goodiar and as to the remainder, unconditionally and in consideration of the large expense incurred by the petitioners and the trouble they had experienced for a long period of time during which the subject has been in dispute."

In support of the motion said that the reference to the Legislature in this case proceeded from a claim having been preferred against the Assignees since the vote of £10 000 had been made which was considerably larger than the assignees had anticipated or recognised It was the intention of Messrs Baker and Waterhouse when the sum of £10 000 was given, to divide it rateably with those who had proved against the estate but the South Australian Banking Company having insisted upon payment of the total amount to the assignees, and having carried the matter into the Supreme Court, the assignees had made this the reference as conveyed in the motion, as they never intended to be the recipients of the money claimed by the creditors of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar merely to satisfy one creditor instead of the whole

Mr BAKEWELL would vote against the motion His first reason for so doing was that it asked the House to do that which it was out of its power to do viz, to assert what were the intentions of a former Legislature with regard to the appropriation of a certain sum of money which had been voted to the creditors of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar, but they must remember that the House was at that time composed of members which were not now present and there were others in the House now who had taken no part in the adoption of that vote The House however was asked to affirm that the £10 000 voted to Messrs Borrow & Goodiar's creditors was a free gift, but so far as his views were concerned, he looked upon it in a far different light, as a full discharge of a debt The facts were these—The assignees of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar obtained a verdict in the Supreme Court against the Government for the sum of £36,000 The Government disputed the justice of this verdict, and moved for a new trial which was granted, and the case was about to be heard when the assignees made a proposition, to prevent an expensive litigation, to accept £10,000 in full of all demands, and the Government in acceding to those terms, did so from a belief that they were freeing themselves in the safest and most economical manner from the possibility of any further demands upon them, in fact that it was the best bargain that could be made How could the £10 000 therefore be looked upon as a free gift? With respect to the claim of the South Australian Banking Company, this debt had been mortgaged to them by Borrow & Goodiar in 1842 and their claim had been always recognised and in proof of this the Government, in admitting that they owed the money, resisted payment except to those who should equitably dispose of it, and they did this with full notice from the Bank that such a claim was in existence If the House passed that motion it would be tantamount to saying that the South Australian Banking Company had no claim upon that money If it was intended that the South Australian Banking Company were to be dispossessed of any right to claim, he held that they should have been given notice of that intention so that when the money was voted they might have been in a position to petition that House on the question This motion was introduced no doubt to help the case which was to be heard in a few days, but he hoped the House would not agree to it as it would be the means of great injustice

Mr Solomon opposed the motion He was not a member of that House in June, 1857, but from the information he had gathered, it struck him that the money was voted to the creditors of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar as a compensation on their claim He deprecated such a case being then brought before that House

Mr Strangways thought if they agreed to this motion it would be a bad precedent in reviving a question passed by a former Legislature On referring to the votes in Council then, he found that £8,000 had been given to the assignees and £2 000 to be handed over to Messrs Borrow and Goodiar The latter sum had been paid it was said to Messrs Borrow & Goodiar, but it appeared one of the principal creditors was disputing with the assignees the distribution of the £8,000, but there was no evidence before the House to shew the merits of the case When the Government paid a certain sum to the assignees, and the assignees in their turn accepted it, it was a thorough admission of the relinquishment of any further claim What the assignees were to do with the money in their hands was not he thought a question for that House to determine, but no doubt the Judges would shortly decide that matter for them He considered that the passing of such a resolution would tend to establish a very dangerous precedent

Mr Milne would like to hear the opinion of the Attorney-General on this question (A laugh) He looked upon it as very doubtful whether the passing of such a resolution would have the effect of overriding or otherwise the decision of a Court of Justice He was a member at the time alluded to, and he certainly understood that the money had been voted to liquidate the claims of the creditors of Messrs Borrow and Goodiar

The Attorney-General said it was utterly impossible for him to give an answer to the question put by the last speaker, for the settlement of the case depended upon the decision of the Judges, and not upon himself, which they must be pretty well aware of With respect to the motion before them, he did not feel inclined to assent to it in its entirety The claim of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar was composed of two items The one was admitted by the Government and the other was not With regard to that portion of it, viz , £2,000 or £3,000, which was recognised the money remained in the hands of the Government pending an arrangement of certain matters then in dispute Beyond this £2,000 or £3 000, the Government did not recognise any claim whatever, and when the debenture was passed to the South Australian Banking Company it was a full discharge of the debt on the part of the Government He (the Attorney-General), as the adviser of the Crown, recommended that any further claim should be opposed Certain representations were, however, subsequently made to him that induced him to alter his opinion, and it was this, that although the Bank had been paid a certain amount as a full discharge of the claim by Messrs Borrow & Goodiar on the Government, it was proved that a very large amount had been subsequently advanced to Messrs Borrow & Goodiar to enable them to continue their contract, and that the colony was deriving an advantage in the completion of the work for which they had not made a sufficient compensation When he (the Attorney General) became aware of this, he thought the matter stood in a different light, and that the Government were bound morally to recognise the claims of those persons so advancing the money The money so paid, however, was a free gift, to which there could be no legal title The creditors had supplied the means to continue the work, and this was an acknowledgment to them on the part of the Government, and the sum over the £2,000 or £3,000 admitted as a claim, viz , £8,000, was intended, so far as the Government were concerned, as a free gift to the general body of the creditors As to the opinion that might be held by this House, he could not say whether it would be held as evidence in a court of law He thought it unjust that the Banking Company should be deprived of the debt assigned to them, but he could say, from his own knowledge, that he believed not one farthing would have been given by the House if it thought the money voted would go to enrich them to the exclusion of the creditors of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar

Mr Reynolds considered that the matter having been previously disposed of by the grant of money to the creditors of Messrs Borrow & Goodiar, the interference of the House now was out of the question The Bank should be left to settle the matter with the assignees

Mr Mildred said that from the confused state in which the question was at the present time, he would, to save further loss of time, move the previous question

The Speaker put the previous question, which resulted in Mr Neales's motion being negatived

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

This Bill was read a third time and passed

TAXATION

On the motion of Mr Peake the following resolution standing in his name—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no Bill for imposing a tax on the people should be proceeded with unless the same be founded on a resolution of this House and that the rules and orders of the Commons House of Parliament with respect to all Bills for imposing a tax on the people be in future acted on by this House"—

was made an Order of the Day for this day (Wednesday)

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The further consideration of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

JETTY AT PORT LINCOLN

The consideration in Committee of an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for 1859, for the purpose of extending the Jetty at Port Lincoln, in conformity with the prayer of the petition of the inhabitants of that place, was on the motion of the hon member for Flinders (Mr Macdermott) made an Order of the Day for the next day

The House then adjourned

Wednesday, October 27

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

Mr Strangways gave notice that on Friday next he should move the memorial addressed by the junior officers in the Government service to the Chief Secretary in reference to the Civil Service Bill be laid upon the table of the House

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS

Mr Neales gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move the petition of Captain John Finnis be referred to a Select Committee with the view of ascertaining what claim he had for the publication of the first number of the Colonial "Hansard"

MR JOHN HINDMARSH

Mr Neales gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move the report of the Committee upon the petition of Mr John Hindmarsh be adopted by the House

NORTHERN EXPLORATION

Mr Peake wished to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands a question in reference to the northern exploration party He saw by the public prints that information had been received from that exploring expedition, and as the public press had thought proper to make some very extraordinary remarks in reference to the information which had been received he was desirous of asking the Commissioner of Crown Lands of what information, if any, the Government were in possession in reference to this matter As this question had been discussed before the House——

The Speaker said as the hon member was asking a question without notice, he must confine himself strictly to the question

Mr Peake would then merely ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether he would lay the papers connected with the Northern Exploration upon the table of the House

The Commissioner of Crown Lands, in reply to the hon member, stated that some communications had been received, but that he did not think it would be desirable at present to lay them before the House He had no objection, however to place them in the hands of any hon member who might wish to peruse them,

Mr Strangways asked whether the despatches referred to or copies of them had been shewn to persons connected with the public press

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said they had been They had been shown to the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) and several other members of the House He should be happy to shew them to any hon member who desired to see them

Mr Neales asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether he had received any communication from a gentleman named Stuart, who had recently been engaged in exploring, and if so, whether he had any objection to lay such communication upon the table of the House?

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said he had that morning received a communication from Mr Stuart, but having so recently received it, it had been impossible to take any action upon it He was not at present prepared to lay it upon the table of the House

MAJOR WARBURTON

Mr Peake gave notice that on the following day he should move the despatches recently received from Major Warburton be laid upon the table of the House

MR STUART

Mr Neales gave notice that on the following day he should move the communications recently received from Mr Stuart be laid upon the table of the House

DISTRICT COUNCILS BILL

The Commissioner of Public Works wished to ask the hon the Speaker what course would be most consistent with the orders of that House in reference to the District Councils Bill He believed it would very much facilitate the passing of that Bill through Committee if various verbal amendments were effected by the printer prior to the Bill being again brought under consideration The House would remember that the Committee had already gone through 61 clauses, but the repeated alterations and amendments which were necessary by the insertion of "District" before "Councils," and the substitution of "the said" for "this," consumed a great deal of time He believed it would greatly facilitate the passing of the Bill if it were reprinted with such verbal alterations as were obviously essential

The SPEAKER said there was no objection to a reprint of the Bill being laid before hon members, and then the hon gentleman could move that the reprint of the Bill be substituted for the original

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if in that case it would be necessary that the Bill should be dealt with in Committee de novo, that is would it be necessary that the 61 clauses should be gone through again?

The SPEAKER said it would not be necessary to reconsider clauses which had been already passed

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS wished to know if it was necessary that he should give notice of his intention to have the Bill reprinted?

The SPEAKER said it was not

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would then take the course which had been suggested by the hon the Speaker

SWAN RIVER

Mr DUFFIELD wished to ask the Attorney-General whether the Government had received any communication from the Government of Swan River in reference to a prisoner who had been forwarded here from that locality, which circumstance he recently brought under the notice of the House

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said no despatch so far as he was aware had been received from the Government of Swan River, in answer to a despatch from the Government of this colony upon the subject referred to by the hon member, which had been laid upon the table of that House

Mr REYNOLDS wished to ask the Hon the Speaker a question upon what he considered a question of privilege As Chairman of the Committee upon Railway Management, a question had arisen as to whether the Committee should furnish one of the witnesses with a copy of the whole of the evidence which had been taken He wished to know whether the rules of the House would permit the Committee to give witnesses copies of the evidence taken before that evidence had been placed before the House

The SPEAKER stated that he did not think the Committee would do wrong in giving the evidence, as he understood that the Committee were engaged in enquiring into the conduct of the witness referred to The evidence must, however, be given to the witness upon the distinct understanding that he should not make any public use of it

POWDER MAGAZINE

Mr PEAKE asked the Commissioner of Public Works if it were true that the construction of the powder magazine at Port Adelaide was so defective that a part of it had fallen in

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was not true

Mr DUFFIELD, in reference to the question which had just been answered, wished to ask the Commissioner of Public Works whether the report was true as regarded the powder magazine erecting upon the Park Lands in the city of Adelaide.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that a slight accident had occurred to the Powder Magazine which was in course of erection upon the Park Lands The arch was hardly thick enough and had fallen in

Mr REYNOLDS asked if it had fallen in more than once?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS believed that it had not

HINDMARSH ISLAND

Mr STRANGWAYS moved, in accordance with notice—

"That it is desirable that a plan and estimate be prepared for a ferry to connect Hindmarsh Island with the Goolwa"

It would be remembered that the petition which he had presented upon the subject was signed by the Chairman and three members of the District Council of Port Elliot, and when he asked the Commissioner of Public Works what course the Government were prepared to adopt in reference to the petition, the hon gentleman stated that the Government were prepared to assist in the construction of a ferry Since then, however, he (Mr Strangways) had received a communication from the Clerk of the District Council, to the effect that the District Council were not in a position to expend the necessary amount, even if only one-half of the amount were required from them He was informed that the estimate which the District Council had made was to the effect that the ferry and approaches would cost £600, and as the annual income of the District Council did not amount to more than £520 or £530, the Council, if left to their own resources, would have to expend upon this work alone more than a whole year's income. The settlers upon Hindmarsh Island were placed in a peculiar position They had purchased land at a rate considerably higher than the upset price, and had no means of communication with the main land, except by a private ferry and private boats The island had only recently been settled, and the settlers had been subjected to considerable outlay in the erection of their houses and fencing and were not prepared to raise by private subscription the sum which he believed would be necessary to defray half the cost of erecting a ferry, namely £300 This amount would be required, even supposing that the Commissioner of Public Works intended to go to the extent of subsidising to an extent equal to the amount raised by private subscriptions The actual question was whether the ferry should be constructed or not The extent of the subsidy was not the question which the House should consider All he asked was, that the House should agree to the Commissioner of Public Works having the plans and estimates prepared in reference to the ferry and the, necessary works When the plans had been prepared, and the cost had been ascertained, he would then take the sense of the House as to what course should be pursued The House would see that persons living on Hindmarsh Island were differently situated from many others, as they had no means of communicating with the main land but by the private ferry, or boats, to which he had alluded, and he believed it was intended to discontinue the ferry which at present existed If the House agreed to the resolution they would not in the slightest degree pledge themselves to support any subsequent motion which he might bring forward relative to the construction of the ferry

Mr LINDSAY seconded the motion There could be no doubt that the ferry was very much required, but till the plans and estimates had been prepared it would be impossible to take any further steps in the matter There could not be the slightest doubt that Hindmarsh Island was entitled to some share of the public monies, for a considerable quantity of land had been sold in the locality—he believed more than half, and he was not aware that one penny had been expended beyond the ordinary work in connection with the Survey Department, which was executed in the orthodox South Australian manner, straight lines being marked over the country, with intervening strips called roads, involving considerable expense, for which no doubt the residents were grateful, and no doubt they were grateful also for the privilege which they possessed by virtue of the District Council of undoing the work of the Survey Department and doing the work again at their own expense

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there would be no objection on the part of the Government to prepare the necessary plans and estimates and lay them before the House upon the understanding that their preparation did not involve any pledge to support any subsequent motion Upon that distinct understanding he had no objection to undertake that the plans and estimates should be prepared, but he would observe that in consequence of the great many public works which the Government were anxious to press forward the architects were fully employed, there should, however, be no unnecessary delay

The motion was carried

CAPTAIN DASHWOOD

Mr REYNOLDS, in accordance with notice, moved—

"That all correspondence relating to the grant of land to Captain Dashwood be laid upon the table of the House, shewing the grounds upon which such grant has been made"

He presumed there would be no objection on the part of the Government to furnish the correspondence which he now asked for It would be in the recollection of hon members that certain gentlemen applied to the House for grants of land, that is, that they should be placed on the same footing as other military and naval officers The House did not affirm that proposition, but he had since ascertained that one naval gentleman had received a grant of land, and he was consequently desirous of knowing upon what ground this distinction had been made At the first blush it looked like favoritism, but he had no doubt that the product on of the correspondence would show that such was not the case He had drawn attention to the matter not being aware that the Government of the present day had any power to alienate land without receiving payment for it No doubt the correspondence would explain what certainly required explanation

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion, which was carried

The SPEAKER pointed out an error in the motion It should have been Lieutenant instead of Captain Dashwood

Mr REYNOLDS amended the motion accordingly

WASTE LANDS OF THE CROWN

Mr PEAKE asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands—

"1 What course the Government intend to adopt with respect to applications sent in for depasturing leases of the waste lands of the Crown, recently discovered, it is said, by Mr Stuart, or other persons? (2) Will the Government place any limit on the extent of country that may be applied for by one person? (3) Will they, as heretofore, grant depasturing leases of such waste lands for 14 years at ten shillings per square mile?"

He regarded the question as of considerable importance at the present time From all he heard it appeared that a large available country had been opened, and was still opening up by the energy of men like Mr Stuart, and the policy which the Government pursued with regard to recent discoveries might be of great importance to the country, and affect the judgment and decision of hon members on questions of policy before the House He hoped the Commissioner of Crown Lands would give clear and distinct answers to the several quest ons, so that the House would know what they had got to trust to in the matter

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the action of the Government would be in accordance with the existing law as embodied in the Waste Lands regulations, and the Government had no intention at present to alter them

THE INSOLVENT LAW

Mr Strangways put the question standing in his name, "That he will ask the Honorable the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) whether any despatch has been received from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies respecting the Insolvent Act of last session, and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such despatch on the table of this House"

He would merely remark that he had seen a statement in the public press to the effect, that a despatch had been received by the Government stating an intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to recommend Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the Insolvent Act of last session, on account of a clause in the Act which gave the Insolvent Court of this colony jurisdiction over the property of Insolvents in England in certain cases The law officers of the Crown in England were of opinion that this was an usurpation of power which the Parliament of this colony did not possess, and they had in consequence advised Her Majesty to disallow the Act

The Attorney-General said a despatch had been received upon the subject, and there could be no objection on the part of the Government to lay it upon the table of the House It would indeed have been laid upon the table of the House before but having been laid before the law officers of the Crown in this colony, it was thought better that the despatch should be accompanied by their report upon the subject, in order to put the House in possession of the views of the Government upon the subject, and the policy which they considered the House should adopt The objection taken by the law officers of the Crown in England was that the present law gave the Commissioner of Insolvency power to make the property of an insolvent in England available for the payment of such insolvent's debts With regard to the justice of such a power there could be no question, but technical objections had been raised by the advisers of Her Majesty It appeared to him that if the matter were fully laid before the authorities in England they would be disposed to acquiesce in the measure as it at present stood He had no objection to lay the despatch upon the table, and by Friday next the report also would be ready

Mr Reynolds, as Chairman of the Select Committee upon Railway Management asked for an extension of time to enable the Committee to bring up the report Most of the evidence had been taken, but there were still one or two witnesses who had to be examined, and a great portion of the evidence was in the printer's hands The report could not be prepared until the evidence was in the hands of the Committee He begged to ask for an extension of time till that day fortnight

Granted

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

Mr Barrow, as Chairman of the Select Committee upon the Assessment on Stock Bill, asked for a further extension of time for bringing up the report until that day week He might state that the Committee had concluded the examination of witnesses, but wished for the extension for which he had asked, in order that they might be able to revise the evidence in a complete form, and prepare the report The indulgence which he asked for would have been unnecessary if greater accommodation had been provided for Committees It was intended that the concluding examination of witnesses should take place on Friday last, but he received an intimation from the Clerk that it was impossible the Committee could assemble on that day as there was no room for them to meet in The Committee were consequently unable to meet till the following Tuesday He hoped this would be a sufficient apology for asking for an extension of time

Granted

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE ACT FURTHER AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of Mr Strangways the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole, for the further consideration of this Bill Some verbal alterations were made in the first clause Mr Strangways explained that the effect of this clause would be to repeal Clauses 182 and 183 of the Supreme Court Procedure Act In reference to observations which had fallen from the Hon the Attorney General upon the second reading of the Bill, he would suggest that, if the hon member desired to introduce a clause which would have the effect of giving the Judges of the Supreme Court a modification of the power which they at present possessed, the best way would be to repeal clauses 182 and 183, by the clause which he had just read of the Bill before the House, and introduce another clause in the Bill, giving the Judges the power which he desired to give them His own opinion was that it was not desirable to introduce a clause giving the Judges even a modified power, but that the best course would be to repeal the two clauses, 182 and 183 In reference to the objection which had been raised by the hon member for the city, Mr Solomon, that it would be exceedingly prejudicial to the mercantile community to take from the Judges the power of referring cases to arbitration, he would point out that the Judges would not be deprived of that power, as clause 2 of the Supreme Court Procedure Act of 1855 and 1856 give power to the Court or Judge to direct an arbitration before trial, when it should be made to appear upon the application of either party, that the matter in dispute consisted of matters of account which could not be conveniently tried in the ordinary way In the second clause which it was proposed to repeal the Judge had power against the wish of either party in the cause, to refer the matter in dispute to arbitration, and this power did not extend merely to actions involving matters of account, but to actions for assault or trespass, &c He believed there was one instance in which this power had been acted upon, and the parties in the cause who came to Adelaide prepared to go to trial were referred to arbitration and thereby incurred expenses exceeding £150 In cases where parties themselves were desirous of going to a Jury, it was better that they should, but, as he had before stated, the Act of 1855 and 1856 gave the Judge power to refer matters of account to arbitration He did not suppose the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) would be in favor of cases of assault or trespass, for instance, being referred to arbitration, but as regarded complicated matters of account, the power to refer them would still be left to the Judge by the Act to which he had alluded He apprehended, having shown that the power to refer such cases would still be retained by the Judges, the clause now before the House, the first clause of the new Bill, would meet the views of all hon members With regard to clause 182, the object of repealing that clause was to prevent the Judge from putting questions of fact as had hitherto been the case He had with him numerous reports of trials at the last sitting, which if necessary, he should be happy to refer to for the purpose of showing how this clause had operated When this clause was repealed the Judge might still have a common law right, which would not in the slightest degree be interfered with The only power of which the Judge would be deprived would be the power conferred upon him by the clause which it was sought to repeal That clause conferred a power which the Judges in England did not possess The clause was either superfluous upon the ground that the Judges had the power which it professed to confer without it, or it gave them a power which the House of Commons in England thought it unadvisable to place in the hands of Judges

The Attorney-General stated his intention to move an amendment in accordance with the view adopted by that branch of the Legislature when a similar Bill was under consideration during the last session of Parliament He thought it would be a wise and beneficial thing that the Judges should retain, in a modified form, the power conferred upon them by the clauses which it was proposed to repeal It was, however, a matter entirely for the House to decide, after considering the question in all its bearings, whether the power should be taken away or limited The clause of the Bill before the House, as it at present stood, destroyed the power altogether, but if that clause were modified, as he should propose, it would still leave the power in the hands of the Judge, but prevent it from being exercised except upon the application of one party, nor in any case could the Judge direct matters not in dispute to be referred except by the consent of both parties in open Court He would therefore move as an amendment the insertion of words to the effect—"and the power given by the said section shall not be exercised except upon the application of one party, and in no case shall the Judge direct matters not in dispute to be referred except upon the consent of both parties in open Court" This would leave a power which he believed would be found extremely useful in the hands of the Judge Where it was wise to exercise it, it could be, but its exercise would be prevented in opposition to the wishes of both parties to the cause He would move that the clause as originally proposed be struck out and that a clause such as he had just read be substituted

Mr Bagot must oppose the amendment of the Attorney-General, which he thought would leave the matter in as bad or worse a position than it was at present By clause 182 of the present Act the Judge might in every case direct a Jury to give a special verdict, and he could not see the advantage of depriving the Judge of the power if it were to be done on the consent of one party He had heard no argument from the Attorney-General to shew him where the difference would be It appeared to him that in these particular clauses they went a step beyond what was considered right in England, and in matters of this kind it appeared to him that in a small community such as this was it would be well not to step beyond what was considered right and proper in the home country There they were feeling their way step by step and were going forward gradually He scarcely ever knew a case there in which a Jury refused to give an answer to a question put by a Judge There might, it was true, be political cases or cases of libel in which the Juries took the law into their own hands and refused to give anything but a general verdict, but in nineteen cases out of twenty they answered the questions of the Judge In the way the law at present stood here the effect was to create antagonism between the Judge and the Jury He felt there was nothing more destructive to the course of justice than that any antagonism should exist between Judges and Juries He thought they should do everything they could to smooth the way, so that Judges might decide the law, and Juries the facts, and that the Judge might put what question he wished to the Jury, the Jury feeling no antagonism in answering the question, feeling that they were not bound to give a verdict contrary to their convictions, in fact, that in the face of answering questions, they were at liberty to give any verdict they pleased He thought the power of referring with the consent of both parties was a power which might be usefully used The power given to the Judge, of referring without the consent of either party, might be abused He did not say that any case of the kind had occurred, but it might occur, and be attended with injurious results to the suitors He preferred, however, supporting the clause as it stood, and falling back on the Acts of 1855 and 1856, which gave the Judge power to refer certain matters He had intended to go more fully into the subject, but had stated sufficient to shew his feelings, and the desire which he had to assimulate the laws of this colony with those of England

Mr BAKEWELL felt it his duty to support the Bill as it stood, and to oppose the amendments which had been proposed by the Attorney-General, which he hoped would be withdrawn The Judge already possessed power to refer cases by the consent of both parties, and it appeared to him to be an interference with the rights of parties to refer upon the consent of only one He believed that trial by Jury was the best course which could be adopted, except in cases of complicated accounts, in which cases he preferred arbitration The law as it at present stood gave the Judge power to refer to arbitration against the consent of the parties in the cause, but he thought that power should be limited, and that parties should have the right of going to a Jury The great recommendation of the Bill before the House was, that it assimilated the law of this colony to the law of England, and it would be far better to assimilate it than to tinker it in any other way No doubt the commission appointed to consider the question in England had well considered every possible suggestion, and he was quite sure the House would be acting wisely by adopting the law of England He trusted the Attorney General would withdraw the amendment

Mr STRANGWAYS could not adopt the amendment of the Attorney General, as there would be constant squabbles betwe n the Judge and the counsel as to what questions should be asked One counsel might wish to ask what another would object to, and the Judge would take one side or the other, and then there would be squabbles whether the questions should be put or not His desire was to assimilate the law to the law of England He should press the clause, and, if necessary, divide the House upon it

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no desire to press the amendment if the House disapproved it, but would say a few words with regard to what had fallen from the hon members who had spoken In the first place he for one protested against being bound by the example of England on legislation, Many gentlemen between 50 and 100 years of age might remember the phrase that "it works well" was used in reference to the old system in the Courts of Chancery All those who profited by the system declared it worked well, but that was not sufficient to prevent them forming amendments to Acts in order to make that which worked well, work still better The other argument was that "it was more safe" The colony had set an example to England in legislation in two important points With respect to "compulsory reference," it had been adopted to a great extent by the English Legislature, which had passed an Act giving that power An Act for providing for equitable defences was also passed in the colony before it passed the English Legislature, and taking the facts mentioned into consideration, he did not think the desire on the part of the Colonial Legislature to follow humbly and exclusively in the footsteps of the English Legislature would be wise He considered it of comparatively little importance whether the clause was altered or not, for from 1853, when the Act was altered, to the present time there had not been one, at all events he did not think more than one instance of that power being acted on by the Court He considered that the strongest reason why it was unimportant to retain it in legislation, but if hon members imagined they were legislating against the power of asking questions the legal gentlemen in the House would know it was a mistake altogether, for that power was founded on the Common Law right of Judges He had no desire to press the amendment, and would withdraw it

Mr SOLOMON said that the information given him by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) in regard to the Bill, induced him to give his support to it He thought the allusion made to the Act of 1853 not having been acted upon, was the strongest reason why it should not exist It was evident there had been no occasion for its use, and when an Act was inoperative, it was best off the Statute-Book altogether Believing that the object of the mercantile community would be gained by power of reference being given in questions of accounts, he would give his support to the Bill

Mr NEALES believed the mercantile community would be satisfied if that Bill were passed He could tell of several cases of reference In the case of Chaloner v Chaloner —

Mr BAGOT said the Attorney General was referring to clause 182, not clause 183

Mr NEALES said several cases had occurred which had caused great public inconvenience, and the sooner the law was restored to the state in which it was before the better The submission of the Attorney-General to the legal members of the House would be thankfully received by the mercantile community

Mr LINDSAY endorsed the sentiments of the Attorney-General that the colony ought not to follow in the wake of England, but that the House ought to be guided by common sense, and in every case make our Legislation consistent with itself He thought the powers of the Supreme and Local Courts should be assimilated, for many Magistrates in Local Courts might think themselves unable to give a legal illusion and might wish to arbitrate, whereas such would not be the case in the Supreme Court Believing it more expedient that the consent of both parties should be given, he supported the amendment of the hon member for Encounter Bay

The amendment was carried

The clause passed

The remainder of the clauses and the preamble were passed

The House resumed, the Speaker reported the Bill, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for Friday next

Mr DUFFIELD, before moving that the Speaker leave the chair for the purpose of considering the motion standing in his name, would refer to a question of order He found on the notice paper that the hon member (Mr Neales) moved that on a certain day the House should resolve itself into Committee for a certain purpose The House resolved so to do, but on that day the House did not

The SPEAKER requested the hon member to proceed with his motion The hon member had been informed that he must move that the Speaker do now leave the chair

ROAD THROUGH GAWLER TOWN

On the motion of Mr DUFFIELD, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole for the consideration in Committee of an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for the purpose of granting the prayer of the petition of the Mayor and Corporation of Gawler Town, presented to this House on 15th September last

Mr DUFFIELD moved that the petition be read

The petition was read accordingly

Mr DUFFIELD said the reading of that petition would obviate the necessity that might otherwise have existed for occupying the time of the House in bringing the question before it When first the inhabitants of Gawler Town had their petition granted in giving them a Corporation they were ignorant of the position in which they would be placed in regard to the main road to the north, a portion of which passed through their district In fact, it was not decided by the Central Road Board whether they had the power to spend money on roads in a corporate town or not until after the Corporation had been granted He believed that money had been spent by the Road Board within the limits of Corporations previously to that time Two or three Corporations had avoided the position in which Gawler Town was placed by excluding the main roads passing through them from their jurisdiction, and those were now kept in repair by the Central Road Board It was well known that a portion of that road was in very bad condition, being in fact a bed of sand, and the sum asked was £1,000, or such sum as was necessary £1,000 would not do more than place the road in a state of repair The Road Board had cut away the hill a few years ago, but the Corporation had made the cutting wider and the road safer He thought, therefore, the House would be justified in voting the sum asked, it would be satisfactorily expended there and would be advantageous to the public and to Gawler Town It might be said that the road ran parallel to a line of railway shortly to be opened, but that would not relieve the traffic upon it, for a considerable portion of that traffic came from the east, the south-east, and the north-east, to the Town of Gawler, which was the only outlet for those districts Should the House vote that sum it would not establish a precedent for the Corporation to go back to them and ask for more They only asked to be placed in the position in which they expected to be placed when first the petition was presented for making Gawler Town a corporate town, for had they believed that the maintenance and repair of that road would have been thrown upon them, the inhabitants would not then have petitioned to be incorporated The passing of that resolution would shew the country at large that the House was ready to establish Corporate bodies and District Councils, and to grant such reasonable assistance as was asked for when circumstances justified them, and it would tend to bring the various districts of the colony under self government

Mr BAKEWELL thought the petitioners had made out a strong and reasonable case for having a sum of money voted to them It appeared that a portion of the great trunk line of the North-road had ceased to be a main line of road, and was subject to be maintained by a body who were comparatively uninterested in it But it was for the good of the community generally, and not merely for the inhabitants of Gawler Town, who might leave that line of road unrepaired without any great disadvantage to themselves It seemed to him that the House could not do less than vote the amount asked If it were not voted the consequence would be that the road would be left out of repair, to the danger of persons travelling along it, and of the inhabitants of the district

Mr Burford felt it his duty to oppose the motion One of the reasons for granting Corporations was that the roads would be repaired, and now the granting of that Corporation was put forth as a reason why the relief asked should be voted But the House ought to take it for granted that before the petition was signed asking for the incorporation of Gawler Town, the circumstances had been well considered, for he could not believe such a petition would be presented by an unenlightened community The rule for supplementing aid to District Councils and Corporations was that the Government would add a sum for carrying out the objects contemplated equal to their own contributions, so that if they collected £3,000 in Gawler Town the Corporation might expect £3,000 more He therefore thought it too bad for the Corporation to ask to be assisted in the expense of improving any portion of their district Again, if that source of revenue failed, Gawler Town, of all other towns with which he was acquainted, was admirably situated for a toll, for they had high ground on one side, and a line of railway on the other, and they could thus compel all the traffic to go in a particular direction, and levy a toll for passing over the road He thought therefore that it was little short of being absurd for the House to pass that vote There must be a limit to the distribution of the public money, and that was reached in the way he had alluded to—(oh, oh) namely, the system of supplementing out of the revenue, and to go beyond that limit would be unjust The language of the petition itself stated that the Central Road Board had put the road in repair It was clear therefore that the Corporation were not in a state of ignorance, but the thing not being to their mind, they now came down and asked a considerable sum—he forgot what it was—£1,700 he believed—(laughter)—to put them in a state of enjoyment (Laughter)

Mr Hawker should support the motion of the hon member for Barossa, and was astonished at the arguments brought forward by the hon member for the city Had the Corporation of Adelaide been perfectly immaculate in asking for money? If so, the hon member would have come forward in his opposition with a better grace He believed some time ago, however, a sum (£400) was asked for by the Corporation of the city for making a road between the Hospital and Frome Bridge He believed also the road to and the iron bridge across the Torrens was done by the Government He He, therefore, could not see how the arguments of the hon member could tell against the argument for making a road through Gawler Town A small portion of the road in question was through the main street of Gawler Town, the largest part was between Gawler and the Woolleston Bridge, and it was impossible, within 20 or 30 miles of the city, to find such a bad road There was another point to be considered During the last twelve months the traffic that used to go through Port Wakefield went through Gawler Town, and, therefore, the road was very much injured by traffic, in which the people of that town had no interest whatever

Mr Neales should now have his revenge He should vote for the resolution because he believed it correct, but how those gentlemen who voted against the grant to the Port-road could vote for it was difficult to explain He considered them parallel cases (No, no) The House was now asked for something for a public work, and not to vote money for a District Council, and the other grant was asked for on similar grounds The inhabitants of Gawler Town did not ask for the road to be repaired after they had it in thorough repair, but that the road should be made, and then they would take it for ever That was also stated in the other case, and on the principle of doing good for evil he would vote for the motion

The Commissioner of Public Works thought the inhabitants of Gawler Town had made out a good case, and there was another feature in it that he liked, there was no likelihood for afterclaps in the matter, and, therefore, he should vote for the thousand pounds It was a distinct understanding that they should afterwards keep the road in repair, and long might their traffic pass over it

Mr Solomon would vote for the motion, for he did not like the idea of City versus Country, or Country versus City He believed the House could do justice to both, but whether it was for the city or the country, he should always vote for those measures he believed founded in justice, and he considered the claims of the inhabitants of Gawler Town just The road was a main trunk line, used by all the North, and hon members had only to pass through Gawler Town to see in what a disgraceful state it was The hon member for the city had propounded something like a system of tolls in Gawler Town, with a view of making parties trafficking there pay for the repairs of the road He never had any idea that that hon member (Mr Burford) was in favour of tolls He thought that system was exploded in the colony

Mr Burford explained that he suggested it only as an ultimate resource

Mr Solomon understood that Gawler Town was so beautifully situated that it was hedged in, and a toll could easily be laid He was glad to hear the hon member (Mr Neales) say he should support that vote, but could not think the case parallel to that of the Port road

The Chairman wished the hon member to confine himself to the question before the House

Mr Solomon would endeavor to do so, and would only say that he considered in passing that resolution the House was doing an act of justice to the people of Gawler Town

Several members rose to speak in different parts of the House.

Mr Barrow would also support the motion before the House Had he not been strongly inclined to do so he should not have risen five times for the purpose of expressing his opinion—(great laughter)—he having risen four times previously and sat down again, without being fortunate enough to catch the Chairman's eye (Laughter) The application he considered a just one, and though the hon member (Mr Burford) had somewhat ridiculed the idea of the people of Gawler Town trusting to the generosity of the House, he (Mr Barrow) hoped they would see that the people of Gawler Town had formed a more correct idea of it than had the hon member who taunted them with their misplaced confidence He hoped also that the hon member, Mr Neales, would have at some future time the consent of that House to an address on behalf of a road which he must not name on account of the rule just laid down (Laughter) Gawler Town ought to have that sum of money voted, because the road was a main line of road when the Corporation there was established He thought the case was a good one, and with respect to the road not being put in a state of complete repair, he drew a different inference from that circumstance from the hon member, Mr Burford, and believed it to be an additional reason why the people of Gawler Town should not be expected to make that portion of the main line which, it was said, was beyond their ability to put in repair He was glad to find it was their intention to keep the road in repair at their own expense in future, and so far from looking with disfavor at such applications, it would be wise and judicious to entertain them as far as the funds of the colony would admit There was no necessity to do injustice to another district because justice was done to one It was not as if it was necessary to divert the funds from other works to meet the expense of that In that case it might be advisable to refuse to Gawler Town the sum its inhabitants asked for, but under present circumstances he thought them entitled to it

Mr Peake was glad that the hon member for the city would be revenged for the vote against the Port (Laughter)

The Chairman requested the hon member to abide by the rule laid down

Mr Peake would touch on the question then—(laughter)—and would support the application because a large portion of the road to Gawler Town had never been made, and was still in a state of nature, being nothing but drift sand Before the Corporation of Gawler Town were called upon to expend their funds on that road, he thought it only fair that a sum of money such as that asked for should be expended upon it, but he thought the motion did not go far enough, and that the House were called upon to know the mode of expenditure before the money was voted, and would recommend an amendment to the effect that £1,000 should be placed at the disposal of the Central Road Board, to be expended in repairing the main North-road through Gawler Town It was better to avoid differences between the Engineer of Gawler Town and the Engineer of the Central Road Board, and by the mode proposed, the House would be protected, and there would be a guarantee that the money was expended in the usual manner

Mr Strangways would second the amendment of the hon member for Burra and Clare, believing that it would be in accordance with precedent That course was followed in the case of the Glenelg road, about 12 months ago Many roads within the boundaries of District Councils were kept in repair by the Central Road Board, and he thought some principle should be laid down in regard to such grants He believed, as according to the wording of the original motion, His Excellency might direct any sum to be put on the Estimates, he would suggest that a certain sum necessary should be named, and would recommend the hon member for Barossa to adopt the amendment

Mr Hay hoped, if the sum was voted it would be placed in the hands of the Corporation of Gawler Town He agreed that the amount should be stated, but considered it unwise to have two parties—the Central Road Board and the Corporation of Gawler Town—repairing the road in the same locality He considered it also unwise for that House to distrust any corporate body until they had reason for doing so He trusted the hon member for Barossa would not consent to alter his motion and to leave the money in the hands of the Central Road Board While, however, he intended to support the motion, he considered the House laid itself open to many similar calls He knew the Corporation of the city had similar claims In one instance application was made for a road, which was refused He thought it would be wise to state that in such cases where main lines of road ran through the district within the boundaries of a Corporation, the Central Road Board should keep them in repair He believed the new District Councils Act would do away with the necessity for dealing with a Corporation such as that of Gawler Town

Mr Lindsay supported the motion, because he saw no reason why a main road passing through a small area within the jurisdiction of the Gawler Town Corporation should be excepted from the system of main roads passing through the jurisdiction of District Councils There seemed to be no reason why a distinction should be made between Corporations and District Councils, and further he supported it because he believed that principle of construction only without maintenance, must be embodied into the main road system whenever they legislated upon it.

Mr Duffield could not consent to the amendment of the hon member for Burra and Clare, but was willing to insert the sum of £1,000

The amendment of the hon member, Mr Duffield, was put and carried

The motion in its amended form was carried

The House resumed, the Speaker reported the resolution, and obtained leave to transmit it to His Excellency

INTRODUCTION OF MONEY BILLS

Mr Peake in rising to move the following resolution standing in his name on the notice paper —

"That, in the opinion of this House, no Bill for imposing a tax on the people should be proceeded with unless the same be founded on a resolution of this House, and that the rules and orders of the Commons House of Parliament with respect to all Bills for imposing a tax on the people be in future acted on by this House "

said, that he had found on consulting the Act of the Imperial Parliament which empowered the Legislature of this country to pass the Constitution Act, that the first portion of the resolution would be illegal He therefore desired to amend the resolution by striking out all the words from the word "House" in the first line to the word "the" in the third line. The hon member then read the motion as it would stand, if amended in accordance with his motion

The Speaker said the hon member could not bring forward a motion which would have the effect of rescinding the Standing Orders without giving notice of his intention to do so Besides which the Standing Orders were then before His Excellency for confirmation, and could not be dealt with before returned, any more than a Bill could be when transmitted to the other House

Mr Peake accordingly withdrew the motion

EXTENSION OF PORT LINCOLN JETTY

Mr Macdermott moved that the House resolve itself into Committee for the purpose of considering the following resolution —

" Consideration in Committee of an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for 1859, for the purpose of extending the Jetty at Port Lincoln, in conformity with the prayer of the petition of the inhabitants of that place "

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee accordingly

Mr Macdermott said that in moving this address he would observe that the whole, or nearly the whole of the traffic passed through Port Lincoln The House had already affirmed the necessity of constructing a jetty at the place, but it was found not to be efficient, owing to the shallowness of the water close by the township The extension necessary to make it efficient would be, as the petition stated, one of about 150 feet, as that would enable the coasting vessels which traded to Port Lincoln to lie at the end of the jetty, whereas at present the whole of the traffic had to be lightered to the vessels and landed by the same means, as the vessels could not approach sufficiently near the jetty to load or unload The question had been asked, when he brought this subject before the House previously, whether the jetty abutted on Crown lands and he was at that time unable to reply to it, but he had since ascertained that such was the case The jetty abutted on Tasman's-terrace The cost of the proposed extension would be about £800, and as the inhabitants of Port Lincoln had hitherto been very moderate in their demands on the liberality of the House, he hoped the House would not object to this sum for making the jetty efficient, especially as it had already declared the necessity of a jetty

Mr Reynolds asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the statement of the hon member that the proposed extension would cost £800 was correct, and if so how it was that 150 feet of jetty should cost £800? Had the hon member made an estimate of the probable cost?

The Commissioner of Public Works believed that £800 would be the cost of the work

Mr Reynolds wished to know how 150 feet of a jetty would cost £800, considering the sum set down for another jetty, which was to be 1,900 feet in length?

The Commissioner of Public Works replied that it was owing to the differences in the length of the piles

Mr Mildred would repeat the question He wished to know the length of the present jetty, and what it had cost? He did so, because when the sum was asked for, he had stated that to grant it would be only locking up capital in a useless manner, as in all probability the jetty would be allowed to rot unused, and there were other more suitable places for a jetty on that part of the coast When the money was voted the House was told it would be sufficient, yet now an additional sum was asked for

The Commissioner of Public Works was not prepared to answer the question at the moment The construction of the jetty had been authorised by the Legislative Council of the province

Mr Strangways said, as the hon the Commissioner of Public Works knew nothing of the matter—(a laugh)—he should move its further consideration be made an order of the day for that day week

Mr Macdermott hoped that the House would not agree to the amendment He never spoke from memory, but he believed that the length of the jetty was 1,300 feet, or rather that the cost of the work was about £1,300—(laughter)—and that it amounted to about £3 10s a foot, so that he supposed the length was about 400 feet A sum of £2,000 had been voted in a previous session for the jetty, and also for sinking some wells, but he imagined that the difference between £1,300 and £2,000 had been saved to the Government, as he was not aware that the well had been sunk

Mr Solomon supported the adjournment, as he could not vote money for a work respecting which the House had no information, and the postponement would probably afford an opportunity to the hon the Commissioner of Public Works of obtaining some information on the subject

The Commissioner of Public Works rose to speak, but—

The Chairman said he must put the amendment, as it was a motion for adjournment

The amendment was then put and carried without a division

The House then resumed

Mr Macdermott enquired whether he could ask for a division

The Speaker replied in the negative.

Dr Wark said as the business of the day was now concluded, he would ask leave to move the motion which had lapsed from the paper of the previous day

The Speaker ruled that it was not competent for the hon member to do so

The House adjourned at a quarter past 3.

Thursday, October 28

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

MR ABRAHAM LONGBOTTOM

Captain Hart presented a petition from Mr Abraham Longbottom, asking leave to bring in a Bill for a patent in reference to the manufacture of gas

PORT LINCOLN JETTY

The Commissioner of Public Works begged to inform the House that he had laid upon the table of the library plans of the Port Lincoln Jetty to which reference had been made upon a former occasion He had laid the plans upon the table of the library instead of the table of the House, because in the latter case they would have become portion of the records The whole of the other information in connection with the jetty was comprised in a paper which he now laid upon the table of the House

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

Upon the motion of the Treasurer, the House went into Committee for the consideration of the Civil Service Bill

The preamble was postponed

The first clause repealing Acts No 9, of 1852, and No 21, of 1854, was passed as printed

Clause 2 provided for the classification of officers, and was as follows —

'2 And whereas a new classification of salaries was made in the Estimates of 1858, in lieu of the classification authorised in the said first-recited Act, and also certain amounts were voted as good-service pay to certain officers in said Estimates in respect of their claims arising under the said Act—Be it enacted that the amounts of salary and good-service pay received during the year 1858, by any officers who were classified or entitled to be classified under the provisions of the said Act heretofore repealed, shall be deemed and taken to have satisfied all claims of such officers in respect of such salary and good-service pay, except such as may arise under the Act

Upon the Treasurer moving that it should be passed as printed,

Mr Strangways suggested that an appropriate marginal note for the clause would be " repudiation of existing claims " He should oppose the clause, and though he stood alone, should divide the House upon it Under the Acts referred to in the first clause he could not see why the claims of persons under these Acts should not be recognised If the clause were passed as it at present stood he contended it would amount to a repudiation of existing claims It would be highly unwise that the House should pass any clause which might in the slightest degree be interpreted into a repudiation of existing claims, particularly when the House constantly authorized the Government to increase the liabilities of the colony If the House repudiated one claim the natural inference would be that they would repudiate others The clause was unnecessary, if the Government intended to act fairly to the 48 persons in the Government service who had claims under the Act which it was proposed to repeal By a return, moved for by the late member for the Port (Mr Hughes), it appeared there were only 48 persons who had not accepted in full satisfaction of their claims the amounts they had severally contributed to the fund, and interest at the rate of 10 per cent. If the Government desired to place these parties in a fair and proper position, those entitled to pensions should receive them, or the Government should calculate the money value of those pensions and tender the amount. Again, as there were some who would not be entitled to pensions for many years to come, the Government should make out a full account.

The TREASURER rose to order. The hon. member was discussing a subject which was not introduced in the Bill. The clause under discussion referred solely to the Clerks Salaries Bill, and not to the Superannuation Bill.

The CHAIRMAN said the hon. member must confine himself to the clause under discussion.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said the clause stated that by its provisions any officers who were classified or entitled under the provisions of the said Act heretofore repealed, and as the framers of the Bill had not stated to which Act they referred, he submitted he was perfectly in order in making the remarks which he had. He would ask if he was not in order in referring to either or both of the Acts which were to be repealed.

The TREASURER said the clause referred to No. 9 of 1852.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said the clause left hon. members in the dark. It did not show which Act was referred to.

The CHAIRMAN said the clause referred solely to the classification of officers, and the hon. member, in his arguments, must confine himself strictly to that question.

Mr. STRANGWAYS would then confine himself to the Act to which it appeared the clause was intended to refer. Taking the clause as it stood it was an admission on the part of the Government that there were some persons who had claims, and the Government now called upon the House to repudiate those claims. He would be no party to such an act of injustice to public officers. He should oppose the clause, as either it was necessary because there were persons who had claims, and if so he was not prepared to repudiate them, or it was unnecessary because there were no claims, so that in either case the clause should be struck out. He should oppose the clause, and though he stood alone should divide the House upon it.

The TREASURER would say a few words for the purpose of setting the hon. member who had just sat down right. It was quite clear that the hon. member had been arguing in the dark. The hon. member could not have considered the clause or he would not have fallen into the error which he had in reference to the Superannuation Act. The clause under discussion, instead of repudiating existing engagements, was intended to have a directly contrary effect. They could not repeal an Act which gave certain advantages to individuals unless they replaced it by another. The Act under which certain advantages were conferred was repealed by the first clause of the Bill, and he wished to explain that as that Act had been repealed the present clause was intended for the purpose of replacing the beneficial provisions which the former Act contained. Nothing was easier than to devise or constitute a claim, and many claims would no doubt arise, for which there was not a shadow of foundation. It was considered that the claims under the old Act should merge into the new one, so that no injustice should be done to those who were deprived of their increase under the Act which was repealed. They could not deprive officers of advantages which they had had for some time past without substituting some Act for the purpose of giving them a compensation or equivalent. It was so considered last session, and that the new classification of officers was an equivalent for that which they had under a former Act. Formerly there were three classifications, but there were now five, so that it was impossible to meet each case exactly. There must be some compromise in every case, and this was sought to be done when the Estimates were under consideration. The Treasurer of that day (Captain Hart) went very closely into the calculation, and submitted a scheme to the House which was supposed to place every officer upon a fair and equitable footing, as regarded the claims which had been alluded to by the hon. member who had last spoken. All in fact which was sought to be done by the clause under discussion was to legalize that which was done last year and prevent other claims arising. There was no intention to repudiate any claims which had arisen and he would remark that funds had been already voted by the House to satisfy all claims which could arise under the Estimates of last year. This clause would not prevent the Government from satisfying any claims which might be proved at the present moment. He thought the House would see that the hon. member for Encounter Bay had been arguing in the dark when he attempted to fix a charge of repudiation.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked if this clause was intended to bar any claim which might be made under the Act which had been repealed?

The TREASURER said that it was.

Captain HART would point out to the hon. member (Mr. Strangways) that he must have forgotten the discussion which took place last year, as it was clearly pointed out in the classification of officers their claims under the old Act would be strictly regarded and provided for. There could be no doubt that under any circumstances the late Clerks Salaries Act must be repealed. It was a gross absurdity in the first instance, and looking at the change of times which had taken place it was perfectly inapplicable. It was passed at a time of great excitement, when people thought that £500 a-year was scarcely sufficient remuneration for a doorkeeper. It was under the feelings which obtained at that time that the Act was passed, but it was a gross absurdity to say that a young man of 18 or 20 years of age upon entering the Government service should receive an increase of salary to the extent of £10 per annum for 15 years, no matter whether during that period he became competent to hold a higher situation or not. It was absurd to say that a man holding the lower office at 120*l.* a year, should at the end of 15 years have 270*l.* a year, however unequal to fill a higher office. The House, at the present day he was satisfied would not take such a view as was taken by the House at the time the Act was passed. The claims under the Clerks' Salaries Act must be dealt with in a manner somewhat different to that suggested by the hon. member for Encounter Bay.

Mr. STRANGWAYS contended that if the amount of salaries and good service pay were voted last year there was no necessity for the insertion of this clause. It appeared, however, from what had fallen from the Treasurer that the House was called upon to state what were its intentions last session. He believed it was a most objectionable principle to call upon the House to state now what it intended to have done last session. It appeared to him that the clause was either unnecessary, upon the ground that there were no persons affected by it, or if there were persons affected by it, it would be most unjust.

The clause was carried.

Clause 3 related to the minimum salary of each class, and that officers, commencing at the minimum salary, were to be increased by a moiety of good-service pay. It was as follows:—

"3. From the 1st day of January, 1859, any public officer who shall then be serving, or who shall be thereafter appointed to serve, the Crown in the said province, whose salary as fixed for the said year 1859, shall not exceed £280, nor be less than £120 per annum, shall be ranked in one of five classifications, to be called respectively the first, second, third, fourth and fifth class. The minimum rate of salary for each of the said classes shall be as follows, that is to say:—For the fifth class £120; for the fourth class, £160; for the third class, £200; for the second class, £240; and for the first class, £280; and any officer appointed to any office, or raised to any superior class shall receive only the minimum salary, until the same is increased by the moiety of the good service pay hereinafter provided, which is not required to be carried to the credit of 'the Retirement Allowance Fund.'"

Mr. GLYDE hoped that the Government would assent to an alteration in the latter part of clause, by striking out "moiety" and inserting "portion." He wished this alteration to be made for the purpose of paving the way for an amendment which he intended to propose in the fourth clause.

The TREASURER stated that he had no objection to the alteration.

Mr. REYNOLDS begged to ask the Treasurer, whether officers in the police force, constables, messengers or letter carriers, were intended to be included in this clause, and if not, why not? Why should such parties not be entitled to good-service pay as much as other parties in the Government service?

The TREASURER before moving that the clause pass as amended, would afford the hon. member for the Sturt the information which he desired. The clause under discussion did not include members of the police force or police officers, nor messengers nor those receiving daily pay in the public service. The great advantage of the present Bill over that of last session, was that it limited the number of persons who could claim under it. With regard to the police force it would be impossible to lay down a rule applicable to them which would be applicable to all other branches. There must be a rule in reference to the police force, and others specially applicable to other public officers. Those parties who were in public departments and were in the receipt of daily pay were liable at a week's notice to lose their employment, and under such circumstances it would be rather hard upon them to require them to contribute towards the Superannuation Fund. The number of such parties was also very shifting and was of course regulated according to the requirements of the various departments with which they were connected. In one year the police force might be very much increased, and in another it might be very much diminished, according to the requirements of the colony, and the same remark would apply to the Survey department. The classes which had been referred to by the hon. member for Sturt were too fluctuating to render it desirable that they should be placed on the fund. The Bill was intended to apply only to those who had an annual salary, and were upon a fixed establishment in the colony.

Mr. REYNOLDS said, that being the case, why were the classes which he had referred to not excluded from the operation of the Bill, as it was quite possible that those parties might prefer claims if the clause were passed as it at present stood. The parties he had referred to were a very deserving class, and he did not see why they should be debarred from good-service pay. The hon. the Treasurer had remarked that it was hard that this class should be called upon to contribute, but it appeared they did not contribute, and that the Government made them a present of a certain fund towards a pension list.

Mr STRANGWAYS thought it an extremely bad principle to go on increasing the salaries of officers whether they were capable of filling higher offices or not. There was one civil service which was remarkable for the excellence of its arrangements. He alluded to the civil service of the East India Company. In that service a certain salary was attached to each office, and certain deductions were made from that which were set apart towards a retiring fund. There were various funds to which the officers were called upon to contribute. It would be well to consider whether the course adopted by the East India Company might not be advantageously adopted in this colony. There, as he had already stated, the various offices under the Company had certain salaries attached to them, and a percentage was deducted as a contribution towards the fund. That system worked remarkably well in India, and he could not see why it should not work well here. The system here was not that each officer should contribute towards the fund, but that the Government should set aside a certain sum for the benefit of the officers. Let every office have a certain salary attached to it, but let them abolish this good service pay entirely. If a higher office were vacant, let a subordinate, if competent, be appointed to it as a reward for his services. In the one case, the officer himself would contribute towards the fund from which he subsequently derived advantage, but in the other the whole burden was thrown upon the colony.

Mr NEALES certainly could not understand the logic of the hon. member for Encounter Bay. What were the facts of the case? Here we gave officers a salary with a rising scale, but the East India Company, according to the statement of the hon. member, had no rising scale. He could not conceive how the hon. member could attempt to show that the fund here was not created by a deduction from the salary. The salary was subsidized by another payment and from the subsidy a certain sum was stopped for a particular purpose. It was playing with words to say that it was not a deduction. (Hear, hear.) It appeared to him monstrous to say that there should be no promotion in pay except the party were removed to a higher office. The service here if based upon such a principle would present no inducement to parties to enter it. He approved of the system by which parties by length of service and goodness of conduct would get an increase no matter whether the officers above them died or gave up their berths. He could not conceive a greater inducement for officers to remain in the service, than giving them an annual increase, from which there should be a deduction for the purpose of affording them security for a comfortable provision in old age. He had carefully considered the measure, and was of opinion that it would be a great injustice to Government officers if it did not pass. All the objections which had been raised had he was satisfied, merely been brought forward for the purpose of impeding the settlement of a very difficult question. There could be no doubt that a blunder had been committed in passing the Act of last session, but this Bill appeared to him to be a perfect remedy and to do justice to all parties. It did not exclude rights which arose before the end of 1858, but all claims would be dealt with equitably between the Government and the claimants. The object of the Bill was to prevent any more claims from arising. He thought the hon. the Treasurer had given a sufficient reason for not including the police force and other classes but he should have no objection to support a Bill by which a mutual insurance would be established amongst employees of the Government not included in this Act. He believed it would be a very good thing to encourage such a course in order that parties might be enabled to make a provision for their old age. If such parties were included in the present Bill it might be a temptation to Government, from political motives, to dismiss such bodies of men, and under all the circumstances he thought it was undesirable that such shifting bodies should be included in the present Bill.

Mr REYNOLDS said if mutual insurance were such a good principle, why not support it in a more extended view. As it appeared that the police were not to be included in the present Bill, he would ask the Treasurer if it would not be necessary to exclude them from the Bill. The House having affirmed the principle of the Bill, he could assure the House that his only desire was to make the Bill as perfect as possible. There was another class whom he was desirous of knowing whether it was intended to include in the present Bill. He alluded to officers under various Boards. It was true that the Public Works Bill had not yet passed the House so that it was difficult to say what officers would be affected, but he was desirous of knowing whether it was intended that officers in connection with Boards should be brought under the operation of this Bill.

The TREASURER said, with respect to the officers referred to, it was clear that those who did not at present appear upon the Estimates could not come under the operations of the Bill; but if any officers of the Central Road Board for instance, or in the Public Works Department were placed on fixed establishments then they would be classed as officers, and would come under the operations of the Act, but not otherwise.

Mr REYNOLDS pointed out that the words used in the clause were "any public officer." He wished to ask whether all clerks in the Government service were to have good-service pay no matter whether they were good, bad, or indifferent clerks. He saw no provision in the Bill that there should be a certificate from the head of the department to the effect that they were entitled by good conduct to good service pay. He should like the pay to be really good-service pay, and not that it should be given indiscriminately, whether the officers were good, bad, or indifferent.

Mr BARROW thought the principle referred to by the hon. member was recognised in the 8th clause, and if that principle were applied to the clause under discussion, it would be an improvement.

The clause was passed as amended.

Clause 4 provided for a retirement allowance fund, and was as follows:—

"4. For the purpose of forming a fund to provide for the retirement of officers in the service of the Crown in the said province, and for the continued payment of the annuities of persons who have retired under the provisions of Act No. 21 of 1854, the Treasurer of the said province shall carry the unexpended balance of all moneys by law appropriated towards the payment of such last-named annuities, and also the whole of the sums hereinafter provided as good service pay, in respect of officers whose salary at the commencement of this Act shall amount to £300 a year and upwards, and one moiety of such good service pay in respect of officers included in the aforesaid classification, to the credit of a fund to be called 'The Retirement Allowance Fund,' and shall invest the same every year in South Australian Government securities. Provided that if the sum so authorised to be invested shall at any time exceed £10,000, any surplus beyond that amount shall be carried to the General Public Revenue of the said province, for the public use thereof."

Mr GLYDE rose for the purpose of proposing an amendment, remarking that he had not opposed the second reading of the Bill because he felt that the Act 21 of 1854, which was repealed by the present Bill, ought to be repealed. That Act was evidently a great mistake, and he could not think how the Legislature could have been betrayed into passing it. Any man acquainted with pounds, shillings, and pence, must ridicule the idea of charging every man, whatever was his age, 2½ per cent. It was most absurd. Another objection to that Act was that the payments were not compulsory but merely voluntary. It was impossible to strike an average with anything at all like safety. He trusted that the House would assent to the amendment which he was about to propose. He held that the clause as it stood was a rough attempt at the establishment of an Insurance Company. The hon. member read his amendment, which proposed that the whole of the good service pay in respect of officers who at the commencement were above 45 years of age should be carried to the fund, three-quarters of the good service pay of those between 35 and 45 years, one half the good service pay in respect of those between 28 and 35 years, and one-fourth of the good service pay of those who had not attained 28 years. He considered that a better proportion than that which was contained in the clause as it stood. The principle was that younger men should pay less than those of more advanced years. He had that morning been to various insurance offices to see if he could obtain a table of rates, but he found that none of the offices here did business in that way. It should be borne in mind that it would be unfair to the junior officers in the service if the clause were passed as printed, because the younger men would have to pay for a greater number of years before they could avail themselves of the fund, and they had a less chance of living to become pensioners upon the fund; that is, a man who had arrived at 40 years of age had a better chance of arriving at the age of 60 years than a man of 30 years of age had. A young man for instance 30 years of age would have to contribute towards the fund for a period of 30 years, and if he died before that period, he forfeited all that he had contributed. He was satisfied the amendment would, upon consideration be regarded as an improvement. He could not believe that the Government would be acting rightly in going into this matter at all. In theory this attempt at life insurance should be left alone, and let the Government pay a fair day's salary for a fair day's work, leaving Government officers to provide for themselves. He believed however that many would not make a provision, and that it would be desirable that old officers who had become unfit for their various offices should retire. He believed that whoever had prepared the last portion of the clause, must have done so in a satirical mood in alluding to the surplus of the £10,000, as in the course of a few years the probability was that, instead of a surplus there would be a tremendous pull upon the Treasury. When the schedule was under consideration he should feel bound to move some amendments, feeling satisfied that they were making a bad bargain. The number of Government officers was so small that it was impossible to strike a fair average, and the result would be found to be that though the senior officers had made a very good bargain the junior officers had made a very bad one. The reason he had moved the amendment was, that he felt the clause, as it stood would be unjust to the younger and more clever officers in the public service. If a man at 30 years of age had, by his abilities and energy, risen to a position to which a salary of £700 a-year was attached, it was unfair that he should in consequence be called upon to contribute the whole of the good-service pay.

Mr BARROW hoped that the clause would be postponed, as many hon. members were not such adepts in figures as his colleague (Mr Glyde), in order that those hon. members might have an opportunity of checking the figures of the amendment.

Mr HAY hoped that before the calculations of the hon. member (Mr Glyde) were gone into, the clause itself would be closely examined. He thought the junior members would have an advantage by the proposed arrangement, as they would get one-half their good-service pay, whilst officers in the receipt of £300 a year would get none at all. If there were to be any alteration in the clause, he would say, "Do away with good-service pay being given to anybody, and let it all go into the general fund." The amendment of the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) would be unjust, unless Government officers could at all times claim a retiring allowance. The great object of the Bill was to do away with all appeals to the House for pensions, but that when the time arrived for an officer to retire from the service he should have a claim upon the Government, and this was highly desirable inasmuch as nothing could degrade an officer so much as that he should be compelled to curry favor with a member of that House in order to have his claim for an allowance brought forward. Again, if an officer was connected with some society such as the Oddfellows, or the Freemasons, although he might be an inefficient public servant, he might by means of members of the House who were members of the same society obtain an allowance, whilst another officer not having friends could not procure one. He thought that every officer should have a claim, and that the House would not have to give them allowances through charity. He should support the clause as it stood.

Mr SOLOMON would not have risen to address the House at all, but for the remarks of the previous speaker. He was neither an Oddfellow nor a Mason, but the hon. member (Mr Hay) had touched the very chord which showed that it was unnecessary to provide this fund at all. For if an officer was an Oddfellow or a Mason, by paying considerably less than the Government now asked, he would have a claim on the society to which he belonged, which would render it unnecessary to ask any hon. member of that House to claim for him a pension which he was entitled to. He would support the amendment of the hon. member for East Torrens, for he was not at all convinced by the arguments of the hon. member for Gumeracha, when that hon. member attempted to show that so far from there being an injustice to the junior clerks there would an injustice to the seniors. Well as he knew figures, and he did know them pretty well, he was not able to discover how the amendment could lead to such an issue. A great injustice would be done to the junior officers by compelling them to pay the same rate for insurance (for he could regard it as nothing else) as was paid by the seniors. He would support the amendment of the hon. member for East Torrens, for if a fund was to be created he could see no better mode of doing it.

Mr NEALES said that by the amendment a poor fellow in the third class might have £5 deducted from his good-service pay whilst a gentleman with £300 a year would have only £4 to pay.

Mr GLYDE said he did not propose to use the classification of offices at all.

Mr NEALES said that was just what he complained of, as the effect would be that the higher class of officers would have less deducted from their pay than the lower.

Mr GLYDE said that his amendment did not touch the question of salaries at all. It was only that according to the age of the officer a certain amount of good service pay should be deducted.

Mr NEALES said that only made the case worse, and if the system was to be carried out they had better abandon the Bill altogether. If the amendment was carried, the Bill would be quite useless inasmuch as it would never provide sufficient funds. He believed it was quite fair to deduct one-half the good service pay from officers who had a certain amount of pay, but when they arrived at the comparative independence of £300 a year, they should contribute more. It was a mere contract between parties. When the question was before the House previously, he did not believe the allowance was a pension, and now he did not regard it as an insurance. It was merely a certain condition which officers with certain salaries agreed to. There would be no injustice in taking the whole of the good service pay from officers with £300 a year, as these persons were comparatively independent. As to the talented young men with £300 a year, the terms were offered to them and they were not compelled to accept them. It was not like cutting down an old establishment, and with respect to the classification of last year it was successful, and had had the effect of raising salaries.

Captain HART would vote against the amendment. The hon. member himself (Mr Glyde) if he entered into calculations, would see that in attempting to make what he considered a more fair arrangement, he had left out one important ingredient altogether; for whilst a young man would have to pay a certain sum for a certain number of years, the payment he received was in proportion to the time he spent in the service. If for instance, he served for 30 years, he would get six-eighths of his pay, whilst the officer who had only served 20 years would only get four-eighths. But, would the House say, that if this Bill did not pass, they would give for the present good service of the junior officers, this £10 a-year. If so, it would be necessary to go into a different calculation, and to take the individual position of each officer, before knowing what pay he was to receive. This necessity was obviated by the course proposed to be adopted in the Bill, and the next question was, is the sum to be raised sufficient for the purposes of the Bill. If such were the case he would not alter the Bill at all. But the hon. member who had just spoken said the sum was not sufficient, and yet he proposed to reduce it. The hon. member forgot that the junior officer's pay increased according to the time he was in the service, and that his pension was calculated by that time. Hon. members would do well to take the same trouble which the members of the Select Committee which produced this Bill had taken, and if so, they would come to the same conclusion. He would refer to the members of that Committee, to the hon. members for Gumeracha, Mount Barker, and the Light. These hon. members were opposed to a pension list, if it could be got rid of, but they saw that it was a question which must be grappled with, and they came to the conclusion which they arrived at after very serious consideration. As to the amendment, if carried it would at once defeat the Bill. (No, no, and hear, hear.) Hon. members might say "no, no," but he would show that it would at least defeat the vital principle of classification. It would bring a man of lower class, incompetent though he might be, to a higher salary than a man of a higher class. The £35 which a man would gain in seven years would bring him within £5 of the class above him. The maximum of good-service pay amounted to £70, and half of this went to the officer, but if he got more than this, he would have more than the class above him. He thought that before adopting the amendment, the House should be in a position to know whether it was based on proper calculations or not.

Mr LINDSAY could not understand the amendment, and thought it impossible to say what its effects might be. He should therefore, support the motion of the hon. member (Mr Barrow) that the clause be postponed.

The CHAIRMAN said it was the amendment that was before the House.

Mr LINDSAY still hoped that the clause would be postponed. Whatever might be the amendment of the hon. member for East Torrens, the clause could not be made worse than it was. (Laughter.) For instance, a man entering the service at 18 and remaining in it until he was 60 would contribute £1,260, whilst a man with £500 a-year, would only contribute £1,500, although the first-named individual would only get £117 a-year, and the other £375. There was no proportion here. Again if two officers, entered the Government service at 25 years of age one having £120 a-year, and the other £500, the individual who received £120 would contribute £1,015 to the retiring allowance fund, whilst the officer with £500 would only contribute £1,220 or a very little more, whilst the amounts they received were £117 a year for the low class, and £376 for the high. Again suppose that two individuals entered the service at 36 years of age, the clerk of £120 a year would contribute £630, whilst the man at £500 a year contributed but £780, and the lower class man would retire on a pension of £78, whilst the high class officer would receive £250. He did not see how it was possible to alter the clause so as to make it more unjust. How it would affect parties making jumps from one class to another he could not say, but he would ask the hon. the Treasurer whether an officer of a low class stepping into the next rank would have to begin de novo, or whether he would occupy the same position as if he had remained in the service at a lower rate of salary.

Mr REYNOLDS said that something had been said about calculations, and he would like to know from the Hon. the Treasurer, what sum the Government would have to pay for this fund during the next eight years. The hon. the Treasurer would correct him if he was wrong, but he found according to the Bill, that the country would have to pay no less than about £60,000 during that time. He thought this would be paying too dearly for their whistle. He agreed with one hon. member who thought the fund would not be sufficient to meet the cases which would come under it. Take the case of His Honor the Chief Justice, who had been now nearly 20 years in the service, and who would therefore be entitled to four-eighths of his pay, or instead of £1,500 a-year to £750 as a pension. Then there were two other officers at £600 a year each, and one at £700. For these officers the country would have to pay £3 284 in pensions or superannuation allowances. He had only taken these four gentlemen who might claim their retiring allowances, but there might be others, and he (Mr Reynolds) questioned whether the £60,000 which we would have to pay would be sufficient for all the claimants. This certainly did not look like economy but far otherwise. But it also appeared that the good services of an officer receiving £1,500 a-year were only worth £10, whilst the good services of an officer with £120 a-year were also worth £10. In fact all good services, whether good, bad, or indifferent, were worth £10 a-year. (Laughter.) There were about 56 officers with salaries of £300 a year and upwards, and these would have each to pay £10 a-year, and about 130 whose pay was under £300 and who would have to pay £5 each, making a total of £1,210, and the sum to be paid altogether for good-service pensions in the first year would be £1,860

Mr GLYDE, in explanation, stated that as a sequel to the amendment he intended to propose an amendment in the next clause to the effect that the word "ten" be struck out, and the word "five" inserted

Mr SCAMMELL thought if the amendment was carried, it would be necessary to have every Government officer duly examined with the stethescope, and his previous habits inquired into before a new classification was made for the public service But it might not be known to some hon members that a practice prevailed in England of deducting from the salaries of Government officers at the rate of two per cent on salaries of £100 a year and below that amount, and of four per cent on salaries over £100, and this money was paid into the retiring allowance fund The fund had proved equal to all emergencies, to such an extent, indeed that he believed it was a historical fact that Lord North many years ago borrowed from it a million and a half of money for the public service He would move as an amendment that all officers receiving £200 a-year or below that amount should pay two per cent to the retiring allowance fund, and all officers having over that amount should pay, say four per cent (Laughter from Mr Glyde) In spite of the laugh of the hon member for East Torrens, this amendment would be an improvement on that of that hon member, inasmuch as it would not entail an additional staff of medical men, and constant fees for the examination of officers entering the service He found too that under this Bill a considerable branch of the Government service would be excluded, which until recently would have come under its provisions He alluded to the Trinity Board, several of whose officers had been many years in the public service He thought there would be no difficulty in placing these officers on the same footing as other persons in the public service

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would oppose the amendment, and in doing so would say a few words with respect to the character of the opposition offered to the Bill Objection had been taken to the statement made during the present session of the intentions of the House as to this matter during the last session, but in spite of these objections he contended that the Bill was in accordance with the former intentions of the House He deducted these intentions from the declarations of hon members during the last session and the act of the House Inasmuch as this Bill was almost the same as the one which received the sanction of the House on its second reading, he contended what was then said and done formed a sufficient basis for argument in favor of the measure The Bill originated in the discussion of the Estimates, in reference to the good service pay, last session, when there was a strong feeling manifested in favor of abolishing the good service pay A suggestion was made by an hon member that it might be made the basis of a retiring allowance, and the matter was referred to a Select Committee, and the Committee was of opinion that good service pay should be granted in the case of clerks He denied that any injustice had been done to junior clerks by the arrangement proposed, for if it were not for the introduction of the Bill of last session, the Estimates would have been passed without any good service pay at all The House had affirmed the Estimates in the belief that the Bill would pass The principle of the Bill was to do away with good service pay except in the cases of persons holding no definite appointments, but who were simply clerks, and to substitute for this pay, retiring allowances There was no intention of going into elaborate calculations and saying such a person is entitled to so much and such another to so much more, but merely to substitute retiring allowances for good service pay The amendment would destroy this principle Did hon members remark how eagerly all those who opposed the Bill adopted the amendment by way as it were of improving the measure, and bearing this in mind, he asked the hon member (Mr Glyde) to consider whether he had not mistaken the character of the Bill One hon member (Mr Reynolds), who he regretted was not now in his place, had said that the good services of all officers were worth £10 each, and assuming that estimate to be absurd, how could the hon member support the amendment which left that principle as it was Hon members might often judge of the motives of individuals by contrasting their arguments and their votes There was no reason why the hon member (Mr Reynolds) should support the amendment, inasmuch as it did not affect any objectionable principle of the Bill, but he did so, believing that it would be the destruction of a Bill to which he was opposed He was sorry the hon member who sat on that (the Government) side of the House did not employ some of his time and ability in improving the measure instead of waiting until he was on the opposite side and then opposing it He should be sorry that an hon member should be compelled under different circumstances to support a measure which he had previously supported, but in such circumstances the tone and language of his opposition would be very different from that which had been adopted on this occasion As to the money derived from the good service pay being inadequate for the purposes of the Bill, unless ill-health visited the public officers to such an extent as was never known there or indeed in any part of the world, he believed it would be impossible to show how the fund could be exhausted But if the provision which the Government intended to make was inadequate, why was it to be diminished by one-half?

Mr BURFORD said that his feeling was that the title of the Bill should be altered He regarded it as a Bill for "gulling" the public—(laughter)—and sacrificing the junior for the senior officers It was evidently a Bill emanating from persons favorably inclined to the old hands It had been shown that it would bear hardly on the junior officers, and there had been a petition presented from 75 clerks

The CHAIRMAN stated that there had been no petition presented to the House on the subject (Laughter)

Mr BURFORD continued—He understood there had been an expression of opinion from a large majority of the Government clerks, showing their disapproval of the measure, and their desire that it should not pass If this was the judgment of the junior officers themselves, he asked whether it would not be gross presumption in the House to legislate for them against their own interests, minds, and wills The Bill was an ingenious contrivance, whereby to gull the public When they spoke of engagements in any other establishment than one under Government, the thing was easily understood, but under Government, there was some mystery about it They should tear this veil away, and have no shifts or contrivances to entice young men into the Government service It was said the question must be grappled with——

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member was going into the principle of the Bill, and not addressing himself to the clause before the Committee

Mr BURFORD said that the clause dealt with the money, and the mode of its appropriation

The CHAIRMAN said the clause did not relate to the appropriation of the money

Mr BURFORD found it difficult to separate the appropriation of the money from the question before the House He would ask why this question must be grappled with? Was it because the Government had introduced this fictitious mode of rewarding the services of persons in their employment? There was no necessity for grappling with the question, and his conclusion was that they would do best by not grappling with it in any other way than by throwing it under the table If he was a Government officer he should feel humbled and disgraced by the remarks which had been made as to their position, and what they were likely to do or not likely to do, or what they were capable of doing or not capable of doing The Government officers had been most mercilessly treated It was said by one hon member that they were not capable of taking care of themselves, and that, therefore, the House must take care of them, that they had so little providence or forethought, that the House should say to them, "Poor fellows, you are so little acquainted with this wicked world, and the character of its temptations, that we must take care of your money for you" (Laughter) This was not a payment for services rendered, but would be taken from the public revenue, and put aside to the tune of some thousands by way of a donation to make things comfortable for those poor fellows when the got into a crippled condition If the House suffered this Bill to pass, they would deserve the epithet of being soft (Laughter) He would say that the public would call them a soft lot—(laughter)—if they allowed the Bill to pass

The TREASURER would call attention to the object of that particular clause There could be no doubt if that clause were negatived it would be fatal to the Bill, because the Bill provided a substitute for the Superannuation Bill which now existed, and was unworkable The hon member for East Torrens had proposed an amendment to the clause which, if carried, would really upset the Bill altogether His argument was, that there would be a great outlay of funds—that the amount proposed by the Government was not sufficient and in the face of that he introduced an amendment which would render the fund smaller still After the last Bill for providing retiring allowances had passed the House, it was found that the fund was not sufficient The House ought, therefore, to be very careful to provide sufficient funds, otherwise they would be drawn into the same vortex as that from which they wished to escape and which would involve also all the officers in the public service who were classified Under the Bill before the House it was intended to make the system of retirement compulsory in every office in the service, and he considered the fund created by that Bill sufficient He thought the old Treasurer must have been joking, when he said £10,000 would be found sufficient It was possible that such a contingency might arise that a balance over and above the requirements of the service might be in hand Into that question he need not enter, but the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), in estimating the contributions of an officer under 20 years of age, made it £1 260, and the utmost pension he would receive £117 per year He (the Treasurer) could not arrive at that conclusion, for if an officer contributed 30 years, the maximum contributed could only be £35 per annum Supposing him to be such a donkey as not to rise above the lowest classification, his contribution would be about £1,050, and as to the pension he could not suppose a clerk would remain thirty years in the public service at £120 a year, and supposing he never got above the highest in his classification, he would enjoy a salary of £280 a year, and £35 more good service pay, or a salary of £315 a year, and his pension would be £236, which differed materially from £117 per year That put him in a much more favorable position than he would have been in by subscribing to an insurance office

Mr Townsend hoped the Government would withdraw the clause until the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens was committed Not having been in the House during the former debate he did not clutch at the amendment in order to get rid of the Bill, but he wished for more information on the subject, and he therefore wished the Government to postpone the clause in order that due consideration might be given to it With regard to the remark of the hon Attorney-General, that it was strange that the hon member for Sturt could forget the course he took on that Bill when before the House last session, he (Mr Townsend) had been surprised to find that in one session a person could vote in favor of free distillation, and in another against it

The Chairman begged the hon member not to allude to what took place this session

Mr Townsend claimed the right to reply to the remarks of the hon Attorney General He considered it a lamentable fact that members of the Government could change the views they had formerly expressed when they took their seats on that side of the House He did not hesitate to say that now that photographic pictures could be taken, some artist would record the different aspects which members assumed when sitting in opposition to, and on the Government benches He wished the Government to postpone the clause

Mr Strangways wished the clause to be postponed, in order that the Government might give more information than the House had at present When the Act of last session was passed, the Treasurer was Colonial Secretary, and if he could be guilty of a blunder then, he could be guilty of a blunder now The only way to convince the House that the funds would be sufficient, would be by getting some one to compute the amounts to be paid during the next five years, and the amount likely to be drawn from the fund, and by setting the amounts one against another, hon members would have an opportunity of considering the probability of the amounts being sufficient He did not like the principle of superannuation being considered good-service pay If clerks were entitled to good-service pay, let them have it irrespective of the superannuation fund He thought the Government might find some person who could tell them the amount of superannuation paid to officers in the Civil Service in India The East India Company's plan had worked well, and the funds were rapidly increasing, and it would be better to adopt their principle Some one had said that the payments during the next eight years would be £60,000, The sum on the Estimates was £1,540 for an amount of £3,000 a year That would not be sufficient for the claims within the next twelve months, for there were persons in the Government service who would be entitled to retire, the most of them at one half of their salary, and the total amount of their pensions would be between three and four thousand pounds a year, which would have to be added to the pensions already existing, so that the total would be £5,000 a year, and the accumulations only £3,000 He hoped he should not be considered out of order in referring to a subsequent clause relating to the expenditure of that fund In clause 6——

The Chairman thought the hon member would be out of order On the second reading of the Bill the whole principle was discussed, and therefore hon members should confine themselves to the objects and scope of the clause under consideration

Mr Strangways would only say that if he had an opportunity he should move that it be reconsidered He hoped the Government would consent to the postponement of the clause under consideration, and give such data as would enable hon members to form a conclusion as to whether the fund proposed would be sufficient or not

Mr Barrow said—It was no doubt a good rule to require hon members to confine their remarks to the particular clause of a Bill before the House, but it was impossible strictly and literally to adhere to that rule, for one clause depended sometimes so absolutely upon another, that an alteration in one necessarily involved the consideration of the effect it would have upon all the rest For instance, he intended to move an amendment on the 7th clause, and to propose a maximum of £350 a year in it It was therefore necessary to allude to that in order that hon members might take it into consideration in voting for or against the amendment in the 4th clause He was glad that the term "good-service pay" was used instead of "pension," for he was desirous to exclude the word pension altogether from the requirements of the civil service In voting the clause affirming good service pay it was necessary not only to understand what the following clauses proposed to do with that pay, but even to consider the effect which their vote would prospectively have upon the Estimates then lying on the table He (Mr Barrow) would distinctly assert, that if a Retirement Fund was not to be created out of the good service pay, he would not vote one shilling of such pay when the Estimates came on (Hear, hear, from the Attorney-General) So far as related to the different sets of figures submitted to the House, those by the hon member (Mr Glyde) might possibly be preferable to those of the Government, but as the House did not know that to be the case, they could not come to a correct conclusion without entering into calculations, and checking the reckonings of that hon gentleman He believed that the Government had availed themselves of the record of the labors of the Select Committee which had investigated the subject, and before whom a competent actuary was examined The House had, therefore a right to assume that those figures were the result of close calculation, and it was impossible to attach the same confidence to figures arrived at on the spur of the moment, as to those which had been the subject of close investigation He thought therefore that sufficient time should be given for members to satisfy themselves on this point, and he hoped that no attempt would be made to force the amendment through the House that evening The 4th clause related to the raising of a fund, the 7th to the expenditure of it, but though the 7th was not then before them, it was really necessary to know how much money was wanted—(hear)—as well as how it was to be obtained, and if they might consider, first how much was needed, and then how they were to get it, the proper course to be taken would be to make the 7th clause the 4th, and the 4th clause the 7th He believed that by providing a retiring allowance in this manner for decayed Government officers, instead of taking money out of people's pockets, it would put money into them—(hear)—as it would prevent the necessity of retaining incapable men in office, because they could not, for humanity's sake, turn them adrift in old age He wished that the public should have a good day's work for a good day's pay It was desirable therefore to average for the retirement of officers who were no longer able to discharge their duties The hon member (Mr Burford) had said it was presumptuous of the House to meddle with the arrangements of officers in the civil service, he (Mr Barrow) could not see why it was so He thought it right of that House to take measures for avoiding the public inconvenience and loss which would result from retaining in the service those officers whom, although incapacitated for duty, humanity would not allow them to dismiss He hoped therefore, sufficient time would be allowed by the Government for members to consider that clause in the Bill, and to ascertain whether the proposition of the Government or the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens, was the better

The amendment was then put and negatived

Mr Strangways moved that the House resume, and the Chairman report progress

The motion was negatived

The question was put that the clause stand as printed

Mr Glyde did not wish to defeat the Bill His object was to improve it It had been asserted that in the arrangement he proposed the provision would be considerably less than in that proposed by the Government

The Chairman asked whether the hon member was speaking to the amendment or the clause

Mr Glyde was speaking to the clause, and submitted he was in order

The Chairman said the hon member was referring again and again to an amendment that had been negatived

Mr Glyde submitted he was perfectly in order The question had been put that the clause stand as printed, and he was giving reasons why it should not do so He could not understand how the Attorney-General could think that the clerks would be satisfied by the clause as printed Under his arrangement a young man at 25 years of age would receive, after he had been five years in the service, 10*l* per annum, out of which 2*l* 10s would be taken to provide a retiring fund, and he thought that better than being mulcted in favor of the senior members He hoped the Government would not press the clause to a division, as perhaps the amendment might be amended or other arrangements made, and if the clause were pressed to a division he would oppose it

Mr Peake wished the consideration of the clause to be postponed He did not think the Attorney-General had any right to attribute factious motives to hon members who opposed the Bill He considered that what he had formerly called a pension list should be called an insurance list (Laughter) He had hoped that the Government would have proved that £10 000 would be a sufficient sum to carry out the object of the Bill, but he had heard nothing of the kind He denied the doctrine contained in the Bill which ignored the usual calculations of the relative value of lives, and substituted the schedule in lieu of it The schedule ought to have been submitted to an actuary (Hear) The Government were departing from the ordinary rules of insurance offices, and establishing a principle never tried It therefore required much caution before the House adopted the system He hoped the clause would be postponed

The Attorney General said the Government would not oppose the recommittal of the Bill, in order to consider the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens, but could not consent to the postponement of the clause The calculations in which the figures on the clause were based were not undertaken by the Government, but by a body appointed by that House, and the House had twice sanctioned the scheme of that Committee by twice sanctioning the second reading of the Bill The only motive he attributed to the hon member for Burra and Clare was the motive of throwing out the Bill, he having on a prior occasion protested against it and voted against the second reading He considered him sincere in his opposition, and did not think he was wrong in attributing to him a desire to destroy the Bill, but he feared the support of hon members, (whose object was not improvement but destruction), to alterations in the Bill (Hear, hear)

Mr Reynolds, in self defence, must make some remarks He had been charged with inconsistency The Bill of last year, he was told had had his support. As being based on the recommendation of the Committee the Government were bound to bring in this Bill, and were always ready to bow to that House. So that if he had been inconsistent the Attorney-General had been ten times more so.

The clause then passed.

On clause 5 being put,

Mr GLYDE moved an amendment on line 45, to the effect that £10 be struck out, and all the words in the fifth line of the third page. That was carrying out his idea of classification, as regarded age. It appeared to him absurd that if good-service pay were taken into consideration they should stop at the end of seven years, and four years, in some cases. He thought that if members remained in the service 20 years, their good-service pay should be allowed to accumulate.

Mr STRANGWAYS asked what sum was to be added to the salary of public officers at first. The clause was only to increase at the rate of £10 per annum.

Mr GLYDE asked if it was intended that the Judges should be included in the operations of the fund. He thought by the clause it might include the Governor himself.

The TREASURER believed that the Judges and parties mentioned by the hon member for East Torrens were not included in the operations of the Bill. As to the amount of good-service pay, the intention of the Bill was to settle it at £10 a year to be paid into the Treasury by every officer after three years' service, half of that amount only to be given to himself as pay, and the other half to form a superannuation fund.

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Attorney-General whether the Judges would be included in the operations of that Bill. They were not excluded, and it was to include all officers except responsible Ministers.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, according to the phraseology of the Bill, whether the Judges might or might not be brought under it he could not say, but the intention of the Act was that they should not. Their salaries were already fixed by an Act of the Legislature, which had received the assent of Her Majesty. Over their salaries the Legislature had no control except for the purpose of increasing them. There was a sufficient reason for their not coming under that Bill because they stood apart from all other persons in the public service. So long as they lived they could not be removed from their office, except by Her Majesty on an address from both Houses of the Legislature. And even were that address presented for their removal on account of age or sickness, Her Majesty would not dismiss them without special provision being made for them, and therefore it was not likely they would attempt to avail themselves of the provisions of that Bill. He believed they did not come within the scope for the Legislature, but fixed their salaries absolutely by the 13th, and 14th Victoria, which prevented any alteration being made.

Mr BAGOT thought that the argument of the Attorney-General was the strongest reason why the Judges should be included in the Bill, because as the House had no power to compel them to retire without an address from both Houses, there should be some means of giving them a retiring allowance when they passed that age that the good of the country rendered their retirement necessary. At home great inconvenience arose from gentlemen holding on to office in order to gain a certain amount of pension. He hoped therefore the clause would not be altered.

Mr BARROW said the argument of the Attorney-General would include not only the Judges, but the Under Secretary, the Auditor-General, and the Crown Solicitor. It would be well for the House to know what officers on the Civil list were included, in order that the House might know what claims for superannuation might be made, for on the scale laid down by the Bill, very large retiring allowances might be claimed by the superior officers of the Government. The clauses were so mixed up that it was necessary to refer to them prospectively unless clause after clause was recommitted in order to reconcile previous clauses with amendments which it was intended to move on subsequent ones. If it were stated that officers on the civil list were not eligible to be included in the operations of the Bill, it would avoid a difficulty, but it would not remove all difficulty. For instance, some future Registrar-General might claim six eighths of £1,000 a year, which would be much more than he (Mr Barrow) would be inclined to vote. The object of the Bill was not to place superannuated officers in luxury, but to provide for them moderately, and relieve the Government from the necessity of dismissing them. While an officer might retire with credit on £350 a year, and while the House might grant that sum, it was very different from granting a pension of double the amount.

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the clause itself was a sufficient answer to the questions put. No one could imagine the Attorney-General would have included in the Bill an unnecessary clause, therefore, the exception would be totally unnecessary. He, however, should imagine that all persons in the service of the Crown not excepted by that clause would be entitled to pensions. He thought it quite clear from that clause that it was optional on the part of the Government to place on the Estimates any sum they chose for the first year, as good-service pay, and as it was the intention of the Bill that the advance for the first year should be ten pounds, he would move that that sum of ten pounds be inserted. To remove also the objections that still existed as to its being probable under that clause that the Judges of the Supreme Court and His Excellency the Governor might be entitled to pensions, in the event of sufficiently long service, and as it was not intended to include them under its provisions, he would move that His Excellency the Governor and his successors in office, and the Judges of the Supreme Court should not be allowed to claim retiring pensions under the provisions of the Bill.

The TREASURER suggested, before the amendment was put that the Judges should be excluded. He had no objection whatever to the insertion of words which would have that effect. He would, therefore, suggest that, after the Ministers of the Crown, the words "or Judges of the Supreme Court" should be inserted.

Mr NEALES would prefer the clause remaining as it was, and when they came to the clause as to the amount, they could regulate the matter then. A case might occur in which a Judge might be very much disposed to retire upon a pension of £500 a year, and, under the circumstances, it occurred to him that it would be far better to let the clause under discussion remain as it was, making the necessary provision in a future clause.

Mr STRANGWAYS was not altogether clear that it would not be advantageous to the public service that the Judges should not be excluded. He wished the Government to state what were their views or wishes upon the point, if they had any. He suspected that the Government wanted to carry the Bill as it was, and then to put their own construction upon it afterwards. No doubt when the Bill had been passed it would be found that the Government had committed a great blunder as before. If the Attorney-General thought it desirable to include the Judges, he should be happy to consider the point. In all other parts of the world Judges after serving a certain time were entitled to pensions, the length of service varying accordingly to the country in which they served. He could not see why an officer connected with one department should be excluded from benefits in which the officers of another department participated. As the clause stood all but responsible Ministers of the Crown were entitled to pensions. It might be highly advantageous to the public service that a Judge should under certain circumstances receive a pension, and it would be for the House to consider whether it was desirable that Judges should be brought under the operations of this Act or that their claims should be separately considered.

Captain HART should support the view of the Treasurer that the Judges should be excluded. It was an omission if they were not by their position already excluded. He should oppose the proposition of the hon. member for East Torrens, because to make an amendment to tally with an amendment which had been lost would be a silly thing. There would be no difficulty, however, in recommitting this clause, if it were found necessary to make it tally with any amendment which had been proposed. On looking at this clause, the fallacy of the argument previously used in reference to injustice to junior members was shewn, as the good service pay of a junior officer might amount to £70 a year, whilst with no other class could it amount to more than £40.

The clause was passed with the various amendments which had been proposed.

Clause 6 provided how officers should be placed upon the retired list, and was as follows:—

"Any officer, clerk, or other person as aforesaid, desiring to avail himself of the retiring allowance hereinafter provided, shall notify such desire in writing, addressed to the Chief Secretary, accompanied (if such officer shall not have attained the age of 60 years) by a certificate, signed by a medical practitioner, and by the head of the department in which he shall be then serving, that, by reason of permanent bad health, or other infirmity, he is no longer capable of performing his duties, and the Chief Secretary, if satisfied as to the allegations contained in such certificate, if any, as aforesaid, shall thereupon direct such officer, clerk, or other person to be placed on the retired list."

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed to strike out "60 years" and to insert the words "If he has not served 20 years." If a young man entered the service at 20 years of age, he must, as the clause stood at present serve 40 years before he would be entitled to retire, whereas if he did not enter till he was 40 years, he would only have to serve half the time, that is, the latter would gain the same advantages by a service of 20 years that the former gained by a service of 40 years. He saw no justice in such an arrangement, and certainly no advantage to the public service. It was frequently desirable to have fresh blood in the public service, and therefore he thought a service of 20 years quite long enough. Both the public service and the public would be benefitted by it. In India men who served 20 years received a certain pension, but if they served 25 or 30 years they received so much more, and sometimes the full amount of their salaries was given to them. He was not wedded to 20 years, but thought some time should be specified.

Captain HART could not understand the motion of the hon. member for Encounter Bay. If the hon member looked at the schedule he would find that an officer after 20 years' service would receive half salary, but if he served 30 years he would receive six-eighths. The hon member had endeavored to make it appear that an officer entering the service at a late period of life received the same advantage after a service of 20 years that a younger man entering the service received at the expiration of forty years, but this was not the case. If the hon. member wished to carry out the views which he apparently entertained, he should have moved that after a service of 40 years the officer should receive his whole salary. He had no objection to the proposition, feeling satisfied that there were very few men who would enter the service at 20 years of age, and remain there till they were 60. A long time must elapse before such a contingency could happen. It certainly would not be in the time of hon. members of that House.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought there was some force in the first part of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Encounter Bay. Was it fair that a person should enter the Government service at 50 years of age, and after a service of 10 years be allowed to retire. It was true that he would then receive little more than a half what he would receive if he remained for a longer period, so that there would be little inducement for a person to retire at 60 years of age unless he had served for a longer period than 10 years. Still it was a question for the House to consider whether, in the event of an officer being in good health, he should be able to retire at 60 years of age. The House should guard against the adoption of any course such as that which destroyed the former measure, and consider whether it was desirable that parties in the full possession of health and faculties should be entitled to retire. He did not think the House had any right to agree to such a proposition. That House had a duty cast upon it to provide the means of support to those who were incapacitated from performing their duties, and, having served the Government so long a time, had a just expectation of being able to retire, but he did not think they were justified in making provision for parties who were in the prime of life. The only way which occurred to him of meeting the views of the hon. member for Encounter Bay was to introduce both the 60 years and the 20 years' service, but he must confess he felt disposed to support the clause in its present form.

Mr STRANGWAYS found, upon consulting the schedule, that a party entering the service at 30 years of age would be placed in the same position as one entering the service at 20 years of age. What he wished the House to decide was whether the right to retire, or the amount of pension received should depend upon old age or length of service.

Mr HAY thought there was a good deal of inconsistency in the opposition which was shown. It had been repeatedly stated during the discussion that this Bill was only intended to apply to those who were incapacitated from performing their duties, yet the hon. member for Encounter Bay now came forward and wanted to give pensions for length of service only. He should oppose any such proposition, thinking that provision should merely be made for those who were incapacitated from performing their duties. He should have no objection if the age at which parties could retire were 65 instead of 60 years, and would move an amendment to that effect.

The amendments were lost, and the clause as printed carried.

Clause 7 was as follows:—

"The Treasurer shall periodically, at such times as the Governor may appoint for that purpose, pay to every officer, clerk, or other person, whose name shall appear on such retired list, such sums as he may be entitled to receive in accordance with the schedule to this Act annexed."

Mr BARROW moved, as an addition to the clause, "provided that no sum thus paid shall exceed in amount one-half of the salary the retiring officer had been receiving, the same to be computed on an average of three years preceding his retirement, nor shall exceed the maximum amount of £350."

The TREASURER hoped the hon. member would not persist in the amendment. The hon. member seemed to have an impression upon his mind, to which indeed he had given expression, that the House were only bound to keep retiring officers above the pressure of want. The pressure of want, as applied to different classes, however, was very different. The pressure of want might in many cases be amply met by the proposition contained in the amendment in the case of a single man, but not in the case of parties who had held high positions, and who had large families. The sphere of such parties, and their social position, would be completely lowered by the acceptance of a pension of this kind. He believed that the proposition if carried out would tend to materially damage the public service, as the moment a party found that he had attained a position by which he could claim the maximum pension of £350, he would leave the public service, although he might be still qualified to be highly useful in it.

Mr NEALES hoped the Treasurer would submit to the proposition of the hon. member (Mr Barrow), or to something like it, for he was quite certain that at least two thirds of the House were prepared to support the proposition. If the hon. member would assent to alter the amount from £350 to £400, he was quite satisfied the proposition would be carried by a large majority. The argument of the hon. the Treasurer would not hold water, the clause which had been previously passed, having effectually prevented parties from retiring when they were not incapacitated or had not served the requisite time. Unless parties got a false certificate as to the state of their health, no such contingency as that referred to by the Treasurer could arise. He believed there were very few even amongst those who had enjoyed incomes of £3,000 or £4,000 a year, who under the pressure of old age or ill health would not consider £400 a year a very ample allowance. Let hon. members consult some of the shopkeepers and auctioneers, and see how glad many of them would be to retire to a cheap country, if they could only get £100 a quarter.

Mr BARROW had no objection, if it were the wish of the House, to alter the amount to £400. He had been requested to make the amount £300, at which rate he knew that he should have had some support, but still he had no objection to increase the amount to £400. He had proposed £350, thinking that amount a very ample one, and could not see why the Treasurer should consider it so small when by the Constitution Act the pensions varied from £425 down to £250, at which latter rate no doubt the late Commissioner of Crown Lands was living happily enough. (Mr Neales—"He could live for half.") Here, then, was a constitutional standard. (A laugh.) When he spoke of the retiring allowances being sufficient to keep parties beyond the pressure of want, he spoke loosely, but he remembered that when he spoke of want he also spoke of luxury, and had said that it was not the intention of the House to provide means for retired Government officers to live in luxury, but merely to give them such a pension as would relieve them from embarrassment and want. He had introduced in the amendment not only a maximum amount, but a provision to preclude Government officers from receiving more than half the amount of their salary, such salary to be computed from an average of three years preceeding their retirement. If the maximum rate only were fixed, it might happen that an officer receiving a much less salary might attain the same pension as another. In order not only to have a maximum rate but a graduated one, he had worded his amendment in the particular manner which he had. If it were the wish of the House he would alter the maximum amount to £400.

Mr STRANGWAYS should support the £350 as originally proposed by the hon. member, Mr Barrow. The Government he presumed would support one or the other proposition, as it was quite clear they were not disposed to place themselves in a minority. By limiting the amount to £350 he did not deem it probable that parties in receipt perhaps of £1,500 a-year would desire to avail themselves of so small a pension unless there were good grounds for so doing. Notwithstanding the alterations which had been made in some of the clauses, he believed that a Judge might come in under the 7th clause.

Capt HART remarked that they would do away with the spirit of the Act if the schedule were interfered with, and he should oppose any proposition to do so.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if the hon. member, Mr Barrow, would fix the amount at £400 he should have no objection to it, but he must object to the proposition that, however long the service of an individual might have been, that, after a period of 20 years no additional continuance in office should entitle him to any additional retiring-allowance. He hoped the hon. member would strike out the portion of the amendment having reference to half salary. It would be unwise in principle to say that a person continuing to serve, after a period of 20 years, should not receive any additional retiring allowance.

Mr BARROW said that the portion of the amendment alluded to by the Attorney-General was no portion of his original suggestion, but he adopted it upon the suggestion of some hon. members, and the adverse wishes of others in reference to it, would justify him in withdrawing it. In reference to the maximum amount, however, he should, if necessary, divide the House.

Mr HAY remarked that an officer receiving a salary of £525 and another receiving £1,000 per annum would, if the amendment were carried, be placed upon the same footing. He thought this was inconsistent.

Mr BURFORD should vote for the amendment of the hon. member, Mr Barrow, the odd £50 were of no consequence. (Laughter.) He thought it would have been well if the hon. member could have carried the other part of his amendment too, for it was their duty, he considered, to modify the extreme extravagance connected with this measure. He was very glad, indeed, that the amendment had been moved. The hon. member for Gumeracha complained of inequality, but he contended there was great equality, for no matter what the officers had been receiving when they were incapacitated, they were both placed upon the shelf, and should he thought receive the same amount. There would be equality with all when they got into their six feet by two, but till they did, he thought £400 a-year, payable quarterly, a very comfortable allowance.

Mr BARROW having consented to abandon the former portion of his amendment, it was negatived, and the latter portion, fixing the maximum rate at £400, was carried.

Clause 8, provided that officers dismissed or resigning should forfeit all claim to the fund.

Mr GLYDE wished to insert a provision to the effect that parties leaving the colony unless from ill-health should forfeit their allowances. Absenteeism was the curse of this colony, and if these parties after obtaining pensions left the colony there could be no doubt it would be most injurious. He would therefore move as an amendment that parties leaving the colony for more than a year unless, under a medical certificate should forfeit their allowances.

Mr. NEALES thought this proviso would really amount to nothing, as certificates could be so readily obtained.

Mr. BARROW thought the clause had better stand as it was. It was quite refreshing to find the hon. member (Mr. Glyde) protesting against absenteeism. Seeing that the hon. member was so extensively interested in that question, he would no doubt some day cordially support a proposition for an absentee tax.

Mr. BLAKE thought the hon. member (Mr. Glyde) might safely allow the clause to pass as printed, and before long the House would no doubt find a mode of meeting the hon. member's views in reference to absentees.

The clause was passed as printed.

Clause 9 merely provided how retiring allowances were to be computed.

Mr. HAY asked if a person left the Government service, and after an absence of three or four years returned to it, from what period would his services be computed? Would they be computed from the date at which he first entered the Government service?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL imagined not. The party having left the Government service forfeited all claim.

Mr. GLYDE, in order to make this perfectly clear, suggested the insertion of the word "consecutively."

Captain HART was afraid if this were introduced that the clause would not only have prospective but retrospective effect. It was not right, he thought, that parties should be prejudicially affected because they had been out of the Government service some little time. He knew several officers who were in that position. The Judge of the Insolvent Court had been in and out several times, and there were several others who, he thought, should not be debarred from the benefits of this Act merely because they had been out of the public service for a short time. He had no objection whatever to give the clause prospective effect.

Mr. BARROW suggested the introduction of a provision by which only officers who left without leave of absence would be affected.

Mr. GLYDE would not press his amendment. He wished it, however, to be distinctly understood from what date service would count.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that circumstances might arise, as they had arisen in the colony, which would render it absolutely necessary that a number of public servants should be dispensed with, not because they had been guilty of any misconduct, but because the revenue was insufficient to keep up the various establishments, and it was very possible, as had been the case, that a short time afterwards these parties might be taken on again; and he would ask, would it be fair because they had been discharged for a short time that they should lose the benefit of their previous services. The Government were unable at the period to which he had referred to keep on these persons in consequence of misfortunes in which every person in the colony shared. He thought parties should have the advantages of their services unless they voluntarily resigned, or were discharged from incapacity. In the case of one officer who had been prominently alluded to, the first Governor of the colony suspended him, but the Commissioners directed Governor Gawler to re-instate him. Governor Gawler did not carry out these instructions, but appointed some other person. Still he thought that in such a case the party should have the benefit of the services which he had actually rendered.

Mr. STRANGWAYS suggested that there was another class of cases in which it would be extremely hard to deprive parties of the advantages of past services. He alluded to cases in which offices were abolished by that House, refusing to vote the salaries. He should like to ask whether, when an officer left the service in consequence of the House refusing to vote his salary, it was intended to repay him his contributions to this fund, or to give him an equivalent?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said such cases would be equitably dealt with.

Mr. GLYDE withdrew his amendment, and the clause was passed as printed.

Clause 10, providing that deductions under No. 21, of 1854, should be repaid with interest, was passed as printed.

Upon clause 11, providing for the payment of existing allowances, being proposed,

Mr. MILNE said he had an amendment to propose of the same character as that which was introduced last session. The clause, as it at present stood, would enable those parties to whom pensions had been granted to claim them for their natural lives; but they had really no reason to expect that this should be the case, for in 1856, when it was quite evident that the amount which had been voted would not be sufficient to pay pensions for life, a number of gentlemen very hastily retired and saddled the country with pensions. These gentlemen thought that, though £10,000 would not be sufficient to pay the pensions for life, they would still have a good claim upon the Government. He was sorry that the House had been placed in this awkward position, but what he proposed was, under the circumstances, to compromise the matter. Last year it had been proposed that with the exception of the pensions granted to Messrs. Thos. Lipson and Thos. Gilbert, these pensions should be paid for a period of four years; but he now proposed that a sum equivalent to six years' allowance be given to the parties, and that the pension list be thus got rid of altogether.

Mr. STRANGWAYS hoped the House would not agree to so iniquitous a suggestion as to repudiate the just claims upon them. Why, he would ask, should persons retiring under the Act of 1854 be placed in a worse position than those who would probably retire within six months of this Bill being passed? He believed that in the course of six months a pension list of between £3,000 and £4,000 per annum would be established under this very Bill. He hoped the House would not sanction repudiation, otherwise he should recommend parties who were in a position to retire to do so at once, in order that they might get as much as possible out of the House before it repudiated the claims under the Bill which they were engaged in discussing. The only argument he had ever heard in support of the proposition which had been made by the hon. member (Mr. Milne) was, that the parties who retired must have known that the Bill was a gross piece of folly.

Mr. TOWNSEND should support the amendment. Many of the parties who retired under the Act of 1854, were in their full vigour, and it was quite clear that if the 10,000*l*. had been left to work itself out, it would have done so in a few years, and the parties would then have been placed precisely in the same position in which it was now proposed to place them. The parties in fact found there was a loophole in the Act, and took advantage of it to leave the public service.

Mr. BURFORD said his feelings were precisely in accordance with those which had been expressed by the last speaker; the similarity was indeed wondrous. He should support the amendment, but would not have it said that he had been guilty of repudiation. There was no repudiation, but it "sarved 'em right."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he had been one of a Committee who recommended that an Act should be framed in accordance with the amendment which had been proposed. The Government introduced that measure upon the recommendation of the Committee, but when the clause was under discussion there was an unmistakeable expression of opinion against it on both sides of the House. The opinion was to the effect that the Legislature were bound to respect the claims of those who had retired upon the faith of an Act of the Legislature, based upon a calculation made by the Legislature. In consequence of the very preponderating opinion against the Bill, and in accordance with what he believed to be the feeling of the House, the Government prepared the present Bill. He hoped the House would allow the clause to pass as it at present stood, and not say that the parties who took advantage of the Act of 1856 should be left to the consequences of an error of the Legislature.

Mr. GLYDE presumed that an account had been kept of all sums placed to the credit of this fund, and of all sums paid out on account of it. Supposing the present clause were passed as it stood, he wished to know whether, when the Treasurer found that the sum paid out exceeded the amount paid in by £10,000, he would feel bound to pay any more.

The TREASURER said he should clearly be justified, under the 4th clause of the present Bill, in continuing the payment.

Mr. MILNE said the hon. member Mr. Strangways had asked the House not to repudiate just claims, but he had failed to shew that these parties had any just claims. If the Act under which these parties retired had been kept in existence, they would actually not have been so well off as he now proposed to make them. The hon. member had asked why place parties who retired under the present Bill in a better position than those who retired under the previous one, but no such effect would be produced, as under the Bill under discussion parties could not retire except from old age or ill health, whereas the parties who retired under the old Act were in their full vigor.

Mr. HAY said that if the proposition had been to divide the balance of the £10,000 amongst the parties, he should have supported it, but it appeared to him scarcely worth while to support a proposition to give them six years pension. It was, however, most unfair that the revenue should be burdened on account of these parties with a larger sum than £10,000.

The TREASURER pointed out that by the proposed amendment a distinction was drawn in favor of some officers to the exclusion of others. If the principle were good it should apply to all. All should be included in the same category. He would also point out that a different position obtained this year from last, as the greater portion of the fund had been absorbed by repayments to the contributors.

Mr. BURFORD said the question had been fully gone into last session, and there were good grounds for excepting the two gentlemen referred to in the amendment.

The amendment was lost, and the clause having been passed as printed, upon the motion of Mr. Strangways, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following day.

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE BILL.

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the second reading of the Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

The House adjourned at 20 minutes past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

THE UNEMPLOYED

Mr COLLINSON presented a petition from 167 unemployed laborers at the Port, praying the House to proceed immediately with such public works as had been determined upon The petition was read, and stated that a large number of laborers at the Port were destitute of the actual necessaries of life, and prayed that the spoon-barge might be employed, as this would be productive of great benefit not only to the residents at the Port but to the colony at large The petition also prayed that public works which had been determined upon at the Port and in the city of Adelaide, might be commenced forthwith, so as to enable large numbers of laborers at present unemployed to earn an honest livelihood The petitioners concluded by stating that the large majority of them had been brought out by money voted by that House, and had emigrated upon the assurance that they would obtain plenty of employment upon their arrival here

THE SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

Mr MILNE brought up the report of the Select Committee upon the Smillie Estate Bill The report stated that the Committee considered the preamble proved, and saw no reason for the House to delay the passing of the Bill The report was ordered to be printed, Mr Milne giving notice that on Wednesday next he should move that the Bill be read a second time

THE ABORIGINES

Upon the motion of Mr MILNE, a petition recently presented by him from the Aborigines' Friends Association was read by the Clerk of the House, and the hon member then moved that on Wednesday, Nov 3, he should move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the purpose of considering the expediency of presenting an address to His Excellency the Governor, praying that a sum of £500 might be placed on the Estimates for 1859, for the purposes contemplated by the Aborigines' Friends Association The House was probably aware that this association had been called into existence at a public meeting held in Green's Exchange, at the end of August last It had been felt by a large number of citizens for some time back that the country was not doing its duty in reference to the native population The feeling which he had alluded to was strongly evinced at the meeting at which this association was formed, the room being full to overflowing, and many who were desirous of being present being prevented from gaining admission All classes took part at the meeting, from the representative of royalty downwards They were too much in the habit of taking it for granted that it was impossible to improve the social and moral condition of the natives, and that it would be throwing time and money away to attempt to do so He differed from this view, and indeed the success which had attended some efforts to improve the condition of the aborigines, showed, to a certain extent, that the idea was fallacious Whatever difference of opinion might exist in reference to the adults, he apprehended there could be no difference of opinion as to the advantages which would arise from educating the native children There could be no doubt that the education of the children would advance their position intellectually and morally As a highly civilised nation, there could be no doubt that we were perfectly justified in taking possession of this fine country, seeing that the natives in their rude and degraded state were unable to turn the country to profitable account But there was no doubting that our advent upon the shores of this country had been attended with disastrous results to the natives We had derived vast benefits from coming to this fine country, where the rich soil enabled us to grow the finest grain in the world—where we were enabled to plant our vineyards and orchards, and live in peace and security Nor was this all, for we dug a great deal of mineral wealth from the bowels of the earth All these advantages we had derived, but the fact must not be lost sight of that we had brought disease and misery upon the original possessors of the soil in this colony However degraded in one sense the natives might have been prior to this country having been wrested from them, the House could not help admitting that there was something in the wild and uncontaminated savage to admire His erect carriage and free and unrestrained movement shewed that physically he occupied a high position, but the result of introducing him to civilized life was that they soon found him in a most degraded position, in fact the natives soon acquired all the vices of civilized society without improving by their virtues The position of the natives at the present moment might to a great extent be attributed to the course which had been pursued towards them by the civilized portion of the community, who had adopted certain schemes for the improvement of the aborigines, but because they did not realize all their anticipations, those schemes were abandoned in disgust They were bound to try every possible scheme for the advancement and improvement of the aborigines, no matter what the result might be, as they would then at least have the satisfaction of knowing that they had done their duty It might be said that the moral and spiritual welfare of the natives should be left to private charity, but he contended that this, unlike many other philanthropic movements, came home to every individual in the colony, and they could with great propriety ask funds from the general revenue to carry out the objects of the Association Every week they were alienating lands in the country for ever, and they were bound to look after the interests of the original possessors He would draw the attention of the House to Council Paper No 17, which contained the new commission of His Excellency the Governor, and contained also instructions in reference to the aborigines The 21st paragraph of those instructions stated—"And it is our further will and pleasure that you use your utmost power to promote religion amongst the natives" These instructions emanated from Her Majesty, who had enriched us by the splendid gift of the lands of the colony, and it would be no strained inference to draw the conclusion that a condition of that gift was that the spiritual and physical wants of the native population should be attended to He admitted that the present Government had done their duty so far as attending to the physical wants of the aborigines, but they had no right to stop short in the advantages which they were bound to confer, or attempt to confer He thought that as the Government sold lands they should lay aside from time to time sections for aboriginal reserves These could be let, and in the course of time, yielding a very handsome revenue, it would not be necessary from time to time to come to that House for the purpose of asking for a special vote for the native population The Aborigines' Friends Association proposed, if the money were voted, to erect a native school at Goolwa, in order that the children of the natives might receive a certain amount of education, and being trained to industrial pursuits might ultimately become useful colonists At the same time what could be done to supply the spiritual wants of the adults would, of course, be attended to The association had fixed on the Goolwa as a fitting spot at which to erect the school, because the natives were in the habit of assembling there in great numbers He was happy to say that he did not anticipate any opposition from the Government, and he hoped the House would feel it to be their duty not only to go into Committee upon the subject, but to grant the money which was asked for He found in one of the morning papers a suggestion that there were other parts of the colony to which similar aid might with advantage be extended, and he should be happy to test the feeling of the House as to whether the operations of this Association should be extended to other parts than the Goolwa

Mr ROGERS felt great pleasure in seconding the motion It was clearly the duty not only of that House but of the whole colonists to do the utmost in their power to improve the condition of the native population He quite agreed with the remark that they had all derived great benefits from becoming possessed of the soil of which the natives were dispossessed, and under such circumstances he considered it most praiseworthy not only of the Association who now asked for this grant, but of any of the colonists to endeavor to ameliorate the condition of the aborigines

Mr BURFORD was not opposed to efforts to ameliorate the condition of the aborigines, but still he felt some little difficulty in connection with the subject before the House, inasmuch as he considered there should be a universal application as opposed to the selection of any particular locality It was true that the sum which was asked was small, but the House should remember that they already had officers appointed in connection with the aborigines whose duty, in fact, it was to minister to their necessities to the extent which the liberality of the Government allowed There was no stinting in that direction on the part of the Government, as they were always ready to furnish to the Inspector and Sub-Inspector such assistance as those officers considered necessary It was proposed by the resolution before the House to place the sum asked for under the management of an Association termed "The Aborigines' Friends Association" but he conceived that two organizations should not be permitted to exist to accomplish a single purpose He could not see, if the House sanctioned this vote, how they could consent to retain on the Estimates the items for the Inspector and Sub-Inspector The duties of these officers would, in all probability, clash with the duties of the Association, or if not, their duties with their wishes The probability was, that parties in power, though not by Act of Parliament, would oppose or disagree with the persons recognised as servants by the Government He considered that either the items on the Estimates should be struck out, and all should be handed over to the Association, or else the Government should extend operations through their own immediate officers, and allow any Committee to act voluntarily in furtherance of the measures which the Government pursued He was persuaded that the Association and the officers would not co-operate, it was in the nature of things that disagreement should arise, and inconvenience would follow Under the circumstances he should like further time to be allowed before the question was disposed of, in order that it might be discussed in all its phases and all its consequences traced Desiring that good should be done to the aborigines on a more extended scale, and in all parts of the colony, he begged to move the previous question

Mr Cole supported the motion before the House with much pleasure He felt that in doing so he was merely doing his duty as an Englishman and one who had adopted South Australia as his home He thought the aboriginal population, or the few who remained, demanded serious consideration They were entitled to something more than good wishes, They should have something substantial allotted them He was glad to find that hitherto the aborigines had received consideration, so far as their physical wants were concerned, though at the same time, though in advancing what he was about to, he might be thought a disciple of cant and hypocrisy, he contended that not only their physical but spiritual wants should be attended to It had been argued by some that the race were of that stamp that they could not comprehend religious instruction, but he denied this, as he had had evidence brought before him in more ways than one, to shew that the reverse was the case Twelve or thirteen years ago, whilst coming overland with his family from Portland Bay—a journey which at that time was an affair of some risk—he encountered a large body of natives, the great bulk of whom, he believed, had not seen a white face before At that time he was, unfortunately, without water, and made known his want to his sable brethren, for he must term them brothers, though of a different color They supplied his wants without making any claim for a return, but left him to his own impulse, and he felt pleasure at being enabled to reward them The chief asked him his course, which he pointed out, but perceived that he had to go through a thick forest, which laid before him The chief saw the difficulty and volunteered to escort him alone, and did so for some miles through a gap until then unknown to him, and saw him safely through The act would have been a graceful one on the part of a civilized man, but how much more so upon the part of one of the degraded and ill-used natives of this country Not many weeks since, amongst the poor people, aborigines, receiving aid at Goolwa, was a girl about 12 years of age, who had a sick and aged mother residing at a distance of 9 or 10 miles The girl knew that her mother was dying for want of the comforts which the society at Goolwa were distributing, and lost no time in proceeding to her aged parent, whom she implored to follow her to what she termed the good place, where the good things were being dispensed The mother said she could not go in consequence of physical weakness, and the girl then placed her mother upon her shoulders and carried her to a spot where she received comforts Were they, after witnessing such instances amongst these people, to say that they had not feelings which were susceptible of the best impressions? Would the House say that the race could not be elevated by having religious principles instilled in them? It was then duty as Englishmen, legislators, and brothers, though of a different color, to spare no effort to improve the condition of the aborigines They had taken possession of their lands, they had grown rich upon what they had taken from the aborigines, and the time having arrived when they could render some assistance in return, it would be a disgrace to South Australia if they did not do so In the mother-country they bore a high name for morality and humanity, and let them not tarnish it by denying the aborigines a right to which they were entitled

Mr Peake was sorry that he could not go with the motion, because no one was more desirous than he was of improving the condition of the aborigines as far as possible He was pleased and glad to refer to the legislation which had already taken place in reference to this question The governing power of this colony had from the beginning acknowledged the principle that it was the duty of those who took possession of this colony to succor and protect the aborigines Feeling at the outset this view, he confessed he felt great difficulty in opposing the motion, but still he felt bound to oppose it because he considered it impracticable It was proposed as he understood to expend the £500 in the establishment of a school at Goolwa If there were a comprehensive scheme for the succour and improvement of the aboriginal race, and that scheme appeared practicable, he should be happy to support it, but it was quite clear to him that the sum of £500 would be quite futile to accomplish this If they were bound, as no doubt they were, to give all the protection and succour they could to the aborigines, the House must not lose sight of another obligation, and that was, that the aboriginal race must give their co-operation It would be quite useless for the House to vote money for the instruction of the aborigines, or for the Executive to devise means for their instruction, if there were not cordial co-operation on the part of the aborigines If the aborigines refused to come within the pale of civilised society, and were determined to follow their wild and savage customs, he would ask how was it possible for the civilised community to deal with such a people, as he was sure every member of that House, and every member of the Government, would like to deal with them if they would co-operate with the efforts for their improvement and advancement He felt that the subject was beset with so many difficulties, that it could not be dealt with from any single point, but that it must be left to the Executive to deal with in accordance with the views expressed by the House from time to time If the Executive found it necessary to take any decisive stand in the matter, no doubt they would come down to the House after taking the necessary steps, and the House would indemnify them for what they had done He could not support the hon member for Onkaparinga in selecting a solitary point at which to commence operations, and ask the House to throw away £500 in a visionary scheme He was satisfied that the grant asked for would not effect the object which the hon member had in view Building a school would not feed the hungry or clothe the naked, nor take away that love of perfect and unrestrained freedom which seemed life long in the aboriginal race He was satisfied that the House could not take any action in the matter with a prospect of success, without the co-operation of the aboriginal race.

Mr Strangways seconded the motion for the previous question, though not at all opposed to what he presumed was the object of the Association, namely, to benefit the aborigines He objected, however, to the manner in which it was proposed to benefit them He must oppose the motion upon the same ground that he recently opposed a similar motion in reference to camels (Laughter) Hon members might laugh, but he would show that there was great similarity between the two motions In this instance, the House was asked to cause to be placed upon the Estimates a certain amount without any guarantee that the money would be expended as stated, and in the previous instance the House was asked to grant a sum of money to a Company without any guarantee that it would be devoted to the purposes mentioned He did not mean to compare an aboriginal with a camel (Laughter) He only wished to show that the Association was placed in the same position as the Society, by affording no guarantee of the application of the funds The hon member had gone at great length into the claims of the aborigines, but that really was not the question The question was simply whether the amount should be paid to the Association It appeared to him that the amount would be quite useless, as it would scarcely build a scholroom or provide a teacher Many years ago there was a row of habitations upon the Park Lands erected for the aborigines, and these were considered quite sufficient, although they were such as were usually devoted to the occupancy of pigs From the smallness of the sum, he presumed that the accommodations contemplated by the Association were somewhat similar He feared if the motion were assented to that they would have the Protector of Aborigines pulling one way and the Directors of the Association another

The Commissioner of Crown Lands should support the motion, and thought that hon members and the colonists generally were very much indebted to the philanthropic gentlemen who formed themselves into a Committee for the protection of the aborigines They had taken a great deal of labor and trouble in the matter He should have no hesitation in affording the Association the assistance from the public funds, which they asked for to afford them an opportunity of putting into operation the plans they had formed for the promotion of the welfare of the aborigines The House were aware that a liberal sum was voted every year for the bodily wants of the aborigines, and as the expenditure of that fund came under his supervision, he was enabled to state that so far as their physical wants were concerned, he believed the aborigines fared exceedingly well There were numerous stations throughout the country from which they were supplied with food and clothing It was to be deplored that the efforts of former years on the part of the South Australian Government, having in view the moral cultivation and elevation of these poor people, had not produced those fruits which could have been wished for The school formerly established in Adelaide had been done away with, but the establishment under the charge of Archdeacon Hale had sprung from it, and he believed a great deal of good had been done by it. The Association referred to in the motion was endeavouring to establish on a small scale a school in that quarter of the colony where, more than in any other place, a large number of aborigines were in the habit of locating themselves Knowing the respectability of the Committee, he thought the House could have no hesitation in entrusting the expenditure to them No doubt there were great difficulties in the way of doing good for the aborigines When they considered that in North America, where the natives were very superior in physical conformation and mental ability to those of South Australia, they had nearly vanished from the earth, they could scarcely wonder that the natives of this continent, who, in the scale of humanity, were so much inferior, were rapidly vanishing before the progress of civilized man There were more than ordinary difficulties in attempting to civilize them, and bring them to a better state Still, though they might fail, they had a duty to perform, and he would remind such hon members as were present at the breakfast recently given to the Rev Mr Binney, that gentleman eloquently discussed and explained his experience and enquiries relative to the aborigines All who heard the reverend gentleman must have been convinced of the entire truth of what he said He admitted there were great difficulties, but they had a duty to perform from which they must not shrink

in which they were placed He had been many years in the colonies, and knew numberless instances where not only had education been successfully imparted to children, but a love of Christianity had been implanted too He thought, therefore, such efforts would probably succeed with the young (Hear) Only twenty years ago the inhabitants of New Zealand were cannibals and it was said they were the lowest and most degraded of the human race, but now they had Joint Stock Companies and mills, and they were building ships That was the result of well-directed efforts to civilize them If, as the hon member for Encounter Bay said, no effort was to be made to reclaim them, the next generation would be like the last, and would be no better than their fathers He believed, therefore, it would be an act of justice to make the attempt, and he would support the motion

Mr TOWNSEND regretted to hear it said that it was no use legislating in the matter, unless the natives co operated with the colonists in efforts to reclaim them He thought that instead of such excuses for inaction, the House should give ear to the feelings and promptings of our better nature—should do their duty in endeavouring to reclaim the aborigines, and leave the result to a higher power He was not aware whether or not it was possible to elevate them, but considered it a duty to make the attempt The motion before the House was to vote £500 to be placed in the hands of a Committee of the Association, composed of members of the religious bodies in the colony, and of merchants of high standing, who were willing to give their time to the work He should support the motion, which he considered reflected honor on the mover

Mr MACDERMOTT felt bound to support the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga It would be in the recollection of the House that £1,500 was formerly voted for Poonindie, of which sum £500 was withdrawn He thought that £500 might be applied to the object of the Association There was no association for that purpose on a large scale and in fact very few portions of the country in which operations could be rendered useful, but Goolwa was one of the best points, and until a better plan was organised, the House was bound to support the Association, and place the supervision under the Government as a controlling power over the expenditure As for the old among the natives, it was to be feared they would not be reclaimed, but he felt convinced that the young were capable of moral and religious training The natives were fast disappearing Their numbers were not one quarter what they were when first the country was occupied as a colony, and the colonists were bound to make to the remainder a good return for having possessed their country

Mr LINDSAY would support the motion before the House, for the amount asked was so small compared with the property taken from the aborigines as not to merit consideration It had been objected that the money would be thrown away, because the efforts would not be successful, and that the natives must disappear because the tribes of North America were disappearing since the colonization of that country by the whites He denied that asserted fact They had not disappeared, but it was a curious fact that wherever England, or rather the Anglo-Saxons, with the Protestant religion settled, the native tribes disappeared, but wherever the Catholic religion prevailed, then they did not disappear (Great laughter) In Mexico the native race was more numerous than any other, and throughout South America, while in those parts of North America, where the Anglo Saxons settled, they were disappearing (Laughter) The South Australians were said to be an inferior race, but he recollected when the New Zealanders were considered the lowest on account of their cannibalism They had, however, been reclaimed, and he believed that under proper treatment such might be the case with the aborigines of South Australia

Mr HAWKER moved that the House divide

The question was put and negatived

Mr HAY had no intention to oppose the motion, but when he saw the votes for the aborigines amounted to £1,150, it was time to adopt some general system instead of supporting those isolated attempts to reclaim them He knew several parties connected with the Association, and therefore was satisfied that the money would be faithfully expended The vote only applied to the natives about Port Lincoln But there were other tribes about Mount Gambier and further up the Murray who were equally entitled to consideration He hoped before the Estimates were prepared for 1859 the Government might mature some system whereby a sum could be voted, and that they would call on six eight, or ten individuals who took an interest in the aborigines, to give advice how best to expend the money for their benefit He believed there was some property at Port Lincoln, over which the House had no control, that was applicable for improving the condition of the natives, he hoped when they were able to manage their own affairs that might be left with them He understood that some of that property was in the hands of private individuals He hoped, however, that £500 would be the beginning of some general system

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not like the question should go to a division without saying a few words in regard to what had been said He had not expected that a motion simply asking the House to consent to a motion for a simple address of that description would have been met by such opposition, but was glad to find that a strong feeling in favour of it appeared to pervade the majority of hon members He had always felt an emotion of shame in considering the way in which the aborigines had been treated It must be evident that everything done and accomplished in the colony was the result of taking possession of the land that had been occupied by them from time immemorial, and it must not be forgotten in doing it there was no intention on the part of the colonists to injure them Still the actual if not the inevitable result was, that a large proportion of the native population had died without children to fill their places, and perhaps the remaining population was slowly melting away It was, therefore, a solemn duty laid on the community, of which they had been too negligent, to make some provision for them, however inadequate, not merely for their sustenance, but as far as possible to elevate them in the scale of society He thought the hon member for Burra and Clare altogether mistaken in the principle which should actuate them, when he said the House should expect the natives to co-operate with them in those plans It was because the natives were not in a position to co-operate that the colonists should step in and do something for them As they were not able to co-operate, it became the duty of the House to provide for them in the same way as they provide for destitute children When he listened to that speech of the hon member (Mr Peake) he thought it must be irony on his part (Great laughter, during which Mr Peake explained that he was sincere.) If so he (the Attorney-General) did not think he had improved his position (Renewed laughter) The hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Lindsay) made an observation so utterly at variance with fact that it must be noticed He had said, wherever the Spanish and Portuguese Catholics had settled the native races had been preserved He would, probably, say there were more natives in Cuba, and in Hispaniola, or in the islands of the Spanish Main, than there were at the present time in Canada Had he read history he must be aware that within two or three generations after the Spaniards took possession of those islands there was scarcely an aboriginal native in the islands The American Indians had probably not suffered more by the vices introduced by the colonists than by the refusal to recognise their peculiar social rights, but to speak of the bad effects produced by British colonists as contrasted with those of the Spanish and Portuguese, was to ignore the facts of history, and to libel the race of which the hon member was a descendant

Mr BARROW said if it were necessary to have the co-operation of the native races in all grants and on all questions concerning them, the best way would be to have some intelligent native sitting in the House—(great laughter)—able to state his views on those subjects from his own standing-point —(great laughter)—so that whenever questions like the one under discussion were introduced, the House would have aboriginal support (Laughter) But he thought the House would be quite prepared to do justice without a sable representative being present (Laughter) He considered that to care for the aborigines was an act of justice, and although he would not support the doctrine that, because they were the first occupants of the land they, exclusively, were entitled to hold it, it must not be forgotten that the colonists, having taken possession of their country and the land of their fathers, were bound to make them some return No doubt the colonists were lawfully on the land It had been stated by the hon member for Gumeracha that whatever was done in the direction of improving the condition of the aborigines should be done in some general and settled plan He (Mr Barrow) supposed that pointed in the direction of the revival of a protectorship of the aborigines, but it was a question whether an officer of that class should superintend the distribution of the money voted by the House But he thought that if movements of a local character were originated, and if it were ascertained that they were under the influence of respectable and responsible persons, and were movements over which the House could have some control, they should be supplemented by the House He considered the present question not a general but a particular one He was glad to find the House so generally favorable to the motion When the hon member for Victoria called for a division he agreed with the proposition, but as hon members appeared to want a few more speeches on the subject he had thought it best to say two or three words on the motion (Laughter)

The amendment having been put and negatived, the original motion was carried

HARBOR TRUST FUNDS

Mr PEAKE asked leave to amend his motion by adding to it that there should be also laid on the table a lithographic plan showing the soundings in various parts of the harbor, before and after the improvements in it were made

Leave given

Mr PEAKE said that the motion was little more than a consequence of a previous motion

The SPEAKER requested the hon member not to introduce any allusion to previous debates

Mr PEAKE proposed to speak to the motion, and would say that many hon members agreed with him in his construction of the Act of 1851 as to the course that should have been taken in expending the £100 000 placed under the control of the Harbor Trust He thought it would be satisfactory to hon members to be in possession of the information he moved for, relative to the expenditure of that money in Port Adelaide. He had heard many remarks made with regard to the object of his moving in that matter. It was said he wished a vote of censure to be passed on the Port Adelaide Harbor Trust. He did not pretend to censure those gentlemen for having misappropriated the public moneys, nor did he intend to say they had not expended those moneys without improving the Port.

The SPEAKER reminded the hon. member he was not speaking to the motion before the House.

Mr. PEAKE thought it extremely important that the House should know how it was proposed to expend the money in deepening Port Adelaide, and therefore a lithographed plan of the soundings in the harbor, shewing the difference between the present depths and the depth of water before the improvements were made was desirable. He had no doubt the Harbor Trust would be rather pleased to have the opportunity of giving the information, and he would move "That a return of the manner in which it is proposed to apply the balance now in the hands of the Port Adelaide Harbor Trustees, be forthwith laid on the table of the House," with the amendment he had already read.

Mr. COLLINSON moved as an amendment "That a Commission be appointed of Civil Engineers who should report upon the improvements already effected in the Harbor of Port Adelaide, and the best means of carrying out further improvements." The statement of the balance in the hands of the Harbor Trustees should be laid on the table as soon as possible.

Mr. SOLOMON would second the amendment. In moving the resolution before the House the hon. member for Burra and Clare said he did not wish to imply any censure on the Harbor Trust. He believed the Harbor Trust would not shirk inquiry into anything they had done. He was glad to find the hon. member (Mr. Collinson) had brought forward an amendment asking that House to make enquiry into the conduct of the Harbor Trust. He was glad to support it, for it not only included the information asked for by the hon. member for Burra and Clare, but would give such information as would enable them to judge whether they had been censured justly or not.

Mr. MACDERMOTT thought the tendency of the motion before the House would be to supersede the functions of the Harbor Trust. He thought the Hon. Commissioner of Public Works should have been requested to place that information on the table of the House. He thought when responsible Boards were placed in situations of trust they should be allowed to exercise their trust, except it could be shewn that its funds had been grossly misappropriated.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would be rather disposed to support the original motion of the hon. member for Burra and Clare, assuming that the motion was not put in such a way as to imply discourtesy towards the Harbor Trust, but he thought application should be made for that information to the proper officers. He had no objection to referring the question to a Commission of civil engineers, excepting on the score of expense, but if the Harbor Trust made a return which would be satisfactory to persons conversant with those matters in the House, as to the manner in which they propose to expend the money in their hands, the Commission would be needless. He objected to it still further, as implying a distrust in the judgment of the Harbor Trust. He thought it reasonable that the House should know how they were going to act in regard to further expenditure, but until some objection was taken to the proceedings of the Harbor Trust, he should not support the amendment of the hon. member for the Port.

Captain HART was sorry that the hon. the Attorney-General opposed the amendment, for the motion before the House should be looked at in all its bearings. The Harbor Trust felt that they had escaped severe censure by a very narrow majority in that House, and they were desirous that a Commission should be appointed to enquire whether censure was merited or not. He was sure the result would be to free them from all blame. Were he a member of that Trust, he should wish the enquiry to be made forthwith. (Hear, hear.)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said an enquiry by a Commission would tend to retard the report which the Harbor Trust were requested to present to the House. He was not surprised that the Harbor Trust felt sore about the matter, but every hon. member, knowing the way in which they had performed their duties, would give them support. It would be necessary that the information should be communicated to the House in the usual official way. He had no objection to the amendment as a substantive proposition standing by itself any more than to the motion of the hon. member for Burra and Clare, but he had no wish to censure the Harbor Trust. He hoped both the motion and amendment would be passed by the House.

Mr. STRANGWAYS hoped the House would not agree to the amendment of the hon. member for the Port, for the House would have to appoint the Commission, and, therefore it would result in nothing; and of whom would the Commission be composed? Of civil engineers. The Attorney-General was of opinion that any question respecting Port Adelaide should only be considered by nautical men. (Hear, hear.)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained, that on account of its being a land question the hon. member must know a great deal about it.

Mr. STRANGWAYS supposed if that Commission were appointed, the Engineer of the Waterworks would have a billet. (Hear, hear.) He had no wish that such a Commission should be appointed, for if the House left it to the Government, they would only appoint incompetent persons. (Laughter.) Had not the hon. member for Burra and Clare disclaimed any intention to reflect on the Harbor Trust, the motion would not have had that effect but it should not be connected with a previous motion. (The hon. member checked himself, amid loud laughter.) It was merely calling the Government to lay on the table of the House information that they ought to possess, and therefore he could not see why it should be objected to.

Mr. BURFORD was surprised that hon. members could not see that the lithographic map asked for would cost a considerable sum of money. It appeared to him to be a curious way of making use of the balance in the hands of the Harbor Trust.

Mr. REYNOLDS said it was not proper to refer to previous debates—(laughter)—but something had been said about censure. It seemed only to be a difference of opinion with regard to the interpretation of an Act. He must support the motion of the hon. member for Burra and Clare, as it would give the Harbor Trust an opportunity of making their statement. If it was a difference in the way of reading the law, how could engineers decide?

Mr. PEAKE must oppose the amendment, for there was no insinuation in his motion in regard to the Harbor Trust. His object was merely to obtain information as to how the money was to be spent. It was simply for a return. Had he had no confidence in the Harbor Trust he should have introduced a motion to that effect.

The amendment was put, and negatived. The motion, with the addition, was carried.

EDUCATION.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table a return of all licensed schools within the city of Adelaide, and also an approximate return of schools within ten miles of the city, together with certain particulars respecting the number of scholars and other matters.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved—

"That there be laid upon the table of this House a copy of the memorial recently addressed by the Government officers to the Chief Secretary on the subject of the Civil Service Bill."

The TREASURER laid on the table a copy of the memorial referred to, and also a copy of another memorial on the same subject from another class of officers in the same service. He moved that both be printed.

Agreed to.

COLONIAL DEFENCES.

On the motion of Captain HART, an extension of time for a week was allowed for the bringing up of the report of this Committee.

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE FURTHER AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved that the report of the Committee on this Bill be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, and the third reading of the Bill was made an order of the day for Wednesday, November 3.

PORT LINCOLN JETTY.

Mr. MACDERMOTT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee for the consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for 1859 for the purpose of extending the jetty at Port Lincoln in conformity with the prayer of the petition of the inhabitants of that place. The information called for by the Committee the last time this matter was under consideration, was now on the table. (Cries of "No," from some hon. members, and "hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works.)

The CHAIRMAN said there was a report but no plan on the table.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the plan was on the table of the Library, as otherwise it would become part of the records of the House, and could not be removed.

The CHAIRMAN said the House had no library of its own. It was for the House to say whether the plan should be laid on the table.

Mr. MACDERMOTT said all the necessary information was before the House, but of £2,000 voted last session £1,639 had been expended, leaving a balance of nearly £400, so that he hoped a small sum in addition would suffice for the work. There was not one single line of road made in the district, whilst most other districts had considerable sums spent in this way.

Mr. HAWKER supported the motion. The district was growing in importance every day, and it was necessary that every advantage should be given to the settlers to ship their produce. The sum previously voted had not been expended, and the sum now asked, considering the amounts voted for jetties in other places, was very moderate. A good deal of land was sold in the neighborhood, and from the discoveries in the north and north-west, the place was rising in importance every day.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked to have the report read.

The CLERK read the report accordingly.

Mr Strangways asked whether it was true that the jetty was in such a position as to be of very little use indeed, and that the extension would in consequence be a waste of time. No doubt shipping accommodation should be afforded. The only question was, if this was the proper way of doing it.

The Commissioner of Public Works replied that no report to that effect had reached him. He believed the reason of the jetty not being availed of was that the Marion steamer could not get alongside it. He believed the district was important, as years back it had shown symptoms of its being a mineral country, and he hoped that before long the mines would be worked there. There were also large numbers of sheep in the district, and it had contributed much to the revenue, but had received very little in return. With respect to the sum voted for the wells, a further sum for that purpose had been placed on the estimates for 1859, which, with the balance of the previous vote, he believed would suffice for the prosecution of the work.

Mr Reynolds supported the motion, believing that the outlying districts should be attended to.

Mr Peake supported the motion, but wished to know, as the plans laid on the library table were those of the old works, whether the new works were to be executed on the same designs.

The Commissioner of Public Works explained that he had laid the plans on the library table in accordance with the advice of the Speaker in order to avoid expense. Of course the extension of the Jetty would be in conformity with the portion of it which now existed. No new plans were yet prepared, but they would be immediately got ready if the vote was passed.

Mr Peake said it appeared that the hon the Commissioner of Public Works had resolved to carry out this undertaking in defiance of the report of the Jetty Commission, which specially condemned this Jetty. He would call the attention of the hon member and the House to the report, which said that the smallest piles should be of 12 inches, whilst those in this Jetty were of 10 inches. The hon member read an extract from the report. Were we to go on perpetuating the catalogue of evils detailed in that report? He hoped as the attention of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works was now called to the report that he would not persevere in his plan.

Mr Lindsay thought the hon member for the Burra and Clare had done good service in bringing forward the matter as he had done, but that would not prevent him from voting for the item. ("Hear, hear," from Mr MacDermott.) He thought the inhabitants of the district were entitled to the expenditure, and that instead of entering into engineering details, they should take it for granted that the Government engineers were competent for their work—("Hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works)—and that the hon the Commissioner of Public Works would prevent the repetition of the egregious errors into which the Government fell on former occasions. It was no fault of that hon member's if the jetty at Port Elliot was originally built too high, and had subsequently to be cut down—(laughter)—or that the jetty at Yankalilla was put in the wrong place, and was washed down directly after it was built. (Laughter.) The Argus eyes of the House would prevent such occurrences in future.

Mr MacDermott, in reply, thought the hon member for the Burra and Clare might have saved the whole of his remarks as they did not apply to the work before the House. This jetty was in still water—in harbor—and, of course it would be folly to put the same strength in the work which was absolutely necessary in a sea jetty.

Mr Peake supposed it was a freshwater jetty, as the hon member said it was not a sea jetty.

Mr MacDermott—A harbour jetty.

Mr Peake thought his remarks were pertinent to the question. His object was to draw from the hon the Commissioner of Public Works the explanation which he was sure that hon member would give.

The Commissioner of Public Works said if the hon member could show that the Port Lincoln jetty, with all its defects of construction and other faults, had been washed down, or required to be removed in consequence of the piles being too small, he could understand the course taken by the hon member. He would take the hon member's advice and read the report of the Jetty Commission, and would take care that the new jetty should be sufficiently strong to prevent his being placed in the awkward position of having to account for its being washed down.

The report was then agreed to, and, the House having resumed, was finally adopted.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The House having gone into Committee,

Mr Reynolds enquired whether the hon the Treasurer had made any calculations as to whether the schedule would bear curtailment.

The Treasurer had made a calculation, and found that the fund would be sufficient to meet all charges against it. It had been remarked that the number of officers likely to retire within the next two or three years would entirely absorb the fund. But he found that within the next 10 years only fifteen officers could by possibility retire, and these only in the following order. The largest possible payment for the first year would be £1809, and this included all officers who had already retired under the former Act. In the second year the amount would be the same, for during these two years only one officer could retire, and this was a complete answer to the hon member for Encounter Bay, who spoke of the whole fund being absorbed in two years. In the third year the amount would be £2,363, in the fourth, £2,663, in the fifth, £2,723, in the sixth, £2,783, in the seventh, £3,139, in the the eighth, £3,780, in the ninth, £4,130, and in the tenth, £4,320.

Mr Strangways asked whether the Treasurer would give further data. The hon member was a member of the Government which perpetrated some gross blunders four years ago, and he might do the same on the present occasion. It was not sufficient to say that at a certain date so many will retire. He wanted to know whether, within 12 months, there might not be a pension list of £3,000 or £4,000? He should also ask the hon the Attorney-General, in connection with the 6th clause, whether a Judge of the Supreme Court could not come in under that clause, although by a previous clause he would not get good-service pay? This might make a difference of some £400 a year. If this argument held good, then those on the Civil List would take advantage of the Act. The Auditor-General and the Under-Secretary might then come in, and this would make a difference of some hundreds at once. He had put this question to the hon the Attorney-General on the previous day, but the hon member had not then answered it. Perhaps he had since time to make up his mind.

The Attorney-General enquired whether the hon member was serious. Did he really think that a Judge of the Supreme Court receiving from £1,300 to £1,500 a-year, and holding a position from which he could not be removed, except by Her Majesty, would retire from such a position unless some suitable provision was made for him? The hon member could not be serious. With regard to the other part of the question, he would remind the House that the calculations were made by a Select Committee, and that the general results of the provisions of the Act as affected by the state of the service, and the persons employed in the service, were shown by the statement of the hon the Treasurer. He thought hon members would see that it was not likely that persons of 20 years' standing in the service would retire in order to get half their salary, and these persons might therefore be set off against those who would retire through illness or casualties. There would also be some deaths, so that in a few years the fund would be free from the payment of many charges upon it.

The Treasurer said he would now notice a remark in reference to himself which he had not noticed, although it was made before. The hon member for Encounter Bay said that owing to the blunders which had been made by, he believed, himself (the Treasurer) in respect to the former Bill, he (Mr Strangways) could have no confidence in the calculations made by him (the Treasurer). But the calculations were not made by him, but by a Committee. He was no party to a single calculation of the Bill, and though a member of the Government, he stated distinctly, to guard himself against what he knew to be a faulty principle in the Bill, that he would not be responsible for it, and that the House would have to remodel the Bill, and the second reading was passed with that understanding.

Mr Strangways explained. What he said was that the Treasurer was a member of the Government which made the blunders, not that he was the party who made them. As to the hon the Attorney-General, he had asked that hon member a plain question to which he shirked giving an answer. He simply asked whether a Judge of the Supreme Court could come under the Act, and the hon member replied that he did not think it at all probable. He (Mr Strangways) did not care whether it was probable, he only wanted to know whether it was possible. He hoped the hon member would also answer whether the Auditor-General and Under-Secretary would be excluded from the Act, as the hon member had stated on the previous day that persons on the civil list were not excluded.

The Attorney-General said he always felt called upon to answer a question which appeared to be put for the purpose of acquiring information, but a question like that of the hon member he declined replying to. It was not a question of fact but of opinion, and the hon member could form his own opinion.

Mr Reynolds submitted that the hon member on a point of law should answer any question put to him, and therefore he was not showing sufficient respect to the House. When the hon the Treasurer said he had made calculations, and that the fund would meet the claims upon it, he was bound to believe these statements. But he would like to know how the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works felt on this subject. That hon member occupied the position which he (Mr Reynolds) once filled, and, after the strictures which had been passed upon him (Mr Reynolds) on the previous day, he thought the hon member (the Commissioner of Public Works) could not feel very comfortable. (Laughter.) There was a time when the hon. member would have no superannuation fund—when he considered that such a Bill as this would be the foundation of a pension list. He (Mr Reynolds) did not know how his dear friend opposite felt after the severe strictures passed upon him (Mr Reynolds) on the previous day. (Laughter.) He was afraid that association with hon gentlemen opposite had sadly led him astray (much laughter), but having now left them he hoped to redeem his character and to pursue the independent course which he had pursued before (Laughter)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would relieve the mind of the hon member (Mr Reynolds) by referring him to the division on the third reading of last session, where he would find his (the hon Commissioner's) name in the minority

Mr SCAMMELL did not rise to enter into these personal questions, but to ask whether the officers of the Trinity Board, who had served for many years, could not be included in the Bill, as up to a certain date they would have been

Mr PEAKE asked the hon the Treasurer whether in his calculations for the next ten years, he had estimated how many might retire through sickness or accident? He would also like to know from the hon the Attorney-General how far the Act would affect officers under the following circumstances —Supposing that an officer who had been in the service 20 or 30 years, and who had not attained the age of 60 years, but who had contributed during all that time to the fund, died from some sudden accident and left his wife and family unprovided for, would all the money contributed by him to the fund be lost to his family?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he might appeal to numerous members of the House whether on questions involving points of law he had ever refused to reply, but whilst he did this through courtesy, still hon members had no right to ask his opinion except as a member of the Government, on matters of fact In reference to another personal matter, he would not trouble himself to reply, but would leave his character for consistency, and that of the hon member opposite (Mr Reynolds) to be judged by the public He only regretted that that hon member had made up his mind to act as an independent member, because it would deprive them of the pleasure of soon seeing the hon member on that (the Government) side of the House (Laughter) The suggestion of the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) had received the consideration of the Committee, but it was thought impossible to lay down a plan to meet that and other analogous cases These should be matters of special arrangement by the Government, subject to the sanction of the House

Mr STRANGWAYS said that the hon the Attorney-General stated that no hon member could demand his opinion on a matter of law If so what was the use of an Attorney-General at all? (Hear hear) In the House of Commons, members from all parts of the House asked the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, and if these officers refused to answer, they would very soon change their positions The doctrine of the hon the Attorney-General was most convenient He could lay down the law, and if hon members chose to accept it, they could do so, and if not, the hon the Attorney-General could fall back upon his right to reserve his opinion If the Attorney-General held that opinion and acted upon it when asked his opinion as the first law officer of the Crown and of that House, he might find out that his seat was not a freehold (Hear hear) There could be no doubt that it was the duty of the law officers, as members of the Government, to advise the House or any member of it upon points of law when called upon to do so Now he had asked the Attorney-General's opinion, and the hon member replied that it was merely a matter of opinion—that any hon member might form an opinion for himself He felt greatly complimented when the Attorney-General told him that his (Mr Strangway's) opinion was as good as the hon gentleman's own He knew the hon member did not mean to pass such a compliment, but still he felt exceedingly grateful and complimented (Cries of hear, hear, and laughter from the Government benches) The hon member concluded by again putting the question

Mr SOLOMON thought the question should be answered He had certainly listened with some surprise to the reply of the Attorney-General, for he was always under the impression that the hon member sat in his place as the law adviser of the Crown, and that on any matter affecting the colony, he was bound to answer any question put to him, or to acknowledge that he could not (Cries of "hear, hear") If, as a private individual, he (Mr Solomon) wanted the hon gentleman's opinion, he should go to his office and pay his fee, but when an hon member put a question in that House, the Attorney-General was in duty bound to answer Hon members were not lawyers, but he presumed the hon the Attorney-General was paid as a lawyer to give his advice (Cries of "hear, hear") If the Attorney-General said that he was not prepared to give an answer, the question might be postponed until he had consulted the necessary works, but he (Mr Solomon) as an independent member, was not disposed quietly to submit to the dictum of the Attorney-General, that he would withhold his opinion if he chose (Cries of "hear, hear") If that was the position of the Attorney-General, he (Mr Solomon) was much deceived as to the reason of the hon gentleman's holding a seat in the House. He trusted the Attorney-General would reconsider his decision, and a sense of the duty for which he was paid and courtesy to the House would induce him to give his opinion on this matter

Mr TOWNSEND also hoped the Attorney-General would answer the question It was quite true that questions might come from individual members which the hon member would not be bound to answer, but this was not the case at present If the hon member declined to answer, he (Mr Townsend) would warn him—(laughter)—that during the present year in England one of the most powerful Governments which ever existed there, backed by a House of Commons pledged to support them, by a similar proceeding to the present lost their hold of power, and that however clear the head, and however high the position of the hon the Attorney-General, the country might find a way of doing without him

Mr BURFORD thought the cases suggested by the hon member for the Burra and Clare could not be provided for But the next question he came to was, what was the use of an Attorney-General (Hear, hear, and laughter) He was of great use and was very necessary outside but an Attorney-General—(he did not speak of the hon member Mr Hanson)—was of no use in the House His proper place was outside, but the proper place of the hon member on his left (the Attorney-General) was in the House He (Mr Burford) wanted the hon member's person in the House, and his office outside He had no business in the House as Attorney-General, but the Constitution Act provided, and we must submit to it He hoped hon members would bear this in mind in the first session of the next Parliament, and that the matter would be rectified

Mr YOUNG was more satisfied by the last hour's discussion of the injustice and incompleteness of the Bill than he had ever been before Last session the Bill had made as great progress as this had done, yet it was thrown out, and he thought this would probably share the same fate It was a a measure for inflicting injustice on many, in order to do justice to a few He hoped some further light would be thrown on the Bill, or he must vote against its third reading, regarding it as the thin edge of the wedge, to introduce a general pensional list, and trusted it would be thrown out on the third reading again, though such a course was unusual

The TREASURER hoped the House would not throw the Bill out. With reference to the remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay, he would remark that he had gone into details, and found that during the next ten years there would only be 15 officers in the service, exclusive of the judges who could by possibility retire, that is, there were only 15 who would have attained the requisite age His calculation was based upon the assumption that every officer, upon reaching the age of 60, would take avdvantage of the fund, thus placing the fund in the most unfavorable position He had been asked if he had taken into consideration claims arising on account of sickness or death he could only take an average in such cases, and he thought it might be fairly assumed that the chances occurring from death within 10 years and the chances of those arriving at the age of 60, not immediately availing themselves of the fund, would certainly overbalance any extra charge upon the fund on account of sickness or death He had taken all reasonable precaution to satisfy himself that the payments which he had mentioned would not be exceeded

Dr WARK intimated that he should oppose the Bill at the third reading After a period of quiescence, it appeared the House had roused itself, and had asserted that those in office should perform the duties appertaining to office He contended that the Attorney-General had a right to answer any questions of law put to him affecting any Bill before the House. It might be that the manner of the hon member for Encounter Bay was not very pleasant, but the question which he had put was certainly a very important one If the Attorney-General would not answer questions of law which were put to him, it was possible that the House might consider it would be better to have a second-rate lawyer filling that office, who would pay proper attention to his duties, than a first-rate one who neglected them, and constantly kept the House waiting, independently of giving saucy answers The hon gentleman proceeded at some length to state that he considered the Bill was defective in consequence of not making any provision for the widows and orphans of officers, thus placing Government officers in a worse position than parties in a more humble position in life, who were enabled by resorting to Insurance Offices and various Societies, to make such provision The hon member (who was called to order by the Chairman for discussing the principle of the Bill), said he should certainly oppose the third reading

Mr LINDSAY said the discussion had taken a rather irregular turn By the Act of 1852 Government officers were entitled to a certain amount, but the Bill before the House deprived them of one-half of that amount He wished to know whether in the event of a Government officer dying before attaining the age of 60, the money which he would be forced to contribute out of what he would be entitled to under the Act of 1852, would be devoted to the benefit of his family He must be satisfied upon that point, and should wish to see some clauses amended, or he must certainly oppose the third reading

The TREASURER remarked the Government on the previous day had stated that they would not object to the Bill being recommitted for the purpose of enabling the hon member (Mr Glyde) to bring forward a proposition, and they would extend the same facilities to other hon members He would remark in reference to an observation which had fallen from the hon member for West Torrens, that the officers of the Trinity Board were not included in the present Bill, because they did not appear upon the Estimates as classified officers, but if the hon member wished them to be included, and would bring forward a scheme to effect that object, the Government would be disposed to consider it No provision was made for the widows or orphans of officers in this Bill, as it was already sufficiently complicated It was never contemplated that any advantage would be conferred upon the families of officers, but no doubt if an officer had contributed to the fund for a number of years without receiving a pension, that would be regarded as a strong case, and the Government would no doubt ask the House to authorise them to make it a special case for the benefit of the family

Captain HART said the misfortune appeared to be, that each member had his own calculation in connection with this Bill, and his own notions of what it ought to carry out It was never intended that the Bill should provide for the widows and orphans of officers, if so, there would have been a different system proposed, but it proposed to do for the officer what he could not do for himself, and that was, to provide him with an annuity in his old age The officer could provide for his wife and family in the usual way by insuring his life. It was absurd for hon members to base their calculations upon the rates chargeable at home, as the principal ingredient, the interest of money, was so different The hon member repeated the statement which he made on the previous day in reference to the principle of the Bill, and cautioned the House against rejecting it, as by the Act which it proposed to repeal the value of pensions to which parties were already entitled was £13,000, whilst the amount at the disposal of the Government was only about £7,000 He believed every objection which had been made to the Bill had been answered If the schedule were not passed the Bill of course would be lost The Bill grappled with the claims not only of those who had retired under the former Act, but with the claims of those who had not retired He could not conceive any measure better calculated to meet the difficulties of the case

Mr TOWNSEND reminded the Chairman that Dr Wark had been called to order for discussing the principle of the Bill, instead of the schedule, but that Captain Hart had been allowed to make a speech on the principle of the Bill

The CHAIRMAN said that Captain Hart had been out of order, and that the debate had grown very irregular

Mr HALLETT moved that the House divide

Carried

The schedule was then put and carried by a majority of 4 The votes—Ayes 15, Noes 11, being as follows —

AYES —The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Hallett, Macdermott Hawker, Hart, Scammell, Rogers, Hay, McEllister, Milne, Bagot, Harvey, the Treasurer (Teller)

NOES —Messrs Peake Burford, Strangways, Reynolds, Wark, Young, Glyde, Cole, Lindsay, Townsend, Solomon (Teller)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated that the Government were desirous of affording an opportunity to recommit the Bill in order that the hon member (Mr Glyde) might propose the amendment of which he had given notice He should oppose the amendment but not the recommittal of the clause

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday next

THE JEWS

Mr SOLOMON asked the Attorney-General whether the Act No 18 of 1852, or any other Act passed in this colony, makes it imperative upon the person acting as officiating minister for the time being, or upon any other person appointed to perform the marriage ceremony among the Jews of this colony, to be registered or licensed in that behalf? The hon member stated that some doubts had arisen amongst the members of the persuasion, who were very numerous in this colony, and they were desirous that those doubts should be set at rest

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought no license was necessary for the performance of the ceremony according to the usage of that body, but if the officiating minister wished to give licenses under the Act of 1852, it was necessary he should be licensed by the Governor

MAGILL INSTITUTE

Mr WARK moved—

"That the House, on Wednesday, 3rd November, go into Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to place on the Estimates for 1859 the sum of £175, in aid of the funds of the Magill Institute"

The hon member stated that £225 had been expended upon the building alone, independently of £75 for other purposes The only amount which had been received from the Government was £50

Mr HARVEY seconded the motion, remarking that a precedent had been established in the case of the Burra Institute

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would not oppose going into Committee, as he had no objection to a discussion upon the claims of this Institute, but he cautioned the hon mover that he would have to show there were some exceptional points in the case of the Magill Institute, as compared with similar institutions throughout the country

The motion was carried

MR A LONGBOTTOM

Upon the motion of Captain HART, Standing Order No 302 was suspended, in order to admit the presentation of a petition from Mr A Longbottom, in reference to a patent for the manufacture of gas

THE POLICE FORCE

Mr MCELLISTER moved that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to alter the regulations under which the Police Force of this province is regulated, so as to alter that portion which gives the Commissioner power to dismiss without investigation The hon member observed that he had for 16 years been connected with the Police Force in various parts of the world, and that he had never, except in this colony, known of a regulation by which men could be dismissed without a fair trial

Mr HAWKER seconded the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the previous question, upon the ground that this was a question of a purely executive nature, and that the House had nothing before it to show that such a regulation really existed

Mr BAGOT considered if such a regulation existed, it certainly ought to be altered The resolution could not do any harm

Mr HAWKER said the hon mover showed him the printed regulations on the previous day, and called his attention to one to the effect that the Commissioner might dismiss a member of the force without assigning a reason

At the suggestion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the words "or assigning a reason" were added to the motion, which, thus amended, was carried

WATER-WORKS AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the second reading of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the consideration in Committee of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS having moved that the second reading of this Bill be an Order of the Day for Thursday,

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if the Government really intended to proceed with it, as it had been upon the table for a great length of time

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said he was prepared to proceed with it at once, and was explaining its provisions, when Mr Strangways called the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there were not 12 members present, and the House adjourned shortly after 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on Tuesday

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 2

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon John Morphett, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Dr Everard, and the Hon Captain Hall

The Hon Mr FORSTER presented a petition signed by 1,243 persons residing within the Hundred of Nuriootpa, in the neighborhood of Greenock Creek, praying for the abolition of restrictions on free distillation

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon Major O HALLORAN presented a petition from the Chairman of the District Council of Brighton praying that the Public Works Bill should not be passed in its present shape and that the Central Road Board should be omitted from its operation

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The CLERK of the House read a message from the House of Assembly on the subject of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that no new principle was involved in the Bill, as it had been fully discussed during the last session, and consequently its consideration need not be delayed He moved the second reading of the Bill on the following day

The Hon Dr EVERARD considered the intervening time too short, twenty-four hours was too limited a period for the proper and careful consideration of the separate clauses of the Bill

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY would take the sense of the House on the subject It was immaterial to him whether the Bill were read the following day, or the day after that. He therefore moved that the second reading of the Bill be the Order of the Day for Thursday next, which period would afford hon members an opportunity for proper consideration of the Bill

LUNATICS IN REDRUTH GAOL

The Hon Dr DAVIES gave notice that he would ask a question of the Chief Secretary relative to two persons named Wisker and Fawkner, who were at present confined as lunatics in Redruth Gaol, he would ask on the certificates of what medical men they were placed in confinement, whether retained there at Government expense, who were the medical attendants, and whether they were now eligible inmates for an hospital or lunatic asylum

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY would make enquiries, and be prepared to answer the question on the following Tuesday, by which time the required information could be obtained

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The Hon Captain BAGOT gave notice of the following amendments in this Bill —

"That all the words after the word 'that' in the second line be struck out, and that the following be introduced —'A supervising power shall be exercised by a person directly responsible to the Legislature of this province, and whereas by an Act, No 17, 1852, "For Making and Improving of Roads in South Australia," certain persons, to be elected and appointed as therein provided were constituted the Central Board of Main Roads, and whereas by an Act, No 20, of 1854, "To authorize the raising of the sum of One Hundred Thousand Pounds for the Deepening and Improving of the Harbour of Port Adelaide, and for other purposes therein named," certain persons therein designated and named were appointed to form a Trust for the purpose of the said Act, and whereas by the "South Australian Railway Act," No 27 of 1855-6, the Governor was authorised to appoint South Australian Railway Commissioners for the purposes in such last-mentioned Act expressed, and whereas, by an Act, No 28 of 1855 6, "To provide for the Water Supply and Drainage of the City of Adelaide," the Governor was authorised to appoint a Chief Commissioner and two other Commissioners, for the purposes of such last-mentioned Act and whereas it is expedient that the said Board, Trusts, and Commissioners, and all or any other Boards, Trusts, and Commissioners that at present exist, or may be hereafter appointed, and all persons whatsoever who may at any time be entrusted with the execution of any public work in this province, should be liable to the immediate supervision of the Commissioner of Public Works, be it therefore enacted by the Governor-in-Chief of the Province of South Australia, with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of the said province, in this present Parliament assembled, as follows — That the enacting clause be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor—1 That on and after the passing hereof, the person holding the responsible office of Commissioner of Public Works shall possess and exercise the right and power of supervision over all Boards, Trusts, Commissioners, and persons entrusted with the direction and execution of public works within this province, and that he, the said Commissioner of Public Works, shall have full authority to call for all such reports, returns, and accounts as he from time to time may deem expedient, and that he shall have full power and liberty personally to inspect all such works, or to cause such inspection to be made by such person or persons as he may appoint thereunto 2 And it is hereby enacted that all Boards, Trusts Commissioners, or persons as hereinbefore named or described, who have been or who shall hereafter be entrusted with the direction or execution of any public works within this province, shall be considered, and they are hereby placed under the immediate supervision of the aforesaid Commissioner of Public Works, to whom and at whose desire and demand they shall make all such reports and returns as he shall require from them, and shall also furnish him with full, true and faithful accounts of the expenditure of all public moneys that may be entrusted to them, and in such forms and details as he may from time to time direct'"

BREAKWATER AT GLENELG

The Hon Captain BAGOT gave notice that he would ask the Chief Secretary if it was the intention of Government to proceed with the iron breakwater at Glenelg

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

This Bill was read a third time and passed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved that the Bill be sent to the House of Assembly, with a message that it had been agreed to with certain amendments

Carried

WASTE LANDS BILL

This Bill was read a third time and passed

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the House adjourned to the following Thursday, at 2 o clock.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 2.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 10 minutes past 1 o'clock

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS presented a petition from Abraham Longbottom, praying for leave to bring in a Bill to secure to him the advantages derivable from the discovery of a novel process for the production of gas from fatty substances

The petition was received, and the Bill introduced accordingly

TELEGRAPH CHARGES

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a return of the rates of charges on the various lines of intercolonial telegraph within this and the neighbouring colonies

THE ESTIMATES

The TREASURER moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the consideration of the Estimates for 1859

Mr STRANGWAYS moved as an amendment that the consideration of these Estimates be made an Order of the Day for that day week They had been previously postponed in order that the report of the Committees on taxation and on the Assessment on Stock, be laid upon the table Both these reports would be laid on the table during the present week, and he believed the Committees were now in a position to bring them up If it was desirable during the previous week that the Estimates should be postponed to allow of these reports being brought up, it was equally desirable that they should be postponed now He thought it unnecessary to remark upon the effect which these reports would have on the Estimates, but he trusted hon members would agree with him in thinking that the Order of the Day should be postponed

Mr. BURFORD seconded the amendment

The amendment was then put and carried

MAIN ROADS OF THE COLONY

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, with a view to consider the following resolutions, viz —

"I That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to maintain the distinction at present existing between Main and District Roads

"II That, in the opinion of this House, the whole amount which can be spared from the General Revenue for road purposes should be devoted to the construction of roads and bridges, but that the maintenance and repair thereof should be provided for by funds drawn from some other source than the existing General Revenue

"III That it is the opinion of this House that the necessary funds for maintaining and repairing the main roads and bridges of this province should be raised by rates upon a general assessment of property, aided, when practicable, by a system of tolls

"IV That it is expedient to provide for the widening of the tires of waggons and carts which transport heavy goods

"V That the salaries of all officers employed in carrying out the provisions of the Road Act should annually be submitted for the consideration of Parliament"

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee accordingly

The COMMISSISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that perhaps there was no subject of more general interest to the community or of greater difficulty to deal with, than that which by the present resolution he sought to form a basis of action upon Every man took an interest in the road question, and at every public meeting it was either directly or indirectly alluded to The main difficulty in providing good roads was the financial difficulty We had nearly 700 miles of main roads in the colony, of which 136 were formed and metalled, and these had cost an enormous sum—nearly approaching to three quarters of a million of money With respect to the resolutions, the first, fourth, and fifth would not require so much discussion as the remaining two, but the other two were of great importance But before referring to them he would say one word in justification of the course which the Government had taken in the matter It was no new course, either here or in other parts of the British dominions A similar course had been taken by the Government which preceded the present Government, and, to compare small things with great, the great difficulty of Indian legislation had been treated in a similar style in the British House of Commons The extension of main roads could only be accomplished by separating the construction and maintenance of these roads The average cost of making the main roads at present was £2,000 per mile, and it required £200 per mile to keep them in an efficient state of repair Considering that we had now 700 miles of main roads, it was manifest we could not bear this expenditure, even omitting from consideration other roads whose claims to be treated as main roads could not be overlooked These 700 miles of road would require an immense deal of money to make them, and it was only by very gradual degrees that money could be found for the purpose Every mile of road made required a certain expenditure for repairs, so that in course of time it was capable of arithmetical proof that the resources of the colony available for the making and maintenance of the roads would all be required for the maintenance of roads already formed It was commonly asserted that, in Scotland, Ireland, and London, the toll-bar system had been found so great a nuisance that it had been done away with, but then it was only done to make room for a system of rates which provided the funds hitherto drawn from the toll-bars From a report sent in some time since by Captain Freeling, the head of the Road Board, and whose knowledge of the subject would be admitted to be greater than that of almost any other person in the colony, derived as it was from long experience, it appeared that the means available for the construction of roads would be sufficient if the roads when made were handed over to the District Councils. But the main lines of road had been made the boundaries of District Councils, and therefore it would be exceedingly difficult to make all main lines district roads, besides which it would in his (the hon. Commissioner's) estimation, be a breach of faith to do so. He anticipated little difficulty with respect to the first resolution. The second was to the effect that the construction of roads was the purpose for which the Legislature should vote all the money it could spare. In 1857 the Surveyors of the Central Road Board had sent in reports to the effect that a sum of £25 ,000 would be required for the roads, but the House was only in a position to vote £70,000, and everybody who looked into the subject must see that there would be a great and growing demand for this purpose. He thought the country would be able to meet these demands provided we devoted all our means to the construction of roads, but if we had likewise to pay for the maintenance of the roads at the rate of £200 per mile the House would see that we must soon come to a point when we could not even pay sufficient to keep in repair the roads already made. This was proved by a Parliamentary paper No. 71, by which it appeared that the cost of the maintenance of roads had been in 1856, £25,000 , in 1857, £25,431 , in 1858, leaving out the Port, Gawler Town, and Lower North roads, £20,436, leaving in 1858 only £43,513 available for the construction of new works. If we were to continue this system the remote districts would be long before they could be reached by metalled roads. Moreover, we were fast selling the available lands portion of the proceeds of which were originally devoted to the construction and maintenance of the main roads, and it would be hardly fair to go spending the money in the vicinity of Adelaide unless the burden was thrown upon some different source. The fourth resolution would solve to some extent the question as to the sum required per mile for the maintenance of roads, inasmuch as it had reference to the widening of the tires of wheels. This was a matter of some difficulty, but he did not think there was any other place where loads of three and four tons were drawn with such narrow wheels as in South Australia. Any person seeing the heavy loads and narrow wheels upon the South-road must admit that no road could for any time stand such a description of traffic. As to the fifth resolution, if the clerks in other Government offices had their salaries submitted to Parliament, why should not those in this branch of the public service. He now moved the first resolution.

Mr. Peake had to find fault with the very meagre and unsatisfactory character of the resolutions. He confessed he was surprised after all that had passed during the last and also the present session, and the many a time and oft repeated expressions of opinion of the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works, that that hon. member should have omitted all mention of railways. The question of railways had been so extensively discussed, and their relative bearing on the main roads of the colony so frequently dwelt upon by himself as well as by other hon. members, that he was surprised they had not been introduced into the resolutions. It was said over and over again that wherever railways were made they should be the main roads of the colony, and therefore it was very unsatisfactory to him that they should not have been mentioned. He felt some doubt about moving what might be termed counter resolutions, but he would do so in order to elicit the opinion of the House. He agreed with the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works that it was thoroughly impossible to carry on our present plan of road making and maintenance. That was as plain as that two and two made four. If hon. members wanted any proof of this more striking than another, it consisted in the fact of £250,000 received from the Government in three years £163,513 was expended on new works, whilst nearly one-half that amount went in the cost of maintenance of old works. He would now read the few ideas on this subject, which he had put in the shape of a resolution, which he would not call a counter resolution, inasmuch as it had the same object in view as the original resolution. It was "that this House is further of opinion that it is desirable so far as the resources and natural features of the country will permit, to construct main trunk lines of railway in this province, and that as wherever lines of railway have been or may hereafter be made, the same shall supersede other main roads adjacent or parallel to them." He thought the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works could scarcely object to that, which was more explicit than the very dubious wording of the original resolution. He would next move "That the policy hitherto pursued of constructing and maintaining main roads and bridges out of the general revenue, fails to give an adequate supply of road accommodation for the wants of the colony, and each year diminishes the revenue available for construction by increasing the amount required out of that revenue for the maintenance of such roads." It was better that the proposition should be put clearly before the House, and persons out of doors would then see why we could not go on with the present system. He would also suggest that they should go a little further, and would therefore move "that in the opinion of this House it is expedient to capitalise all that can be spared from the construction of main roads and bridges, and that in future all main roads which do not yield a revenue equal to the cost of maintaining the same in repair, should be maintained by other means." When he spoke of lines being self-supporting, he meant either railways or tramways. With respect to the fourth and fifth resolutions, he saw no objection to them at all.

Mr. Strangways seconded the amendments. Hon. members would remember that a short time back there was a Bill introduced called the Public Works Bill, for the purpose of placing all Boards under the Commissioner of Public Works, but it appeared the Government had now great doubts as to the fate of that measure, and they brought these resolutions as a quiet way of letting the matter drop. The hon. the Commissioner of Public Works had given very little information as to the management of the main roads, or as to whether there were to be any main roads at all. The hon. member seemed to look upon receiving the assent of the House as a matter of necessity, whatever policy the Government might choose to advance. But the question before the House necessitated an expression of opinion as to whether in any case a main line of road should run in the immediate neighborhood of a tramway or railway. This would affect 50 miles of roads which would entail a vast expense on the districts through which they passed. His own opinion was that in the immediate vicinity of centres of population it would be necessary, although there were iron roads, whether railways or tramways, to have macadamised roads also, but this was not the case in outlying districts. He believed it was the opinion of Mr. Jackson, a Melbourne engineer, that if iron roads were constructed to carry the heavy traffic of this country, the natural surface would be sufficient for the light traffic, and that there was scarcely a part of the colony which a man on horseback could not pass over at any time. It was impossible to perpetuate the present system, and if the resolutions passed they could lead to nothing, as the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works seemed desirous should be the case. The House should consider not only the roads in this and the neighbouring colonies, but also the turnpike roads of England, which were analogous to ours. When these roads were constructed by private companies, these persons had authority to levy tolls and when it was found that these parties did not receive sufficient remuneration, authority was given to them in many cases to levy tolls for a certain number of years, a certain portion of these tolls being allowed for the payment of interest, and the remainder for the repayment of principal. The time would yet come, though it might not be immediately, when we would have all district roads, and when no road would be maintained by the Government within the settled districts. He believed the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works himself had stated that in two or three years time, even if the Legislature placed a large sum in the hands of the Road Board it must be expended in repairs and not in the construction of roads. Again, to spend all the money in the neighborhood of Adelaide would not be fair to the outlying districts. The roads should be made by the Government and maintained from other sources. He would not say that the means for this purpose should be derived from a general assessment on property. The question might be affected in a great measure by the report of the Select Committee on taxation, if that Committee ever reported at all. He doubted, however, whether the report of the Committee would seriously affect the question.

Mr. Townsend rose to order. Was it right to reflect upon the Committee before they had brought up their report?

The Chairman thought such a mode of proceeding was undesirable.

Mr. Strangways wanted to show that the question might be affected by matters now under the consideration of the Committee, that they should not pass resolutions, which if an unmentionable contingency arose—(laughter)—they would have to recal. He wished to know whether the resolutions would be put seriatim or the whole of them together.

The Chairman said he had already put the first resolution separately.

Mr. Strangways said hon. members must also consider the effect which one of the resolutions might have upon another. His opinion was that it was not desirable to maintain at all times the distinction between main and district roads.

Mr. Solomon congratulated the Government on having brought before the House a matter of such importance to the country. It was said in the House that the Ministry was a "do-nothing" Ministry. (Oh, oh.) Or that, if they wished to do anything, that they always came down to feel the pulse of the House before doing it. He was glad the question had been brought on, for it was a matter which required very grave consideration. First, how our roads were to be constructed, and secondly, how they were to be repaired. It was admitted that wherever roads and streets were required there must be an increased rate imposed on the community, and, therefore, the general question was how the community should contribute for this object. He maintained that we had a right to fall back on our borrowing power. He did not think it right where both the present community and those who came after them were to be benefitted that the present community were to bear the whole burthen of the cost. In the first place the country was bound to make good roads, and then it should call on the districts through which the roads passed to undertake the keeping of them in repair. He wished it to be understood that in supporting this view he did so not as a city member but as a representative having the interest of the country at heart. This was not a question of to-day, for he remembered one very nearly the same agitating the country some years ago, and the same principle which he supported at that time he supported now The whole duty of the Government was to lay the burthen as lightly as possible, and let after generations pay their share of the principal and interest He was very glad the Government had come to ask the opinion of the House before bringing in a Bill for the purpose of doing what they might afterwards see the undesirableness of doing

Mr BURFORD said this was a subject on which every one in the colony was equally interested, and like many other topics which had been brought before the House it would drive them to consider the question of taxation, for that was the perpetual stumbling block The hon member who had just sat down, remarked that the Ministry were not exposing themselves to the censure more or less conveyed in the remark that they did nothing without first ascertaining the feeling of the House, but what was the fact? They had not before them a Bill ready cut and dry in all its parts, but resolutions that according to the opinion of the House some Bill should be founded upon This was feeling the way He did not say it was an unhealthy course of action, it might be wise policy, though he would rather see a Bill to which the responsible Executive of the country had committed itself He believed that a distinction might be made between main and district roads, but that would throw them into the second resolution As to an assessment, he would be rather more ready to agree to one on property generally We were now at that happy point in our history when it was necessary to revise our position altogether, for we were stepping from the mud into the mire He had himself drafted an amendment to the effect that in the opinion of the House a Bill should be passed authorising the Treasurer to borrow at four separate periods, a sum of say £1,000,000, redeemable in 28 years The interest of £1,000,000 would be £6,000, and he thought we should not burthen ourselves or run too a great a risk if we allowed seven years to pay back, each £250,000, which would be quite a sufficient sum to raise at one time, inasmuch as it would keep all our idle hands employed for a considerable time It would be folly to borrow more than could be profitably expended, and this would be the only way of progressing in one direction without hampering ourselves in another It would allow us a free course, and would leave still in abeyance more than one question now unsettled in the minds of hon members and before Committees of the House

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor intimating that he complied with the terms of the addresses from that House, with respect to the Strathalbyn Tramway and the main road through Gawler Town

DEBATE RESUMED

Mr TOWNSEND said that the course adopted by the Government on the present occasion, in bringing forward the resolutions then before the House, was an exceedingly novel one It appeared by this plan the weaker the Government the better All they had to do when they doubted their position was to bring forward a series of resolutions to ascertain the feeling of the House as to any particular measure they might wish to introduce, and then subsequently to supplement it by a Bill if those resolutions should happen to be agreed to Surely they could not call this responsible Government, in fact, so far from its being responsible Government, it was a systematic course of submitting every question to the House for an expression of opinion before the Government would decide upon any distinct policy In fact, they had no policy, and as to responsible Government this system was far from approaching to its spirit

Mr REYNOLDS considered the question an important one, and one of the political problems of the day They were restricted to the first resolution, and he should, therefore, in the remarks he should make, confine himself to that He could not help expressing his regret that the Government had not seen fit to bring forward a Bill, and his disappointment was the more confirmed when he considered the experience the Government had already obtained on the subject, and the expression of opinion which had been freely taken from the Chairmen of District Councils He regretted the course the Government had adopted in bringing forward these resolutions, for it would tend to a waste of time, for they would have one discussion on the resolutions and then another on the Bill, and the House would be kept in a constant state of excitement It might be said that the introduction of the Bill without resolution would have "settled" the Government—(a laugh)—but he maintained that the Government were settled already (Laughter) They were settled in their willingness on all occasions to bow to the wishes of the House, and their consent to be a set of obedient machines They were always ready to yield readily to impressions, and in all this they must be considered as settled With respect to the question itself, he thought there could be no doubt as to the first proposition—"That in the opinion of this House it is desirable to maintain the distinction at present existing between main and district roads" If the Government took the district roads into their own hands, it would be impossible for them to make them, and therefore it was desirable that district roads should be left in the hands of District Councils, and main roads in the hands of the Government There was another question to be considered, that was whether the Government could afford to continue the contribution to District Councils With regard to the amendment of the hon member for Burra and Clare he would go with him

Dr WARK was disappointed with the resolutions before the House, inasmuch as allusions had been frequently made by the Government to a Road Bill which they proposed to introduce, and which he understood as forming a very important part of their policy But now they brought forward a set of resolutions on which they might found a Bill The fact was Select Committees were too stale It was a dodge too often repeated (A laugh) It had been said that they had a precedent for such a course of action in the British Parliament, but he begged to say that when it was practised, it was practised only by independent members, and not by any member of the Ministry It appeared on the part of the Ministry here that, when the Select Committee dodge got to be old, then they brought up something new, viz, legislation by resolution He considered that this was not an open or straightforward course, that whoever held office should declare a policy of their own, and abide by it It was unmanly to do otherwise—to saddle the House with a responsibility which they should take upon themselves There were a few points he would refer to, and with respect to the distinction of main roads from district roads that he thought had been partly grappled with by the hon member for Burra and Clare But with respect to those lines running parallel to lines of railway, if this resolution was to pass what would become of them? According to this resolution they were to be kept up as main roads He did not object to the principle of the amendment of the hon member for the Burra and Clare, but he thought that in any scheme devised, railways should be considered by themselves It was too momentous a subject to be treated slightingly

MESSAGE FROM LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

A message was received from the President of the Legislative Council, intimating that the Bills of Exchange Bill had been consented to with certain amendments, included in schedule Also, that the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill had been consented to with certain amendments, included in schedule

On the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, the consideration of these amendments was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

DEBATE RESUMED

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the position taken by the hon member opposite might be well expected, for it was the policy of that hon gentleman to shift his ground as the emergency of the case required it, without any regard to consistency of opinion When the Government introduced a Bill affecting the question of taxation, then that hon membre brought forward a motion calling upon the House to affirm the principle that no Bill for the purpose of imposing a tax should be introduced except by resolution of the whole House And now, when the Government sought, in accordance with a previous intimation from them, to amend a certain principle in the construction and maintenance of the main lines of road, and did so in accordance with the spirit of the hon member for the Burra and Clare's suggestion, their position was deprecated Then with regard to another point One hon member had spoken of the Government, having taken the House by surprise in their submitting a series of resolutions Why, in the speech by which that Council was opened it was stated that certain resolutions, would be introduced, and the Government were only acting in accordance with that intimation With regard to the position of the ministry in introducing these resolutions, and in the propriety of their so doing, he had said before what he would again repeat, that nothing was more easy in the event of the Ministry not meeting with confidence, than for the House to declare its opinion of their conduct in the usual manner It was only for those hon members who were discontented to so express their feelings, and the moment that opinion was held by the majority of the House, he for one should bow to it One hon member had spoken about the emolument pertaining to his office as Attorney-General in an equivocal manner inferring that the position he held was maintained from considerations of profit, but he could assure them that his office as Attorney-General was, on the contrary, a positive source of loss to him, and those in the profession in any way acquainted with the duties of his office would no doubt admit that his statement in this respect was in accordance with fact And as to any member of the Ministry being influenced by considerations of emolument in opposition to what they thought right, he thought such an opinion would not be harbored for a moment by those members who properly reflected on the subject With respect to the resolutions before the House, the Government had no desire nor right to dictate to the House the course they should adopt in this instance After alluding briefly to the system of the construction and maintenance of the roads as at present existing, the hon and learned member said with regard to the amendment of the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), that the latter portion of it was in accordance with the views of the Government, but as to the construction of railways, it was a question with the present Government whether they should pledge themselves to it at this time The essential principle now introduced in the House, was the distinction sought to be placed between main and district roads

Mr ROGERS said this was a very important question He did not object to the principle of the first resolution, but he thought there should be a general system of roads, in which the taxation should fall equally upon those having locomotive lines, and those with common roads only, and in which all parties would pay in equal proportion He thought the Government should introduce some self-supporting system The plan proposed by the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) was a good one, and one that would work well They should try a cheaper system of roads They did not want expensive railroads It was clear that the present system could not be carried on for long, as their borrowing power must soon become exhausted He thought a lighter system of railroads would be necessary or a system of common roads constructed on the same principle as railways, that is by borrowed capital

Mr NEALES suggested that the Commissioner of Public Works should alter one word in the first resolution which said "that in the opinion of this House it is desirable to maintain the distinction," &c He proposed that "the distinction" should be altered to "a distinction The hon member thought this alteration was very necessary, as from the confusion which had already existed with respect to main and district roads it was a question whether that distinction was so positive as the resolution seemed to infer

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS agreed to the amendment, and the resolution was altered accordingly

Mr HAY considered that the business of the House was, apart from any consideration of what was the practice of the House of Commons, which had been referred to by previous speakers, to take that course which would tend to bring out the greatest amount of information, and enable the House to frame the best Bill to meet the exigencies of the case If by bringing forward resolutions of the nature before the House that object could be best attained, then the Government had taken a proper course With regard to the present resolutions he was opposed to any system of tolls It would be impossible to collect them in this colony From Adelaide to the Burra Burra the country was so level, that there were only one or two places where toll-gates could be established To point to Gawler Town, for instance, but in that or other similar places the whole of the funds derived from such toll must either go to the local Corporation or to the Central Road Board, besides the toll would be unjust Taking the whole country through, he thought the system of tolls would not be fair or proper The hon member for the city, Mr Solomon, had said the construction and maintainance of the roads should be paid by the District Councils, but it had been shewn by previous speakers that such a system would be unjust In such a case the assessment now made would have to be doubled In discussing the present resolution, the House was not exactly in a fair position, as the Public Works Bill, which in a considerable measure affected the substance of these resolutions, was yet under consideration His view was that the country might be divided into north, south, and eastern portions and that a properly-constituted Board should be appointed or elected in each district, to which the Government might severally hand over the control of the main roads in each district respectively, and such a sum voted out of the general revenue as could be conveniently spared It was obvious at the present time that some radical change was required At the north there were constant applications for the construction of main roads, and in the eastern district, in addition to the already increasing lines of main roads, they did not know how soon they might be appealed to for the construction of new lines His belief was that the best course would be to hand over the main roads to responsible bodies, and vote such money in assistance as could be afforded out of the revenue If they did not adopt this course, then they must let the Public Works Bill be passed at once, and take the main roads into their own control And while the Government kept the control of the roads in their own hands let them provide the funds One advantage which he thought would be gained by the course he had proposed was that a great deal of the expense of the Central Road Board would be done away with One Surveyor in each district might do all that was necessary

Mr LINDSAY agreed with the first resolution which said that it was desirable a distinction should be made between district and main roads, but he thought also that a distinction should be made amongst district roads, between those which were likely to be lines of communication and those which would be for ever useless He would have this distinction made so that District Councils should spend the money intrusted to them in a proper manner, and not construct a road and then abandon it for one supposed to be better That had been the case already, deviation after deviation had been made at a considerable waste of money He agreed with the opinion of the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) that they should make their main lines of road if possible, self supporting But it was impossible to do this by tolls In England turnpike roads had thrown companies into irretrievable debt, and their only chance of escape would be by becoming insolvent The advantages which accompanied locomotive lines of road was that railways were in all countries self supporting and in some countries were immensely reproductive, if not in profit, in the decreased cost of transit of goods The hon member for Mount Barker had said they should have some cheaper system That was indisputable But that system should not be confined to the transit of goods only, but the transit of passengers should also be included The great question, however was, how the roads first constructed were to be maintained whether out of the general revenue or from some other source He thought the best system would be for the Government to survey and appropriate to public use the best of road, secondly, to construct them so far as their funds lines would allow, and thirdly hand them over to local bodies for maintenance The amendment of the hon member for Burra and Clare was, he considered, an improvement, and he should vote for the first resolution, as amended by that hon member

Mr MILNE also felt inclined to give his support to the resolution before the House, with the intent of which he agreed With respect to the second resolution, "That in the opinion of this House the whole amount which can be spared from the general revenue for road purposes should be devoted to the construction of roads and bridges" Knowing the policy of the Government in pushing forward railway communication, especially to the north, he thought it was very little that would be spared after the interest on the bonds was paid He should therefore prefer that a minimum sum should be named With respect to the third resolution, he agreed to it, understanding that it meant that the whole property of the colony should be assessed, and the funds so derived placed together for the general advantage of the whole, not that the funds of each particular district should form a separate fund Mr Solomon had talked about saddling the maintenance of main roads upon District Councils That, he thought, was met by the remarks of the hon member for Gumeracha (Mr Hay), but with respect to those districts through which railways passed, they should contribute in the same proportion as those who were compelled to keep up a system of main roads As to the question of tolls, such a mode of raising a revenue was open to many objections At the same time he could not forget that there were two or three lines of main road in Victoria which were self-supporting But he thought such a system would not work well here There was one portion of the traffic, however on which it would be advisable to impose a toll, that was on the cartage of stone There was no description of traffic that cut the roads up worse than this The hon member for Onkaparinga had propounded a scheme by which the colony was to be divided into different districts But the principle of this scheme was embodied in the Bill that was thrown out during the last session This scheme proposed to throw the burden of the maintenance of the main roads upon District Boards, and there was the contingency that such a body might not satisfactorily attend to their duty He thought therefore that the maintenance of the main roads should not be left to such a contingency He saw no course but to leave the construction and maintenance of the main roads in the hands of the Government, and if the revenue was not capable of supplying the funds, they should be raised by some general assessment on property

Mr DUNN would speak to the second and third resolution, as other hon members seemed not to confine themselves to that more especially before the House He had gathered some information with respect to the cost of transit in the south-eastern districts, and he found that from Strathalbyn to Adelaide the cost of cartage was 30s per ton of 2,000 lbs, and the cartage up from Adelaide to Strathalbyn varied from 50s to 80s per ton The distance to Strathalbyn was 35 miles He would compare this with the distance to Gawler which was 28 miles and to which the cost of transit was only 13s per ton Again, at Mount Torrens, which was about the same distance from Adelaide as Gawler Town, a friend had informed him that he had, during the last season, sent 600 tons, principally of grain, at a cost of 35s per ton, so that, instead of paying 4½d per bushel cartage as in Gawler Town he paid no less than 8½d extra This he considered placed the settlers who had not the advantage of railways in a disadvantageous position, and the proposal to assess all round would act in an unfair manner He thought the Government might well double the tolls on the railways, and then even the settlers in those districts would have the advantage of expedition over their neighbours, who would be taxed in another way to a similar amount As to the levying of tolls, he thought the feeling of the whole country would be against it As to the proposition for widening the tires of drays, it was preposterous, as it would take a quarter of a million to replace the vehicles in an efficient manner He thought a better system might be devised—that of regulating the carriage by the number of wheels—Two-wheeled carriages were much more injurious to the road than others with more wheels A cart with two wheels loaded with two tons would do as much injury to a road as a cart with four wheels loaded with five tons, and where the road was irregular it would do more injury, as when the two-wheeled carriage lounged over into a rut the weight was not equally divided He had had some conversation with several smiths, and he had been assured that it would be impossible, from mechanical difficulties, to put on six inch tires So it was perfectly useless to introduce a system which could not be carried out

The SPEAKER put the first resolution, which with the amendment which had been adopted, was carried

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS begged to make an alteration in the second resolution by introducing the word "appropriated" and striking out "be spared." Hon members in discussing the first resolution had travelled a little from the subject, but probably they had been induced to do so by the example which had been set by himself. He pleaded guilty to having been led in that direction. He should be very brief, because he believed with the hon member for Burra and Clare that it was as plain as two and two made four that the construction and maintenance of main roads could not at the same time be provided for. He would state that a decrease might naturally be expected from the land sales. He believed that if the whole of the proceeds of the sale of land were devoted to the construction and maintenance of main roads that for a few years there would be no complaints, but that every one would be well pleased at getting what they wanted. At no distant period however it would be found that the land sales would be insufficient to provide for the maintenance of the roads, and consequently that no more roads would be constructed. He believed that it would be the best for the colony at large to spend as much as possible upon the main roads, no matter whether locomotive, as they had been termed, or macadamized, but if they sought to do too much and to maintain as well as to construct the roads, he believed they would infallibly break down. That was a great truth, which he believed must have impressed every mind which had at all thought upon the subject. He was not wedded to the precise wording of the resolution, but merely sought to lay down a broad proposition. He should always advocate a certain sum being devoted every year to main lines of road and should endeavor to make that sum as large as possible but he should always endeavor to separate the construction and the maintenance.

Mr TOWNSEND moved as an amendment—"That in the opinion of this House the construction and maintenance of main roads should be provided for by the general revenue." He need say very few words in support of the amendment. A number of persons had bought lands upon the faith that the main lines of road would be maintained out of the general revenue, and upon the faith of that they had settled upon those lands, but it was now proposed that they should be assessed for the maintenance of those roads. This he felt would be an injustice, and when they were discussing the third resolution he should ask whether it was proposed that the assessment should be throughout the colony or only in the district through which the roads passed. If it were proposed that the assessment should be general, then his amendment precisely carried out that proposition, but if it were intended that the roads should be maintained by a taxation upon the district through which the roads passed, then he contended it would be a gross injustice, and he should oppose such a proposition. He believed the colony generally was in favor of the roads being maintained out of the general revenue.

Mr STRANGWAYS said no doubt it was a very general view that everything which could be done out of the general revenue should be, but the general revenue was limited, and if the ideas of many in reference to payments out of the general revenue were to be carried out the revenue would not bear it, though it were ten times larger. The last speaker had contended that if the main roads were not maintained out of the general revenue it would be a gross breach of faith towards those persons who had bought land upon the faith that they would be so maintained. But the general revenue of the colony being so limited, the maintenance of roads within a circuit of 30 miles of Adelaide, would absorb all that was applicable for such a purpose, and as it would be impossible to make main roads in the outlying districts, where parties had also purchased land, there would be complaints of as gross injustice having been committed in those quarters. The House must not look to one particular district, but the whole question of the construction and maintenance of roads must be considered. It appeared to him that there was a disposition on the part of some to make this a question of the town against the country, but he could not view it as such. If all the main lines of road which had been declared main lines, within a circuit of thirty miles of Adelaide, were to be fully constructed, all the revenue would be absorbed, and the roads in the more remote districts never would be constructed. If road accommodation were not given to the outlying districts, the value of land in those districts would of course be depreciated. He thought with the Commissioner of Public Works—with whom he occasionally differed—that the decision of the House should be separately taken as to the construction and maintenance of the roads. The amendment proposed that the construction and maintenance of main roads and bridges should be provided for out of the general revenue, whilst the third resolution referred entirely to the maintenance and repair. The second resolution referred also to the maintenance, but it appeared that portion might be struck out, as it was referred to in a subsequent resolution. He was desirous of proposing an amendment, but the difference between it and the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga was that whilst that hon member's amendment provided for the construction and maintenance, his (Mr Strangways's) provided for the construction only, leaving the maintenance provided for by a separate resolution.

Mr SOLOMON was desirous of moving an amendment to the second resolution.

The SPEAKER said there was already one amendment before the House, which it would be necessary first to dispose of.

Mr LINDSAY thought the proposition to separate the construction from the maintenance of roads a most important one. The hon member for Onkaparinga had said that it would be unjust to parties having property in the neighborhood of existing main roads not to maintain them out of the general revenue, but it would be a greater injustice to those who had purchased property in the neighborhood of nominal main roads if such main roads were never constructed at all. Ever since the first Road Act which had been introduced in the colony there had been nominally a main road to Encounter Bay, but the greater part existed only in the imagination. If the principle of the hon member for Onkaparinga was carried out, that the construction and maintenance of main roads shall be defrayed from the general revenue, such portions of road as existed only in theory would, he feared, never be constructed at all, and greater injustice would be done in that case than in the other in which roads had actually been constructed.

Mr REYNOLDS should support the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, which embodied a principle which he had enunciated some time ago. It appeared that the Government were of opinion that all the money which could be spared should be devoted to the main lines of road, and that no portion should be appropriated to the District Councils for that purpose. That was what he understood from the former portion of the resolution, and if that were the intention he agreed with that portion, thinking it wise to withhold the £25,000 or £30,000, which they had been in the habit of handing over to the District Councils. If there were to be an assessment levied upon the districts themselves, this would be a much shorter way, instead of handing over £25,000 or £30,000 in aid of the rates. If the House husbanded that sum the amount would go a long way towards keeping the main lines of road in repair. If they kept what they had been in the habit of handing over to the District Councils there would be no necessity for a special rate to keep the main lines in repair. Supposing, however, that the District Councils kept the main lines in repair, why, in the district which he represented, there were 25 miles running through, which at £200 a mile would amount to £5,000. It might be said that the road intersected two districts, so that there would be only a moiety to provide for, but he believed that Sturt and Mitcham would be called upon for at least £3,000. He believed these districts would be better satisfied, and that it would be the best way not to grant the District Councils sums in aid of the rates, nor to burden themselves with the main lines through the districts.

Mr BURFORD could not agree with the last speaker relative to District Councils. He should be sorry to refuse them a subsidy to their rates. He believed that by doing so they would be departing from their duty and losing sight of the best interests of the country. Hitherto the District Councils had been to a great extent justified in looking to that House to assist them in repairing the roads in various neighbourhoods, but if the recommendation of the hon member for the Sturt were to be followed, that arrangement would be interfered with, and they would stop the proceedings of District Councils for all future time. He would much rather, both as regarded them and the Corporation of Adelaide, that property should be equally assessed, rather than that House or the Government should be so hampered as to be unable to extend to those bodies that supplementary vote which they had been in the habit of giving. He believed it would be nothing short of folly to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for the Sturt, and that nothing would tend more to keep the country back instead of promoting its advancement than that very proposition. There were other ways open, which no doubt would be seen, by which the necessary funds could be provided without interfering with the advancement of the country in other directions. If they could accomplish that they would have reason, he was going to say, to congratulate themselves, or at all events they would have no necessity to pass a censure upon their own proceedings. He had shadowed forth his ideas upon the subject in an amendment, which he should introduce at the proper time; but in order to convey his ideas to hon members, he would read his proposition, which was to the effect "That a Bill should be introduced for the purpose of raising a loan of one million, in four separate sums, and separate periods, of £250,000, at 6 per cent, repayment extending over a period of 23 years, and interest to be provided by a general assessment of property throughout the colony." He thought the country would not be incurring any risk by merely incurring a liability upon the amount of 6 per cent per annum.

Mr BEAKE must oppose the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, as he did not believe in the soundness of the principle which it contained. He had already read an amendment condemnatory of the system they were now following, and which he understood the hon member for Onkaparinga was desirous of perpetuating. The hon member for Encounter Bay had stated that the toll or turnpike system in Great Britain had proved a failure, and that the road trusts were in fact in a state of insolvency. If the system were tried here he felt satisfied a similar result would follow, and that the whitewashing system would very soon follow. He trusted it would never be tried, as he did not believe it was possible it could prove remunerative. It was the maintenance of the roads which constituted the difficulty and not the construction. At present the toll which was levied upon railways or locomotives for passengers or goods in the shape of freight rendered the railway most likely to be reproductive, and it was most necessary that they should keep in view such terms as would continue to develope that self-supporting road system. He hoped the House would go with the resolution which he had previously read, and that the Commissioner of Public Works would not hesitate to adopt a course which he believed would find favor out of doors when information upon the point was diffused. The principle enunciated in the amendment was that the policy heretofore pursued failed to give adequate road accommodation, and that the means of doing so became yearly diminished. It must be obvious to all that there was not sufficient road accommodation in this colony. The hon. member for Mount Barker had by figures illustrated this in a most remarkable manner, though he (Mr. Peake) should use the illustration for a different purpose from that which the hon. member had intended. The hon. member's argument, as he understood it, went to show the necessity of doubling the present railway tolls. The hon. member had stated that a farmer from the south had had 600 tons of produce carried to market at a cost of 35s. per ton, the distance being about the same as the present railway accommodation, and the gross cost of the carriage being £1,050, whilst from the north a farmer could bring a similar amount of produce to market for £330, in other words, that the Strathalbyn farmer had to pay more than three times the amount for bringing his produce to market than he would have had to pay by railway. He did not say that he would commit the impolicy of doubling the railway tolls but he should be pleased to reduce the cost of bringing produce to market to the Strathalbyn farmer, and he thought that by capitalising the revenue set apart for the construction of roads, and getting on with the work on an extensive scale, they would ultimately benefit the Strathalbyn farmer and others similarly situated and enable them to bring their produce to market at 11s. per ton instead of 35s. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Mount Barker illustrated the policy of adopting such a system as would blot out the 35s. and substitute the 11s. He would ask the Commissioner of Public Works to go a little further, and say that it was expedient to capitalize so much of the revenue, as was set apart for roads and bridges, and that such main lines as did not yield sufficient to keep them in repair should be maintained by a special tax for that purpose. This policy had clearness and distinctness to recommend it, and he believed was correct. He hoped the House would adopt the idea, and that parties out of doors would see the policy that they were aiming at. No doubt there would be an expression of public opinion upon the point, and that the subject would be well ventilated.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there appeared to be some misapprehension existing in the minds of some hon. members. He wished it to be understood that, in speaking of roads after the first resolution, he invariably meant main roads, he did not mean any district road. To make it more clear, he would insert the word "main" before roads.

Mr. DUNN should support the amendment of the hon. member for Onkaparinga. He understood the general revenue to be created by a general tax, and if so, he saw no necessity for any second system, which was in fact, in many instances taxing one portion of the community at the expense of another. It was, he considered, unfair to tax one man more than another, merely because he happened to be living in another part of the country. If main roads were to be constructed and maintained by a general tax, why not increase the general revenue by some other taxation. He did not want to double the cost of carriage on the railway, but he did not want parties residing in other localities to be called upon to pay for a luxury which others enjoyed. The interest on the money borrowed for the construction of the railway came out of the general revenue, and what he wished was that all portions of the community should be taxed alike. It was particularly desirable that this should be the case in the agricultural districts.

Mr. MILNE could not adopt the amendment of his hon. colleague. It was quite notorious that the general revenue as it at present existed was quite unable to meet the cost of maintaining as well as of constructing the main lines. The hon. member for the Sturt had attempted to show the expediency of doing away with the supplementary aid to District Councils, but he must object to such a proposition. Looking upon this as a general question, he thought it would only delay the settlement a little longer if they withheld the aid to the District Councils. It was true that withholding that aid would give the House a greater command of money, but every year that they went on constructing additional main lines of road, they would be called on to devote a larger sum to the maintenance fund till very shortly they would be in the same difficulty again, only to an increased amount. It was impossible that they could withhold the aid. There was no doubt a difficulty connected with the question, but the better course would be at once to grapple with it. Let them at once say that the difficulty should be met by an assessment on the property of the whole country.

Mr. ROGERS supported the proposition of the hon. member for Onkaparinga. He did not object to particular parts being favored with railroads, but he contended that the tax should be put on all equally alike. If the general revenue were not sufficient for the purpose let them devise means to increase it, or see if they could not curtail their expenses a little. He certainly could not agree to the proposition to withdraw the aid from the District Councils, as if they did they would stop the operations of all corporate bodies. He believed the money with which such bodies had been subsidised had been well laid out, and that the colony had been advanced to a very great extent by the exertions of the District Councils. If those bodies had not been supplied with funds he believed that it would have been impossible to travel at all in many parts of the colony. He must object to a direct tax upon parties in the outer districts from which those in the neighbourhood of railroads were exempt. He could not believe it just that parties should be called upon to pay for advantages which were exclusively enjoyed by others.

Mr. NEALES said the last speaker had told the House to devise means of raising the revenue but he had not offered any remedy for the present shortness of revenue, and indeed he feared he would be puzzled to do so. He believed they must trust to the revenue as they had it in hand or as they expected to have it, certainly they would not accomplish the object which they had in view by carrying out the proposition of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, for that hon. member had proposed precisely what they wanted to get rid of. If the construction and maintenance of the main roads were to be paid out of the general revenue, the result would be that the revenue would be all taken up by this source in three or four years, and the bulk of the main roads would not be made at all. This would certainly be the case if they did not divide the construction from the maintenance. If the House thought well of the proposition of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, there was no necessity for legislation upon the subject, but let them throw out the Public Works Bill, and give the £70,000 to the Central Road Board. They would then shortly come to a standstill. They must divide the construction of roads from the maintenance. He objected to capitalizing any amount that could be spared for roads, as that looked too much like an eagerness to borrow. But they borrowed for railroads, and could go to the same source to borrow, if it were thought advisable to make any more macadamised roads. He believed that eventually, though the district roads would be macadamised roads, all the main roads would be either tramways or railways. He believed that the resolution did all that could be expected, though there might, perhaps be another resolution to carry out the views of the hon. member for Burra and Clare, but he did not pledge himself to vote for such a resolution, though it might be worth consideration. The resolution merely affirmed that all that could be spared for the main roads should be devoted to that purpose, that is, for their construction, not repair. They need not go back to the proposition of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, because that was in fact the present state of things, and a state of things which he was not disposed to continue. He did not like to see the hon. member for Mount Barker (Mr. Dunn) put down so completely, because the hon. member for Burra and Clare had not shown that the railway was paying interest and current expenses, and until he had done so, he would not consent to the difference between 11s. per ton and 35s., the cost of carriage to which residents in the south were subjected, was unfairly borne by the residents of Strathalbyn, Mount Barker, and other districts. If railways did not do all that the advocates of railways promised they should do, the charges should be adjusted at once, otherwise it might be argued that one district was robbed to give an advantage to another which had the advantage of railway communication.

Mr. PEAKE said the hon. member for the city (Mr. Neales) had said that unless he (Mr. Peake) could shew that the railway paid its current expenses and the interest of the money which had been expended upon it, he in fact proved nothing, but the hon. member appeared to forget that the Mount Barker road had had a very large sum expended upon the main road both in the construction and the maintenance. He was aware that a railway line was more expensive, but he believed this was compensated for by the self-maintaining power of the railway over the macadamised road. In reference also to cost, the expense of making as well as maintaining the common road must be computed.

Mr. DUFFIELD felt it to be his duty to oppose the amendment of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, as it had been patent for years past that the continuance of the present main road system was utterly impracticable. There was no better proof of this than that they had sold all the good land within a hundred miles of Adelaide, and had only made the main lines of road for about 25 miles. If it absorbed so large an amount of the general revenue to make a few miles of road, it must be patent that the funds to make the whole of the main lines were insufficient. It would be folly to perpetuate the system under which they were living as regarded the main roads. He did not know that there was any great objection to the resolution as it stood. He did not know that it could do much injury, he believed it to be very harmless, as it would be merely adopting a bare proposition, but the machinery to carry out that proposition would be a subject for after discussion He did not think the resolution could do any harm, but he was satisfied they would be doing great mischief by passing the amendment, as it would perpetuate a system under which they were at present existing and delay the improvement which was so clearly necessary in the main road system It was hardly necessary to advert to the arguments which had been used by various members representing various parts of the colony, but he could not help remarking that he thought there was too much of a district feeling brought to bear upon the question Hon members forgot that they were representatives of the Parliament of South Australia as well as the representatives of a particular district When he stood before the constituency of Barossa he told them that where the interests of the whole colony were at stake he should feel it his duty, perhaps, to sacrifice the individual interests of the district which he represented for the purpose of serving the country at large. He was afraid that broad principle was not so fully observed by hon members as it should be. Remarks had been made in reference to the relative cost of carriage from the northern districts and from Strathalbyn, but he would remind hon members that the Government could not carry out all public works which were necessary at one and the same time. Two hon members representing the district of Mount Barker had spoken upon the question, and had apparently forgotten that only a few days ago the House passed a resolution for a survey with reference to constructing a tramway from Strathalbyn so as to enable the farmers in that district to bring their produce to market at a lower rate than hitherto He thought this alone should remove complaints emanating from that district, as it showed the House were not disposed to favor one part of the country and forget the interests of other districts He thought this explanation would remove a difficulty which appeared to have been felt by the representatives of the special neighborhood to which he had alluded The hon member for the Sturt had said that it would be well for the House to consider whether it would not be desirable to withhold aid from the District Councils, but he could not assent to that proposition, and indeed must express an opinion that if any money had been spent with public greater advantage than another to the people of this country it had been the money which had been placed in the hands of the various District Councils He should oppose as long as he could any resolution to stop giving that assistance to local bodies which had been hitherto afforded, having seen how that money had been expended It was not necessary to follow the hon member (Mr Neales) through his various arguments, as the hon member had in fact confuted himself He gathered from the hon member that until it could be shewn that railways were paying their current expenses, and the interest of the money expended upon them, it was demonstrated that railways were a failure or something of the kind He thought that railways should be considered upon the same footing as main roads, as they were alike made for the use and convenience of the people, and although they did not at once pay their working expenses, still they were of such vital importance to the colony at large, that they conferred more than an equivalent, and although railways might yield a considerable revenue to the country, main roads did not pay any return to the general revenue They should keep that view of the subject in mind, because he felt that wherever a railway was practicable to connect a market with water communication it was desirable it should be laid down, and in fact, that the railway system should be extended throughout the country It would not be wise to expend any further sums upon macadamized roads where ultimately they would be called upon to construct railroads Macadamized roads were in fact almost exploded in the present day, and railways were admitted to be the best and cheapest in the end He need merely refer to the experience of the different countries in Europe Up to the present day the main roads in England were enormously in debt, and as had been stated there were no other means of the Road Trusts extricating themselves but by a declaration of insolvency He believed the main lines in England were in debt to the extent of £300 for every mile of road in England at the present time

The TREASURER had a few remarks to make in reference to the statement of the hon member for Mount Barker He would compare the cost of the roads to Mount Barker and Gawler Town The hon member had based his statements upon the assumption that the residents of Mount Barker and other districts were paying the interest of the outlay upon the railways In order to look at the question in its proper light he would consider what sum was fairly due for main roads The railway was extended so far as Kapunda, and that would probably be the whole expense in that direction for main roads He would see what the cost amounted to, and if it were larger than the amount which the general revenue paid to other districts If, however, it were found that the North only got its fair share, of course the argument of the hon member for Mount Barker fell to the ground The sum of £53,000 a year was a permanent charge for the various railway works as far as Kapunda Out of that £53,000 a year the receipts for 1859 amounted to £9,000, so that the general public only paid £44,000 a year for this system of roads, and he would ask if this were too large a sum? The whole contributions from the general revenue for other districts amounted to about £100,000 a year, so that whilst other districts cost £100,000 a year, the North cost only £44 000 a year Thus he had, he thought, shewn that though the North was benefitted by railways it had not received more than its fair proportion The East, the South, and the South-Eastern districts were getting sums expended upon them which would never be replaced, whilst the North was receiving a contribution which it would gradually diminish

Mr LINDSAY wished to correct some errors into which the two or three last speakers had fallen The hon member (Mr Neales) and the hon member (Mr Peake) were to a considerable extent right and to some extent wrong The argument of the hon member for the city was perfectly correct, assuming that railways did not pay their working expenses, and the interest upon the capital invested, but if they did his argument fell to the ground It was generally felt that the northern district had had a large sum expended upon it, in fact, from a return which he had procured, it appeared that whilst £560,000 had been expended upon the north, only £160,000 had been expended upon the southern district This shewed that there was a considerable sum due to the south which no doubt would be eventually paid If as the hon member for Mount Barker stated the agriculturists in the north only had to pay 11s per ton for the conveyance of produce to market, whilst the farmers of the south had to pay 35s and that the south contributed what in fact the north ought to pay, it shewed there must be something radically wrong in the way in which our railways were managed It was always assumed that railways were self-supporting, and not only that but that they would produce something to the revenue If the present rate of tolls were not sufficient, they should be increased; but if they compared the rate of charges with those of other countries, it would appear that there must be something radically wrong in the whole system, for he found that the present charges amounted to 7d per ton per mile, and if the railway were not paying expenses at that rate, there must be something radically wrong, for in other countries the charge was not more than one-sixth of this rate In the Western States of America the farmer could get his produce conveyed into market for three farthings per ton per mile, and although we could not hope to work railways so cheaply here, he believed that the charges might be approximated within 200 or 300 per cent

Mr ROGERS moved that the House divide This motion was carried, and upon the SPEAKER putting the question, the amendment was lost

Mr SOLOMON was desirous of moving another amendment, affirming the principle that they should raise funds for the purpose of making main roads The amendment was to the effect, that in the opinion of the House it was desirable that for the purpose of constructing main roads, a million of money should be borrowed at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent, the sum borrowed not to exceed £200,000 in any one year, and the loan to be redeemable in 28 years, the roads after construction to be maintained by assessment upon the property in the districts in which they were situated

The SPEAKER pointed out that the amendment could not be put, as it would be in contradiction of a portion of the original motion, which had been affirmed

Mr STRANGWAYS said he too was desirous of introducing an amendment, but wished to know how he was to introduce it

The SPEAKER said another amendment could be proposed if it could be so framed as to come in after those words in the original motion, which it had been resolved should stand part of the question

Mr BURFORD almost thought he would be enabled to make his proposition to dovetail in He would move as an addition to the motion, that a Bill be introduced authorizing the Treasurer for the time being to bring in a Bill to borrow a million of money at 6 per cent., to be repaid at stated periods within 28 years The House would perceive he had so framed the resolution that time could be chosen by the Executive for making their calls

The SPEAKER said the hon member had better move the resolution as an amendment to the next resolution, and Mr Burford having acquiesced, the resolution as originally proposed was carried

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the 10th instant

MR STUART'S DISCOVERIES

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table the journal connected with the recent exploration by Mr Stuart, which was ordered to be printed

THE IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the House went into Committee upon this Bill The 46th to 49th clauses, relating to the delivery of cattle upon payment of the sum claimed for damage, order for delivery of the cattle, compensation for trespass, and effect of judgment on conviction under the Act were passed as printed

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS suggested that the House should allow the Act to be reprinted with the various amendments, as he did not intend to take it out of Committee Its provisions could be considered on a future day

The SPEAKER reminded the hon gentleman that several clauses had been postponed

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was aware of this He was desirous of introducing a new clause, to the effect that fences should consist of two rails or three wires, or something equal thereto, and should not be less than four feet from the ground

Mr MILNE considered this clause of such importance that he trusted it would not be entertained till it had been printed

The SPEAKER said the object of bringing forward the clause now was that it might be printed with the Bill

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained to the House the object the Government had A great number of amendments had been passed which affected the character of the Bill, and they consequently wished the Bill to be reprinted, when the Government would move the recommittal of the whole Bill, so that the whole question might be again brought forward

Mr DUFFIELD certainly did not like the clause in its present form He did not see the use of it, as it really did not describe what a fence was or should be, but merely said "something equal thereto," so that the decision of the whole case would in fact be left to two Justices, as under the old Act, which had not worked well

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Commissioner of Crown Lands in framing this clause had apparently forgotten that, in country districts, there were a large number of fences known as log-fences, kangaroo-fences, &c, nor did it appear that walls were included under the head of fences He should have no objection, however, to assent to the clause, upon the assurance given by the Attorney-General that the whole Bill should be reconsidered

Mr HARVEY thought it would be of the utmost utility to have this clause It was the very thing that had given rise to so much dispute as to what was a fence, but this clause would settle the matter At present there were a number of what he could only term cattle-traps, as the moment a beast touched the fence it fell down, and then the owner claimed full damage for trespass If it were properly defined what constituted a fence, a great deal of the existing evil would be done away with

Mr LINDSAY would not oppose the clause if it were distinctly understood that another opportunity should be afforded of discussing the whole Bill, but the custom of the Government appeared to be first to thrust things down members' throats, and then to say, "Oh, you've passed them, you've passed them, and they can't be altered "

The clause was then passed , also clauses 50 to 52

Upon the 53rd clause being proposed,

Mr STRANGWAYS moved, that the Act take effect from the passing thereof

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS thought it would be better that it should take effect from the 1st of January, as it was necessary that a number of poundkeepers should be gazetted under it

Mr HAWKER wished to make a slight addition to clause 18, which he had been requested to make by the hon member for Light

The SPEAKER said the hon member would have an opportunity of doing so when the Bill was recommitted

Upon clause 24, which had been postponed being proposed, providing that poundkeepers should give notice in the Government Gazette to the owners of cattle impounded,

Mr HAWKER said it was the universal wish in the country districts that the insertion should not be in the Government Gazette, but in the two weekly newspapers This had also been stated by many members of the House and there could be no doubt that publicity would be gained better by advertising in the two weekly papers than by forcing Poundkeepers to advertise in a paper which was never seen The House would meet the wishes of the country districts in a very peculiar manner, by assenting to the amendment, and he would therefore move that the notices of impounded cattle be published in the weekly newspapers, instead of the Government Gazette

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS pointed out that in one or two subsequent clauses which had been agreed to, the Government Gazette was mentioned The subject had been fully discussed, and he could not believe that the general sense of the House was against advertising in the Government Gazette which was certainly the most convenient publication for reference where proceedings were taken There were a great number of subscribers to the Gazette which was also sent to the various District Councils, and he could not see any difficulty in persons obtaining access to it The alteration proposed would be productive of great additional expense, and this expense would of course be deducted from the proceeds of the cattle

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the insertion of words requiring the poundkeepers to keep copies of the Government Gazette open for inspection between the hours of sunrise and sunset free of charge He believed this would meet the view of many hon members With respect to the publication in the newspapers, if it were proposed to publish in them as well as in the Government Gazette, he would give in, but newspapers must publish the impoundings as news, and he could not see why the owners of impounded cattle should be taxed for the benefit of the newspaper proprietors

Mr HAY supported the proposition of the hon member for Victoria, which he did not believe would be attended with more expense than the present system

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated that the amount paid into the Treasury for impounding notices for 1857, was £164 He did not think that either of the daily papers would publish the impounding notices for anything like that sum

Mr DUFFIELD thought there must be a special record of impounding notices and he was not aware that any official record could be obtained by placing the notices in the weekly papers A short time ago only one weekly paper was published in Adelaide, and such might occur again He should certainly oppose any course which would add to the expenses, which were already so heavy that when cattle were sold after being impounded, it was seldom that anything was left for the owner

Mr HARVEY supported the proposition of the hon member for Victoria, being satisfied there was no use in advertising in the Government Gazette He believed the course proposed by the hon member for Victoria, was that which would meet the cordial approval of the country districts

The clause was carried as originally proposed with the addition proposed by Mr Strangways

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed another clause imposing a penalty of £20 upon any poundkeeper incorrectly describing the brands of a beast He had been informed that it was no uncommon thing for poundkeepers erroneously to describe the brands of cattle, in order that they might not be recognised by the owners and that they might be sold a bargain

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would be glad to have the clause printed, and it could afterwards be struck out if it were not considered desirable to retain it Poundkeepers could readily ascertain the brands of cattle if they chose to take the trouble to do so

Various other clauses which had been postponed having been passed the Attorney-General reminding the House that the Bill would be recommitted after it had been reprinted, the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday week

Upon the motion of the TREASURER, the consideration in Committee of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday next, and the House adjourned at 25 minutes to 6 o clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

MR JOHN MACDOUALL STUART

Mr STRANGWAYS presented a petition from Mr John Macdouall Stuart, stating that he had discovered a country to the north-west of the head of Spencer s Gulf and had furnished his journal to the Commissioner of Crown Lands The petitioner prayed that the House would take steps to stay the publication of the journal until the conditions precedent to its publication had been assented to by the House

The petition having been read—

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS wished to make a few remarks in connection with this subject upon a point of privilege

The SPEAKER thought the hon gentlemen had better not do so at present

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said his object was to support the prayer of the petition that the printing of the journal be stayed

The SPEAKER said that when the House was fuller and there were 18 members present the hon gentleman could then move the suspension of the Standing Orders, to enable him to make a statement upon the subject

Mr STRANGWAYS gave notice that on Friday next he should move the petition be printed

Mr MACDERMOTT, with the permission of the House, begged to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether the allegations contained in the petition just read were correct

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that in answering the question he should be enabled to state the various points of the case, which he had previously been desirous of communicating to the House He had been in communication with Mr Stuart since that gentleman's return on the subject of his recent discoveries Several letters had passed between them, copies of which had been laid upon the table of the House In the course of the correspondence he had intimated personally to Mr Stuart that it would be better he should confide his journal to him confidentially, in order that he might be in a better position to judge of Mr Stuart's labors and discoveries and of the course which he should recommend the House to pursue in rewarding them This was done Mr Stuart handed him his journal and on the previous day he had an interview with Mr Chambers and Mr Stuart to whom he stated the heads of the resolution which he would introduce to the House upon the information being furnished to the Government which was in Mr Stuart s possession The heads of that resolution were embodied in a letter which he wrote to Mr Stuart, who then placed his journal and map in his hands, with the distinct understanding that they should be laid upon the table of the House The two gentlemen, Mr Chambers and Mr Stuart, did not deny that the distinct understanding was, that the journal and map should be laid upon the table of the House, but unfortunately they did not know and it did not occur to him to inform them that the result of laying them upon the table of the House would be that they would be printed as a matter of course On that point there had been a misunderstanding on the part of the two gentlemen to whom he alluded, although there had been none on his own They distinctly understood that he was to have permission to lay the journal and map upon the table of the House, but they did not understand that this would involve the printing of the documents As they had stated to him personally, and Mr Stuart had stated to the House by petition, that it was desired the journal should not be printed, he was happy to support the prayer of the petition

Mr STRANGWAYS called the attention of the House to the question of privilege involved in this case, and moved that the Standing Order relative to the matter be suspended, and that the Order of the previous day relative to the printing of the journal be discharged

Mr MILDRED seconded the motion, which was carried, and the order for printing the journal was in consequence rescinded

WINE AND BEER LICENCES

Mr BAKEWELL moved, according to notice, for a Select Committee to enquire into the operation of the existing system of granting wine and beer licences, whether the law can be improved, and if so, to prepare a Bill for that purpose He would state to the House the grounds upon which he thought the House would be justified in acceding to this motion They were aware that in the colony there were two descriptions of licenees, the one being a publican's general licence, and the other a wine and beer licence The licence called the publicans' general licence placed the holder under certain restrictions and disabilities, for instance, he had to pay 25*l* for a licence, and the licence would not be granted unless the house were fit for the reception of travellers, and he must find sureties for the due fulfilment of the provisions of the Licensed Victuallers Act Nor was this all for the holder of a publican's general licence was subject to certain police regulations, he was subject to the surveillance of the police, and was compelled to close his house at 11 o'clock at night, and open it at a certain hour in the morning The holders of general licences were subject, no doubt, to very proper restrictions, and he did not complain of the position in which the holders of general licences were placed, nor, he believed, did the licensed victuallers themselves complain, but he would proceed to direct the attention of the House to the position of the holder of a wine and beer licence, who paid £12 a year for this description of licence, which was granted to any one who chose to apply for it without making any enquiry, in fact, the occupant of any "shanty" or pigstye could get a licence When he had got the licence he was free from all the restrictions which attached to the holders of general licences The holder of such a licence had nothing to do but to sell wine and beer at any hour he pleased, and was not subject to the surveillance of the police, but was at liberty to sell at all hours of the day and night, and on Sunday as well as on any other day The Police Force, from the construction placed upon the Act, did not consider that they had any right to interfere with the holders of wine and beer licences The houses which were so licensed were open from morning to night, and from night till morning They were frequently he was informed crowded at 12 o clock at night, and were promoters of drunkenness and vice in every form He believed that the House would be surprised when the evidence which could be obtained upon this subject was laid before them A great many of the houses were no doubt respectably kept, but the majority were most improperly kept and were the resort of bad characters and drunken persons The information which he had given to the House he was not personally possessed of, but it had been communicated to him by persons well acquainted with the subject He held in his hand two letters from highly intelligent persons perfectly competent to form an opinion upon the subject, expressing the strongest opinion as to the mode in which such houses were conducted, they considered them most detrimental to the public morals He believed it to be most impolitic that there should be any distinction between the general licence and the wine and beer licence as regarded the surveillance of the police He believed that when the report of the Committee was laid before the House it would be deemed absolutely essential that there should be an alteration in the existing system It appeared to him that there should be no distinction, but that the holders of licences, whether general, or wine and beer, should be subject to the same regulations. The holders of general licences were bound to keep a lamp burning in front of their premises from sunset to sunrise, and this involved a cost of £15 a year, but the holder of a wine and beer licence was not bound to do this. The holder of a general licence was bound to entertain travellers, but the holder of a wine and beer licence was not There was no reason why the holder of a wine and beer licence should not be subject to the same police restrictions as the holder of a general licence He believed the question would be best dealt with by a Committee, and if the Committee reported that wine and beer licences were a great advantage to the community, and that they were an accommodation to parties who did not like to enter a public house, then a positive advantage would be conferred upon the holders of such licences, but if the allegations to which he had alluded were correct, the House would agree with him that it was time action was taken to place the holders of both descriptions of licenses upon the same footing

Mr SOLOMON seconded the proposition of the hon member for Barossa He thought the House would see the necessity of appointing a Committee for various reasons, and amongst others the necessity which existed for the protection of the public revenue He believed the fact was notorious, or at all events he had been informed by an authority which he relied on, that coffee-houses—the owners of which held wine and beer licences, and the owners of oyster shops and various other establishments, instead of restricting themselves to the sale of wine and beer, supplied spirits as well If the holders of wine and beer licences were under the surveillance of the police as were the holders of general licences, he could understand that very many of the evils now complained of would cease to exist, but whilst the holder of a general licence, who paid £25 per annum for a licence, was compelled to close his doors at a reasonable time, parties holding wine and beer licences, under cover of coffee and oyster shop-keepers, were enabled to keep their establishments open all night, and he believed, not only sold grog, but that these establishments were the resort of very improper characters That such a system should exist in such a city as Adelaide he thought would be admitted was wrong, and upon an enquiry before a Select Committee he believed it would be fully established that all the abuses to which he had alluded in reference to the holders of wine and beer licences did really exist He thought the House would feel that they would only be doing their duty in granting the Committee now asked for, and if it should be shown, as he believed it would, that such establishments were perfectly independent of the interference of the police, that they evaded the payment of a just amount to the revenue, and were detrimental to the morality of the colony, the House would see the necessity of effecting some alteration in the existing system

Mr MILDRED said he should support the motion generally upon the grounds which had been stated He had had opportunities for a great number of years of seeing the working of the system, and he believed that persons holding wine and beer licences in nine cases out of ten violated the law The only excuse he had ever heard for these licences—the only pretext he had ever heard brought forward was, that they approximated to free trade If that principle were introduced in every department he should have no objection to it He wished to see all placed on the same footing It would, however, he thought, be worthy of consideration whether the licence fee, payable by parties carrying on business in the country, should not be reduced

Mr MILNE had great pleasure in supporting the motion Allusion had been made during the debate to certain abuses which existed in town under wine and beer licences, but whether these allegations were true or not he objected to wine and beer licenses existing in a large town like this, because he believed that great injustice was done to the holders of licences of another class and for which a higher fee was exacted It was never intended that wine and beer licences should be issued in places where there was a large trade, the object of such licences was to afford accommodation to outlying districts, where the trade could not be expected to be large and where the holder of a license could not afford to pay a high amount for a license, nor afford that accommodation which was expected from the holder of a general licence Still some accommodation was considered necessary for travellers, and hence it was that wine and beer licences were introduced He hoped the enquiry would result in wine and beer licences being altogether done away with in large towns

Several other members rose to address the House, when

Mr HAWKER moved that the House divide, which course was adopted, and the motion was carried, the Committee appointed being—Messrs Lindsay, MacDermott, McEllister, Mildred Solomon, Strangways, and the mover

The Committee had leave to report on the 11th inst, and to call for persons and papers

MR STUART'S EXPLORATION

Mr NEALES said that on Wednesday last he put a notice on the paper of a question to the Commissioner of Crown Lands relative to a letter which he believed had been received from Mr Stuart, who had recently made large discoveries in the north, but the question had lapsed in consequence of the pressure of business, and he was now desirous of asking the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether such a letter did exist, and if so, whether there was any objection to it being laid upon the table of the House He believed the letter would shew that most important discoveries had been made

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the letter referred to he had laid upon the table of the House on the previous day He had no objection to state the purport of the letter Mr Stuart's exploration was certainly one of the most extraordinary ever performed with such small means within the range of the Australian continent It would be shown by the correspondence that he was prepared to recommend the House to deal most liberally with the discoverer

THE COLONIAL SURGEON

Mr BAKEWELL moved the notice in his name—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return showing

"1 The reason assigned by Mr Nash for being obliged to give up his private practice to attend wholly to the duties of Colonial Surgeon together with copies of any correspondence that may have taken place between the Government and Mr

Nash on that occasion, such return to contain the name of the Assistant Surgeon receiving Government pay, before and after such alteration took place, together with the date and year thereof

"II The number of patients, male and female, at that time in the General Hospital, Lunatic Asylum, Gaol, and Destitute Asylum each to be given separately

"III The number of patients, male and female, at the present time in the General Hospital, Lunatic Asylum, Gaol, and Destitute Asylum—each to be given separately, such return to contain the number of cases of midwifery that have occurred in the latter since the present Colonial Surgeon has been appointed, and the name of the doctor who attended such cases

"IV The number of the out-door sick poor, claiming public aid, attended by the Colonial Surgeon daily, at their own homes, during the four weeks prior to the return being made

"V The number in the horse and foot police, or any other class (excepting the poor) whom the Colonial Surgeon is bound to attend

"VI The number of deaths that have occurred to all persons relieved out of the public funds, since the present Colonial Surgeon has been appointed, such return to state the abodes, names, sexes, ages, diseases year and date, when, and where such deaths may have taken place

"VII The amount of salary paid Mr Nash prior to his giving up all private practice, to attend wholly to the duties of Colonial Surgeon

"VIII The amount of salary paid Mr Nash after giving up all private practice, the better to enable him to devote his entire time to the discharge of the increased duties of Colonial Surgeon

"IX The amount of salary paid the present Colonial Surgeon, with any and what may be the extra amount allowed for incidental expenses of horse, gig, &c, and whether the Colonial Surgeon is allowed the privilege of pursuing his private practice"

It was unnecessary to detain the House by stating the reasons which had prompted him to ask for the information The question, it would be observed, had reference to the condition of the destitute poor of this colony, and the information asked for would throw light upon the question whether the arrangements for medical attendance were the best which could be devised He did not say what the result of these returns would probably be, but he would remark that many were of opinion a better system in reference to medical attendance than that which prevailed could be adopted He believed that the returns would speak for themselves He did not wish to impute any neglect to the medical gentleman at present filling the office of Colonial Surgeon, as no one could be more attentive to his duties, the fault rested not with that gentleman but with the system, and the gentlemen with whom he had communicated thought that a much better system in reference to attendance upon the destitute poor might be adopted

Mr MILDRED seconded the motion

Mr BURFORD supported the motion, remarking that he felt particularly interested in the subject, as it affected the public welfare, and he believed the state of the poor at present was far from satisfactory Greater facilities for relief under their sufferings should be afforded

The motion was carried

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table copy of a letter from the Chief Secretary, appointing the present Colonial Surgeon, which would answer one portion of the returns asked for, as it would show the terms upon which the Colonial Surgeon held his appointment, and the duties which he was expected to perform

The letter was read

Mr STRANGWAYS wished for further returns, but if the Government would undertake to furnish them without notice he would not burden the notice paper The information he asked for had reference to the number of patients in the Hospital, Destitute Asylum, and Lunatic Asylum, attended by the Colonial Surgeon during last month

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said he should be happy to afford any information in reference to this or any other department without notice, if hon members would give him in writing a statement of the information which they required He had no doubt he should be able at once to give the information which was required but if there were any objections, he would state the reasons which prevented the Government from giving the information asked for

Mr NEALES moved that the petition of John Finnis, respecting the completion of the first number of the Hansard be referred to a Select Committee, for the purpose of ascertaining what claims he has for the payment of such work It would appear from the petition, that the petitioner completed a contract which was undertaken by the proprietor of the Times, for whom he had become surety, and the whole amount of the contract would have become forfeited in consequence of the non completion of the contract, owing to the insolvency of the party by whom the work was originally undertaken The petitioner advanced a considerable sum to the contractor, but was afterwards placed in such a position that he was compelled in self-defence to save himself as surety to complete the contract It was clear that the work had been completed, for he held a copy of it in his hand It had been well got up, and although the whole amount which he believed was claimed by Captain Finnis were immediately paid to him, he would still be a very heavy loser by his unfortunate connection with the work All that he wanted was that a Select Committee should be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining to what amount the petitioner really had a claim The existence of the work could leave no doubt that the petitioner had a claim, and it would be for the Select Committee to determine what was the amount The operations of the Committee need be but very brief, as the petitioner was prepared immediately to produce the necessary evidence to enable the Committee to determine what was really due

Mr STRANGWAYS, in seconding the motion, remarked that if he remembered rightly the House had already voted £500 for this very work, that amount being included in the £1,300 upon the Supplementary Estimates, a portion of which was for the "Hansard" of the present session He was at a loss to imagine how the Government could refuse to pay what it certainly appeared the petitioner was in a position to claim Whenever any person had a claim upon the Government, which was partially recognised, but virtually refused, it was the duty of the House, he considered, to appoint a Committee of Enquiry

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would be in the recollection of hon members, that when the sum of £500 was voted for this work he had stated on the part of the Government that they would not make the payment until they had obtained from the House an opinion as to whether the work had been performed in a proper manner, and that the amount claimed was really due He believed there was no better way of testing this than the course proposed by the hon member Mr Neales, and had great pleasure in supporting the proposition for a Select Committee.

The motion was carried, and the Committee appointed were The Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Bagot, Collinson, Hawker, Hart Strangways, and the mover, with liberty to call for persons and papers, and to report this day week

MR JOHN HINDMARSH

Mr NEALES postponed till the 17th inst, the motion in his name, that the report of the Committee on the petition of John Hindmarsh, be adopted by this House

MAJOR WARBURTON'S DESPATCHES

Mr STRANGWAYS moved "That in the opinion of this House the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration, Mr Dutton, in shewing to persons connected with the public press, public despatches, which he (the Commissioner) considered it would be undesirable to lay on the table of this House, acted injudiciously and improperly Hon members were aware that the despatches alluded to were certain despatches from Major Warburton, who had been lately appointed to the command of the exploring expedition An analytical report of the contents of these despatches had appeared in the public press, and the contents of the despatches had been commented upon Although these despatches had been furnished, he presumed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, or at his request, to persons connected with the public press, that hon gentleman, in his place in the House, in reply to a question put to him, had stated that it was undesirable these despatches should be laid upon the table of the House It appeared singular to him that a Government officer should exhibit public despatches to parties connected with the public press, when he considered it undesirable to make these despatches public in the ordinary way by laying them upon the table of the House He considered conduct of that kind perfectly inexcusable, as it amounted to this—that members of the House could not be trusted with public despatches which might with safety be entrusted to persons connected with the public press He believed the House would not agree to such a proposition, but would consider that public despatches might with as great safety be entrusted to members of that House as to the editors or reporters of the public press With reference to this motion he would refer to the course which was pursued in other countries Not long since a member of Lord Derby's administration was censured for publishing a despatch to Lord Canning censuring him relative to his conduct in India If that were the custom in England, how far more reprehensible was it for the Commissioner of Crown Lands to show representatives of the press despatches which it was considered undesirable to lay upon the table of the House The fact no person could venture to dispute as hon members had no doubt seen the contents of the despatches in the public press, and were also aware that the Commissioner of Crown Lands had stated it was undesirable to lay them upon the table of the House

Mr REYNOLDS seconded the motion

Mr BURFORD would be sorry to inconsiderately censure the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands but perhaps that hon member would oblige the House with some explanation such as he had no doubt the hon member could give (Laughter)

Mr DUFFIELD was not prepared to take part in the discussion, for he must admit that he hardly expected that the matter would be entertained very seriously by the House, but as no one else had risen to speak on the subject, he felt called upon to move as an amendment the previous question

He did not express any opinion as to the expediency of the course taken by the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands in the matter He would not say that that hon member had acted judiciously, but he could not, nor did he think the majority of the House would say that he had acted improperly (Hear hear) If the House thought it desirable, or if any hon member moved that it was desirable that the non the Commissioner of Crown Lands should leave his present post, he (Mr Duffield) could understand the question being entertained, but to pick out the members of the Government one after another, and bring up discussions of this kind was merely wasting time as it could lead to no satisfactory conclusion either in the mind of the hon member himself (Mr Strangways) or in that of the House

Mr NEALES supported the previous question He would be quite prepared when any member of the Government offended public opinion or the opinion of that House, to join in such a censure against that individual as there could be no mistake about but he would not hedge about between such phrases as "improper" and "injudicious" If any member of the Government was not suited to the public service, let him be censured in such a way that there could be no mistake about it, but in a case of this kind one man might stomach such a word as "improper" whilst another would not do so If this motion were to be brought forward at all, it should be as a direct censure, and a recommendation that the officer complained of should be dismissed He should therefore vote for the previous question It appeared that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands did put the letters at the disposal of the two daily papers of the province, and that the conductor of one of those papers did not think by the words of the permission given to him he was justified in going to the extent to which the other paper proceeded, for no one could advance the statement that both took exactly the same course But the letters were thrown open to every member of the House (Loud cries of "hear, hear," and "no, no") It was a statement which he was prepared to stand to, that every hon member could have read the letters if he chose, and those who did not avail themselves of the opportunity or who were not present should not cry "no, no" now It was said that other parties besides hon members had got hold of the letters, and if so the members who gave the letters had done wrong, but they could not blame the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands That hon gentleman had said that there were portions of the letters which he thought would be very painful and trying to some parties, meaning the female portion of Mr Babbage's family, inasmuch as these passages referred to the dangers which Major Warburton believed Mr Babbage had run into The article in the paper showed that the writer was well informed, but it suppressed the facts which the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands assigned as one of the reasons for not publishing the despatches in full (Hear, hear) If they were inclined to blame the Ministry or any other body of men, let them attack these persons fairly and openly, but he would never be entrapped into a vote of this description as it was one which might be read differently by a person of callous disposition, or by a man of nervous or sensitive temperament (Laughter)

Mr HAWKER moved that the House divide (Cries of "No")

Mr MILNE thought as there was a strong censure attempted to be thrown upon the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands it would be time to move the previous or any other question when the hon gentleman had explained the circumstances He quite agreed with the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) that every hon member had an opportunity of reading the letter, but the gist of the matter was, as the letter was not laid officially upon the table of the House, whether it should have been given to any person connected with the press for the purpose of being printed in the newspapers

Mr BURFORD rose, but being received with cries of "Spoke," resumed his seat

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that perhaps hon members would like him to say a few words on the matter (Hear, hear) He had always been actuated by a desire of laying before the public information relative to this expedition, in which the public as well as the House took a deep interest When the despatch of Major Warburton arrived, he considered that it contained matter which, if published, was calculated to cause great anxiety to the friends of Mr Babbage, and which he thought on that account it would not be desirable to publish (Hear, hear) In accordance with his practice on former occasions he showed Major Warburton's despatch to a gentleman whom the hon member for Encounter Bay termed a person connected with the press, but whom he would call the hon member for East Torrens—(hear, hear)—and requested that hon member to publish an outline of the information contained The hon member (Mr Barrow) understood that the document was not to be published in extenso, and he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) fancied that no harm would have been done if the hon member had limited himself to conveying the information, and had not coupled it with comments of his own He thought it scarcely fair for the hon member to comment upon matters which he did not put before the public in their entirety, so that the public could judge of the correctness or otherwise of those comments He could not agree with the hon member for Encounter Bay that his conduct in showing the documents to the hon member for East Torrens was wrong, but if he had made an error, it was from his desire to prevent the family of Mr Babbage from experiencing pain and anxiety He had also stated that all the despatches were at the disposal of hon members for perusal They were perused by many hon members and he was not aware until now that there was any hon member who had not seen them He had not shown the despatches to any person unconnected with the Legislature

Mr BARROW said it was evident there had been a sort of semi official publication and those hon members who loved precedents would find many such cases in the old country He could quite go with the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, when that hon member stated that the letters were freely circulated amongst hon members He had seen them passing from hand to hand both in that chamber and in the library of the House He had seen them handed from one hon member to another when the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands was not standing by, and if any hon member gave the letters to persons not connected with that House, such hon member was alone to blame for doing so (Hear hear) He could not agree with the hon member (Mr Milne) that the letters handed to persons connected with the press were not so handed with a view to publication for of what use would they be if they were not for publication ? (Hear, hear) The hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands said that he had given the letters to him (Mr Barrow) not as a member of the press, but as a member of that House Whether fortunately or unfortunately, he (Mr Barrow) held the double position and was therefore enabled to exercise his discretion in making public such information as he received in the House But the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands said he gave him (Mr Barrow) the letters, in order that he might furnish the public with an outline of the information contained in them (Hear) He had done so, and, therefore, the hon Commissioner could not censure him for that But then the hon gentleman said that there would have been no harm done if he (Mr Barrow) had not offered comments upon the information Perhaps it would have been as true if the hon member had said there would have been no good done (a laugh) but for these comments He held that the House had nothing to do with the comments (hear hear), but only as to whether a certain official document had been handed over to the press, directly or indirectly, for publication But unless the House could show him (Mr Barrow) that he was precluded from using the information which he legitimately obtained as a member of that House he should consider himself justified in what he had done Unless anything could be shown in the Standing Orders or rules of Parliament to preclude him from making use of the information legitimately obtained in that House, he would continue to believe that any information which he procured in the House he would be at liberty to use out of the House—("Hear hear," from the Attorney-General)—and that he would not be responsible to the House, but only to individuals, if he made any illegal or injurious comments in connection with such information The hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands said that the reason he considered the publication of the despatches injudicious was that there was a portion of them calculated to alarm the members of Mr Babbage's family That was the portion which referred to the imminent perils, the awful the almost indescribable dangers—(a laugh)—which Mr Babbage had gone into (Laughter) Now although he (Mr Barrow) could not get over the feeling that Mr Babbage knew what he was about better than Major Warburton knew, still in deference to the opinion of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands he suppressed this portion of the document —(hear)—as hon members would see when the letters were before them As a matter of course he made no reference to this portion of the report in the comments that accompanied it, and therefore the objection to the comments shared the same fate as the objection to the report Both in his report and in his comments he had suppressed what he understood the Commissioner of Crown Lands to object to being published As to the rest, of course when he received permission to publish an outline of the information, it mattered not whether he interwove it with comments, or made the comments in another part of the paper He thought the hon member for Encounter Bay would accomplish the object which he had in view, next to that of having another little fling at the Government—(laughter)—inasmuch as the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would in future be very careful not to show to any hon members letters which he could anyhow keep back, and would, further doubtless, consider himself duly admonished by the course which had been pursued (Laughter) But he (Mr Barrow) thought it would be unwise to tie up the hands of the Government too tightly—(hear, hear)—as it might be sometimes desirable for the House to obtain even an inkling of information as to matters in the hands of the Government If hon members thought otherwise, they would vote with the hon member for Encounter Bay, and if that hon member believed that "ignorance was bliss," it would of course be folly in him to be wise—(loud laughter)—so that he would do well to prevent even a gleam of information coming to hon members prior to the full blaze of official notification (Hear, hear)

Mr PEAKE thought the hon the Commissioner of Crown

Lands would feel slightly admonished—(laughter)—and that he would be more careful in future, and, therefore, he would be sorry to administer anything more (Laughter) The hon member for Encounter Bay was not wrong in framing this motion, inasmuch as formerly the House found a difficulty in obtaining information (Hear, hear, and no no) Before the publication of this information he had asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether he had any objection to lay the letters on the table, and the hon member (the Commissioner of Crown Lands), after the letters were published stated that it was not expedient to lay them on the table or print them It seemed strange to him that the hon member should state this after the letters were published, and had received such a severe handling from one portion of the press (Hear, hear and no, no) He had put a motion on the notice paper for the production of the letters, but owing to the pressure of business, it had lapsed and was taken off

Mr Solomon supported the amendment, as the question was one of censure or no censure (Hear, hear) It was said that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had laid the despatches before the editor of a newspaper, but this had not been proved (Cries of "Oh! oh!") It was true that the contents of the letter had got into the papers, but it was not shown how The hon member for East Torrens might or might not be the editor of a paper, but the House had no right to know him as an editor, but as the member for East Torrens (Oh! oh!) They had no more right to know the hon member for East Torrens as an editor than they had to know him (Mr Solomon) as an auctioneer (Loud laughter) He had as much right to see the despatches as an auctioneer as the hon member had as an editor, but he did not make use of them in his profession If the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands laid the letters before hon members individually, and if any charge was to be made at all it should be made against the hon member for East Torrens, either in his capacity of member or editor If such a charge was made against the hon member as an editor he presumed the House would call the hon member before it and reprimand him He was sorry to see so much stress laid upon this matter by the opposition (Hear, hear) He used the term "opposition" because the hon members who occupied the benches opposite to the Ministers had proved themselves to be nothing else than an opposition, inasmuch as they were opposed to everything which came before the House (Cheers and counter cheers) He could not see that any vast amount of injury had been done It appeared to him that if the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had erred it had been from the best of motives, namely to keep back from the family of a man who was employed in exploring the country, a knowledge of the dangers which he had incurred (Hear, hear) But the hon member had not kept this knowledge from the members of the House, for he (Mr Solomon) believed that every hon member had access to these documents (Hear, hear) He himself saw them both in the House and in the library, and he recollected hearing the hon Commissioner of Crown Lands say that he did not wish the whole of them to be published, lest their contents should alarm the friends of Mr Babbage He could not see that the circumstances warranted the hon member for Encounter Bay in bringing forward a motion which amounted to a vote of censure (hear, hear), for he would go farther than the hon member (Mr Neales), and would say that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands must have a very strong stomach if he did not resign in the event of this motion being carried (Hear hear)

Mr Townsend rose amidst cries of "divide" He could not agree with the hon member for the city as to the impropriety of putting this notice upon the paper That hon member had said he would not put such a notice on the paper, unless he had ceased to have confidence in the person against whom it was directed

Mr Neales rose in explanation He had never said anything of the kind

Mr Townsend said the hon member had such a happy way of framing a sentence that it meant neither one thing nor another But the hon member had said that he could not agree with the motion, because, though one person's stomach might be strong enough to bear it another's might not But what was the motion? [The hon member here read the motion] Now the question was, first of all, did the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands show the letters to the hon member for East Torrens as a member of the House or as a member of the press The hon Commissioner said he gave the letter to the hon member for East Torrens and told that hon member that he might make use of it, which he did, by extracting portions which he might fairly give to the public But the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands objected to the comments which had been made He (Mr Townsend) thought the hon member had acted injudiciously in giving the letters, for if he had not done so the comments could not have been made What was the object of giving the information to the press but that it might be commented upon? The hon member (Mr Solomon) did not agree in the motion but he (Mr Townsend) did, believing that after the discussion which had taken place, if the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands was in the same position to morrow he would not act in the same way Under these circumstances, though believing the act of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands to have been injudicious and improper, he would not vote for the resolution

The Attorney General regretted that the previous question had been moved, as he would rather the House should express a decided opinion upon this important matter (Hear, hear) The question raised by the hon member for Encounter Bay was whether a member of the Government being in possession of information which he believed to be important and interesting as affecting an object for which the public money had been devoted, and in which the whole community was interested—whether a member of the Government possessing such information and believing that its publication in extenso would be inconvenient and in some respects injurious—whether in such circumstances a member of the Government had a right to put the public in possession of any information on the subject at all The question was in fact whether the Government of a country where the press possessed great power and influence, was to ignore the press altogether as a means of conveying information and intelligence to the public (Hear, hear) To say that a member of the Government acted improperly and injudiciously in giving information to the press in order that the public might be put in possession of it, showed a misapprehension of the functions of Government and of the position which the press occupied in this country (Hear, hear) Such at least was his impression, and in all cases where it appeared to him that information should be given to the public, and where there was any difficulty in the way of putting the documents in extenso before them he would be glad to avail of the facilities for communicating through the press those portions which he did not think it inexpedient or unadvisable to publish at the time There was another point as to whether the Government were justified in showing despatches to members of the Legislature (for it was not pretended that anybody else saw them) He considered the fact of one member of each branch of the Legislature being a member of the press an advantage to both Houses But to say that because these hon members were members of the press they were to be forbidden from seeing matters affecting the public interest, or that seeing these documents they were to be prohibited from making use of them, was to impose a limit upon the privileges of these members which did not exist in the case of other hon members (Hear, hear) For his part he should wish to give a decided negative to the motion, but as the previous question had been moved he should support it, as he felt that every hon. member who voted for it would be opposed to the original motion (Cries of "Hear, hear," and "No, no")

Mr Reynolds had intended not to speak at all but for one or two statements of the hon the Attorney-General, and which he could not help comparing with the remarks of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands That hon member said he had committed an error, and the Attorney-General said he had not He could not understand this But as the old adage said that the next best thing to not committing a fault was admitting an error he would recommend his hon friend on his right (Mr Strangways) to accept the admission, and withdraw his motion It appeared this paper had been given to the hon member for East Torrens to be published, or to give such an outline of it as he thought proper, and the House was told that this was given for the public information But why was the information given to the public when it was denied to members of that House? (Cries of "No, no," and "hear, hear") He (Mr Reynolds) had tried frequently to get a sight of the letter, but could not obtain one (Cries of "Oh!") He had seen it handed about, but he could never get a sight of it (Much laughter) He hoped the House would excuse him, as he was not an Irishman, (continued laughter), but what he meant was, that he could not get the letter into his own hands to read He thought if the letter could be handed about it could be placed on the table of the House (hear, hear), as well as the journal of Messrs Stuart and Foster, which had never been ordered to be printed How were hon members to know but that there was something in the letter which rendered it necessary to screen the gentleman now in charge of the party—something which might call down censure upon the Government for sending out such a man at all He thought from the statements of the hon member for East Torrens that there might be something very extraordinary in the letter

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said, in explanation, that what he had stated was, that if he had erred, it was through the desire to prevent the family of Mr Babbage from being exposed to alarm and anxiety by the statements in the despatch

Mr Strangways rose amidst loud cries of "divide" He should say a few words in reply, and would address himself first to the hon member (Mr Solomon), who had stated that hon members upon that bench opposed every thing as a matter of course The fact was that the grapes were sour When the hon member for the Port vacated the seat which he (Mr Strangways) occupied, the hon member (Mr Solomon) was a candidate for the place, and being unable to obtain it, he now censured those whom he would have sat beside He could very easily understand this conduct of the hon member

Mr Solomon rose to explain

The Speaker ruled that the hon member should not interrupt a member who was speaking

Mr Strangways resumed—The hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had admitted his error and apologised for it, and he (Mr Strangways) would take it for granted, as the hon member said that he would not be guilty of such conduct again (Laughter) The hon the Attorney-General said that where the press was such a public institution as it was here a member of the Government might contribute information to it The doctrine was a convenient one, and was worthy of an Attorney-General who did his duty as an act of courtesy But in England, where the press was as important or more important than it was here, hon members would find if they read the Times of last May that action had been taken similar to that now taken and that the Earl of Ellenborough was censured by both Houses of Parliament for publishing a despatch of Lord Canning, and had to resign his office in consequence Yet the hon the Attorney-General said that the course now taken was a right and proper one, and that the Commissioner of Crown Lands was justified in making public the documents which he should have kept locked up in his office Then the hon member had started another equally curious doctrine that hon members, who supported the previous question, were opposed to the original motion He (Mr Strangways) always understood that the reason of supporting the previous question was, that hon members did not wish to vote either way He understood from the hon members who had spoken, that they would like to support the original motion (Cries of "No, no.") It was only some two or three hon members who cried, "No" As the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands admitted his error, he (Mr Strangways) would ask leave to withdraw the motion

Mr SOLOMON rose to explain in reference to some remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay

The SPEAKER was understood to rule that the hon member was out of order He also ruled that the original motion could not be withdrawn unless the previous question was withdrawn

The previous question was then put and carried without a division

SELECT COMMITTEE ON TAXATION

On the motion of the TREASURER, a further extension of time for a week was granted to this Committee

PETITION OF JOHN FINLAY DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL rose to move—

"That the petition of John Finlay Duff be referred to a Select Committee, for the purpose of examining into his claim, and reporting on the same to this House"

The facts were as follows —In the month of May, 1857, Mr Duff was owner of the Anna Dixon, which was then lying at Port Adelaide and was manned by a crew of Lascars, from the Mauritius From some cause not necessary to mention, the crew refused to work and were committed to gaol for six weeks, with the understanding that at the end of that time they were to be put on board the Anna Dixon The ship went to Melbourne with a white crew, and in less than a month came back, and Mr Duff applied for his seamen He was told the men had been shipped in another vessel—the Carlisle, whether by accident or design he (Mr Bakewell) was unable to say, nor was it material as far as Mr Duff was concerned That gentleman was obliged to ship a white crew, by which means he lost considerably He thought he was damnified to that extent, and sought to lay his complaint before the House He (Mr Bakewell) believed that other facts would transpire before the Committee which he need not refer to, but he thought it clear that Mr Duff had met an injury through the act of the Government.

Mr NEALES seconded the motion Although they had been encumbered with an immense number of Committees, still when the Executive would not entertain a claim like the present, he did not see what other course was left than the appointment of a Committee He thought the Government should have settled the claim, especially in the case of a very old colonist who had done great service in former days, and should have seen that he got at least a portion of what he claimed

The motion was then agreed to, and the following hon members were elected as a Committee—The Attorney-General, Messrs Cole, Collinson, Hallett, Neales, Hawker, and Bakewell

MAJOR WARBURTON'S DESPATCHES

Mr REYNOLDS asked the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands where these despatches could be seen

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that he would either bring them down to the House next day, or the hon member could see them at his (the hon Commissioner's) office

Mr REYNOLDS would be obliged if the hon member brought them to the House

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

On the motion of Mr BAKEWELL, the Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill was postponed to Friday the 5th instant

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The report of the Select Committee on the Assessment on Stock Bill was brought up by the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), and read The evidence and appendix to the report were, on the motion of that hon member, ordered to be printed

Mr TOWNSEND asked whether the Government could say when they would move the second reading of the Assessment on Stock Bill (Laughter)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could not say until the Government had had an opportunity of perusing the report of the Select Committee (Hear)

GRANT TO THE ABORIGINAL FRIENDS' ASSOCIATION

Mr MILNE moved the House into Committee for the consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor in-Chief requesting him to place the sum of £500 on the Estimates for 1859, for the purpose contemplated by the Aboriginal Friends' Association

Carried

In Committee

Mr MILNE said on a previous occasion when he asked to go into Committee on this question, the general merits of it had been so plainly put before the House that he need not go into a repetition of them now He would therefore content himself with moving the substance of the resolution, viz —"That an address be presented to his Excellency the Governor-in-Chief requesting *him to place the sum of £500 on the Esti*mates for 1859 for the purpose contemplated by the Aboriginal Friends' Association"

Carried

The House resumed, and the report was brought up and adopted

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE FURTHER AMENDMENT BILL

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that this Bill be read a third time, which was agreed to

The Bill was read a third time and passed

MAGILL INSTITUTE

Dr WARK moved that the Speaker do leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the consideration in Committee of an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to place on the Estimates for 1859 the sum of £175, in aid of the funds of the Magill Institute

Carried

In Committee.

Dr WARK, in moving this address, would first premise that the Attorney-General had called for some proof of this being a special case, and it would be his endeavor to show that it was so The House was doubtless aware that a sum fo £500 had been voted by the Parliament in support of country Educational Institutes, by which each Institute applied and received, when deserving of it, a sum of £50 The Committee of the Magill Institute, in accordance with this vote, had applied for and received the sum of £50 The prayer of the petition in this instance was, that a supplementary sum should be given in aid of the expense in building the institute, which had been erected at a cost of £225 The building, and the land on which it rested, was secured to trustees in a permanent manner, and had been reconveyed to the Central Board of Education, from which a sum of £200 had been received The sense of the petition was that this property being conveyed in a permanent manner, under which conveyance there was no danger of its being appropriated to any other purpose than that which was intended, the House should award a special sum to meet the expenses of the Institute, It was the only instance in the colony of such an Institute being conveyed to Trustees, and then reconveyed to the Central Board of Education The sum expended by the Committee had been £175, which had, with the exception of £4 6s 8d, which was advanced by them, been raised by private subscription He trusted if the House agreed to the spirit of this resolution it might be considered as a precedent in a favor of others somewhat similarly situated

Mr MILDRED supported the request, as he thought every facility should be given to education, and however limited the means at present at their disposal, any increase in the facilities for education would meet with corresponding good There were defects in the present system of education no doubt, but such reforms as those contemplated in the motion would in a measure tend to do away with them In the neighborhood of the Magill Institute there were a number of young men who gathered together in the evening for the purpose of mutual instruction, and where this spirit existed the money he was sure would be spent profitably A considerable sum of money had been subscribed, the property resulting from that had been safely put apart for the purposes intended The meetings of the Institute were well attended, and a general desire had been manifested for self improvement amongst the residents, and therefore he considered it a sufficient argument in favor of the sum being granted But he would not confine the principle to this Institute, but he hoped it would be recognised as a precedent by the Ministry, by which they should advocate that the Government should supplement the private subscriptions in the cause of education in each district by a like sum from the general revenue It was a principle he would like to see adopted

Mr TOWNSEND said the hon member who introduced this motion deserved the thanks of the House, if it only served to induce the Government to declare on what principle they would act in the matter He thought some general principle should be established, and with that view he would like to know from the Ministerial benches whether the Government would be prepared to supplement private subscriptions for Educational Institutes by votes from the revenue Although agreeing with the tenor of the motion, he moved that the sum be reduced to £100

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the advantage and expediency of supporting secular education to the fullest extent had ever been acknowledged in that House, and it was an opinion in which he cordially concurred The Government had adopted this principle in the vote which had been passed to the Central Board of Education, and in the assistance which had been afforded to educational purposes throughout the country districts But, at the same time he thought they should not discuss the claims of every institute separately, but, when the Estimates were brought forward, determine what amount should be placed on them for the support of education, and then it would be for the House to affirm a principle as to the distribution of that sum throughout the various institutes having valid claims upon it As to the case immediately before the House, which was put forward as a special case he would say that he was hardly able to recognise the validity of the claim A building had been erected, and he was glad to hear it, he was glad to find that the neighborhood was sufficiently prosperous to enable such a work to be carried out successfully But then they must remember that there were other places not similarly situated He might suppose several localities where they might not be able to raise such a sum for the purposes of education, but where a desire for self-improvement was equally great and where persons met together with the same end in view Such persons he considered were as much entitled to the assistance of the Government as those who were in a more wealthy position He should not on the ground of persons being less wealthy though not less willing establish a precedent of exceptional treatment What he would suggest would be that the hon member should withdraw his motion, and on the Estimates being brought forward the House would be in a position to say what sum should be devoted to the purpose, and the Ministry would be prepared to enunciate their views on the question

Mr STRANGWAYS was glad to find that in one instance at least the Government were going to declare a principle, and it was one that would meet with his cordial concurrence The simple fact that some districts were more wealthy than others was no argument in favor of supporting the former to the neglect of the latter, for if that principle were adopted the less wealthy districts would get no assistance whatever It was very necessary that in all cases there should be some guiding principle by which the support should be afforded without respect to position in point of wealth

Mr BARROW was of opinion that sufficient arguments had been already adduced in favor of voting sums of money for adult education He did not think, however, that the argument was a sound one, that wealthy districts should be supported to the exclusion of those which were in a less favorable position Although favorably disposed to the address, still he was not wedded to it if the Government would say that some principle should be introduced on the consideration of the Estimates—some general scheme devised which should provide more liberally than hitherto for adult education

Dr WARK was a little surprised at the course which had been adopted by the Government in reference to his motion for an address He could only suppose that the principle adopted in junior education was repudiated, for all that was asked was that this principle should be extended to adult education He did not ask for any exclusive or special assistance to the Magill Institute, for he considered whatever was given to it should be given to others similarly situated He had been asked to show in what way the present case should be considered a special one, and he had told them that this Institute was the only one conveyed to Trustees and reconveyed to the Central Board of Education He considered the ground taken by the Attorney-General was untenable, as a grant had been made to the Burra Burra Institute, which was not so special a case as the one now before the House Why, then, should this case be cast aside? It was unfair to those persons who had made great exertion in a good cause. If the Government, however, would say that some system should be introduced to meet the question, then he would withdraw his motion, with the leave of the House The hon member withdrew his motion

RETURNS FOR TRENCHING PARLIAMENT GROUNDS

Mr DUFFIELD moved—

"That a return be laid on the table of the House showing the number of men which have been employed the number of days they have been so employed in trenching the land adjoining this House, the number of rods which have been trenched, the depth, and the cost per rod of such trenching"

He did not bring the motion forward with any view of finding fault but because, as there were a large number of men out of employment, he thought it desirable that those who were willing and able to do a day's work should have the advantage over those who were less competent With regard to the return asked for, he was not prepared to say whether the work in question was done by contract, but from the appearance of the men at work, and the evident display of the "Government stroke," he rather supposed it was day work He thought if these returns were made, they should find that if the Government had made a donation of 4s 6d per day to each man employed, and let the job by contract to other persons so as to allow them to earn 7s per day, the amount saved by contract would be considerable He considered the Government should afford every facility of employment to those men who would do a fair day's work for a fair day's pay He was sorry to say our railway works were likely to carried on on the same principle When he was a young man he remembered on works at home they would not put four men to the tail of a cart to fill it, because it was objected that some of them must of necessity be idle Now at Gawler Town he had seen as many as ten men at the tail of a cart, four of which would have done more than the whole put together His only motive in moving for these returns was, that they should give work to those who were willing and able to work, and that those who would not work should suffer for their laziness If such a principle were perpetuated as that which he had alluded to, he was satisfied that our railways would cost £1,000 per mile more than they should do

Mr NEALES seconded the motion, because he thought employment should be given to those who would do a fair day's work in preference to those who would not He had employed a good many men lately in raising stone, and some of them had earned 12s per day, while some scarcely earned half the amount. If the system of piecework were established, they would have fair value for their money, but clumping people together only tended to make the more industrious men as bad as the others

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would not, of course, oppose the production of the return Seeing the motion on the notice paper, he had given instructions for the returns to be prepared, and he was only sorry that he had not them ready then to present to the House He would, however, ask hon members to pause before they came to any conclusion on the subject, as although the return might not be so satisfactory as might be desired, the work had not been done at such an extravagant rate as was supposed The fact was that some men on the railway works had been sent for relief, as being in a state of destitution, and rather than issue rations to them, it was decided to put them to work, so that some return might be had for the money Even the "Government stroke" which had been spoken of had not made the rate per rod so much in excess as was thought.

The motion for the return was agreed to

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

Mr MILNE moved the second reading of the Smillie Estate Bill, and repeated that the object of the Bill was to enable the trustees of the estate to carry out the intentions of the trust-deed The whole of the allegations contained in the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, and that Committee had come to an unanimous approval of them

Mr STRANGWAYS said it appeared to him that the House was not justified in passing this Act, or else the Act had been drafted in an improper manner His opinion was that the House should not interfere with marriage settlements The hon mover had referred to the existence of legal technicalities only, but surely if this was all that was wrong it was not necessary for him to come to that House to correct such a trifle There was an Act passed during the last session, which provided for such cases But it appeared to him that it was something more than a legal technicality, and his opinion in this was confirmed when that House was called upon to legislate in a case in which parties sought to dispose of property without any provision being made for the disposition of the funds so derived, and the persons so interested sought to bring another portion of the property under their disposal in opposition to the deed of 1844 He thought it a very unwise precedent to establish that marriage settlements should be rendered liable to be upset by permitting persons to come to that House, and obtain a resettlement of such property He saw no reason that the House should assent to the Trustees bringing another section of the property under the original trust deed

Mr NEALES supported the second reading of the Bill, seeing that there had been a Select Committee of seven hon members appointed who had unanimously decided in favor of the Bill He thought it, therefore, rather premature on the part of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), although he might have had a legal education, to force objections which had no foundation to support them The evidence brought before the Committee fully satisfied them of the validity of the Bill, and with regard to the inconvenience which had been alluded to of allowing persons to come to that House for redress, he could only say that if they were subjected to such inconveniences, they would with perfect justice come to have them remedied He (Mr Neales) knew something about the case, and did not hold with the view that he should therefore be prejudiced in his notions, for he believed the more a man knew about a subject, he was the better fitted to form a correct opinion on it—(laughter)—and from what he knew, he thought it would be a long time before the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) could prove his logic to be better than his (Mr Neales's) This was not a case like the Hampstead Heath one, where a large commonage was turned into private property, there was merely a difficulty in the execution of some private deed, which he supposed had been slighted on the principle of doing it cheap, and he did hope a mere technical difficulty would not be allowed to defeat the original intentions of the deed.

The SPEAKER put the question, which was carried, the Bill was read a second time, and the House then went into Committee for its further consideration.

In Committee

Mr BAKEWELL remarked that no person could read the settlement without being impressed with the conviction that Mr Smillie always intended that there should be a power to revoke the settlement.

The various clauses were gone through, but the Attorney-General stated he should like to have time to consider the effect of one of the clauses, and the Chairman in consequence reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Friday next.

PROBATES, &c

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table returns which had been called for, shewing the number of probates and letters of administration which had been taken out, and the number of deeds and other documents registered from September 1854 to August 1858.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

Mr HAWKER rose to a point of order. The hon the Speaker in a former portion of the day had ruled that the Assessment on Stock Bill had been read a second time.

The SPEAKER had merely said he believed that it had been at the time he so stated, but had since ascertained he was in error.

DATE OF ACTS BILL

Mr STRANGWAYS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, remarked that its object was to make the Clerk of the Legislative Council endorse upon Acts the date at which they received the Governor's assent, but it had been suggested to him that the Acts should be endorsed by the Clerk of the House in which they originated, and that the endorsement of the date at which they were assented to should be taken as the date of the Bill. Other portions of the Bill related to Acts which His Excellency reserved for Her Majesty's assent. It provided that intimation of Her Majesty's assent should be advertised within seven days of such intimation having been received, and that should be the date from which they should take effect. The Act would prevent the necessity of a short clause in every Act stating from what date it should take effect.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL seconded the motion for the second reading which was carried, and the consideration of the Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Friday next.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The TREASURER stated for the information of hon members, that the Government proposed to make the Civil Service Bill the first business of the following day.

The House adjourned at 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock.

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Mr Morphett, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon Capt Bagot, the Hon Capt Scott, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Capt Hall, and the Hon the Surveyor-General.

MR STUART'S DISCOVERIES

The Hon A FORSTER was desirous of asking the Chief Secretary a question, which probably the hon gentleman would have no objection to answer at once. He perceived by the papers that it was stated a correspondence had taken place between the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Mr Stuart, the discoverer of a country in the north, in which the Commissioner of Crown Lands proposed to give Mr Stuart 1,000 square miles of country, upon certain terms, subject to the approval of the House of Assembly. As such a grant could only be made in violation of regulations issued in conformity with an Act which had been passed by the Parliament, he wished to ask if it were the intention of the Government to violate the provisions of that Act without the sanction of both Houses of the Legislature.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said his attention had also been drawn to the statement to which the hon gentleman had referred, and he had drawn the attention of the Commissioner of Crown Lands to the circumstance. No doubt the necessary steps would be taken in consequence.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS

The Hon A FORSTER asked the Hon the Chief Secretary whether any arrangements had been made for collecting the agricultural statistics?

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said if the hon gentleman referred to the Estimates he would find that a sum had been provided for collecting the census and agricultural statistics, it being the wish of the Government that both should be collected together.

BREAKWATER AT GLENELG

The Hon Captain BAGOT asked the Chief Secretary, pursuant to notice, whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the erection of the iron breakwater at Glenelg, and if so, whether any reliable estimate had been obtained as to the cost of its erection. He was induced to put the question in consequence of observing the other day that a movement had taken place in reference to the irons intended for the breakwater. From the little which he knew of engineering he felt satisfied that the expense of erecting that toy, for he could call it nothing else, would be very great, probably much more than many persons imagined. It was very desirable before they commenced an additional outlay that they should ascertain what additional outlay would be required to that already incurred.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Government had not yet decided whether they would proceed with the work or not. A reliable estimate had been sent in by the Engineer in charge of the works, by which it appeared that the additional amount required would be £3,200, and that the work would take 12 months to complete. There were no funds in hand voted by Parliament for the formation of the breakwater though there were for the completion of the jetty.

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, remarked that the House would be aware in the Railway Extension Bill of last year two clauses existed, and with the intention of carrying them into effect they had been embodied in the present Bill. Those clauses had been objected to by several hon members, upon the ground that they were foreign to the purposes of the Bill. The clauses were struck out upon the assurance that the Government would introduce an enactment at an early date to carry them into effect. The intention of the present Bill was to give power to the Commissioners to remove gates at level crossings, and not to compel them to make railways as at present constructed. The Engineer's report was to the effect that if the provisions of the Bill were carried out they would effect a saving of £3,000 per annum, without there being any additional risk to life and limb. The Engineer had instanced in support of this assertion that the alteration proposed by this Bill had been adopted for many years past in the United States of America. Although accidents occurred on the American railways, probably more frequently than upon the English railways, he believed it would be found that these accidents arose principally from the inefficient manner in which the American railways were constructed, and from the breaking down of the bridges, not from cattle encroaching upon the lines of railway.

The Hon Captain SCOTT seconded the motion for the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon Dr EVERARD opposed the second reading of the Bill, conceiving that the provisions proposed would create great additional risk to life, and that no effectual methods were proposed to prevent cattle from trespassing upon the lines. He believed that very great danger would be caused by cattle passing from one side to the other, for it was a well known fact to every one at all acquainted with cattle, that cattle were more likely to place themselves in a position of danger than in any other place. For instance, cattle in moving from one side of the road to the other, invariably stopped in the centre. There was nothing in the Act to prevent cattle from placing themselves in a position of the greatest danger. He should have no objection to the Bill if it proposed merely to remove the gatekeepers from the district roads, and rendered it imperative upon every person passing through to open or shut the gates under a penalty. In divers parts of the colony there were slip panels, and no person who wished to pass through objected to take them down and put them up again. Therefore he could not see that there would be any difficulty in inducing parties to shut the gates at level crossings. The expense of having a gate at each level crossing would not probably amount to more than £20, and he believed that with a ditch and a gate there would in fact be more safety than without a ditch and with a gate and gatekeeper. If the Bill were so amended as to meet his views in this respect he should support it, but if not he should vote against it.

The Hon Captain BAGOT could not, notwithstanding the great respect which he had for the last speaker, support the views which the hon gentleman had taken. He believed that the course which was proposed to be adopted by this Bill would ensure greater safety to the public than if there were gates and gatekeepers at level crossings. During the short time which railways had been in operation, there had been perhaps two, three, or four accidents in consequence of the carelessness of gatekeepers. The plan proposed had long been adopted by a country from which they had better draw their precedents than the old country, namely America. It had been so successful there that the probability was there was not a single gatekeeper upon the American lines except in immediate proximity to the large towns, and every day the prejudice was getting less and less, and through large towns the only precaution considered essential was that the trains should travel slowly, and give notice of their approach by a whistle. It was the duty of the House to adopt any system which would lessen the present extravagant expenditure upon railways. He believed the present Bill to be a movement in the right direction, and that it would be the means of taking off a vast useless and extravagant expenditure

The PRESIDENT put the question that the Bill be read a second time, which was carried, and upon the motion of the Chief Secretary the House went into Committee upon it. The first clause was passed with verbal amendments "54th and 55th clauses" being struck out In the second clause verbal amendments were also made upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, the word "open" being inserted before "ditches," and the words "or horses" after "cattle"

The Hon C DAVIES pointed out that by Act 47 gatekeepers were appointed to superintend the crossings, and this clause did not remove them He wished to know whether the gatekeepers were to be retained Was it intended, instead of the gatekeepers, to keep parties in the neighbourhood to superintend the crossings, as if so, there would be a material reduction in the saving which it was supposed would be effected by the present Bill

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the object of this Bill was to do away with gatekeepers and the expense which was involved by retaining that class That was really the object of the passing of the present Bill, but there were also persons employed who would be constantly up and down the line, so that there would be no fear of accidents occurring

The Hon Captain HALL drew the attention of the Council to the fact that authority was given to the Commissioner of Public Works to do this thing and that thing He supposed that was upon the supposition that the Public Works Bill would pass the House, but he thought, under the circumstances, it would be well not to take the Bill before the House out of Committee till the fate of the Public Works Bill had been decided The Commissioner of Public Works was not at present the executive officer of the railway

The Hon Captain BAGOT said it did not appear to him that the manner in which the Commissioner of Public Works was introduced would affect the position in which he trusted he would be placed when the Bill alluded to was under consideration, namely, that he should exercise a controlling power over all works The Commissioner would have power to remove the gates, but the clause did not interfere with the manner in which they should be removed He thought, however, that the clause might be worded more cautiously, as it might be necessary to have some of the gates which were near the city retained For instance, he thought it would be better that power should be given to remove all or any of the gates or gatekeepers He had not looked into the old law, but he believed there was some doubt as to the removal of the gatekeepers

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY referred the hon member to the 42nd section of the old Act, relative to the appointment of gatekeepers, but that Act had been repealed The clause under discussion was permissive but not imperative, as the Commissioner would have power to except any gates which he might think fit

The PRESIDENT stated that the words were imperative and not merely permissive

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY remarked in reference to the observations which had fallen from the Hon Captain Hall, the Commissioner of Public Works was the head of the Railway department, and possessed that power whether the Public Works Bill passed or not, but he had no objection to keep the Bill in Committee if it were desired

The Hon A FORSTER would not offer any remarks upon the subject alluded to by the Hon Captain Hall, as the Chief Secretary had stated it was not his intention to take the Bill out of Committee, but he certainly thought that the intention of the Bill was to vest functions in the Commissioner of Public Works which he did not possess at present As the Public Works Bill had not yet been disposed of, he thought it would be undesirable to take the Bill before the House out of Committee

The PRESIDENT pointed out that it was desirable to remove all doubtful expressions, and to preserve only those in reference to which there was no doubt In certain cases the words "it shall be lawful" were peremptory, but as hon members might not be aware of this, all doubt would be removed if it were stated the Commissioner of Public Works shall do so and so He would suggest that attention should be paid to the phraseology of Bills before the Council

The Hon A FORSTER remarked that he should certainly have taken the words referred to to be permissive

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY quite agreed with the Hon Captain Hall, that they should be permissive, and would alter them so that they should be before the Bill was taken out of Committee

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought the difficulty which he had referred to would be got over by the introduction of the words "all or any"

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY postponed the further consideration of the clause

The third clause was passed with verbal amendments

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved the addition of a fourth clause to the effect that the Act should take effect from the passing thereof

The clause was carried, and the CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday

The Hon A FORSTER called the attention of the Hon the Chief Secretary to the fact that the following Tuesday would be a public holiday, and he wished to know whether the Government also intended to take a holiday upon that occasion

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thanked the hon gentleman for reminding him, and moved that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed till Wednesday next, also, that the business standing on the notice paper for Tuesday be postponed till Wednesday

Carried

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE BILL

The Hon the PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the House of Assembly, stating that the Assembly had agreed to a Bill to further amend the Supreme Court Procedure Act, and desired the concurrence therein of the Legislative Council

Upon the motion of the Hon Mr MORPHETT, the Bill was read a first time, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

The House adjourned at 20 minutes to 3 o'clock, till 2 o'clock on Wednesday

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 10 minutes past 1 o'clock

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The House having gone into Committee on this Bill,

The TREASURER said the Bill had passed through all its stages, but the Government had kept it in Committee in order to redeem a promise made by the hon the Attorney-General, that the hon member (Mr Glyde) should have an opportunity of introducing an amendment in the first clause With respect to that clause, when the hon member put his amendment he would, no doubt, state the argument upon which it was based, and until he (the Treasurer) heard that argument he could only take the course which the Government had all along pursued The Government considered that the Bill, although not a perfect measure—for what measure was perfect—met the difficulty in which the House was placed with respect to the repeal of two Bills now on the Statute-book, and the positions of the various officers of the Civil Service under the Estimates It appeared to him that there was no other way than that in which the Government proposed to deal with the matter for getting rid of the existing difficulties He had already stated that it could not be a perfect Bill, and he was sure that hon members would agree with him that if the hon member (Mr Glyde) succeeded in passing his amendment, it would not make the Bill perfect, but that contingent notice, if carried, would alter the principle of the measure to such an extent that it would require to be remodelled if not withdrawn altogether The Bill had not been prepared at the suggestion of the Government of to-day, but on an Order of the House, and a report of a Select Committee which sat to investigate the subject The principle of the measure was considered and prepared by that Committee after a very careful examination of evidence, and the Government now felt that they were bound to support that principle If the House carried the amendment they would not only alter the amount of the Superannuation Fund and the amount payable annually by the several officers, but they should also touch other portions of the measure, such as the schedules, in order to make them consistent with the amendment He would not go further into the amendment, but it appeared to the Government that there was no better method of escaping from the anomalous position in which they and the House now stood towards persons in the public service Under the Superannuation Bill of 1854, the public faith was pledged to certain officers who had retired in the expectation of receiving certain annuities The Government had taken action on the Bill by resolution authorising the Government to repay to those officers who had subscribed, the amount of their subscriptions, and therefore the fund created by the former Bill was broken up Another anomaly was that last year the House had passed the salaries of officers according to a different qualification from that allowed by law, and the House would never have passed the Estimates—the Estimates of last year—unless on the understanding that the classification was to be settled by the Clerks' Salaries Act, or, as it was now called, the Civil Service Act He moved that the report be brought up

Mr BURFORD said that if this was the proper time to oppose the measure he would feel it his duty to do so He judged from the last few remarks of the hon the Treasurer, that the Government took it for granted that some such measure, if not this precise measure, must be passed But his feeling was, that they ought not to pass anything of the kind, but that the Bill should be thrown out From calculations which he had made he was led to the conclusion, that so far from this Bill being a benefit to those parties whom it professed to serve viz, the junior officers, and still less to others, a sum of 6 per cent would be paid for the whole period of 42 years by these persons, and, therefore, they would be paying at an amazing rate for the privilege of an annuity after they attained the age of 60 years, in fact, more than 10 per cent To pay at this rate for the benefit of an annuity after 60 years of age, was most preposterous It was only leading men to put aside money which they might much more economically and profitably employ otherwise It had been intimated by an hon member that the Bill was in the character of bribery, and he concurred in that view, it went upon the principle that unless a bait was held out, Government officers would not be so diligent, or do their duty so well as they ought This was a most humiliating position to put the matter in He could understand very well, in the case of criminals in the stockade, such a principle being applied as that if they turned out a certain quantity of work, they would so have many marks per day put down to them, and that these would go towards diminishing the terms of their sentences ("Oh, oh," and laughter), but to apply such a principle in the case of gentlemen was most disparaging, and he could not conceive that gentlemen selected from the better class of society should require such a spur to cause them to perform their duty, or that without it such persons would neglect their duty, and that therefore the public interests would suffer Some of the incidents connected with the Bill were of a somewhat amusing character He could not but be amused, when he detected the carping casuistry of one hon member of the Government—(laughter)—the hesitating calculation of another—(laughter)—the whimpering placidity of a third, showing how much he was under the control of his colleagues—(laughter)—and the sort of 'jolly indifference' of a fourth—(much laughter) He could not but expect something not of a homogeneous kind, some such product or creature in fact, as he saw in this Bill It had the curious features of a monster, and should be smothered When he looked at the manner in which the Bill was introduced, he was equally amused by the earnest protestations of one hon member, the deprecatory tone of another, the sly sarcasm of another, and the solemn declamation of another for the effigy of poor "Pam" was brought up by one hon member to frighten the hon the Attorney-General from his propriety He felt no wonder at all this, seeing what a deformed monster the Government had brought before the House (Laughter) Some hon members advocated the measure, and their advocacy reminded him of the verdant mud in the "Groves of Blarney" It resembled the beautiful peat in an Irish bog (Loud laughter) There was nothing good in the measure, but everything pernicious and damaging to the officers of the Government They should advance a man according to his merit, and not set up a pauper scale He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months

The SPEAKER ruled that the amendment would not be in order

Mr STRANGWAYS would call attention to certain clauses which should be recommitted, in order to correct errors in the Bill There were other portions of the measure also which he objected to, but before going into them he would again ask the Government as to whether they were prepared to give an answer as to one clause His question was whether, under the 6th clause, a Judge of the Supreme Court, or any officer whose salary was fixed by the Civil List, could claim a pension That question ought to receive an answer It was immaterial which member of the Government might answer, but it was the duty of the Government to answer the question as to the construction of a measure which they introduced He saw that the chief Law Officer of the Crown was not in his place, or he should address himself to that hon member But if the question was not answered upon that ground alone, if there were no other he should oppose the passing of the Bill, for he contended that questions as to the legal effects of every Bill should be answered by the person introducing a Bill If a private Bill was brought in by a private member, and that member refused to give an opinion respecting the Bill which he had introduced, what would be the effect? Why the House would scout the Bill at once, if for no other reason, because the member refused to give the required information He again put his question, and when it was answered he would be prepared to state his views upon the answer In the fifth clause hon members would see that officers who had not been three years in the service received good service pay, but there was no provision that these three years should not be included in the time which reckoned for the granting of a pension One would imagine that these three years should be excluded from the time, but there was no such provision Again, in clause 7 it was admitted that officers in the civil service of the Government were entitled to sums in accordance with the schedule That was an admission on the part of the House in passing the clause, and yet it was provided that no sum shall be paid by the Treasurer, and it was only by him it could be paid, exceeding £400 a-year Thus, if an officer received £1,500 a-year, he would be entitled to £750, or one half the amount, but the Treasurer could only pay him £400 He presumed that the intention of the clause was that no person should be entitled to a sum exceeding £400 a-year There were only about a dozen or fifteen persons who would be affected by the clause, and he presumed the intention was that those parties receiving high salaries should not be paid at the same rate as persons with lower salaries Again, under the 8th clause, strictly considered an officer retiring from the service at 60 years of age, would forfeit all the advantages which he was supposed to be entitled to, though that was probably a technical error, but it would be desirable to amend the clause The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) had not, he believed, taken any steps to move the amendment of which he had given notice, and he (Mr Strangways) had great doubts whether such an amendment would be a very great improvement, but whether the amendment was carried, or the Bill stood as to the fourth clause, the Ministry would find themselves in three or four years in precisely the same state they were in last year with pensions amounting to £4,000 to £5,000, and an income of not half that amount, so that they would be in just as great a mess as that they were trying to extricate themselves from by this Bill

Mr GLYDE, in order to give hon members on the Treasury benches a chance of the hon the Attorney-General coming in, and so enabling them to reply to the question of the hon member (Mr Strangways), would move the amendment standing in his name asking leave to alter the words "twenty-eight" to "thirty" It was not a perfect amendment, and if it was carried, the Bill would not be perfect, so that he (Mr Glyde) might still be forced to vote against it, but the amendment would be a great improvement on the original Bill The clause in the Government Bill must be very imperfect, inasmuch as they had offered no amendment upon it when the amendment of the hon member (Mr Barrow) was carried, though that amendment altered the whole of the provisions of the Bill In theory this question ought not to be brought before the House at all The public servants should be paid well, and left out of their incomes to make provision for their old age Next to this system, he would prefer, instead of a retiring allowance for our small number of public servants, granting retiring pensions, where they were required, but with our limited resources and uncertain future we might not be able to meet these claims, and hence it was necessary to have a retiring fund. His object was to show that the Government scheme was imperfect, and that his (Mr Glyde's) was a great improvement upon it, and he would quote a few figures for this purpose He would first take the case of a young man (A B) entering say the Customs department under this Act at 20 years of age At 23 he began receiving his good-service pay, at 35 his salary would probably exceed £300 a year, and at 60 years of age he might retire, having been Collector of Customs for three years previously He (Mr Glyde) had made his calculations at 5 per cent, partly because it was easier—(a laugh)—and partly because we could not expect a higher rate for the 20 years over which our debentures had to run The individual whose case he had taken would pay up to the age of 60, £2,429 15s into the retiring fund He would now take another case A man entering the Customs at 35, at a salary exceeding £300 a year, and retired at 60, having been Collector for three years previously This person (C D) would have paid £1,386 against C D's £2,429 Thus A B would have paid nearly double that paid by B C, having also 15 years' longer risk of not living to enjoy his pension, and yet both would retire on £400 a year, but the young man, A B, received in cash £350, and interest £519 15s The hon member proceeded to demonstrate that, deducting the cash and interest received, A B would have paid more by £174 than C D Under the amendment the young man (A B) would pay £2,016 15s, and receive £1,252 15s in cash and interest, leaving £794 as the actual amount contributed by A B, and the elder man (C D) would pay £1,139, and receive £113, therefore contributing a total of £1 026 C D would thus pay £230 more than the younger man (A B), notwithstanding A B's greater length of service, and longer risk of not living to enjoy a pension, being a much fairer plan than making A B pay £274 more than C D Whilst mentioning the risk of not being able to enjoy a pension, he would read a copy of the rates payable for annuities which he had received from the People's Provident Society The annual premiums for annuity of £100 per annum, after attaining the age of 60, were—For a man of 20 years of age, 9 per cent, for one of 30, 16 per cent, of 40, 30 per cent, and of 50, 80 per cent Thus not only did the older man pay a great deal more per annum, but the table was calculated on the supposition that a man of 20 would never live to enjoy his annuity The premium paid would be for a man of 20, £360, of 30, £480, of 40, £600, of 50, at the rate of 80 per cent, or £800 From this it would be seen that Government plan was manifestly unfair He would now the take another case A B has been in the Government service on the 1st January, 1859, 10 years, and is 35 years of age, and in consequence of ability and industry has worked his way up until he is in the receipt of £300 a year He contributes £1,650 to the fund, and if he rises to £700 a year, retires on a pension of £400 C D, on the 1st January, 1859, at 45 years of age has been 10 years in the service, receiving £280, and at about 50 is promoted He retires at 60 from a salary of £700 a year on a pension of £400 But A B has contributed £1,650, whilst C D has paid £798 15s, and received £288 15s, making his actual contribution £510, yet both retire on £400 a year, though A B has had 10 years longer risk of not living to enjoy his pension But under the amendment A B would contribute £1,447 10s, and receive in cash and interest £202 10s, leaving the actual amount paid 1,245*l*, whilst C D would pay 1,087*l* 10s, or about seven-eighths the amount paid by A B, instead of paying less than a third, as would be the case under the Bill If hon members endorsed the Bill after hearing these figures he would be much surprised It was said that young men would declare their ages falsely, but this could be easily guarded against He did not charge the Ministry with any intentional unfairness in the Bill He now moved the amendment standing in his name

Captain Hart said that from a calculation which he had taken the trouble to make, he could show that the hon member (Mr Glyde) had left out one or two essential elements in his calculations, which a little consideration would probably have prevented his omitting The hon member had drawn a vivid picture of the difference of position of the young and old officers, but he had left out a good deal of coloring in the foreground of the Act, which altered the whole features of the calculation The hon member forgot that when the elder officer retired he got no good service pay, but the whole went into the fund He could show the hon member (Mr Glyde), if that hon gentleman sat down with him for some time—and it would require a good deal—the fallacy of his calculations When the hon member had supposed that a young man entering the service at the age of 20 paid a certain sum, how did he arrive at that calculation? Had he taken into account the various steps by which an officer rose to the rank of Collector of Customs? Did the hon member take into consideration that the moment an officer entered a higher class, he ceased to have his good-service pay for the time, that until he was in the new class a year he had but £5, and until he was there seven years he had but £35, whilst an officer, remaining in one class, had £40 a-year all the time The hon member had forgotten to take that into his calculation ("No, no," from Mr Glyde) He (Captain Hart) maintained that the hon member could not have taken it into his calculation, as if he had, he could not have fallen into the error which he had made Taking a man entering the service at the age of 20 he commenced paying at 23, for the first year he had paid £5, and for the seventh £35, but when he got a step above his class, the pay was reduced The hon member had not taken that into consideration at all, and therefore his calculations were altogether fallacious He did not think the hon member could frame a Bill or schedule which would compel every officer to pay what, according to his health and age he should pay But if health was not to be taken into consideration, what would become of the calculation? (Hear, hear) There were many lives of forty that were worth more than others of twenty (Hear, hear, and laughter) With this element, the calculation of the hon member was worth nothing, and it could not be introduced If the hon member proposed an amendment that no person under a certain age should enter the service, he (Capt Hart) could understand it, but this plan had its disadvantages as well as its advantages, and that was the reason of its not being put in the Bill, for it was felt that it involved calculations which would be likely to keep out of the service men whom it would be a public benefit to have in it The hon member said that the amendments of the hon member (Mr Barrow) altered the calculations of the Bill, but it would not do anything of the kind That amendment which limited the retiring allowance to £400 would touch no officer at present in the Government service, with the exception of three, namely, the Postmaster-General, the Collector of Customs, and the Auditor-General Supposing the salaries of these gentlemen to be of the maximum rate, they alone would be touched by the amendment, and therefore the amount of difference which the amendment would make in the calculations was so small as to be in reality of no moment whatever But what would become of the funds if the amendment was passed as it was now proposed? (Hear, hear) They would be so reduced that the whole calculations as to whether they would be sufficient or not would have to be entered into again At present they were sufficient, but it was impossible to say whether they would be if the amendment was passed By this Bill, as it now stood, they would have a pension list—("Oh, oh!")—or rather a pension fund provided at a less cost than by a payment for good services To say that after a service of fifteen years a man was to have a permanent income of £225 was a gross absurdity, whilst the House was in the habit of paying such liberal salaries as it had been doing, and to say that this was to be given whether a person was fit to be promoted or not was a still grosser absurdity The present Bill was intended to repeal the Act which allowed these things to occur The hon member (Mr Glyde) had not taken into consideration the ingredients essential to this calculation, and therefore the calculations were of no value for the purpose for which he intended them In reality the young officer paid nothing—the money was given to him The whole question was, "did the House consider it necessary that a sum should be provided to pay retiring allowances for those officers who in sickness or old age may require it The hon member admitted himself that the fund was necessary, and the next question was, did the Bill provide an adequate fund If it did so that was sufficient to recommend it, and if the fund was too large, the balance would only go to the Treasury (Hear, hear) The amendment would upset the calculations and prevent the sum from being sufficient It would, in fact, be a death-blow to the Bill, and would prevent it from passing at all

Mr Barrow said if the House had to go into the question of the comparative scales of payment put forward by his hon colleague, and the Government, the House had better adjourn for a week in order to enable hon members to go into the calculations His hon colleague might express his belief in the accuracy of his figures, or the hon members of the Government might do the same, but it was impossible to catch the elaborate schedules which had been put forward, and one of which reflected so much credit on his (Mr Barrow's) hon colleague It was impossible, from listening to the reading off of a column of figures, for hon members' minds to follow the calculations so as to perceive their correctness or incorrectness It might be asked why, if the figures of his hon colleague required to be checked, those of the Government did not require to be checked also, but the answer was that the Government were responsible to the House for the correctness of their calculations, whilst the hon member (Mr Glyde) was not responsible for his It should also be borne in mind that the Government were standing upon the calculations of a Select Committee composed of persons very competent to examine into the subject These were two strong arguments in favor of the Government scheme Moreover, if the Government after the great blunders which had been committed on a former occasion in connection with a Bill of the kind now before the House, introduced another Bill embodying a similar blunder, the Government would be held justly amenable to the censure of the House—(hear, hear)—and he had no doubt the censure would fall heavily upon them (Hear, hear) The Government must have been sufficiently warned by the past to take the precaution of ascertaining that their calculations would stand the test of time ("Hear, hear," from the Ministerial benches) It was impossible that hon members could pronounce an opinion on a column of figures unless they had them printed, so that they could take them home with them, and reflect upon them, and digest them in the evenings Without for a moment affirming that the schedule of figures of his hon colleague (Mr Glyde) was not better than those of the Government—for such might be the case—still as the Government were responsible for theirs, and the hon. member (Mr Glyde) was not for his, he (Mr Barrow) should feel compelled to vote for those of the Government if he voted at all It had been said that in theory they should reject the Bill, but the House in passing the Bill through its second reading had affirmed the principle of the measure The hon member (Mr Burford) had said that the Bill had all the features of a monster, but if the hon member had defined what were the features of a monster, the House would be able to distinguish the monstrosity of a Bill (laughter), and could reject it on its first reading But as the hon member had not done this, he (Mr Barrow) could not see how this Bill was open to the charge The hon member (Mr Glyde) said that his amendment was not perfect, and that even if the amendment was passed, he might vote against the Bill If so, what was the use of passing the amendment He (Mr Barrow) could not understand the views of the hon member, and he did not know whether the hon member could vote against a Bill embodying an amendment of his own, but that was a point which would rest between him and the hon the Chairman He (Mr Barrow) however, could not reconcile it to himself to act in such a manner The hon member also said that the amendment which he (Mr Barrow) had introduced had brought a new principle into the Bill, but the effect of that amendment would be to make the Bill more secure instead of making it as the hon members would do, less secure His hon colleague said that the money was not enough, and yet he sought to make it less, but he (Mr Barrow) said that without making the money more he would make the demands upon it less, and therefore his alterations strengthened the Bill, whilst the hon member's weakened it (Hear, hear) He would like to know if the hon members who opposed the Bill would vote the good service pay in the event of the Bill being lost The junior officers might fancy they would receive that pay, but he (Mr Barrow) would say that if these officers did not wish to form a retiring fund, he would not vote the good service pay (Hear, hear) The hon member (Mr Burford) spoke of preventing the officers from investing their money in a better manner, but he (Mr Barrow) denied that this good service pay was their money (Hear, hear) He considered it not as a portion of their regular salaries, but as a free gift of the House, and if the conditions on which it was bestowed were rejected, then it should be withdrawn (Hear, hear) He said if there was to be no retiring fund there would be no good-service pay, at least so far as his vote was concerned (Hear, hear) He did not agree with some of the remarks of the hon member (Mr Burford) He did not think there was any discredit or dishonour to a Government officer in recognising his merit—(hear, hear) -by voting a sum to reward his efficiency If this principle was to be carried out at all, to receive a salary would be a humiliation—(hear, hear, and laughter)—and they would soon have these gentlemen offering premiums to the House to give them situations (Hear, hear, and laughter) He felt obliged to support the clause, because he had no present means of testing the two sets of figures before the House, but as the Government had gone into the question, if they were misleading the House, on them the responsibility must rest, and upon them the censure must fall

Mr Mildred said, in reply to a remark of the hon member (Mr Barrow), as to the Government being responsible for their calculations, that it could not be expected that the same ministers would sit in office for a sufficient number of years to test the calculations So much for the responsibility of ministers He did not think they would do well in providing a pension list or fund, as he was very desirous of seeing every officer under the Government placed in the same position in which he himself was, so that they should exercise prudence whilst they could do so, in order to make a provision for the future. The House had no right to calculate upon the improvidence of officers in the public service. It was clear that any reasonable man by investing a portion of his income in an annuity fund would secure a provision which would be more satisfactory to himself and the country than the system proposed by this Bill. The Government seemed to think that from the improvidence of their officers, it was necessary to provide for them, but the officers themselves, with the exception of those who had no right to expect pensions, were not willing to accept the plan. All that the junior members said, was, "Give us our money and let us do what we like with it." The names of two or three senior officers had been mentioned who were likely to benefit by the Bill, and he (Mr Mildred) respected these gentlemen highly, but they had come to the colony old enough, as he himself had done, and consequently, had no right to expect pensions, inasmuch as they had not spent great portions of their lives in the public service. He would not feel justified in putting these gentleman in a position to avail of a retiring allowance. It was not a system which could be realised, as it was quite clear that in a few years the Government would be obliged to subscribe to the fund in order to carry out the project. Whatever views the House might take, the views which he held would be that taken by the country generally, for it was an universal feeling that nothing in the shape of a pension list should be adopted amongst us.

Mr SOLOMON having spoken to this question on a previous occasion, would say but little, but he would remark that anything he had heard from previous speakers had failed to convince him against his former opinion, that the passing of this Bill would do a great injustice to a large number of young men in the Government service. The hon the Treasurer had informed the House that there were but 15 officers who could retire under the Act which it was proposed to pass, and he would ask the hon the Treasurer whether in the calculations which had been made in framing this Bill, any provision had been made in the case of sickness or accident, or even in death, for paying over to the widow of the deceased officer the amount of subscriptions paid in during his lifetime. It had been admitted by the member for the Port, who was a staunch supporter of the Bill, that it was virtually a pension list. ("No, no.") Hon members said "no," but he could assure them that he had taken the words down, and that that hon gentlemen had admitted it as such, that it was nothing more or less than a pension list. This coming from one of the supporters of the measure was the best argument which could be found against its being passed into law by that House. The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had remarked that if this Bill were not carried he could see no use in continuing the good-service pay, and that he (the hon member for East Torrens) would consequently vote against its continuance. But what did that proposition amount to? Why, to this—that we (the Government) are willing to give you young men a certain emolument for the good service you have rendered if you will give us the liberty of taking it away from you again. However twisted might be the argument used against this view of the case, it amounted to no less than this, that an amount was placed on the Estimates, professedly with the view of benefitting those who from long service had a claim upon the country, and was taken away from them again under the guise of a benefit, which there was no prospect of being realized. It was a case in which a certain number of gentlemen, under the guise of good service pay, had an amount set apart to them, but which was simultaneously abstracted from them by a feat of legerdemain. This Bill in his opinion was nothing more nor less than the initiation of a pension list, but he thought the House had too much good sense to permit the Government to plant upon them, if he might use the expression, this Bill, but would on the contrary throw it out and leave the Ministry to bring in another Bill which should provide for justice being accorded to those ready to retire under it, and to those who would do so at no remote period. With respect to the remark of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) that the Government would be responsible for any defects in the Act, and that, therefore, they should allow it to pass on their assurance, he did not hold with that opinion. Blunders had been committed already in a former Act, and probably would occur again. But supposing the Ministry to be reckoned accountable for these blunders, where would they be when the mistakes had been discovered? Were those gentlemen so sure of their places that they could be answerable at all times for such defects? They all knew that from the Constitution under which the lived those gentlemen were "here to-day and gone to-morrow," and he, therefore, viewed the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow's) argument as a fallacy. He (Mr Solomon) should vote against the Bill.

Mr BAGOT must say, in the words of the hon gentleman who had just down, that he would always set his face against the introduction of a pension list—(hear)—and having said that, he would give it as a reason for supporting the Bill then before the House—(oh!)—for it would just have the tendency of preventing the establishment of a pension list in the colony. What were they to do with old Government officers whose lives had dwindled away in the service? Would any hon gentleman pretend to say that in the case of persons who had served the Government for a long series of years and who had become decrepid in the service, that there would not be a call upon that House for assistance and relief, and that some would not come to that House and say "what are we to do with this old gentleman or that?" For this reason he would compel those in the service to save money to provide a fund which would do away with the necessity which would otherwise exist for a pension list. (Hear.) The hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) had stated that a blunder had been committed in the former attempt at legislation on this subject, and he (Mr Bagot) believed it, but that hon member had said that the present Bill before the House would prove to be a blunder also. But why did not that hon member show in what that blunder consisted? If that hon member had studied the evidence taken by the Select Committee before the introduction of this Bill, he thought he would find that no blunder had been committed. For his own part he looked upon this measure, in providing an assurance fund, as the only means of avoiding a pension list.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, in answer to the remark of the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) that a blunder had been made in the former Act, that no one would of course deny this, but he thought members who had carefully studied the present measure, and the care which it had been framed with, must be of opinion that everything had been done to prevent the recurrence of such blunders in the Bill then before the House. A Select Committee had been appointed to consider it in all its bearings, the calculations were made by able actuaries, and everything had been done to ensure the perfecting of the scheme so that it appeared to him that those hon gentlemen who objected to this measure on the ground of its being insufficient had only one alternative—that of moving for the appointment of another Select Committee to go over the same ground again. (No, no, and laughter.) It was very well for them to say "no, no," for their object was clearly to get rid of the Bill altogether. During the discussion, he had, he confessed, felt inclined to let the cap fall upon his head in remarks which were addressed to the Ministerial benches, but language such as "jolly indifference," and a variety of other epithets, having been used, he had resolved to put all the caps on when he would be sure of getting the one that fitted. (Laughter.) He believed this measure would conduce to the good of the country, and be productive of benefit in getting a better class of officers in the service. He should, therefore, vote against the recommittal of the 4th clause. Although some hon member had described this Bill as the commencement of a pension list, but he (the Commissioner of public Works) denied it—(oh! oh!)—and would ask them not to allow themselves to be influenced by that opinion. Nothing was so easy as to put a few figures together for the purpose of carrying a point. He believed, however, that proper calculations were made in introducing that Bill, and he believed they would prove to be correct. He trusted, therefore, that the House would vote for it.

Mr HAY supported the Bill in opposition to the amendment of the hon member, Mr Glyde, which he considered to be no improvement. The objection of Mr Mildred, that in the case of the death of a Government officer, there was no provision made for handing over the amount subscribed to the widow and children entailed a degree of inconsistency on that hon member's part, and looking at the objections which had been made by previous speakers, one after another, he could not help thinking that there was a considerable amount of inconsistency manifested. This Bill was to provide for the retirement and support of officers in the public service when they could not fulfil their duties by reason of age or other inaptitude. It was a claim for which the Government were liable, and it could not therefore be looked upon in the light of a pension list.

Mr MILDRED explained in reference to some remarks of his which the last speaker had referred to that what he said was that there was no provision in the Bill for the return of the money subscribed, to the heirs of any person in the service, who might become deceased perhaps at the age of 59 years.

Mr LINDSAY was not altogether decided as to how he should place his vote, but from present appearances he thought it probable he should vote against the Bill. (A laugh.) He objected to the Bill because it did not compel officers in the service to contribute to the fund in proportion to the amount of their salaries, and because it did not give them a pension in proportion to the amount contributed. It had been said that the good-service pay was a free gift, but he could not view it in that light, as many officers had entered the service since the Act which provided for the good-service pay had passed. If the Government would so alter the 4th clause as to make them (the Government officers) contribute a certain percentage on their salaries, or alter the schedule so that the pensions should be in proportion to the amount contributed, then he would have no objection to support the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN put the recommittal of the 4th clause, when

Mr Glyde rose and briefly observed that, on careful consideration of the Bill, he found he should have to vote against the Bill even were the amendment carried It had been said that under his amendment the total of the fund would be reduced, but he thought it would have a contrary effect, and that the amount subscribed would be greater under his amendment than under the Bill as introduced by the Government What he wished to establish was, an equitable system between the officers themselves, and not between the Government and the service

Mr Hawker moved "That the House do now divide," and

The Chairman declared it carried

A division was called for

Ayes, 20—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Bagot, Bakewell, Barrow, Collinson, Duffield, Hallett, Hart, Harvey, Hawker, Hay, Macdermott, McEllister, Milne, Neales, Scammell, Shannon, and the Treasurer (teller),

Noes 12—Messrs Burford, Cole, Dunn, Glyde, Lindsay, Mildred, Peake, Reynolds, Solomon, Strangways, Wark, and Townsend (teller)

Making a majority of eight in favor of the Ayes

The Chairman then put the question that clause 4 be recommitted, and declared it negatived

The Treasurer moved that the Bill be now reported, with the amendments

Mr Reynolds observed that he had serious objections to the Bill, but he would reserve them until the third reading was called on

Mr Townsend rose to speak to the amendment

The Chairman informed the hon member that there was no amendment before the House

Mr Strangways would ask the Attorney-General whether under the 6th clause of the Bill the Judges of the Supreme Court, or the responsible Ministers of the Crown could claim under it as well as other officers in the Civil Service

The Attorney-General replied that in his opinion neither the Judges nor the responsible Ministers of the Crown would be entitled to the good-service pay under that Act

The Chairman put the question "That the Bill with the amendments be now reported," and declared the ayes had it A division was called for, which was as follows —

Ayes, 20—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Bagot, Bakewell, Barrow, Duffield, Hallett, Hart, Hardy Hawker, Hay, Collinson, Macdermott, McEllister, Milne, Neales, Scammell, Shannon, and the Treasurer (Teller)

Noes, 12—Messrs Burford, Cole, Dunn, Glyde, Lindsay, Mildred, Peake, Reynolds, Solomon, Strangways, Wark, and Townsend (Teller)

Making a majority of eight in favor of the Ayes

The House resumed, the Speaker reported the Bill with amendments, and on the motion of the Treasurer the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for Friday

MR STUART'S DISCOVERIES IN THE NORTH

Mr Hawker rose on a question of privilege, to move that the journal of Mr Stuart's discoveries in the North, which had been conditionally submitted to the Commissioner of Crown Lands pending an arrangement with the Legislature, should be returned to that gentleman

Mr Reynolds asked whether any petition had been presented, or reason assigned for this request?

The Speaker replied in the affirmative and explained to the hon member that the course adopted was a regular one

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the reason why it was requested that this journal should be returned was that he had already given notice of an address to His Excellency on Mr Stuart's claim for reward, and it was thought desirable that in the mean time the document in question should be taken out of his (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) possession, as if it were laid upon the table it would become the property of the House The journal could be returned and placed in the charge of some hon member, who in the mean time would be able to shew it those who were desirous of seeing it

The motion was carried

PATENT FOR THE MANUFACTURE OF GAS

Mr Hart moved, pursuant to notice—

"That he have leave to introduce " A Bill intituled an Act to secure to Abram Longbottom, for the residue of a term of fourteen years, the exclusive right to use, within the Province of South Australia, an invention for certain improvements in the manufacture of Gas, where oils and fatty matters are used "

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be printed

RETURNS FOR TRENCHING PARLIAMENT GROUNDS

The Commissioner of Public Works laid upon the table the above returns as asked for by the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), and they were ordered to be printed

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

In Committee

The Commissioner of Public Works laid upon the table an amended print of the District Councils Act Amendment Bill He stated the amendments were merely verbal ones, and he begged to move that the amended print be substituted for the former one

Carried

The House resumed, and leave was given to sit again on Thursday the 11th instant

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Commissioner of Public Works, in moving the second reading of this Bill said he was sorry the preparation of other Government business had delayed the introduction of this measure On a former occasion a pledge had been given to the House that an amended Bill would be introduced by the Government as soon as the defects in the working of the measure were discovered, and the experience which had been gained by the Commissioners of Waterworks—amongst whom he might mention the Mayor of Adelaide, whose experience in those matters was doubtless of great service to the Commission—enabled the Government to prepare a Bill more suitable to their requirements, and which he now submitted to the House. Amongst the alterations made from the former Act was the omission of the drainage portion of the scheme Again, the construction rates had been done away with, and a new scale of rates had been introduced as in Schedule A These rates were exceedingly moderate and not more than one-half of the amount as proposed to be levied under the former Act There were other improvements made in this Bill, such as empowering the Commissioners of Waterworks to purchase land, which should vest in the Commissioners, to make roads, and it also omitted the restriction in the former Act requiring the sole supply of water to be taken from the River Torrens With respect to the drainage portion of the scheme, it was proposed under the amended Act to defer it until a sufficient sum had been accumulated from the unexpended balance of rates He hoped the House would agree with him that these were great improvements He thought the waterworks would prove a great source of profit inasmuch as it was invariably the case that the attempt, in most countries, to meet the demand for the supply of water in towns was attended with great success But if this were the case in other countries, where the climate was more temperate, what advantage must ensue in a climate like this from the plentiful supply of water?

Mr Strangways said, from the remarks of the hon Commissioner of Public Works, it appeared that the principal reason given for the passing of this Bill was that the Mayor of Adelaide whose experience was so great in these matters was one of the Waterworks Commissioners (Laughter) For his part, judging from the experience of that gentleman's abilities, as one of the Waterworks Commission in the construction of the River Weir, he thought it was every reason for dissenting to the Bill And he (Mr Strangways) should like to know whether it was intended to keep the present Commissioners of Waterworks in office after they had constructed such a disgraceful piece of engineering, which would entail a loss of £7,000 in money and much more in time He thought provision should be made for the appointment of more competent persons for if their conduct in the construction of the River Weir was to be taken as a specimen of their ability, he thought the sooner they were dismissed the better A new engineer had been already appointed, and that gentleman had declared the work should be done all over again As to the schedule of the Bill he saw very little substantial alteration in it from the previous one The water rate in London amounted to about 3d in the £1, but here he found that the water rate on stores shops, and other buildings would amount to 6d in the £1 on the annual value He should like to know why the Government should be placed in a position to compel persons to receive water whether they were willing or not Private companies had no such immunities as this, and his opinion was that those only who used the water should be made to pay for it That was the principle adopted in other parts of the world, and it was this that made water-works so profitable He considered the Government should stand on the same footing as private companies Why should the Government be in a position to say, we have gone to an expense of £250,000, and we want some return for our money The principle which he thought should be adopted was that of supplying the water at lower rates, and putting the competition of other parties out of the question Again, if any persons had private wells on their premises, and many had, and were independent of any supply from other sources, why should they be compelled to pay for that from which they had received no benefit Again, in Clause 52 there was a strange provision, by which the rates were to be paid in advance This, he considered, was putting the cart before the horse Public companies got their rates after they delivered their water, and why should not the Government do the same. He hoped too the House would consider whether unoccupied land should be subject to water-rates, or whether any other than those who used the water should be made to pay

Mr Solomon said the points argued by the hon member who had just sat down, were the very ones which he had determined to urge upon the House, viz, with respect to the Schedule It appeared that not only were the rates to be expensive, but they were to be unjustly levied Banks, stores, shops, or public offices were to be charged with an additional annual sum of 2½ per cent on the rental of the property. On reference to clauses in the Bill it would be found that a house of two rooms at an ordinary rental would be subject to a rate of 30s per annum, and other houses in proportion, according to the number of rooms. In Sydney the rate was just one-third of this sum, for the rate on a two-roomed cottage would only amount to 10s per annum. But here there was an attempt to charge three times the amount. In London, where he had resided for three years, his experience of the rates levied there was that they did not amount to more than 2½ per cent per annum but here in South Australia a two room cottage rented, say perhaps at £10 a-year, would be subject to a rate of 15 per cent on the rental. He did not object to a rate being made on vacant land, because he believed such works improved the value of the property. This he thought necessary and just, but he objected to the excessive rate to which small cottages would be liable. That being 30s on a two-roomed cottage, or at the rate of 15 per cent per annum. He was not dissatisfied with the Bill generally, but principally with the schedule. There was one other remark he would make with reference to the scheme of bringing water into the town without a proper system of drainage. He opposed this, and, however, much the introduction of water into the town might be considered a boon, he thought without a proper system of drainage it was likely to be turned into a curse in the prevalence of sickness and disease which would follow. He did not think of the question as one always in this colony, for he had had some experience in tropical climates, and knew the blessings which resulted from a proper supply of water, but unless accompanied with a thorough system of drainage, that blessing would cease to exist, and would probably be turned into a curse.

Mr HAY should support the second reading of the Bill. He must say he had heard with considerable surprise the objections which had been taken by the hon member for the city, Mr Solomon, regarding that portion of the schedule which proposed a rate of £2 10s for every £100 assessment upon stores, shops, or banks. If the proprietors of any class of buildings had reason to congratulate themselves upon this Bill, it was the very class referred to in this portion of the schedule. The former Act placed them in a most unamiable position. The proprietors of premises in Rundle or Hindley-street, who had valuable stocks, he had no hesitation in saying, were called upon to pay £40 or £50, where by the provisions of this Bill they would only be called upon to pay £2 10s, and he had no doubt that the payment of this amount would go far to reduce the premiums of insurance to which they were at present subjected. It must be clear to every one that the expense of bringing water to the premises of such parties under existing regulations was excessive, but it could not be said that under the Bill before the House it would be excessive. With regard to the rate to be charged upon vacant lands he hoped the Commissioner of Public Works would see that the rates were framed in such a manner as would be fair and just to the owners of such properties. If, however, there were to be a rate of £2 10s for every £100 of the annual value, he would refer to the great number of disputes which had taken place with the South Australian Company and others relative to the value, that is, the annual value of vacant land. He believed, however, that it would be quite possible to ascertain the market value of the land, and place a rate upon that, but there was such a difference of opinion as to the annual value of land leased for a period of 21 years, that they would scarcely get two land agents in Adelaide to agree upon the annual value of any portions. Whilst this difficulty, however, existed in determining the annual value, there was no difficulty in determining the value of the fee-simple, and he would suggest that a rate should be put upon that amount. The rule which applied in England in reference to 21 years' leases would not apply to a new country like this. He would, therefore, suggest, as the only means of getting over the difficulty, that a rate should be put upon the actual market value of the land, and he should endeavour at the proper time to introduce an amendment to that effect. He agreed with hon members who had previously spoken that the rate proposed to be charged did appear high, but still it was nothing like so high as the rate generally paid at the present time for water. The hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) had remarked upon the extortionate character of the rate, but he would remind that hon member that the rates which were proposed were such as it was presumed would enable the Government ultimately to pay off the capital which had been absorbed in the construction of the Waterworks and then the rates for supply would be much lower. He looked upon the rates named in the schedule as the maximum rates. With regard to the remarks which had been made by the hon member for the City, relative to drainage, he agreed that where a large quantity of water was brought into town, provision should be made for drainage, but this would necessarily involve great additional expense, and there was an express clause in the Act for the purpose of providing drainage when they were prepared to incur the additional cost which would be necessary. The House, he thought, would readily admit that it was absolutely necessary as the city became more thickly inhabited, that there should be a better supply of water, and he believed that the Bill then before the House would be found a great improvement on the existing system.

Mr BARROW should support the second reading of the Bill, although he thought it very likely that many clauses would have to be altered in Committee, and more particularly that it would be necessary the schedule should undergo careful revision. The hon member who had just sat down had addressed his observations principally to the third clause, but had entirely overlooked the fourth. It was true that the third clause provided an assessment of 2½ per cent. upon shops, &c, but the fourth clause provided that they should pay at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum in addition to what they would have to pay if they were assessed as private dwellings. But this was not all, for, after they had paid all they could be called upon to pay under these two clauses, it would be found that they might be called upon for a further payment under the 49th clause. (Clause read.) Thus it was quite possible under the operations of the schedule to the Bill before the House, taken in connection with the 49th clause that certain buildings might be called upon to contribute three times over, and that the aggregate amount would be something very considerable. At the same time he felt that the present mode of water-supply was not only the most unsatisfactory, but the most costly which could be obtained. That, however, was no reason that the House should not carefully consider the various clauses of the present Bill, and see how they could obtain a sufficient supply at the lowest possible remunerative rate. He could have wished, under existing circumstances, that the Commissioner of Public Works, in introducing this Bill for its second reading, had said something with regard to the River Weir, for although that subject was not technically before the House it was impossible to forget the disclosures which had been made in reference to the state of things in connection with that question. He thought it would not have been wandering so far from the subject under discussion as they had wandered on other occasions, if the Commissioner of Public Works had given the House some information in reference to the investigation which took place a few days ago in connection with the River Weir. Some remarkable disclosures had he believed been made, and he had certainly received, some few nuggets of a remarkable character, such he believed as had never before been dignified with the name of concrete. At present all they knew was, that a large sum of money had been squandered or misapplied, but they knew not who was to blame—whether the Commissioners, the Engineer, the contractors, or the Clerk of the Works. All that they knew was that somebody was to blame somehow, and there, perhaps would be an end of the matter. He hoped however, that the matter would not end there, but that they would go a little further into it and endeavour to ascertain with whom the blame really rested. He would not offer any further observations upon the subject than that they had gone to great expense in obtaining water supply for the city, and it was only necessary to go to the north-east corner of the Park Lands to see the tremendous array of pipes to afford an argument for proceeding with the works with all possible expedition, and as the various clauses passed one by one before the Committee in review, they should endeavour to economise and remedy the defects which would no doubt present themselves. He should support the second reading of the Bill, reserving his right to offer amendments in Committee.

Mr LINDSAY supposed he must vote for the second reading of the Bill, in order to tinker up past legislation upon the subject, but it was really disgraceful that the Bills which the House passed one session, they should be called upon during the next session either to supersede or amend. It appeared, however, that they could not legislate in any other way. The hon member for the city (Mr Solomon), in alluding to the schedule, had described the rates as excessive, and had compared them with the rates charged in Sydney and other places. There could be no doubt that the rates which were proposed were excessive, but it appeared that there was no remedy for this, that they must submit to these rates or be without an adequate supply of water. He entertained the opinions which he had previously expressed, that the Government had adopted an expensive—a most unnecessarily expensive—scheme, and that a scheme which would not have cost more than one-half could readily have been pointed out. But the Government had commenced this expensive scheme, and had blundered, but as it had been carried on to a considerable extent, it must be completed, and the rates which were charged must be such as would suffice to pay the interest upon the outlay, and all the expenses of supplying the water. If he had understood the Commissioner of Public Works correctly, that hon gentleman had stated that the drainage portion of the scheme was omitted from the present Bill, if so, he regretted that it should have been, because he considered it would have proved most economical, if both schemes for water supply and drainage had been undertaken at the same time. He fully agreed with the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) that water supply alone without drainage was likely rather to prove prejudicial than beneficial. Wherever surface house drainage and was not carried off entirely, it became exceedingly offensive. He wished, at the same time, that an efficient scheme for water supply had been proposed, there had also been an efficient scheme for drainage. He felt assured it would prove most prejudicial if the present scheme were not immediately followed by a scheme for the drainage of the city in the most effectual manner. He should support the second reading of the Bill, as he could see no good which was likely to arise from throwing it out

MR NEALES believed the last speaker had hit the mark If there would be no good in throwing the Bill out, he was sure there would be no good in passing it (Laughter) Parties both in and out of that House might say that he should be shy in speaking about the Water Works, as he nearly lost his election in consequence of speaking about the previous Bill which was declared by the Government to be perfect There were all sorts of mistakes in the Bill before the House It did not undertake to do what any Water Company should, yet it charged fully five times as much as it should It actually proposed to charge 30s per annum for two rooms six feet by five (Laughter) It was so stated in the Bill, at least, it mentioned rooms of 30 feet, and rooms of the measurement he had stated would amount to that Why, the rent of the rooms would actually not come to as much as it was proposed to charge for water supply No man if he were to build a row of cottages each containing two rooms six feet by five, would get 30s a year for each, yet that was to be the charge under this Bill for the water supply It would be positively a farce to go on with the Bill unless they were prepared to alter almost every word of it There was one thing, however, they knew, and that was that £7,000 had absolutely gone, and, perhaps, the Commissioner of Public Works would tell him how much more was contingent upon that sum? Would £10,000 suffice? No, he believed that it would require £15,000 It was now proposed to go a little further up the river, and that would of course make the affair a little more expensive, although it would have been an easy matter to procure a supply within a stone's throw of Government House, and to have supplied the inhabitants at one-fourth of the rates which were now proposed, but there appeared a determination to spend a frightful sum in connection with Waterworks Under the proposed scheme it would cost the Government considerably more to lay on the water to some streets than treble the rate which they would receive But still he considered the Government were bound to provide the supply, though it should be at a fair advance upon London prices With regard to the 2½ per cent which had been referred to by the hon member for Gumeracha, he thought it quite possible that if the hon member got brought under the three rates, which it had been shown was possible, he might find that those three rates amounted together to something like eighteenpence in the pound, whilst in London the charge varied from a penny seven-eighths in the pound to threepence In London parties were not charged for water if they did not use it, but here it was proposed to exact a rate no matter whether the water was consumed or not He had been opposed to the Bill throughout, and felt bound to continue his opposition Since the first Bill had been introduced they knew this to be the fact that they were in a worse position by £10,000 than they were before

Dr WARK said that when the Commissioner of Public Works rose to move the second reading of the Bill with such a flourish of trumpets, he did not know whether it arose from the hon gentleman's disposition to put a bold front upon everything, or from the goodness of the cause which he had in hand, but he now felt satisfied that the hon gentleman had put a bold front upon a very rotten cause, as rotten as the River Weir, from top to bottom He was perfectly surprised that the Commissioner of Public Works should have brought forward a Bill of this magnitude without giving the House any idea of the state of the works in progress He believed that the people of Adelaide would look upon the present Bill as a curse instead of a blessing He was surprised that the hon gentleman should ask the House to assent to the second reading, without giving some idea of the profit and loss although he believed they would be right in assuming that there had already been a most serious amount of loss At present the House had no idea how the works stood, or what it would cost to complete them He believed the Ministry were in possession of information in connection with the subject which they had not yet laid upon the table of the House, although it had been supplied to the press At least some of the members of the Ministry had seen the Weir, and he thought it would have been only right to afford the House some information upon the point It was the duty of the House to see that the country at large was not subjected to enormous expense, merely that the city might be supplied with water He believed that works of this character were generally carried out better by private companies than by Government It appeared by the present Bill that the present Commissioners were to be kept in office, but he would ask, was there a man in that House who had confidence in any of the Commissioners with the exception of the Chief Commissioner? If the other Commissioners had not seen the work as it progressed, they should It was the duty of the Commissioners to inspect the work, if not, where was the use of having them, if they permitted their officers to mislead them as they had? They owed a deep debt of gratitude to the Chief Commissioner for bringing about the investigation which he had After the works had been completed, it would be the duty of the city members to see that the citizens were not assessed too highly, but he would ask, reverting to the Commissioners, what confidence could there be in a body who held their meetings with closed doors If the press had been admitted it was more than probable that things would not have gone so far wrong

MR TOWNSEND would not detain the House for more than a few moments He merely rose for the purpose of pointing out that it appeared to him the 5th clause was inconsistent with the Public Works Bill Under the provisions of the clause to which he had alluded, Commissioners were to be appointed for the purposes of the Act, so that it appeared Government were still to have the power of appointing Commissioners after they had passed an Act bringing the works referred to in this Bill under the Commissioner of Public Works He found from the testimony of those who had visited the Weir, that there could be no doubt £6,000 or £7,000 had been thrown away in the Torrens, and what he wished to know was how had this mistake occurred? The House was certainly entitled to some explanation from the Government upon the subject, because the Commissioners appointed by the Government certainly had not, in his opinion, done their duty It did not appear that the Commissioners had taken a single step till the present Chief Commissioner joined them and proceeded to test the capabilities of the Engineer The only answer to all this mismanagement appeared to be, "It's true the money's gone, and you must put up with it" He considered it was the duty of the Government and that House to ascertain whether the two Commissioners had done their duty, and, if not, they should be called upon to resign

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would endeavor to confine himself to the question before the House, that is, whether the Bill should be read a second time or not He would call the attention of the House to the existing state of the law upon the subject The House had decided that no provision should be made for drainage, because they had appropriated the money voted for the purpose by a former Legislature to another object It was that which determined the Government not to introduce the subject in the present Bill With regard to the other important question—the essential feature of the Bill—the schedule, or the rates which the various buildings should be charged for water supplied and the construction of the necessary works, hon members would bear in mind that the utmost amount proposed by the present Bill was 6d in the pound, whilst by a former Act, all the valuable buildings in the city—the banks, auction-rooms, &c—might have been taxed to the extent of 2s in the pound, so that the difference between the present Bill and the former was that, whilst this proposed a rate of 6d in the pound, the other proposed a rate of 2s Although he had no practical knowledge of the subject, he believed that a shopkeeper having valuable goods upon his premises would save in insurance a considerably larger sum than it was proposed he should pay under the present Bill With regard to the objections of the hon member for the city (Mr Neales), who had spoken of rooms six feet by five being rated higher for water supply than their actual rental, he could only say that if it were possible a person could think of building rooms of such dimensions, he thought they should levy the highest possible rate, in order to discourage parties from building rooms not fit for pigstyes But supposing the rooms to be only six feet by five, what would the rate amount to?—why 30s per year, or not quite 1d per day, for an ample supply of water, ascertained to be of admirable quality Now, the occupants of such a building would have to pay a much larger sum for a very small quantity of water, so that the present Bill would render them absolute gainers in money, and to a still greater extent in health From the price of water supply now, the constant tendency of persons whose incomes were small was to economise as much as possible the use of water, and this was attended by results which modern society was beginning to recognise, and which modern legislation was beginning to guard against The law at the present time was substantially as he had stated, and the substantial difference was contained in the schedule, but if the hon member for the city believed that it would be better to remain taxable at the present rate, he did not know that the Government would offer any objection to it The Government had always recognised an obligation to propound a scheme of a more general character, but if those who had to bear the burden preferred the present system to the one propounded by this Act, as a much larger burden would have to be contributed by the City of Adelaide, he did not know that there would be any objection to it on the part of the Government The sum applicable to drainage would be much larger and probably it would be the wealthier class who would be called upon to contribute the larger amount He repeated that if hon members preferred the present system be apprehended there would be no objection on the part of the Government, but the system was supposed by many, particularly by the hon member (Mr Neales) to require revision, and the present Bill provided for so doing

MR REYNOLDS should support the second reading without committing himself to the various provisions of the Bill He believed that it required many amendments and had not received due consideration He particularly referred to the drainage system He had hoped that in introducing the Bill the Commissioner of Public Works would have given some information in reference to drainage, for he could not agree with the statement which had been made by the Attorney-General that the House had agreed that drainage should be deferred The hon gentleman was in error in supposing that such was the case He had had something to do with the matter and when the House were asked to apply £80 000 provided by a former Bill, to other purposes, it was distinctly stated that £40,000 would be available for the drainage of the city He now found, however, by this Bill that the simple cost of bringing the water in would be £200,000, and that the drainage was to be provided for by a rate not out of the £200,000 The drainage he believed had been under the consideration of the intelligent Commissioners for four years, and under the circumstances he certainly thought that the Commissioner of Public Works in moving the second reading of this Bill should have made some statement in reference to a subject in which the House and the city felt so deeply interested, and which indeed was of the deepest interest to the country at large. He hoped when the hon gentleman replied, that he would afford some information upon this most important subject In voting for the second reading, he wished it to be understood that he did not support the system that Commissioners should carry out the Water Works What had taken place they had seen in the public press, and it was utterly impossible that after that they could have any confidence whatever in the Commissioners The Chief Commissioner was entitled to the thanks of the House and the country for having taken the initiative in an investigation which had developed such frightful mismanagement in reference to the Weir He hoped this question would come prominently before the House, and that the House would express an opinion in reference to the gross mismanagement which there had been in connection with this matter How the Government, after what had taken place, could have appointed the Engineer to another office, he could not conceive, unless they were influenced by favouritism or prejudice He should certainly feel it his duty to draw the attention of the House to the disclosures which had been made in connection with the Weir, and he hoped the Commissioner of Public Works would at once furnish the House with some information upon the subject There were many details which would have to be attended to in Committee For instance, in reference to apartments six feet by five, it appeared to him that a man would be rated for every cupboard or other apartment which he had about his House He thought that power should be given to extend water supply to the suburban districts of Kensington, Norwood, &c, and even to the Port, if the Weir were capable of holding a sufficient quantity, which he questioned Another thing he should have liked the Commissioner of Public Works to have done, would have been to have shown whether the rates proposed would be sufficient to meet the principal as well as interest He wished it to be understood that in supporting the second reading, he did not support the continuance of the Commissioners

The Commissioner of Public Works would say a few words to endeavor to make up for any omissions in his opening address He did not think there was any necessity for going into a history of the Weir in moving the second reading of the Water Supply Bill He was very glad to give any information in his power whenever he had been asked about the River Weir, which he was about to visit on Saturday next, after which he should be happy to afford any additional information which he might acquire It was intended to proceed with the drainage out of the sum in the hands of the Commissioners after the payment of all liabilities, and this was provided for in clause 45 The rates in the schedule had been very carefully gone through and he was satisfied there would be a very large sum available for drainage besides paying all expenses Hon members generally had, he observed, settled down upon that important portion of the Bill—the schedule—and although some difference of opinion had been expressed, it had been generally assented to With regard to the dimensions of rooms, he thought it would have been better if discussion upon that point had been postponed till the Bill was in Committee All were fond of dwelling on their own individual case, and he might mention that, in one case in which he was interested, he found that this Bill would effect a saving to him of a very considerable sum in the reduction of insurance Hon members were aware that the insurance offices were constantly raising their rates of insurance, and as constantly stating that, as soon as there was an abundant supply of water, the rates would be reduced This had been the cry every time that he had been called upon to insure, and, no doubt, other hon members had experienced the same thing, so that he expected the citizens generally would receive very considerable benefit from this Bill The rates were based upon the assessment of the city, but in one clause it was provided that there should be a special assessment of buildings which were not so assessed The question of supplying the suburbs with water had received considerable attention, but it had been determined after mature consideration not to make any provision in the Bill for that purpose, leaving the object of the Bill simply to supply the city He thought hon members agreed with tolerable unanimity upon the broad principle of the Bill, and that it was an improvement upon the present law After Saturday he should be happy to afford any additional information he acquired in reference to the river Weir A great number of papers in connection with the subject were before the House, and as the hon member for the Sturt had intimated his intention of drawing the attention of the House to the subject, it would probably be as well to postpone further discussion upon the question till then

The motion for the second reading was then carried, and upon the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works, the House went into Committee upon it The first three clauses were passed as printed

Mr Strangways moved that the 4th clause relating to the appointment of Commissioners be postponed, as he believed the Commissioners were abolished by the Public Works Bill

Mr Reynolds thought it would be better to abolish the Commissioners in the present Bill, rather than run the risk of the other Bill not passing

Mr Hay believed it would be wise to alter the clause, considering that these works should be under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works

The motion for the postponement of the clause was carried by a majority of 1, the votes upon a division being—Ayes 12, Noes 11, as follow —

Ayes, 12 —Messrs Strangways, Wark, Mildred, Cole, Captain Hart, Messrs Lindsay, McEllister, Hay, Shannon, Rogers, Townsend Reynolds (teller)

Noes, 11 —The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands Messrs Burford, Macdermott, Glyde, Dunn Solomon, Hawker, Duffield, and Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

Upon the motion of the Attorney-General the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Bills of Exchange Bill were agreed to, and a message to that effect was ordered to be sent to the Council The amendments were merely verbal

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Attorney-General said he would take time to consider the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill, and the consideration of them was postponed for a fortnight

The House adjourned at ¼ to 5 o clock, till 1 o'clock on the following day

Friday, November 5

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock,

ABSENTEEISM

Mr Barrow gave notice that on Wednesday, 10th November, he should move for the appointment of a Select Committee, to consider the question of absenteeism, as affecting the prosperity of this colony, and to report upon the practicability of levying a tax upon the property of absentees, in aid of the general revenue of the province

MR STUART S EXPLORATIONS

Mr Strangways moved that the House, at its rising, adjourn till Wednesday next, at 1 o clock His reason for so doing was, that Tuesday next would be a public holiday The hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration had a notice of motion on the paper, which it was desirable the House should entertain as quickly as possible, in order to enable Mr Stuart to resume his usual occupations without delay If hon members who had notices of motion previous to it upon the paper would allow them to stand over, he (Mr Strangways), who also had a previous notice of motion upon the paper, would be perfectly agreeable that the notice of motion of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands should take precedence

The Commissioner of Crown Lands seconded the motion, that the House at its rising adjourn till the following Wednesday, which was carried, and the House assented to the proposition that the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands take precedence of other business

PETITIONS

Mr Lindsay said that he had given notice some days back for the printing of a petition which he had presented, but in consequence of the pressure of other business the notice had lapsed, and he was desirous of reviving it

The Speaker informed the hon member that he might bring forward a motion upon the subject when there was no other business before the House

GRANT TO MR STUART

The Commissioner of Crown Lands asked hon members who had got notices of motion preceding that in his (the Commissioner of Crown Lands), name to give way, as it was desirable that the very important subject which was embraced in that resolution should be proceeded with at once If hon members would do so, and the notices of motion were not disposed of at 3 o clock he would then move that the notices of motion be proceeded with before the Orders of the Day The House assented

SEMAPHORE JETTY AND PORT-ROAD

Mr Collinson said that whilst the Commissioner of Crown Lands was collecting his ideas, he would ask the Commissioner of Public Works a question of which he had given notice, and which he believed the hon gentleman would have no difficulty in answering He was desirous of obtaining a reply, in order that he might have something to say to his friends below The question was, when the Commissioner of Public Works would be ready to commence the Semaphore Jetty and repairs of the Port road, with a view to afford employment to the persons who signed the petition which was read to the House on Thursday last, the 28th October

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said he should be in a position to advertise for tenders for the Semaphore Jetty in 14 days With regard to the repair of the Port-road, he would mention that he had received a letter from the Central Road Board, stating that a tender had been accepted last week upon the understanding that stone was to be supplied as required but in consequence of the Comptroller of Convicts having intimated that he would be unable to furnish stone from the Dry Creek till the 1st January, the contractor would not sign the contract On the previous day, however, the Board had readvertised for tenders in order that the necessary repairs might be proceeded with forthwith

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved—

"That the House resolve itself into Committee for the purpose of adopting an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will take the necessary steps for granting unto John McDouall Stuart, in consideration of, and reward for, his important discoveries of new country on the north-western side of Lake Torrens, a lease for pastoral purposes of 1,000 square miles of country, in blocks not less than 200 square miles of rectangular form, whose length shall not be more than twice its width, the grantee to be allowed four years for stocking from January 1, 1859, and the 14 years' lease to date from the expiration of this period, when the runs are to be subject to such regulations as may then be in force, the situation of the several blocks to be marked by Mr Stuart on the map of his exploration"

On this occasion he had the honor of bringing a subject before the House which, he was sure, must be productive of the greatest gratification to hon members, as it brought before the public of the colony, and also under the notice of the neighbouring colonies and of England, the particulars of one of the most extraordinary explorations ever performed with such small and insignificant means It was unquestionably the most extraordinary and successful exploration upon the Australian continent He felt satisfied that the individual enterprise which had been exercised upon the occasion in so efficient and extraordinary a manner, would be considered well worthy of the reward which he was about to propose, and that the House would favorably receive the proposition He believed that the encouragement of individual enterprise was the true way of becoming acquainted with the unknown portions of the territory Within the last few months they had all received a practical lesson in reference to explorations which they would not soon forget He believed that the true way of exploring a country was to liberally reward private enterprise, and to allow it to be generally known that exertions, fatigues and dangers would be properly rewarded and appreciated (Hear, hear) Let it be known that the exertions of private individuals would be appreciated by the public, for whose benefit explorations were undertaken It should be remembered that whatever benefit private individuals derived from these discoveries, the colony at large was benefitted to a far greater degree Hon members had no doubt read the notice which had been placed upon the notice paper, with the view of rewarding Mr Stuart, but he would, with the permission of the House, amend that notice by the insertion of words proposing an amendment in the Waste Lands Regulations, for the purpose of carrying out the proposed grant He would by and by explain how the addition of these words would accomplish the object in view without the introduction of a Bill In the early part of the present year the Messrs Chambers fitted out a small party, comprising Mr Stuart, one man named Foster, and a blackfellow The party had five horses with them, and were provided in other respects in the most moderate manner They had with them a small quantity of flour and tea, a few legs of mutton, and a very few pounds of dried meat They proceeded to the unknown country by Lake Torrens, and had scarcely left the settled districts when difficulties beset them For three or four days they were without water, and had great difficulty in reaching the Elizabeth They then proceeded northward, not knowing what country they were going to, or whether they would meet with any fresh water Fortunately they met with not only one waterhole, but a number of other places, which enabled them to extend their journey to a very great length It must always, however, be a subject of intense surprise how this party could have done what they had When Mr Stuart's journal was published, as he hoped it would be shortly, he believed that the perseverance, endurance, and courage shown by Mr Stuart and his party would be subjects of surprise and admiration to every one who would read the journal The horses belonging to the party lost their shoes in passing over stony ground, and became lame The party were exposed to frightful storms of rain, and were compelled to take refuge under the brow of a bare hill for two days, having no shelter whatever The little provision which they had was so reduced that for weeks the party lived upon two pounds and a half of flour per week per man In Mr Stuart's journal he recorded with feelings of exultation how the party caught an opossum which gave them a meal such as they had not had for weeks previously Sometimes they were fortunate enough to catch a few mice on which they existed, but upon reaching Streaky Bay, on the threshold of the accomplishment of their journey, they were nearly lost, in consequence of not having a morsel of any kind to eat For three days they were literally upon the verge of starvation After the display of such energy and perseverance, and the endurance of such difficulties, he thought that Mr Stuart and his party might safely take up their position in the lists of Australian explorers and in the history of Australian exploration The party deserved to be looked up to as most enterprising, courageous and enduring persons He found that the extent of country which Mr Stuart passed over had been 1,650 miles, an extent of country nearly equal to that travelled by Mr Gregory from Moreton Bay to Lake Torrens Mr Gregory's expedition was thought a very extraordinary one, but when he compared the small means possessed by Mr Stuart's party with those possessed by Mr Gregory, who when he arrived here had provisions sufficient to last his party for two or three months longer, he thought they must agree that Mr Stuart's expedition and its astonishing results together with the hardihood displayed by that gentleman far exceeded anything which was to be met with in connection with Mr Gregory's expedition Mr Stuart had found many creeks containing fresh water, and after reading carefully the journal in connection with the exploration, he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had arrived at the conclusion that although the country which had been discovered was useful for pastoral purposes, whoever stocked the country would have to undergo great risks The distance was very great from the settled districts unless they could pass across Lake Torrens They would be cut off from the settled districts as they could not pass from Port Augusta to the Elizabeth during the summer months Under all the circumstances he believed it was the duty of the House to deal in the most liberal manner with Mr Stuart Mr Stuart did not ask for any money, indeed one of the most encouraging and recommendatory points in connection with his discoveries was that he merely asked for a liberal grant for pastoral purposes, and was satisfied to take as a reward for himself and the parties who had sent him out, a run, which he was prepared to run the further risk of stocking, and no doubt this would operate as an inducement to other parties to settle upon the country The real effect of carrying the resolution would be that for a period of four years the country would allow Mr Stuart to risk his and other persons' fortunes in stocking the country South Australia would not derive any benefit from the grant for a period of four years, but at the end of that period, when the lease commenced, so far from the country paying Mr Stuart, that gentleman proposed to pay the country for the use of the run Under the circumstances, he was of opinion that the House might not only safely concede all that was asked for by Mr Stuart, or rather all that it was proposed by the resolution to give him, but that they would consider the terms proposed liberal, and that Mr Stuart was highly deserving of all that was embodied in the resolution With regard to the way in which the objects of the resolution should be carried out, in the first place some hon members had mentioned to him whether it would not be desirable (although it was admitted on all hands that the exploration had been of an extraordinary character, and that the explorers were deserving of great reward), whether as a matter of common prudence, there should not be some limitation, and that the discoveries mentioned in the journal should be verified He would mention, however, that he had carefully perused the journal from first to last, and that truth was impressed upon it in every portion Any one reading the journal would, he was sure, say that it carried truth upon the face of it That was one view, but there was another, and that was the proof of the truth of the discovery afforded by Mr Stuart undertaking to stock the country If Mr Stuart had come to that House to ask for a large sum of money, he should have said that the Government would act rightly in saying they could not recommend the request being complied with before they were satisfied as to the discoveries which had actually been made, but when he merely asked leave to occupy a portion of the country which he had discovered, and undertook to stock the country, which he could not do without great risk to himself and others who sent stock there it was not necessary, he considered, to couple the lease with any condition which would be offensive to Mr Stuart He hoped no amendment would be proposed having that object in view He would draw the attention of the House to the present state of the law in reference to the waste lands of the colony, and shew how he believed a grant to Mr Stuart might be made without the introduction of a Bill He did not think that it would be found necessary to introduce a Bill, but that the case might be dealt with by an alteration of the Waste Lands Regulations The House would remember that in the regulations of last session, power was given to the Governor to make alterations or additions to those regulations The Waste Lands Regulations were published on 13th December last year, and if an alteration were made to the effect that power was given in certain exceptional cases to issue leases for a period not exceeding four years for new and distant runs, the whole matter would be met The Waste Lands Act for last session provided that no lease should be issued for pastoral purposes beyond 14 years, and he was of opinion that the alteration which he had suggested would be satisfactory and would meet the difficulty If hon members referred to the correspondence which had taken place between the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Mr Stuart, it would be seen that there had been some difference as to the quantity of land, as Mr

Stuart had suggested that 1,500 square miles of country should be granted to him, but after a perusal of Mr Stuart's journal, and an inspection of the very interesting map which that gentleman had prepared, he had come to the conclusion to recommend a grant of 1,000 square miles in blocks of 200 square miles, so that there would be five runs, which would no doubt embrace the most valuable portion of the country discovered by Mr Stuart He believed that this would be a very liberal grant, indeed it was almost unprecedented He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) thought the grant of 1,000 square miles would be sufficient, but at the same time he had told Mr Stuart that if hon members thought he was fairly entitled to 1,500 square miles he and his hon colleagues would not oppose the proposition He would conclude by moving that the Speaker leave the chair for the purpose of considering the motion of which he had given notice

The SPEAKER remarked that the resolution affected the revenue, and the hon member would therefore have to give notice that he would bring forward the resolution on a future day

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that perhaps the House would not object to a suspension of the Standing Orders, as Mr Stuart had duties to attend to which were far away from Adelaide, and had already been waiting for some time in town for the purpose of procuring a recognition of his claims, independently of which it was desirable that the information contained in Mr Stuart's journal should be made public as soon as possible

The House having assented to the suspension of the Standing Orders, the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved an address to His Excellency the Governor, embodying the resolution in his name

Mr STRANGWAYS desired to move a slight amendment by moving the insertion of 1,500 square miles instead of 1,000 This was not a question of the town against the country, and, as a proof, they would he believed soon see the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) supporting the proposition It was sometimes his lot to differ with the hon member, but in this instance he found himself in the singular position of supporting the same proposition They had heard from the papers, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the chart which had been laid upon the table of the House, that Mr Stuart had discovered 15,000 or 16,000 miles of good country, hitherto entirely unknown, and which had never been trodden by the foot of a white man Mr Stuart, as a reward for his services, made a very fair offer to the Government, and that was, that they should receive his Chart and Journal, which would give them information of 15,000 or 16,000 square miles of country, of which they knew nothing, and in return he asked them to give him, for a period of four years, 1,500 square miles, which he undertook to stock, and at the expiration of that period he asked for the privilege of paying the Government £750 per annum for the land He considered this a fair offer, and that the House should at once accept it They ought not to deal with explorers as Yankee pedlars, but when a fair offer, such as that which had been made by Mr Stuart, was made, the Government should accept it The difference in the two quantities was practically very small, and he believed it would be the best for all parties that Mr Stuart's offer should be accepted A very simple offer had been made by Mr Stuart It was either fair or unfair if fair, it should be accepted, and if unfair, it should be rejected He thought the House would agree that the offer of Mr Stuart was a fair one, and that they would agree to the amendment which he proposed by the substitution of 1,500 square miles for 1,000

Mr NEALES said as the hon member who had brought forward the amendment had named him, he had great pleasure in seconding the amendment, and should be very sorry to give way to any one in so doing It appeared to him, from looking at the map which had been furnished by Mr Stuart, that scarcely sufficient had been said in reference to the discovery, for Mr Stuart, in accomplishing a journey of 1,680 miles, had discovered 40,000 square miles of country, but with the judgment which he had displayed in previous explorations he had declared 16,000 miles only to be good pasture country, and asked, as a reward for his discovery, something like 10 per cent of the country he had so discovered, for four years, upon conditions named in the resolution When the House did a generous thing, let them do it in such a manner as should encourage other people to do as Mr Stuart had, because, although it was said that only 16,000 square miles were good of the 40,000 miles which had been discovered, old hands would remember when very little of the land except in the immediate vicinity of Adelaide was considered good, when, indeed, Gawler Plains were called very stony, although it had since been ascertained to be the best land in the colony (No, no) Some hon members said "no, no," but he could only say that the price showed it to be the best land in the colony, either the purchasers were wrong, or the land was good They might fairly assume that 16,000 square miles were not the utmost extent of the good land, probably a considerable portion of the remaining 24,000 miles might yet come into use The best way was to afford an opportunity of stocking the country, and it was well known that there were men of large means who were prepared to back up Mr Stuart If there were no means likely to be forthcoming it might perhaps be wise for the House to pause, but it was well known that there were parties who had a large stake in the colony who were prepared to aid Mr Stuart in carrying out his project of stocking the country which he had discovered Perhaps within a few hours of the House assenting to the grant, cattle might be on their way to the new country Some gentlemen outside had said that this grant would possibly take the eyes of the country, but all he could say was, that if out of 10 per cent Mr Stuart could take the eyes of the country, he must be a very clever fellow No doubt the remainder of the land would be hastily scrambled for, and the Treasurer would shortly come down to the House with a smiling face and announce that in consequence of this grant the greater portion of the new country had been taken up He was aware that some claims had been put in to supersede that of Mr Stuart, but he trusted the Government would not allow the claim of the party really entitled to the grant to be prejudiced There could be no doubt that Mr Stuart had a servant, and that he fed him and clothed him as well as he could, though he was free to admit that both came back rather badly off in the hat and breeches line Still, however, the servant fared as well as the master, upon mice and other game, therefore he hoped the Government would not in consequence of any of the claims to which he had alluded allow the first claim to be ignored Although the expedition had been of rather a primitive character, there were some serious expenses connected with it For instance, he believed that the outlay upon horses was about £300, the wages of Mr Stuart's man Foster for six weeks would amount to £28, and these had been paid The "grub" came to rather less than £10 As Mr Stuart had been successful, he supposed the House would consider he was entitled to as much as the country were paying to gentlemen in charge of similar expeditions, consequently, his salary would amount to between £200 and £300 Then, again, there were the instruments, and, however primitive these might be, Mr Stuart had, it was quite clear discovered the country by the aid of them, and therefore he thought credit should be given in reference to them for something like the cost of instruments on similar expeditions At all events, an outlay had been incurred of from £700 to £720 There was another contingency to which he would allude The House were aware that £7,000 had been expended in exploring in the same direction, and he believed that this would be created a reproductive fund by the information which Mr Stuart had communicated to Mr Babbage Although that information would help to place Mr Babbage in a better position with that House and the country, still they ought to look to who gave that information He would inform the House that this Mr Stuart was no other than the draftsman to Mr Sturt's expedition, and had gone through all his difficulties with old Sturt, upon whom they had bestowed a pension, and though opposed to pensions, he would, if it were to come over again, vote for that pension being bestowed Mr Stuart was the man who helped to sustain Mr Sturt in the extremity of the junctures in which he was placed When Mr Gregory arrived from his exploring expedition, he was met by the citizens with cheers, and a most substantial meal was given him in the presence of all the great little men of the place (Laughter) But what did Mr Gregory do? Why, he merely joined Cooper's Creek with the Victoria of another colony He felt assured the House would not consider that they were too liberally recognising Mr Stuart's exertions and discoveries by giving him the grant of land proposed for a period of four years Mr Stuart in fact asked to be allowed to pay the Government £750 a-year, at the end of four years Although he asked that a lease should be granted him at the expiration of that period, it would of course be subject to the regulations of the day, and might not be so advantageous as under the regulations of Messrs Bonney, Macdonnell, and Sir H Young, for it could not be said that those regulations were framed by the country

Mr SOLOMON supported the amendment, thinking that the country could afford to deal liberally with a man who had, by his indomitable energy, raised the colony in the estimation of the neighboring colonies, and of other places with which we had transactions If they might judge from the journal of Mr Stuart, the discoveries which had been made were of the highest importance to this colony The reward asked for astonished him by the moderation of the party seeking it The whole amount asked for actually did not amount to ten per cent upon the quantity of land discovered, and this, too, only for a period of four years At the expiration of that period the Government, as had been observed by the hon, member (Mr Neales), would receive a first-rate return for the amount which had been wasted in sending out an exploring party which had not been quite so successful as that of Mr Stuart He felt assured it would be most unpalatable to the country if any attempt were made to curtail the amount asked for, and he trusted that no such attempt would be made by that House The quantity of land asked for was of little importance compared with the quantity actually discovered After the address had been agreed to by the House, he had not the slightest doubt that every inch of land available for pastoral purposes would be eagerly applied for, and the country would realise great advantages in consequence The hon member who moved the amendment expressed astonishment at finding the hon member, Mr Neales amongst its warmest supporters, but he believed that not only the hon member, Mr Neales, but every other member for the City would always be found voting with motions having for their object the benefit of the colony generally. This was not merely a question of town or country or town against country, but it was a question which affected the whole colony. The country might live without the city, but the city could not live without the country. The interests of all classes would be promoted by the country being fully developed. It was by such development that the interests of those in the city were advanced. If the resources of the colony were not developed, as a commercial community they must cease to exist. Allusions had been made to Mr. Stuart's expedition having been a very primitive affair, but he believed it was capable of giving the Government a very useful lesson, to the effect that it was not necessary to fit out large and expensive exploring parties in order to secure the greatest amount of benefit to the colony. In more than one sense had Mr. Stuart been of advantage; for not only had he made large discoveries, but he had shown that a small party of determined and courageous men could perform that of which a large party of highly paid men were incapable. He should support the amendment, because he believed that the request made by Mr. Stuart was perfectly reasonable, and he was sure the Government, in dealing with a man who had rendered such important services to the colony would not act the part of Jew pedlars. He used that term, considering it more significant than the term Yankee pedlars, which had been used. He strongly urged the House to act liberally in this matter, as, by so doing, they would create in others a disposition to enter upon similar expeditions, and the most important and beneficial results might be anticipated.

Mr. BURFORD must oppose the amendment, though not because he was indisposed to reward Mr. Stuart liberally. On the contrary he was disposed to do so as heartily as any other member, but still he thought they should guard against being too liberal. ("Oh.") The House should consider that they were not legislating even for the present but for subsequent generations. When he looked at the vast extent of a thousand square miles, it reminded him of a continental province, he might say a nation, and anticipating what might possibly occur in a few years, he had much hesitation in recommending an increase in the grant from 1,000 to 1,500 square miles. He thought 1,000 square miles would be an ample reward. He gathered from the correspondence which had taken place between Mr. Stuart and the Commissioner of Crown Lands, that it would be quite as much as Mr. Stuart would be in a position to stock, though backed by all the capital to which the hon. member Mr. Neales had alluded. He thought under such circumstances the House should be careful in extending the grant, and he would like to direct the attention of the House to one point, which he considered of great importance, and that was, that the grant should only be made subject to a verification of the report contained in Mr. Stuart's journal. The motion before the House did not contain that stipulation, and he was desirous that such a provision should be added. It would be remembered that only a short time ago Lake Torrens was described as being a paradise, with beautiful lakes, delicious water and scenery, and in fact everything to attract those who had a tendency to squatting habits; but after a short time all this vanished into mirage. Suppose, when that description was given, the House had met in session, and in the great exhilaration of their feelings had passed some such resolution as the present, how chagrined would they not have looked when they came to meet again, and found that the report given by Mr. Goodiar had vanished into thin air? He therefore proposed to add that the grant should be made subject to the verification of the statement of Mr. Stuart. The hon. member for the city (Mr. Neales) had said it was well known that Mr. Stuart was well backed up by capital. That might be, and no doubt there were one or two men of capital interested in this matter; but still he contended that the precaution which he had suggested was necessary. The hon. member for the City (Mr. Solomon) had, quite unintentionally, he was sure reflected upon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, when he had spoken of substituting 1,000 square miles for the 1,500 originally asked for by Mr. Stuart, but he believed that the Commissioner of Crown Lands had done his duty in the matter. The remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Solomon) had been that it would be a reflection upon that House if the grant were reduced to 1,000 square miles; and, consequently, it amounted to a reflection upon the Commissioner of Crown Lands who proposed the reduction. With regard to the remarks which had been made relative to exploring parties, it was true that we had hitherto been unfortunate, but still the Government must not give up such modes of legitimately opening up the country wherever inducements justified such a course. It might even be necessary to send out an exploring party to verify the discoveries of Mr. Stuart, or to ascertain what country there was beyond those discoveries. This was not an idle remark, for it was well known there was a strip of country in that neighborhood which we were desirous of obtaining from New South Wales for the purpose of attaching to this territory. He was as desirous, as any other hon. member could be of seeing Mr. Stuart properly rewarded, but he cautioned the House not to be extravagant in gifts. "Enough was as good as a feast," and he believed that the thousand square miles would be sufficient to satisfy all the desires of Mr. Stuart for life. Such being the case, the House had no right to legislate for his children or grandchildren. With the permission of the House he would move that the amount of land be one thousand square miles, and that the grant be subject to the verification of Mr. Stuart's statement.

Captain HART voted for the amendment, being satisfied that, if the House had divided previous to the discussion being made known, they would have voted a much larger remuneration for such a discovery. The real fact was, that all the advantages which may yet be derived from the discoveries which Mr. Babbage was now likely to make would arise from the discovery of Mr. Stuart. Mr. Babbage would never have penetrated so far without the information he obtained from Mr. Stuart, and Major Warburton had, it was understood, given his opinion to that effect. It was clear that the entire merit of these discoveries would rest with Mr. Stuart, as in all probability the term for which it was proposed to grant the 1,500 square miles in accordance with the amendment, would have long passed away without any discoveries having been made if it were not for Mr. Stuart. We would have known nothing of the country for four years but for that gentleman, as from the accounts received from the expeditions it was not likely that another would have been fitted out for some time. The entire merit rested with Mr. Stuart, and in reality the House would not be liberal enough in giving him a vote according to the terms of the amendment. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Hart) believed that no information which had been received with regard to the interior of the country since the establishment of South Australia was of so much importance as this. The fact that what we believed to be a desert up to the Gulf of Carpentaria, and which was supposed to be so by Mr. Gregory, was proved to be false, and that the desert within the discoveries of Mr. Stuart was bounded by really fine country, was most gratifying. He was certain this discovery would only be the commencement of others and that discoveries would yet be made in the same direction of land superior to any in either of the colonies—a country of unlimited extent and only unavailable owing to its distance from the sea. He hoped the House would be unanimous in carrying the amendment, for he was satisfied the Government would join heartily in supporting it by withdrawing the original motion, inasmuch as the only fear of the Government was that the House would not go to the extent of giving the amount which Mr. Stuart asked for. The very fact of the quantity of land applied for being so large showed the value of the discovery, for unless the country was of such a nature as it was represented to be the grant would be of no value at all. It was only in case the country was as good as Mr. Stuart represented it that the value of the grant could be considerable. The hon. member who had last addressed the House spoke of the value of the runs, but he (Mr. Hart) could not think what value the hon. member set upon them. After they were stocked they became more valuable to the country, but until they were stocked, they were neither valuable to the person who held them nor to the country. The sooner the country was stocked, and the greater the facilities given for occupying it, the better for the country. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Hart) would remove every difficulty in the way of stocking the country, and would hold out every inducement for the bringing from the other colonies the stock which we stood in need of.

Mr. BARROW said the question was, had Mr. Stuart discovered all the tract of available country which he reported; and next was it too much to allow that gentleman 10 per cent. of his discovery for a limited period, in order that he might put stock upon it, which the House might assess hereafter—(a laugh)—but for which at all events, he would pay a fair rent. (Hear, hear.) It might possibly be the case—though it was very unlikely—that this new country was a mirage, as the hon. member (Mr. Burford) had described it to be. (Laughter.) But if Mr. Stuart had only discovered a mirage, let the House give him 10 per cent. of his mirage, and he would soon find out that the compensation was as ethereal as the discovery. (Laughter.) If Mr. Stuart asked for a reward in hard cash, he (Mr. Barrow) might be inclined to meet the claim differently. In such a case, if they found that his country vanished on approach, and then indeed, they would be in the humiliating and mortifying position which the hon. member for the city feared they might be in now. But as Mr. Stuart asked his reward, not in cash, but in the occupation of the land, if the land was not available then it was Mr. Stuart himself and his backers who would be in the humiliating position which the hon. member described. The hon. member (Mr. Burford) also objected to increasing the extent of land to be placed at the disposal of Mr. Stuart, on the ground that surely every man should be satisfied when he had enough. (Laughter.) But when Daniel O'Connell was asked what was 'enough,'' he answered "a little more." (Loud laughter.) He (Mr. Barrow) did not know whether Mr. Stuart was avaricious or not, but in asking for the temporary use of 1,500 square miles, he had given a sufficient proof that he did not consider 1,000 miles enough. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Barrow) did not think it was worthy of the House to bargain as to the extent of country which Mr. Stuart should have—(hear, hear)—for the country would be as useless, until it was stocked, as it was before it was discovered. It was not discovery, but occupation, which would confer a value upon it. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Stuart sought to occupy the country, and although that gentleman only asked for 10 per cent of the area, did any hon member believe that there would be immediately such competition, that if Mr Stuart got only 5 per cent, the remaining 95 per cent would be applied for and stocked by private enterprise (Hear hear) He (Mr Barrow) believed that if Mr Stuart got his 10 per cent, there would be plenty left for those who might afterwards apply, and, moreover, the fact of Mr Stuart, and those who backed him, stocking the country as he (Mr Barrow) knew they were prepared to do—(hear hear)—would draw large numbers in their wake who would not go by themselves (Hear, hear) It was not sufficient for Mr Stuart to have discovered the country, he must also lead the way into it For these reasons he (Mr Barrow) would allow Mr Stuart 1,500 square miles believing that there would still be plenty left for others, and they would at the same time secure a tenant for 1,500 square miles at the end of four years, instead of a tenant for 1,000 They should not run away with the idea that the country discovered by Mr Stuart, though available for pastoral purposes, would be highly valuable in a market point of view (Hear, hear) He (Mr Barrow) had been informed by an hon member that he had some time since sold to a well known member of the other House who had lately left for England a tract of 1,750 square miles on the Darling for £1,000 When he took these facts into consideration, it appeared to him that, so far from the demand of Mr Stuart being unreasonable, it was exceedingly moderate (Hear, hear) He would ask hon members supposing that, prior to any intimation being given of this discovery, Mr Stuart, or any other gentleman had come to the House and said, "I am of an enterprising turn of mind I have two or three good horses, and I have also a friend who is a good bushman I will go out to look for a new country It may probably turn out a mirage, but we will go at our own risk, and if we find any new country, will you allow us 10 per cent until we can stock it, and after a time pay rent for it?" If that offer had been made prior to the discovery, the House would have said "take 10, 20, or 50 per cent if you like Our object is to get the country occupied" (Hear, hear) Entertaining these sentiments, he should vote for the amendment. He quite agreed with the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) that no claims should be allowed to interfere with those of Mr Stuart, until it had been shown that they were of equal weight He (Mr Barrow) did not know who the other claimant could be, as he scarcely supposed that it could be any person who was engaged at weekly wages by Mr Stuart But no person whatever should be allowed to interfere with the well-established claims of Mr Stuart, until his claims also were well established, and fully tested He would freely reward any one who opened up the country which had too long been a terra incognita, and must support the amendment

"Like the baseless fabric of a vision,

Mr Peake also supported the amendment, or rather the motion, for the Government did not oppose it He was satisfied from the tone of the House that there would soon be a change in the unwise policy lately pursued on the land question He was glad the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands was not going to carry out the policy which that hon gentleman had declared his intention of upholding in reply to a question of his (Mr Peake's) the other day, and that we were coming to a more rational system of dealing with the waste lands He would suppose the case of paying Mr Stuart in money for his discovery Mr Stuart declared himself ready to accept 3000*l* or the occupation of 1,500 square miles of the land Taking the cost of the expedition at 800*l*, Mr Stuart offered in fact to take 2,200*l*, or to pay after four years 750*l* a-year The House would see that this was giving Mr Stuart by no means a high rate of reward It would be a cheap bargain, and a good arrangement, and he should compliment Mr Stuart and those who acted with him, on the manner in which they had acted If they asked for money he (Mr Peake) should treat them in a different way, but when an enterprising man asked only a field to prove the value of his discovery, the House should not lose a moment in acceding to the request (Hear hear) He thought the 14 years' lease would be practically a delusion, and that it would never be granted, inasmuch as a subsequent portion of the resolution said that the lease was to be subject to such Crown Lands regulations as might be in force at the time of issuing it He (Mr Peake) believed the present system of leases would not be in force in four years time He believed they had taken the first step that day towards abolishing the 14 years lease, and he would ask the House and the Government to go with him in expunging them The House should not, therefore, pledge itself to granting a lease under a system which would probably not be in force With this exception he would support the motion before the House as he considered it only fair to encourage legitimate enterprise, and the House without being Quixotic or overrunning its proper limit, as it had been termed by the hon member (Mr Burford), could do so in this instance

Mr Neales rose to explain If the motion was altered to the effect proposed by the last speaker, it would amount to this—that Mr Stuart might as well at once claim his 14 years lease, and thus make sure of the land for 10 years subsequent to the four years which he required to stock it The grant would not be worth a farthing if not made in the words of the resolution, or to that effect, for if legislation took effect which would destroy any lease now in force, it would affect this lease also, notwithstanding anything the House or the Government could do to prevent it He hoped the House would never interfere with any leases once granted If the resolution were passed without a guarantee to Mr Stuart that at the end of four years he should have his lease, they would send away a discoverer actually disgusted with the action of the House (Hear hear) If Mr Stuart had made harder terms if he had sent a note down to him (Mr Neales) saying, "I am on my road down and I have discovered a certain thing, do you make a bargain for me" If Mr Stuart had done this, would not the House have jumped at an offer coming from him (Mr Neales) If the guarantee of the lease at the end of four years were struck out of the resolution, he would recommend Mr Stuart to apply for his lease at once, and if Mr Stuart afterwards applied for a money reward, perhaps the House would be so much ashamed of its treatment of him (Mr Stuart) that it would give him £3,000

Mr Hay supported the amendment, but there was one matter which he should most decidedly oppose, and that was the granting of an 18 years lease It might be put in any form the House pleased, but that was what the proposal amounted to The 12th clause of the Waste Lands Act said that no lease should be granted for a longer period than 14 years The hon member (Mr Neales) said, whatever was done, let the lease be granted from the present time He had no objection to give the land to Mr Stuart for the first seven years for nothing, but let the House not curtail the reward which any discoverer earned (Hear, hear) Still hon members who made the laws in that House should not be the first to break them—(hear, hear)—and the 12th clause of the Waste Lands Act was distinct enough (The hon member here read the clause) He would sooner see the extent of country increased to 2,000 square miles than that a longer lease than 14 years should be granted (Hear, hear) Let it be distinctly understood what was to be given when the vote was passed, and then Mr Stuart could not say four years hence that he had been treated in an improper manner The words "within the limits of his discoveries" should also be inserted in the resolution, although no doubt Mr Stuart intended to take his land within these limits There should also be a limit fixed within which Mr Stuart should mark upon the map the country he was about to take up This should be fixed say within 10 days or a month as at present Mr Stuart could mark it out at any time within four years, and in the meantime, parties might go to look at the country and find, on coming back that the part they wanted was one of the portions which Mr Stuart intended to take (Hear hear) Whilst giving a full reward to Mr Stuart or any other explorer the House should always meet those who made discoveries when they came down and announced them in a fair and liberal spirit

Mr Hawker would support the suggestion of the hon member for Gumeracha and he was aware that Mr Stuart would be willing to accept the terms proposed by that hon member, viz, that he should have a lease for 14 years from the present time, and the land free of rent for the first seven years He might say that, if hon members unacquainted with the bush were struck with this extraordinary exploration, he, who was well acquainted with the bush and the character of the country was much more surprised He had traced on the previous night Mr Stuart's journey, and he would say that for enduring courage, indomitable perseverance, and unmitigated pluck—(a laugh)—no such journey was ever made in this country (Hear, hear) Hon members knew that the country Mr Stuart found was good, but they did not know the difficulties and dangers he had to pass through in order to get there (Hear hear) When the journal was published they would see how he had pushed on for three or four days without water, and not knowing whether there was any in the country into which he was going Before he made Mr Gibson's station at Streaky Bay, on the 27th July he came upon the track of a horse, which gave him the idea that some one had been in that country before He could then retrace his steps to the settled country where he could relieve the necessities of himself and his companion, but instead of doing this, he struck out to the north-west, although he did not know whether there was any water in that direction On the 30th July, three days afterwards his man baked the last of their flour, 10 lbs weight, into two dampers, and this 10 lbs of flour was all that Messrs Stuart and Foster had to subsist upon until the 22nd August, when they reached Streaky Bay, All the provisions they obtained on the way consisted of a few Kangaroo mice a few wallabys and a crow—(a laugh) and he would ask if any hon gentleman in the House would not feel very hard up—(laughter)—if he was kept upon this stock of provisions for the same time (Laughter) So far from the demand of Mr Stuart being excessive, he thought that gentleman had evinced great moderation If, as the hon member (Mr Burford) said, the country was nothing but a mirage, in giving these 1,500 square miles of mirage the reward would be as misty as the country discovered He could not look on the matter from the same point of view as the hon member for the city (Mr Burford), as he considered the reward given to Mr Stuart should be proportionate to the benefit that gentleman had conferred on future generations Under the suggestion of the hon member for Gumeracha, if Mr Stuart did not stock any portion of the country within seven years, that portion would revert to the Government, and Mr Stuart would derive no benefit from it. Hon. members might think it was a very easy matter to stock such a country, but as the nearest point of it was from 250 to 300 miles from Port Augusta, and there was 100 miles without water to be traversed, in order to get there, unless some new road was discovered from Fowler's Bay or to the north-east of Lake Torrens, there was no getting stock into the new country except in the very wettest part of the winter. He believed it would be many years before the country would be available for sheep, because of the difficulty of bringing down the wool, in consequence of the scarcity of water.

Mr. McELLISTER seconded the amendment of his hon. colleague. He objected to handing over so large a quantity of land to any individual. Before 18 years had passed we would have to bear a heavy burden of taxation, and therefore he could not see why we should give up the income derivable from the public lands. He would give a lease for 14 years, with seven years free, but no longer.

Mr MILDRED also supported the proposition of the hon. member for Gumeracha. It was an occasion on which the House should show that it would deal justly and liberally. (Hear, hear.) He would merely offer one suggestion. He hoped it would be distinctly understood that the land was to be stocked within four years and not within seven, as he could fancy great evils arising if this provision was not made.

Mr. SOLOMON said that when he supported the motion of the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) he saw nothing better before the House, but the proposition of the hon. member for Gumeracha was still more liberal and therefore met his (Mr. Solomon's) views better. He would therefore support the proposition of the hon. member for Gumeracha. He made this explanation to show that there was no inconsistency in the course he intended to pursue.

Mr. GLYDE asked the hon. the Attorney-General whether under the Waste Lands Act the Government could grant a lease without charging any rent, whether, in fact, the lowest rate at which a lease could be issued was not a rent of 10s. per square mile.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was disposed to think that an alteration in the regulations might be made which would have the effect of enabling a lease to be issued without payment of rent.

It being now three o'clock the Standing Orders were, on the motion of Mr. NEALES, suspended in order to allow of the debate being proceeded with.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL resumed—As the rent was not fixed except in the case of mineral lands, it was not fixed in the case of pastoral country, an alteration in the Waste Lands Regulations might enable the Government to carry into effect the present intention of the House. If it involved only such an alteration the Government would wish to have the concurrence of the other branch of the Legislature. If, however, on further consideration, he should be of opinion that a Bill would be requisite for the purpose, it would, of course be necessary to obtain the assent of the other House. He should carefully consider the matter, and would take an early opportunity of informing the House how any address could be carried out, but his present impression was that the object could be effected without passing a new Act.

Mr. COLE said that, according to the resolution, the land was to be divided into blocks of 200 square miles but Mr. Stuart might take these in such a manner as to secure all the valuable country.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS pointed out that this was provided for by the resolution.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. STRANGWAYS withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HARVEY considered Mr. Stuart deserving of great credit for his discoveries, and in reference to the stocking of the runs, he knew that there were gentlemen connnected with Mr. Stuart who would be in a position to accomplish this in accordance with the resolution before the House. He would move that the resolution be amendeded in such a manner that Mr. Stuart should have a lease of 1,500 square miles for 14 years from the 1st January, 1859 the land to be rent free for the first seven years, to be stocked by the end of the fourth year and after the end of the seventh year to be subject to such regulations as may then be in force respecting the waste lands.

An amendment embodying these propositions was then drawn up and agreed to, and inserted in the original motion.

Mr GLYDE moved the insertion in the amended resolution of the words "described to the Government, and marked by Mr. Stuart upon his map of his explorations within three months from the 1st January, 1859."

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that Mr Stuart was quite ready to mark out the runs at once, but it would do no harm to add the words though they were quite unnecessary.

Mr STRANGWAYS said it would be immaterial when Mr. Stuart marked out his runs as the date of all his leases would be from the 1st January, 1859.

Mr SOLOMON said that if Mr Stuart did not mark out his runs it might have the effect of deterring other persons from taking out runs. (Hear, hear.)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would be a wise precaution to insert the words unless some objection existed on the part of Mr Stuart, and so far from that being the case Mr. Stuart was prepared to mark out the runs immediately.

Mr DUFFIELD said that, though Mr Stuart was quite prepared to mark out his runs still the words should be inserted to remove obstructions from the way of other persons desirous of taking up country. He would, however, suggest an alteration of the date to the 1st January, 1859. Mr Stuart would be quite satisfied with that amount of time.

The suggestion was adopted, and the words so amended were inserted in the resolution.

Mr BURFORD suggested the addition of the words "subject to verification of the discovery." This addition could do no harm, and might prove useful.

Mr. REYNOLDS did not quite understand whether the hon. member (Mr Burford) intended to go up himself. (Loud laughter.)

Mr. BURFORD reminded the hon. member, that he (Mr Burford) had not yet sat down, but he would not detain the hon. member long. He was about to say there was a possibility—for he remembered a saying of the eminent writer Locke, that in temporal matters we are saved, not by faith but by the want of faith. (Great laughter.) Supposing that outside the 1,500 square miles there were not 2,000 square miles of good country, then we would be chiselled altogether—(great laughter)—and therefore he would move that the grant be subject to verification of the discovery.

Mr. REYNOLDS said if the hon. member (Mr. Burford) went to verify the discovery, perhaps the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands would go with him during the recess, and perhaps he (Mr Reynolds) might make a third for a pleasure trip to the desert. (Laughter.) He had not had an opportunity before of expressing an opinion on this matter, but he might now say he thought we should give the greatest encouragement we can to explorers, or rather to the squatters themselves to explore the country. (Hear, hear.) The explorations of Mr. Chambers, or he should say of Mr Stuart, had saved the country a large sum. We need not have sent out Mr Babbage or the other party which went after if we knew that the squatters themselves were exploring the country. 1,500 square miles seemed a very large tract of country, but we were in the habit of handing over hundreds of square miles as if we had a great deal of territory, and perhaps we had. He could not but be amused at the hon. member (Mr Burford's) reference to Lake Torrens, and the refusal of the Government to grant leases there. It would have been better to have allowed the gentlemen who applied to take out hundreds of square miles there, as by that means we would be in possession of a large revenue, which we had not now. Whilst he considered 1,500 square miles a large block, still we should not be niggardly in such a matter. We need not act like Jew pedlars—(loud laughter)—or persons of that sort, but should act with liberality.

The amendment of Mr Burford was negatived.

The original motion as amended was then put and carried without a dissentient voice.

The House resumed, and the report was brought up and adopted.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the resolution be referred to the Legislative Council with an address, requesting the concurrence of that hon. Chamber therein.

Agreed to.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid on the table Mr. Stuart's journal of his explorations, with its accompanying map, and moved that the former be printed and the latter lithographed.

The motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF FOWLER'S BAY

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table of the House a return of some instructions given by the late hon. Treasurer with respect to the survey of Fowler's Bay, which were ordered to be printed.

COLONIAL DEFENCES

On the motion of Mr. HART, the bringing up of the report of the Select Committee on Colonial Defences was postponed until Wednesday.

THE ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

The second reading of this Bill was postponed.

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

In Committee.

Mr. MILNE moved some verbal alterations in this Bill.

Clause 4 was recommitted, and in the second line, after the word "is," the words "lawfully executed" were inserted.

The clause was passed as amended.

The Preamble was recommitted, and in the second page at the 44th line after the word "certain," the words "the whole of" were inserted, and in the 42nd line after the word "Smillie," "bearing date to the 30th of June 1851." Another verbal alteration was made, and the preamble was passed as amended.

The title was reconsidered, and with a verbal alteration it passed as amended.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL observed that it was his opinion that the principle the House should go upon in these cases was, that in enlarging the powers of trust deeds they should not act in a manner that would defeat the original intentions of the testators He was satisfied with respect to this Bill that it would have no prejudicial effect

Mr STRANGWAYS said, after that expression of opinion from the Attorney-General, it would do away with many objections which he had previously raised

The House resumed

The SPEAKER reported the Bill with the amendments, and the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

DATE OF ACTS BILL

On the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS the further consideration of the Date of Acts Bill was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the consideration of the report of the Committee of the whole House on the Civil Service Bill, was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

COUNTRY MAIL SERVICE

Mr HAY rose pursuant to notice to move—

"That, in all future arrangements of the mail service to the various parts of the Colony, regard should be had to the number of letters carried and expense of service, in deciding the extent of accomodation to be given to each district"

He said he had an amendment on his motion to propose, which was that after the word "accommodation" in the last line, the words "beyond a weekly mail" should be inserted He said that it had been a matter of frequent complaint that some districts enjoyed greater advantages in point of mail communication than others, though not more entitled to it in respect to their resources, than those which were neglected Persons interested in this had hitherto refrained from applying for redress as they did not know the real expenditure in mail communication in proportion to the income This was from motives of consideration, but he found from Council Paper 98, which hon members were no doubt fully familiar with, that the revenue was greatly in excess of the expenditure in the inland postal service generally There were several districts in which mail communication was well established, but in the North-Eastern District there was only a mail twice a week No doubt in this instance the expenditure was large, but there were other districts with a larger expenditure and a less revenue He thought that in deciding the amount of accommodation to be afforded to each district the amount of letters carried would form a very good criterion

Mr ROGERS seconded the motion, and thought that as the attention of the Government had been called to the matter, they would take steps at once to revise the existing regulations with regard to the postal service throughout the country

The motion was carried with the amendment proposed by the mover

WASTE LANDS REGULATIONS

Mr PEAKE moved, pursuant to notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Waste Lands Regulations adopted and upheld by the present Government, fail to secure a fair and adequate revenue to the State, and do not recompense private individuals for their discovery of new country in a manner best calculated to reward them, and at the same time secure the public interest in their discoveries"

He stated that the reason he had tabled this motion was that some short time ago he had put a question to the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the scope of which was as to what policy the Government intended to adopt with respect to new discoveries of country—whether they would be considered under the present Waste Lands Regulations, or that new regulations would be introduced, and the answer he then received from that hon gentleman was that the Government did intend to deal with such cases under the existing Waste Lands Regulations But the flagrant impolicy of such a principle on the part of the Government had been clearly demonstrated that day, for the first time that hon gentleman was called upon to act in the cases he had suggested—that is, the new discovery of country—he had abandoned the policy which he had previously pledged himself to in favor of one bearing a more liberal construction This surely was a system of tergiversation He (Mr Peake) did not object to the new policy of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, for he was very glad to find that that hon gentleman was reforming his ways But he (Mr Peake) had tabled this motion also with the view of ascertaining from that House whether they approved of the existing system in the disposal of our waste lands, and if they did not, to ask them to express their disapproval He believed the existing regulations with regard to the disposal of our waste lands were most unthrifty and impolitic, and he considered the House could have no stronger argument in favour of this view than that every member of the Government, and the majority of the members of the House had decided that those Waste Lands Regulations did not provide an adequate return to the revenue in proportion to that contributed by other classes of property in the colony The House had affirmed, in the most clear and distinct manner, that the system was not a perfect one, and the Commissioner of Crown Lands had endorsed that opinion Next, as to whether an adequate amount was contributed to the State under these regulations He (Mr Peake) recollected that during the last session a castigation was inflicted by the now Commissioner of Crown Lands on the Treasurer, then Chief Secretary, and how he told him that he was pandering to public opinion—how he was studying popularity rather than consistency, when that hon gentleman (the then Chief Secretary) declared in favor of the popular feeling with regard to the Waste Lands Regulations Yet, nevertheless, that hon gentleman (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) now repudiated his formerly expressed convictions, and now asked them to do that which, on a former occasion, he had so determinately opposed He thought the House would admit that this was a very unwise and shaky sort of policy as exhibited by one of the members of the Ministry That hon gentleman (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) declared when the Assessment on Stock Bill was introduced, that the squatters did not pay their fair share towards the revenue of the province, and this opinion was endorsed by the hon the Attorney-General and every member of the Government

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to a point of order He did not think the hon member was in order in referring to any debate which had occurred during the present session

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member for Burra and Clare was certainly out of order

Mr REYNOLDS would then ask, with the permission of the Speaker, whether it was not in order to refer to what had transpired during the last or any previous session

The SPEAKER said it would be in order to do so.

Mr PEAKE resumed and said, he would then simply say that the Commissioner of Crown Lands did say what he had attributed to him But with regard to the ruling of the Speaker, he thought it would be impossible to elicit truth if hon members were prevented from referring to matters bearing upon the subject of their argument

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS asked the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), to read the question and answer which he referred to as printed on the records of the House

Mr PEAKE would read the question and answer (Read the question, the answer to which, from the Commissioner of Crown Lands, was to the effect that the action of the Government would be in accordance with the existing laws, and that the Government had no present intention of introducing new regulations) He (Mr Peake) would ask the House whether that answer did not infer that the Commissioner of Crown Lands intended to uphold the existing regulations, if it did not do so, there was no meaning in the English language, and they would have to go to school again He had said that every member of the Government had agreed that the squatters did not pay their fair share towards the support of the revenue, but it was intimated from the Commissioner of Crown Lands that the Government did not intend to alter the existing regulations in dealing with new discoveries ("No, no," from the Commissioner of Crown Lands) The hon Commissioner of Crown Lands said "no, no," and he might be right or he might be wrong, he might prove that a chesnut horse was a horse chesnut—(a laugh)—or the converse At the same time, to his (Mr Peake's) weak and inferior judgment it appeared that the Government were not acting consistently or properly The Waste Lands Regulations were, in principle, in direct contravention to the practice common to private estates No man would think of alienating his estate for a number of years at a mere peppercorn rental The landlord would, doubtless, make a proper allowance for the outlay on his property in the shape of capital and labor, but then he would look forward to the time when he would be able to come in and reap the benefit The House has been asked to go on with that very system which was tantamount to a tax upon property That system was an attempted justification of a tax upon the produce of land—which was a tax upon the consumer and not upon the producer He thought it impolitic that such an unthrifty system should be perpetuated For that reason he had tabled the motion now before them, and he hoped the House would go with him in endeavoring to do away with such an imperfect system, and in obliging the Government to deviate from the principles hitherto advocated by them

Mr YOUNG seconded the motion, and thought there was no time so suitable as the present for enunciating such a principle as that embodied in the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake's) motion The motion declared the present system to be inadequate, that had been affirmed by the majority of the House, and in order to meet this an assessment upon stock had been proposed This they were led to believe, by what had transpired within the last day or two, would be objected to, and some other means must be devised to satisfy the community It was not, he was sure, questioned by any hon member that the squatters wished to evade payment of just dues to the country, but the alternative that would have to be resorted to if the assessment were not assented to, would be that of altering the existing regulations Although the Commissioner of Crown Lands had denied the allegations of the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) he (Mr Young) did not think the former hon member had got out of the difficulty, as he had shown so clearly to the House that day by the resolution which had been passed, that the existing regulations were totally insufficient to meet their requirements

Mr BAGOT would ask the hon member for the Burra and Clare what system he proposed to substitute for that which he denounced

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS trusted the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) would not think he underrated his motion, because he thought there was not sufficient ground for assenting to it He would remark with regard to his expression of dissent by crying "no, no," when the hon member for the Burra and Clare was speaking, that it was simply a denial of the words attributed to him by that hon gentleman, and not a denial of his answer as given in the records of the House That answer was given in writing, and it would indeed have been strange if he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had repudiated it The hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) had made two objections to the existing regulations The first was that they were unworkable, and the second that they did not provide a sufficient income to the country He had also said that this opinion had been endorsed by the House but if it were so he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) was certainly in ignorance of it He would say in reply to that hon gentleman that he found those regulations worked well in the great majority of cases, and though there were occasional exceptions these were incidental to the drought which had taken place during the last season, and were not to be considered as forming any objection to the working of the system When he said a short time since that the Government were not prepared to alter the existing regulations, no inference could be drawn from that expression that he was now prepared to uphold them At the time that answer was given to the hon member for Burra and Clare, he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) was conducting the negociation consequent upon Mr Stuart's discoveries, and he could not then say in what way the regulations might have to be altered to meet that case It did not however follow, that because he was not at the moment prepared to alter the regulations, that he intended to uphold them for the future if good grounds were shown for altering them hereafter for the benefit of the public Then, again, the hon member had alluded to the Waste Lands Regulations as not calculated to give a fair return to the revenue He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) agreed to this being the case, but he would remind that hon member that these regulations only applied to new runs in distant districts, where the runs were so indifferent that it was imperative that every facility should be given to those willing to stock them, and these new runs could not afford to pay more than 10s a square mile, rent The Government, however, had not lost sight of the fact that the old-established runs did not pay a fair return to the revenue, which was evident by their having brought in a Bill to levy an assessment on stock But the feeling seemed to be against that They all knew that the leases of the old runs had six or seven years to run yet, and the Government had no power to increase the rental upon them They would therefore, have to wait until the expiration of the leases, when no doubt steps would be taken to establish the leases on a different footing, and obtain the full value from them It was utterly impossible to raise the rental during the currency of the old leases and for that reason the Government had introduced a Bill to provide for an assessment upon stock, but which by present appearances did not meet with acquiescence Everything had been done in fact to meet the deficiency which was in strict accordance with justice On the whole the regulations had worked well Such a discovery as that made by Mr Stuart might easily be legislated upon according to its merits, and he thought that the resolution passed that day by the House, conferring upon Mr Stuart a tract of country of an area of 1,500 square miles would form a very good precedent for action by that Legislature in any future discoveries of a like nature, and any discoveries of new country of a less important character, would be amply recompensed by the grant of a loan of 200 square miles without going to auction, as at present provided by the regulations

The ATTORNEY GENERAL would make a few remarks, as he had been alluded to in the discussion It would be in the recollection of that House that, when taking his seat, he stated that the policy of the Government would be not to throw difficulties in the way of the appropriation and stocking of new runs, but to offer every facility for the runs being taken up and partially stocked, and that, when the first difficulty was over, an assessment proportionate to the value of the run could be levied, by which the public interest would be secured, and no obstructions thrown in the way of the settlement of the runs He thus distinguished the difference between that principle and the policy adopted by his predecessors, in refusing to grant land on the easy terms before mentioned The regulations had been drawn up with the view of offering every justifiable facility for the stocking of the runs, subject to a reasonable assessment after the first difficulties had been overcome The hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) had said that these regulations were unworkable, but he would tell that hon member that no general regulations possible to be framed by finite beings would have the effect of providing for every contingency or of meeting the conflicting differences of opinion which would operate upon them

Mr PEAKE briefly replied, and recapitulated his views on the question His reason for bringing forward this motion was that such a system as that now existing might not be perpetuated He urged upon the House the necessity of so expressing their disapproval that the Government might be induced to remodel the existing regulations

The SPEAKER put the motion, which was negatived without a division

The House then adjourned to Wednesday at 1 o'clock

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Capt Bagot, the Hon Major O'Halloran the Hon Capt Scott, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Capt Hall, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon E C Gwynne, and the Hon the Surveyor General,

THE PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN had a very important petition to present, from the Associated Chairmen of District Councils, representing the whole districts of the colony The petition was signed by 21 District Chairmen, and prayed that the Council would not pass the Public Works Bill in its present shape, but would omit the Central Road Board from its operations

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN presented a petition upon the same subject from the Chairman of the District Council of Aldinga He remarked that the petition sung the same song as the preceding one, eulogising the Central Road Board and praying that it might not be dissolved

The petition was received, but upon being read, proved to be informal, and was consequently withdrawn

The Hon Dr EVERARD presented a petition upon the same subject from the District Council of Noarlunga, praying the House not to pass the Public Works Bill in its present shape, but to exempt the Central Road Board from its operations

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon A FORSTER presented two petitions upon the same subject from 115 rate-payers in the hundred of Talunga, praying the Council not to pass the Public Works Bill in its present form, but to exempt the Central Road Board from its operations

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the House of Assembly, intimating that they had agreed to the whole of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Bills of Exchange Bill

MR STUART'S EXPLORATION

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the House of Assembly, intimating that the Assembly had adopted an address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to take the necessary steps to effect an alteration in the existing Waste Lands Regulations, with the view of granting a lease of certain lands to Mr J M Stuart in the country recently discovered by that gentleman

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The Hon A FORSTER presented a petition from the District Council of Mount Barker, praying that the House would not assent to any alteration in the constitution of the Central Road Board, except such as was indicated in the petition

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

The Hon H AYERS presented a similar petition from the Mitcham District Council, which was received, read, and ordered to be printed

THE INSOLVENT ACT

The Hon H AYERS gave notice that on Tuesday next he would move an address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting him to lay on the table copy of the despatch received from the Secretary of State on the subject of the Insolvent Act, and suggesting alterations therein, and the opinion of the Hon the Attorney-General thereon

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The CHIEF SECRETARY, in rising to move the second reading of the Public Works Bill, said the House were probably aware that it was a Bill to bring the great public works of the colony, namely, the construction of main lines of road, the management of railways, the improvement of the harbor, and the construction of waterworks, under the direct management and control of the Commissioner of Public Works He did not wish to imply that the previous management of these works had not been perfectly right and proper On the contrary he believed that the works to which he had referred had been well managed by the Boards having the control of them, but hon members would recollect that the constitution of the present Boards had been effected at a time when the character of the Government was different, the Executive of that day were not in any way responsible to the Legislature It was thought that better management and control would be effected by the large expenditure upon these great public works being directly under the responsible Minister of the Crown, the Commissioner of Public Works He was informed that a considerable saving would be effected by the passing of the present Bill, as the various offices of secretary, clerks &c attached to the existing Board would be abolished It, however, he might judge from the number of petitions which had been that day presented, it appeared there would be considerable opposition offered to the second reading He would suggest that the House should assent to the second reading, and that such alterations should be effected in Committee as appeared to be in conformity with the views of a majority of the House If the House of Assembly did not agree to the amendments which were made by the Council, it was still possible that upon a conference a Bill might be passed which would give satisfaction to all parties

The Hon H AYERS seconded the motion for the second reading

The Hon Captain BAGOT did not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of the Bill, but would take that opportunity of stating that he did not oppose it simply because he had given notice of his intention if the Bill were proceeded with, to propose amendments which would altogether alter the character of the Bill He thought from the expression of public opinion in reference to the usefulness of the Central Road Board, of which such ample evidence had that day been afforded by the presentation of petitions, praying the Council to exempt that Board from the operations of the Bill, that the Council would agree with him to abolish that Board would be very unwise He had hoped that when the Chief Secretary brought forward this measure he would have shown just grounds for the sweeping alterations proposed by the Bill in vesting all the powers at present possessed by these Boards in the Commissioner of Public Works He was not prepared to say that the various Trusts and Commissions which were included in the Bill were the very best that could be constituted, but having been established and having worked well, he thought it would be extremely unwise to take the works upon which they were at present engaged from under their management, particularly as all these works would shortly have a termination, and were not to continue for ever, or for any lengthened period The Chief Secretary had stated that under responsible Government it was desirable that the Commissioner of Public Works should have the entire management and control of public works but he begged to differ altogether with the hon gentleman, believing that though the Commissioner of Public Works should have the control and supervision of such works the management should not be undertaken by him It was impossible, indeed, that the Commissioner of Public Works could undertake their management, and, consequently, if it were nominally vested in him, they must in reality be undertaken by some one appointed by the Commissioner of Public Works If the various Commissioners and Boards at present existing were displaced, some one else must be appointed, there must be some head to look after the management of the various departments, therefore, he thought it would be very unwise to displace the present parties, who had been tried, for the purpose of appointing others Nothing had been shown in that House or elsewhere that he was aware of to convince him that such a course would be desirable, and he was prepared with some amendments which, if the Bill were read a second time, he should move in Committee, and he believed they would be found to carry out the prayer of the petitions which had been presented that day It might be necessary that there should be some alteration in the Central Road Board, but all he thought must admit that it would be unwise to abolish it The great objection which had been raised to the Central Road Board was that it was not sufficiently responsible to the executive Government, and to remedy that he had drawn up amendments which would be found upon the table of the House His object was to place the Commissioner of Public Works in the position of General Supervisor and Comptroller of all the public works that he should be enabled to enquire at any time into all matters connected with them, and that he should have power of inspection either by himself or others It was essential that the Commissioner of Public Works should be placed in this position in order that he might be prepared to afford the Legislature the fullest information upon all matters with which expenditure upon public works was at all connected In the printed amendments upon the table of the House, he felt that he had not gone far enough in explaining as he ought, what he considered to be the duties of the Commissioner of Public Works, and he was therefore prepared to move an addition to the first clause, if the House determined upon considering the Bill in Committee He would not oppose the second reading, but if the amendments which he intended to propose were not acceded to, he should be compelled to join in voting that the Bill be read again that day six months

The Hon A FORSTER had no desire to oppose the second reading, if it could be shown that by going into Committee there was a better chance of an understanding being come to than by throwing the Bill out at once He felt, however, that he was bound to oppose the Bill in the absence of all explanation of the benefits which they had a right to expect from it (Hear, hear) The Chief Secretary had stated that dissatisfaction had been expressed at the expensive mode in which public works had been conducted under the administration of Boards, but suppose that was the case, and that dissatisfaction existed to a large extent the hon gentleman had not intimated in what way it was intended by the Bill before the House to remedy this The hon gentleman had not shown in what way public works would be more efficiently conducted for the public service by the present Bill, but, on the contrary, he had borne complimentary testimony to the manner in which public works had been conducted by the means of existing Boards Not having shewn that they would be better conducted by the sole and arbitrary administration of the Commissioner of Public Works and seeing that the Bill involved most sweeping and important changes, he felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill, though he should be exceedingly glad if the Chief Secretary would give such information to the House as would satisfy him, that the plans proposed by the hon gentleman were better than those which he proposed to supersede He should be glad if he were able to vote for the second reading in order to assist the Government in carrying out some arrangement for the better conducting of public works At present he simply asked for information, reserving what he had to say for another opportunity From present appearances, however, and the expression of public opinion, he was inclined to object to the Central Road Board being included in the Bill Generally he should be disposed to accept gratuitous services, or next to gratuitous services from practical and experienced persons, and he believed a large amount of valuable service, gratuitous service was rendered by the Chairmen of District Councils in connection with the operations of the Central Road Board For a compensation merely nominal he believed that several members of that body were rendering good service to the country He should certainly hesitate before he transferred the usefulness of that Board to the Commissioner of Public Works, until he knew how that power was to be exercised

The Hon Mr GWYNNE upon entering the House, felt indisposed to take any part in the discussion, feeling that the question was of such great importance, and had probably been so well considered by other hon gentlemen, that it would be indiscreet for him to take any active part upon the present occasion From the speeches which he had heard delivered, however, since he had been in the House, he saw his way clearly as to the course he should take in this instance It was a most refreshing circumstance to hear the Hon Mr Forster advocating a preservation of the existing institutions till he was assured that some benefit would result from a change He was opposed to setting aside institutions which had stood the test of experience till those organizations, as he might term them, which it was proposed should supersede existing institutions, had been shown to possess some advantages over existing systems Those were the principles which he (Mr Gwynne) had always entertained He objected to change merely for change sake He objected to make changes in any existing institution shewn to work moderately well till he had been fully satisfied that the scheme which it was proposed to substitute would, in all probability, work better than that which it was proposed to set aside That was the great principle which he had ever advocated, and to which he was glad to see that the Hon Mr Forster had become a convert Without calling the attention of the House to all the Boards which were referred to in the present Bill, he would particularly allude to one, but his remarks would more or less apply to the others The Central Road Board was that to which he would particularly direct attention That Board had existed for some time, and was organised upon a popular basis It depended upon election by the people, and to a great extent possessed the public confidence When the Board was first formed it did not obtain the amount of confidence which it at present possessed, but after the whole organization had been gone through, after the members had obtained a certain amount of experience, had exercised a sound discretion in the selection of officers, and had, in fact, gone through a long, expensive, and painful process, they attained some of the attributes of perfection, and hence the increased confidence which they had obtained The Board throughout its ramifications had performed its functions creditably, efficiently, and to the public satisfaction, and he should be extremely loth to throw money aside which the Board had expended in litigation alone, in preparing their forms, for instance, construing their Acts, and various other matters connected with their organization The Board had learnt what its powers were, they had learned that they were dependent upon public opinion, they had bowed to that opinion, and when it was found that it worked so well, and afforded so much satisfaction, he could not vote for abrogating it until he had been fully informed of the extent of the power which the Minister of Public Works would have under him in carrying on the onerous duties of the Central Road Board As regarded that Board, he should certainly give the Bill his opposition, and the remarks which he had made in reference to that Board were to a considerable extent applicable to other Boards, which it was proposed to set aside He thought the best plan would be to throw out the Bill, and he should go with that vote if he found it were the general sense of the House.

The Hon J MORPHETT would make a few observations upon this most important Bill He would state at the commencement that he should decidedly oppose the Bill He did not know whether it could be shewn that it would be desirable to go into Committee, but as the Bill at present stood, he was quite prepared to vote against it He should do so principally upon the grounds which the Chief Secretary had advanced in favour of the Bill, that is, that the whole power and responsibility would be thrown on the Commissioner of Public Works. No man could effectively perform the functions of the various Boards and Trusts. If the hon. gentleman spoke of responsibility in a parliamentary sense, he contended that the Commissioner of Public Works was responsible now, and not only the Commissioner of Public Works, but the whole of the gentlemen upon the Ministerial benches. Those honorable gentlemen were bound to satisfy Parliament that public works were properly and efficiently done. He believed that the work performed by the various Boards included in this Bill was effectively done. He fully agreed with the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Gwynne, in reference to the Central Road Board, and although he did not know much about other Boards he believed the various works which were undertaken by them were most effectively done. One object in going into Committee would be to consider the amendments proposed by his honorable friend Captain Bagot. He was not quite sure whether those amendments amounted to a practical proposition, or whether they would tend to throw greater responsibility upon the Commissioner of Public Works than at present. He did not clearly see the benefits which would be derived from the clauses which it was proposed to introduce, but he was quite sure he would oppose the Bill as it at present stood. If the Hon. Captain Bagot thought it was desirable to go into Committee for the purpose of considering the resolutions of which his hon. friend had given notice he should have no objection, always however reserving to himself the right of moving that the Bill be read again that day six months.

The Hon. Captain HALL, in rising to remark upon the second reading of the Bill, would observe that, so far as the title of the Bill was concerned, it proposed to do what was highly desirable—more efficiently and economically to conduct public works; but that assumption was unsupported by facts. The hon. the Chief Secretary had stated that the works were most efficiently conducted by the present Boards, and had not shown how they would be more efficiently conducted under the management which it was proposed to substitute, namely, that of the Commissioner of Public Works. No machinery was set forth in the Bill to replace the system which it was proposed to pull down. The hon. gentleman was not prepared to show any other erection which could be raised. The House must not take all for gospel that they heard. Several memorials had that day been presented to the House reflecting high credit upon the Central Road Board, yet it was proposed by the Bill before the House to abolish that Board. The hon. the Chief Secretary was himself a member of another Trust, of the working of which he must have had experience, and he believed the hon. gentleman could not charge his conscience with any mismanagement. It appeared to him not within the range of possibility that one individual could overlook the whole of the public works of this colony. He would require the stride of Colossus, the eyes of Argus, more than the universal genius of the Admirable Crichton, and still not have sufficient power to carry out the provisions of this Bill. Supposing, however, that some Commissioner of Public Works should have the modesty to undertake what would be required of him by this Bill, what would be the effect of this centralization of power and patronage? Would the Bill before the House secure the more efficient and economical conduct of the public works? Would the public service be protected by it? He very much feared that directly the reverse would be the case. The responsibility of the Commissioner of Public Works to the Legislature in reference to public works could not be doubted. What then did the Bill propose to effect, if the Commissioner of Public Works was already responsible? He (Capt. Hall) was a member of one Board, and he could only say that he considered that Board responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works, and that hon. gentleman was in a position every day, if he liked, to demand of the Secretary and Chairman that they should report their proceedings to him day by day. It was very desirable, he thought, that the Bill should not be thrown out altogether, but that something like amendments of which notice had been given by the Hon. Captain Bagot should be introduced for the purpose of setting aside any doubt as to the responsibility of Boards to the Commissioner of Public Works. Some Boards had afforded information to the Commissioner of Public Works as a matter of courtesy, but he thought they should understand that they should do so not merely as an act of courtesy, but as a matter of duty to the Commissioner of Public Works. He thought that was the only ground upon which any alteration should be effected. The Board with which he was connected had never understood otherwise, but if that point were cleared up there would be no necessity for the Bill before the House, and he should oppose the second reading.

The Hon. Captain SCOTT had expected, when the Chief Secretary moved the second reading of the Bill, that it would have been found the hon. gentleman had some heavy charges to bring against the Boards, Trusts, or Commissioners at present existing, and that it would not have been attempted to effect the changes proposed by the Bill before the House without there being some objections to the present systems. No such objections, however, had been pointed out by the hon. the Chief Secretary, nor had any charges been made against the existing Boards, many of which had been in existence for a long time without any complaints having been made respecting their proceedings. It appeared that the change which this Bill sought to effect was merely a change for change sake. He believed that it was very desirable that every person or every body of persons to whom public money was entrusted for the purpose of carrying out public works, should be responsible to the Minister of the day, that he should be prepared at any time to call for the fullest information in reference to such expenditure, in order that he in return might account to the representatives of the public, whose money these various Boards had been using. The Bill proposed that one thing should be given up, but it did not state what the public were to receive in return which would be for their benefit. The House had not been told the particulars of the new plan which it was proposed to substitute for the present one. All that they were told was that the Commissioner of Public Works was to have a good deal to do, or which must be done by those whom he appointed over one place or the other. He could not see what improvement the plan proposed would be upon the existing system; on the contrary, he believed that the effect would be directly opposite if they were to put all those works under the Commissioner of Public Works, which were now undertaken by the various Boards which this Bill proposed to abolish. It was quite clear that the Commissioner of Public Works could not personally superintend these various works, but that he must appoint some person to superintend each of the works which were now managed by Boards. The Commissioner of Public Works could not be in every place, and it was clear that his judgment must be guided in a great measure by the opinions of the party whom he appointed. No doubt the Commissioner of Public Works would for his own sake be careful in selecting the best men to take charge of the various departments, but he must be guided by their report. He felt that this was a question which affected the interests of the country to a great extent, and the country should have some better security for the economical and proper conduct of public works than was proposed by this Bill. Moreover before the House could assent to this Bill it should be shewn that there was a greater probability of the works being better managed by the single person in each department appointed by the Commissioner of Public Works to superintend them than by the Board at present constituted. He believed that the very reverse would be the case. If it should be said that the Government might appoint one or more individuals to Boards or Trusts who were not quite competent, still, although they were not quite competent he would ask if the inexperience of the party appointed by the Commissioner of Public Works would not be quite as injurious to the good working of the Board or Trust as though the Commissioner of Public Works had the whole management himself. If this party appointed by the Commissioner of Public Works were incompetent, or had a particular leaning, he might inflict paramount or permanent injury in the one case, whilst only partial injury could be inflicted in the other. Then again, the individual, let him be as upright as possible, might commit an error in judgment, and he would have no one to consult with, but it was not the case with a Board, for if an error in judgment was committed by one member, it might be corrected by his colleagues. The hon. the Chief Secretary had said that this Bill would effect a saving in the management of works which were now managed by Boards or Trusts, but he (Capt. Scott) was at a loss to see how this could be. He was persuaded, indeed—though perhaps it might be contended that he was not competent to form a correct opinion—that the very reverse would be the case. He felt satisfied that the business of the Board of which he had the honor to be a member if conducted by a private individual, would be very much more costly. The whole of the members of the Board received for their labors a sum in the aggregate which would not be sufficient properly to remunerate by one-half an individual as the head of the department. Supposing for instance, that the Central Road Board were done away with, it would be impossible that one individual could superintend the whole of the operations, and precisely the same number of clerks and officers as at present must be retained. The fees which were paid to members of the Board would, he felt assured, go but a small way to pay one individual as the head of the department; consequently where would be the saving? Under the proposed system, the country would not have the same security that the works would be properly done as at present, for upright as the individual upon whom the management devolved might be, he was liable to commit an error in judgment—far more liable than if there were four or five other individuals with whom he could consult. All that he wished was that Boards should know that they would be compelled to lay out public money for the purpose for which it was voted, and that if at any time they should omit to do so they could be called to account. He was not sure how other Boards were managed, but he could only say that the Board of which he was a member, before commencing any work, furnished the Government not only with a plan of the work which they proposed to undertake, but an estimate of the cost was submitted to the Government, and the Board were not in a position to do anything or to obtain a sixpence until the plan and estimate had met with the approval of the Government. There was a complete understanding that they were under the control of the Government. Besides this the Bill came before the House now as if all the works which had been performed by the Government had been done so well and so economically that there was just cause for censuring all Boards for the extravagant and inefficient manner in which works performed by them had been executed. Now they had only to go along the coast and every jetty which they came to would rise up in judgment against the Government as the most useless, costly, and unsatisfactory of any public works which had been constructed in the country. He thought the Government should set the example and be able to say we can perform works so cheaply and so well, whilst Boards are so extravagant and so unsatisfactory that we must dispense with them and take the management on ourselves. But could they do so at present to justify such a Bill as this? Why, the very reverse was the case. The Chief Secretary had made out no case to warrant the passing of the Bill before the House, but he should like all Boards and Trusts distinctly to understand that they were so far under the control of the Government that they could not lay out sixpence of the public money except as Parliament intended it should be laid out at the time it was voted. He should like to hear what other hon. members had to say upon the subject, but at present his feeling was to oppose the Bill; if, however, any more light could be thrown upon the subject he should be glad to hear it.

The Hon. H. AYERS supported the second reading of the Bill, principally for the purpose of getting it into Committee. He did not mean to cast any reflection upon the management of Boards, and, indeed, thought it rather unfortunate that the hon. member (Captain Scott) had drawn comparisons between the operations of Boards and the Government. No doubt, if an investigation were held, it would be found that sometimes works undertaken by Boards were defective, as well as those undertaken by the Government. An instance had indeed recently occurred, a portion of the works undertaken by the Waterworks Commissioners having proved very defective. He did not think, however, that had anything to do with the question; but the great question was, the responsibility of these Boards and Trusts. He understood there was no direct responsibility on the part of these Boards to the Government, and that impression was strengthened by the contingent notice of motion given by the Hon. Captain Bagot. It seemed by the clause it was intended to add, if the Bill ever reached Committee, that it was intended to give—not direction or control—but supervision only, if he understood the clause. This was a strong proof, to his mind, that he was right in assuming that Boards were not responsible at present. If the Bill passed its second reading, he should be happy to make such alterations in reference to the Central Road Board and others as would make them more responsible, as at present he understood that the Board could give their clerks what salaries they liked. He objected to this as he considered the Central Road Board as much a Government establishment as the Treasury or the Custom-House. It was likely to create great dissatisfaction where there was a difference in the salaries paid by such Boards and in other Government establishments. He wished the various sums which were required to be submitted to Parliament, and also the salaries which it was proposed to pay to officers. He should have no objection to vote for the measure in that form. The only reason that he had for voting for the second reading was, that the House might go into Committee and endeavour so to moderate the measure as to make it conform to the wishes of the various petitioners who had addressed the House upon the subject. Every petition, he believed, which had been presented to the House, urged that the Board should be made responsible but did not wish that it should be removed altogether, and placed solely under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works.

The Hon. Mr. GWYNNE asked if any amendment was before the House.

The PRESIDENT said that there was not.

The Hon. S. DAVENPORT said that the course which he intended to pursue was to vote against the second reading. If, however, any doubt existed amongst members of the Government, as to the individual member connected with public works requiring legal powers of which he was not at present possessed, he should be most anxious to introduce a law to give him the required facilities. He took that to be the expressed opinion of the House. Before he came to the House he made up his mind not to oppose the second reading, but in Committee to support to some extent the amendments of which notice had been given by the Hon. Captain Bagot, which he thought would prove desirable, but he would suggest to the Chief Secretary that he should withdraw the present measure, and when the Government had recognised where the feebleness of the Minister in connection with public works existed, they could then introduce a measure to give that member of the Government his proper powers. He never liked to oppose Government unless he felt it necessary. He liked a Government to be strong, and believed that the better they were supported the better it was for the community. He felt happy on this occasion in reflecting that he was not opposing a measure upon which the Government were unanimous; for however much the Chief Secretary might have done his duty in introducing this measure, as a member of the Government he felt assured from what had fallen from the hon. gentleman that all the members of the Government did not go with it. For a short time he held the office of Commissioner of Public Works, and from the slight experience which he then gained he felt assured that no one person could take charge of the whole of the public works referred to in this Bill. The Commissioner of Public Works was a responsible Minister of the Crown, and was not selected for his ability to conduct public works, but he was a political party, and as such parties were changing, the probability was that a party would enter upon office with antagonistic views to his predecessor. The result of such an arrangement as that proposed by this Bill would consequently be that there would soon be confusion, the officers would be at loggerheads, and great loss and suffering would accrue. It would be impolitic for the Government to bring themselves into direct communication with the parties affected by the class of works undertaken by Boards. Those works were not public works of an ordinary character; they were not the mere building of public institutions, or of Houses of Parliament, but they were public works for which the community were directly taxed. It was, therefore, impolitic for the Government to bring themselves into such direct contact with the community. It was impolitic to introduce a measure of that kind; and as he liked to see a Government strong he raised the objection to the second reading. He sympathised with the Chief Secretary when that hon. gentleman moved the second reading of the Bill, for he could not but recollect when he (Mr. Davenport) was placed in a similar position, when he introduced a Bill of the same kind, feeling at the same time that he could not support it, as the then existing Boards were really doing so well. He said little upon the occasion, but merely introduced the measure and on that occasion the Chief Secretary opposed it. It would be a bad compliment to the hon. gentleman to suppose that he had not grown wiser since. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN seconded the amendment.

The Hon. Captain FREELING supported the second reading of the Bill. It appeared to him that the country generally were of opinion that the Commissioner of Public Works should be in a position to demand information which at present was only afforded by courtesy. The Commissioner of Public Works had no power which he was aware of, particularly in connection with the Central Road Board and Railways, to demand the information which he desired, nor could he interfere in the execution of any works; thus these Boards might perform what work they liked, quite irrespectively of the authority of the Commissioner of Public Works. It appeared to him a fallacy to expect responsibility on the part of the Commissioner of Public Works when they did not give him power. He believed the railway management had induced the Government to introduce this Bill. A former Commissioner of Public Works endeavored to enforce certain views which were not entertained by the Railway Commissioners, and it appeared the Commissioner of Public Works was powerless. The Central Road Board was very much in the same position, being irresponsible to any power but themselves, as those representatives who were selected by the District Councils must remain in during the period for which they were elected. If it were expected that the Commissioner of Public Works should be responsible, it was only reasonable that he should have full power. In departments where there was only one executive officer he would endeavor to understand his business, and immediate action could be brought to bear upon him upon all subjects entrusted to him. It had been said that the Central Road Board was working so well that there was no necessity for an alteration. It was to a certain extent popular; but it should be remembered that only a short time ago the Board was execrated from one end of the country to the other. Everything that the Board did was wrong, or at least it was said so, and he was at a loss to judge how it was that it had become popular, for there was the same executive as before, the same division of work, and the same number of persons constituted the Board. There were also the same rules in existence as when the Board was so unpopular. The Board, though carried on in the same way as at present, might become as unpopular as before. He did not place much reliance upon its popularity. Questions coming before the Board were more or less of an engineering and scientific character, and if these were discussed by qualified persons a true result was more likely to be arrived at, than if they were dealt with by parties unfitted by education for the consideration of questions which required persons of peculiar and scientific education to understand them. He trusted the House would not throw out the Bill.

The Hon. Dr. DAVIES recapitulated some of the remarks of the Hon. S. Davenport and the Hon. the Surveyor-General, and remarked that the reason the Central Road Board had become popular probably was that they had had a lesson taught them. He believed that in connection with that Board and the Harbor Trust were gentlemen, in whose knowledge of the works which they were called upon to perform they should have every confidence. He was not prepared to go against the sense of the country at large, and the Central Road Board should certainly be excluded from the operations of the Bill. He should oppose the second reading.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said in reply that he introduced the Bill as a member of the Government. He would remind the House that an entirely different state of things existed now to that which existed when the Boards which had been referred to were created. Hon. members generally appeared to agree that certain Boards should be made more responsible to the Minister of the Crown in connection with public works than they were at present, and feeling that, he could not think they would act wisely in opposing the second reading of the Bill, but they could move amendments in Committee He hoped the House would reconsider the decision at which they appeared to have arrived, and agree to the second reading of the Bill

The second reading was in fact lost by a majority of 10 to 3, the votes upon the motion that the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question being—Ayes 3, Noes 10, as follows —

AYES—The Hon Captain Freeling, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Chief Secretary (teller)

NOES—The Hon Messrs Gwynne, O'Halloran, Everard, Scott, Bagot, Davies, Forster, Morphett, Hall, Davenport (teller)

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY the House went into Committee upon the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment Bill, when

Dr EVERARD renewed his objection that the proposed ditches at level-crossings would not afford sufficient protection to life and limb, and intimated that he should vote against the Bill

The Hon Dr DAVIES remarked that the system of ditches had not been adopted in England, and he thought it should be tested here in the outer districts before the gates which already existed were removed He therefore moved that neither the gates nor the gatekeepers be removed until the efficacy of the proposed plan had been tried

This proposition was declared lost, upon which the Hon Dr DAVIES called for a division, when the votes—Ayes 2, Noes 11, were as follow —

AYES 2—The Hon Dr Everard and the Hon Dr Davies (teller)

NOES 11—The Hon Messrs Gwynne, Ayers, Davenport, Freeling, O'Halloran, Scott, Hall, Morphett, Forster, Bagot, the Chief Secretary (teller)

The Hon Dr EVERARD moved a further amendment to the effect that all district roads abutting upon any railway should have a swing gate in addition to the ditches contemplated by the Act, such gates to be without gatekeepers, and to be opened and shut by the passers by

The Hon S DAVENPORT seconded this proposition, remarking that any one acquainted with cattle must know that there was no place to which they were more likely to take themselves than the elevated gravel which constituted the railway line

The Hon Captain FREELING thought the remedy worse than the disease, for a person passing through these gates in a carriage would have in reality to cross the railway five times instead of once for the purpose of opening and shutting the gates, and each time he would run the risk of being run over by the train

The Hon Captain SCOTT wished to know at whose expense the gates were to be maintained, as the probability was that from the carelessness of parties in leaving them open they would soon be smashed

This proposition was declared to be lost, upon which the Hon Dr EVERARD called for a division, when the votes were—Ayes 4, noes 10, as follows —

AYES—The Hon Captain Hall, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon H Ayers the Hon Dr Everard (teller)

NOES—The Hon, Messrs Scott, Davies, Forster, O'Halloran, Morphett, Bagot, Gwynne, Freeling Chief Secretary (teller)

Some verbal alterations were made, and at the suggestion of the Hon E C GWYNNE, the words "at his discretion" were introduced in order to remove all doubt as to the power of the Commissioner of Public Works to retain what gates he thought proper

The Bill having been reported with amendments the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon J MORPHETT, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that its object was simply to repeal two clauses in the Act of 1853, which clauses, Nos 182 and 183 gave the Judge power, the one to put special questions, questions on special facts to the Jury, and the other gave the Judge power to refer cases to arbitration without the consent of the litigants Those clauses had been felt to be a great hardship to the community at large, and it had been thought desirable to repeal them The members of the legal profession considered the clauses very objectionable, one effect of them being to place the Judge and the Jury in an antagonistic position, and tended to the discredit of the Supreme Court Of course, the Judge would still have power to refer cases to arbitration upon the consent of both litigants That power was considered sufficient, and the Judge also had power under the Acts of 1855 and 1856 to refer all matters of account to arbitration , clauses 2 to 11 in the old Acts referred to specially providing for reference The Council passed a Bill with a similar provision to the present last session, and sent it to the Assembly, where, however, such alterations were made in it as the Council declined to accede to it The present Bill, which had passed the Assembly, was precisely similar to that formerly passed by the Council, and he therefore apprehended, the principle having been affirmed, there would be no difficulty in assenting to the second reading

The Hon A FORSTER seconded the motion which was carried, and the Bill passed through Committee without amendment

The third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

MR STUART'S EXPLORATIONS

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY gave notice that on Tuesday next he should move a resolution in accordance with the resolution which had been adopted by the House of Assembly, relative to a grant of land made to Mr Stuart in the country recently discovered by that gentleman

The House adjourned at a quarter-past 4 o'clock till 2 o clock on Tuesday next

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock

FREE DISTILLATION

Mr BAGOT presented a petition praying that the restrictions upon distillation may be abolished

The petition was read and received

PRIVILEGE

The TREASURER said that before proceeding with the business of the day he rose to make some remarks upon a question of privilege He found that in reference to a grant made to a discoverer of land in the North, that a message was ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Council with the resolution of the Assembly Unless the House rescinded that order it would place the Legislative Council in the position of dealing in detail with a matter involving the expenditure of the public money They admitted that the Legislative Council had a voice in the public expenditure in so far as that House could reject or pass the Estimates , and so, also in this matter the Council should have an ultimate voice, for when the resolution of the Assembly was forwarded to that House it could act upon it, either by amending the resolution or passing the Bill If the case was to be met by an alteration of the regulations, the House would have an ultimate voice in the matter, inasmuch as the Act provided that the amended regulations should be laid before the Council within 14 days He would now move that the order of the House of November the 5th be read and discharged, with the view of substituting another resolution to the effect that the resolution of that House be transmitted to the Council for the information of hon members

Mr GLYDE asked upon whose motion this order appeared amongst the votes and proceedings of the House?

The SPEAKER replied that it appeared upon the motion of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands

Mr GLYDE wished to hear from the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands some better reason for rescinding the motion than had been assigned by the hon the Treasurer He thought that in rescinding the motion the House would be dictating in a very uncourteous manner to the Legislative Council (No, no) The hon the Treasurer had said that the concurrence of the Council would be necessary if they brought in a Bill He could not see why it was desirable to rescind the resolution, and should vote against doing so, even though he stood alone—(hear, hear)—unless the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands assigned some better reason for taking that course than he (Mr Glyde) had yet heard

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he was not prepared to give any further information than that which was already in the possession of hon members He was not aware at the time of moving the motion that it was informal

Mr NEALES said the question of the hon member (Mr Glyde) went further than the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands seemed to perceive Was that hon member now satisfied that the motion was informal?

Mr GLYDE again rose, and said he should vote against the motion

The SPEAKER called the hon member to order He had already spoken to the question

The TREASURER said that although he had already spoken he felt bound to satisfy the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde), inasmuch as the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands was not in his place when the question was put and had not consequently an opportunity of fully hearing it The hon member, Mr Glyde, wanted to know the reason why the motion was informal It was so as it appeared to him (the Treasurer) inasmuch as it transmitted a resolution of that House (the Assembly) which would have the effect of appropriating a portion of the public revenue, and asked the concurrence of the Upper House in such a resolution This course had not been taken in reference to other addresses of the House on similar subjects It was not usual to transmit resolutions of this kind to the Upper House for its concurrence, inasmuch as the Upper House had the power of rejecting all votes when the Estimates were before it The resolution was merely an address asking the Governor to do a certain thing which the Governor would do by altering the regulations and would then lay the regulations before Parliament If on the other hand the alteration was made by a

Bill then the Council would have a voice in accepting or rejecting the Bill

Mr GLYDE rose to put another question

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member would not be in order in doing so

The motion for rescinding the motion was then put and carried without a division

Mr GLYDE asked the Ministry whether the members of the Cabinet had yet made up their minds as to whether it would be necessary to bring in a Bill in order to give effect to the resolution previously passed by the House

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that the point had not yet been decided

COLONIAL DEFENCES

Captain HART brought up the report of the Select Committee on defences, which was read by the Clerk and ordered to be printed

ABSENTEE PROPRIETORS

Mr BARROW rose to move the resolution standing in his name —

"That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the question of absenteeism, as affecting the prosperity of this colony, and to report upon the practicability, or otherwise, of levying a special tax upon the property of absentees, in aid of the General Revenue of the province"

He had no intention of occupying more than a few minutes in dealing with this question, as what he asked for was a Committee to enquire into the matter It would be admitted that the question was one of great importance, and he was well aware of the difficulties of dealing with it, but those difficulties, so far from telling against his motion, should rather be viewed as favorable to it He did not ask the House to affirm the proposition that it was desirable or expedient to tax the property of absentees, but simply to enquire whether such a course of proceeding was desirable or expedient He found, on referring to the estimated revenue and expenditure for the current year, that the Legislature had to look forward to a deficient revenue for the first six months, and it was well-known that a very large proportion of the wealth of the country was expended out of it He knew the value of the influx of foreign capital into the country too well to take any course calculated to check it—(hear)—but if any description of tax could be levied upon the property of absentees which would not obstruct the introduction of foreign capital, he thought it should be adopted He would state in the broadest sense that if it could be shown that a tax upon the property of absentees would have the effect of checking the influx of foreign capital he would abandon it (Hear, hear) But he was by no means clear that such a tax would have such an effect, and hence he wished to gain information upon the point Neither would he for a moment seek to check the free choice of persons as to where they would live. (Hear, hear) The tax on absentees need not be a check upon this free liberty, but the House might, on enquiry, come to the conclusion that some kind of tax might be levied on these persons which would neither check the influx of foreign capital, nor the free choice of persons as to where they would reside Hon members frequently heard references made to the immense amount of money annually sent out of the colony, and that at a time when money was so scarce He did not refer to the money expended in the making of our railways upon which interest was allowed It would be a difficult thing to impose a tax upon the holders of our government debentures, but the case was different with persons who had purchased for shillings properties now worth hundreds of pounds,—persons who paid little or nothing into the Treasury for properties which now brought them in thousands upon thousands yearly He would like, if it were practicable, to place these persons in somewhat the same position as if they still lived in the colony, by compelling them to contribute to the revenue as they would do through the Customs department if they resided in the country His object at present was to obtain a Committee to take evidence as to the extent of absenteeism, the number of absentees, the value of their properties, the nature and classification of such properties, and the best means of reaching them for the purpose of taxation Reserving any further remarks which he might have to offer until the close of the discussion, if any discussion should arise, he now moved the resolution

Mr MCELLISTER seconded the motion

Mr BAKEWELL expressed his great disappointment at the speech of the hon member (Mr Barrow) He had thought that hon gentleman would have made out a better case before troubling the House by asking for a Select Committee The hon member did not tell the House what an absentee was (Hear, hear) Would he include amongst them the first purchasers of the land, who subscribed in London the money which set the colony going, and who it was well known never intended themselves to come to this country It would be a fraud and a cheat to tax the land of these gentlemen (Hear, hear) The colony was under the greatest obligations to them, for the English Government would not have allowed the colony to be founded unless a certain amount had been subscribed by the purchasers of land Again, would the hon member tax gentlemen who lent money in the colony at a moderate rate of interest? It would be highly impolitic to impose such a tax, as it would inevitably result in capitalists drawing their money out of the colony They would write to their constituents saying "you must pay us 8, 9, or 10 per cent for our money You must add the amount of the tax to the interest or the money will be withdrawn" The rate of interest paid here was not very large In Canada any amount of money could be lent at 15 per cent, and it was only the other day he saw a letter from a farmer resident of this country, mentioning the rates of interest prevalent in Canada. The only class of persons who had a right to be called absentees were those who came here and purchased land and who then went away It was a question whether these persons should be taxed, but we should first ascertain whether absenteeism was a pecuniary loss to a country (Oh oh!) The hon member for East Torrens should have touched upon this point, but he did not But what said the political economists from Adam Smith downwards? He was not going to trouble the House with what these writers said [The hon member here read a brief extract from a book, to the effect that it was a matter of no moment whether a capitalist resided upon his estate or not] He believed it would be found by all persons who investigated the subject that there would be no pecuniary loss sustained from this cause, and in not having proved that there would be such a loss, the hon member for East Torrens had failed in one essential point No doubt in a poor community like Ireland it was an injury that the possessors of property—the natural protectors of the people—should be absent, but in a rich country, or in one circumstanced like this, it was a matter of the purest indifference where the landlord lived (Oh! oh!) He (Mr Bakewell) did not believe the country would be any the richer for the landlord's presence, and he judged from the opinions of a man who had studied the subject No doubt there might be a little more trade and a few additional merchants employed to provide the family of the landlord with jewellery and silks, but as a matter of trade the country would be none the worse for his absence It was also a remarkable fact that no country in the universe had taxed absentees The thing was a mere theory and a dream But on the other hand some countries which ought to be studied, interfered for the protection of absentees He would instance this by an Act of Congress, passed by the United States of America in 1783 Every State had its own executive, and a certain form of Government, and in 1783 the great men who framed the American Constitution inserted a clause in the Act defining the powers of the State Legislatures, to the effect that no tax should be imposed upon land the property of a citizen of the United States, by reason of the non-residence of the owner, and in no case shall a non-resident be taxed higher than a resident The same clause was, in later years, introduced in Congress, for the Congress saw that the State Legislatures would try to tax persons who set the country a-going He thought it would be wise if such a provision was introduced here There was no country in which capitalists did not invest their money in foreign countries, and if all the capital so invested here was withdrawn, we should have a very poor place indeed Our object should rather be to encourage capitalists in buying our poor land, for the country would benefit by their buying the land even at £1 an acre He believed a mere attempt of this kind to tax absentees—the very mooting of the question—was calculated to do great injury inasmuch as it would alarm persons in other countries who had invested their money here. (Hear, hear)

Mr MACDERMOTT found he could not support the motion, as it was calculated to create alarm, and so prevent the introduction of foreign capital into the colony, which would be a far greater evil than the one which the hon member for East Torrens complained of At the same time he could not go the whole length of the hon member for Barossa, for if it should be found on enquiry that the property of absentees did not pay the same amount for its protection as that of resident proprietors, he considered that to that extent it would be a fit subject for taxation

Mr BURFORD thought there had been nothing advanced to show that it would be improper in the House to appoint a Committee The object was enquiry, and it was admitted on all hands that we could not have too much of that It was generally recognised in connection with this subject that the notions of people were much scattered—that few think alike, and fewer of these think consecutively In fact, they were all abroad, and the only means he could see of getting out of the difficulty was, the appointment of a Committee This might concentrate the ideas of hon members and put the matter in a light in which they had never seen it before Any steps whereby the public could be enlightened on the question of taxation were valuable, and on this account he hoped the Committee would be granted Remarks had been made as to the danger of preventing capitalists from investing their money, but he thought there were higher considerations involved In the first place, whatever was obviously right, they were bound to attend to (A laugh) Absentees should pay as much in proportion as other members of the community towards the expenditure of the Government which protected their properties and facilitated their operations in search of further gains There were two parties to the question So far as the man of wealth was concerned, the arguments used were all very well, but was the House justified in leaving out of consideration the industrious classes? The hon member for Barossa spoke of capitalists buying up our bad land, but it was not all bad land which these persons took up. These capitalists had power to lock up the land until it would realise such prices as would satisfy their inordinate desire for gain, whilst the man who would work the land for the benefit of the community could not, owing to its high price, obtain any. For whatever period the capitalists held the land—even from the foundation of the colony—they must have their interest, and until they could get that, and a spanking profit, they would not let the land go. The industrious men would benefit the country and the others were drones. (Laughter.) But they were wide awake enough to know a good investment. We should protect the property of such persons, but we should open up every means of enabling the industrious man to obtain land and work it for the benefit of the country. He believed it was required by the English Government that capitalists should raise £32,000 before steps were taken to found this colony. The capitalists calculated that in all probability it would turn out a good "spec," and it did turn out so, but the capitalists were not to suppose that they were to be protected through all time. He maintained that the very object of founding the colony would be defeated by the plan which the advocates of the absentees now proposed to follow. How often we were afflicted by the complaints of old colonists as to the wants of the comforts of life in the colony, by men who, having a sort of home-sickness over them, complained of those who went away, and yet desired to follow them, and thereby add to the evil. If these men were patriotic they would stay here and give the colony the benefit not only of their wealth, but also of their knowledge and experience. These however were not the parties who we should most consider, but the industrious classes.

Capt. HART opposed the motion, as the very fact of appointing the Committee would show that the House contemplated doing a great injustice. (Hear, hear, and Oh, oh.) Every principle of political economy was opposed to the imposition of a tax on absentees, and in the very first place they had the knowledge that no other country had imposed one. Even where absenteeism was felt most strongly—where the rents were taken away by the landlords from Ireland—although it was a very serious evil, still it was found that without injustice these persons could not be taxed. Another thing to be considered was that in this country we were so dependent upon foreign capital to bring forth the capabilities of the country that to do anything which would prevent that capital from coming in would be to inflict a great national misfortune. The imposition of a tax on absentees would have this effect, and then where were we to stop? Were we to tax the bondholder? If we taxed the man who lent money to private individuals, why not tax the man who lent to the Government, and so at once prevent the Government from borrowing on the easy terms it procured at present. He would ask any hon. member acquainted with the system of borrowing and lending money whether any such restriction would do good. He was satisfied any such restriction would fall in the end, not upon the man who lent money, but upon the borrower, for the lender would take the money away unless he was paid an increased interest to cover the tax; and any hon. member acquainted with the subject would be of the same opinion. Capital was one of those kind of things which were very sensible indeed. (Laughter.) It was so sensitive, in fact, that if a tax-gatherer put his hand upon it, it vanished altogether. (Laughter.) He was satisfied this tax would have the effect of drawing away a large amount of capital from the country. Many hon. members had not the same experience as others, but if they looked back 20 years they could draw a comparison between our present position and the one we were in at that time. The hon. the Speaker would recollect when we had land and labor, but no capital to employ the labor, and in consequence the labor went away. If capital was not employed for this purpose no country could get on, and the labor would go away when there was no capital to employ it. Although he could not go the length of the hon. member for Barossa, who said that it would not be a disadvantage if all capitalists left the country, still it would not be the disadvantage which hon. members supposed. The entire advantage of the capitalists' presence consisted in the profit on the goods which he consumed. But the chief argument was that if we crushed the capitalists by means of the tax-gatherer, we would cause him to leave the country, and where were we to stop at all? If we taxed the man who lent money, why not tax the man who sends goods for sale and return? It might be said in reply that the importer paid duty, but it was the consumer who paid it. Unless we taxed the importer of goods as well as the lender of money, the system would be quite unfair. It would be impossible to tax absentees except by a general income tax, and he could understand that if it was proposed. In England there was an income tax, but it was general, and did not tax a man living in Germany more than a man living in Battersea, or any other portion of Great Britain. The very fact that we now hailed with the greatest delight the prospect of a new bank, showed that we had not a sufficient quantity of the circulating medium to meet the requirements of our trade, and if we did anything which might stop the importation of money, we would be doing a great wrong to ourselves and the colony. He trusted that the hon. member for East Torrens would withdraw his motion, or that there would be some unanimous expression of opinion that it was of a dangerous nature.

Mr. BAGOT would say but a very few words, as the hon. member for the Port had made use of every argument bearing on the subject, but he could not refrain from expressing his disapproval of the motion. He regretted that when it was made the Government did not, as was usual in other places, express some opinion upon it. It would have been better to do this than to wait until they had heard the remarks of the whole house, and then express their opinions. (Hear, hear.) He had often remarked this mode of proceeding, though he did not say so with the intention of throwing any great blame upon the Government, but if they acted otherwise, it might lead himself and other hon. members to take a different part. (Hear, hear.) He agreed in almost every word which had fallen from the hon. member for the Port, but that hon. member should not take Ireland as an instance, showing that this tax should not be imposed here, for Ireland was always the weaker party and in dealing with questions of this kind, even if the people of Ireland wished to impose a tax on absentees it would not be put on. Although he (Mr. Bagot) when he resided in Ireland was opposed to an absentee tax which had been fully discussed there, he was satisfied that such a tax would be doubly as disastrous here. The difference between the persons occupying the soil in Ireland and in this country, was that here they were masters of the soil, whereas in Ireland they were mere servants. But without going further into that point he should oppose the motion.

Mr. STRANGWAYS opposed the motion, which he believed would inflict a lasting injury on the colony. If they appointed the Committee it would be an intimation on the part of the House that it would be under certain circumstances desirable to impose such a tax. The hon. member for East Torrens seemed particularly desirous of being upon another Committee now that he had finished his labors upon one. (Laughter.) As the mover of the motion, that hon. member would of course be upon the Committee, and as he seemed not to be particular as to which Committee he was on—(laughter)—he (Mr. Strangways) would be happy to withdraw from the Wine and Beer Licences Committee, in order to make room for him. If a tax on the property of absentees were allowed, it would confer lasting injury on the country. This was a colony of absentees, and founded by absentees. (Hear, hear, and no.) The hon. member who said "no" knew nothing of the matter. It was persons in England who subscribed to found the colony as absentees—men who did not know within many degrees of latitude or many hundreds of miles where the property they purchased was situate. The capital of absentees was the main stay of the colony, and therefore, this tax, if imposed, would confer a lasting injury. There was not £150,000 of colonial capital in the country. Where would our railways be but for imported capital? Could we sell £20,000 worth of bonds but for absentee capital? If that capital was withdrawn all the members of the House could not purchase £5,000 worth of our bonds to-morrow. (Oh, oh.) Hon. members did not take it into consideration that all the capital of the banks was absentee capital. There was very little capital in the colony, and if the foreign capital was withdrawn, the colony would be injured in one of its vital interests. What was an absentee? Was a man going home for three or four years to educate his family to be considered so? If a man was very wealthy and desirous of evading the tax, he might travel backwards and forwards perpetually for that purpose. The tax would be one very difficult to levy and most injurious if it was levied. The property invested in the mines of the colony was also absentee capital, and as the hon. member for the Port had said the tax would be paid not by the absentee, but by the borrowers of money. If the £20,000 with which the colony was started had not been raised, and he believed there was a great difficulty in raising it, and that it was only procured on the very morning or within a few hours of the necessary time, South Australia would not have become a colony. The colony was not like the others. It was a speculation of absentees, who invested their money, not knowing whether they would ever get back a penny of it. The very difficulty of getting the money showed the doubts of the capitalists of England on this point, and there were persons in England who would watch with a jealous eye any proceeding of this kind for the purpose of taxing them. There was a disposition to tax the country unduly, and if it was done, no doubt the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would be very happy to spend the money. (A laugh.) They were told the other day that Daniel O'Connell said that enough was a little more, therefore enough taxation would be a little more. (A laugh.) That was the information given by the hon. mover of this motion. (Laughter from Mr. Barrow.) He would not move the previous question, as he hoped the House would negative the motion at once.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL objected to the terms of the motion, as pledging the House to lay a tax on absentees if it were practicable, without first ascertaining if it were just. He also said that the motion contained nothing to show who the absentees were. If he understood the term "absentee" it meant a person out of the colony, who was deriving an income from capital invested in the colony. But then this had an extended meaning, for there was a variety of capital invested in the colony by absentees in the shape of loans on mortgage, shares in the banking companies and in other ways besides on fixed properties, but there was nothing in the motion to shew whether it was intended that this description of property should be made liable to a tax or not. He thought the House would not be prepared to impose a tax upon persons who, though not residing in the colony, had money out on interest and who invested it or withdrew it from circulation as suited their interest. To levy a tax on such persons would be in principle the same as repudiation. With respect to the general question of absenteeism, he would ask what position the colony would have been in were it not for the support it had received from absentees? Hon members who were acquainted with the circumstances of the colony at one period must be convinced that much good was effected by it, but he could not but suppose that if they adopted the principle embodied in the motion, of taxation without representation, that it would tend much to retard the introduction of foreign capital and to render that uncertain which was already invested in the colony. He would suppose the effect which would probably result from a tax of this nature upon absentees, in their withdrawing their capital from the colony, and would ask them in the event of all foreign capital being extracted from the colony what would be the merchantable value of the residue. (Hear, hear.) Such a course would, he believed, tend to a depreciation of the exchangeable value of their articles of produce. With regard to the first part of the question, as affecting the prosperity of the colony, was there any person who would say that the introduction of foreign capital, even though under the element of absenteeism, did not tend hitherto to increase the prosperity of the colony. Who could doubt but that the loan of money on mortgage and by other means which placed the agriculturist in the position of obtaining land on easy terms of going upon it, and of obtaining the means of supporting himself and eventually of paying back the debt, was a benefit conferred on the colony by means of the absentee having sent his money here to invest. Then, again, the investment of the money of the foreign capitalist in land tended to increase the value of land generally, which reflected an advantage upon every person in the community. And if the price of land was increased in proportion to the investment of capital, so also would it be decreased by the withdrawal of that capital. He objected to this Committee because it ignored all justice to a particular class who were instrumental in raising the colony to its present state of prosperity, because he saw no service to be derived from it except the House were prepared to adopt a system which would tend to the withdrawal of the capital of the absentee and because the Government were not prepared to introduce a measure which would place a tax upon one class of the community for the advantage of another class.

Mr SOLOMON supported the motion, as he considered it was merely a call for enquiry, and if a Select Committee were appointed, it would decide as to the expediency or otherwise of taxing the absentee. While assenting to the proposition that the withdrawal of the capital of the absentee would inflict a serious injury upon the colony, he could not see that there was any intention in this motion to tax any property otherwise than fixed property, and so far as that went, they had innumerable instances of the injustice which was committed on the resident proprietors to the advantage of the absentee. He would suppose that he (Mr Solomon) had 100 acres of land, and that an absentee proprietor had 100 acres beside him, and that he (Mr Solomon) spent £1,000 upon his 100 acres. He was at once taxed for his improvements and the absentee who reaped advantages thereby in the enhanced value of his land did not contribute one sixpence. That was his cause of complaint principally. It had been implied that it would be an injustice to the absentee to tax him, but this he could not see. What was required was that, not only in the country, but in the town, there should be an equitable rate established. At present, while he (Mr Solomon) was paying for an acre of land in the city at the rate of £100 per year, the absentee was held harmless, because his land, although immensely enhanced in value, was not improved, and he therefore was let off by paying £2 per acre. Was that justice, he would ask? As to an income tax, he (Mr Solomon) should not object to it if it were introduced in conjunction with a property tax, by which means they would then be able to reach the absentees. The hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had said that the colony was enormously indebted to absentees, and although he admitted we might be to some extent, he could not agree to a sequential statement of that hon member, that if all the capital of absentees were withdrawn, the members of that House could not find 5 000*l* in money between them. (Laughter.) He believed that it was from no kindliness to South Australia that home capitalists invested their money here, but that it suited their purpose. He trusted that the great bugbear which had been presented to the view of hon members throughout the debate, the withdrawal of foreign capital, would not prevent the House from sending the question for enquiry to a Select Committee. If the enquiry tended to shew that an injury would result from such a tax there was an end to it, but he could only attribute the opposition to the enquiry to the fact that the case was too strong against the absentees.

Mr REYNOLDS could not go with the motion, because he thought it would tend to frighten away, as it had been said, the capitalist. But if such a tax were imposed what was there to prevent the absentee from investing his property in a second name, and thus evading this special tax. ("Oh," and hear.) But he knew there were instances in this colony already of shares being held in companies by residents here, which actually belonged to parties in England who were absentee proprietors. With regard to the fixed property of the absentee, this, he thought, might be reached through the District Councils or the Corporation, without necessitating the appointment of a Select Committee.

Mr PEAKE opposed the motion, as he did a Bill of the same nature a short time since, as tending to introduce a system of class legislation, and he was glad to find the Attorney-General with him on this occasion. With regard to putting a special tax upon absentees he would say that he looked upon that class as a portion of the State, and which the state were bound to protect, and he would not single them out therefore to be the subjects of a special tax. In support of his views he would read a passage from Adam Smith. (Read the passage.) Every proprietor whether resident or absent, had an interest in the State, and therefore, he had an objection to any one being singled out as a subject for taxation. He did not think it wise or politic in the hon member for Last Torrens to introduce this motion. Not that he thought that hon member had any impression of its impolicy, but that he believed that there was an opening to introduce such a system. He thought it better that the House should negative the motion at once than that it should have the effect of frightening capital out of the colony although he believed, in answer to a remark from the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) that the security against this was that the capitalist found a better return for his money in this colony than in any other country—that he received 100 per cent premium over the investment of capital in England. He (Mr Peake) was not terrified, therefore, at the prospect of any large withdrawal of capital, but, nevertheless the more they steered clear of any attempt at class legislation the better it would be for the capitalist and the country itself. The hon member for the Light (Mr Bagot) had said that the farmers paid 25 per cent for their borrowed capital. If they were able to do that all he could say was that the sooner some fiscal system was introduced which would put an end to the industrious agriculturist being weighed down by such a burden the better. The hon member for Encounter Bay had said that this colony was founded by speculative capitalists, but he (Mr Peake) thought it was founded rather by the intelligence of English capitalists who saw their state at home and wished to find a labor market for their superabundant labor, and he thought their foresight was an honor to them. He opposed this motion as inopportune and inexpedient.

The TREASURER would vote against the motion, and in doing so was not content to merely give a silent vote, because the principle embodied in it was too important for him to do so. This question had been mooted before, and after careful consideration he then stated his objection to taxing the absentee, because he was of opinion that it was most unjust to select one particular class of the community for the purpose of inflicting a tax which was not general, and which, of course, amounted to class legislation. He (Mr Finniss) felt so strongly on this point that he would be sorry to form a part of any Government which would uphold it and he would always, when out of his present post, oppose any Government holding such views. This colony owed its origin to absenteeism, and its future success depended upon it also. He entirely agreed with those persons who said that a tax upon absentees would tend to a withdrawal of capital. With regard to a remark which had fallen from the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) that if he spent £1,000 upon his 100 acres of land, the absentee who had property beside him would reap the advantage. He would ask how it could be assumed that the land in question was the property of an absentee, but supposing it were, that was no reason why he should be subject to a special tax because a resident proprietor had chosen to improve his property. If no better argument could be brought in favor of the motion, he certainly must vote against it. Some speaker had drawn a distinction between those who were once residents in the colony, but who had subsequently left, and those who were always absentees, but this he considered would be a very inconvenient distinction. It was natural there should be with those who came to this colony from their native land a yearning towards home. This feeling, however, would have no sympathy exercised towards it by a restriction such as that which it was proposed to enact. But then, although this desire could not be counteracted in the present brief existence of the colony, it must be borne in mind that the descendants of the present settlers would look upon this country as their home, and the principle of absenteeism would not have to be combatted to such an extent as now at a future period. In some cases, the removal of persons from this colony tended to good, as in the instance of a person making money in the colony and taking his children home to be educated. Was that not an advantage to the colony—the education of their youth—who would eventually return and improve their moral position. He could not understand why there should be a distinction made between those who were always absentees and those who made their money in the colony and then removed. It would be impossible to keep up such a distinction, for there would be persons who originally invested their money in the colony as absentees, then settled in it, and afterwards removed from it. Were such persons to be made an exception? Were such persons to be taxed because they were absentees? Such distinctions could not be justified by any policy or argument. He opposed the motion because he thought it unjust to select any portion of the community for the purpose of subjecting them to a special tax.

Mr NEALES would say to this question, as he had said with respect to the Assessment on Stock Bill, that he had quite sufficient evidence, and wanted no more. As to the absentees having an undue advantage over resident proprietors, all he could say was that they must be turned up by local taxation, but he could not see that they would benefit themselves by attempting anything beyond that. No doubt, in some cases, foreign capitalists would buy and invest for years, and hold for a market, but the District Councils and the Corporation would be able to combat with that difficulty. With respect to a tax on floating capital he was of opinion that it would be impracticable. He supposed the case of a holder of ten Burra shares which might change hands, or the holder of which might be a resident to-day and an absentee to-morrow. The income tax at home had a very unjust effect, the poor surgeon, whose means were limited, paid the same in proportion to his income as the man who rolled about in his carriage. If the facilities for communication between this and home were increased, they would eventually have something like a resident-absenteeism. He did not approve of the motion, as it had a special effect. The proper way was that if a person, whether here or in Birmingham, had property, he should be made to pay his just proportion towards the revenue, but if there was anything like unfairness in the distribution of the tax, it would have the effect of frightening away foreign capital. He would cite the case of the National Bank, where the people of Melbourne had taken a number of shares in a bank which was to be opened in Adelaide, but it could not but be believed that an imposition such as that spoken of would tend to a withdrawal of capital on their part. The motion had been brought forward by a zealous member, but he thought the more he, the member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), thought of it, the more he would see the necessity of withdrawing it. Such a tax would tend to affect all descriptions of property, such as Bank shares, mortgages, loans, railway shares, and other securities, and as he had been a borrower all his life, and hoped he would be as long as he lived, he could not vote for that which would have the tendency of checking such facilities for the interchange of securities.

Mr BARROW, in reply, said that the hon member for Barossa (Mr Bakewell), who he was sorry was not in his place, had remarked that he (Mr Barrow) had given no reason for his wishing to inflict another Select Committee on that House, but when he remembered that the last two Select Committees appointed, were inflicted through the instrumentality of the hon member (Mr Bakewell) and that he (Mr Barrow) had only as yet asked for one Select Committee, he could not but think the hon member for Barossa was somewhat out in his reckoning. The hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had said that he would resign his place on the Wine and Beer Licences Select Committee, to him (Mr Barrow), were he desirous of being on another Select Committee, but he declined that offer, and if it were not out of order he would say that he voted that hon member (Mr Strangways), on the Wine and Beer Licence Committee, hoping thereby he might be used up—(Great laughter)—that he might be used up in Committees (Continued laughter)—and he should always vote for that hon member being placed on Committee with the view of preventing his active services in the House. He would say with respect to a remark from the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart), who said there was a predisposition to an act of injustice being committed by the appointment of a Select Committee, that however obviously ridiculous such an argument might be, the same thing would apply with greater force to that hon gentleman's position on the Select Committee on Colonial Defences, in which he cut so distinguished a figure. The hon member for Barossa (Mr Bakewell) had expressed his astonishment that no conclusive reasons had been submitted in favor of the necessity of taxing the absentees. But he (Mr Barrow) was not then prepared to submit direct proof of the policy or impolicy of such a tax, all he asked was the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the advisability or unadvisability of doing a certain thing. (Hear, hear.) Surely the motion could not have been read according to the terms in which it was worded, as no hon member would have made such a query. The scope of the motion was simply to enquire into the question of absenteeism, and to report either in favor of it or against it. The hon the Attorney-General had not denied the practicability of taxing the absentees, and had told the House that unless they were prepared to adopt the report of a Select Committee, they had better not appoint one. He (Mr Barrow) took that as an admission on the part of the Attorney-General that the Select Committee would gather such conclusive information on the question of absenteeism as would lead it at once to report unfavorably of it. (Hear.) The whole of the arguments raised against this motion were based on the assumption that to tax the absentee would check the introduction of foreign capital. But he could not see that it would have those alarming effects which had been so fearfully pourtrayed by some hon speakers. Still if such evil results were apparent to the members of a Select Committee, then no doubt they would report unfavorably of it. He (Mr Barrow) remembered the time when from the Treasury benches there came fearful forebodings of the irretrievable ruin which would follow any diminution in the salaries of the Government clerks—(laughter)—but those gloomy forebodings had not as yet been realised, and probably the apprehensions which were engendered as to the probable effects of the present motion might also be eradicated before long. It had been said that a tax upon the absentee would amount to taxation without representation, as absentees were not represented in that House. But he (Mr Barrow) thought they were represented and well represented in the House. There was the hon member for East Torrens—and by the way he (Mr Barrow) recollected some questions having been put to that gentleman at a certain election meeting some time ago as to his opinion upon the propriety of taxing the absentees, when that gentleman replied to the effect that he was not altogether opposed to a tax upon absentees. (A laugh.) He also remembered that the same hon member a short time since declared, when the Civil Service Bill was under Committee, that Government officers retiring should be compelled to spend their money in the colony. He had no doubt therefore that his hon colleague would be able to support some plan which might meet the question. It had been inferred by previous speakers that it was proposed to tax floating capital as well as fixed property, but this was clearly an inference which was unwarrantable, and as to the motion not being sufficiently minute, he might say that if his own mind had been made up, he (Mr Barrow) would have introduced a Bill at once instead of the present resolution, but it was because the question should be sifted—it was because a vast amount of money was being taken out of the colony by absentees, which might be made to contribute to the revenue, that he tabled his motion, which, however, did not seem to meet with general support. He had, however, accomplished his object, and that was to bring the question before the notice of the House. Though he had no wish to press the motion, still he did not fear to stand in a minority—(hear, hear)—and instead of withdrawing the motion, therefore, he would let it take its course. He believed the day would arrive when instead of being in a minority on this question, he and those gentlemen who supported him would be in the majority. All he had asked for was the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the advisability of taxing the absentees, if it could be done with justice to themselves or for the advantage of the community.

The SPEAKER then put the question and declared the noes had it.

Mr BARROW called for a division, which was as follows:—

AYES, 9.—Messrs Solomon, Glyde, Burford, McEllister, Rogers, Cole, Lindsay, Harvey, and Barrow (teller.)

NOES, 19.—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Neales, Hart, Shannon, Dunn, Milne, Hay, Andrews, Hallett, Bagot, Peake, McDermott, Wark, Reynolds, Strangways, Duffield, Mildred, and the Treasurer (teller.)

making a majority of 10 in favor of the noes.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

The bringing up of the report of the Select Committee on Railway Management was, on the motion of Mr REYNOLDS, made an Order of the Day for next Wednesday.

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

The report of the Select Committe on the Smillie Estate Bill was agreed to, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Thursday.

MAIN ROADS RESOLUTIONS

In Committee.

Mr MILNE moved his contingent resolution of which he had given notice, as follows:—

That he will move the following as an additional resolution, to follow No 2 and to stand before No 3, viz:—"That in the opinion of this House, at least one-half of the funds derived from the sale of Waste Lands should be devoted yearly to the construction of the main lines of road throughout the colony."

And said that as our Land Fund was at present absorbed in the general revenue, the effect of a proposal such as that embodied in the motion, would probably be lost sight of. He considered the state of the Land Fund should be the criterion of the amount to be set apart for the construction and maintenance of roads. If large quantities of land were sold, he thought it only just that access to those lands should be given by a portion of the revenue arising from their sale, and it would be productive of general good. The facilitating of communication into the interior tended to raise the value of the waste lands. As to the amounts to be devoted to this purpose, he had no objection to modify it if thought necessary, although he should like some minimum amount to be stated. He had introduced the motion more with the view of drawing out a discussion.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS explained that a larger sum than asked for by the last speaker—viz, one half of the waste lands revenue—had been applied to the roads and bridges during the last year, amounting in all to 118,000*l*, to which interest might be added. He also remarked, that any expression of opinion by the House now could not bind any future Government in their action in the matter

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped the House would not pledge itself to any course, as he thought it better that the sum for main roads should be voted annually The House should not pledge itself to any specific sum, as some years it might be advisable to spend the moiety of the land fund, and the next year it might not be necessary to do so

Mr ROGERS supported the motion, for the more that was expended on the roads the better it would be for the colony

Mr MILDRED opposed the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga, and hoped he would withdraw it

Dr WARK also opposed the motion, and hoped it might be withdrawn

Mr DUFFIELD intimated his intention of voting for the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga if he put it to the vote

Mr HAY hoped the motion would be withdrawn, as it was intended to direct the Government how they should dispose of the revenue He thought the Government should be in a position to submit these questions to the House on their own responsibility

The CHAIRMAN then put Mr Milne's contingent motion, which was negatived

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS then moved the resolution standing in his name, as follows —

"That it is the opinion of this House that the necessary funds for maintaining and repairing the main roads and bridges of this province should be raised by rates upon a general assessment of property, aided, where practicable, by a system of tolls"

He explained the object of the motion, the substance of which had been previously discussed He said that at present there were 150 miles of main road in the colony, the cost of the maintenance of which amounted to £200 per mile, and experience proved that no less a sum would do The assessment proposed, it would be remarked, was to be a general one so as to affect all persons alike It was singular that, subsequently to these resolutions having been framed, he (the Commissioner of Public Works) had heard that Captain Martindale, of New South Wales, had introduced resolutions affecting the main road system very similar to those before the House As to toll-gates, and it being said that these were too antiquated to introduce here, they had proof that they worked well at home, and he thought the only objection against them would be in the cost of collection The Surveyors of the four road districts had reported that the settlers were in favor of them, and it was not a little remarkable that all these gentlemen should have been so unanimous in their opinion He left the matter in the hands of the House, for their careful consideration

Mr PEAKE rose to move an amendment or counter-resolution to resolution No 3, the substance of which has already been given in the former discussion on these resolutions The hon gentleman reiterated his former arguments and moved the amendment

The CHAIRMAN said it was at variance with a previous resolution agreed by the House, and therefore, it could not be put He returned it to the hon member

Mr MACDERMOTT said that, doubtless, the reason why the Commissioner of Public Works had introduced these resolutions was, that the difference of opinion on this question was so great He was not surprised at his adopting this course, as there were scarcely two opinions alike The best way, perhaps, would be to collect all their opinions in a hat and strike an average (A laugh) He was quite prepared to support the former part of the resolution, but with respect to the toll-bars, he was against them

Mr NEALES said the Commissioner of Public Works had told them that it cost £200 a mile to keep the roads in repair Now sometime ago he asked the House for a guarantee to a private company for the construction of a short line of rail, which would have amounted at the most to less than £200 per mile, and yet he was refused He instanced this as an inconsistency As to tolls he thought it was impossible to collect them There was only one place where it would be practicable, that was in coming out of the Little Gorge but even in that case it would be quite possible to make a private road and outflank the tollgate, which could not be met except by branch gates, which would be out of the question He proposed that they should strike out the portion referring to tolls In some instances where a toll was practicable, the settler would pay both assessment and toll, while elsewhere, where the toll was impracticable, the assessment would only be paid

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped the addition to the assessment, viz, "Aided if practicable by a system of tolls," should be struck out, as it would otherwise result in the Commissioner of Public Works being beaten on the resolution altogether

Mr LINDSAY agreed with the motion, excepting the system of tolls, which he would have struck out

Mr DUNN was also opposed to the system of tolls, which he thought unsuitable to this colony

Mr MILDRED hoped that tolls would be struck out, and a little more information given as to the mode in which the assessment would operate upon property

Mr DUFFIELD thought the hon the Commissioner of Public Works should have stated his views on the subject of tolls, as they were exploded in England, and should certainly not be introduced in this new country The Government were evidently trying to find out what was the feeling of the House, which was, perhaps, a wise course in the circumstances (A laugh) He admitted that a weak Ministry in England the other day took a similar course No arguments had been brought forward in favour of tolls, and if the hon the Commissioner of Public Works did not withdraw the first part of his motion he (Mr Duffield) should vote that it be struck out

In reply to Mr MILDRED, the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was not the intention of Government to rate personal property Neither was it meant to assess only land which abutted on main roads

Mr ROGERS considered the agricultural interest sufficiently taxed already, and that it would be unjust to impose an additional burthen on districts which already assessed themselves The agricultural interest already paid £381,000 a year in rates and assessment He wished to know whether it was proposed to tax land rented from the Crown as well He thought also that it was a mistake of the Government not to lay a general measure before the House

Mr HAY was pleased to hear the decided stand made against tolls by the hon member (Mr Rogers) If the general revenue was not sufficient to enable us to go on patching the roads it might be necessary to fall back on an assessment, but he was entirely opposed to tolls, as the effect would be to throw the whole burthen upon the poor working man who was the occupier of a section If there was to be an assessment let it be on all the land of the colony according to its value, but tolls were partial and unjust

Mr PEAKE said his chief object in asking the House to assent to his amendment was to put a policy on the face of the resolutions, rather than shirk the question by adopting the dubious wording of the original resolution

Dr WARK was of opinion that tolls worked well in New South Wales and Victoria, but they would not answer here, owing to the great number of cross and by-roads The hon member censured severely the practice of legislating by resolution, and taunted the Ministry with not having brought in a Bill which they would be prepared to stand by

Mr TOWNSEND also taunted the Ministry with trying to ascertain by means of the resolutions how the wind blew, or what were the sentiments of the House on the subject

Mr COLE thought it unfair to tax the districts higher than they were taxed at present If such was the object of the resolution, he would oppose it

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it would be manifestly unfair that one district having three main-roads in it should maintain them all, whilst another having no main-road paid nothing The term "general assessment" was meant to include all property at present rated by the district

The House then divided on the question that all the words after the word "that" in the original motion proposed to be struck out, with the view to introduce an amendment, stand part of the question, when there appeared, Ayes 10, Noes 12

The following is the division list —

AYES—The Treasurer, Attorney-General, Commissioner of Public Works, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Duffield, Macdermott, Hay, Shannon, McEllister and Harvey

NOES—Messrs Glyde, Strangways, Reynolds, Mildred, Burford, Cole, Lindsay, Rogers, Dr Wark, Messrs Townsend, Peake and Dunne

The question was then put that the words proposed to be inserted be inserted, which was negatived

The House then resumed, and the CHAIRMAN having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday, 16th inst

The House rose shortly after 5 o'clock

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 11

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

THE GREAT EASTERN LINE

Mr TOWNSEND presented a petition from 213 of the inhabitants upon the Great Eastern line of road, praying that they might have the use of the Great Eastern line of road The petition was read and set forth, that if the road were opened up a large quantity of available land would be brought into the market, and that a number of expensive buildings had been erected upon the road, upon the faith that the road would be opened up They therefore prayed that a sum of £5000 might to be placed on the Estimates for the purpose of opening up the road, which would afford employment for a number of those wanting employment

DESECRATION OF THE SABBATH

Mr COLE gave notice that on Tuesday next he should ask the Commissioner of Public Works if it were true that trucks had been employed for the removal of wool and other articles to the railway station on Sunday last, and if so, whether this was with the sanction of the Government?

THE SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

Upon the motion of Mr MILNE the Smillie Estate Bill took precedence of other business and was read a third time and passed The Bill was ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Council, accompanied by the evidence taken before the Select Committee

WINE AND BEER LICENSES

Mr SOLOMON, in the absence of Mr Bakewell, brought up the report of the Select Committee upon Wine and Beer Licenses The petition was received and read, and stated that, in the opinion of the Committee, the operation of the law gave a great and unjust advantage to the holders of Wine and Beer Licenses over the holders of general licenses, and encouraged tippling habits The Committee expressed a belief that Wine and Beer Licenses did not answer any useful purpose, and that no other than general licenses should be issued They had prepared a Bill for the amendment of the law as suggested

Mr MILDRED wished to know if he would be in order in moving that the evidence be read, as he believed it was not voluminous, and was of a very interesting character

The SPEAKER said it was not usual to read the evidence

The report and evidence were ordered to be printed

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS, the consideration in Committee of this Bill was postponed till Thursday next, the hon gentleman stating that he wished to go through it very carefully

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that he believed the Treasurer was desirous of proceeding with the Estimates in Committee, and he would, therefore, postpone the consideration of the District Councils Bill

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The consideration of this Bill was also postponed in order to enable the Treasurer to proceed with the Estimates

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT

The TREASURER said that he understood the practice with regard to the financial statement was that it should be made in Committee, and that the motion that the House go into Committee upon the Estimates was merely a formal one, on a late occasion it would be remembered that the consideration of the Estimates was postponed, and he presumed that the reason upon that occasion was that he merely moved the House into Committee of the whole without offering any reason or explanation why he did so He did so because he thought it was a mere formal motion, and, as a matter of course, that the House would go into Committee to hear the financial statement upon which the Estimates were based He should follow the practice of the House of Commons and not make the financial statement till the House were in Committee, and would give some reasons for adopting that course He would at once state that when the House consented to go into Committee he did not propose to go on with the details of the Estimates at once, but merely desired to make a statement respecting them, with any explanation which it might be desired he should afford in reference to the financial policy of the Government Some of the grounds upon which the adjournment of the consideration of the Estimates had taken place were, that some Committees were sitting upon Ways and Means, at least those were some of the reasons which were given by some hon members who addressed the House On that point he would say that it was customary for the House of Commons to agree to the expenditure which was necessary, or for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state the expenditure which he proposed, and then to proceed to show how that expenditure was to be met If the House considered that the expenditure proposed was necessary, they would of course assent to it, but if not, amendments could be moved in Committee If, however, it was considered that sums proposed were necessary for the Government of the colony, and the improvements of the colony, it could not be a matter of moment whether particular items which made up the revenue should be continued or not seeing that if a certain expenditure were necessary, the necessary ways and means must be voted With regard to the Customs, for instance, a Committee was sitting which involved distillation and there might be an alteration of the Customs duties to meet any defalcation arising from distillation, but whatever defalcations there were, they must be made up either from the Customs or some other source So with regard to the assessment on stock Whether the House sanctioned that measure or not, was not the question If, however, the House disallowed that particular amount, there would be no obligation on the part of the Government to make up that amount in any other way, as they had a balance upon the Estimates of £19,000, which would leave a sufficient balance on the six months, notwithstanding the tax proposed by the assessment on stock were disallowed by the House He thought he had shown good reasons why the House should go into Committee upon the Estimates and he would remind the House that they were now near the middle of November, and that in about six weeks there would be the Christmas holidays The expenses of the ensuing year must be authorised before the 1st January, or the Government would be placed in the position of having their supplies stopped That was an extreme measure in all parts of the world Unless the House went into Committee at the present time, and even then they had only six weeks before them, they would have the alternative of the supplies being thrown over for another year, and the session protracted beyond the new year In addition to the principle involved in stopping the supplies, unless the Estimates were at once proceeded with the House would have but a short prorogation, as there was only a period of six weeks in which to pass the Estimates, and as there must be a sitting in April if the business was not disposed of before January, it would scarcely be worth while that there should be any prorogation, and the business of hon members must come to a stand-still He moved that the House go into Committee upon the Estimates

Mr SOLOMON rose to oppose the House going into Committee, because he believed that the Government, like private individuals, before entering into arrangements to make payments, should show where those payments were to come from He had carefully looked over the Estimates and the Ways and Means for 1859, and having done so, he had no hesitation in saying, indeed he would pledge his commercial veracity upon the fact, that it would be utterly impossible that the Ways and Means as they at present appeared upon the Estimates, could ever in the present state of the colony be realised

The SPEAKER pointed out that a discussion upon the Estimates was irregular until the House was in Committee

Mr SOLOMON would then defer his remarks

Mr TOWNSEND apprehended he would be perfectly in order in showing reasons that the House should not go into Committee

The SPEAKER did not think there was an instance on record in which the House of Commons had opposed going into Committee upon the Estimates

Mr STRANGWAYS should oppose the House going into Committee

Mr TOWNSEND submitted it was quite competent for any member to shew why the House should not go into Committee

The SPEAKER repeated that there was no instance that he was aware of in which the House of Commons had refused to go into Committee All the discussion took place in Committee, but he apprehended the hon member would be in order in moving an amendment upon the motion that the House go into Committee

Mr TOWNSEND would then move as an amendment that the Speaker do not leave the Chair, but that the other business which appeared upon the notice paper be proceeded with He, for one, had come to the House prepared to take part in the business as it appeared upon the notice paper He had received no intimation that the first three matters which appeared upon the notice paper would be postponed in order to make way for the fourth, or, if he had, he would have applied his mind to the fourth instead of to the three preceding notices It was unjust to the country members to take business in this irregular order, as they came to town by certain trains, thinking that they would be in sufficient time for certain business, but upon their arrival probably found that it had been disposed of in consequence of having been taken out of its turn He contended that if the Government were to have the power upon Government days to shift from No 1 to No 5, as they might think proper, it would be great injustice to the country members

The SPEAKER said the hon member would have been more in order if he had objected to the postponement of the notices to which he had referred, but he had agreed to that motion The motion before the House was really purely formal

Mr REYNOLDS asked if the House were bound to go into Committee upon the motion of the Treasurer

The SPEAKER repeated that it would be perfectly competent to move an amendment upon the motion that the House go into Committee, but the question was never argued

Mr REYNOLDS said the Treasurer had advanced reasons that the House should go into Committee, and he wished to know if hon members were not at liberty to show contrary reasons

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped he should not be out of order in the observations which he was about to make. The hon the Treasurer, in the statement which he had made to the House, had said that it would be immaterial whether the Assessment on Stock Bill was allowed by the House or not, but why did not the Government in a manly, straightforward manner at once state what their policy was

The SPEAKER said this discussion was really most irregular Why not allow the House to go into Committee, and then hon members would be at liberty to comment upon the Treasurer's statement as much as they pleased

Mr STRANGWAYS understood the Speaker to rule that the Treasurer having made a statement, and subsequently moved the House into Committee, no hon member was at liberty to reply until the House had gone into Committee

Considerable confusion ensued, several members rising at the same moment

Mr TOWNSEND moved that the House adjourn

The TREASURER said the hon member had previously spoken

The SPEAKER wished that hon members would bear in mind that when the Speaker rose, hon members should resume their seats He should put the question that the Speaker leave the chair, and the House resolve itself into Committee upon the Estimates

The question having been put, there was a cry of "Divide"

The SPEAKER reminded hon members that they should wait till the Speaker had given his decision before they called divide

The motion for going into Committee was carried by a majority of 12, the votes on a division being, Ayes, 18, Noes 6, as follows —

Ayes—Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Solomon, Mildred, Macdermott, Dunn, Glyde, Rogers, Cole, Neales, Barrow, Harvey, Hallett, Milne, Shannon, McEllister, Peake, the Treasurer (teller)

Noes—Messrs Townsend, Burford, Wark, Young, Reynolds, Strangways (teller)

Mr REYNOLDS wished to ask the Speaker whether an hon member merely rising and asking a question as to the rule of the House was to be understood as having addressed the House He asked the question, because a short time previously he wished to show why he opposed the House going into Committee, and merely put a question to the Speaker before doing so, but in consequence of having done so, the Speaker afterwards ruled that he had already spoken

The SPEAKER said, as a general rule, asking a question upon a point of order was not addressing the House, although if the question included argument, it was

Mr STRANGWAYS also wished to put a question upon a point of privilege He had been called to order, and in obedience to that call sat down as soon as the Speaker rose, but upon the Speaker resuming his chair, he certainly thought that he (Mr Strangways) should have been permitted to resume his speech

The SPEAKER said the hon member was clearly out of order upon the occasion referred to, as he had previously spoken twice upon the same subject

The House then went into Committee

Mr REYNOLDS asked if the question which he had put would be placed upon the records of the House?

The CHAIRMAN—Certainly not

Mr REYNOLDS—Then what course——

The CHAIRMAN—Order, order The House is in Committee on the Estimates

The TREASURER would endeavor to give the House as clear and full a statement as possible of the expenditure proposed by the Government as appeared upon the Estimates upon the table, and would then proceed to state in what way it was proposed to raise the ways and means It was well known to the House that the Estimates which had been laid upon the table embraced a period of six months, ending on the 30th June next When the Governor opened the House it would be in the recollection of hon members that His Excellency explained the reasons that the Government intended to propose an Estimate for six months instead of twelve months, namely, to bring about a change in the financial year It was supposed that there would be great advantage in the annual expenditure being voted for the year commencing on the 1st July, instead of the 1st January The public expenditure involved in roads, and bridges, and railways, could be more economically arranged at that time of the year than at any other It was this circumstance which had had great influence upon the Government in making this arrangement It was, indeed, the chief influence It had been long represented to the Government, especially by the Central Road Board and the Railway Commissioners, that the expenditure upon those objects could be better carried on during the dry than the rainy season It would be a most important advantage in economy that sums should be placed at the disposal of these Boards on 1st July, because they would be enabled to make all their preliminary arrangements before the summer commenced Another advantage under the new arrangement would be that the House would not meet, or be sitting, as heretofore, at a busy season of the year—during sheep-shearing, or the wheat or hay harvest, but henceforth the Legislature would be called upon to meet about March or April, instead of in August or September as heretofore Those reasons were of sufficient importance to induce the Government to change the financial year to 1st July, and so far as he had been enabled to ascertain the feelings of the House, the change would be in accordance with their feelings The Estimates before the House, as he had already stated, merely included six months The only objection which could be raised to the new arrangement was, that it might interfere with statistical returns or statements, but that objection after all he thought was rather imaginary than real, as there would be no reason under the new system that the returns should not be made up as usual There was no reason for departing from the system which had been adopted heretofore, as quarterly accounts of receipts and expenditure would be made up as hitherto, and it would be an easy matter to arrange those returns into annual statistics to 31st December All the statistics could be arranged upon this principle, so that, he apprehended, no inconvenience could result, but even if the new arrangement did disturb these statistical returns, that would not balance against the positive loss to the public resulting from the existing system, and the inconvenience which resulted to hon members from the particular time at which the House, from necessity, had hitherto been called upon to sit He would proceed to explain these half-yearly Estimates Hon members would perceive that the total expenditure proposed for the half-year was £254,843 4s 7d Hon members would, perhaps, refer to the 5th page of the Estimates, which would enable them to follow him with greater ease The Ways and Means, it would be observed, included £10,000 for assessment on stock the total amount being £274,311 7s 7d leaving a balance at the close of the half-year of £19,468 2s 2d He did not wish at the present stage to allude in detail to the £10,000 included in the ways and means for assessment on stock, but would merely repeat that by including that sum, the total amount of ways and means was £274,311 5s 7d, leaving a balance, after deducting the proposed expenditure, of £19,468 2s 2d, so that, even assuming assessment on stock should not be allowed by the House, and deducting the £10,000 which it was assumed would be derived from that source, there would still be a clear balance in hand at the termination of the half-year of upwards of £9,000 In analyzing this expenditure, he would call the attention of the House to the mode which he had adopted, or purposed adopting, of classification From the abstract of the Estimates laid upon the table, it would be seen that they related to the permanent and fixed expenditure, in order to shew the actual cost to the Government, and the amount permanently appropriated, which the colony was bound to make provision for as distinguished from that portion of the expenditure which, though necessary for the improvement of the colony, was still variable according to the ways and means The establishments and incidental expenses, including the items under the head of Miscellaneous, amounted to £128,440 8s 0d Those were charges of a permanent character, and the amount required for railways during the half-year would be £30,755 The cost of the Government, including salaries, contingencies, allowances, education, hospital, destitute establishments All these establishments necessary for carrying on the Government amounted to £162,195 8s 0d That was one classification, the fixed expenditure Then came public works Under the head of railways the sum of £67,975 appeared—that was because he added to the sum of £57,975 the £10,000 for carrying on the Kapunda railway, the Bill for which, however, had not yet passed into law He had no reason, however, to believe that the Bill would not pass both Houses The Emigration and balance of Pension Fund amounted to, as would be seen by the abstract, 24,616*l* 16s 7d, and these three sums, the 162,195*l* 8s, the 67,975*l*, and the 24,672*l* 16s 7d made up the grand total of expenditure proposed by the Government for the first six months of the ensuing year It would strike hon members no doubt, upon looking at the Estimates, and would be made the subject of comment probably by both sides of the House, that there appeared to be an increase in the estimate for establishments, the amount being 95,195*l* 18s against 85,132*l*, 2s 7d the expenses during the corresponding period of the previous year but he would point out at once that this was a comparison between the estimated expenditure and the absolute expenditure for the same period The estimated expenditure always exceeded the absolute expenditure, because on the estimated expenditure the fullest amount was taken to meet the probable expenditure, and the Government exercised their discretion in economising that amount In illustration he might refer to the Supplementary Estimates which had been passed, where it would be seen that a very large amount was stated as the probable saving, and which, upon the whole year, that is, the current year, amounted to £19,632 on the whole estimate, so that the House must bear that in view, that the amount of £95,000 was arrived at as the estimated probable expenditure, and in comparing it with the actual expenditure there would no doubt arise those savings in the year which were always shewn in a financial statement That then would account to some extent for the difference He would proceed to give the increase and decrease which appeared upon the present Estimate, and it would be seen that so far from the expenditure having been increased by £10,000 and upwards, the increase was in reality only £2 092 Upon the item, the Governor-in-Chief there was an increase of £109 1s, Legislature, £175, Audit £25, Police £205, Gaols £135, Convicts £340, Post-Office £122 10s, Education £744 2s, Registrar of Births, &c £125, Medical £397 12s 6d, Destitute poor £200, Public offices £47 10s, Military £120 15s, Law offices £40, Supreme Court £10, Magistrates and Local Courts £890 5s, Court of Insolvency £600, Registrar General of Deaths £2164 10s, Office of Treasurer £60, Customs £140, Agent in England £50, Office of Commissioner of Crown Lands £150, Survey and Crown Lands £1,052 12s 6d, Office of Commissioner of Public Works £125, Colonial Architect £140, Railways and Tramways £105 17 6d, Observatory and Telegraphs £2118 2s 6d Those were all the increases upon the sums voted last year, but it was right he should also explain that in some of the same departments there had also been a decrease For instance under the head of Legislature there was a decrease of £357 10s, Audit £15, Police £205 Convicts £458, Education £20, Medical £375, Colonial stores £5, Military £199 2s 11d, Magistrates and Local Courts £515, Court of Insolvency £1, Treasury £20, Customs £222 10s, Coast Harbor Service £1530, South Australian Bank Agency 400*l*, Survey and Crown Lands 1,014*l* 12s, Immigration 1,600*l*, Commissioner of Public Works 25*l*, Colonial Architect 25*l*, Railways and Tramways 231*l* 15s, Observatory and Telegraphs 1,091*l* 5s The total increase was 10,382*l* 18s, and the total decrease 8,290*l* 14s 11d making the nett increase only 2,092*l* 3s 1d This would explain that the large increase which appeared on the Estimate was apparent, not real. In reference to the increase of 880*l.* to Magistrates and Local Courts, he should explain that this increase arose from the Government having placed certain Clerks at fixed salaries who were formerly paid by fees, that is, they had exchanged the amount of fees, or very nearly so, for a fixed salary. Where the salary by fees exceeded 100*l.* per annum, the Government had adopted the course of paying by a fixed salary instead of fees. This had always been the intention of the Government. When the Courts were first appointed the receipts were made the test of the salary to be paid. In the first instance the clerk received the fees, but when they amounted to a certain sum then the fees were exchanged for a fixed salary. The increased expenditure was nearly balanced on the other side by the revenue deriving the receipts from these Courts which were now transferred to the Treasury. In the Court of Insolvency there was an increase of about £600, but the principle of that increase had been allowed in the Supplementary Estimates, and arose from a change in the law. In the Registrar-General of Deaths department there was an increase of £2,164 10s., but that item had already been fully discussed and explained. In the Survey and Crown Lands department there was an increase of £1,052, but the saving in that department had been £1,014, and the difference was so small that it was unnecessary to dwell upon it. In the Commissioner of Public Work's department there was an increase of £125, and in the Colonial Architect's, of £140. In Railways and Tramways there was an increase of £105 17s. 6d., but the House would observe there had also been a saving of £231 15s. Under the head of Observatory and Telegraph, the increase appeared to be very large, but he would observe that the increase did not arise from an increase in the salaries for there had in fact been very few increases of that nature, and those only of a minor character, but the increase in the estimate arose from the necessary expansion of these departments coming under the head of reproductive works. He would proceed to give the House some idea of the number of departments which were self-supporting, so that the House would see that, although there was a large sum on the Estimates for salaries, in reality the departments to which they were paid produced a large revenue. He would select only a few. The Supreme Court cost 2,465*l.* and produced 750*l.* 8s. 7d. The Insolvent Court cost 1,055*l.*, but produced 924*l.* 0s. 5d. The Adelaide and Port Adelaide Courts cost 1,115*l.* and produced 1,296*l.* 17s. 8d. The District Courts cost 3,213*l.* 7s. 6d., and the amount received from them had been 820*l.* 18s. 7d. A further sum of 840*l.* was expected from them. Clerks and officers connected with those Courts cost 1,209*l.* 10s., but the total fines received amounted to 1,661*l.* 7s. 1d. The Post-Office cost 8,702*l.*, and the receipts were 5,989 19s. The Registration of Deeds cost 944*l.* 5s., and the amount received had been 3,001 2s. 4d. The Printing Establishment cost 1,582*l.* 10s., and the receipts had been 438*l.* 0s. 6d., but, independently of this amount, the various Government Departments had been supplied gratuitously with printing from this department, the cost of which should be added to the profits, because, if the printing had not been obtained from that source, it must have been paid for elsewhere. The public cemetery cost £287 10s., and had yielded £57 7s. 6d. The convicts cost £2,472 12s. and had yielded £1,113 4s. 3d. The labor of the convicts, in fact, paid half the entire cost of the establishment. The Customs cost £3,709 4s., and brought in £80,089 10s. 9d., thus it would be seen that the Customs revenue cost less than 5 per cent to collect. The Land and Survey Department cost £8,170 1s. 6d., and the land sold amounted to £102,284 17s. The goldfields cost £125, and had produced £103 10s. The Inspectors of Scab cost £743 2s. 6d., and produced £513 4s. The Railways had netted £2,391 16s. 5d. after paying all expenses. The Port Elliot and Goolwa Tramway cost £1,095 7s., and produced £956 19s. The Telegraphs cost £3,913 3s., and produced £753 17s. 8d. These sums were the proposed cost for the half-year of 1859, and the returns were for the half-year of 1858. He had entered thus fully into an explanation of the various items, because, otherwise, it would probably have been urged that the Government had been extravagant in increasing the expenditure at the rate proposed, but he had shewn the actual increase upon the half-year would be only £2,092, and that involved several new departments—the Registrar General's department, and an enlargement of the Telegraph department. With respect to public works and buildings, for which a large sum appeared upon the Estimates, he would call the attention of the House to one fact. It was the desire of the House to vote a much larger sum during the current year for roads and bridges than had been previously voted, and the House took from the sum intended to be appropriated for the coming year the sum of 20,000*l.*, and added it to the Supplementary Estimates for this year. The amount upon the present Estimates was consequently less by 20,000*l.* than it would otherwise have been. Under the head of miscellaneous expenditure, was included a sum of 7,000*l.*, being a subsidy for steam postal communication, and there were items of 4,500*l.* for military, for the defence of the colony, and 2,500*l.* for the collection of the census and statistics. It was proposed at the time the census was taken, also to obtain other returns. The sum of 4,500*l.* for military defences was based upon a report which had been laid upon the table of the House, which had reference to the cost of maintaining 100 volunteers. On referring to the report before the House, it would be seen that the cost of 100 volunteers, merely at 1s. an hour, sufficient to pay their travelling expenses would amount to 876*l.* 5s., and assuming that 700 were called out, which was the lowest number they ought to have, if they were to be of any use for defence at all and for anything better than amusement, the cost would be 6,139*l.* per annum; but he had fixed the annual cost at 4,500*l.*, and had taken the amount which appeared upon the Estimates as about the proximate amount for the first six months when the heaviest expenses would be incurred. He thought he had travelled through almost all the items of expenditure in a general way, and would advert to one branch of the subject, which was the classification under the head of "appropriation." He had stated to the House that the permanent appropriation for railways and other works was 33,755*l.*, and that brought him to the subject of the loan. He would state that the colony was liable for the payment of this amount every six months, being the payment of redemption and principal upon loans which had been raised upon the authority of that House. On the subject of debt he would state that the amount authorized by that House was 889,000*l.*, but that did not include the Kapunda Railway loan, which had not been included, as the Bill authorizing it had not yet become law. Under the authority to which he had referred bonds had been issued to the extent of 685,000*l.*, but the amount had been reduced by 61,000*l.* since the first issue, so that the total debt now amounted to 624,400*l.* He would not go further into the subject because he made a statement in detail in reference to it when the Supplementary Estimates were under discussion, and should be happy to furnish any further information which was required. He would now pass to the other side—the estimate of Ways and Means. Before he went into a detail of the sums which it was expected would be realized by the Government, he would make some statistical statements to the House upon which they might form an opinion of the probable prosperity of the colony during the rest of the year. Since the Supplementary Estimates had been before the House, the Customs returns showing the imports and exports for the quarter ending 30th September had been published, and they showed that the imports for the third quarter of the year amounted in value to 323,217*l.*, whilst the imports for the corresponding quarter of the previous year had been 300,832*l.*, showing an increase in the imports of 22,386*l.* This was a very trifling increase, it was true and might arise merely from a single shipment, but upon referring to the exports, he found that for the past quarter they had only been 244,531*l.*, whilst for the corresponding quarter of 1857 they were 331,525*l.*, showing a decrease in our exports for the past quarter of 86,994*l.* He should not comment upon the causes and effects of these increases and decreases, because he believed that these matters would always right themselves. As soon, for instance as the imports increased to such an extent that they ceased to find a market, importers would cease to import. He admitted that they could not judge very properly or very conclusively of the progress of the colony from any such comparison, but they might judge of its prosperity by the estimated value of its exports. To that test he would proceed to draw the attention of the House. He would read to them tables showing the staple produce exported for the quarter ending the 30th September last, as compared with similar exports for corresponding quarters in previous years. The tables were, he thought well worthy of consideration. The total value of the exports from the colony for the fourth quarter of 1856 was 415,441*l.*, for the first quarter of 1857 it was 444,899*l.*, the second quarter, 318,681*l.*, the third quarter, 331,527*l.*, the fourth quarter 614,694*l.* The first quarter of 1858 316,252*l.*, second quarter, 297,765*l.*, third quarter, 244,531*l.* The total of the exports for the first four quarters he had quoted had been 1,510,549*l.*, and for the last four 1,383,242*l.*, so that there had been a decrease during the last four quarters, there was a falling off in the value of exports of 127,307*l.* These sums were made up during the first four quarters, of various products, the value of which was as follows:—Wheat and flour, 608,318*l.*, other cereal produce, 67,090*l.*, mining produce 439,375*l.*, wool, 376,403*l.*, other produce, 19,363*l.* During the last four quarters the relative value of the exports was as follows:—wheat and flour, 492,758*l.*, other cereal produce, 50,019*l.*, mining produce, 391,084*l.*, wool, 417,445*l.*, other products, 31,936*l.*, so that the decrease in the value of wheat and flour upon the last four quarters compared with the preceding ones was in wheat and flour, 115,560*l.*, other cereal produce, 17,071*l.*, mining produce, 48,291*l.* The only items of increase were wool, 41,042*l.*, other products, 12,573*l.* These tables disclosed an important feature in colonial history which could not be too closely studied. It might be said, however, that notwithstanding the reduction in the value there had been an increased quantity exported; but this was not the case, for the tables to which he had alluded shewed that during the first four quarters, namely, the last quarter of 1856 and the first three quarters of 1857, the exports were as follow:—28,620 tons of flour, 206,568 bushels of wheat, 53,133 cwt. of copper, 45 tons of regulus, 9,333 tons of copper ore, and 416 tons of lead ore, but for the last four quarters, or the last quarter of 1857 and the first three quarters of 1858, the quantities were:—24,533 tons of flour, 199,040 bushels of wheat, 47,005 cwt. of copper, 165 tons of regulus, 5,868 tons of copper ore, and 1,700 tons of lead ore, so that there was a decrease of 4,087 tons of flour, 7,258 bushels of wheat, 6,123 cwt of copper 3 465 tons of copper ore, the only items of increase, 122 tons of regulus, and 1,284 tons of lead ore It would be seen then that there was not only a considerable decrease in the value but in the quantity of our exports The deficiency in the cereal produce shipped during the last quarter might arise from the failure in the harvest, and during the present quarter there was generally less ore and wool shipped than at other times, and again, parties might be holding back their produce in the hope of getting better prices next year, but still the facts which he had stated were on record, and he gave them to the House as he found them The effect of this diminution in exports had caused a pressure upon the money market and he could not help remarking that the produce of the land sales had been maintained in a most unexpected degree, but he would not ask the House, from that circumstance, to suppose that it would continue, because that was a source of revenue which depended upon particular lands being put up, and there had been large sales lately upon runs, the proprietors of which had bought these lands themselves, and that was a system which could not be calculated upon to continue It was impossible to strike an average in reference to such sales He would now go into details of several sources of income as they appeared upon the Estimates With regard to the revenue, he would observe that was to a great extent the data upon which they must base their expectations for the future He would inform the House what was likely to be realised to the end of this year, and explain the reasons which had induced the balance of £15 000 to be brought forward in addition to the balance formerly appearing upon the Estimates The hon gentleman went through the various items, showing that from the amount which had been received during the first nine months of the year there was every probability of the sum set down for the last three months being realised With regard to the Customs Department he held in his hand a very interesting document, showing the quantity of wine and spirits imported each year, which showed one remarkable fact of great value in connection with a branch of industry which was being developed – he alluded to the manufacture of wine It appeared from this return, as he should shortly show, that two-thirds of the wine drunk in the colony was made in the colony The quantity of wine imported to the colony did not now amount to half a gallon-per head annually In 1851 the quantity of wine imported was 69 264 gallons, of spirits, 66,516 gallons, and the population was then 66,538, the quantity of wine imported being, per head rather more than one gallon, and of spirits one gallon In 1852 the wine imported was 52,865 gallons spirits, 67 886 gallons, population 68,663 In 1853 the quantity of wine imported was 169 093 gallons, spirits, 169,992 gallons, population, 76,050 In 1854 the quantity of wine imported was 145,900 gallons, spirits, 106,418 gallons, population, 83 530 In 1855 the quantity of wine imported was 83 957 gallons, spirits 126,175 gallons population, 96,982 In 1856 the quantity of wine imported was 65,497 gallons, spirits, 131,576 gallons, population, 104,708 In 1857 the quantity of wine imported was 55,680 gallons, spirits, 134,041 gallons, population, 109,917, so that the quantity of imported wine consumed was insignificant, and this might be accounted for by the masses consuming the wine manufactured in the colony Under existing circumstances he saw no reason to suppose that the revenue during the first six months of the ensuing year would be lower than was stated upon the Estimates Taking the Land Sales, not at the figure of 1858 but at a much lower figure, that which he first assumed for this year and he hoped they would be realised In no one year had so small a sum been estimated from this source With regard to the Customs Revenue having, during the first quarter of this year received 80,000*l* from that source, there was no apprehension that the amount calculated upon would not be realised The same remark would apply to Harbor Dues and Rents As to assessment on stock, he would not state at that time what were the expectations of the Government from that source, because the House had not yet come to a decision upon the matter, and indeed further allusion to the subject might with propriety be deferred till the report of the Select Committee appointed to investigate the subject had been discussed, or till the Government had declared what course they would take in reference to the matter He had already shewn the House that, if that Bill was disallowed and the item of 10,000*l* consequently struck off, there would still be a surplus of 9,000*l* —not so insignificant a sum, when it was considered that these Estimates were only for six months and that the balance was consequently at the rate of 18 000*l* per annum With regard to the item for publicans' licenses, he thought there could be no doubt about that item being realized, as there was no indication of the number of public houses being diminished The hon gentleman went through the various other items, pointing out that there was every probability of the sums set down being realised and concluded by stating that in moving the House into Committee, he did not propose to discuss any item upon the Estimates, but intended immediately to ask the Chairman to report progress

Mr SOLOMON said that if hon members supposed he rose upon this occasion to have what was vulgarly called "a slap at the Government," they were very much mistaken He should be sorry to do anything of the kind but in the face of the documents which had been laid before the House showing the probable Ways and Means for the year 1859 he felt that he should be wanting in his duty to himself and other hon members if he failed to call attention to what he believed to be mistakes in the figures, for he believed it was beyond a doubt that some of the amounts set down could never be realised (Hear, hear) There were only one or two items to which he had paid particular attention, and to these he would now direct the attention of the House, beginning with the department of Customs The estimated income from this department was set down at 77,007*l* for the first half year, or being at the rate of 154 000*l*, as the amount of duties derivable from the Customs On referring to the year 1857 he found that the amount of duties for that year amounted to 151,960*l* He was anxious to know why, even in a trifling degree, the estimate for the present year should be above the actual receipts of 1857—why it should be set down at 154 000*l*, when the actual income of 1857 was not quite 152,000*l* He was at a loss to understand how this result was arrived at True, the hon the Treasurer had told the House that he had no doubt that the items upon which he calculated would be realised, but he (Mr Solomon) must join issue with the hon gentleman upon this point He would say that with commercial matters in the state in which they now were in the colony, for the hon the Treasurer to come down and tell the House that English importers or men in the colony who had their warehouses stocked to the very ceilings, with the bonded stores crammed, and every private store as full of goods as they could possibly be stowed, with probably enough of goods in the colony to last for the whole of the next year –under such circumstances for the hon the Treasurer to come down to the House and say that such an amount would be available from the duties on imports as he had set down, was almost an insult to the House (Hear hear) In 1857, the duties on spirits amounted to 66 971*l*, giving the enormous quantity of 130,000 gallons of spirits imported, on tobacco, the duty was 16,191*l*, giving an importation of 330,090 lbs, on tea, 5,203*l*, which would give, at 89 lbs the chest, 7 804 chests, on sugar, 5 810*l* which would give an importation of 2 900 tons on beer, 6 885*l*, giving an importation of 413 000 gals, on wine, 2,938, giving an importation of 58,763 gallons There were other items which raised the amount to 102,450*l*, besides the proceeds of ad valorem duties from which £49 417 was derived This sum of £49 417 to be obtained from articles of luxury, which could only be consumed in times of prosperity What amount of goods would therefore be requisite for next year to make up the amount of Customs duties estimated by the hon the Treasurer? We should receive a million's worth in the shape of drapery goods slops, boots and shoes and other necessaries, but with our warehouses as full as they were, this was an impossibility The hon the Treasurer asked the House in the first place to go into the question as to whether we should spend the money which he had put down as the estimated expenditure for the year, but he (Mr Solomon) thought the House would be wrong in endeavouring to spend money until hon members were quite satisfied that it was money which they could get it The hon the Treasurer had not shown this He had merely hazarded a supposition that at a time of unprecedented commercial panic and depression we were to expect as large a revenue as we had in 1857, when the country was prosperous to a degree Were we to expect a repetition of the same enormous imports this year which we had in 1857 He (Mr Solomon) would say Heaven forbid for the sake of our commercial prosperity that such should be the case (Hear hear) If it was possible that the estimate of the hon the Treasurer could be borne out by facts the colony would be in a decided state of bankruptcy, inasmuch as it would not for a considerable period be able to pay for the goods which had been imported The hon the Treasurer said he would not comment on the overplus of imports as compared with our exports inasmuch as he believed this disparity would right itself that importers abroad and also persons in this country would cease to introduce goods But if so what would be the result? Why, that it would be impossible that the amount put upon the Estimates for Customs revenue could ever be realised (Hear hear) He would take the hon the Treasurer's own argument, and would say when the disproportion between our imports and exports righted itself, then would be the time to put down an estimate such as could not be realised now when there was a commercial panic in the colony He would now refer to another point The hon the Treasurer had said he would not allude to a sum of £10,000 which appeared on the Estimates as the sum anticipated from the assessment on stock But he (Mr Solomon) as a supporter of the Government on the subject with which that vote was connected, intended to allude to it For whilst he fully held that the Committee had done their duty, he and those who supported the Government had been sold inasmuch as the Government failed to call such witnesses as would have given evidence favorable to the assessment The Government had not called witnesses who could have shewn that it was just and necessary that the assessment should be carried out Why had not the hon the Treasurer alluded to this £10,000? He contended that that hon member should have shown where the Government intended to make their stand on the matter He, as one of those who supported the Government, could not but feel indignant, for he considered that the Government had sold him It was an old commercial axiom and a true one, that "you should cut your coat according to your cloth," and certainly the House should know what they were going to spend and by what means they were to raise it before setting about spending it. But so far from doing that the hon. the Treasurer had merely laid before the House a document which could not possibly be borne out by facts. Having already referred to the Customs estimates, he was confident that commercial members of the House knew it could not be borne out by facts, and he would, therefore, leave the matter in the hands of these hon. members. He would next refer to the sales of Crown Lands, which were set down at £90,000, as he wished to know where that amount was to come from. Were the people of the colony in a position at present to buy land at that rate? He maintained that they were not, and the banks would tell hon. members that they were not. The banks for a long time past were contracting their discounts as much as possible, and these afforded the only means of purchasing land unless the land was forced on the market in such a manner as to evince a determination to sell it to the injury of every other interest of the country. It was impossible that 90,000*l.* could be available from this source, although he did not profess to know as much upon this subject as he did on that of the Customs duties; with respect to the Customs Estimates, he would still pledge his veracity, that unless a gold-field should be discovered, or some other great change took place, these estimates could not be realised. He would leave the other points of the hon. the Treasurer's statement in the hands of hon. members, as he had only risen to give vent to his opinion on those matters to which he had referred, and would probably be followed by other hon. members who were better able to deal with other portions of the statement.

Mr REYNOLDS would say a few words in reference to the land revenue. He felt fully persuaded that the sum of 90,000*l.* could not be raised from this source for the first half of 1859. The hon. the Treasurer had supplied him with an argument on this point. That hon. member stated that the land revenue was kept up by forcing the squatters' runs into the market, and the squatters were obliged to buy the land in self defence. The squatters were a wealthy class, but they had not an unlimited amount of capital, and could not, therefore, buy an unlimited quantity of land. He (Mr Reynolds) was of opinion that the Land Fund would fall off to a very serious extent. He also thought that in forcing the land into the market they would be adopting a policy far from beneficial to the colony. If the squatters were not forced to buy land by the land being forced into the market, a great deal of the money now in the hands of the squatters would find its way into the hands of the commercial community, and form a sort of floating capital. Again, we were to send a large portion of the money derived from the sale of land out of the colony for the purpose of importing labor, and that at a time when we had not sufficient money to employ the labor already in the market. There was a sum of 20,000*l.* down upon the Estimates for the first half year of 1859 for the purpose he presumed, of paying a moiety of 40,000*l.* proposed to be devoted to immigration during the year. The question was did we want this labor? Let hon. members look at the laborers working on the rail way from 3s. 6d. per day, and ask themselves whether we wanted this additional labor. The hon. member for Onkaparinga had brought forward a motion on this subject the other day, and he (Mr Reynolds) did not vote for it, believing that it could not do any good, inasmuch as the immigration could not be stopped immediately. But he felt it his duty not to vote a further sum for this purpose at present, and if the vote was persisted in, he should feel it his duty to oppose it. With regard to the Customs duties, he concurred with the hon. member, Mr Solomon; and if he wanted an argument in favor of that hon. member's views, the hon. the Treasurer had supplied it, inasmuch as he stated that we were now using native wines to a considerable extent, which would cause a considerable falling off in the import of spirits and other imported articles. There was also a large quantity of goods in stock in the country, upon which duty was already paid, so that we should be prepared for a falling of in the Customs. The Government should have placed upon the table the quarterly Customs' returns up to the end of September, which he (Mr Reynolds) had not received, and which he believed was not printed. Hon. members had received the returns of revenue and expenditure, but he referred to those of imports and exports. He had the returns for the year ending 31st December, but could not find the quarterly return amongst his papers, and he found it a great disadvantage, as it had prevented his making certain calculations. The relation of our imports and exports was not in the healthy ratio he would wish to see maintained, although it was true that the exports were large. In 1856 as compared with 1855, the imports showed a fractional increase of say 20,000*l.*, whilst the exports showed an increase of 100 per cent. In 1857 as compared with 1858, the population had increased about 6 per cent., the imports about 40 per cent., and the exports only about 25 per cent., being an increase of exports of 300,000*l.* over and above imports. But the three quarters of 1858 show an increase of nearly 400,000*l.* of imports over exports, and a large falling off of staple products. These facts showed that we had not the materials to export which we had in previous years, whilst the prospects of the coming year were not so cheering as he could wish them. It therefore became us to be very chary of keeping up expensive public establishments. We should use the pruning knife freely in order to keep up something like a proportionate ratio between our income and expenditure. The rate per head of the ordinary revenue to the population in 1850, was 43s., whilst the cost of establishments or rather the sum required for the purposes of government, amounted to but 26s., per head of the population. But in 1858, he found that whilst the revenue averaged about 42s. per head the cost of Government was 37s., or an increase in proportion to the population of about 50 per cent. for cost of government. It was time to strike out some more moderate and economical course, and to reduce the cost of government, which now amounts to 190,000*l.* or 200,000*l.* If the Government struck out the 12,000*l.* for immigration, it might to a great extent meet the deficiency caused by the assessment on stock, that is if the Government were not disposed to go on with the assessment. He did not know whether the sum for Immigration would be struck out of the Estimates, but he would be glad to support the Government in dispensing with it. He did not know in what position the Government would place him in reference to it. He thought the Government was right in putting the sum on the Estimates, for they had no right to suppose what the House thought upon the subject, and they of course put the sum on to test the feeling of the House. He would not refer at present to other items which he would like to strike out or modify. The first was the snagboat on the Murray, about which he had a little to say, but he would not trouble the House at present.

Mr STRANGWAYS remarked that the Estimates showed a deficiency of 10,000*l.* in the revenue as compared with that of last year, for which he could not account. Towards the end of the Estimates he saw a considerable sum for public works and buildings, but the hon. the Treasurer had not informed the House what course he intended to pursue in respect of these. Neither did the hon. member refer to the Public Works Bill which he (Mr Strangways) understood was thrown out in the Upper House. The Government should have referred to this matter and informed the House whether they meant to take further action in reference to it at present or whether a further vote would be necessary. The hon. the Treasurer had however left the House entirely in the dark on these points. There was a considerable increase on the Estimates for the Surveyor-General's department, and that of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and nearly 10,000*l.* was absorbed by the New Lands Titles Registration department. The question of the assessment on stock had not been alluded to by the hon. the Treasurer. With respect to the vote for Immigration he thought it might be desirable that instructions should be sent to the agent in England desiring him only to send out immigrants at the rate of one ship each two months instead of one ship per month as at present. Whilst he was opposed to the entire stoppage of immigration, he thought it desirable that it should be regulated fairly in accordance with the supply and demand for labor. But hon. members should bear in mind when they came to deal with this matter, that any action they might take in reference to the question could not take effect in the colony for six months at least. He hoped hon. members would not be led away by any impression that their refusal to grant this money would have any effect on the superfluity of labor here, if there was a superfluity, for some time to come. He would merely call attention to Parliamentary Paper 118, on the trenching of the Parliament Houses ground, where they would find some explanation of the alleged superfluity of labor. The items of expenditure could be best considered in detail, but there was one statement of the hon. the Treasurer which surprised him (Mr Strangways), that was, that the exportation of copper was less by 6,000 tons than it had been during the previous year. He (Mr Strangways) believed that the annual export did not amount to 6,000 tons, and he thought that either the hon. the Treasurer had made a mistake, or he (Mr Strangways) and some other hon. members, must have misunderstood him.

The CHAIRMAN then put the item—

Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor, £200.

The TREASURER said that he had already stated he meant to move that the items be proceeded with on a future day. If, however, hon. members wished to proceed at once with some unimportant items, he would do so.

Mr REYNOLDS understood the items were not to be proceeded with.

The item was then agreed to, and on the motion of the Treasurer, the House resumed, and the Chairman having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again the following day.

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The House went into Committee on this Bill, resuming its consideration at clause 61.

Clauses 61 to 67 inclusive, were agreed to without discussion.

On clause 68, "Money to be paid into bank, and payments to be made through the banks,"

Mr YOUNG suggested that the Councils should have the power of paying small sums without restriction.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in his own experience of District Councils, had found the proposed plan much more convenient.

Mr Harvey moved that Councils should be compelled to pay in any money they might possess upwards of 5*l*

Mr Peake supported this clause

Mr Neales also supported the clause believing it to be a great advantage that everything should appear in the cheque book There were constantly cases arising in the Councils which proved the necessity for some such regulation as the one proposed The Observer newspaper contained a library of information in support of this view of the matter

Mr Mildred supported the clause

Mr Rogers suggested that the cheques should be signed both by the Chairman and the Clerk of the Council

Mr Glyde moved that the word "all" be prefixed to the clause, and that the words "within seven days after the receipt thereof" be inserted, and the words "and countersigned by the Clerk" be added

The amendment for the insertion of the word "all" was agreed to

Some desultory discussion ensued, in which various limits were proposed to be set to the amount retainable in the hands of the Council

Mr Rogers proposed that the clause should provide that no money should be paid except by cheque As the clause stood, it was possible to pay sums of money otherwise than by cheque

Mr Duffield proposed, as an amendment, that "all moneys of every District Council should be paid into the bank whenever the sums amounted to £20, and that no money should be paid except by cheque"

Mr Mildred thought the latter portion of the amendment would be inconvenient, as very often small amounts were required to be paid away He objected to the limitation of the amount to £20 to be paid in, as it would be quite possible for an officer of a District Council to keep £19 19s 6d in his breeches pocket for a considerable period, and so evade the provision He proposed that the clause should be altered, compelling the money to be banked when it amounted to £10, also, that all moneys above £5 paid should be paid by cheque

Mr Duffield's amendment was then put and carried, and the clause as amended was then passed, and stands as follows —"That all moneys of every District Council, whenever the same amounts to £20, shall be paid into some bank, and no money shall be paid except by cheque, signed by the Chairman and one other Councillor"

Clause 69, "Assessment of Rateable Property"

Mr Mildred asked the Attorney-General if he would explain what was meant by the expression, "estimated annual value?"

The Attorney-General said that as it was understood in England, it was what a person as tenant would give from year to year for any property For instance, if a vineyard were planted the "estimated annual value" was what rental it would fetch, or if a man rented a piece of ground it was what he would be able to pay in rent that would enable him to plough sow and reap it for his advantage This was the course adopted in England in deciding the annual value of any property

Mr Strangways asked whether it was not usual at home to deduct the outgoings from the annual value

The Attorney-General said that what the tenant paid in England in the shape of rental was paid after those outgoings were liquidated Of course what a tenant would give in the shape of rental would be a net amount after reckoning the expense of ploughing, sowing, reaping, and getting in his grain

Mr Shannon thought it a great hardship that farming improvements should be taxed This clause was the most objectionable part of the District Councils Act In his district there was no Council established, and he had pointed out the advisability of having one, but he had been always met with the answer that so long as the present assessment was continued there would be no steps taken to establish one, for all the improvements a farmer made upon his property only involved his being rated at a higher assessment He considered the tax upon improvements put a damper upon any desire to improve one's property, and he should therefore propose, as an amendment, that farming improvements should be exempt from this assessment

Mr Mildred was sorry to say that the Attorney-General's answer to him was not a satisfactory reply to his question For instance, the South Australian Company had land in the town, some of which was valueless, and other portions of great value, and he would like to know how the Attorney-General's principle could be applied to such property, as well as to throw some light upon his own mind in the event of his being called upon as a Magistrate to adjudicate in such cases If his mind was not satisfied on this point, he should propose that instead of "property," and "annual," they should substitute the words subject to the usual covenants of a lease for 21 years

Mr Strangways said the hon member's proposition was untenable, as there would be as much difficulty in ascertaining the annual value under a 21 years lease, as in the case as it now stood In the present state of the Act, the district obtained advantages from the use of unoccupied land, but the proposition of the hon member for Noarlunga would tend to do away with this He believed the present system worked well, and he should oppose the amendment, as it tended, if possible, to make confusion worse confounded

Mr Mildred said he would tax land, but not improvements nor industry, and whether by District Councils or by the State, he would impose a general rate, and if that were not sufficient he would double it The "annual assessment" was not a just or proper way of raising the revenue

The Attorney-General said the doctrine held by the hon member for Noarlunga was certainly a convenient one, and one which would be certainly approved by those who were only self-interested, but he supposed that if persons escaped paying the revenue in one way they would have to pay in another He could understand with the hon member for the Light that it was hard for persons to pay for their improvements, but then it must be remembered that the probability was that those persons who improved their property became more necessitated to use the roads than others, and were, therefore, entitled to pay in a greater proportion than others for these conveniences The principle hitherto adopted was one which had been recognised ever since local taxation was introduced It was a principle which had been adopted in Europe for centuries, and was he, thought one as free from objection as any other

Mr Peake agreed that if the principle of the hon member for Noarlunga could be introduced, it would, as well as to himself, be a salve to many persons But it was a well recognised fact in political economy that as property increased in value, so did the necessities for improvement increase With respect to the Attorney-General's definition of the words annual value, he would say that it was the custom at home, if he did not mistake, to empower the valuator to deduct a certain amount from the annual value as would pay for repairs, improvements, &c, and then it was usual to determine the residue as the rateable value Perhaps the Attorney-General might deem it advisable to introduce such a system here, say deduct one fourth or one-fifth from the gross annual value, and let the remainder stand as the rateable value

Mr Duffield said the doctrine of the hon member for Noarlunga was certainly a new one, and one that privately he should have no objection to see carried out in his own district The sense of that hon gentleman's proposition was this, that he, as Chairman of the District Council of East Torrens, might, in directing the assessor to assess the property of the district, say to him, "Now, this is the property, but you are not to take it as you find it, but as it was in 1840 ("No, no," from Mr Mildred) The hon member said "No, no," but that was surely the sense of his proposition, if improvements were not to be assessed, and he thought it to be a fallacy He (Mr Duffield) had had several arguments with gentlemen in the country, but he could never bring them to a point, nor could they give any reason for their faith, except that it should be so He thought the House would find no suggestion so much to the purpose as the course which was at present laid down in the Act The only amendment he should propose was, that the last five words should be struck out which provide that the Assessment Book should not be deposited in public-houses, as he thought this would be an inconvenient restriction, the public-house being very often the most suitable place to deposit the Assessment Book The matter might be left with the Councils

Mr Mildred could not but express his gratification that there were other gentlemen, as the last speaker had intimated, who held opinions similar to his own He would explain, with reference to the views he had stated to the House, that he did not intend it to be implied for one moment that he would place the assessment on land at its first cost, which in some cases was 12s per acre, but that they should commence at once, say to morrow, and take the present annual value, and not include any future improvements A section of land near Adelaide, worth 1,000*l*, he would assess at 1,000*l*, and another, at Mount Remarkable, he would rate at its proper value He knew this step was in advance of the practice in England, but it was not the only thing in which we were in advance of the mother country, and he felt proud of it He repeated that he did not intend for a moment to shackle the industry of the poor man

Dr Wark had no doubt of the clause having a prejudicial effect It was a difficulty which at present they did not see their way out of It tended to retard improvements There was one point which struck him after he heard the Attorney-General's definition of the "estimated annual value" and that was this He would suppose a person laid out a vineyard and that it remained unserviceable for the first four or five years, would such property be rated during its unoccupancy He thought in such a case the assessment should not be levied

Mr Hay thought some alteration was requisite so that improvements should not be taxed The hon member for the City (Mr Solomon) had very forcibly pointed out on the absentee question the disadvantage which the improver of property was at to those who allowed their land to be idle, and he thought it was an apposite argument in this case He thought in any alteration they might make they should define some improvements which should be exempt from taxation, and others which should be liable to it He supported the amendment that the covenant for a 21 years' lease should be considered a rule as to the annual value, as he thought it would to a certain extent meet the difficulty which had been raised

Mr Lindsay was perfectly sensible to the objection against this clause, but did not see how it was to be got over. It was a difficulty which had been experienced in his district. He was aware that the objection had been met by some District Councils, although in an illegal manner, and that was by instructing the valuator to assess that description of improvement likely to yield an annual return, such as in clearing land and fencing: whilst houses, or what were considered as conveniences, were exempt. It was certainly an illegal act, as the terms of the District Councils Act were not thereby complied with, which implied that all improvements should be rated. He did not see, however, that it was possible to introduce any system which would obviate this difficulty.

The clause was then passed, the only amendment in it being the omission of the last five words, which left it optional to deposit the Assessment Book at a licensed public-house.

The House resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Wednesday next.

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The further consideration of this Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Friday.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

The consideration of report of Committee of the whole House on the Civil Service Bill was postponed until Friday.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK.

Mr. PEAKE put the question to the Commissioner of Crown Lands, standing in his name seriatim: First, "Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed further with the Assessment on Stock Bill this session?"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS: Unless the report of the Select Committee should be adopted by the House, the Government does intend to proceed further with the Bill.

Mr. PEAKE would then ask, secondly, "Whether this House is to understand that the present Government, in proposing to place an assessment on the stock depasturing on the Waste Lands of the Crown, held under lease for 14 years at 10s. per square mile, does so with a view to supplement the rent for which those Waste Lands are now let?"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS—The Government in proposing to place an assessment upon stock, intended to make the occupiers of the waste lands of the Crown held under pastoral leases contribute more equally to the public revenue than at present.

Mr. PEAKE asked, thirdly, "Whether, in the event of an assessment on stock being adopted as a supplemental payment of rent for such Waste Lands, any distinction as to their liability for assessment for purposes of General Revenue will be made between lessees holding their leases under the present Waste Lands Regulations, and those persons who hold their leases under the regulations previously in force in this colony; and if so, what will be the nature of such distinction?"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS—The details of the Bill explain how it is proposed to deal with old and new runs.

Mr. PEAKE asked fourthly and lastly, whether the leases of Crown Lands holding under the present Waste Lands Regulations, can claim an exemption from assessment on the ground that they hold their leases under an implied covenant that the runs are not to be assessed for purposes of General Revenue."

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS—No exemption can be claimed on the grounds stated.

PETITION OF JOHN FINNIS.

An extension of time (till next Wednesday) was given to bring up the Report of the Select Committee on the petition of John Finnis.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES.

Mr. STRANGWAYS asked the Attorney-General whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this session to define Parliamentary privileges.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was the intention of the Government to do so, and he hoped by the middle of next week to be in a position to ask for leave to introduce such a measure.

The House then adjourned to 1 o'clock next day.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12.

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Several notices of motion were given.

POINT OF ORDER.

Captain HART rose to a point of order, which he considered one of great importance, so much so that he believed the hon. the Speaker and the House would see the necessity of considering it at once. The point which he alluded to was in reference to the ruling of the Speaker on the previous day upon the motion of the Treasurer that the Speaker leave the chair, and the House resolve itself into Committee upon the Estimates. He thought that the hon. the Speaker, upon consideration, would feel that his ruling upon that occasion was not in accordance either with the rules and regulations of that House or of the House of Commons. In the first place he would remark that there could be a debate upon any motion except two, the one was when the House was called upon to divide, and the other was that the House adjourn. Those were the only two questions which could be put from the chair upon which no debate could take place, and any debates which took place upon any other motion would be perfectly in order. On that point alone he believed that the hon. the Speaker would feel that he was wrong, and that the hon. member who wished to move an amendment was perfectly in order in so doing, but the particular question before the House was one in which the ruling of the Speaker was directly opposed to the custom of the House of Commons. The question was one on which, when brought before the House of Commons, more amendments arose than on any other which was put to the House of Commons. It appeared to him that the ruling of the Speaker arose from a mistake in having confused the question brought before the House on the previous day with that which immediately succeeded the reading of the Queen's speech, that the House on a certain day go into Committee for the purpose of voting supplies for Her Majesty's service. That, however, was not the corresponding question which was before the House on the previous day. The question which was before the House on the previous day corresponded with the motion for the House of Commons going into Committee on supplies. The question that supplies should be voted to Her Majesty was always passed without comment or debate. The question before the House on the previous day, however, was for going into Committee upon the Estimates. On that question, in 1837, being put to the House of Commons, there were 85 amendments. The question that the House go into Committee on supplies was 85 times put to the House, and out of the 85 times there were only 14 upon which it did go. He had always understood that it was a portion of the rights of the Commons of England that upon the question of supply was the proper time for bringing forward every grievance which the Commons had before going into Committee. It appeared to him that the ruling of the Speaker was most inappropriate in that respect, particularly at the present time, when so many things might be urged for a postponement of the consideration of the Estimates, when a Select Committee was sitting upon a question of taxation, and when it had not been determined whether there should be an assessment upon stock or not. Before the question of going into Committee had been decided, if amendments had been allowed, it would in all probability have been determined that there should be a postponement till the questions to which he had alluded had been settled. He contended that the ruling of the Speaker was against all rules and regulations of the House of Commons, and was directly opposed indeed to the very principle which governed the House of Commons in reference to this question. The hon. member quoted from "Hansard" what took place in the House of Commons in 1837, when on a motion of supply to be considered in the whole House, 85 amendments were brought forward, and only in 14 instances was the question considered. On each occasion that the motion was brought forward, some hon. member rose with some notice of motion, and all matters of grievance were brought forward. For instance, one hon. member referred to a disgraceful assault committed by the military in the city of Bradford, and another hon. member asked whether a question which had recently arisen in Canada had been brought under the notice of the Ministry. In fact every grievance which the Commons had to complain of was brought forward and considered, a debate ensuing on each—and these amendments, if he might so term them, were perfectly in order upon the motion for going into a Committee of Supply. He thought the House and even the hon. the Speaker must now agree that the Speaker was in error on the previous day in ruling that there should be no debate and no amendment upon the motion. He believed the point was a most important one, and might mention that had he been in the House on the previous day, when the motion for going into Committee was made, he should certainly have advocated a postponement till the question of assessment on stock had been determined upon and till it had become known whether the Committee upon taxation recommended any alteration in the mode of raising the revenue. According to the Speaker's ruling it would have been impossible that the Estimates as a whole could have been debated. Neither the financial position of the country nor the necessity for any change could have been discussed. Nothing in fact could have been entered upon but the particular item which was proposed. The debate must have been confined to that item, and that which was of so much importance to the country, the Estimates themselves, or any matters of grievance, could not have been brought forward. It was most important that the practice of the House of Commons should be followed in this respect. By the Standing Order 198 of the House of Commons, questions upon supply and ways and means were excepted from the general rule, that when once considered in Committee, the Speaker should leave the Chair without the question being put. On the very question of Estimates, which corresponded to the question of Ways and Means, it was competent that a debate should take place after having been in Committee. Although a great part, or any part, of the Estimates had been considered previously, a debate could take place every time that the House went into Committee. This was sufficient to shew that the Speaker in his ruling of the previous day had departed in an extraordinary way from the practice of the House of Commons. He felt, when he entered the House on the previous day, that it was impossible the House could be in Committee, feeling assured that there would have been a long debate upon the financial policy of the Government, a debate which would probably have extended over three or four days. He was surprised when he entered the House to find that the salary of the Private Secretary was under consideration. He thought the hon. the Speaker would, upon consideration, feel that he had committed an error, and he should propose that upon the next occasion that the Order of the Day was called on for going into Committee, there should be a free and open debate upon the general financial policy of the Government.

The SPEAKER asked if the hon. member would be kind enough to point out the particular ruling to which he alluded.

Captain HART said that, according to the Advertiser, Hansard, and statements made to him by various hon. members, the Speaker had ruled that no amendment could be put upon the question, that the House resolve itself into Committee upon the Estimates. He had understood that the Speaker had ruled it was the custom of the House of Commons, upon going into Committee of Supply, which corresponded with our going into Committee upon the Estimates, that there should be no debate or amendments.

The SPEAKER said if the hon. member had been in the House on the previous day at the time the circumstance to which he alluded took place, he could not have been led into the error of supposing that the Speaker had ruled as the hon. member had stated. So far from having ruled that there could be no amendment upon the motion that the House go into Committee, he had clearly and distinctly stated that it was in the power of any hon. member to move such amendment, but it was not moved. It was however totally unusual in the House of Commons to throw any obstacle in the way of the financial statement being made to the House. The hon. gentleman quoted from May, to shew that his statements in reference to the practice of the House of Commons and his ruling on the previous day were perfectly correct. He had carefully looked through "Hansard," and could not find any instance on record in which the House of Commons dissented from the Minister making the financial statement when the proper time came. Even after an amendment upon the motion that the House go into Committee had been carried, it was still competent that the Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, should move the House into Committee.

Mr STRANGWAYS stated that he understood what the hon. member for the Port, and he and other hon. members objected to was, that any member of the Government should be permitted, upon moving the House into Committee, to make any statements which he might think proper, and yet that other hon. members should not be permitted to give any reasons for their opposition. That he understood to be the opinion of the hon. member for the Port, and he must say he thoroughly coincided. Whether there was any record or not of any such instance having occurred in the House of Commons was not the question. The simple fact of there being no record of any amendment having been moved when the motion was brought forward in the House of Commons, was no proof whatever that such an amendment would be out of order. It was quite possible that such a course might be perfectly in order, although there was no record of any such course having been pursued in the House of Commons. He objected to the Treasurer being allowed to make a financial statement and to enter into the question of the Estimates, urging reasons that the House should go into Committee upon them, and yet that no other hon. member should be permitted to urge reasons that the House should not go into Committee. Again, he begged to call the attention of the Speaker to another point of order. On the previous day he (Mr Strangways) was called to order and resumed his seat upon being so, but the point of order having been settled, upon resuming his speech the Speaker ruled that he had previously spoken and could not again address the House. Upon afterwards bringing this matter under the notice of the Speaker the hon. gentleman said that he (Mr Strangways) was clearly out of order in again addressing the House, as he had previously addressed the House twice upon the same subject. That, however, was not the reason which the Speaker assigned when he called him to order, the reason assigned by the hon. gentleman was that he was travelling from the question, and not that he had spoken twice previously. The hon. member for Onkaparinga (Mr Townsend) rose to oppose the motion for going into Committee, and subsequently he (Mr Strangways) rose, but had no sooner done so than the hon. member (Mr Townsend) rose to a point of order. He (Mr Strangways) rose a second time, upon which the hon. member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) rose to a point of order. Some discussion took place, but he (Mr Strangways) had in reality not addressed the House, but had merely resumed his seat in consequence of being called to order. As he had previously stated, he was prevented from resuming his address after the point of order had been disposed of. What he wished to know was, whether upon a member being interrupted upon a a point of order, and that point of order having been disposed of, he was not at liberty to resume his address to the House.

The SPEAKER said that the Treasurer in bringing the Estimates before the House on the previous day had not made a financial statement, but the hon. the Treasurer took the course which he did because the House had twice before refused to hear the financial statement. When an hon. member upon addressing the House was called to order, upon the point of order having been decided, he was at liberty to resume his address, but he would remind the hon. member that he allowed several matters to be discussed before he again rose, and in consequence of that it was ruled that he had already spoken.

Mr REYNOLDS thought that the Speaker would find his ruling on the previous day rather contradictory. When the hon. member for Onkaparinga asked if it was not competent to move an amendment, the Speaker said there was not an instance upon record of the House of Commons ever having refused to go into Committee. (The Speaker said that he had made some additions to his remarks, which appeared in the Hansard, which would render them more intelligible.) His (Mr Reynolds's) memory corroborated the statement which appeared in the Hansard. The question which arose in his mind on the previous day was whether any hon. member did not possess as much right to urge reasons for not going into Committee, as the Treasurer had to urge reasons for taking that step. The hon. the Speaker stopped him when he was making some observation to this effect, for it did strike him at the time as being contrary to the practice of the House of Commons to allow the Treasurer to state reasons for going into Committee, and, at the same time, to prevent other hon. members from making contrary statements.

The SPEAKER had most distinctly stated that any hon. member had full power to move any amendment he pleased. The hon. member for the Port was in error in assuming that he would not be at liberty to discuss the whole question of the financial statement when in Committee. Several hon. members, indeed, did so address the House in opposition to the reasonings of the Treasurer. Two hours were occupied by the address of the Treasurer, and the addresses of other hon. members in opposition.

Mr PEAKE wished to know whether, in future, when the Treasurer or the head of the Government moved that the House go into Committee of Supply, any hon. member would be at liberty to move an amendment to the effect that the House do not go into Committee.

The SPEAKER said that any amendment whatever could be put.

Captain HART thought the House scarcely felt in a right position at present. For his own part he knew that the ruling of the Speaker was that the particular item which was before the Committee was the only one which could be considered or debated. That had been the Speaker's ruling in many cases, and he (Captain Hart) had been debarred from going into the question of the Estimates by the Speaker's ruling that on the question being put that the House should go into Committee upon the Estimates, there should be no debate. If the Speaker were against him on that point, and still contended that his ruling was in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons, he could only say it appeared to him that it was not so by the public documents which were before the House. Those documents showed that the longest and most frequent debates were raised upon the question before the House on the previous day, whether the House should go into Committee upon the Estimates.

The SPEAKER said the hon. member entirely misapprehended him. He had stated over and over again that upon the motion that the House go into Committee, it was quite competent for any hon. member to move an amendment, but there was no instance of any amendment having been made when the object in view was merely to make the financial statement, as the House generally was too anxious to hear the statement. The debate on the budget, on the other hand, was large and extended, and might extend over several days.

Captain HART believed that the ruling of the Speaker had arisen from a misapprehension in mixing up with the question, similar to that which was before the House on the previous day, one which was invariably agreed to without contradiction, which was, that the House agree to grant supplies for Her Majesty's service. On the question, however, corresponding to that which had been before the House on the previous day, there was invariably a long and protracted debate. It was then perfectly in order to bring forward any question of grievance without notice. It was quite possible that many hon. members might have such notices to bring forward, but they would be stopped from doing so by the Speaker's ruling.

The SPEAKER said that he had stated over and over again that the rule was that hon. members might bring forward any amendments they liked on the motion for going into Committee on the Estimates. He always admitted that there were many scores of motions which were discussed upon the motion that the Speaker leave the chair.

Captain HART hoped the House would agree to the proposition which he was desirous of bringing forward, that when the Order of the Day came on, that the Speaker should leave the chair and the House go into Committee of Supply, there should be a free and open debate upon the question of the Estimates. It was quite clear that hon. members who desired to open up a debate on the broad question of the Estimates, would be prevented from doing so by the Speaker's ruling of the previous day

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would make one or two remarks He had not been in the House on the previous day when the circumstances which had been referred to occurred, but he would state that he had always understood that the practice of the House of Commons was, that on the first proposition of what was there analogous to going into Committee upon the Estimates here, there was never any opposition or debate He believed the first motion was merely for the purpose of enabling the Minister to develop the financial policy of the Government No discussion upon the financial policy or the revenue of the country took place when the House was moved in Committee upon the Estimates, but when the House was moved into Committee of Supply, then any amendment which any hon member might think proper could be brought forward If any member, for instance, thought that a policeman in passing a chapel had not paid sufficient respect, he could move that he be censured, or if he considered that prisoners in a gaol had not been properly treated he could bring the circumstance under the notice of the House, in fact, any grievance which hon members wished to bring before the House or the country could be brought forward, because it was competent for any hon member, without notice, to move an amendment upon the motion for going into Committee of Supply He was quite sure there was not one instance of a discussion upon the Estimates when out of Committee Looking at the report of the Advertiser and Hansard, it appeared that the Speaker refused to allow discussion upon the Estimates before they were in Committee, but it appeared by the report that, upon two or three occasions, the Speaker intimated that any amendment would be in order and, if put, it, of course, ought to be discussed As he understood the rule, it was that after the House was in Committee, there might be a discussion upon the general question, and when this had been settled it was for the convenience of the House and the promotion of the service of the country, that members should confine themselves to particular items under discussion He believed that the opinion which the hon the Speaker had expressed with respect to the usages of the House of Commons was in precise conformity with the practice of that House

Mr SOLOMON said as this discussion had arisen in some measure in consequence of his having risen to address the House on the previous day, he would say a few words He had voted for going into Committee upon the Estimates, because the hon the Speaker had ruled that he was out of order in referring to certain matters, the House not being in Committee, but it appeared to him then, and had so since upon mature deliberation, that it was precisely the time which should have been selected for the discussion of such questions, when he was stopped in doing so If they were not to handle various matters before going into Committee it was quite clear that after they had gone in Committee, they would have no opportunity of doing so The question which he had been desirous of discussing was where were the supplies to be drawn from to meet the items which, when in Committee, they would be called upon to vote It did appear so him, without any reference to the practice of the House of Commons, that it was singular members should be prevented from shewing the fallacy of the figures of which the revenue was made up before going into Committee for the purpose of voting away that revenue He bowed with due submission to the ruling of the Speaker, and should always do so, but he believed that ruling was not in accordance with the general desire of the House He should not pretend to say whether or not it was in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons The Treasurer having exposed his budget, he believed that was the proper time for him (Mr Solomon) to make the observations which he was desirous of making when he was stopped by the ruling of the Speaker

The SPEAKER said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might see reason to alter the Ways and Means, so that it was impossible the House could be in possession of what they were until they had heard what he had to say

Mr SOLOMON supposed he was in possession of the Ways and Means for 1859, when he received the document which he then held in his hand, but if it were not intended to rely upon the document which had been placed before the House he did not see how hon members could come to a proper conclusion hastily in Committee, when they would be engaged in disposing of each item separately It might have been foolish on his part to suppose so, but he certainly understood that the Ways and Means which were relied upon by the hon the Treasurer and the Government were developed in the document which had been placed before hon members If, however, he understood that it was within the province of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to alter and vary the Ways and Means, it appeared to him it would be useless for hon members to direct their attention to them until they came on for discussion in Committee He always understood that the Budget, as developed in the Ways and Means which were laid before hon members, was that upon which the Treasurer intended to rely, but if that were not the case, he was perfectly in the dark as to what was the usual course On the previous day, no sooner had the House gone into Committee than the first item, the Private Secretary's salary, was moved, and consequently the House had no chance of going into the whole question He wished to know, when the House went into Committee and a particular item was proposed, if hon members would be liable to be called to order merely for veering from one particular item and going to others?

The SPEAKER said the hon member totally misapprehended the real state of the case The House had full power, when a particular item was under discussion, to enter upon the whole question of the Ways and Means The Ways and Means were open to discussion at all times, although only one particular item might be under consideration The hon member himself exemplified this the day before

Mr SOLOMON repeated that it appeared to him on the previous day and did so still, that the proper time to discuss the whole question of the probable Ways and Means was before the House went into Committee The hon the Speaker, however, had ruled to the contrary and he had bowed with due submission to the Speaker's ruling He could understand, from what had fallen from previous speakers, what was the practice of the House of Commons upon this point, but he could not understand how upon a debtor and creditor account being presented to them, they could vote what appeared upon one side without seeing what was on the other, and where the necessary supplies were to come from If it were the practice of the House of Commons blindly to vote away money without first ascertaining where it was to come from, he could only say, that he and other hon members disapproved of such a course being adopted here

The TREASURER thought the discussion which had taken place might enlighten hon members upon points which had been hitherto obscure When the old Legislature was in existence, the Treasurer made his statement before going into Committee but when the old Legislature was done away with and two Houses of Legislature were substituted, it was considered better to adopt the usages of the House of Commons There was some difficulty at first in getting hon members to understand the change of systems, that which was formerly adopted certainly not being in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons It appeared to him that it was from the practice which existed in the old Legislature, and the change which had subsequently taken place, that the present confusion had arisen He regarded the Budget as a notice of motion for consideration at a future time till the Treasurer made a statement upon the paper which had been placed in the hands of hon members, but the Estimates could not be discussed till the House was in Committee Therefore it was that the Treasurer moved the House in Committee in order that the Estimates might be discussed with such explanation as the Treasurer had given, and that was what he took to be what was called in the House of Commons the budget That, indeed, was the only time at which the Chancellor of Exchequer in England or the Treasurer here could enter upon an explanation, for he would be in an unfair position if hon members were to be at liberty to enter upon a debate upon the Ways and Means before he had made his explanation in reference to them After the Treasurer had so explained then every member was at liberty to speak as often as he liked There was no mistake apparently upon this point on the previous day, for the hon member, Mr Solomon, and, several others, did attack the Estimates He would remind the House that the course which he had taken on the previous day had been pursued previously If he remembered right, when Mr Torrens was Treasurer, the House first went into Committee, and the hon gentleman then made his financial statement It was only in Committee that questions affecting revenue and expenditure could be discussed His remarks in the first instance had been explanatory, and for the purpose of deprecating discussion, as it appeared that the House were inclined to discuss the whole question before going into Committee, forgetting probably that the practice of the House was now different from what it was under the old Legislature What he had endeavoured to do was merely to prevent discussion till he had explained

Mr GLYDE said it might perhaps remove some misunderstanding if the hon the Speaker would favor him with his opinion and advice upon a matter which would probably be brought under the attention of the House that afternoon He believed that in the course of the afternoon the House would be asked to go into Committee upon the Estimates, and he had prepared a motion upon the general policy of the Government in a financial sense, although he did not wish to move an amendment upon the motion for going into Committee But he presumed if he allowed the House to go into Committee without bringing forward the amendment, the Treasurer would be in possession of the Chair, and as he observed the first item in the Estimates was the salary of the Messenger, he presumed that the Speaker would rule that the discussion must be confined to that item Under such circumstances, as he did not wish to be so limited, he wished to know what course he had better pursue, or when he had better bring forward his motion or amendment Perhaps the Speaker would kindly explain

The SPEAKER could hardly give an opinion without seeing the form of the motion alluded to by the hon member He did not know the nature of the motion, but it would be perfectly competent for the hon member to move any amendment he pleased upon the motion, that the Speaker leave the chair If that amendment were carried it would subsequently be quite competent for the Treasurer to move the original motion. The hon. member could move any amendment he pleased.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought that the whole of this debate had arisen from the ignorance of some hon. members of the 343rd Standing Order, which distinctly provided that matters affecting finance should be discussed only in Committee of the whole House. Nothing could be more distinctly laid down than the broad principle that matters affecting finance must be discussed in Committee of the whole House. He recollected a very similar debate to the present taking place when the financial statement was made for the first time in Committee, consequent upon the change in the Legislature alluded to by his hon. colleague the Treasurer. The Treasurer moved the first item, which was a mere formal motion, and when this was made on the previous day, he was quite surprised that there were not more speeches, for it was quite competent for hon. members to discuss the whole question of finance, but they must be in Committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND said that although he bowed to the ruling of the Speaker on the previous day, he certainly differed from it. Although the 343rd Standing Order rendered it imperative that matters of finance should be discussed only in Committee of the whole House, the Treasurer, upon moving that the Speaker leave the chair, was allowed to enter into an explanation affecting the Estimates, and not only indeed went into the Estimates, but into figures. To one new to Parliamentary life it appeared strange that the hon. the Treasurer should be allowed to make the statement which he did, and that no other hon. member should be at liberty to reply. He presumed that the Speaker was right in ruling that hon. members had not the right of reply, but he presumed that the mistake really made by the Speaker was in allowing the Treasurer to make the statement which he did. The hon. member referred to "May" to shew that the attempt to establish an analogy between the practice here and the practice of the House of Commons had failed, as in the House of Commons the Chancellor of Exchequer moved certain resolutions.

The SPEAKER said that the Treasurer on the previous day moved a resolution, as would be found by the report of the proceedings of the Committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND repeated that upon the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, the hon. the Treasurer quoted figures explanatory of the Estimates, but no other hon. member was allowed to reply to those statements, and he could not understand how this was. He wished the hon. the Speaker to explain how it was that the Treasurer was allowed to address the House for fully twelve or fifteen minutes, and make statements explanatory of the Estimates about to be submitted to the House, and yet no other member of the House was allowed to reply to them. He vindicated, on the part of every member, a right of speech equal to that of the Treasurer himself.

The TREASURER said that in his first address to the House he carefully guarded himself against making any financial statement whatever. All he stated was that he believed some hon. members objected to going into Committee on the Estimates on account of there being certain Committees sitting on the question of taxation; but he had stated that the reports of those Committees could not affect the question of expenditure, and consequently that he saw no reason that the Estimates should not be proceeded with.

Mr. PEAKE would be sorry if the Estimates or any question of finance were discussed otherwise than in Committee. That was a cardinal principle which had been established for many hundred years, and he should be sorry to see any departure from it. He could not think that the hon. the Treasurer had guarded himself quite so carefully as he would have the House imagine, for upon referring to Hansard, he found that the hon. gentleman had stated he thought he had shown good reasons that the House should proceed with the Estimates—that there were only about six weeks to the Christmas holidays, &c. He agreed that there was not an analogy between the practice here and the practice of the House of Commons, as in the House of Commons the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he made the statement which he called the budget, concluded by moving a resolution, which was not the case here, as the Treasurer at once moved the first item upon the Estimates. He thought it was most important that there should be some opportunity for the House to declare upon the general outline of the policy of the Government, and that would have taken place on the previous day had it been permitted.

Captain HART rose.

The SPEAKER said the hon. member was out of order in again rising.

Captain HART thought he had the right of reply.

The SPEAKER said there was no motion before the House.

Captain HART said he had proposed a motion verbally, and had it written. It was to the effect, that when the House was moved into Committee, debate upon the general question should be allowed.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not seconded.

Mr. STRANGWAYS reminded the Speaker the discussion was upon a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER said that did not alter the case; the rule was the same.

Mr. DUFFIELD had taken no part in the occurrence of the previous day, but he felt the House would be placed in a very awkward position if the Speaker's ruling that no hon. member should be permitted to reply to the Treasurer were correct. The Treasurer should not in his opinion have been allowed to make the statement which it appeared by Hansard he had. It was absurd to say that the hon. gentleman did not go into figures, as he found that the hon. gentleman had stated that if the Assessment on Stock Bill were disallowed, the £10,000 which would be swept off by that disallowance, need not be replaced, as there would still be a surplus of £9,000 upon the six months. He felt that when such a statement had been made on one side, when figures were quoted on one side, and hon. members on the opposite side were prepared to shew those figures were not correct, they should have been allowed to shew such was the case. He felt indeed, whilst desiring to vote with the Ministry that the Estimates were going into Committee under circumstances which would not justify him in voting at all upon the question, but that if the Treasurer were allowed to make a statement and introduce figures in connection with the Estimates, it would be but justice to hon. members that they should be allowed to reply.

Captain HART begged the decision of the Speaker on a point of order. The Speaker had ruled that the whole question could be discussed on the consideration of the first item, viz., the vote of 200*l*. for the salary of the Private Secretary. If so, he wished to know what was to become of a previous ruling of the hon. gentleman given upon the Supplementary Estimates, to the effect that no question which had not direct reference to the particular item before the Committee could be discussed. Either the ruling in the one case or that in the other must be wrong. If the ruling now given was right the hon. the Treasurer was in the wrong, inasmuch as that hon. member had gone fully and completely into the reasons for going into Committee on the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair. It was competent for the House to go into Committee, but he thought that it was necessary to take the opinion of the House as to whether a debate should ensue on the question that the Speaker do leave the chair.

The SPEAKER said that his ruling on the Supplementary Estimates was that when a vote of money was under discussion, hon. members could not discuss any other particular item; but he held that it was competent when discussing the salary of the Private Secretary, to go into the whole financial policy of the Government. The House could, in fact, always discuss the Ways and Means when discussing the supplies.

Mr. BARROW thought the discussion would do good, inasmuch as it would clear up things which were not clear before. His own recollection quite agreed with that of the hon. member (Captain Hart) as to the ruling of the hon. the Speaker on the Supplementary Estimates, namely, that it was to the effect that hon. members should confine their remarks to the particular item under discussion.

The SPEAKER explained. His ruling was that when one item was under discussion, hon. members could not speak upon another item.

Mr. BARROW said he felt relieved from some doubts as to the position of the House upon a matter of privilege by the decision of the hon. Speaker, in which he was supported by the hon. the Attorney-General. It now appeared that on any one item the House could discuss anything it pleased, or might introduce anything, whether relevant or irrelevant, into the discussion. For instance, in discussing the vote for the department of the Registrar-General, they might vote that the administration of the Gaol was not satisfactory. (Laughter.)

The SPEAKER said his ruling was that hon. members could discuss the financial Ways and Means of the Government generally.

Mr. BARROW resumed—It would be competent to vote that a policeman on passing by a chapel had not paid a proper degree of respect to it—(laughter)—or that a prisoner in the gaol had not been properly treated. (Laughter.) The hon. the Attorney-General had stated these cases in illustration of his meaning.

The SPEAKER said that what the hon. the Attorney-General and himself had stated was, that on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair was the proper time to discuss these matters.

Mr. BARROW congratulated the House on the fact that there was any time when such questions could be discussed. (Laughter.) With regard to what took place on the previous day, the error originated with the hon. the Treasurer in travelling a little beyond his proper limits. (Hear, hear.) He did not mean to say that the Treasurer should have moved that the House go into Committee without making any remarks. But the hon. member had not advanced his remarks merely in favor of the House going into Committee, but with the view of impressing the House favourably towards the budget. (Hear, hear.) He did not think the hon. member (Mr. Peake) had made out a case when that hon. member referred to the Treasurer's having said that unless they got on with the Estimates they would soon have the Christmas holidays upon them. That he (Mr. Barrow) considered a good argument in favor of going into Committee. But he thought the hon. member (Mr. Duffield) had made out a case when he referred to the hon. the Treasurer's having spoken on the Assessment on Stock Bill. That was clearly discussing the budget, at least he (Mr. Barrow) took it to be so He thought as the hon the Treasurer had been allowed to make his financial statement, it would have been only justice that other hon members, even if not strictly in order, should have been allowed to make their financial statements too It was now ruled that the House would be at liberty when the first item was moved to discuss the policy of the Government with respect to the financial arrangements of the next six months As the House now understood the matter clearly he might be permitted to hope that they would not waste time, but would go into Committee as soon as hon members had sufficiently discussed this question of privilege

At this stage of the proceedings several notices of motion were given

MAJOR WARBURTON'S DESPATCHES

Mr PEAKE rose to move—

"That the despatches lately received from Major Warburton be laid on the table of this House and printed, together with all the despatches sent to Major Warburton"

He need not detain the House with any lengthened explanation of the reasons of the motion He thought enough had transpired in the House and in the public press to call for such a proceeding, and he trusted the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would not hesitate to accede to the proposal The anxiety so laudably expressed not to alarm the family of Mr Babbage could not be put forward now as a reason for withholding the information, inasmuch as the withholding of it, after what had transpired, would rather tend to increase such anxiety In justice to Major Warburton and Mr Babbage also, he trusted that the House would not be satisfied until the despatches were laid upon the table and printed

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the Government had not the slightest objection to produce the documents

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired whether the words "all the despatches" would include a copy of Major Warburton's instructions

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that any addition to the motion was unnecessary, as he would lay a copy of the instructions upon the table No despatches had been forwarded to Major Warburton since he left Adelaide, but that gentleman's own despatches would be laid on the table

The motion was then agreed to

THE RIVER WEIR

Mr PEAKE, pursuant to notice, asked the Commissioner of Public Works—

"If the Government have taken steps to punish or bring to account the parties responsible for the disgraceful manner in which the weir across the river Torrens has been constructed, and if not, whether they intend to do so Also, whether the engineer, from whose designs and under whose orders the work was constructed, the Clerk of the Works who had charge of the execution of the works, and the contractors who executed the works, are now any of them in the public service, or engaged in carrying out any other Government contracts, and whether the Commissioner of Public Works will again allow any of those persons to have charge of or execution of any of the public works of this colony?"

He would simply remark that he would withhold any special observations, reserving to a future occasion the action he should take in the matter

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that the Government had not taken any steps to bring to account the parties who were responsible for the improper construction of the weir, and until the whole of the evidence relating to the work was before them they could not say whether they intended doing so or not The engineer under whose orders the works were constructed had been employed to stake out the line of railway from Section 112, as stated by him (the Commissioner of Public Works) in reply to the hon member for Encounter Bay, that this work was nearly completed, and the pay of the engineer was 25s per day The Clerk of Works was not in the public service, nor engaged in carrying out contracts under the Government Messrs Frost and Watson had the contract for the extension of the Gawler Town line to Section 112, which was let to them in June last, and they were engaged in carrying on the works to the satisfaction of the Railway Commissioners The Commissioner of Public Works kept a record of the manner in which contractors and others interested in public works performed their contracts, and referred especially to such record before approving of the appointment of any person, or the acceptance of any tender

THE ESTIMATES

The TREASURER moved that the Speaker leave the chair, in order that the House should resolve itself into Committee on the Estimates

Mr GLYDE asked whether this was the proper time to move an amendment, as in doing so he should probably have to go into figures

The SPEAKER thought it would be better to go into Committee

Mr GLYDE would be happy to do so on the understanding that he would be in possession of the chair The amendment he intended to move was—

"That in the opinion of this House the Estimates of Ways and Means prepared by the hon the Treasurer for the first six months of the year 1859 cannot be realized, and that the House considers that the proper way of meeting the difficulties arising from the decrease in the revenue consists in reducing the cost of establishments and of immigration and not in diminishing the amount set apart for public works"

The SPEAKER suggested that the better course would be for the hon member to move the former part only of the resolution—viz, that having reference to Ways and Means—at present, omitting the portion which referred to expenditure

Mr BURFORD enquired what course should be taken supposing there was an inclination on the part of an hon member to move that a certain limited sum should be deducted from the estimated expenditure, leaving the Ministry to arrange the matter as they best could Suppose he were to say, taking off 25 per cent from the whole estimated expenditure.

The SPEAKER again suggested that the best course would be to move the first part of the amendment and postpone the remainder to a future time

Mr REYNOLDS wished to call attention to the circumstance that when the Supplementary Estimates were under discussion, the hon the Speaker ruled that hon members should confine themselves to the items under consideration He now wished to ask if upon a salary being moved by the hon the Treasurer, it would be competent to move the general consideration of the Estimates

The SPEAKER replied that it was competent for an hon member to address himself to the Ways and Means generally, but not to matters connected with another department

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether this could be done upon any item?

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether he would be in order in moving that the consideration of the Estimates be an Order of the Day for another day?

The SPEAKER said that such an amendment would be in order, and hon members would bear in mind that he only expressed his own opinions as Speaker as to the meaning of the Standing Orders—(hear, hear)—but whatever was the wish of the House, he was quite willing to carry out

Mr GLYDE said if the House could enter upon the discussion of his motion, he would not oppose the motion for going into Committee, and he hoped other hon members would not oppose it

Captain HART would move that the hon member (Mr Glyde) would be in order in moving his resolution He did this because it was in accordance with the practice of the House before When there was a motion that the House go into Committee on an address to the Governor, praying for a sum of money, it was a parallel case to the motion of the hon member for East Torrens It was most convenient that the House should be in Committee, that hon members might have the opportunity of speaking two or three times

Mr BAGOT seconded the motion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL enquired whether he was to understand that the House was about to discuss a question of finance in violation of the Standing Orders, and without suspending the Standing Orders

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if the amendment of the hon member (Mr Glyde) were put as a substantive motion whether the hon the Speaker could then put the question that the House go into Committee upon it

The SPEAKER ruled that according to Standing Order 343, nothing affecting finance could be discussed except in Committee, and, therefore, the motion of the hon member (Mr Glyde) could not be discussed otherwise

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that if hon members would not now discuss the amendment in Committee, the proper course would be to give notice of motion that on a future day the House should resolve itself into Committee If the motion was that the House go into Committee for a particular purpose, it could not be brought on without notice The House could now refuse to go into Committee, and any hon member would then have the right to give notice of a fresh motion

Mr BAGOT said the same difficulties would arise then, and as this was an important matter, it would be better to have it decided

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL understood that the object of the Standing Order was that, in matters of figures and details, every member of the Government and of the House generally should have the opportunity of speaking as often as he might consider necessary In a matter of this kind, it would be unfair to the hon the Treasurer, who had prepared the Estimates, and was most familiar with them, that he should only be allowed to speak once, whilst half-a-dozen members might speak against him Without a suspension of the Standing Orders, a discussion would be clearly irregular

Mr BAGOT recollected on a former occasion that a motion for a Committee which was known as the Committee on the Estimates, was discussed in the whole House

The SPEAKER replied that that was under the old regime According to the practice of the House of Commons, every application for money must be discussed in Committee of the whole House

Mr PEAKE quite agreed with the hon the Attorney-General that everything affecting finance should be discussed in Committee of the whole House, but this was very distinct from an ordinary motion of the kind, inasmuch as it affected the general question of finance which was before the House He would be sorry to trench upon the important principle of discussing questions of finance, and would agree to a suspension of the Standing Orders if the hon gentleman adhered to his opinion that it was necessary

Mr REYNOLDS suggested that the difficulty might be removed by moving as an instruction to the Committee that the whole question of finance be taken into consideration That would be the most practical way of meeting the difficulty

The SPEAKER said if the Committee had full power already, the House could not give such an instruction, as it would be superfluous

Dr WARK said it appeared to him that what was sought by the motion of the hon member for East Torrens would be fully attained by going into Committee (Hear, hear, from the Commissioner of Public Works) He also thought they should suspend the Standing Orders The hon the Attorney-General had put the matter very clearly before the House, and he (Dr Wark) believed that hon members' judgment was correct He (Dr Wark) could not see any advantage in discussing the question with the Speaker in the Chair He also thought it was not fair that the hon the Treasurer should be put to the wall He did not think hon members need be afraid of that hon gentleman (A laugh) He wanted to know why the House should depart from its ordinary custom

Mr MILNE would ask another question It was, whether the proper way would not be to commence out of Committee on the general policy of finance Suppose, for instance, it was necessary to appoint another Estimates Committee If the House were at once to go into Committee of the whole to consider the Estimates, how could it appoint a Committee, seeing that a Committee of the whole had not power to appoint a Select Committee?

The SPEAKER replied that if the Committee of the whole came to a resolution that it was expedient to appoint a Select Committee, and reported the same to the House, then the House could adopt the report and appoint the Committee

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped, as the hon the Attorney General had spoken three times, he might be allowed to speak a second time If the hon the Treasurer had on the previous day adopted the course taken in the House of Commons, this difficulty would not have arisen

Mr DUFFIELD thought the hon member (Mr Glyde) might withdraw his motion and move it as an amendment in Committee

Mr GLYDE was quite willing to wait until the House went into Committee provided it was understood, and that the hon the Speaker ruled that he (Mr Glyde) should be in order in moving, and all hon members in speaking, upon the general policy of finance.

The SPEAKER ruled that the first part of the motion of the hon member (Mr Glyde) was a fair matter for discussion as an amendment, but it would be out of order in discussing one item of the expenditure to discuss all the others The hon member would be in order, so far as he meant to show that the Ways and Means as estimated by the Government were in their gross amount too large, but he could not then go into the items

Mr PEAKE suggested that perhaps the hon the Attorney-General would favor the House with his views on this important matter

Mr BARROW moved that the Standing Orders be suspended, as, instead of getting out of the difficulty, they were getting deeper and deeper into it (Laughter)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if it was a matter of urgency the Standing Orders could be suspended, but he was about to move that the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Estimates be made an Order of the Day for a future occasion, when hon members could discuss the subject after having had time to consider it If the House decided upon discussing the question at present, they would of course do so, but the reason of his suggesting a different mode of proceedure was that the course which they might take now would be a precedent on all future occasions, and it would be a pity that a precedent should be established without full consideration

Captain HART said that the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had said that some good would come out of that debate, and he (Captain Hart) believed such would be the case The fact was they were in a regular "fix," and must get out of it if they could For his part he believed that the Standing Orders did not require to be suspended, for he considered the amendment for going into Committee was quite in order He should like to know how the hon the Speaker would report, if, on the motion that the first item be passed as printed, an hon member were to move an amendment such as the hon member, Mr Glyde, had proposed that day, and that the amendment was carried How would the hon the Speaker report as Chairman in that case? It was impossible that such a question should be considered in Committee It was not one of those financial questions which should be so considered, but something altogether different, and one on which the decision could not be reported

Mr SOLOMON did not think this was such a question of finance as should be discussed in Committee, involving as it did the whole general question of finance Moreover it was competent for the House to discuss it without going into Committee at all Suppose that the former part of the resolution was considered in the whole House

The SPEAKER said it was a question which could be dealt with only by figures, and should therefore be referred to a Committee

Mr MILDRED moved that the House divide on the motion that the Standing Orders be suspended

Mr STRANGWAYS rose to order

The SPEAKER said he must put the motion of the last hon member (Mr Mildred)

The motion was accordingly put and negatived, amidst some laughter without a division

Mr BAGOT would support the suspension of the Standing Orders, not because he thought they had not power to discuss the question, but because he thought it better they should follow in all things the ruling of the hon the Speaker, and that hon gentleman had ruled that the only way in which the question could be discussed was by a suspension of the Standing Orders

Mr MACDERMOTT would regret that the House should come to such a decision as was now proposed, inasmuch as the motion involved the whole question of finance, and could not be discussed without going into the entire financial policy of the Government

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the House adjourn, that they might get out of the mess they were now in

Mr NEALES said if they suspended the Standing Orders it would be only to allow of a discussion taking place out of Committee which after all must be in Committee The course proposed by the hon the Attorney-General was by far the best, viz, to postpone the Estimates and go on with the next question, and allow the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) to give notice of his motion to come on for discussion on Tuesday That would settle the matter at once There was so much in the motion that it must come to a discussion, there was no evading it Let it be discussed separately from the Estimates, and if the Government chose to force on the Estimates, let them take the consequences, and do it at their peril But the hon the Attorney-General had already stated that the Government were prepared to withdraw the Estimates That was the fairest course to all parties—both to those who were in favor of the Government on the one hand and to those who were fairly opposed to them on the other He believed the Ways and Means would not come up to what the hon the Treasurer had estimated them at, but he would not go in a round-about way to discuss such a question He would like to see it set down upon the paper for discussion as a question of finance, for to say that it was not a matter of finance was ridiculous One party said "I have so much money to spend and I will spend it so and so," and the other side said "you have not so much money" If this was not a question of finance, he would like to know what was

Mr GLYDE repeated his offer to withdraw his motion, provided the Government undertook to withdraw the Estimates

The TREASURER was glad the motion for suspending the Standing Orders was withdrawn He would be happy to withdraw the Estimates But otherwise, the Standing Orders should have been suspended, for the principle at stake was so serious that it would not have been in accordance with the Standing Orders to have proceeded with the discussion without giving notice The motion was one of the most important ever tabled in that House It was, in fact, that the House had not confidence in the calculations which he had made on the part of the Government, and that the House wished to instruct the Government as to how the Estimates were to be framed Whether the discussion took place in Committee or out of Committee was perhaps immaterial, so far as the Government were concerned, but in compliance with the Standing Orders, he did not see how the subject was to be discussed out of Committee

Mr GLYDE here formally withdrew his motion

The TREASURER withdrew the Estimates, and moved that their further consideration in Committee be made an Order of the Day for Thursday, 18th instant

Mr GLYDE said he had forgotten to give notice of his intention to move the resolution which he had withdrawn

The SPEAKER replied that the hon member could give notice on Tuesday, 16th instant, for the following day

Mr GLYDE said that he hoped that in case his motion could not come on for discussion on Wednesday, the hon the Treasurer would promise that he would not proceed with the Estimates on the following day

The SPEAKER said there was no business on the paper for Wednesday to interfere with the motion of the hon gentleman

ABRAM LONGBOTTOM

Captain HART, moved that the first reading of the Bill to secure to Abram Longbottom a patent right to prepare gas from certain fatty substances, be read a first time

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was accordingly read a first time and ordered to be submitted to a Select Committee consisting of the following hon members, viz Messrs Barrow, Burford, Cole, Lindsay, Milne, Wark, and Hart (Chairman)

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

In Committee

Clause 4 was postponed

Clause 5, "Governor may appoint Commissioners" On this clause being put,

Mr STRANGWAYS rose and asked what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to the appointment of these Commissioners, and as he had understood the Public Works Bill had been thrown out by the Upper House, whether the Ministry intended to introduce another Bill or separate Bills to bring the whole of the Boards under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works If the Government did not intend to do this, he (Mr Strangways) should be compelled to take the necessary steps so to alter the Bill as to bring the whole of the Boards under the immediate superintendence of the Commissioner of Public Works

Mr REYNOLDS said that as they had had no official intimation as yet of the Public Works Bill having been thrown out, they could only suppose that such was the case, and under those circumstances he would ask whether the Government could not adopt the same principle as that embodied in the Public Works Bill in carrying out this measure, as if the Public Works Bill had not been rejected

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS made a reply, the purport of which was not caught by the reporter

Mr REYNOLDS said that his question had not been understood What he wanted to know was, supposing the Public Works Bill to be abolished, what course the Government intended to take, whether they could not introduce the same principle into the Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill as affecting that measure only without regard to the effect upon the Boards generally

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if the House were of opinion that it was expedient to abolish the Water Works Board and to bring it under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works, the Government would have no more objection to carry out the principle embodied in the Public Works Bill with respect to this measure, than they would have as applied to the Boards generally The clause had been prepared with the view of placing the management of the existing Boards under the superintendence of the Commissioner of Public Works, and he could not see why the Government should not take the same course with respect to this Board as any other Perhaps it would be as well to suspend the 5th and 6th clauses for the present, and go on with the details of the Bill

Mr STRANGWAYS thought that in any case the 5th clause would be superfluous

Mr BURFORD thought it might be left an open question for the present Although the House had every reason to believe that the Public Works Bill had been rejected, still they must believe it probable that the Government would introduce another Bill in a modified form, which might be passed

Mr REYNOLDS was not aware that the hon member for the City (Mr Burford) was the exponent of the views of the Government The House, he was sure, had not heard from the Government that they intended to introduce another Bill, and he could not, therefore, take the statement of the hon member for the City for granted The best plan he (Mr Reynolds) thought would be to deal with the Bills as they came before them He had great confidence in the Commissioner of Public Works, and as the Government had said they had no objection to strike out such portions as would make it inconsistent, he thought they should agree to that proposal

Mr SOLOMON did not know whether the Government intended to do away with the Commissioners of Waterworks but, if so, the 5th clause was certainly inconsistent, and should be struck out One clause in the Bill stated that the Commissioners should not hold any office under the Government, therefore the term Commissioner, as vested in the Commissioner of Public Works, would likewise be inconsistent

Mr BURFORD was not disposed to sit down under the surmise of the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds), who implied that he (Mr Burford) was acting as the exponent of the Government He did not presume to do so, but he thought the mere fact of the Government suggesting the suspension of clauses 5 and 6 showed there was a latent intention of doing what he had suggested merely might be done

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the Government did not wish to make any distinction between one Board and another As to the Chief Commissioner of Waterworks, his confidence in that gentleman was well founded He was an active man of business, and he had conferred at various times great public services It would be unfair to make one Board responsible, and not another If this clause were struck out, it would involve some change in the management of the Board

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Commissioner of Public Works had been loud in his praise of the Chief Commissioner of Waterworks, but nothing had been said about the other Commissioners, which he considered to be an invidious distinction If the Government intended to abolish the Board of Waterworks, why not state so at once in a manly manner

Mr HAWKER supported the striking out of the clause and thought the House had special reasons for applying the principle to this Board first They had every reason to know that this Board was thoroughly inefficient, as it had been the source of a loss of £7,000 to the country by mismanagement As to making "fish of one and flesh of another" he thought the only plan they could adopt was to take them as they turned up, commencing by abolishing the Waterworks Board in the first instance

Mr NEALES thought they should accept one-third of the principle if they could not get the whole He was always for getting part of a good measure, he would therefore do away with the Waterworks Commission, and see what effect the personal exertions of the Commissioner of Public Works would have in the working of the Board

Dr WARK said the Commissioner of Public Works had intimated that he was about to visit the Weir, and would give the House every information with respect to it (The Commissioner of Public Works said he had promised some information, but that was all) The House had not had that information however They were now, it appeared, called upon to legislate anew £7,000 had been thrown away, and they were not in a position to say exactly with whom the fault lay He (Dr Wark) could give some information if others could not, and he thought any one who took the trouble to examine the weir where daylight had been let into it, would be in a position as well as himself to see the inordinate negligence which had been exhibited in its construction It was a very nice thing no doubt to laud the Chief Commissioner, and that gentleman, no doubt had done his duty in bringing the matter to light But were they to maintain the Commissioners as a body in office when they had allowed such gross negligence as that he had referred to What were these gentlemen doing if they could not see to it? He should move that the 5th clause be struck out

Mr TOWNSEND would be compelled to vote against the clause, unless the Board were placed under the superintendence of the Commissioner of Public Works It was a palpable fact that all this waste of expenditure had been entailed under the eyes of the Commissioners, and they had not seemed to have been aware of it He should have no objection, however, to the clause being withheld until the correspondence with regard to Waterworks Weir was placed before the House

Mr MILDRED thought the Commission was far from being the best description of machinery to carry out such a work The Commissioners, it appeared, up to a certain time absolutely knew nothing about the way in which the work was being conducted The system of Public Boards generally was inexpedient, and could not operate successfully He was for sweeping away Public Boards of this nature altogether

Mr HAY was opposed to the system, and thought a great mistake had been made in appointing the Waterworks Commissioners The Corporation, much as it might be charged with wasteful expenditure, had never committed such a piece of bungling as that perpetrated in the river weir Had the expenditure of the money been left to the Corporation, he was satisfied much better results would have attended it There was no doubt the Public Works Bill had been thrown out by the Upper House, and the sooner they devised some plan to bring the Boards generally under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works the better If the Corporation had had a voice in the construction of these works, he was convinced that much of the antagonism which had been exhibited would have been prevented He would suggest the withdrawal of the Bill so that a clause might be framed placing the Waterworks Board under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said as to the Chief Commissioner of Waterworks and his (Mr Blyth's) previous expression of opinion as to that gentleman's abilities being called in question, he must say that his (Mr Blyth's) experience of that gentleman was, that he had been always exceedingly attentive to the duties of his department, and he (Mr Blyth) had never applied once for returns or other information without it being punctually complied with He did not approve of the practice of attacking absent persons, and he would not say whether the experience of the Commissioners was greater now than formerly With regard to the antagonism which had been referred to, he was of opinion that the Commissioners were right, and the Corporation wrong

Mr McELLISTER thought the thanks of the country were due to the Commissioners for the way in which they had fished out the robbery, he might say, which was being perpetrated upon the country (Laughter) He could not say where the blame rested, whether with the contractors or engineer If any Board were retained he thought the Waterworks Board should be

Mr SOLOMON was glad to hear the remarks of the Commissioner of Public Works, that he did not see the justice of attacking persons behind their backs He considered the fault lay with the system The fact was, men should have been appointed who really understood the work It was apparent that this was not the case, and that the appointments had been made through private friendships There were many portions of this Bill which required alteration There was one point if the Government were considered as merely the trustees of the city, then after the outlay and the interest on the construction of the Waterworks were paid, they should be made over to the citizens The hon member proceeded to refer to some clause in the after part of the Bill, but—

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member was out of order, and if discussing the general principle of the Bill that should have been done before it had been committed

Mr SOLOMON must agree that the fault did not rest with the Commissioners The Commissioner of Public Works had told them that he had had no difficulty in obtaining information when he required it, and that spoke favorably of their having done their duty. Therefore it was a question whether the fault might not be properly attributed to the engineer. It was proper that the Government should not throw the blame on certain persons in order to take the onus off their own shoulders.

Mr TOWNSEND agreed that the appointments to the Waterworks Commissioners had been made through private friendships. He wished to know whether the Government were empowered to appoint persons to public offices for which they were incompetent. He believed that with one practical engineer, irrespective of any Commission, the loss of £7,000, which had been sustained would have been avoided. He would vote against the clause. The Commissioner of Public Works had said, "Don't make a distinction between the Boards," but he would tell him that he would make a distinction, and he would apply the same principle to other public servants, that if one person performed his duty, and another did not, he should applaud the former, and call the latter to account.

THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could hardly submit to the allusion which had been made to appointments having been made through individual friendships. He had no reason to suppose that such was the case. As to Mr Waterhouse, he repeated what he had stated before, that he thought he was well suited to the position which he held.

Mr REYNOLDS thought in this case it was the right man in the right place, but he objected to the appointment of Commissioners altogether. What had been the case? Why that these Commissioners met once a week, and then only for an hour, and it could easily be inferred what service could be done in that time. When he (Mr Reynolds) was Commissioner of Public Works, he remembered that no less than 72 reports from the Engineer had been passed by the Commissioners without a single dissent. This was certainly paying the Engineer a high compliment. But the context had shown that the Commissioners had placed too much confidence in the Engineer, and that the Engineer had relied too much on the Clerk of Works. With regard to making "fish of one and flesh of another," all he could say was, that what the House did with the Waterworks Commissioners, might also be done with other Boards.

Mr BURFORD did not see why they should endorse the opinion of one Commissioner over another. He would say this, that Mr Waterhouse, who had been particularly exempted from censure, had come into office just at the time when the bungling which had occurred was being found out, therefore any praise which he might have got was rather the effect of accident than any foresight. He thought the House had nothing to do with exalting one Commissioner over another. He might refer to the Mayor of Adelaide, who was one of the Commissioners, in answer to the statement of the hon member for Gumeracha, who stated the citizens had no voice in the matter. Now he considered the voice of their worthy Mayor was fully as sonorous as his own (Mr Burford's)—(laughter)—and the citizens were, therefore, very well represented. He thought no time should be lost in remodelling the system, and he agreed with the hon member (Mr Neales) that if the principle was affected in this instance, it would be ultimately with the other two Boards.

Clause 5 was then put and negatived, and was consequently struck out.

Clause 6. "Commissioners to appoint officers." On this clause being put,

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that the Attorney General should adopt the same course as in the District Councils Act, by withdrawing the Bill and substituting an amended print. A great proportion of the clauses might be struck out, in fact clause 6 was quite superfluous, and so with many other of the clauses.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could see that the alterations required were more extensive than he had imagined. He should, therefore, propose that the House resume, and before the Committee sat again he would have an amended reprint prepared.

The House resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Friday next.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

The consideration of the report of the Committee of the whole House on the Civil Service Bill was made an Order of the Day for Friday next.

The House then adjourned until 1 o'clock on Tuesday.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock.

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon A Forster, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon A Scott.

REDRUTH GAOL.

The Hon Dr DAVIES, in putting the questions of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Chief Secretary the following particulars relative to the detention, for a period of about six weeks, in the Redruth Gaol, of two men named Driscoll and Faulkner, and one woman, all stated to be lunatics —

"1. By whose order or authority were these individuals placed in confinement and detained?

"2. Who were the two medical practitioners who furnished the certificates required by law to prove a state of lunacy?

"3. Did any medical man or medical men attend them during their incarceration, and what is his or their names?

"4. If such attendance were given, was it at the Government expense, and by whom was it authorized?

"5. If such be the case are they the same medical men who are appointed to attend the Gaol under ordinary circumstances?

"6. What is the size of the said Gaol to admit of accommodation sufficient for its being used either as an Hospital or a Lunatic Asylum?

"7. What facilities and conveniences are there in the said Gaol for the proper treatment of lunatics?

"8. The Redruth Gaol being used as a Lunatic Asylum, are any visitors appointed to supervise?

"9. Are the plan of the said Gaol (used as an Asylum), and the copy of Ordinance No. 2 of 1847, hung up in the said Gaol?

"10. Why did not the police give immediate information, and transmit these persons to town?

"11. Where are these three individuals at present, and what is their mental condition?"

said that in putting those questions, he would at once state that he knew nothing derogatory to the character of any one connected with the establishment to which his questions had reference. As it might appear that there was something like censure conveyed in his questions, he wished it to be understood at the outset that he knew nothing wrong on the part of any one connected with the gaol. He simply wished the public to feel that if individuals were confined under an assumption that they were insane, that it should be first proved that they were in that unhappy condition, and that there should be ample accommodations in the places in which such unfortunate parties were confined, so as to afford them a fair chance of recovering. If Redruth Gaol, or any other gaol, were used as a lunatic asylum, the public should feel assured, and that House should see, that there was sufficient accommodation there, and that there was proper attention to the patients, to afford them a fair chance of recovery. In the case of lunatics, it was imperatively essential that they should be properly treated. Not only should the medical attendant be fully qualified, but all parties who were at all connected with the care of lunatics should have had the advantage of experience in reference to their treatment. Another object which he had in putting the questions was that the Act distinctly stated that visitors should be appointed to every place which was proclaimed as a lunatic asylum, so that a gaol, if it contained lunatics, should have visitors appointed for the purpose of ascertaining that the lunatic inmates were properly cared for. Several cases had recently occurred in England, showing the sorry manner in which the inmates of lunatic asylums were sometimes treated. As there was a Lunatic Asylum in Adelaide, he thought the police or the Magistrates, or the parties who caused these unfortunate creatures to be sent to gaol as lunatics should send every case to the general Asylum, unless, indeed, cases of delirium tremens, which might reasonably be expected to recover in a short period. He believed that if lunatics were sent to the general Asylum, the expense to the Government would be very much lessened, and that the patients would have a far better chance of being restored to health than if they were kept in a common gaol. He believed that it was impossible in common gaols to make a sufficient distinction between prisoners and lunatics. As the questions of which he had given notice were numerous, and as, no doubt, the answers of the Chief Secretary would to a great extent remove the objections which he (Dr Davies) had alluded to, he should not dwell further upon the subject, but if anything should arise from the answers given by the Chief Secretary, he would at a future time call the attention of the House to additional facts.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the questions were very numerous, and he had placed the answers in writing, which he was prepared to place upon the table of the House. He presumed the Hon Dr Davies did not wish the answers read seriatim.

The Hon Dr DAVIES said as the answers, he presumed, would be printed, he would for the present merely move that they be read by the Clerk of the House.

The answers were to the effect that the parties referred to were placed in confinement and detained by virtue of a warrant issued by the Special Magistrate in the neighbourhood. Drs Yates and Mayo furnished the certificates required by law in the first two cases, and Dr Mayo in the last. Drs Mayo and Morley attended them during their incarceration, such attendance being given by direction of the Special Magistrate and at the Government expense. The size of that portion of the Gaol allotted to males was 97 feet by 75, with three cells of 12 feet by 8 feet each, that portion alloted to females was of similar size and possessed similar accommodations. No portion of the Gaol was specially set apart for lunatics, nor were there any facilities or conveniences in the Gaol for the proper treatment of lunatics. No visitors were appointed to supervise the Gaol. The Gaol was not a lunatic asylum, nor was copy of Ordinance No. 2 of 1847 hung up in the said Gaol. The Magistrate at Redruth sent to town in reference to the female patient, but thinking that the other two would quickly get better, he did not deem it necessary to send to town in reference to them. Since that period, however, the whole of the parties had been sent to the Lunatic Asylum in town.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY, in order that this matter might be sifted to the utmost, laid upon the table of the House copy of the Surgeon's Visiting Book in connection with the Redruth Gaol at the time these parties were there incarcerated. He also laid upon the table a return, shewing the names, &c., of all the lunatics who had been confined in Redruth Gaol from September, 1853, to November, 1858. By this return it would be seen that during five years 31 lunatics had been confined from time to time in the Redruth Gaol, having been committed there under a Magistrate's warrant. The parties had remained there for periods varying from a week to a month. If they recovered within that period, they were turned out, but if not, and there was no probability of their speedy recovery, they were forwarded to the Lunatic Asylum in Adelaide. This was found to be the best and most convenient course to pursue in the case of those unfortunate persons. He had not visited the Redruth Gaol, but he had permission from the Hon. Mr. Forster to state that that gentleman had recently inspected the Gaol and had found it remarkably cleanly and apparently well conducted in every respect.

THE INSOLVENT ACT

The Hon. H. AYERS moved—

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause to be laid upon the table of this Council, a copy of any Despatch received by His Excellency from the Secretary of State on the subject of the Insolvent Act, and suggesting some alteration in it, together with a copy of the Report of the Attorney-General thereon."

The hon. gentleman remarked that he had heard from members of the legal profession, merchants, and others competent to judge, that the Insolvent Act was not working in all its branches so satisfactorily as could be desired, and as he understood that the Imperial Government had recommended Her Majesty not to assent to the Act, he was anxious before taking steps to endeavour to remedy the defects which appeared to exist in the Act, to ascertain what were the defects in the Act which had induced the Imperial Government to recommend Her Majesty to withhold her assent. He was also desirous of ascertaining what was the opinion of the hon. the Attorney-General of this colony in reference to those reasons, and what was the probable course which the local Government would pursue in reference to the Act. Those were the reasons which had induced him to place the notice upon the paper.

The Hon. J. MORPHETT, in seconding the motion, called the attention of the Chief Secretary to the fact that if he had answered a question which he (Mr. Morphett) had asked him some three weeks ago, the Council would have been spared the necessity of listening to the motion, and the Hon. Mr. Ayers would have been spared the trouble of bringing it forward. It would be remembered that he had asked the Hon. the Chief Secretary precisely the same question as that which was now brought forward by the Hon. Mr. Ayers. He had asked for precisely the same information. The Hon. the Chief Secretary at the time the question was put had promised to give an answer to it, but had never done so, and consequently the Hon. Mr. Ayers had taken the more regular course of placing a motion on the paper upon the subject.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY was sorry it should be thought he had given unnecessary trouble in this matter or that he had withheld any information in his power to afford. On the contrary, he was at all times anxious to afford every information in his power. When the question was put to him before, he gave the Hon. Mr. Morphett the same answer as that which he was now prepared to give to the Hon. Mr. Ayers, and that was, that he would lay the documents upon the table when they were complete, which would be in a day or two. The motion was carried.

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

The PRESIDENT stated that a Message had been received from the House of Assembly intimating that they had passed a Bill to remove doubts as to the title of lessees of land formerly held by the late Mr. Smillie, and desiring the concurrence of the Legislative Council therein.

Upon the motion of the Hon. Captain HALL the Bill was read a first time, and referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Hon. Messrs. Morphett, Ayers, Everard, Forster and Hall, to report on Tuesday next.

MR. STUART'S EXPLORATION

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY intimated that it was not his intention to proceed with the following notice which stood in his name:—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will take the necessary steps, by amending the Waste Lands Regulations, or otherwise, for granting unto John McDouall Stuart, in consideration of, and reward for, his important discoveries of new country on the north-western side of Lake Torrens, a 14 years' lease of 1,500 square miles for pastoral purposes, to date from 1st January, 1859, to be rent free for the first seven years, to be declared stocked at the end of the first four years, after the expiration of the first seven years, to be subject to such rent and regulations as may then be in force, the runs to be in blocks of not less than 200 square miles, of rectangular form whose length shall not be more than twice the width, the situation of such blocks to be described to the Government by Mr. Stuart on the map of his exploration before the 1st day of January, 1859."

The hon. gentleman stated that his motive for withdrawing it was, that it was the original intention of the Government to effect an alteration in the Waste Lands Regulations for the purpose of accomplishing the object in view, but upon further consideration it was thought it would be expedient to introduce a Bill for the express purpose of granting a lease to Mr. Stuart. He would reserve discussion upon the subject till the Bill was before the House, and in the meantime would merely ask permission of the House to withdraw the motion.

The Hon. J. MORPHETT wished to ask the Hon. the Chief Secretary a question upon this subject. The hon. gentleman had stated that he wished to withdraw the motion in consequence of the determination of the Government to introduce a Bill to accomplish the object in view instead of altering the Waste Lands Regulations. He thought it desirable, before the motion was withdrawn, that the hon. gentleman should state distinctly what was the nature of the Bill which it was intended to introduce. He considered this should be stated before leave was given to withdraw the motion. If he had understood the hon. gentleman rightly, he had stated that the Bill which it was intended to introduce was to empower the Government to grant certain advantages to the individual named in the motion, Mr. Stuart, but he wished to put it to the hon. gentleman whether it would not be better, more in accordance with popular feeling, and altogether in better spirit and better taste, that the Bill should not be confined to Mr. Stuart, but that it should be a general measure conferring certain advantages upon successful explorers. If it were a general measure he should be happy to give it his support, but if it were merely to grant a special advantage to Mr. Stuart, it was very probable that he might feel bound to oppose it. He therefore wished to ask the Chief Secretary whether the Bill would be a general measure or a special one.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY thought he had already stated what were the views of the Government upon this question. The Hon. Mr. Morphett must be aware that it would be necessary to alter the existing Waste Lands Regulations to carry out the object which he had in view, but those regulations were found advantageous and adapted to every probable contingency. It was consequently, not desired to alter them. The case of Mr. Stuart was purely a special case, and the way in which it was intended to carry out the resolution before the House was by the introduction of a special Bill.

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

This Bill was read a third time and passed, and transmitted by message to the House of Assembly.

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE FURTHER AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon. J. MORPHETT, seconded by the Hon. A. FORSTER, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and transmitted by message to the House of Assembly.

The Council adjourned at half-past 2 o'clock till Tuesday next at 2 o'clock.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 13 minutes past 1 o'clock.

NORTHERN EXPLORATION

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid on the table copies of the despatches of Major Warburton.

THE ROAD SYSTEM

The House having gone into Committee—

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS rose to move—

"That the repair of the main roads, when constructed, be provided for by a special imposition upon the rateable property within the province."

It would be remembered by hon. members that when last the House was in Committee on this question there was a lengthened debate and a great deal of discussion, which resulted in the striking out of all the words of the resolution, with the exception of the word "that," and that at that stage of the proceedings the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again. He (the Commissioner of Public Works) had since felt it to be his duty to add certain words in the room of those which had been struck out, and embodying nearly the same principle as that contained in the words struck out. He thought the House, having already come to the conclusion that if we were to construct roads we would not have the means to maintain them, would have to decide upon the plan now proposed. It was always objectionable and unpleasant to pay a tax or to impose one; but, as he had said before, he believed there was no money better spent than that expended in providing the best means of internal communication. He was anxious to be as equitable as possible in providing the means for this purpose, and he believed the object would be attained by the words which he had inserted after the word "that." The assessment was to be upon the whole rateable property of the country, including the whole City of Adelaide and the whole of the land sold and occupied in the province, whether it paid rates to District Councils or municipalities or not, for he believed that all property was alike interested in the construction and maintenance of roads. He would listen attentively to what any hon. member might say on the subject, and he was sure all who were sincerely desirous of providing good means of internal communication would concur in the resolutions. It would be inequitable and unfair to exempt properties already rated to the District Councils or Municipal Corporations, and it would perpetuate the system of levying very small rates as however small the rate it would exempt the district from any further payments for main lines of road. He hoped another resolution, which would be before the House presently, and to which therefore, he should not further refer at present, would have the effect of reducing the cost of maintenance of roads from the £200 per mile which they at present cost, in which case he believed that only a small rate would be required, and for his own part he would be willing, and he hoped others would also be willing cheerfully to pay the requisite amount.

Mr. STRANGWAYS asked whether, in the event of his now moving that the House resume, and the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again that day six months, the House should divide at once.

The reply of the Chairman was inaudible.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said he should presently make a motion to the effect he had referred to. His reason for doing so was that he was not at all satisfied with the resolution as suggested by the Government, and if such a resolution were to pass the Government would find it totally insufficient as the basis of a "Main Roads Bill." The resolutions contained three or four abstract propositions, and even if these were carried he was confident they would not afford sufficient data for the preparation of a Bill. He should now address himself to the special resolution before the House. He should very much like to hear from the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works what he meant by main roads, and where these roads were to go to and where from. They constantly saw disputes in the papers between parties and the Road Board, as to which were the main lines of road. A scheme of main roads like the present was not one which the House should sanction. Again if they authorised a special tax on all the rateable property of the colony, there ought to be a system of main roads which would include not only Adelaide but the whole province. (Hear, hear.) What benefit would Streaky Bay, for instance, derive from the proposed plan? Before the House agreed to any resolution on the subject, the Government should come down with a system of main roads, and then they might with some justice ask the House to authorize the levying of a special tax. The main roads now laid out did not extend beyond 100 or 150 miles from Adelaide. Yet there was rateable property at Port Lincoln, Port Augusta, and Mount Remarkable. Whether there was any rateable property at Streaky Bay or not, he did not know, but there would be in a short time. All this property would, under the proposed plan have to contribute to the maintenance of main roads, and what benefit would it derive from them? Again, the House did not know whether the Government would take action on the matter this session or next session, or in three or four sessions to come. All they knew was, that they were told in the speech of His Excellency that resolutions would be submitted on the subject of main roads, upon which a Bill might be founded, but whether such a Bill would be introduced, or any discussion taken upon it during the present session, they did not know. He thought hon. members would agree that this was a bad time for levying a special tax, whilst all persons were complaining of the prospects of the harvest, and when the prospects of the mercantile community were very dull, and too many likely to prove disastrous. Such was a bad time for a special tax, unless the Government saw their way very clearly, which he (Mr. Strangways) did not. Again, the Government did not tell the House what the phrase "rateable property," meant. Some thought it should mean unimproved land, others improved land, and others that, as in older countries, it should include houses and gardens and the like. Yet notwithstanding all this, the Government had tabled a resolution, which he believed was substantially embodied in the resolution previously rejected. If the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works would withdraw the whole of the resolutions, and not again bring them forward during the present session, he (Mr. Strangways) would withdraw his amendment; but if not he would move it.

The TREASURER said if the motion was carried it would have the effect of setting aside the first and second resolutions already agreed to in Committee and reported to the House. If the hon. member meant to ask the Committee to consider that all the discussions for days past were to be set aside as useless, then indeed he would come forward with some propriety in asking the Committee to affirm his amendment. But he (the Treasurer) believed that when hon. members considered the resolutions before they were in earnest, and intended in discussing them to agree upon the general principle of a new Road Bill. If the House affirmed the amendment—which he could scarcely suppose it would—the Government would have so far attained their object that they would have ascertained that the House wished for no further reform in the existing Roads Bill, and that hon. members were of opinion that this was not a proper time for any such reform. He did not, however, expect that the House would agree in any such conclusion. The hon. member for Encounter Bay had said that before the Government asked the House to assent to a special tax, some plan of main roads should be laid before the House. But all the House need do was to admit that the general revenue was insufficient for the maintenance, in addition to the making, of the roads, and that the after repairs must be provided for by a special tax on rateable property; and when that principle was affirmed the Government would introduce a Bill giving effect to the principle embodied in the resolution. Then would be the time for a special tax to be raised, with such modifications as the circumstances of the case might require; and then would be the time to fix a limit to the amount of taxation. When the revenue was supplemented by the tax for road purposes, the House would annually have it in its power to say what roads should be maintained out of those funds and what should not. Each year a scheme of the main roads to be repaired would necessarily be submitted to the House, and according to the proceeds of the tax the House would regulate the expenditure of the money. These remarks showed that a special system of roads need not be laid down in the resolution at present. As to the prospects of a bad harvest, and the commercial depression, the hon. member was a prophet of evil—(a laugh)—but he (the Treasurer) could not join his voice to that of the hon. member in any such proposition. For the hon. member to say that we had a bad harvest at this time of the year was premature. ("Oh, oh," and "hear, hear.") He heard some cry "oh! oh!" and some "hear, hear," which he took to mean dissent (hear, hear)—but he had heard hon. members of the House state that their crops had not suffered in the slightest degree, and that they had fair prospects. Through all the hill districts it was said that the crops would be of an average description, and the only prospect of failure appeared to be in the plains where the crops must be always precarious owing to their dependance on the early or late prevalence of dry weather. He should not therefore, join in the cry that we were to have a bad harvest. As to the commercial depression there could be no doubt, as we had tasted its effects; but the Roads Bill was not to come into operation for the next six months merely, but for a series of years; and to say that we were not to introduce such a Bill, because for a particular year or a particular part of a year there was a certain commercial depression, was an argument not founded on reason.

Mr. MACDERMOTT opposed the amendment, as he thought it quite time that our road system should be put on a more satisfactory basis. There was no subject which could occupy the attention of the House more important to its well being. He quite concurred with the hon. the Treasurer, that the general revenue would not suffice to construct and maintain the roads, and that there must be some special fund for the latter object; and he knew of no means to attain this object more equal and general in its character than a rateable assessment. The House had been rather prodigal in declaring main lines of road, and he (Mr. Macdermott) should be very glad to see a Select Committee appointed to consider the question, and strike out all roads not found to be necessary; for as long as the present system remained in force the House would be constantly called on for funds for such objects. He saw that one of the contingent notices of motion was in favor of capitalising the sums proposed to be expended on main roads. He could not concur in the opinion that it would be wise to capitalise the sum to be expended in macadamising the roads, as there was nothing permanent in them, and instead of being reproductive works they were a steady and constant source of expenditure. (Hear, hear.) He thought the public creditor would require something more real and substantial as security for his capital. Railroads were the proper and legitimate objects on which to borrow capital. He should oppose the amendment, though he would like to see the number of roads curtailed.

Mr. HAWKER rose to order. He wished to ask whether the resolution was not in substance the same as that which had been negatived on Thursday.

The CHAIRMAN read both resolutions, and said it rested with the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works to point out wherein they differed. (A laugh.)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there was a substantial difference between the two resolutions, inasmuch as one objection to the former was that it was not sufficiently distinct to be understood, whereas he had put this one in a form in which it could be clearly comprehended.

Mr. REYNOLDS said if his recollection served him, that when an objection was made to the words "general assessment on property" the hon. the Attorney-General explained the phrase as applying to rateable property. That being the meaning attached by the Government to the resolution which had been rejected, the present one could not be maintained, inasmuch as the same interpretation was put upon it

The CHAIRMAN thought the language was sufficiently changed to make the resolutions different and therefore it would be better that the House should either agree to or negative the present motion than merely reject it on a point of order

Mr BURFORD did not consider this resolution putting the matter in a clearer light He thought the previous resolution was even clearer He could guess that a very wide distinction might be drawn under the phrase "rateable property" One hon member might name the land lying outside District Councils, and paying no rates either to Councils or Corporations Many others might object that beyond these boundaries property could not be rated, as he judged from the votes given when the question of absenteeism was before the House (Order, order, from the Chairman) That was a strong objection to entertaining the resolution at all The more he looked at the matter, the more he saw its complications Their ideas as to what should be the proper source of revenue were too floating and vague to enable them to come to a resolution on this matter, especially as it was intended to last for years to come There were various questions pending now which would necessarily act on the minds of hon members in considering this question There was, for instance, the assessment on stock—("Order, order," from the Chairman)—because if the one was abandoned the other might be adopted He was only speaking suppositiously (A laugh) If it should be thought necessary to tax runs instead of stock, they would come immediately to the question of rateable property, and he (Mr Burford) maintained that the runs were rateable as they were something which had a fixity about them There was also another Committee sitting, whose deliberations embraced a subject more or less connected with the present question, and until the decision of that Committee was laid before the House, they would not be in a position to entertain this question He could not, of course, be sanguine that the opinions to which he (Mr Burford) was attached would be held by that Committee, but he still maintained their correctness, and he believed, until they adopted his system, they would never arrive at a healthy one at all There was another point, which had been raised before, viz, that it was very unfair to tax one portion of the community whilst another went free But how would this resolution touch the capitalist or the money lender? Such a man would go on prosperously, and yet contribute nothing to the maintenance of the roads, although these roads brought in the produce by which the capitalist throve That was not fair He would not object to any system which affected us all alike, but we must lay hold of these gentlemen The Treasurer reminded the House by way of recommending this resolution, that if they passed it they would be in a position each session to single out what roads should be kept in repair, and what roads should not He (Mr Burford) did not see that they would be in any more advantageous position then than they were in now The roads were likely to be under the superintendance of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works, and if so, that hon gentleman could single out such as should be kept in repair, or if he wanted the directions and advice of the House he need only ask it in order to get it That, therefore, was no reason to justify the adoption of the resolutions, supposing them to be objectionable in another particular He thought the Corporation of the City of Adelaide, and those hon members who represented the City of Adelaide—(a laugh)—were bound to look seriously at this question The citizens were pretty handsomely taxed as it was, though they were not complaining, but were quite willing to pay the rates for the improvement of the city (A laugh) But under this resolution the city would be rated for the maintenance of the roads according to the assessment in the city rate-books, which was known not to be a light one The whole proprietary in the District Councils, on the other hand, would pay a mere nominal sum Under all the circumstances he felt that they were not in a position to come to a definite resolution, and that it would be far better to defer the matter for another year Let hon members first get a little settled down as to their ideas, and the course which lay before them It would be far better than to go on precipitately (A laugh)

Mr TOWNSEND said that the hon member (Mr Burford) wished to claim an exemption from taxation for himself The hon member claimed exemption for anything which had not fixity, and he (Mr Townsend) thought that Mr Burford could claim it on the ground of not having fixity of purpose (A laugh) The hon the Treasurer had spoken in reference to the harvest He (Mr Townsend) was not one of those who took a gloomy view, but the more he heard of the prospects of the harvest at the Bremer and Langhorne's Creek, and every part of the plains, the greater seemed the probability of a bad harvest As to the commercial depression, every one felt it, and the general impression was, that we had not touched the bottom yet This was certainly not the time to put an additional tax on property But he was opposed to the resolutions on other grounds Why should there be a special tax for this purpose? Why should not the rate go to the credit side of the general revenue? The object of the resolution was to induce the House to assent in a bald resolution to a principle which hon members would not assent to in a Bill He should oppose the resolution, but if the Government fell in with the views which he expressed, and introduced a Bill, he should give it his best consideration

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said it would be recollected that originally five resolutions were proposed by the hon the Commissioner of Public Works The first of these resolutions was amended for the purpose of asserting a principle, and the second, which was with regard to the carrying out of railways, was adopted by the House The opinion of the House had been expressed that the whole of the money which could be spared from the general revenue should be spent in the construction of main roads, and that the funds for their maintenance should be raised from some other source The House had adopted that principle from which it appeared a necessary corollary that a resolution analogous to the present should be passed, as otherwise the Government and the country would be placed in this position—that while we went on constructing main lines of road and spending upon them all the funds which could be spared from the general revenue, we would only be doing so in order that the roads when completed, should fall into destruction Hon members must be aware from experience in their own localities and on the roads over which they were in the habit of travelling, that this process of destruction was exceedingly rapid Take, for instance, the road from Glen-Osmond and the Mountain Hut, and if no funds were expended upon it from the general revenue, or provided from some other source, it would in a very short time be nearly impassable The process might be more rapid there than on any other road, but there was no main road which, if left to itself, would not in a very short time become useless He could understand hon members who felt the difficulty of imposing this new tax, being indisposed to accede to the proposition now made, with a view to have the matter put an end to altogether, and fall back upon the present system, which kept in a sort of repair the roads already in existence, but which restricted our progress completely The real question for the House was, whether it was prepared to continue the present system, by acting on which they need impose no additional burthen, whether they would adhere to a principle fraught with the elements of its own destruction, and which must in a short time come to an end When the question was stated in that way, the decision arrived at must be whether hon members would have main roads or not One hon member had said that he did not object to taxation in his own person Now he (the Attorney-General) did (A laugh) But, whilst he sympathized with those who were opposed to taxation, still he knew well, as a member of the community, that each and every public benefit must be procured at the public expense, and the funds must be raised from taxation Therefore, much as he was opposed to taxation, he was prepared to pay it when it was for the benefit of the country and his own convenience Some hon members might take the view that the inconvenience of special taxation would be greater than the benefit of having the roads made and maintained, and according as they believed the one or the other side of the question, so of course they would act The Government, however, believed in common with the unanimous opinion of the Road Board, that the present system was not a wise one to continue, and that the present was the proper time to provide for the maintenance of the roads from a fund specially raised for that purpose If the House, however, objected to the proposed plan, the Government were prepared to go on with the present system until the time should arrive when the House was of opinion that that system should be altered It was a question upon which hon members who knew the views of their constituencies as to which system was preferable might express opinions worthy of respect He would vote for the resolution, as he believed the money expended upon roads to be more remunerative than that spent in any other way except on railways, and that the inconvenience of the tax would be light compared with the advantage of having main roads running to all parts of the colony

Mr DUNN said that with regard to the Eastern-road which had been spoken off, and which was so cut up by the large stones and other heavy traffic carried over it, a gentleman had assured him that that road could be kept in thorough repair for £150 per mile, taking it 25 miles out This was much lower than the hon the Commissioner of Public Works' average of £200 per mile. He was also informed that £1 550 per mile was an ample sum for the construction of macadamized roads He was sorry he must go against the Ministry on this resolution, but he believed this was the worst time possible for putting a proposition before the public at large for a special tax, a general tax, or in fact a tax of any description He had been often in the House when motions came on which he did not quite understand (a laugh), and upon one of these occasions he had gone out of the House in order not to vote On another occasion an hon member, who was now sitting behind, told him that in such cases they should act like jurors, and give a verdict on the evidence before them (Laughter) He had been in the corn trade since 1844, and it had been during that time his principal business He believed the farming population had never been in so deplorable a state as they were in at the present moment (Hear hear, from Mr Solomon and one or two other members) He believed an extra tax upon the farmers now would be tantamount to the Sheriff's Officer at once (Hear, hear) Even as it was, a great many should give up, though, of course, there were some wealthy farmers as there were wealthy merchants or stockholders If the House imposed a special tax by which the farmers would be the greatest sufferers, they would not be able to pay it Besides, why impose an additional tax now, when the country paid as much as it could bear for the expenses of government for a population of but 100,000?

Mr Barrow said the hon member who had just sat down had stated that an hon member behind him had recommended him when he did not clearly understand a question before the House, to act as a Juror, and give a verdict (Laughter) He trusted the hon member did not refer to him (Mr Barrow), as, in that case, he must disclaim the intended compliment He (Mr Barrow) was, however, at present in something of the same condition of uncertainty as the hon member had spoken of on this occasion No doubt a good system of roads would be a great advantage to the colony, but a special tax would fall very inconveniently at the present moment It was quite true, as the hon the Attorney-General had said, that if we were to have good roads, we must submit to the necessary taxation with as good a grace as possible But it was not a question of taxation, but of the time of taxing—(hear)—and matters were not now in that flourishing condition which would induce people to look contentedly on the imposition of any new burthen He (Mr Barrow) thought it would be more in accordance with the views of the country, that we should reduce our expenditure—(hear, hear)—and obtain funds by this means He had no objection to an assessment on property for the maintenance of the roads if the time was favorable for its imposition, but notwithstanding what the hon the Treasurer had said concerning the impropriety of drawing any conclusions as to the prospects of the harvest, he (Mr Barrow) could not help saying that the prospects of the harvest were unfavourable. All the information which came to him lately was adverse to the conclusion that the harvest would be a good average He had had communications of an adverse character not only from the plains, from Gawler, and Kapunda, but from Clare and Riverton, whence he heard some time ago very favorable reports, but from which localities he had more recently received gloomy advices Around the Bremer and Lake Alexandrina, the crops were very bad, and even at Mount Gambier, and many other localities where some time since it was thought there would be an abundant harvest, later accounts show that if it reaches an average it was as much as could be expected From all he could learn he was compelled to think that the harvest would be below the average In such circumstances he thought it would be rather hard to levy a special tax on those who would suffer most considerably from the deficient harvest (Hear hear) He had calculated that if they were to levy a rate of 1s on all the assessed property in the districts, excluding Adelaide, and the other incorporated townships, it would produce about £22,500 a year, as the value of the assessed property in the 43 districts was about £450,000 If they were to pay at the rate of £200 per mile for the maintenance of roads, this rate of 1s in the pound on all assessed property, not including that in Adelaide and the other Corporations, would enable them to maintain about 112 miles per annum The Corporate towns would, he supposed, maintain their own roads as at present The amount of work thus done in return for a special tax would, he thought, scarcely be looked upon as sufficient value received by all those persons upon whom this assessment would fall with great weight It was a most inopportune time to impose such a tax (Hear) He could not say that on principle he objected to the proposal, but would rather take exception to the unfavourable time for giving effect to it There was also much uncertainty in the wording of the resolution What was called "a special assessment," might be endurable or unendurable (A laugh) There was something very indefinite in the wording, so that he scarcely knew how to vote for the resolution, though for some reasons he should like to do so It was also worthy of consideration whether there could be no better means devised than the present for making and repairing the roads He himself had sometimes seen good natural surface, which would have lasted for light traffic for many years, with an inconsiderable outlay, cut up and the natural footpath at the side excavated, in order to be thrown into the middle of the road, there to be pulverized into the finest dust the work of destruction, in fact, going on under the name of road-making (Hear) He could point out numerous places where he had seen these things done, whereas if the holes had been filled up with a little gravel or metal, a better result would have been attained at a tithe of the expense Of course, he did not then allude to the great central lines of heavy traffic, but it was a question whether they also should not be constructed on a different principle The Glen Osmond-road had been mentioned, and it was a question whether some sort of light tramway should not be substituted for the present expensively-metalled road At present, the country was sinking vast sums on the various roads, and getting very little return Whatever was done, they must have roads The colony could not develop itself without them, but still, the levying of a special tax, at the present moment, might be a remedy worse than the disease Taking into consideration, therefore, the prospect of a bad harvest, and the existing commercial depression, he scarcely saw his way clear to vote for new and additional taxation at the present moment

Mr Reynolds said if it was desirable to levy the tax it need not take effect for 12 months to come ("Hear, hear," from the Government benches) Even though things looked a little gloomy, he was surprised that the feeling of the House should be of such a desponding character He did not know whether this might arise from anticipated misfortunes, from the political results which might take place next week (Laughter) He did not know whether the prospect of losing our Government officers might have influenced the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) in giving so gloomy a picture of our condition (A laugh) He hoped that neither the Government nor the country would suppose that he was opposed to providing good roads, because he opposed the resolutions, though the hon the Attorney-General had put it in the light that if the House could not see the immediate necessity of an assessment of rateable property it could not want good roads In the next place he did not see the justice of levying an assessment on rateable property when there was such an assessment already in the District Councils. He (Mr Reynolds) did not like the idea of taxing the districts twice, and that merely in order to hand the Councils back a certain amount again He found that most Councils levied a rate of one shilling, and the Government was in the habit of giving an equal amount as a grant in aid for public works Why then should they levy an assessment on property in order to give back the 1s levied by the Council Why not levy 2s at once and not give Government the trouble of levying money in order to give it back again—taking it from one pocket to put it into the other?

The Commissioner of Public Works said it was true that many Councils levied one shilling, but in many important districts there were no Councils at all For instance, in the County of Light there was no Council, though it contained the town of Kapunda and the mines of Kooringa and the Burra The traffic from these mines destroyed a great portion of the main road, and it was but fair that these mines and townships should contribute equally with the rest of the colony to maintain the roads There were also a great number of Councils which did not levy a shilling rate, it was becoming less regular than formerly All persons in the colony, all who used the roads, were interested in their maintenance, and, therefore, the whole of these persons' properties should contribute He was aware that this was a very unsuitable time for levying a tax, but he could have wished that hon members had not held up such a gloomy picture of affairs He was not of a sanguine temperament, on the contrary, he erred rather on the other side, but he could not take so gloomy a view He knew one circumstance of a commercial character which he would mention to the House in refutation of what had been said At one of the banks of the province on the 4th of the present month there was not a single dishonored bill (Laughter) Hon members were aware that this was a very heavy month, and that almost all bills were payable on the 4th, so that this was a fact of great commercial interest If mercantile men attended to their business a little more, and curtailed their expenses—(cries of "hear, hear")—they would not be suffering so severely He was satisfied the colony was in a healthy state He had none of the gloomy anticipations of other hon members, and he believed we were passing through the worst of the crisis The Government put the question to the House, "How are we to maintain our main roads?" and hon members could not get out of the difficulty by saying that this was not a convenient time to answer He would leave the resolution in the hands of the Committee

Mr Lindsay said some hon members seemed to be impressed with a great horror of taxation, and no doubt it was a very unpleasant thing, and if they could do without taxation in constructing their roads, he for one should feel exceedingly pleased But they must be taxed either one way or the other, and if not for roads it would be in the extra cost of cartage His hon colleague had said that the Government should have introduced some general system, and no doubt it was desirable that they should do so, but that was not the question they were called upon to decide then Their business now was to say whether the repair of the main roads when constructed should be provided for by a special imposition on the rateable property of the province It had been said by the hon member for Flinders that the construction and maintenance of their roads should be placed on a better footing, which indeed was their object, and it had been likewise said that they had been prodigal in declaring their main lines of road He thought they might agree to both of these propositions, and with respect to the latter, that they would have to strike out some lines of main road which had been uselessly declared and add to others With respect to a remark which had fallen from one hon member, it was a fact that many of their lines of main road were not permanently laid out, and it was desirable that they should be made permanent as soon as possible The Attorney-General had said that if there was not a special tax imposed, the alternative would be that the roads would have to be neglected, but instead of adopting either of those propositions, he (Mr Lindsay) thought they might entertain the principle of making the roads, and of then handing them over to local bodies for maintenance This principle has been adopted in connection with the Port-road, and also on the main road through Gawler Town, and if it was a correct one, he did not see why they should not entertain it He could not see any good in deferring the present question to a future time, and if they discussed the matter now, they would be better able to fix upon some perfect system the next session He was convinced that if they did not submit to be taxed for the construction and maintenance of their main roads, they would have to pay a tax in some other form

Mr Solomon said those hon members who had gone before him had argued that this was not the proper time to impose a fresh tax He perfectly agreed in this expression of opinion, and for that reason he should support the amendment before the Committee In the present gloomy state of affairs, which had been referred to, he could not see any inducement to levy a fresh tax without some commensurate advantage were to be derived from it, and that had not been proved He was certainly rather surprised to hear the Commissioner of Public Works state as an evidence of things not being so gloomy as had been supposed, that on the 4th of this month not a single bill had been dishonored But if that hon gentleman could only have a peep into the counting houses of Messrs Wicksteed, Botting, and Co, and Messrs Solomon and Co, he would perhaps come to a different conclusion The fact, he believed, was that merchants and others had to renew those bills which were said not to be dishonored It was a very easy thing to say, when the Banks had contracted their discounts that no bills had been dishonored, and if, as he anticipated, the Banks still further contracted their discounts, then no doubt they would have no dishonored bills at all (Laughter) The Commissioner of Public Works had said that he saw the necessity for the Kapunda Mine contributing a fair share to the support of the roads, and no doubt it was quite just that it should do so, but then they must remember that the assessment would be general, that the agricultural interest was at that time in a most depressed state, and that therefore the effect of carrying out his (the Commissioner of Public Works') proposal would be this, that instead of doing a little evil that great good might come, it would be doing a great evil that a little good might come (A laugh) He (Mr Solomon) was not sanguine, like the hon Commissioner of Public Works, of the prosperity which was looming in the future He had formed this impression from the depressed state the agricultural interest was in at the present time (Hear) This was not likely to be alleviated, for in his opinion they would only get deeper and deeper into their difficulties It was not the time, therefore, to impose a tax upon persons who already were weighed down by their difficulties and he should therefore oppose the original resolution and vote for the amendment

Mr Duffield said in some respects he agreed with the last speaker but in others he totally differed from him They all knew the beneficial effects produced to the farming population in the reduction of their expenses, by the improvement of the roads Those persons who had any experience in the matter would know the expense to which the farmer was sometimes exposed in putting perhaps eight or ten bullocks into a dray with a light load, and then probably winding-up with the loss of the pole and other considerable inconvenience He could not agree that this was not the time to alter a system which was confessedly admitted to be a bad one, and he thought the sooner it was remedied the better for the agricultural interests and the community generally He had been surprised at the contrary opinions which had fallen from the Treasury benches, inasmuch as one hon gentleman on those benches admitted the colony was at present in a depressed state, and another (the Commissioner of Public Works) declared that it was not so He (Mr Duffield) was convinced that so far as the agricultural interest was affected there was nothing which could happen at this late period of the year to make the crops even average ones It would be remembered that in September last, when the Governor s speech was discussed, he (Mr Duffield) expressed it as his opinion that that portion of it which referred to their then alleged "commercial prosperity" was not justified by their position That expression of opinion was then challenged by the hon member for East Torrens, and ——

Mr Barrow submitted to the Speaker that the hon member was not in order in referring to a previous debate

The Speaker ruled that he was not in order

Mr Duffield was under the impression that he was travelling within due bounds

The Speaker explained that no hon member could refer to a previous debate in that session, unless it were upon the motion under discussion

Mr Duffield proceeded, and said that the opinion he had then expressed fully tallied with the experience of their present "commercial prosperity," and was, therefore, fully justified It was a well ascertained fact that the colony was not now in a prosperous state He was not second to any one in stating his views when called upon to do so, and he would say that the same perseverance and energy which had always characterised the colonists of South Australia would enable them to pass through their present state of financial depression They must only make up their minds to husband their resources, and continue the same energy and perseverance which they had hitherto exhibited, and no doubt their difficulties would be surmounted, One hon member had suggested that a Select Committee should be appointed to enquire into the matter, but he (Mr Duffield) thought if he knew who were the gentlemen who were to form that Select Committee he would also be able to tell in what districts the roads would be constructed and cared for (A laugh from Mr Townsend) No doubt the hon member for Onkaparinga would, if on that Committee, get a road to Nairne, and the hon member for Burra and Clare, if in the same position, would take care that the roads in that district should occupy a place on the new schedule But he was not sure but that it might be desirable to appoint a Select Committee to enquire into the whole system of the maintenance and construction of our main roads As to the resolution before the House, he could assure them that the people were opposed to it, nor was it likely that a Road Bill, embodying the same principle, would be passed through that House He considered that the best course to adopt would be for the House to resume, and for a Committee to be appointed to enquire into the whole subject He could not agree to the amendment proposed, that the resolution should be read that day six months, nor could he support the resolution itself, as it was too bald He thought some system might be devised to meet the difficulty, such as a tax upon vehicles—that those persons who used the roads should pay for their maintenance By this means the produce from the mines would be indirectly taxed

Mr Strangways asked the Speaker whether his amendment had been put

The Chairman replied that it had not yet been put to the House but that of course he should feel it incumbent upon him to do so

Mr Mildred opposed the resolution, but thought at the same time that postponing the question would only place them in a worse position He thought some other means might be devised by which a tax should be placed on some article of general consumption, and that they allow the roads to stand under the present regulations The proposed additional tax upon the country districts for the maintenance of the main roads was very uncalled-for and unjust The people composing each district might very properly say, "if we give you good district roads you should give us good main roads " He hoped the Government would see fit to withdraw these resolutions, as not only were they objected to by the House, but they were offensive, he was assured, throughout the colony If they (the Government) could not devise a better plan he should move, "that the present assessment made by the District Councils should be deducted from the gross assessment," that was, if the gross assessment were 2s in the pound, the shilling in the pound they were now paying should be deducted

Mr Strangways moved that the House resume

The Chairman was understood to convey an intimation to the hon member that his motion was irregular, as he had already proposed an amendment

Mr Bacot hoped the Commissioner of Public Works would withdraw his resolution, that the House might then resume He thought it would be equitable if the main roads could be kept up as in Ireland by one half of the expense drawn from the general revenue and the other half raised in the boundaries through which the roads passed There was one portion of the resolution which he was in favor of, that which provided for a contribution from those who occupied the waste lands of the Crown The general effect of the resolution, however was not politic, and in order that some other scheme might be devised he should move that the House resume, and the Speaker report progress

The motion was carried The House resumed and the Speaker reported progress

The Attorney-General said, in answer to the Speaker, that he would not fix a day when the Committee should have leave to sit again (A laugh)

MESSAGE FROM LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Messages Nos 14 and 15 were received from the Legislative Council, the former returning the "Railway Clauses Consolidation Amendment Bill, with certain amendments, and the latter the "Supreme Court Procedure Further Amendment Bill" with the same The consideration of the amendment in the former was made an Order of the Day for Friday

RETURN OF PRISONERS

The Attorney-General laid upon the table of the House a return of prisoners transmitted from the South Eastern District asked for by the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake)

APPOINTMENT OF A THIRD JUDGE

Mr Barrow moved pursuant to notice—

"That the House will, on Thursday, 18th November, go into Committee of the whole to consider the question of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, affirming the desirableness of appointing a third Judge of the Supreme Court, and requesting that the Government may be instructed to prepare and bring in a Bill on the subject "

The hon member said that in doing so he would make but few remarks He had heard it frequently stated that the administration of justice at the Supreme Court was not in such a state as to give general satisfaction to the community, but he would wish it to be distinctly understood that in making those remarks he did not intend even in the remotest degree to convey thereby any reflection upon the learned gentlemen at present filling the high offices of Judges in this province It was not from any doubt of their learning, or superior attainments, or from any suspicion that they had on any occasion departed from the strict line of justice that he brought forward the present question, but it was because when they had two Judges only, as at present, the administration of justice was frequently in danger of being brought to a dead lock through the very conscientiousness of the Judges, one Judge deciding one way, and the other holding a directly opposite opinion This they would admit, was not a satisfactory state of things to perpetuate, and it therefore required a remedy Arguments might be brought forward in support of having only one Judge in preference to three, so that the difficulty he had mentioned might be avoided, but he would state in connection with this subject, that he did not propose the appointment of a third Judge merely for the sake of facilitating the business of the Supreme Court, but also, and specially with the view of procuring the more efficient, speedy, and economical dispensation of justice throughout the country districts (Hear, hear) Whether this should be effected by Judges going on circuit by the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Local Courts in the country, or by any other means, he could not then affirm He repeated that he would not, as a non-professional member, have introduced the motion if it merely referred to the working of the business of the Supreme Court, but he did so because he believed that at the same time the facilities for the administration of justice in the country districts might be greatly increased, and the expense much reduced In the outlying districts at the present time it was frequently the case that criminals were allowed to escape because those who had been wronged submitted to other wrongs rather than come to town, and be thereby put to the great trouble, serious loss of time, and ruinous expense of prosecuting them He hoped the hon member for Barossa (Mr Bakewell) would not rise on this occasion, as on a former one, and declare that he (Mr Barrow) had not made out a case, — (a laugh) — on the contrary, he trusted that hon gentleman would support the motion, and, in the remarks he made, supply any deficiency of argument on his (Mr Barrow's) part, which he (Mr Bakewell) was so peculiarly fitted to do from his professional experience He would state again that he hoped it would not be supposed for one moment that he intended any reflection upon the Judges of the Supreme Court of this colony

Mr Lindsay would support the motion He thought it desirable that they should discuss whether a third Judge was required or not, although he was not prepared to pledge himself to the necessity for it There was one strong objection to the appointment of Judges, that was, their being such expensive officers In the United States the remuneration to them was considerably less than here, and he thought that there were many briefless barristers at home who would be glad to accept such an appointment at a considerably less salary than that which was now being paid

Mr Bakewell would support the motion When Judge Crawford was appointed, two Judges were considered to be necessary and he was convinced that not more than one-half of the business was done in the Supreme Court then that was now Therefore, if two Judges were considered necessary then, three Judges would not be more than sufficient under their altered circumstances Besides the Matrimonial Bill might give them more employment He was sensible of the inconveniences which at present existed in the Supreme Court from the want of a third Judge Such cases as contrariety of opinion with the Judges frequently happened at home, under similar circumstances In the highest legal tribunal at home, the House of Lords, it has been decided that no business should be proceeded with unless three law lords were in attendance (The hon member quoted the opinion of Lord Lyndhurst on the subject) At Westminster it was repeatedly the case for the Judges to differ What had happened in England might be very well anticipated in this colony He (Mr Bakewell) was of opinion that prompt judgment was better, even if erroneous, than a righteous judgment deferred for a length of time would be to one who had all his property dissipated in gaining it He considered even one Judge would be better than two Who ever heard of two arbitrators? and the same thing would apply to the action of two Judges He cordially supported the resolution

MESSAGES FROM THE GOVERNOR

The following messages were received from His Excellency the Governor —No 16, complying with the address of the House for the revival of the Gold Discovery Reward Fund, No 15, complying with the address referring to the Police Force Regulations, No, 14, complying with address on Port Lincoln Jetty, No 13, complying with address on Money Order Officers

APPOINTMENT OF THIRD JUDGE (RESUMED)

Mr Strangways said, as a discussion would take place when they went into Committee, he should move that the House do now divide

The Speaker then put the motion for going into Committee on Thursday next, which was carried

SUNDAY RAILWAY TRAFFIC

Mr Cole asked the Commissioner of Public Works, pursuant to notice—

"If he is aware of the fact of trucks having been employed in conveying stone and wool to the Adelaide Railway Station on Sunday, 7th November, and if so, is such traffic carried on with the sanction of the Government?"

He said, since he had tabled this motion, he had found that the traffic he complained of had been repeated again last Sunday. He thought if the Government were cognizant of the fact they would not tolerate such a desecration of the Sabbath

The Commissioner of Public Works said he had not been aware of the fact of the traffic having taken place as alleged However, the explanation from the Traffic Manager stated that it had been the case only three times during the past year In the cases named there had not been a sufficient number of waggons to warrant the sending out of a special engine, but quite sufficient to have put the manager to inconvenience on the Monday morning if they had not been removed on the Sunday The Commissioners had advised him also, that since they had been in office the trains had not run on either line during morning service, and every effort was made to interfere as little as possible with the Sunday He entirely agreed with the course taken by the Commissioners, and no other course would be sanctioned by the Government

Mr Duffield said, that last Sunday several trucks of wool from Gawler, and stone from the Dry Creek, passed along the line, and, if in order, he would ask the Commissioner of Public Works for some explanation of this repetition of that which Mr Cole complained of

The Commissioner of Public Works was not able to reply to the question further than he had done

Mr Strangways asked whether it was not often the case in England for goods vans and trucks to be attached to the passenger trains

The Commissioner of Public Works was not in a position to reply to the question

MAIN ROADS

Mr Rogers's motion with respect to the introduction of a new system of main roads lapsed

MAGILL LINE

Mr Townsend moved that the petition from the inhabitants of the Great Eastern or Magill line of road, should be printed

Carried

The House then adjourned at 20 minutes past 3

Wednesday, November 17

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o clock

RETURNS

The Commissioner of Crown Lands laid upon the table various returns which had been called for, and which were ordered to be printed

DATE OF ACTS BILL

Mr Strangways said that he had intended to move the House into Committee for the consideration of the Date of Acts Bill, but before doing so, he would state that he had been informed the Attorney-General was desirous of moving some amendments and if those amendments were likely to occupy any considerable time, he would move that the consideration of the Date of Acts Bill be made an Order of the Day for some future day, as he observed a very important notice of motion upon the paper

The Attorney-General said that the amendments which he was desirous of proposing were simply to bring the provisions of the Bill into conformity with what had been the previous practice of both Houses of the Legislature The object of the Bill was one in which he concurred He concurred in the general principle of the Bill, but he was desirous of making some amendments in order that there might be no alteration in the existing arrangements Unless the hon member had some objection to such amendments as he had suggested, he believed that the whole of them might be got through in a quarter of an hour

Mr Strangways said his own view in reference to the amendments which he had heard it was the intention of the hon the Attorney-General to propose was, that he did not think he could acquiesce in them If the hon the Attorney-General would state what his amendments were that he and other hon members might have an opportunity of considering their effect, he would move that the consideration in Committee of the Date of Acts Bill be made an Order of the Day for that day week

The Speaker said that the better way would be for the hon member to move the House into Committee, and then the amendments which the Attorney General intended to propose could be printed

Mr Strangways having acquiesced, the House went into Committee

The Attorney General moved an amendment to the effect that Bills should be endorsed by the Clerk of the Council or the Clerk of the Assembly, according to the branch of the Legislature in which they were originated. At the present time, as the House were probably aware, the practice was in accordance with the amendment which he proposed. The practice was that Bills which were originated in that branch of the Legislature, after being assented to with or without amendments, were sent by the Speaker of that House to the Governor, and Bills which were originated in the other branch of the Legislature were sent by the President of the Council to the Governor, so that the proper plan, or the plan at present in existence, was that the Bill was endorsed by the Clerk of the House in which the Bill was ultimately passed. No reason had been suggested for any alteration, nor was he aware of any cause for such an alteration as the Bill before the House proposed to effect. He, therefore, moved an amendment to the effect he had mentioned.

Mr STRANGWAYS believed that the amendment which was proposed was in accordance with the present practice of the Legislature, but in order to assimilate the practice to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, it was desirable or necessary that the Bills should be endorsed by the Clerk of the Legislative Council, who would be required in fact to act as Clerk of Parliament. It was customary for His Excellency the Governor to go to the Legislative Council for the purpose of giving his assent to Acts and the Clerk of the Council made his endorsement upon the Acts whether they had been assented to, dissented from, or reserved for the Royal assent. If the amendment proposed by the Hon the Attorney-General was carried the effect would be that two persons would be required to do the work of one man. The object of introducing the present Bill was in fact to do away with the necessity of introducing in every Bill a short clause stating when the Act should take effect.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member was in error in presuming that the Bill proposed to assimilate the practice here to the practice of the Imperial Parliament. In England the Bills were endorsed, not by the Clerk of the House of Lords, but by the Clerk of Parliament. Here, however, there was no such officer as the Clerk of Parliament, and he thought the only proper course was that the Bills should be endorsed by the Clerk of the particular branch of the Legislature in which they originated and were formally passed. It was the duty of the Clerk of such branch of the Legislature to endorse the day upon which they received such assent.

The amendment was carried and some other amendments having been agreed to, the Bill was reported, and the consideration of the report in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Friday.

LANDS TITLES REGISTRATION OFFICE

Mr STRANGWAYS moved—

"That there be laid on the table of this House the following returns from the Lands Titles Registration Office, viz —A return of the number of applications to bring property under the Real Property Act, the number of properties brought under the Act, and the number of applications rejected, the number of land grants issued since the 1st of July last, the number of transactions that have taken place under the Act, specifying the nature (whether mortgage, lease, &c), the gross amount of fees received, stating in detail for what the fees were paid, the gross amount of sums received for the insurance fund, the number and nature of transactions that have been attempted under the Act, and have not been carried out giving the cause of failure when known, and a return of the average weekly receipts of the office."

The hon member with the permission of the House amended his motion by the insertion of the words "giving the amount of insurance paid upon grants of land purchased since the 1st of July last." He believed that there would be no objection on the part of the Government to furnish the return in the form in which he desired it, so that it would furnish all the information which he desired, but if that were not the case he must again ask permission to amend his motion, though the effect would be to make the returns much more voluminous. The reason of his asking for such returns was to place the House in possession of information in reference to the working of the Real Property Act. At present there were all kinds of reports in circulation in reference to the working of that Act, some asserting that it was working as well as its most zealous supporters could desire, others, that there was nothing at all doing under the Act, and others that, although it cost £500 per month, the receipts under it did not exceed £70. He wished to have an opportunity of ascertaining whether these reports were correct or not, he wished to know how the Real Property Act was really working. He was informed moreover that before any very great time had elapsed hon members would be called upon to consider very considerable amendments which would be proposed in the Bill, but before they were called upon to consider such amendments they should, he considered, have the most accurate information before them in reference to the working of the Bill. With reference to the amount which was received from the insurance fund, he believed that by the provisions of the Act insurance could only be charged on property brought under the operation of the Act which had been sold before the 1st July last but he had been informed that the Lands Titles Office was in the habit of charging insurance upon property sold since the 1st July, and he was informed that one gentleman had been subjected to a charge of £16, which was never contemplated by the Act. This might or might not be correct, at all events, it was desirable the House should be informed of the number of applications which had been made to bring property alienated from the Crown before the 1st July last, under the operations of this Act. He did not want the return to extend to every separate portion of a section, but it would be sufficient if they were in accordance with the Gazette notices, that is, if six or eight notices were included in one application, he should consider that one application. He had been informed that numerous applications which had been made to bring property under the Act had been rejected, though upon what grounds he had not ascertained, but it was right the House should be informed. He apprehended there would be very little difficulty in giving the return which he asked for in reference to the amount of fees but at the same time, as he had before stated, he did not wish to have a return of the fees charged upon every property, though at the same time if any charges had been made which were not mentioned in the Act, he should like to have a return of them. He also wished for a return of the gross amount of fees received under the insurance fund, and he also wished to have a separate return of the fees received in respect of property purchased since the 1st July last.

Mr GLYDE seconded the motion.

Mr MILDRED wished to ask the Attorney-General whether it was true that an Amended Real Property Bill was in the hands of the printer.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if so, it was without his knowledge.

Mr BARROW said the hon member for Encounter Bay had stated that he believed that House and the country stood in need of information in reference to the Lands Titles Registration Department, and he (Mr Barrow) thought so too. It would be in the recollection of the House that only a short time ago he tabled a motion upon the subject, but that motion, in consequence of other business, disappeared from the paper. He would venture to express an opinion that more information than that which was alluded to by the hon member for Encounter Bay was desirable and might readily be procured. If mere answers to the questions referred to were received, there would be a considerable amount of information withheld, and he (Mr Barrow) therefore thought that the motion of the hon member had better be amended in some such manner as the following:—

"That there be laid on the table of this House the following returns and reports from the Lands Titles Registration Office, viz —

"1 A return of the number of applications to bring land under the Real Property Act, the number of applications rejected, the number withdrawn, the number remaining under consideration, the number approved, the number of transfers executed under the Act, the number of leases, the number of mortgages, the number of encumbrances.

"2 A return of the total value of the land represented by approved applications brought under the Act, the total value of land brought under the Act by alienation from the Crown, the amount secured by mortgage or encumbrance.

"3 A return of the fees collected and payable, distinguished under the several heads of 'Application fees, payable to the Commissioners,' 'Fees for assurance of title,' and 'Registration fees, payable to General Revenue account.

"4 A return of the number and nature of transactions that have been attempted under the Act, and have not been carried out with the causes of failure as far as known, the causes which have operated to retard the general adoption of the Act, as far as such causes are known.

"5 A return of the principal defects of the Act, as yet developed in its working; the beneficial results as yet developed in its working.

"6 An explanatory statement, with forms and examples, exhibiting the procedure and working of the system pursued in the Lands Titles Registration Office, with estimates of the cost of conducting the entire business of the colony under that system.

"7 A report contrasting that system with the method of registration as conducted in this colony under Acts prior to the 1st July last, with any suggestions the Registrar-General may be enabled to offer for reducing the large expenditure at present incurred for registration generally in this colony. Such returns and reports to be brought down to the latest convenient date."

If that information could be obtained and he was in a position to say it could be obtained, the House would have a much more complete case before it than if the information were confined to what appeared in the motion of the hon member for Encounter Bay. Unless the hon member was prepared to adopt the amendment in preference to the proposition which he (Mr Strangways) had brought before the House, he (Mr Barrow) should certainly feel disposed to bring forward his proposition as an amendment.

Mr MILNE seconded the amendment.

Mr STRANGWAYS would have been most happy to adopt the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens, Mr Barrow, indeed if he had not been in a hurry when he drew up his motion, he should certainly have asked for more information than was at present involved in the motion, but he felt there were some returns asked for in the amendment which would considerably pose the Registrar-General. However glad, indeed, the Registrar-General might be to afford the information referred to or however happy the House might be to receive it, he felt that the Registrar-General would have considerable difficulty in furnishing it. The Registrar-General would certainly have to consult the Attorney-General upon the subject, for from the information which was asked for, the Registrar-General would require to be a perfect master of real property law, past, present, and future. However deeply the Registrar-General might look into real property law, he questioned whether he would be enabled to afford the information which was asked for. He should, however, be happy to adopt the amendment.

Mr. Barrow asked if the hon. member was replying?

The Speaker presumed so.

Mr. Strangways said that after the hon. member for East Torrens had brought forward his amendment, he waited some time, but as no other hon. member appeared disposed to rise, he rose for the purpose of stating that he should be happy to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for East Torrens. He repeated, however, that whilst the returns asked for by the amendment would afford most useful information to the House, and would enable hon. members to become excellent real property lawyers, he believed the Registrar-General would have great difficulty in furnishing those returns. He adopted, however, the amendment in place of the original motion upon the understanding that the returns as to facts were to be furnished as quickly as possible and those as to effects after being fully considered by the Registrar-General, the Lands Titles Commissioners and their legal advisers, should also be furnished with as little delay as possible. His object in making this proviso was that if the House were to wait till the whole of the returns had been prepared he believed they would not be presented to the House during the present session, but this difficulty would be got over if the questions of fact were to be answered now, and those of law afterwards.

The Attorney-General quite agreed, as he was sure the House would, that it was important the questions of fact should be distinguished from those of opinion. It was quite right, if the House required it, that they should obtain the opinion of the Registrar-General or any other officer of the Government, but after all it was for the House to form an opinion from the facts before it, and the facts should be carefully separated from the inferences. He should take care in furnishing the report that the facts were separated from the other portions of the report.

The motion (that is the amendment brought forward by Mr. Barrow) was carried.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Upon the motion of Mr. Glyde, seconded by Captain Hart, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole for the consideration of the following resolution, viz.:—

"That this House is of opinion that the estimated amount of Ways and Means for the first six months of 1859, as laid on the table by the Treasurer (Mr. Finniss), will not be realized, and considers that the best and most prudent method of meeting the financial difficulties arising from a decreasing revenue, will be by reducing the expenditure on establishments and immigration, and not by curtailing the amount appropriated to public works."

He regretted that the mention of this motion should have led to an hour's useless discussion on Friday last, but he would endeavour to explain in few words how this occurred. He and other hon. members were completely taken by surprise on Thursday last upon finding the first item on the Estimates under discussion so much earlier than was anticipated. He had been in consultation with the hon. member for the Port (Capt. Hart), and expected that a long debate would take place upon the financial policy of the Government, but finding that the first item on the Estimates had been put, he presumed it was too late to ask the House to enter upon a debate upon the financial policy of the Government, and therefore it was that upon the following day he prepared the motion which he had now the honor to bring forward and which he had presented to the House on Friday last. He wished to enter upon this explanation to shew that there was nothing extraordinary in taking the course which he did as the acknowledged friend of the Government. (Laughter.) He contended there was nothing at all extraordinary in taking the course which he was now taking. He was a professed friend of the Government. (Laughter.) He did not wish in introducing this motion to shew any hostility to the Government, but as an honest independent member, he claimed the right of expressing an honest opinion upon all measures affecting the general prosperity of the colony. He had always supported the Ministers when he believed they were right, but he was perfectly prepared to oppose them when he believed they were wrong. He believed that hon. members would give him the credit of saying that he did not often trouble the House with long speeches; in fact he should have been better satisfied on the present occasion if he could have sat still and assented to the Estimates which the Treasurer had placed before the House. But he felt that he could not do so when he found that during 18 months they had spent £115,000 more than they had earned, that during the last 12 months they had spent £86,000 more than they had earned, and that during the last quarter they had spent £60,000 more than they had earned. The estimates of expenditure for 1858 were £136,000 more than the actual revenue, and he found that the balance in hand as savings was gradually slipping away, and that the country would not have more than £150,000 in hand at the end of the present year. If the estimates of expenditure as at present before the House were adopted, he believed that at the end of 1859 the Government of the colony would be something like insolvent. When he remembered that they had had an exceedingly bad harvest and that the prospect of the coming harvest was worse, when he remembered that the exports of the colony during the past 12 months had decreased to the extent of a quarter of million sterling, when the warehouses were glutted with imported goods—he could not sit quietly down and vote away the sums which it was proposed to expend by the Estimates before the House. He could not support the Government in what he must consider an extravagant expenditure compared with their means. He could not support them in voting away the public money in the extravagant manner which was proposed. It had been said by some hon. members and others that it was a very injudicious thing on his part to bring forward a motion of this kind; it was said that it was injudicious to talk about the difficulties under which the colony was laboring. It was said that to talk about their difficulties was the way to increase them; but he must beg to differ with those who held such opinions, believing that it would tend to advance the prosperity of South Australia to look their difficulties in the face, and to let people outside see that they were not afraid to face them. He believed that the people generally would be more likely to put their shoulders to the wheel to advance the general prosperity of the colony, if they found that their representatives in that House sympathised with them, and endeavored to overcome the difficulties by which they were surrounded by retrenchments in Government departments. Again, it had been said by some that it was imprudent to bring forward the motion, as it would tend to injure the colony at home with the holders of South Australian bonds; but he must entirely differ with those who held such an opinion, believing that parties upon the Stock Exchange would be more likely to lend their money when they found there was a disposition to reduce the extravagant expenditure in the colony and thus meet their difficulties instead of going on in the extravagant way which they hitherto had. It was absurd to suppose that parties upon the Stock Exchange were ignorant of the financial position of the colony. So far from such being the case they were not only perfectly well acquainted with the financial position of the colony, but with her expenditure, and in the course of another month those parties and the holders of the bonds of the colony would be in possession of the fact that the colony had only £165,000 left. When this fact became known and the further fact that the expenditure of the colony was upon as extravagant a scale as ever, parties who had hitherto advanced money upon the security of the colony would button up their pockets and refuse to make further advances. If the House took the course which he trusted they would on the present occasion, the debate would do good, as when parties at home ascertained that retrenchment had been determined upon, they would say that the people of South Australia were determined to act like honest men, and to reduce their expenditure by turning off their servants rather than not meet their liabilities. Before proceeding to examine the estimated Ways and Means in detail he would refer to the statement, the financial statement of the hon. the Treasurer. He presumed he would be permitted to quote from what he presumed would be recognised as a faithful record of the hon. gentleman's statement.

The Treasurer said he had not yet had an opportunity of examining the statement, the figures in which might or might not be correct.

The Speaker said the hon. member, Mr. Glyde, would be perfectly in order in referring to the statement of the hon. the Treasurer, but it must be from his own memory alone, as he would see by turning to Standing Order 120.

Mr. Glyde was not aware that he would have been prevented by the rules of the House from quoting from the published statement of the Treasurer's statement.

The Treasurer had not the slightest objection to the hon. member quoting from the paper, but he merely wished it to be understood that he should not consider himself bound by the figures.

Mr. Townsend presumed that if the hon. member were allowed to depart from the rules of the House in this instance that other hon. members would be allowed to do so on other occasions.

Mr. Glyde would get over the difficulty by putting the paper aside. He did not wish to read it, but would trust his memory. The Treasurer in introducing the Estimates to the House had stated in a particularly jaunty manner that it was immaterial whether the £10,000 proposed to be raised by assessment on stock were allowed or not, as if the House did not vote it, if it were disallowed there would still be a surplus of £9,000. There was another statement which was made by the hon. gentleman, which had particularly struck him and no doubt had struck other hon. members. He alluded to the statement made by the hon. gentleman in reference to the money which he asked for the defences of the colony. The hon. gentleman had stated that 700 men would be necessary for the defence of the colony if they were to have a force fit for anything better than amusement or than for playing at soldiers The hon gentleman estimated the cost of these 700 men at £6,300, but though the hon gentleman had said that if the number were less the money would be thrown away, that it would in fact be expended in nothing more than an absurd amusement, he had still estimated the annual cost at £4 500, and put down a proximate amount for six months—he had been surprised to find that a sum of £4,500 was required for the first six months In reading over the Treasurer's statement, it struck him that the hon gentleman's statements and figures justified quite as gloomy a prospect as he (Mr Glyde) could draw, but the hon gentleman's inferences and deductions were quite different After telling them that there was a great decrease in the importation of wines, that there was a great decrease in their exports, and that in the land sales they must expect the falling off would be considerable, after telling them that the monetary pressure was extreme—still the hon gentleman went on to say that he believed the revenue for the first six months of 1859 would be maintained The mere reading of the Treasurer's speech was quite enough to make any hon member of that House look into details He (Mr Glyde) had gone into detail, he had gone into the Ways and Means, and he was no alarmist, he was not disposed to exaggerate, but he could not believe that the proper course for hon members to pursue after ascertaining how matters really stood, was to say "it's all right," but to look the difficulties under which they were laboring in the face He took the first item of Ways and Means, £27,661 6s 9d, the estimated balance available for the service of 1859 brought forward from Supplementary Estimates He presumed that this would be realised but he hoped the Treasurer would kindly explain why he brought down an item of £4,300 as a probable saving, as it appeared by a paper which had been laid upon the table of the House, that the sum of £73,000 to which it had reference had been raised and spent He presumed that some satisfactory explanation could be given on this point The second item was, "probable excess of receipts over estimated Ways and Means for 1858, £15,000" He felt satisfied in the first instance that this amount would not be realized, but he had subsequently seen reason to change his opinion, and he believed it would be. He found the estimated revenue for 1858 was £414,000, to which adding this £15,000, the amount would be £429 000 Now the revenue for the first three quarters of the year had been only £332,000, leaving a sum of nearly £100,000 to be gained during the last quarter He had felt pretty confident that this sum would not be realised but he found that this quarter had received the advantage of a £20,000 land sale at the end of September, so that it was not improbable this £15,000 would be realized Still he considered it would have been quite sufficient to have taken credit for £10,000 The revenue for the last quarter only amounted to £100,000, and consisted of several items which would not be realized during the present quarter He did not object to the item of £15,000, but he threw out the remarks which he had for the consideration of hon members whether implicit dependence could be placed upon it He now came to the principal source of revenue, £90,000 from the sale of Crown lands He had no hesitation in saying that amount would never be realized during the first six months, and he would state the reasons which had led him to that conclusion There could be no doubt that the monetary pressure was extreme The small farmers and the large squatters were alike in the same position and consequently they must expect a gradual falling off in the land sales It was true that last month there was a haul of about £7,000, but of this amount Mr Leake took up about £5,000 worth The amount taken up during the present month by private contract was only £400 worth, and the total amount during the present quarter had been only £21 000 He had conversed with half a-dozen of the leading land agents in the colony, and had asked them what amount would probably be realized from land sales to the end of the year, and they had agreed with him that half of the lots would be passed At the end of the year he observed there was a land sale which would probably realize £3,000 or £4,000, but in the present state of the money market this would be equivalent to giving gentlemen who it was known would buy, land at £1 1s per acre The Government would thus be giving away the property of the people at a very unremunerating price He had also taken the opinion and advice of half a-dozen leading land agents as to the amount which would probably be realized during the first six months of 1859, and all agreed with him that it was impossible unless indeed some thing most unforeseen should occur, that anything like £90,000 could be realized All sorts of opinions were, it was true, held upon the point, some being of opinion that not more than £50,000 would be realized He had no wish to exaggerate the monetary depression which existed, but it was notorious that the banks would not advance a shilling to parties to assist them in the purchase of land, the farmers were as bare of cash as possible, the crops were exceedingly deficient, and there was no prospect of a remunerative market on the other side It was notorious that parties who had been in the habit of purchasing for re-sale were choked with land Let them look down the columns of the Advertiser or the Chronicle and they would see advertisements of hundreds of sections for sale, so that it was quite clear that nothing like £90,000 would be realized In fact as he had before stated, some were of opinion that there would not be a larger sum than £50,000 realized from the land sales He was not disposed to think that the sum would be quite so low, but he did not think the amount would much exceed £60,000 He would, however give the Government credit for receiving £70 000 during the first six months He had made his calculations upon the assumption that the land sales would be conducted in a fair and proper manner, but even if the Government picked out the choicest sections they could find he did not believe that such a sum as £90,000 could be realized He would now proceed to the item of Customs, in reference to which there were, perhaps more reliable data than any other The first thing which struck him in looking at this item was that the Treasurer had taken credit for £4 000 more than had been derived from this source during the last six months, the amount set down being £77,000, whilst the amount realized during the last six months had been only £73 000 The Treasurer might not be aware of the depression which existed in commercial circles, but that great depression did exist was beyond all doubt The hon gentleman should have borne in mind that the imports for the first six months of 1859 depended upon the orders from merchants which had gone home during the last two or three months, and it was notorious that during the last few months the colony had been laboring under great monetary depression, and consequently, that very few orders had gone home The colony was, in fact, glutted with goods to a greater extent than had been the case for many years It was consequently improbable that during the next six months anything like the quantity of goods could arrive that had arrived during the past It might be said that importations did not depend upon orders sent from this, but that parties were in the habit of consigning large quantities of goods to the colony He was convinced that at least two-thirds of the imports to the colony came out on account of South Australia It was notorious that every shopkeeper in Adelaide imported more or less on his own account If he did not import direct, he sent home indents, which amounted to the same thing It was true that in many instances the manufacturers to whom these indents were sent, sent out duplicate goods upon their own account (A voice—"More shame for them") He agreed that in many cases it was shameful, but still that it was done was notorious No orders, then, having been sent for goods, they must not shut their eyes to the fact that during the first six months of 1859 there was a very strong probability of a falling off in the importations of drapery, boots and shoes, and luxuries of various kinds He totally differed with the Treasurer as to the amount which would probably be realized from duty on spirits, for there had been a decline from that source observable for months past, and it was by no means difficult to account for this, as there was a considerable amount of illicit distillation, and a rumor having existed that there would probably be a reduction in the duty had operated upon the minds of holders, and a large quantity of spirits had in consequence been kept in bond He found that the duties upon beer and wines had fallen off considerably, and the fact should not be lost sight of that fewer ships came to the port during the first six months of the year than the last He could not see how the Treasurer could shut his eyes to this fact and put down £77,000 as the amount which would probably be realized, when his own figures showed that last year the amount realized had only been £73,000 He (Mr Glyde) put down the item at £70,000, but was inclined to think that even that amount would not be realized The next two items, Harbour Dues £900, and Rents, £13,000, would probably be realized He would not enter upon the next item, Assessment on Stock, £10,000, because a battle would be fought upon that question on the following day, but he would venture to state that he did not think the Government would get the amount The next two items, Licences, £12,500, and Postage, £6,000 might be realized The item Fines, Fees, and Forfeitures, £8,000, he considered very doubtful The Treasurer, in his financial statement, had alluded to a change which had been made in the payment of Clerks of District Courts, by giving them a fixed salary instead of fees, but he would remark that although Clerks might have been in the habit of receiving £100 from fees when those fees constituted the emoluments of their office, it did not follow when the fees became the property of the Government, that a similar amount would be realized, because there was such a thing as encouraging or discouraging litigation, and when a Clerk had no direct interest in the fees, he was very likely to tell parties who came to the Court that instead of taking out process, they had better go and settle their disputes amongst themselves It was a most extraordinary thing but there was not in the Estimates before the House a single farthing brought forward to the credit of the Government from Torrens's Bill The House was asked to vote the sum of £5,000 as the expenses of carrying out that Bill, and yet it appeared it was not expected that the office would yield a farthing He found that in the General Registry Office no falling off appeared to be anticipated yet at the termination of the first six months of the coming year, Torrens's Bill would have been in operation for a considerable time, and every land grant after the 1st July last must go through Torrens's office, so that he could not see why the amount taken to be earned by the General Registry Office should be the same as hitherto He certainly considered that the business of the General Registry Office would fall off, and that most of the attorneys' offices would be crying out that they had no business to do But the fees of the Insolvent Court might perhaps bring up the amount a little, but he thought they might fairly reduce the gross amount of fines, fees, and forfeitures, from £8,000 to £7,500 Miscellaneous receipts, £900, would probably be realized In reference to the item "Reimbursements in aid of expenses incurred by the Government, £2,250," he wished to state that he believed more money would be realized if at the Government Printing Office the price for documents were reduced from sixpence per sheet, at home, he believed it was twopence Special receipts, put down at £2,000, he believed were over-estimated, for this reason, that he observed they had not averaged anything like the amount for the last few years They could not expect much from special receipts on account of immigration, as there was not much inducement for parties to bring out their friends He believed that at least £500 of the amount should be struck out. On railways he found the sum of £3,348 put down for the first half-year of 1858, but in this sum he found was included a sum of £2,193 as earned by the City and Port Railway in 1857, and if only that amount were realized in 1857, which was a busy year, was it probable that as much would be made during the first six months of 1859 The City and Gawler line was not mentioned at all, and he, therefore, presumed it was a tacit admission that the line did not earn sixpence of profit If the House were to understand that, he was sure it would be admitted it must be a mistake to bring forward the sum of £4,000 as the amount which would be derived from railways during the first six months of 1859 They might certainly strike £1 000 off the amount The next item was Telegraphs, £1,600 He certainly thought this amount was over-estimated, particularly as he found that during the last three months the amount earned was only £753 The Telegraph was opened to Melbourne about the middle of July, and had it been opened all the time, it was probable the amount earned would have been about £1,000 It was proposed to extend it to Burra and Kapunda, but the receipts would be inconsiderable, and why it should be presumed there would be such a large increase in the receipts he could not see Presuming even that there were an increase of 50 per cent, the amount would be only £3,000 The total amount of over-estimated revenue, including the £10,000 assessment on stock, was £40,000, and he believed that the actual revenue for the first six months of 1859 would not exceed £200,000 at the very outside The colony had not been earning more than that lately He had gone through the various items, and had endeavoured calmly to prove the first part of his proposition, that the Ways and Means, as stated upon the Estimates before the House, would not be realized, and he would now proceed to the point, that the proper way to meet the difficulty would be by reducing establishments, and not by reducing public works He did not intend to say much upon this question, satisfied that he had only got to broach the subject to induce plenty of hon members to come to the attack He was not prepared to say at that moment how the reduction should be effected Some would perhaps say "cut them down in a lump, take off 20 per cent, hand them over to the Government and say, there, you must do with them as they are," but he was not prepared to do that He would, however, point his finger to three or four departments where he believed retrenchments might be effected without at all impairing the efficiency of the public service Although not prepared to point out where all the necessary retrenchments could be effected, possibly the hon member for the Port (Captain Hart), or the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) would be enabled to do so The first item to which he objected was £200 for travelling expenses for the Governor and suite That amount he contended never ought to have been asked It was one which was particularly calculated to make people grumble, for they paid the Governor the handsome salary of £4,000 a-year, and the Ministry under such circumstances never ought to have allowed themselves to be induced to ask for £200 for His Excellency's travelling expenses He next came to the department of audit, and here he thought they might even take a lesson from their expensive neighbors in Victoria, where, although they turned over seven millions annually, they got it done for £7,000, but here, where the amount turned over was not more than one-seventh what it was in Victoria, it actually cost £2,500 The Burra Mine turned over as much as the Government did, and there the cost of audit was 40 guineas per annum (A laugh) Here it was deemed essential to have an Auditor-General responsible to the Ministry, but he would recommend that the example of Victoria should be followed, and that a commission of audit should be appointed who should be responsible to this House Turning over the pages he came to the police item, in which he was sure it would be admitted a very considerable reduction might be effected The foot-police he observed cost about £10,000 a year, but as a member for a country district he must contend that the country districts should not pay for the maintenance of the foot police If the people of Adelaide wanted an ornamental police to walk about let them have a metropolitan police Application had been made by the residents of Kensington and Norwood for police protection, but the answer had been that the Government would supply them if the inhabitants would pay half the expense Let that principle be carried out in Adelaide, for he contended that the residents of the city had no right to expect protection at the expense of others He was sure that the House, upon reflection, would see that a change was necessary, and he would suggest that the mounted police should be made a charge upon the general revenue, and that in reference to any other police protection all the country should be placed upon the same footing The next item to which he would direct attention was "Registrar General," and here he would repeat that it did appear to him a most extraordinary thing that whilst they were paying so dearly for their little toy—the Lands Titles department—it actually appeared that department was earning nothing Not one shilling appeared to be saved in other departments, although the House were asked for a vote of nearly £5,000 a year under Torrens's Bill If the department were doing anything he thought one or two clerks might be dispensed with from the Registrar of Deeds department He observed that in the Survey of Crown Lands and the department connected therewith, the Treasurer had taken considerable credit, because there was only an increase of £40, but if hon members looked they would find that a mischievous system had been introduced, for there had been an increase of parties on the establishment and a decrease of those who were temporarily employed Under the former system, when a man was no longer required he was no longer paid, but now a great number of parties had been put upon the staff, and no doubt they would be half their time unemployed At all events if anything happened so that their services were no longer required, there was the necessity to find them another billet He had referred to the only items which he had marked, because he felt assured when he brought forward his motion hon members would come prepared, each with his particular grievance He would refer, however, to an item for the Government Farm The House was asked last session for £500 for a fence At the time he asked if it was to be a fancy one and was told no, but that it was to be a good substantial affair, and they were now asked for another £500 for the Government Farm This item might, he thought, be dispensed with Then, again, £3 000 were put down for collecting the census and statistical returns It was quite necessary no doubt that there should be statistical returns, but he thought they could dispense with the census being taken so frequently He believed the rule was to take it every five years He had a few words to say in reference to Immigration, for which he observed the sum of £20,000 put down He did not go to the extent of saying that he would strike off that item altogether, considering that it would be foolish to do so, having organised a staff at home in connection with this subject, but he certainly thought the amount might be reduced by one half He was sure it would gratify the people outside to do so, a general opinion existing that they would be doing wrong by sending home sixpence for immigration He thought they might safely try the experiment of reducing the amount to £10,000 The Agent had made arrangements, perhaps, for shipments so late as April, but the May and June shipments might be stopped It would be injudicious that immigrants should be sent during those months, as they would arrive here in the dullest season of the year, and as the House would meet again in April, if it were then the opinion of the House that immigration should be resumed, instructions could be sent to Captain Dashwood to revive immigration He could not vote to strike off the item entirely Before quitting the subject he would remark that he believed arrangements might be made with the neighboring colony of Victoria, which only spent £50,000 upon immigration, and that principally upon single females Why cannot this Government say to the Government of Victoria, you have seven times the income which we have, and five times the amount of population, we will put down £50,000 per annum if you will put down five times that amount or £250,000, which would be very little for Victoria, and the suggestion would probably be adopted He was no advocate for stopping immigration, but still there could be no doubt that a very large number of immigrants imported at the expense of South Australia went to Victoria This was very easily seen by looking at the Customs returns of passengers for the first few weeks after the arrival of an immigrant vessel, the emigration to Victoria greatly increased at those periods, and there could be no doubt that a large proportion of those who left these shores we had paid £15 per head to import He proposed, then, to save £10,000 from the vote for immigration, and to devote the balance to public works, say a tramway to the south After alluding to one or two items which he considered required explanation, the hon member said he had gone as briefly, quietly, and calmly as possible through the reasons which had induced him to put the motion upon the paper He had not asked any hon member to second it, but had placed it upon the paper with the view of directing the attention of hon members to it He was glad that an opportunity had been afforded the hon the Treasurer of shewing how he expected to get the revenue which appeared upon the Estimates before the House He should be happy to be convinced that he was wrong in his prognostications as to the position in which they would be placed if those Estimates were assented to His interests were identified with South Australia, and thanking the House for the attentive manner in which they had listened to him, he begged to propose the motion in his name

Mr Townsend had to congratulate the Government and the House on the manner in which the motion had been introduced Hon gentlemen who sat upon that (the left) side of the House, were sometimes charged, because they sat there, with being hostile to the Government, but this motion, this friendly motion of the hon member for East Torrens, emanated from the other side. If he (Mr Townsend) understood the proposition aright, it was to this effect—"Mr Treasurer, you cannot get the money you hope for, and if by any possibility you should obtain it, you are about to spend it wrongly" But in considering this friendly motion of the hon member for East Torrens, one could not help taking cognizance of what might be the issue of it, if successful If it should appear that the hon the Treasurer was wrong and that the hon member for East Torrens was right, and if the Government were defeated, he presumed the hon member for East Torrens would be sent for, and that the Government would devolve upon him (Laughter) He (Mr Townsend) would not go with the hon member in that event for though the hon member was very calm and quiet, and a very nice young man for a small tea party, still he was not just the man the country required The hon member was quite a new fledged politician—one who had never been heard of before The people even about the hills did not know what sort of man he was, whether he was a tall man or a short man, they only knew that he was a glidey sort of a man (Laughter) But his (Mr Townsend's) opinion was that the hon member wished to glide into the Government benches He (Mr Townsend), though he was considered an opponent of the Government, and even supposing the hon member to be right, would sooner discuss the question when the Estimates were before the House, and leave the Government where they were at present He would move as an amendment, "That the best and most prudent method of meeting the financial difficulties likely to arise from the probable deficiency of the revenue, is by reducing the establishments, and the sum set apart for immigration, and not by diminishing the vote for public works, but that this object can be best carried out as each item of the Estimates comes on for discussion" He could not but admire the calm and quiet manner of the hon member (Mr Glyde) when, after drawing so gloomy a picture as that the revenue, instead of being £274,000, would be only £200,000, he proposed to ask the Government of another colony to vote £250,000 to aid us But how did the hon member deal with the responsibility of other members? In this he was very politic, for he relieved himself from all responsibility He could say to the Government, "My dear fellows, I brought forward the motion because I thought the Treasurer was wrong, and that I had a chance of getting in myself It is true I was followed by a number of those confounded radical fellows, but beyond disallowing the Governor his travelling expenses and cutting down the estimate for police and one or two other little matters, I threw upon the independent members all the unpleasant part of the task" If the hon member only wanted the means of reciting a speech got up during the night, he (Mr Townsend) would dismiss him by saying "you have been a good boy, and, knowing something of figures, you got up a nice little speech, but you looked so pale and careworn even after this one night's work that I cannot allow you to come into the Government" When the Estimates came on for discussion he should be prepared to go into them He should want to know, for instance, from the hon the Treasurer whether it was necessary to retain a Superintendent of Police, in order that he might go hunting after Mr Babbage, and when he got half-way turn cowardly and come back He would also like to know whether it was necessary to have Inspectors of Police in silver lace to attend public breakfasts and balls He presumed also that it was considered necessary for the protection of life and property that these gentlemen should learn to speak in a particular style, but he (Mr Townsend) did not believe this to be absolutely necessary He found that when these gentlemen were appointed it was argued that it was necessary to have mounted Inspectors to visit the outlying districts and see that the police did their duty When he (Mr Townsend) was in some of the country districts, he asked how often the Inspectors were there, and the people did not even know them At Woodville and Nairne, these Inspectors were not seen at all At the latter there were three constables, but as there was no place to put the prisoners in, they escaped He believed if we did away with the Superintendent and a couple of Inspectors life and property would be more respected Again, taking a calm and quiet view of the exigencies of the colony, he believed it would be wise that not a farthing should be expended with the exception of money for nomination orders on immigration With regard to the £50,000 referred to by the hon member (Mr Glyde) as voted by the Victorian Government for this purpose, it was only a special vote for a special purpose, and not the regular annual vote With regard to the £4,000 estimated under the head of Telegraphs he did not consider it too much He believed that if the Government reduced the charges, there would be an excess over the vote, and so far from there being less than £4,000, there might be £5,000 Again, when the hon member referred to the office being opened in July, he should remember that it was not in efficient working order for a month subsequent to that time With respect to the item of £10,000 for the assessment on stock he understood the hon member to speak as a prophet He (Mr Townsend) would advise the hon member not to prophesy either that the revenue for 1859 would be only £200,000 or that the House would not vote this £10 000 assessment on stock He warned the hon member that prophecy was an unprofitable game He believed no hon member of the House would wish to do an injustice, but he did not believe that the squatters paid their fair share to the burthens of the colony, and that therefore this item would be carried He would not, however, refer further to the subject, as it would come under consideration the following day, but would leave the hon member to have another calm and quiet night, or rather day, before entering on the discussion With respect to the Customs he could not see or understand why they were set down at £4,000 more than they realised last year He also believed that for the last two months a smaller amount of indents left the colony than for the same period during any year for three years before But the hon member for East Torrens should bear in mind that just at this time, when no goods were shipped from England to order, was the time when the outsiders from England flooded the market with their goods, and having at present large quantities on hand, they would ship them, and therefore the decrease would not be so large as the hon member supposed The hon member had used a good argument for the abolition of fees, and the clerks of the Local Courts would no doubt be obliged to him for the compliment He (Mr Townsend) did not think the hon the Treasurer had put down too large a sum under this head, but he would leave that point to be settled by the hon the Treasurer himself He (Mr Townsend) put it to the House, and to the hon gentleman himself, to say whether, if he wished the Estimates cut down in detail, he could not do it when they were under consideration in Committee, and if the hon member desired to see the amount set down for works increased, he could effect his object in the same way, so that, in fact, all the purposes he contemplated could be attained—even after the gloomy picture which the hon member had drawn (A laugh) He thanked the hon member for that laugh, as a laugh did good to the system But he would put a case to the hon member The hon member said that members on that (the left) side of the House were opponents, and on the other side friends of the Government Now he (Mr Townsend) believed the question could be discussed upon his amendment If the amendment of the hon member did not mean the same, if under the cover of a friendly motion there were concealed aspiring views and a proper and reasonable ambition to sit upon the Government side of the House, if the hon member thought "that Government is not what it should be, and never will be till I glide into it," then he (Mr Glyde) might press his motion But believing that the hon member could attain all his views by supporting his (Mr Townsend's) amendment, and believing that the country was in favour of the Government remaining in the hands of the gentlemen at present conducting it, he would move his amendment

The Treasurer said that, on the present occasion, he would have to travel over a great deal of the ground he had passed over on a former occasion, as he could not meet the statements of the hon member for East Torrens without going into figures, many of which he had laid before the House previously The hon member said he would endeavour to review the Ways and Means and financial policy of the Government with calmness and coolness The hon member did display a considerable degree of coolness and candour He (the Treasurer) would not address himself to the personal remarks which had been made in reference to the hon member, for if the House was to discuss the Ways and Means deliberately, it could only be done by avoiding all personalities (Hear hear) The hon member (Mr Glyde) had opened his remarks by observing that the moving of the first item of the Estimates on a previous occasion had precluded him (Mr Glyde) from making certain remarks which he wished to have made On the part of the Government he (the Treasurer) was prepared at that time to go into an examination of the Ways and Means, but no steps were taken by hon members for that purpose He regretted that the present debate did not come on upon that occasion, as it would have enabled the House to advance one week at least with the Estimates He supposed the difficulty arose from some misunderstanding as to the proper mode of proceeding He was now prepared to discuss all the items of Ways and Means and of the proposed general expenditure Most of the remarks which had been made as to the anticipated deficiency of the revenue, were based on the deficiency of our exports to meet imports He should therefore first allude to that point, in order to enable the House and the country to judge of the extent to which we fell short, both in exports and imports In doing so, he should merely take the general totals For the first quarter of 1857, both the imports and exports were far greater than at the present time The imports since that time were, for the first quarter 1857, £361,546, second quarter, £381,447, third quarter, £300,832, fourth quarter, £412,671 First quarter 1858, £479,681, second quarter, £363,305, third quarter, £323,217, total for the seven quarters, £2,592,699 The exports during the same period were first quarter, 1857 £444,699, second quarter, £318,684, third quarter, £331,525, fourth quarter, £614,694, first quarter,

1858, £316,252, second quarter £207,765, third quarter, £244 531, giving a total of exports for the seven quarters of £2 478,350 Thus, striking a balance of imports and exports, there was an excess of the former of £114,349 If he was to take a single quarter in estimating the balance of imports and exports he would be liable to error A fair deduction was only to be made by carrying the calculation back for a considerable time and hence he had done so But he had not gone back beyond the year 1855, because the Estimates Committee sat in that year, and the result was that the country started fair from that time However, going back to the first quarter of 1857, and taking the imports and exports for the seven quarters—since that time there was a balance of £114,349 against us during 21 months He thought that was not such a loss as would justify us in supposing, in the language of the hon member for East Torrens that we were rapidly rushing into a state of insolvency, for although we had not a very glowing prospect coupled with this loss, still we were not likely to be in a state of insolvency, and he (the Treasurer) must say he did not share the gloomy apprehensions for the revenue of 1859 which the hon member entertained He would enter presently into the condition of the Customs revenue, but as the Estimates of Ways and Means formed the subject of the first part of the resolution, he would first state generally to the House what means the Government had of meeting any deficiency which might occur in their Estimates, and what allowances the Government had made for this purpose The total estimated revenue for the first half year of 1859 was £274,311 Now in order to compare the revenue expected in the first half year of 1859, with that actually received in the first half-year of 1858, it would be necessary to omit those heads of receipts which were not common to both half-years In the first place there was a balance from last year of £42,661 and adding to this the £10,000, anticipated from the assessment on stock, as there was no means of comparing this with a similar sum in 1858, there would be a total of £52,661 to be deducted from the total estimated revenue, leaving a balance of £221,650, to be compared with similar heads in 1858 The actual receipts for 1858, under the same heads was £232,155 This gave £10 000, as the falling off in the revenue in the half year But the Government had also made a further allowance, for as the population had increased, and was still increasing, they would be entitled in a time of ordinary prosperity to add five per cent to the revenue of the previous year, and they had not done so He would say therefore that the total allowance made for depression was £22,112, which was equivalent to £44,000 a year

It being now 3 o clock, the Chairman left the chair in accordance with the Standing Orders

The ATTORNEY GENERAL moved the suspension of the Standing Orders, with a view that the debate be proceeded with

The motion was agreed to, and the House again went into Committee

The TREASURER resumed The Government then allowed at the rate of £44,000 a-year for the present year below their estimate of what the revenue would produce in an ordinary year, in order to meet the depression which existed now, and which, as hon members were aware, had existed ever since the beginning of 1858 But although the Government had made this allowance the hon member (Mr Glyde) did not think they had made enough The Government might be right or they might be wrong, but they had made what they considered a reasonable allowance They could not prepare to meet extraordinary fallings off of which they had no means of judging They might make a guess, seeing that things were falling off and strike off so much but that was not the proper way of making an estimate He thought the Government had made a very proper allowance But notwithstanding all this, if things were to become as bad or even worse than the hon member (Mr Glyde) anticipated, if the banks were to close their discounts and that we were to have no banks at all except for deposits, then, indeed, we would have a state of things he did not anticipate, but supposing even this to occur still the Government would be able to meet it, and would not be as had been said in a state of insolvency The total estimate of the revenue for the first half year of 1859 was £274 311, including the balance of revenue in excess of the expenditure according to the Estimates of last year, and which amounted to £15,000, they would have £10 000 more at the end of this year of depression and loss That he could prove by figures very shortly, as he had the receipts for all the sums up to within six weeks of the present time and could very easily make up the amounts for the remaining six weeks of the year This balance would raise the revenue to £284,311 Now the proposed expenditure amounted only to £254,843, which would leave an available balance of £39,468, without any diminution of the proposed expenditure He would allow in the Customs a falling off of £5,000 He would suppose, for argument, that the Customs only realized £141 000 during the entire year That would give £72,000 for the first half-year The estimate was £77,00, but he would assume that there might occur a deficiency of £5,000 Next he would go to the land sales He would suppose, merely to meet the case and show how well the Government were able to meet any falling off, that the land sales should fall to £150,000 for the year He assumed this, although in 1858 they amounted to £205,000, in 1857, to £220,000, in 1856, to £331 000, and so on increasing But, allowing the land sales to fall from £205,000 last year, to £150 000 for the present year, or for the half-year to £75,000 The estimate for the half-year was £90,000, so that there would be a deficiency of £15,000 He would also assume the loss of the assessment on stock He would assume even as a possible contingency, a deficiency of £30 000 in the Ways and Means, but he would show it to be a very improbable one presently He would assume this in order to show the hon member that at the utmost to which he could carry his supposition there would be funds in the Treasury to meet the deficiency He had already stated that there would be £39,468 to spare in order to meet the contingency of the estimated revenue not being realized If the revenue was not realized, if there was a loss of £30,000 on the half year, there would still be £9,468 to meet it Even although the hon member should be able to maintain that in the words of the resolution the Estimates would not be sustained this result might ensue, that the Government would have Ways and Means sufficient to meet all the expenditure stated on the Estimates He had not put before the House an estimate of expenditure which would exceed the possible, or, he believed, probable, means of the colony but had made as safe a calculation as could well be made The hon member when he looked to the waste lands, did not think they would realize more than £140,000 for the year, but on the Estimates they were put down at £90,000 for the half-year He would state the monthly receipts in this year of financial difficulty and depression—and hon members would bear him out in saying that the pressure did not exist more now than it did many months ago Hon members knew that the screw was put on long ago for he (the Treasurer) had waited upon the banks and asked the question (A laugh) Hon members laughed, but he had asked the question not on his own account but on account of others (Much laughter) The sales of Crown Lands for the various months of the present year were, in January, £12,134, February, £10,094, March, £13,080, April £21,541, May, £28,168, June, £17,266, July, £14,114, August, £16,389, September, £15,468, October, £32,880 He would now dwell upon the fact that the receipts for the last month were £32,880, for the hon mover of the resolution had stated that the land sales for the last quarter only realized £21,000 The hon member was, therefore, quite in error unless he (the Treasurer) had misunderstood him. He stated these facts with confidence, inasmuch as he had a vote of the cashier in the Treasury to bear him out

Mr GLYDE explained that what he had remarked was that the receipts for this quarter would be greater on account of the large sale in September, but that the sales since October would not exceed £21,600

The TREASURER stated that the explanation only relieved the hon member from the charge of having made an unfounded statement He could show by figures the amounts paid into the Treasury In October, as he had said, the amount paid in was £32 180, making a total for the ten months of £181,438 That gave more than the average assumed for the whole of the next year It gave £18,000 per month as the receipts from land sales, or a total sum for the year of £216,000 The Government had not however taken any such amount They allowed a very large margin in that respect Besides, they only estimated for half the year, and at the end of that time they could frame a new estimate They had, however, estimated the land sales at £180,000 instead of £216,000, the average of the last twelve months They had allowed a fair deduction for the existing state of things It was possible they might be mistaken, as they could not calculate exactly the pressure out of doors or the effect upon many individuals They could only make a large allowance, equal to what had been made on a former occasion, when a similar state of things was said to exist Before going into the Customs he should tell where the surplus of £10,000 was to come from, of which he had previously spoken The hon member (Mr Glyde) had candidly admitted that the Government might realize £15 000, but that he thought £10,000 would be as much as should be allowed The hon member might have been still more candid if he had the information which he (the Treasurer) had, and might have allowed nearer to £25,000 From sales of Crown Lands the receipts would be £186,869 to the 14th Nov taking the lowest average for six weeks lately Assuming the sales only produced £2,000 per week, it would give £12,000 more for the land sales, up to the end of the year, This was founded on a very low estimate Thus we should gain on the land sales £25 869 The Customs receipts up to the present time were £134,751, and taking the average of the last few weeks as the basis of the receipts for the next six weeks they should amount to £15,000 more, making a total of £150,351 From this there was to be a reduction made of 3 351*l*, for repayment of duties to New South Wales and Victoria, for goods sent up the Murray River, so that the net Customs receipts would be 147,000*l* The estimated revenue was 154,000*l*, so that there would be a loss of 7,000*l* on the Customs In harbor dues, there had been received up to the present time 1,562*l*, in addition to which he anticipated 240*l*, giving a total of 1,802*l* The estimate was 2,200*l*, so that there would be a loss of 398*l* On rents there would be a gain of 86*l* The licences received amounted to 13,577*l*, amount expected, 200*l*, estimated amount 13,000*l*, gain, 577*l* Postage received, 12,111*l*, expected, 800*l*, estimated, 10,020*l*, gain

2,111*l* Fines and fees received, 14,483*l*, expected, 1,500*l*, estimate 17,000*l*, loss, 2,127*l* Sales received, 788*l*, estimate, 2,000*l*, loss, 1,212*l* Reimbursements in aid, received, 3,849*l*, expected, 500*l*, estimate, 5,000*l*, loss, 1,151*l* Miscellaneous, received, 1,554*l*, probable receipts, 50*l*, estimate, 2,000*l*, loss, 446*l* Special receipts, 3,796*l*, probable receipts, 500*l*, all gain Interest received, 4,076*l*, probable receipts during six weeks, 478*l*, being one-half the quarter's receipts in 1857 against an estimate of 2,000*l*, gain, 2,076*l* With regard to the railways, the hon member had said that the City and Port Railway was the only one mentioned but it was only from that the Government had as yet derived any profit, as the Gawler Town line was only opened in November, but for the next year there would be a profit on the Gawler Town line also For 1858 the profit on the railways was 5031*l*, being a gain on the estimate of 2,554*l* The telegraphs had already brought in 2591*l*, and he (the Treasurer) had assumed 500*l* more, against an estimate of 4000*l*, giving a loss of 1409*l* He might remark that during the current year the working of the telegraph was not fully developed The receipts of the overland telegraphs were not balanced Thus the total gains amounted to 37,069*l*, and the losses to 12,531*l* leaving a balance of gain of 24,538*l* There would, therefore, be a clear balance of nearly 25,000*l*, instead of the 15,000*l* which appeared on the estimates, and this was not a matter of probability, but almost of certainty, as the receipts were ascertained for the whole year with the exception of six weeks and the receipts for the remaining period were taken at the lowest average of the year With respect to the Customs receipts, he would now state the different items on which his expectations were based He would first take spirits The actual revenue for the first half year of 1858 was 29,354*l*, and the actual receipt for 1857, 60,493*l* He now expected again 30,000*l* during the first half year of 1859 It was an item which did not depend on the extent of our imports or exports It was a luxury which would be obtained whatever its price at the time He would take half the receipts for 1857, and throw over the increase to our population between 1857 and 1859, and that difference would make up any possible deficiency Then the actual receipts from wine in the first half of 1858 were 1,884*l*, but he had only estimated them at 1,500*l*, because he believed that imported wines were chiefly consumed by the upper classes, and these classes might feel the propriety of curtailing their expenditure From tobacco the actual receipts for the first half year of 1858 were 5,529*l* and he had estimated it at 5,600*l*, as this also was a very regular article of consumption, and depended more upon population than upon any other circumstance The actual receipts from beer in the first half-year of 1858 were 3,625*l*, and he had assumed them at 3,700*l* for the first six months of the present year In 1857 the total duty from beer was 6,740*l* On tea, the actual receipts in the first half year of 1858 were 3,280*l*, but he had assumed that he should receive 3,500*l*, adding slightly for the increase of population In sugar, the receipts for the first half-year of 1858 were 4 703*l*, but he had taken it at 4 000*l* to allow for the stocks in hand Next came drapery, and ad valorem goods, and these were the things on which the existing depression was most likely to tell He had estimated these at 7,400*l*. for the first six months of the year against 9,383*l* for the first six months of 1858 Groceries brought in 803*l* for the first half year of 1858, and he had taken them at 900*l*, which he believed was not excessive From apparel, the receipts in 1858 were 1,691*l*, and he had taken them at 1,500*l*, from timber, 1,364*l*, and he had taken them at 1,300*l*, from iron, 1,673*l*, and he had taken them at 1,600*l*, from other goods, 16,501*l*, now taken at 16,000*l* By these means he made out a total of 77,000*l*, and though he might have over-estimated, at all events he had some good grounds, as he had made allowance for those goods said to be in excess in the market He would now compare this estimate with the receipts for a great many years back The duties on slops were in 1851, 665*l*, in 1852, 535*l*, in 1853, 2,775*l*, in 1854, 2,466*l*, in 1855, 1,566*l*, in 1856, 1,189*l*, and in 1857, 2,115*l* On drapery and haberdashery the receipts were, in 1851, 9,759*l*, in 1852, 5,558*l*, in 1853, 25 239*l*, in 1854, 28,562*l*, in 1855, 12,151*l*, in 1856, 10,600*l*, and, in 1857, 15,527*l* He had now travelled over the subject in sufficient detail, and he did not think there was any point to which the hon member (Mr Glyde) had alluded, on which he (the Treasurer) had not touched The hon member had charged him with having passed over in a very jaunty way the question of an assessment on stock, but the hon member himself had treated it in a similar manner and as it was to come on for discussion on the following day perhaps the less said on the subject at present the better After some few remarks in reply to an observation of Mr Glyde's, respecting the Harbor Trust, the hon member proceeded to say, as to the proposed expenditure, there were a few points which the Government would wish to submit to the House With respect to Immigration the House during the last session had fixed the Government to one ship a month, and the Government had not thought proper to alter that arrangement, but the Government wished to place the subject before the House that the House might exercise the discretion which properly belonged to it Subsequent events seemed to show that the amount might be wisely diminished, and the difference thrown into the Treasury Then with respect to volunteer forces, when the Estimates were prepared, it was not known what would be the decision of the Committee on this subject or of the House as to the provision which should be made for the defence of the country The Government felt that there were rumours of wars in various parts of the world, and that it would not be right to omit bringing the question of defences before the colony They, therefore, placed a sum upon the Estimates to meet any expenses which might be incurred He (the Treasurer) was, however, willing to admit that there was no occasion to go to any expense in the present position of affairs, and that we might put off all preparation for a time This was, therefore, another item which the Government would not press upon the House, but upon which they would be glad to have the advice of the House The amount set apart for this purpose would form a considerable sum to be appropriated in aid of roads and public works For some years past, the sums voted for roads and bridges had been diminishing, but the reason of this was, that we were capitalising our surplus revenue, which would otherwise have gone to the formation of roads and bridges But this money was now being expended in a manner which would give employment to a much larger number of persons, and which would be much more advantageous to the country If we were still to go on capitalising our balances for permanent works, of course we could not have the same amount as we otherwise would for roads Nor should we merely take an account of the money actually expended on these public works, but we should also bear in mind the amount annually paid for interest and the liquidation of loans, for these sums taken together with the amounts upon the Estimates were really and properly the full amounts to be expended on public works

Mr Strangways had heard the address of the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Townsend), and he confessed he was never more surprised with anything than the display made by that hon member He (Mr Strangways) imagined at one time that he was sitting in Burton's Circus (Laughter) He had heard almost every address which had been made during the present session, and most of those made during the previous one—for then, being not a member of the House he attended in the gallery—and he believed he was strictly correct in saying that such an exhibition had never occurred in that House on any former occasion, and he hoped they would never be treated again to conduct approaching to personal abuse of the most offensive character He was inclined to believe that that hon gentleman's case must have been a very bad one, when he required to abuse his opponent Again, that hon member (Mr Townsend) had very offensively referred to the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) as being an "unfledged politician" But what was the case? Why, that the hon member for Onkaparinga had taken his seat in that House a month or two after the member for East Torrens Who, then, was the "unfledged politician?" (Laughter) Then the hon member for Onkaparinga had supposed a desire on the part of the hon member for East Torrens to obtain a seat on the ministerial benches, but he thought when that hon member indulged in this and other reflections, it must have been under the smart of the allusion which had been made in a previous debate to old Icarus, whose flight was so high that it proved fatal to him, for the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings together, and he fell into the Ægean Sea. (Great laughter) Otherwise he was quite sure the hon member for Onkaparinga would not have indulged in such a personal attack He (Mr Strangways) would venture to say, however, that if the debates in that House were to be frequently characterised by such an exhibition as that indulged in by the hon member for Onkaparinga, this Legislature would very soon rank in an inferior position to even that of Van Diemen's Land, and hon members might know that there had it been found necessary to suspend a member for misconduct in the House He hoped that the Speaker would never have occasion in that House to adopt a similar line of conduct to any hon member (a laugh), but he must say that, if personal abuse such as that which he alluded to were indulged in, and which had undoubtedly never before been witnessed in that House, were to form a feature in any hon member's speech, it would go a great way towards necessitating such a penalty He hoped, therefore, that all hon members who had any respect for decorum would put their face against anything of the kind in future. He (Mr Strangways) trusted that he had never—and he thought hon members would bear him out in this statement—during the whole of the time he had had a seat in that House, said anything that could, even in the remotest degree, be interpreted as being personal or vulgar, and he hoped that if at any time he should so far forget himself as to adopt any other line of conduct, hon members would call him to order, and they should have his thanks for it

Mr Reynolds rose to order He was present when the hon member for Onkaparinga spoke, and he heard nothing which could be construed as being personal abuse. (Hear, and no) He said this because the hon member for Encounter Bay's remarks appeared to reflect upon the Speaker and hon members in submitting to the alleged irregularity

Mr Townsend asked the Chairman whether his language had been unparliamentary

The Chairman said that certainly the hon member had indulged in strong terms, but he could not say they were unparliamentary The less, however, that members indulged in such personalities, and the more they confined themselves to orderly debate, the more satisfactorily would the business of the House be carried on

Mr TOWNSEND—"Did I not understand you to say, Mr Chairman, that my language was not unparliamentary?"

The CHAIRMAN—"In England it is frequently the case for members of Parliament to use very strong terms, but I think the habit there, or elsewhere, is very much to be deprecated"

Mr STRANGWAYS continued and said, that when the hon member for the Sturt rose to order, he was not accusing any hon member of indulging in personalities but he said that if he (Mr Strangways) were to indulge in them, he should be glad to be called to order He had done what the hon member for East Torrens had done he had looked into the probability of the "Ways and Means" being realised He thought no hon member would accuse him of being a supporter of the Government, though he should oppose the resolution of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) He would also oppose the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga. Whilst he agreed with one statement made by the hon member for East Torrens, viz —"That it was desirable to reduce the amount of immigration one half, still he would say it was not desirable to reduce the money amount as entered on the Estimates for that purpose, and for this reason, that he was convinced that even should they have only one ship in two months, as the hon member proposed, instead of one per month, the expense of that would fully equal the amount placed on the Estimates, viz, £20,000 The expense of 200 statute adults which was about the number each ship contained, would, he believed, according to the contract price, and the other additional expenses of agency, &c, absorb the £20,000 placed on the Estimates at the rate of one ship in two months If it should be discovered, which he very much doubted that the sum entered on the Estimates was more than sufficient, then of course he should have no objection to reduce the amount There was one point which had not been touched on, and that was, the statement of the former Treasurer (Mr Torrens) that there was an amount of £190,000 to the credit of the revenue when that gentleman resigned his office He wanted to know what had been done with the money it this were the case for the statements that were now made to the House did not all coincide with that of Mr Torrens, and this House could only blame itself if it submitted to the inaccuracy Again, the hon member for East Torrens had said that the stores in Adelaide were glutted with imported goods He (Mr Strangways) knew this was the case in some instances, but he also knew there were very many cases where it was not so, (no, no)—he knew many stores that instead of being glutted, were completely empty (A laugh) And then, it must be remembered, that there was a great quantity of imported goods which could not be stored for any length of time, as they were liable to decay, such as woollen goods and drapery, bales of which were frequently opened, he was assured, and found to be destroyed with moths But admitting that there was a large quantity of imported goods in the market, yet the demand was regular for them, especially for drapery, and boots and shoes They were articles of which there was a regular consumption Then as to the falling off in the consumption of wine, spirits, and beer, which had been looked to as indicative of a probable reduction in the Customs' dues on those articles for 1859, hon members should remember that it was the cold season of the year, and therefore, the consumption was less For instance, a man in the cold month of June would not drink so much as he would in the hot month of December Any apparent falling off, he considered, therefore, might be very well attributed to that circumstance The member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) had said that a resolution of the nature of the one before the House would not be injurious to the sale of their colonial bonds, but he (Mr Strangways) was at a loss to think how that hon member had come to such a conclusion For if he (Mr Strangways) were to ask for a loan of £1,000, he would surely be asked what he had to repay it with, and if he could not satisfy the lender as to the state of his finances, of course it would be refused But if, on the contrary, he went to some Bank and said "I want so much money, and my revenue is greater than my expenditure," then, no doubt, he would have a better prospect of getting what he wanted He apprehended the principle would apply equally as well in the sale of their colonial bonds If their financial circumstances were weak, hon members could very well understand that no money-lender would advance money on bonds proceeding from a colony the financial position of which had been stigmatised He thought such a resolution would have a highly injurious effect If the colony was not in such a healthy position as they might wish, still he could not agree with some hon members who took the number of insolvencies as indicative of their commercial depression, for he maintained that it was frequently indicative of the contrary It was clear that there was always a certain class of traders who lived upon the public, and whose downfall was rather productive of good than otherwise He would mention one case which had occurred in this colony A man commenced business in 1854 on the sum of £6 8s 6d, he carried on four years, expended privately from £1,000 to £2,000 per annum, and was in debt when he gave up business to the extent of £8,000 Such persons as these should be decidedly cleared out from commercial circles No person who really traded with capital would be able to compete with them, and it was that very class of persons who produced, more than any other, an excess of importation The hon member for East Torrens had said the Government could not realize on the sale of Crown Lands, and, no doubt it was to the advantage of the land agents to hinder the sale of Government land as much as possible Land agents, no doubt, would be glad to see no more land sold, as it would thereby enhance the value of the land which they traded upon He was sure that if that House were to adopt any course to prevent the sales of Government land to any extent, the land agents would feel exceedingly grateful, as private land must of necessity be increased in value There was one thing which appeared to be omitted on the Estimates, at which he felt surprise, and that was, the probable revenue from the Northern Railway for 1859 This, he thought, was an item of revenue which should not have been left out, and he hoped the hon the Treasurer would afford some explanation as to the omission

The TREASURER explained that in the Estimates for 1859 the probable revenue from the railways was put under one general heading, including all returns from railways and tramways The Northern line was included under that heading

Mr STRANGWAYS said he found on page 7 of the Estimates the sum of £2,391 16s 5d against the City and Port line, but he could see no mention made of the North line That only tended to prove that the revenue from railways might be considerably increased The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) said that the item of telegraphs was over estimated at £4 000 for the half year, and he (Mr Strangways) was inclined to support him in that view, as it was a very considerable increase from the previous year But from what he knew of the working of telegraphs, he believed that by judicious management they would become one of the most important items of the revenue, and if, in addition to the usual telegraph business, the facilities for sending messages were so great as to include much of that correspondence which at present passed through the Post Office then, he believed that instead of £4 000 being the amount they should receive, it would be considerably more It was utterly useless to adopt a high rate of charges At the present time the charge for a message from Adelaide to Goolwa was 2s Some short time ago he had seen a person go into the office in King William-street, with the full intention of sending a message to the Goolwa, supposing, perhaps, it was not more than 1s, but when he found that the cost was 2s he declined to send the message In all parts of the world the expense was the great drawback to the success of telegraphs He hoped the Government would see fit to give instructions to the Superintendent of Telegraphs to introduce a lower rate of charges The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) had said that the Revenue to the 30th of June, 1859, would not amount to the sum estimated by the Government That was, of course, a question of opinion He (Mr Strangways) had looked into the estimated revenue and had formed his own opinions He had heard the speech of the hon member for East Torrens, and it amounted to this proposition—'Shall we take the opinion of the hon member for East Torrens who has had no other than ordinary means of judging, or shall we take the estimate of the Treasurer, who has had all the official data by which to compile it" As this House had no opportunity of judging of the relative correctness of the figures of either party—for it was not sufficient to say "it is so," without proof—he (Mr Strangways) should stand aloof from either party, and judge for himself as the Estimates were proceeded with ("Hear, hear," from the Treasury benches) His conviction was that, leaving out the question of the assessment on stock, the other items would not be far wrong, and would be realized As to the item of "Police," he agreed with the hon member for East Torrens that the expenses attached to that body might be considerably reduced He saw no reason why the metropolitan police should be kept up at the expense of the general revenue. When in East Torrens they asked for police protection, they were told "You must pay half the expense." It was an unjust system, and one which he hoped to see done away with The London police, which he might say were superior to any other in the world, were maintained by a special rate, and, except in the city, where they were under the control of the Lord Mayor, were placed under a General Commissioner of Police He thought this system might be very advantageously introduced here The mounted police he thought it desirable to maintain, and make their head quarters in Adelaide By this, they would get a fair share of protection Then, with respect to the Lands Titles Department, hon members who had supported this measure were not justified in now objecting to the expense Those hon members had been cautioned, and he thought from the working of that department, hon members who supported the measure, even the most sanguine of them, would see that the expense of that department was not justifiable. He considered that this item of expenditure might be reduced to one-half or two-thirds without departing from the strict justice of the case, that was if they went upon the principle of remunerating persons according to the amount of work they did (A laugh) There was another item which he objected to, and which he thought should be struck out altogether—"the agency in England." He had found that in Melbourne they derived a revenue from the "agency." One of the large Melbourne contractors paid several thousand pounds for it, and when he (Mr. Strangways) asked how they could afford to do this, he was told that the merchants or contractors made the profit by the large number of ships which were thereby consigned to them. That was a question which Government should inquire into; and as to the colonial Bonds he was satisfied any one of the banks would be glad to do that business for nothing, from the fact of the large number of persons it would bring into connection with them. The colonists would also have better security through the banks for their business being safely and properly performed. With respect to decreasing immigration, he had already stated that he would reduce it to one ship every two months, but that he considered the item on the Estimates of 20,000*l.* would be required to carry this out. He was opposed to stopping immigration altogether. Their circumstances in this colony were not like those of America. The Government there did not find it necessary to assist emigration, for at one time persons could get a passage there for as low a sum as 30s. Certainly they were not carefully provided for on the way, and if they could live they lived, and if not they died. (A laugh.) But that was a system which could not be adopted in this colony. Here the average cost to the colony of each statute adult was 15*l.*, and that being the case no ordinary laboring man at home could pay the expense of his passage to this colony. How was it possible for an agricultural laborer to pay such an amount, which would be the work of a lifetime to raise, independently of the expense of his wife and children, if he had any. He thought the House would at once see that to expect that the description of labor which they wanted, would come out without assistance, was perfectly untenable. Then as to the resolution generally, as proposed by the hon. member for East Torrens, he could not agree that the "Ways and Means" would not be realised, or that it was undesirable to curtail any of the public works. He had looked into the Estimates, and found that a large sum was put down to public works. £10,000 of this might be struck out. There was 4,000*l.* for the National Institute. That ought to be postponed. Then for a Post-office and Court-house at Port Adelaide there was a considerable sum, that might be omitted. Then there was for a new Government Printing-office, 2,000*l.* If the finances of the colony were in such a low state, they might do very well without this increase to their expenditure. He had had the greater reason to object to the foregoing works, because they were not calculated to give employment to ordinary labor. Fine buildings, with four or five different styles of architecture, was not likely to give employment to that class of persons who were principally out of work. He would at least postpone this proposed expenditure, and hon. members would, no doubt, find some six months hence that their Ways and Means were not so much reduced as they had anticipated. As to the amendment of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, it amounted to nothing. Perhaps that hon. member wanted the £20,000 proposed for immigration spent amongst the artizans in the city. (A laugh.) He should oppose the resolution.

Mr. BURFORD moved that the House resume, and the Speaker report progress.

The motion was put, but it was negatived.

Mr. HART thought the House had reason to thank the hon. member for East Torrens in bringing forward this resolution, so that hon. members might be in a position to discuss the Estimates as a whole, without being restricted to the limited discussion which only could take place in Committee. He must say, with that hon. member, that he had no desire to censure the Government by siding with this resolution. His object was simply to be enabled to consider thereby the Ways and Means as a whole. With respect to the Estimates, then, he would say, as regarded the Customs dues for 1859, he did not think the Treasurer had over-estimated them. The hon. member for East Torrens declared it as his opinion that they would be decreased some £7,000, but he thought that hon. member had overlooked the fact that our population had increased, and as the Customs revenue was principally derived from tobacco and spirits, of which there was a regular consumption, he (Mr. Hart) did not see why they should anticipate a falling off. Although there might be, as had been stated, a large amount of imported goods at present stored in Adelaide, yet he believed that the fact had been overlooked that there were also very considerable quantities of goods in the bonded warehouses at the Port, on which duty would be paid during the ensuing financial year. Therefore on this head he could not see that there would be any diminution in the revenue. With regard to the estimated revenue from the sale of Crown lands, he thought this item would not be realized. There had been a falling off in 1858 from the previous year, and he thought in the ensuing year they might look forward to a still further reduction, and that they should find a greater disparity in the revenue of 1858 with 1859, than that of 1857 with 1858. The effect of that depression in their land fund would no doubt be felt to a much greater degree for the next 12 months, than they had experienced for many years. To meet this he must confess that he went with the hon. member for East Torrens in saying that the cost of their establishments should be reduced in the first instance, and that as the general revenue was decreasing so ought they to limit their expenditure. In some instances, no doubt, establishments required to be increased, as in the Observatory and Telegraph Department. But with respect to these establishments he would say that it was not politic to introduce them into the general Estimates. He should take the profit and loss on each department, and let that only appear on the credit or debit side of the Estimates. Again, the profit made on the colonial bonds transactions should not be carried to the general revenue. There was an amount of this nature that accrued from the sale of the Waterworks and Drainage bonds of 513*l.* Now he recollected some time ago, the House receiving with strong marks of approbation an opinion expressed by the Attorney-General, that amounts of that nature should be passed to the credit for which the bonds were sold.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that on the Estimates for the ensuing year there were no items of that nature. It was on last year's Estimates that the items referred to appeared.

Mr. HART continued, and said he was proceeding to show that it would be a difficult thing for the Government, if they adopted the plan of carrying such amounts to the general revenue, to keep a proper account with the city on the Waterworks and Drainage Loan, inasmuch as the city having to pay back the amount of the loan, should have credit for the the profits on these bonds. Again, with respect to the amount to be realized by the Land Fund, he thought if they got £150,000 next year, it would be as much as they would get, and that the estimated amount by the Treasurer of 180,000*l.* would not nearly be reached. Take for instance the sale of Crown lands in the first quarter of the present year, which realized 17,000*l.*, and in addition to which some 6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.* worth more were sold. There was no prospect of their having such lands again as these, for some time to come, to submit to the public, such as those in the Mount Gambier district; and even if they had, the public had not got the money to pay for them. Then, again, the pastoral interest was suffering equally with the agricultural, and the agriculturists had suffered more the last two years than for many years previously. If the estimated Ways and Means could not be realized, then how necessary it was to reduce their expenditure. In the Survey department there was an increase in the present Estimates; and here, he thought, some reduction might be effected. Seeing that the cost of survey ought to be in proportion to the revenue to be derived from the quantity of land sold. With regard to railways he could not take the same view as the hon. the Treasurer had, viz., that £8,000 would be realized on that head as from the agricultural produce being less the traffic must of necessity be reduced. He was convinced that no larger amount of traffic would take place than in 1858, when there was no profit at all except on the Port line. Therefore, there was no probability of the £4,000 for the half year being realized. As to the £10,000 from the assessment on stock, that he supposed was consigned to "the tomb of all the Capulets." (A laugh.) As to the assessment, if it had been allowed, amounting to more than £10,000 for the half-year he thought it was doubtful. As to the Customs dues, however, he felt convinced that as a large quantity of goods, as he had previously stated, were in bond, and as the duty on these goods would go to their credit for the ensuing year, that there would be no falling off. He hoped, in conclusion, that the House would not object to the laudable desire on the part of some hon. members to thoroughly revise such portions of the Estimates as were palpably inconsistent with their probable revenue for the ensuing year.

Mr. SOLOMON had no object to serve in throwing impediments in the way of the Government; all he wanted was to have those impediments which already existed removed, and when he saw from their Ways and Means that there was no chance of the estimated revenue being realized, he thought it to be his duty to come forward and call attention to it. It had been said that the figures which had been advanced against the estimated Ways and Means of the Treasurer were suppositious, but surely they had the same right to deduce from the experience of former years what would be their future revenue. It had been stated by the hon. member for the Port, that large quantities of goods were stored in the bonded warehouses, and that a revenue would be derived from these in the shape of duty which had not been calculated, and which would go to swell their Custom dues. Now, he could not agree with the hon. member for the Port (Captain Hart), for while he (Mr. Solomon) admitted that there were considerable quantities of goods bonded, yet he could not forget, what was equally true, that there were very large quantities of goods out of bond, and stored in merchants' warehouses, which in the total would, he thought, be equal to the year's consumption. There was one remark he would make on a matter on which the Select Committee sitting on Taxation would, no doubt, give a report; that was the duty on corn-sacks. In 1857 he found that the amount paid in duty for corn-sacks amounted to 1,980*l.* Now, when the Government talked about their estimated Ways and Means he submitted that they should take facts and items of this nature into consideration. Then, again, he found that in 1858 that even a still larger number of corn sacks paid duty; and he would state what might or might not be believed, that they had as many cornsacks in the colony as would supply them for the next two years to come, without being under the necessity of paying one farthing of duty He (Mr Solomon) had taken the trouble to calculate the quantity of bags on which duty was paid in 1857, and he found they were capable of containing no less than 77 727 tons of flour They would all admit that the colony did not possess the means of carrying out agricul ture to the extent that would be commensurate with this He could not see how anyone could go through the various items of Customs revenue, and say that the same amount of duty would be paid in 1859 as in previous years They had only to look at those Estimates, and they would see there was something radically wrong in them There was an estimated revenue on goods ad valorem, which there was not the slightest prospect of being realized, for instance, on boots and shoes, which were not paying invoice cost at the present time On such goods the duty paid in 1857 was 3,800*l*, but could they anticipate anything like this in 1859? But there was a larger item he would call attention to, and that was "cutlery and hardware." In 1857, a sum of 15,367*l*, ad valorem duty was paid on this class of goods, now were they to be told that they were to have one-half or one-third of that quantity paying duty in 1859? He should say no—for if they depended upon such a contingency he thought they would be "reckoning without their host" Again, in hops 2,150*l* was paid for duty in 1857 In 1858, the low price of hops at home had considerably increased the importation of this article, and the stores were so full of them that they were not to be sold at the mere cost of freight and duty Then, again, with "bottled beer," if hon members took the trouble to go through the stores in town, they would find out that they were full of bottled beer True, there was some in bond, but it was only bonded to save warehouse room There was enough bottled beer in the colony to last them six months to come without paying any duty whatever The hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) had said that his reason for believing the Land Fund would not be maintained was that the agricultural interest was in such a depressed state, but in the same breath he also said he saw no reason to suppose there would be any falling off in the Customs dues Now, he (Mr Solomon) thought that these opinions were very incompatible The hon. the Treasurer had said he had made no allowance for the falling off in the duty on spirits, because the men who consumed them would always have them But he (Mr Solomon) would ask how they were to get them Was a man with 4s per day able to treat himself to the same luxuries as when he was in receipt of 8s per day? (Hear, hear) Another point worthy of consideration was this, that the exports for 1858 had fallen considerably short of those of 1857, and he doubted whether there would be any improvement in 1859 He had now made all the objections which he had intended to make He might say that he agreed with the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) that their Land Fund would not be realized It was a fact that a large portion of the land which was sold last year had been bought by persons who had supplied the other colonies with sheep, and who invested the product of their sheep in land But no such market was open this year He supported Mr Glyde's resolution, but not with the view of impeding the Government He trusted the Treasurer would attend to the hints and suggestions which had been made that day, that he would see that the proper course to take to meet the depressed state of the revenue would be to reduce establishments The fact was they were living beyond their means, and that the time for retrenchment had come

Mr BARROW moved an adjournment

The motion was carried, and the House resumed

The CHAIRMAN reported progress, and leave was given to sit again next day

CAPTAIN J F DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL obtained an extension of a week for bringing up the report of the Committee upon the case of Captain J F Duff

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr REYNOLDS said the report of the Committee was in manuscript Another week was allowed for bringing up the report.

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the further consideration in Committee of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Friday

ASSESSMENT BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the second reading of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Friday next, the hon gentleman remarking that the adjourned debate would probably occupy the whole of the following day—for which day the Assessment Bill had been set down

The House adjourned at 10 minutes past 5 o'clock, till 1 o'clock on the following day

THURSDAY NOVEMBER 18

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

GOLD DISCOVERIES

Mr SOLOMON gave notice that, on Tuesday next, he should ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands if any applications had been made to the Government for the reward for the discovery of gold, and if so, whether the claim had been recognised, and whether the discovery had taken place in the country recently discovered by Mr Stuart

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was prepared at once to answer the question if the hon member wished No application had been put in for the discovery of gold, and that question having been answered, he apprehended that all the other questions fell to the ground He wished it to be clearly understood that no application had been put in for the actual discovery of gold

WINE AND BEER LICENCES

Mr BAKEWELL gave notice that, on Tuesday next, he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal those portions of the Publicans' Act which related to the issue of wine and beer licences

INCORPORATION ASSOCIATIONS BILL

Mr BAKEWELL gave notice that, on Tuesday next, he should move the second reading of the Incorporation Associations Bill

MR JOHN HINDMARSH

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table a letter which had been received from Mr John Hindmarsh, offering to sell the Government a section of land at Rosetta Head, and the answer which had been sent to that gentleman

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands if he was prepared at once to state what course the Government intended to take in reference to this matter, and when they would be in a position to take action

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated in reply, that a message would be sent to the House by His Excellency the Governor, recommending that the sum of £2,000 be placed on the Estimates for the purchase of the land in question

Upon the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS, the letters were ordered to be read by the Clerk of the House That from Mr Hindmarsh formally offered to sell the land referred to, 134 acres preliminary section, including all claims arising from the past occupation of the land in question by the Government for the sum of £2,000 and to execute any conveyance which might be required Mr Hindmarsh asked for a reply as soon as possible, and stated that it must be understood the offer was not to prejudice him in the event of being driven to arbitration The letter from the Commissioner of Crown Lands was to the effect that the necessary steps would be taken to procure the sanction of the Legislature to the arrangement suggested

Mr DUFFIELD, with the permission of the House, wished to ask the Commissioner of Public Works, if the Government had taken any steps to alter the arrangements under which the unemployed laborers, as they were termed were now employed by the Government He wished to know whether there had been any alteration in the system during the last few weeks His reason for asking the Commissioner of Public Works this question was, that he perceived by a return which he had moved for about a fortnight ago, that the Commissioner of Public Works was apparently not fully aware of the effect of the system which had been hitherto adopted by the Government When he had asked about the trenching of that place of worship—(laughter)—he meant of the trenching of that House, the hon the Commissioner of Public Works entered into a statement, but the statement which the hon gentleman then made showed that he was not aware of what was going on, inasmuch as the statement he made was very different in figures from what was shown to be the case by the returns which had since been rendered From those returns, it appeared that the trenching around that House cost £1 9s 8½d per rod He (Mr Duffield) had stated that he believed the trenching would cost at least four times what it ought to, and the return which had since been laid before the House shewed that his remarks were fully warranted It was quite clear that the time had arrived when it was essential that the Government should make some alteration, and——

The SPEAKER remarked that the hon member was arguing a point of which he had given no notice. The proper course would be for the hon member to put the question, and the Commissioner of Public Works having answered it, the hon member could then if he liked give notice of motion in connection with the subject

Mr DUFFIELD would then confine himself to asking the question, whether the Government had made any fresh arrangements in reference to the employment of the unemployed

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that although he could not answer in the affirmative, he would state that different arrangements were in course of being made Those arrangements were however not yet completed, but when he was in a position to place the House in possession of them he was sure that not only the hon member for Barossa, but every member of the House would be satisfied with them Arrangements would be completed by which a most complete check would, as he believed, be obtained A simple mode of measurement would be adopted by which it would be ascertained whether the Government got a fair day's work from the parties whom they employed. The course which the Government contemplated adopting would be perfected in a few days, and he might mention that a portion of the surplus labor of the colony would be employed in breaking stones, and the remaining portion would be employed in piecework.

WINE AND BEER LICENCES.

Mr. Bakewell gave notice that on Tuesday next he should move that so much of the Publicans' Act as related to the issue of wine and beer licences should be repealed.

THE HARBOR TRUST.

The Commissioner of Public Works gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move an address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting the appointment of Henry Simpson, Esq., as a member of the Harbor Trust, in the room of E. G. Collinson, Esq.

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands the consideration in Committee of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill was made an Order of the Day for Thursday.

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the consideration of this Bill in Committee was postponed, the hon. gentleman remarking that he was perfectly prepared to proceed with the Bill, but that the House would probably desire to proceed as quickly as possible with the adjourned debate upon the Ways and Means.

THE ESTIMATES.

Upon the motion of the Treasurer the consideration in Committee of the Estimates was postponed till Tuesday next, the hon. gentleman remarking that the Attorney-General had, on the previous day, informed the House that the second reading of the Assessment Bill would be postponed till the following day.

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS.

Mr. Neales brought up the report of the Select Committee upon the petition of Captain John Finnis in reference to the completion of the first volume of "Hansard." The report was read, and was to the effect that the Committee, after taking evidence, found that the allegations contained in the petition were proved, and they recommended that the balance of the contract be handed over to the petitioner, who would still be a heavy loser by the transaction. A rider was added by Mr. Strangways, expressing an opinion that the work had been too much condensed.

A THIRD JUDGE.

Upon the motion of Mr. Barrow, the House went into Committee for the consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief affirming the desirableness of appointing a third Judge of the Supreme Court, and requesting that the Government may be instructed to prepare and bring in a Bill on the subject.

Mr. Barrow remarked, that he felt sure the House desired to proceed as speedily as possible with the adjourned debate upon the motion of the hon. member Mr. Glyde, and therefore, he would do no more than offer one or two brief remarks on the subject upon the notice paper, which he had had the honor of bringing under the consideration of the House. He thought there could be but one opinion amongst hon. members as to the desirableness of having a third Judge, the only question which he could suppose would be raised in opposition to this, would be a financial one. If, upon a question of expense, the proposition which he had made should be objected to, no one more than himself would feel the force of that objection. If it were shewn or even stated that the expense was a valid objection to making the appointment at the present time, he should as heartily, upon that ground, consent to waive the motion, as upon others he should contend for the adoption of the principle. He believed, that whilst there were some departments in which they might with advantage to the public service economise, there were others in which the expenditure of public money was connected with such vital interests that they ought not to allow financial economy to permit them to forget what was due to the administration of justice. He believed, however, that by the appointment of a third Judge, they might be so enabled to regulate matters in the Supreme Court, and so to economise the administration of justice throughout the colony, that what was spent in one direction would be economised in another. He thought that the appointment of a third Judge would not altogether prove an additional expense, but that when the Estimates were brought under consideration, if the motion at present before the House were carried, many of the items in connection with the expenditure of the Supreme Court would be challenged by hon. members. He believed that the appointment of a third Judge would facilitate the administration of justice throughout the colony, and thus it was, notwithstanding his desire for financial economy, that he was found urging this question. If they could facilitate and economise the administration of justice in the country districts, and in the Supreme Court of this province, they would do a good and great work, and in carrying out that work they would be supported not only by the people of Adelaide, but by those of the country districts in enabling them to obtain speedier and more effectual justice than hitherto. Not wishing to take up the time of the House, and thus postpone the discussion on the more interesting subject which had been postponed from the previous day, he would move that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief praying His Excellency to appoint a third Judge of the Supreme Court, and requesting that the Government may be instructed to prepare and bring in a Bill on the subject.

The Speaker suggested that the hon. member should add, "and that this House make good the expense thereof."

Mr. Reynolds wished, before the motion was put, to make one or two observations. The hon. member who had brought forward this motion had stated that there could not be two opinions as to the desirableness of appointing a third Judge. He should like, however, to know the precise grounds upon which the House was asked to request the Governor to introduce a Bill for the appointment of a third Judge. He was not disposed to take it for granted, as had been stated by the hon. gentleman who had charge of this motion, that it was desirable to appoint a third Judge. Such an appointment would involve a large expenditure to the country. It did appear to him a most peculiar and extraordinary thing, that with a population of 110,000 or 112,000 people they should have three Judges in order that the administration of justice might be carried out properly. Unless the hon. member for East Torrens could give some better reasons for such an appointment than those which he had already given, he certainly felt disposed to vote against the proposition. The hon. member had stated that such an appointment would facilitate the administration of justice in the country districts, and therefore that they should appoint a third Judge. He could have understood the proposition if the District Courts Bill, which was introduced last session, were before the House. If District Courts or Circuit Courts were to be introduced he could understand the motion for the appointment of a third Judge, because one Judge would be required to travel; but until a District Courts Bill were introduced, he could see nothing at all to justify the appointment of a third Judge. The Supreme Court department was already a very expensive one, and unless the hon. member was prepared to reduce the expenditure connected with that department the House would certainly not be justified in assenting to the appointment of a third Judge. One point might be urged in favor of the appointment of a third Judge, and that was, that in cases of appeal or dispute, if the two Judges differed there was no third party to decide. Well, he believed there were cases of this character, but they were very few. It was very desirable whilst talking about reducing the cost of establishments that they should avoid incurring unnecessary expenditure, and, therefore, he urged the House not to assent to the appointment of a third Judge until some good reason had been assigned for doing so. He had not yet heard good and valid reasons for the appointment of a third Judge, and he should oppose the proposition.

Mr. Solomon rose for the purpose of supporting the motion of the hon. member for East Torrens, Mr. Barrow; but at the same time he trusted, although His Excellency acceded to the address, that it would not be immediately acted upon, because he considered the colony was not financially in a position at the present time to bear the additional expense. But he could not say with the last speaker that no good and valid reason had been shown for the appointment of a third Judge, nor could he agree that very few cases arose in which difficulties arose from there being at present only two Judges. There were very many instances in connection with the Supreme Court of this colony which showed that many suitors in that Court labored under great disadvantages in consequence of the two Judges who were connected with the Court being unable to agree. He thought sufficiently valid reasons for such an appointment had been given by the hon. mover. It was notorious that the residents in the country districts were deprived of facilities which they should possess for obtaining justice. It was notorious that a great number of persons committing felony in country districts escaped in consequence of the inability of persons suffering to come to Adelaide for the purpose of prosecuting. If this were a state of things which was to be permitted to exist, and was not to be deplored, then unquestionably there was no necessity for the appointment of a third Judge, but on the other hand if it were held that it was necessary to grant justice to the country districts, then he contended it was absolutely necessary that a third Judge should be appointed. He believed that Circuit Courts would be found very useful, and, no doubt, the appointment of a third Judge was merely a preliminary step to their introduction. He believed with the hon. member, Mr. Barrow, that when they came to the Supreme Court items upon the Estimates they would find that a great saving might be effected. It was principally, however, upon the ground that much benefit would arise to the country districts that he supported the appointment of a third Judge, but at the same time he hoped for the reason which he had previously assigned that the appointment would not be immediately made, but that the House would signify when they desired effect to be given to the resolution.

Mr. Hay stated that upon the very grounds which the last speaker had stated he should support the motion, he (Mr. Hay) should oppose it. In the first place the hon. member, Mr. Solomon, had stated that the colony was not in a position to pay the salary of a third Judge, and although he should vote for the presentation of the address, yet the hon member stated that he trusted the Governor would not act upon it (No no)

Mr SOLOMON was desirous of offering some explanation, but the Speaker said the better course would be to allow the hon member, Mr Hay, first to conclude his speech

Mr HAY had certainly understood the hon member to say that the colony was not in a position to pay and he therefore hoped that the Governor would not act upon it (No, no) He took down the hon member's words and they were to the effect that although the address was adopted by the House he hoped the Governor would not act upon it (No, no) The hon member who cried "No, no" would have an opportunity of explanation, and he should be very happy to be convinced that he had misunderstood the hon member It was quite time he contended to ask for the appointment of a third Judge when the colony was in a position to pay for it In cases where the two Judges disagreed, he would suggest that the difficulty might be met by giving the opinion of the Chief Justice preference to that of the other Judge (No, no) He believed the present law as it was carried out, was one from which much difficulty could not arise He believed that the present rule was that the opinion of the Judge who presided upon the Bench when the case was tried, carried the day, that is, that his judgment was upheld He thought that was a very fair mode, and that there could be no great objection to it He agreed with the remarks of the hon member for the Sturt, that in a population of only 110,000 or 112,000 inhabitants, it did seem strange that three Judges should be required It was perfectly monstrous that they should be called upon to expend another £1,300 per annum in the payment of a third Judge This would be going far beyond their means During a debate which had already taken place in that House, they had heard so much about the financial position of the country, a decreasing revenue, &c, that he was sure the House would agree with him, it was not the time to bring forward a motion for the expenditure of £1,300 for a third Judge If, as had been observed by the hon member for the Sturt, there were a Bill before the House for the establishment of Circuit Courts, it would be a different thing, but even then, it would be a question with him whether they had not better meet the difficulty by allowing a certain sum for the attendance of witnesses, instead of appointing a third Judge, and establishing Circuit Courts He believed that there might be some reasons for sending a Judge to the far north, or to Guichen Bay, but he doubted if there were many other places to which it would be advisable to send a Judge It should be remembered that travelling was expensive, and that if they appointed a Judge, they must pay his travelling expenses, nor was this all, for if they established Circuit Courts a number of lawyers would in all probability follow the Judge and these would certainly not go unless they were pretty well sure of getting well paid The House should consider whether after all Circuit Courts would not be a greater expense to suitors than the present system, and whether, instead of establishing them, it would not be better to provide for the administration of justice to the residents in the country districts by paying a portion of the expenses of witnesses Considering that the condition of the revenue was not such as to bear the additional expense, and that the smallness of the population would not warrant the appointment of a third Judge, he must oppose the motion

Mr SOLOMON rose for the purpose of explaining what he had really said in reference to this question He had been misquoted by the hon member who had just sat down He had not made use of the remarks which had been attributed to him, but what he had really said was, that whilst he trusted the Governor would accede to the resolution of the House, he also trusted that the House would on a future occasion decide when the appointment should commence

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if it was absolutely necessary that the words should be added, "and this House will make good the expenses thereof" He had looked into "May" upon the subject, and found that those words were only necessary where the House originated a grant of public money

The SPEAKER remarked that on further reference to "May," he found it was not necessary to add the words in question

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS should support the motion of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) As one of the guardians of the people's money, he believed that in supporting the vote he was supporting true economy Although there might be only something like a population of 110,000 souls in the colony, the spirit of litigation was anything but creditable Nor was it only on the civil side that the remark would apply, for he was sorry to say that on the other side of the Court there was also a great deal of business He believed that a good deal of the litigation arose from the feeling of uncertainty which was created in the minds of suitors in consequence of there only being two Judges He believed that it would be true economy to have a third Judge, and he should therefore support the proposition

Mr STRANGWAYS said that, as the words which had been appended to the motion at the suggestion of the Speaker had now been removed a great many of his objections had also been removed He should object to any resolution of that House which pledged the House to pass a Bill founded upon the resolution before it The whole question was one of supply, and if the addition to which he had referred had not been removed, the House would unquestionably have been bound to pass the Bill when it was brought forward As those words had been removed he should not oppose the resolution, but it must be distinctly understood that when the Bill was under consideration he should consider himself at liberty to take such steps as he might deem desirable He would remind the House that the question relative to the establishment of Circuit Courts was not merely a question involving the appointment of a Judge, but Court-houses would have to be erected, gaols would have to be built, and the expense of establishing each Circuit Court would be a very considerable charge upon the revenue Whether the advantages which would be derived from the establishment of such Courts would be at all commensurate with the expenditure, was to him very problematical There was another circumstance to which he felt bound to direct the attention of the House He believed the Chief Justice had occasionally stated it to be his opinion that writs &c, could be issued from the Supreme Court in Adelaide at any period of the year, that is, that there were a very great number of steps which could be taken here at any season, which in England could only be taken during term Now if Circuit Courts were established here, it would be necessary to divide the year into terms somewhat similar to the practice adopted in England, because if legal gentlemen were compelled to attend the Judge on Circuit, it was clear they could not attend in Adelaide at the same time The Assizes in England were generally so arranged that the sittings of the Assizes took place out of term so that those professional men who had business in London and other large cities might attend Circuit without injury to their private practice But here, under existing arrangements, it was quite clear that one or other must be sacrificed to a great extent If it were intended to make the appointment of a third Judge the commencement of a system of Circuit Courts, the matter which he had referred to should be taken into consideration, and the whole matter had better be arranged in one Bill As to three Judges being too many, he believed that either two were one too many or too few, for if there were a Judge on each side, who was to decide? There was one notorious case in the colony which had been four times tried, had come before the full Court on four occasions On each occasion the judgment was set aside, and such occurrences must take place so long as the present system existed He wished also to know whether in the event of it being determined to appoint a third Judge, it was intended to appoint a local practitioner to the office or to send to England The great objection to the appointment of a local practitioner was that parties who had been in practice here many years almost as a matter of necessity had their friends, and prejudices, and animosities, but if a Judge were imported from England he would be free from anything of that kind That was the great and principal objection which he had to the appointment of a local practioner to the office of Judge If the system were once adopted of appointing a local practitioner to the office of Judge, they would never be able to put a stop to it, and the consequence would be that a person at the head of his profession would naturally expect to be elevated to the Bench as vacancies arose But whatever a man's qualifications might be as a lawyer, he would remark that a good lawyer did not of necessity make a good Judge It would, he thought, be bad policy to initiate a system which might be construed to have that effect If the Bill intended to be introduced were for the appointment of any specific person to the office of Judge he should like to be informed The House would of course be assured that the party intended was in every way competent He mentioned no name as the probable occupant of the office, nor had he heard any name mentioned, but hon members had no doubt seen a name mentioned in the paper, and he believed that a large majority of the members of that House would gladly see the gentleman who had been mentioned elevated to the Bench If, however, the object were to elevate any local practitioner, he hoped the House would well consider the point He hoped the hon member for East Torrens who had introduced this motion, would state that hon members who supported it would not be expected as a matter of necessity to support the Bill, but would state that the motion had been brought forward merely for the purpose of eliciting the views of the House His own impression was that one Judge, supposing he was always in good health, would be sufficient If one Judge were always ready to attend to work, he believed it could be got through, but as it would be unreasonable to suppose that he would be always in good health, the necessity had arisen for the appointment of two Judges, and it now appeared that if there were two it was absolutely necessary to have three

Mr MILDRED hoped the hon member for East Torrens would withdraw the motion for the present, as he believed there would be considerable difficulty in carrying it out at the present time There were many hon members who would remember that there had been but one Judge here for many years, and then the public often complained of the inconvenience to which they were subjected, but since there had been two there had perhaps been more complaints than formerly

The ground which he took was that a small community like South Australia should not be put to the expense of permanently appointing an officer for the purpose of acting as arbiter, where two gentlemen differed. If the hon. member for East Torrens would withdraw his motion, he thought that there might be an understanding arrived at that the gentleman who held the office of Judge of the Insolvent Court, should act occasionally as Judge of the Supreme Court without any additional expense to the colony. The duties were of that peculiar character that they might be performed by any person in whom the public had confidence, having a knowledge of the law, and if the course which he had suggested were followed, there would be no additional expense to the colony. If the motion were not withdrawn, or if the suggestion which he had thrown out were not adopted, then he thought, in preference to appointing a third Judge, it would be better only to have one. He had frequently attended the Supreme Court, and he must say that what occasionally took place in consequence of the different opinions held by the Judges was far from agreeable. The question was one of great and vital importance, and he for one was not disposed hastily to dispose of it, merely, as had been suggested, for the purpose of attending to other and perhaps more interesting business. He believed the end in view would be answered if the Judge of the Insolvent Court were placed upon the Bench when a difference of opinion existed between the other two Judges.

Dr. WARK was exceedingly glad to observe that the hon. the Attorney-General had taken his seat, as this was a subject which it would have been exceedingly inconvenient to discuss in the absence of that hon. gentleman. It was one, indeed, in which the presence of that hon. gentleman was essentially necessary. No one could have the same knowledge of the requirements for a third Judge as the Attorney-General, and it was therefore with much satisfaction he saw the hon. gentleman present. He believed that hon. gentleman would feel no hesitation in expressing an opinion that it was absolutely necessary there should be three Judges. No doubt the House would be ready to take a hint from the hon. member for Noarlunga, and see that due economy was observed. Economy, indeed, must be observed, all the speeches of late had tended towards economy and retrenchment, and he thought that the hint thrown out by the hon. member for Noarlunga pointed to a very economical way of getting over the difficulty, particularly as he apprehended that the points which a third Judge would be called upon to determine would not occupy a great deal of time. The hon. member for East Torrens had not, in his opinion, made out a case, the hon. member had merely stated that it would be well if such and such were done, but he advanced no proofs to support the statement which he had made. Legal gentlemen were unquestionably better acquainted with legal affairs than other people, but it did not appear from the statements which had been made in that House that there were many cases in which the want of a third Judge was severely felt. It did appear to him very extraordinary that in a small community like South Australia, containing little more than 100,000 souls, they should require three Judges. The question should be well ventilated. The opinions of hon. members should be fully elicited. His own opinion was that the financial position of the colony would not warrant them in making the appointment, or, indeed, any fresh appointments, but that they should rather endeavour to do away with some of those at present existing. It would be remembered that the business of the Supreme Court went on very well during the absence of one Judge, when a temporary appointment was made, and he could not see why a similar course could not be pursued in this case. It would be far better that a temporary appointment only should be made than that the colony should be saddled with a permanent expenditure. No Circuit Court Bill was before the House, nor was there any proof that the Government intended to carry out that system. He therefore believed that the appointment of a third Judge would be a great waste of public money, and that justice would be better administered by going on in the present system for a certain time. Trifling cases which arose could be disposed of in Local Courts, and he believed that very few cases arose either at the Burra or Guichen Bay, which were the only two places which had been mentioned as those at which it was desirable Circuit Courts should be held. Under such circumstances he should oppose the motion.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL called the attention of the House to the fact, that during the last session that branch of the Legislature passed a Bill for the appointment of a third Judge, and that was with the view of carrying out what he believed to be a very important, useful, and necessary reform in carrying justice in all cases to the doors of persons in various parts of the country instead of compelling them to come to Adelaide to seek justice. If for no other reason he should support the motion, because he believed it would be impossible to establish Circuit Courts without there being three Judges, and because he believed that Circuit Courts would prove a great boon to the community. It was very true that the number of cases appeared to be comparatively small, in which parties residing at a distance did not possess proper facilities for obtaining justice, but he would tell the House from personal experience, and no doubt the experience of other hon. members was to the same effect, that there were many crimes committed, and still more private disputes, where the expense of bringing witnesses to Adelaide deterred those interested in settling them from taking any steps in the matter. He had known cases of litigation in which the expenses of witnesses to the unsuccessful party were more considerable than the amount in dispute, although that was not small, and in many cases, indeed, in which it was known that heavy expenses for witnesses must fall upon some one, parties were afraid of bringing the matter into Court. It was a great advantage to persons residing in a civilized community, that they should be enabled to settle their differences in a Court of Justice, and the practical recognition of this was, that we maintained a Court of Justice. The advantages, however, of that Court were limited, because it was held in Adelaide only. From tolerable experience in such matters, he would say that although the public were called upon to pay £1,300 per annum for a third Judge, he believed that Circuit Courts would save them fully three or four times that amount in the expenses of bringing witnesses to Adelaide. That was one of the grounds upon which he should support the motion, but another was in reference to the proposition that the whole of the duties should be performed by one Judge. It would be found that the duties of the office of Judge were more than could be properly performed by one person. Independently of the chances of ill health or temporary weakness, it was found that justice could not be properly administered unless there were two Judges. The consequence was that a second Judge was appointed, and the result had been what must always arise where two independent minds were called upon to form an opinion, that they sometimes arrived at different conclusions. Suitors had a right to expect that any Judge who entertained conscientious opinions in reference either to the law or evidence of a case should support that view, that there should be no compromise, and that the Judge should not give up his conscientious opinion upon law or evidence for the purpose of effecting a compromise. If, then, that view were carried out, there would be no means of deciding upon cases upon which a difference of opinion existed between the Judges but by the appointment of a third Judge. A suggestion had been thrown out that the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court might occasionally act as third Judge, and that suggestion he remembered had been thrown out last session, but it clearly could not with any propriety, be acted upon, as the Supreme Court was the Court of Appeal from the Insolvent Court, so that if the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court were appointed to act as third Judge he might be called upon to act as arbiter in cases affecting his own judgment, as well as others. The duties of the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court were quite incompatible with what had been contemplated by the appointment of a third Judge, namely, the establishment of Circuit Courts. He understood that previously to entering the House a suggestion had been made that if the motion were acceded to, a Judge should be sent for from England instead of being selected from the bar of the colony. Every hon. member of that House had probably had an opportunity of observing how colonial appointments of this character operated, and had formed an opinion whether it would be desirable to procure a Judge from England instead of availing themselves of the talent of those who were known in the colony. His own opinion was that they were not likely to select, or to have selected for them, a person more deserving or possessing more the confidence of the public than an individual who might be selected from the bar of the colony. That, however, was a question quite independent of the one which was before the House. He believed for the purpose of effecting a saving to suitors, for facilitating the administration of justice, and for saving expenses to which suitors were subjected at the present time the motion of the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Barrow) was a wise one, and he should therefore support it.

Mr. REYNOLDS gathered from what had fallen from the Attorney-General that something more was intended than the mere appointment of a third Judge. It appeared that it was in contemplation to establish Circuit Courts. If the hon. member for East Torrens had stated this in his motion it would have removed a great deal of the objection which he (Mr. Reynolds) had to the motion, but the hon. member had not stated that much. If the hon. member would add to the motion, "and also for establishing Circuit Courts," he would go with it, as last session he very warmly supported the Circuit Court Bill, and should do so again if it were brought forward during the present session, but if it were not to be, he felt very much disposed to vote against the present motion. He did not see the force of the objections which had been raised to the appointment of the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court to act as third Judge, for although it was true that the Commissioner would, or might be called upon to pronounce upon matters on which he had adjudicated, still it should be remembered that he would have two Judges to act with him. He saw no great disadvantage in the Judge of the Insolvent Court presiding with the two others; nor could he agree with the hon. member (Mr. Strangways) that the establishment of Circuit Courts involved a very large expenditure for buildings, such as gaols, court-houses, &c., as he apprehended there were only two or three districts in which such courts would be established, and in those places they already had suitable buildings, all the machinery was in fact ready to carry out the Circuit Courts. There were three districts he remembered in which Circuit Courts could be established, and if it were the intention of the hon member to move for the establishment of Circuit Courts as well as for the appointment of a third Judge, he should not object to the proposition. He must confess he was rather surprised to find the hon member for the City, Mr Solomon, supporting this motion, because the hon member had on the previous day supported the motion of the hon member, Mr Glyde, in reference to the financial difficulties of the colony. Such being the case, he was at a loss to conceive how the hon member could support a motion for the expenditure of an additional £1,300 per annum if he really believed that the colony labored under such financial difficulties as he had alluded to on the previous day. The hon member said, however, that there was no necessity for the appointment being immediately made, but he did not think the House ought to legislate in that way. Rather let them say, if it were desirable that a third Judge should be appointed, that he should be appointed at once. If it were a question of economy, a Bill should be introduced at once. He should support the motion if amended as he had suggested.

Mr Burford said that for reasons recently advanced, he should feel bound to vote against the motion. It appeared to him that as a matter of necessity, if there were three Judges there would be Circuit Courts, and the additional expense would, in consequence, as he held, be very considerable. In the first place, if Circuit Courts were established, it would be necessary to erect suitable buildings in which to carry on the business, and it would also be necessary to erect Gaols. The mere shell of a Court in which to hold the sittings would not be the only building which they would be called upon to provide. There were a great many other expenses also besides the buildings. After the expression of opinion given in that House the other day, when it was proposed to levy an assessment for the construction of roads, he could not conceive how hon members could feel justified at that particular time in voting for the appointment of a third Judge with all the other expenses involved in such an appointment. He could not pretend to say what the expenditure would be, but he was satisfied it would be many thousands per annum, and when they took into consideration what the annual expenditure under the head of Supreme Court was, he felt assured the House would consider that the amount which was expended on that department was quite sufficient at the present time. He could not help alluding to the remark of the hon member for Encounter Bay, to the effect that it would be unwise to select a Judge from amongst the professional men practising in the colony. The hon member might have reasons for his remarks, but as he understood that which swayed the hon member most was that local practitioners had their local feelings in connection with local circumstances, which were calculated to warp their judgment. That reason, if Circuit Courts were established, would, he (Mr Burford) thought, be particularly applicable to those who were placed upon the Jury. The danger in the one case would be very obvious, but not so in the other. He thought it would be unwise to import a Judge from England, as if they did, he would soon form a circle of attachments and friends, and the same influences would exist as though he had been in the colony for 20 years. But they could never get rid of those feelings which permeated through country districts. There was a proposition formerly to have a Jury of four for the purpose of getting over this difficulty, but suppose they had the old number, 12, he could not conceive how the strong local feeling which would influence the minds of Jurors was to be prevented. He could conceive there were many reasons that the members of the legal profession would like the system of Circuit Courts to be carried out, as it would afford them an opportunity for many country jaunts out of term, so that when their business in the Supreme Court in Adelaide was disposed of, they might take a profitable trip out of town. They would know, of course, when His Honor was going to proceed to such and such a district, and would be on the qui vive to follow him, and whoever paid the expenses, it might be fairly assumed that it would not come out of their own pockets. Looking at the present critical position of the colony, he was not speaking like a croaker he must oppose the motion, as he was not prepared to incur the expense attendant upon the appointment of a third Judge.

Mr Neales should support the views which had been propounded by the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow). He believed they did want a third Judge. He did not say there were a few cases, but he believed there were many very serious cases, which could only be decided either by unshipping one Judge or by appointing another to the Bench. The statement made by the hon member for Gumeracha was quite incorrect, that when a case was brought before the full Court, the Judge who had decided or tried the case, had superior power. So far from this being the case when the case was brought before both Judges, each had equal power, and if they held different opinions there was no other way of obtaining a settlement but by appointing an arbiter as was now proposed. He felt that hon members must see the arguments against appointing the Judge of the Insolvent Court to act in cases in which a difference of opinion existed between the two Judges, were so strong that it was unnecessary to allude to them at any length. If such a course were to be taken, the effect would be that the Judge of the Insolvent Court would be called upon to review his own cases, and have power to decide against the Chief Justice, in fact he would be the Lord Chancellor of South Australia. With regard to the remarks which had been made in reference to the smallness of the population of South Australia, although the population amounted only to 110,000 there were to be found amongst that population the same wants, the same feelings, the same passions as though they numbered ten millions, and if they were a civilized lot they must have the same facilities as though their numbers were greater. It would be but a poor argument to say that many of the smaller towns in England were not entitled to the same facilities as the larger ones, for precisely the same crimes, the same circumstances occurred in small towns as in large ones, and the only difference was that to afford the same facilities to the small as were enjoyed by the large, there was of necessity a little more outlay in proportion. During the previous session of the Legislature he had supported the proposition for the establishment of Circuit Courts, and should do so again. He did not believe it would be necessary to establish permanent Courts at many places, but what he would suggest was, that as circumstances arose the Governor should issue a commission to try cases upon the spot if there were no necessity that they should be tried in Adelaide. That would be one way instead of making Circuit Courts permanent, whether there were any business or not. He believed that there were a great many cases which would otherwise be brought before the Court, but that it had got abroad that the Judges frequently differed, and parties, therefore, thought it was of no use going to law until three Judges had been appointed. With regard to the remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay, who appeared to think it would be injudicious to appoint a Judge from the local bar, he was entirely against the hon member upon that point. He (Mr Neales) had retained the services of the present Lord Chancellor of England at the Union Hall, and if the argument of the hon member for Encounter Bay was worth anything, it amounted to this, that when a Judge was required in England he should be procured from America. (Laughter.) Why a practising attorney of this colony should not have the hope held out to him of becoming a Judge he could not see. He believed, as had been stated by the Attorney-General, that they stood quite as good a chance of making a good selection here as in England, for it must be remembered that here they were not in a position to offer such inducements to accept a seat upon the Bench as in England. Independently of the case of Sir F Thesiger, now Lord Chancellor of England, to whom he had referred as having retained his services for a whole day, at Union Hall, for two guineas, he might mention that he had retained Adolphus also, and then again there was Sergeant Wylde, who began in a very small way, and was not thought much of even as a sergeant though he afterwards held the seals of England. Judge Stephen, of Sydney, practised for many years in the colony before he was made a Judge, and although some might know something not very creditable of those connected with him, still he believed that Judge Stephen was a man whose character and decisions had never been impeached. There were many rising young barristers whom he could mention as likely one day to occupy the position of Judges. One schoolfellow of his was very nearly being Solicitor-General, and would have been but for a change of the Ministry, and he had no doubt would one day be Chancellor of England. He was satisfied that in this colony no man would ever rise to the Bench if there were any suspicion that when there he could not act as fairly and impartially as any Judge in England. With regard to the local feeling which had been spoken of by the hon member (Mr Burford), he presumed that in the event of there being any reasonable grounds for supposing that local feeling would interfere with the administration of justice, there would no difficulty in changing the venue, so that a case, for instance, instead of being tried at the Burra would be tried in Adelaide. He did not think there was any necessity for running into expense immediately in establishing Circuit Courts, but he believed that every one who had been in the Supreme Court lately must be satisfied that another Judge was required, and in passing through the Estimates, it would be for them to see if they could not squeeze out sufficient to defray the salary.

Mr Strangways wished to say a few words in reference to the remarks of the last speaker, relative to having retained Sir F Thesiger. No doubt the hon member had not only detained Sir F Thesiger for two guineas, but he had no doubt that he might, if he had liked, have retained Lord St Leonard for half a-crown. (Laughter.) It was well known that gentleman rose from the ranks. There were numerous such instances, but there was no analogy between a country like this containing a population of 110,000 only equal to a third rate English city, and England containing a population of 26 millions. The Judges in a country like England had their local feeling, but it was very small indeed. Here, however, the case was very different and there was in fact no analogy between the two cases. He had made the remarks which he had, not with the view of inducing hon members to reject the idea of selecting Judges from local practitioners, but merely that the matter might be taken into consideration. In reference to Circuit Courts he believed that the advantages to be derived from their establishment were not nearly so great as was anticipated, inasmuch as in criminal cases the indictments would have to be prepared in Adelaide, and in civil cases, all the pleadings would have to be prepared here, as very few legal practitioners he apprehended would be found scattered amongst the country districts to whom the preparation of such documents would be entrusted. Suitors would of necessity come to Adelaide for the purpose of having the pleas and indictments prepared. The special advantages which would be conferred upon the country districts, he believed would be very small.

Mr DUFFIELD, though he had last year supported the proposition for the establishment of Circuit Courts throughout the colony, should oppose the present motion, thinking that it should have been coupled with something bearing upon that point. When they were considering the subject of establishing District Courts throughout the province he thought the present Local Court Act should be taken into consideration. He believed that great benefit would result from the extension of the jurisdiction of Local Courts, say to £50, and an appeal might be given to the Circuit Courts which he presumed would be provided for in a Bill to be introduced to the House. He objected to the present motion because it proposed to provide the man before providing work for him. He believed that very large further expenses would be incurred if the House passed the resolution in its present form; in fact, he believed it would be beginning at the wrong end. If the resolution were coupled with a Bill such as was introduced last session, he should support it, but he did not now feel justified in doing so. The Commissioner of Public Works had stated, that a few cases arose requiring the intervention of a third Judge, but he did not think the House would be justified in spending £1,300 a-year merely because there were half-a-dozen people who were obstinate. If he found a Judge opposed to him, what he should endeavor to do would be to compromise the matter with his opponents, and no doubt he should succeed in coming to some arrangement. The Attorney-General had said that there were some cases which were never brought before the Court in consequence of it being known that a difference of opinion existed between the two Judges, and the hon gentleman had attempted to shew that great injury arose from this, but he did not think it at all followed it was to the injury of the suitors that they were obliged to arrange the matters privately, however objectionable this might seem to the members of the legal profession.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said what he had stated was that the expense of bringing witnesses to town was so great that persons were deterred from taking proceedings to enforce their claims.

Mr DUFFIELD had certainly been mistaken in the words uttered by the hon gentleman, but still the argument was the same. Persons who were deterred from going into court in all probability in his opinion were saved from costs though perhaps they did not derive what would be a satisfaction to some minds. He fully agreed with the hon member, Mr Neales, that people here had the same feelings, tastes, &c, as in the mother-country, and probably they had the same desire to go into law courts, but he might remark that we had not the same means of paying Judges that they had in England, and this point should he thought be considered before they incurred the expense involved in this motion. He hoped the Government would see the necessity of bringing forward some measure dealing with the subject in a more extensive shape than was proposed by this resolution.

Mr McELLISTER should support the proposition of the hon member for East Torrens, feeling satisfied that the only way of overcoming the difficulties under which they were at present laboring, would be either by dispensing with one of the present Judges or by appointing a third. He believed at the same time that the gentlemen who occupied the Bench were as honest and straightforward as could be found. He did not think that much should be said about the salary, seeing the vast benefits which this appointment was calculated to confer upon the community. The gentleman appointed to the office would spend his money here, and he thought they might depend upon getting an honest, straightforward, and well-qualified man, without sending out of the colony for him. He should therefore support the motion of the hon member for East Torrens.

Mr ROGERS, if he had understood the Attorney-General rightly, understood the hon gentleman to say that he would introduce a Bill for the establishment of Circuit Courts. If so he should certainly support the present motion, considering that great benefits were likely to arise from the establishment of Circuit Courts. He could not believe that the expense of establishing Circuit Conrts in the country districts would be so great as appeared to be anticipated, for in many districts buildings were already provided. In reference to the remarks of the hon member, Mr Strangways, he could assure that hon gentleman that lawyers were beginning to find their way to the settled districts, consequently a good deal of business in connection with Circuit Courts would probably be performed in the immediate locality. Upon the understanding that a Bill should be introduced for the establishment of Circuit Courts, he should support the motion.

Mr BARROW said that he was intentionally brief in introducing the question, though not because he wished to avoid giving reasons for bringing this motion before the House. He had condensed his remarks into the briefest possible space for the purpose of disposing of the question as quickly as possible. He grounded his motion on the necessity which existed for taking some steps for improving the administration of justice at the Supreme Court and preventing the difficulties which so frequently arose in consequence of the two Judges differing in opinion. But it was not merely the Supreme Court which he had in view, he wished to carry justice into the country districts and to enable country settlers to obtain more speedy and economical justice than hitherto. With respect to the financial view of the question he would state that he thought a portion of the salary might be redeemed upon other items placed under the head of "Supreme Court" upon the Estimates. Many of the remarks which had been made during the debate would have been very pertinent if the Bill itself, which some hon members sought to have introduced, had been before the House. For instance, they had been told by the hon member for Barossa that reference might have been made to the Local Court Act. Well, reference certainly might have been made to that Act, and to many others, but all he wanted by the resolution submitted to the House was that the House should affirm whether it was desirable to have a third Judge or not. If a Bill was to be introduced to give effect to the wish of the House, they could then discuss the Local Court Act or any other Act which the hon member for Barossa might think proper to introduce for the purpose of enlivening the debate. (Laughter.) He did not agree with the hon member for Barossa when that hon member stated that the necessity for a third Judge merely arose from half a dozen obstinate individuals. He could assure the hon member that there were a great many more than half a dozen individuals in that House, and he did not know how many out of it, who were very strongly in favor of the resolution which he had had the honor of submitting. He did not know that a person for merely asserting his rightful claim in a Court of Justice was to be called an obstinate individual. If so, he did not doubt that many obstinate individuals might be found; in fact, he believed that if the hon member for Barossa thought that he had a good claim against him and he resisted that claim, he (Mr Barrow) would find him a very obstinate individual. He had been assured by the hon member for the Sturt that if he would consent to the addition of the words "and for the establishment of Circuit Courts," the hon member would support the motion. Well, he had no objection to introduce Circuit Courts, or anything analogous, which, indeed, he thought was implied in his remarks, that he was desirous of carrying justice into the country districts. (Hear, hear.) How justice could be carried there unless there were some kind of legal machinery he was at a loss to conceive, and therefore he could have no objection to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for the Sturt. Whether the House would establish Circuit Courts, or enlarge the jurisdiction of Local Courts, he did not know, nor was he particular so long as he obtained what he was desirous of obtaining, namely, that the administration of justice in this province should be placed upon a more satisfactory footing, and he believed this could only be accomplished by the appointment of a third Judge, unless indeed they went back to one which would be preferable to the anomalous position of having two Judges who were called upon to decide points upon which both differed. He had been asked by the hon member for Encounter Bay whether he would consider that hon members in supporting this resolution, were pledged to support the Bill, and he would state that so far from considering this to be the case, he did not feel himself pledged to support the Bill. The House would have the Bill under their consideration as they would any other Bill, and would deal with it as they would with any other Bill. It was a notorious fact, that at the present moment there was a large sum of money, £5 000 or £6,000, kept back from an individual who considered himself the rightful claimant, because in the present state of the administration of justice it was impossible to get a final verdict. He alluded to the case of Tombe, Blanchard, and Robin. It was not right to say, as he presumed the hon member for Barossa would say, that a man was an obstinate individual, because he did not choose to give up £5 000 or £6,000. In reference to the question whether the Judge should be appointed from the colonial bar or imported from England, the House could discuss and form their opinion upon that point when the Bill was before it, but he had no wish to prejudice that question in any way at all. To meet the wishes of some hon members he would move the insertion in the motion of the words "with the view to the establishment of Circuit Courts."

The CHAIRMAN put the motion as amended, which was carried, and the Chairman then brought up the report, the House resumed, and the report was adopted.

WAYS AND MEANS ADJOURNED DEBATE

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, although he could not agree with the arguments which the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) used on the previous day in introducing his motion, still he was desirous to render justice to the fair way in which that hon member had treated this important subject, and to acquit the hon member—in doing which his (the hon Commissioner's) colleagues joined him—of any desire to make a motion hostile to the Government. (Hear, hear.) That was his (the hon Commissioner's) impression, and he had no doubt his colleagues would join him therein. (Hear, hear.) The hon. the Treasurer had on the previous day very fully, and he (the hon. Commissioner) trusted satisfactorily, shown by figures and other data that the Government had reasonable grounds for supposing that the Ways and Means would be realized as introduced. The House had the testimony of an experienced member (the hon. member for the Port, Captain Hart), whose conviction was that the Customs revenue was not over estimated, and he (the hon. Commissioner) was sure that all hon. members would place great reliance upon a statement coming from an hon. member of such great local experience, and particularly in matters connected with the Customs revenue. (Hear, hear.) Considering that the principal portion of that revenue was derived from spirits and tobacco, and that however bad the times might be people would not cease drinking spirits and smoking tobacco—(a laugh)—he thought the estimate would be maintained as shown by the hon. the Treasurer. The next item was more in his (the hon. Commissioner's) department, namely, the Land Sales, on the probable produce of which, for the next six months, a great deal of difference of opinion existed amongst hon. members. He did not wish hon. members to suppose that he looked upon the yield of the land sales as a thing which would continue for all time. There was an end of all things, and he believed there would be of the land sales, whatever might be the result of the sales for 1859. It struck him (the hon. Commissioner) that the hon. member for East Torrens must have had in view the estimated revenue for the whole year rather than for one half the year. But whatever might be the result of the land sales of 1859—and what man could foresee what would take place in ten or twelve months—there were reasonable grounds for supposing that they would not fall so far short of the estimated revenue as some hon. members had attempted to show the House. He might state that the Surveyor General had assured him (the hon. the Commissioner) that he had reasonable grounds for supposing that in the next six months, 53,000 acres would be bought as special sales. As this large amount would be entirely independent of the ordinary sales, it was his (the hon. the Commissioner's) candid conviction that the sales for the first six months of the year would not fall so low as the hon. member for East Torrens supposed. The revenue from land sales in 1858 was estimated at £180,000, yet there were £181,000 already received, and the sales of nine weeks were yet to come. Almost within the whole of his recollection—ever since he had held a seat in that House, and he believed it would generally be the case—every succeeding year the estimates of the produce of land sales was under what they produced. It would be unfair to shut our eyes to the fact, that there were many causes which appeared disadvantageous to the usual flourishing state of our land sales; but these causes were very much magnified, and he thought some sources of revenue had been lost sight of. The other day the House had a discussion on the expediency of taxing absentees, but he would draw the attention of the House to the fact that some of the best purchasers of our land were absentees—persons residing in England; and now we had accounts from England showing a very gratifying advance in the price of wool. (Hear, hear.) He was satisfied this would have the effect of restoring the confidence of the stockholders, and would induce them to purchase land on their runs as heretofore. He had lately received a report from the Surveyor-General to the effect that he would be able during the next 12 months to keep the market supplied with land as fully as it had been for two or three years past, and that, therefore, the people would have the same facilities for selecting the land they wanted as hitherto. The most important part of the Surveyor-General's duty was to see that the market was not supplied by fits and starts, but regularly, and that the land should be not alone sufficient in quantity but in quality. He had a report from the very able and efficient officer in question, stating that he would be in a position to do this, and, therefore, one important point might be borne in mind, that so far as the Government were concerned in that department there would be no difficulty in supplying the public with what they required. One remark of the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) was that the Government would probably be taking the eyes out of the country in trying to support the revenue by the sale of land; but the Government had no such intention. They had never done so, and it would be unwise on the part of that or any other Government to attempt it. But because the Government could not get as much as in more flourishing times for the land, where they to suspend the sales? That would be most gratifying to those persons who had purchased land largely, but most injurious to the public. The Surveyor General would continue to put in the market the average quality and quantity of land and by this means the public interests would be secured. He (the hon. Commissioner) had lately learned that applications had been made in London to the Agent General to receive money for the purchase of land in the colony, and he considered this fact very important as showing that persons in England had sufficient confidence in the colony to buy land here. He now wished to say a few words upon the large item set down amongst the expenditure for the half-year for immigration. He would call attention to the fact that the Government had no option but to place a sum of £40 000 for the year, or £20 000 for the half-year, as the proposed provision for this service. Hon. members would recollect that it was decided by a Committee last session that immigration should be proceeded with at the rate of one ship a month. This would absorb £40 000 a year, and in the absence of any resolution of the House to the contrary, the Government had no option but to put that amount on the Estimates. If, however, hon. members considered that one ship every two months would answer, the £20,000 would be sufficient for the year. He might put down the average cost of a ship at £4,400, the average cost of the passage at £14 per statute adult, and the average number of statute adults in each ship a little over 300. This £10,000 for the half-year would be sufficient to introduce one shipload every two months. He hoped the House would not be led away in considering this important question, by what he hoped would prove a temporary depression, to strike out the whole vote for immigration. It was little more than a month since a discussion took place in the House on the subject. Since then he (the hon. the Commissioner) had felt it his duty to address a despatch to the Agent in London, mentioning an outline of the points discussed by the House and pointing out also that he (the hon. Commissioner) considered it very probable that the vote for 1859 would be reduced. He had also pointed out that the labour market was over supplied, and although he was not in a position to give absolute instructions for stopping the immigration decided on last session, he suggested that it would be desirable to restrict the immigrants as far as possible to persons nominated by others in the colony, and to postpone sending out labourers until July. He pointed out that the best time for labourers to arrive was at the time of harvest. Although he gave no positive instructions on these points, he had no doubt that the Agent would act upon the suggestions, and that in the next ship despatched he would send out principally nominated immigrants. He would here state his conviction that the nominated system as now carried out was most beneficial for all the persons who came out under it would not be at all likely to become burthens to the colony, even if there was a dearth of employment. If these persons could not immediately find employment, they would have friends to assist them during the temporary idleness. The charges which persons had to pay for passages were much more reasonable than in Victoria or New South Wales. He should express his full confidence that the regulations would work much better for the colony than the previous ones, and he should be very sorry to see them changed. He would also state that the £2,000 which the hon. member for East Torrens did not think would be realised averaged very equally about £350 per month. He would now only make a few allusions to details of his department which had been referred to on the previous day, as these would be the subject of considerable discussion. But there were one or two statements made of so important a character, that no time should be lost in setting hon. members right upon them. The hon. member for East Torrens had made allusion to the Survey Department, and had spoken of surveyors who were formerly on the temporary list being now on the permanent staff, at the same time expressing an opinion that they were not employed half their time. That was a statement which it would not become him (the hon. Commissioner) as the head of the Department to pass unchallenged. These parties were employed for the whole year round, there was never a period when they were not employed. He hoped the hon. member was disabused on that point, and he would not think there was any surveyor upon the Estimates who had any portion of his time employed unprofitably to the public. It would, perhaps, be well to inform the House how surveyors formerly on the temporary list were now on the permanent list. He would, with the permission of the House, read what the Surveyor General said on this subject—"Temporary staffs were so classified, not because the extra assistance would not be permanently wanted in future years, but because it was not finally decided whether the detachment of the Royal Engineers should not be kept up to its original strength of 15, in which case the temporary assistance would not be required. It has now been decided not to replace the men of the detachment as they leave the service by other military surveyors; it, therefore, becomes desirable to make the permanent establishment up to the strength that will be required for the conduct of the survey of this colony for future years. This has been done in the Estimates for 1859. The permanent establishment of Royal Engineers has been reduced from 15 (as originally) to seven as at present." With regard to these Surveyors being placed on the permanent staff, the Surveyor-General could not see for very many years any chance of cessation in the duty of the Survey Office. There was a vast amount of land to be surveyed. We should not lose sight of the fact, that what more than anything conduced to place us in a pre-eminent position as compared with the other colonies was the surveys were always in advance of our wants, so that the man who wanted his 80 acres could get it, and become a permanent landholder. This system had worked exceedingly well, and he should be exceedingly sorry to see measures taken by the Legislature which would retard the surveys, and prevent the country being settled by small landholders. The hon. member proceeded to defend, in a few words, the proposed outlay on the Government Farm. Before sitting down he would express a hope that the gloomy forebodings which the House had heard so much of would not be realized. It must be confessed that whether the approaching harvest would be a small one was a matter of opinion Some hon members were of opinion that it would be very deficient, whilst gentlemen from other parts of the country spoke very favourably It was, however, a point which could not be proved until the harvest was gathered in, but hon members would have the opportunity of making such retrenchment as they considered desirable

Mr BARROW felt it his duty to say a few words on this subject, and should first address himself to the observations of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands That hon member had intimated that whether the harvest was to be deficient or abundant was a mere matter of opinion, but he (Mr Barrow) thought that on this point they were getting beyond the regions of speculation and rapidly entering upon the domain of facts The hon gentleman could see for himself, if he took the trouble to look how many broad acres there were which could never pay for reaping, and which if all the rains their hearts could wish for, were to fall upon them, would never be restored (Hear, hear) Of course in other parts of the colony the case was different, and it would be sad indeed if it were not so He knew that whilst the corps were deficient in some parts they were abundant in others A deficient harvest here did not mean what the same words meant in England In England a deficient harvest meant that there was not bread enough to supply the wants of the country and that there must be heavy and costly imports of food, but here it meant that whilst we had enough for our own wants, we had not so much as we wanted to sell to our neighbors (Hear, hear, and some laughter) It would be a great mistake and would inflict a great injury on the colony if it went abroad, that a deficient harvest here meant the same thing as it meant in England (Hear, hear) On this ground, though they might give utterance to their feelings when things looked a little gloomy, still there was no necessity for saying that we were in a ruined state, or on the verge of insolvency When they said that the crops had failed, they meant that there was not sufficient export harvest to satisfy the farmer He had gone carefully through the Ways and Means, and had noted in the margin many items which he thought would bear reduction, but considered it better to leave these until the House was in Committee on the Estimates, for of course notwithstanding the debate the House would go into Committee (Hear, hear) He would therefore waive the consideration of these items, a course which would no doubt be agreeable to those hon members who made long speeches, and who wished to rise, or, at all events, to those who liked short speeches and made none at all themselves (A laugh) There were three courses before hon members,—first, to support the motion of the hon member (Mr Glyde), second, to support the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, which was not an amendment at all, and thirdly, to vote against both If the word "may" stood in place of the word "will" he might possibly support the motion of the hon member (Mr Glyde), but he thought it was not sufficiently ascertained or proved as a fact that the Ways and Means certainly would not be realized according to the Estimates, or if not, that they would fall so far short as to justify the deduction which formed the concluding portion of the amendment [The hon member here read the resolution] That language was too strong, inasmuch as it indicated a state of things which he (Mr Barrow) did not believe would arise He recollected some time ago, when he had not the honor of a seat in the House, that a gentleman now filling the highest position in the Government of the country laid an elaborate series of figures before the Legislature, showing that if the country was not on the verge of bankruptcy it was rapidly falling into that condition The result of that proceeding was the celebrated Estimates Committee, and whilst he believed that that Committee conferred great benefits on the people of the colony—(hear)—notwithstanding all the odium and reproaches to which its members were subjected, still it must be admitted that the forebodings of these gentlemen had not been wholly realized, and that the resources of the colony had shown themselves to be more elastic than had been supposed He thought the present position of affairs might be very much the same, and that instead of verging upon bankruptcy on the 1st July, 1859, if the Estimates were not altogether realised, they might not have fallen very short of the amount set down by the hon the Treasurer In making this statement he did not want to quarrel with the opinions of those hon members who believed that there would be a decrease in the revenue. He knew such would be the case, and the hon the Treasurer knew it also, for he had provided for such a decrease If the hon the Treasurer had not made allowance for a falling off in the revenue he (Mr Barrow) should have voted against him, but the hon member had proclaimed in the Ways and Means the extent of the anticipated deficiency That allowance might or might not be enough, but there was an allowance The hon member admitted that they would not realise as much in the first six months of the next year as in the first six months of the present year The revenue for the first six months of the past year was £232,000, and the estimate for the present year £221,000, leaving a balance of £10,505, and that not for twelve but for six months Besides, the hon member had not added what in ordinary circumstances would have gone to the credit side of his account, owing to the increase of population Thus there was an allowance for the year of 21,000*l*, saying nothing of what the increased population would consume It might be said that this decrease was not commensurate with the deficiency in the harvest, but they lived not on the profits of one harvest, but on the profits of a series of harvests (Hear, hear) One class of persons next year might be compelled to retrench, but there were others who would spend just as much as if the harvest had been abundant and plentiful At all events, whether the revenue would be realized or not, it was not demonstrated that it would be deficient He would, therefore not go with the motion of the hon member (Mr Glyde), and there was the less necessity for his doing so as he was prepared to go almost any length in making reductions on the other side of the account, which was all the House, could do even if the most gloomy forebodings of the hon member were realized They must allow something for establishments, the cost of government, and public works, but he was prepared to go through the Estimates and strike out unhesitatingly those items which had no right to appear there Then, if the revenue should fall off more than was anticipated, the House would have made provision for the deficiency by diminishing the expenditure It would be wrong for a responsible Ministry to depreciate the income of the colony They should not on the one hand delude the people with exaggerated statements of prosperity, or mislead them with hopes not to be realised, but, on the other hand, he would repeat, it would be wrong for a responsible Ministry to try to put down their income at less than they believed it would amount to They were bound to make a careful calculation, and then it rested with the House to keep the expenditure within such bounds, that if the income was not realised no disaster would ensue Disbelieving that the revenue would fall off to the extent, and being fully prepared to make the full provision for such falling off as might take place, he could not see the necessity of supporting the resolution of the hon member for East Torrens As to the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, it was included in the motion of the hon member for East Torrens [Mr Barrow here read the amendment] It appeared to him that the two motions were nearly identical, indeed it was surprising after having seen the antagonistic positions of these hon members how close their views were It reminded one of the old rhyme—

> "Strange that such difference should be
> 'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee "

(Laughter) He thought when hon members were engaged in going through the items of expenditure they would find something worthy of their financial zeal, and therefore he was prepared to let the Government produce the income which they stated they could produce, and which at least within a reasonable limit, he thought they could obtain He would let the Government be responsible for producing the money whilst the House did its duty in watching the expenditure If hon members went through the Estimates from page 8 to page 38, they would see no doubt a variety of ways in which money could be saved without inconvenience or injury to the public service (Hear hear) It would be a far shorter and easier method when the House was asked £95,000 for the first half of next year to say "we will give £85 000, the same as last year, or, as our income is likely to be less, we will take off £5,000 and give you £80,000 Go through the whole Estimates—there is your £80,000, and do the best you can with it " He (Mr Barrow) would not despair of the Queen's Government being carried on if the House said, "Gentlemen, £80,000 is the most you will get " (Laughter) He knew very well the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches would, in such a case, find the way of saving £15,000 He would rather take his stand on this point than prove to demonstration that the Government could not get the income which the hon the Treasurer would prove to demonstration they could get (Laughter) In going through the estimates of expenditure, he saw many things which would give rise to discussion He hoped the department of Police, for instance, would be overhauled for he was confident a great saving could be effected in that department It was true they could not expect so much police display for 8,000*l* as for 10,000*l*, but let them have 8,000*l* worth of protection, and they could do without the 2,000*l* worth of display Then there was the Registration Department which was carried on at a great expense, and in the most cumbrous and unsatisfactory manner There was a gentlemen at the head of the Lands Titles Registration Department who was only desirous of having more work to do than he had at present—a gentlemen who ran the faster the more weight he carried (laughter), and he (Mr Barrow) thought it would be well to allow that gentlemen not only all the conveyancing, but also all the registration business of the colony That gentleman was so convinced of the elasticity of the office over which he reigned supreme, that he would at once recommend the abolition of the other branch of the Registration Department. The very index to the memorials (not in Mr Torrens's but in the other department), he (Mr Barrow) was informed consisted of 76 folio volumes (Laughter) Presuming that to be the extent of the index, he (Mr Barrow) should like to see the library (Renewed laughter) So complicated in fact was the system in that department that it was breaking down under its own weight He (Mr Barrow) understood that it sometimes cost £20 to make a search, and occupied three weeks of time And yet all was the work of 10 years The only consolation was that a system which could attain such a growth in 10 years, must die of premature old age before it was 30 (Laughter) It would be very easy to show in other departments how considerable reductions could be made. He should support the Government in bringing in the Estimates, and oppose both amendments, and he believed the Government would meet the House fully and fairly in a reduction of the expenditure. It had been asked if the Government went out who would supply their places—(hear, hear)—and it was a very proper question to put, for he (Mr Barrow) would never assist in turning out a Government unless he knew that their successors would be wiser and better than themselves—(hear, hear), but he looked upon the retirement of the present Ministry as so unlikely to occur—(a laugh)—he regarded it as a contingency so exceedingly remote, that it needed no consideration. He had not heard the Government declare that they would stand up for retrenchment, nor had he heard them say they would stand by the expenditure. He believed they only wanted the "pressure from without," which meant, in other words, the cordial support of their friends to enlist them on the side of retrenchment. At the same time, he did not think that the men of property were the men who had the largest balances to their credit—the men who had the largest sums locked up in their chests. (Hear, hear.) It would be a false policy to censure the Government because they had not brought forward such large balances at one time as at another time. The House would remember that the Government had been frequently stimulated to expend money on public works, and it would be scarcely generous—indeed it would not be just—to turn round now and say, "nearly all the funds are exhausted, there is next to nothing in the Treasury." If the House gave the Government instructions to spend all the money in the Treasury on public works, the House could not "have its cake and eat it too." It was on public works the money should be expended, but first of all on roads. They should not be too lavish on buildings, though even on them money was better spent than on mere clerical services, or building, or works of ornament. They should keep down their mere administrative charges to the lowest point consistent with the good of the country, and the reasonable comfort of officers employed in the public service. There was no necessity that any one should be over-paid, but there was every necessity for abolishing many unnecessary officers. He was confident that if the Government obtained 80,000*l* they would take it gratefully and spend it advantageously and economically. (Laughter.) With these remarks he should reserve any further observations he had to offer until the House was in Committee on the Estimates. As the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Townsend) had tabled a motion so much like that of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde), and as he saw that the hon member (Mr Glyde) was not present to support his own amendment, which showed that he cared very little about it, he (Mr Barrow) should vote against both amendments, in order that the House might go into Committee on the Estimates, when he would do his best, together with hon members to reduce the expenditure as far as was consistent with the due performance of the public service.

Mr BURFORD had been a little anticipated by the hon member who had just sat down. He felt considerable difficulty from the similarity of the two resolutions, both of which affirmed the same proposition, and recommended the same course of action. The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) singularly enough had embodied both in his speech, for in the early part the hon member recommended the House to go into details and knock off sums bit by bit, but in the end he said, "we will allow you so much, and do what you can with it." That was the view he (Mr Burford) took. He did not think it at all fair that if the House found, or thought it found that the Estimates of Ways and Means could not be realised, that therefore they should be obliged bit by bit to reduce the amount. The work of the House was to ascertain great principles and request the Ministry to act upon them. The plan he proposed would be the simplest and most effectual. He found that the establishments absorbed seven-sixteenths of the whole estimated revenue before a penny was available for the improvement of the country. That was a most enormous per centage, so great that no man in his senses in business would expect to do any good with expenses in proportion. As far as observation and reading had led him to see, the maximum expenditure in all matters of production was 25 per cent. Hon members would find that some standard of this sort was necessary. He had experienced great dissatisfaction last year, after going through the Estimates, to find that what they had saved was scarcely worth a rap. This was because no standard of expenditure was recognized. He would, therefore, propose, and he hoped to have an opportunity of putting it before the House, a reduction of 10 per cent on the cost of establishments. He would leave the Government to arrange the items in which a reduction, equal on the whole to 10 per cent, should be made, because the members of the Government knew best which items to spare, which to cut off, and which to increase, all of which considerations were involved in his proposal. The Government could do this, and no doubt with comparative ease. This reduction would be a retrenchment of £54,000, and this would make hon members and their constituencies comfortable, so far as any apprehensions of a falling-off in the revenue were concerned, as it would be sufficient to cover any deficiency which might arise. As to immigration, he was not desirous of seeing it stopped altogether. He wished to see it left to the discretion of Government, and was happy to hear the explanation of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands. The choice lay between reducing the expenditure item by item, and knocking off 10 per cent as he suggested. He would include all pensions, gratuities, and allowances in his proposal of reduction. He would say a few words as to the Lands Titles Registration Department, which the hon member (Mr Strangways) took such delight in having a fling at, whether for the sake of the office or of the gentleman who presided over it he (Mr Burford) could not say. It was amusing to see the gusto with which the hon member went in against this department. If this arose from a suspicion that the expense of the establishment was too great for its utility, the hon member had himself to charge for such a result, inasmuch as he had been the first to prevent the establishment from being fully developed. The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had said that the old department should be amalgamated with the new one, and that was what he (Mr Burford) thought. As individuals were obliged to retrench their expenses in trade and manufactures, so the Government should retrench theirs, and if the Government did not choose to do so, the House must do it for them.

Mr REYNOLDS said that after the lecture of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) on long speeches, he (Mr Reynolds) should not make a long speech lest he should not be reported in the Hansard, but taking the speeches of the hon member and comparing them with those of other hon members, he found they occupied as much space as those of any other hon member. Now that hon member (Mr Barrow) had stated that he would let the Government make as large a revenue as possible and let the House deal with the expenditure. The hon member (Mr Barrow) was new to legislation or he would know that if the Government made out a good case for the revenue, they would make a good case for the expenditure also, for the larger the revenue, the larger the estimate to expend. He (Mr Reynolds) would therefore rather see what were the probable Ways and Means. (Hear, hear.) He was glad to find that the hon member, Mr Burford, was converted to the principle of economy and that that hon member had come to regard the Lands Titles Registration Office as an expensive establishment which would require retrenchment. (Ironical "hear, hear," from Mr Burford.) He was also pleased to see the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands look so mildly and gently on the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde). (Laughter.) It afforded him (Mr Reynolds) great gratification to find that there was no desire on the part of the hon member (Mr Glyde) to displace the Government, or to occupy a position on the ministerial side of the House, that he had no ambition to be looked upon as Chief Secretary of South Australia. (Laughter.) That was very gratifying to his (Mr Reynolds's) mind, because it had been intimated to him that the hon member (Mr Glyde) would not be able to work with him (Mr Reynolds), and, therefore, if he was looking for a place on the ministerial side he would be disappointed. (Laughter.) But if the hon member had no desire to displace the Government, the motion had a very hostile aspect, so that if he (Mr Reynolds) had been on the other side, and that any hon member on either side of the House had moved such a motion, he should look upon that hon member as exceedingly hostile to the Government. What else did the motion mean? [The hon member here read the motion.] It would appear from that that the Government were not capable of making a calculation, and that the hon member for East Torrens was far more capable of dealing with matters of finance than the present Cabinet. Supposing the motion carried, could the Government look at it otherwise than as a censure upon their estimate of Ways and Means. He was sure the hon the Attorney-General would view the matter in that light. But if the hon member had no desire to censure the Government, if he was as he represented himself, let him show it by withdrawing the motion. It was a most dangerous motion not only to the Government but to the colony, for it declared a state of things to exist which did not exist. It spoke of financial difficulties, but he (Mr Reynolds) could see none, even if the hon member's own estimate was borne out. The hon member had only shown a deficiency of 39,000*l* and from which he should strike off the 10,000*l* for the assessment on stock, for how did he know that the House would not endorse that Bill. If that Bill passed, our financial difficulties were at an end. But supposing the 20,000*l* for immigration struck off, and that, as the Treasurer had stated, a larger balance than he had before calculated on was brought forward, where would the financial difficulty be then? He could not support the motion, nor the amendment of the hon member for Onkaparinga, who adopted the same statement. There was no reason for reducing the expenditure on the ground of financial difficulty. He would go with any hon member in reducing the expenditure, but he did not like to see an hon member take up a subject which he did not like to handle. He still thought that neither the land revenue nor the Customs would come up to the Estimates, but he could not see the financial difficulties which the hon member for East Torrens spoke of. The motion, if carried, would have a very prejudicial effect on our bonds, as it would alarm the capitalists who invested in them. Notwithstanding all that had been said about our being a sensible set of fellows engaged in reducing our expenditure on account of our financial difficulties, it would be well to show first that that was the case There was one matter which, if he stood alone, he would vote against, and that was the sum for immigration, To propose such a sum for the first six months of 1859 was like throwing the money away We had had one lot of nominated immigrants, and was that a good sample? Why some of them were working at 2s 6d a day, and dear at that He would say we were better without such immigrants There were some of them working at 3s 6d and 4s 6d a day on the railway, to whom he (Mr Reynolds) would not give half-a crown ("No no," from the Commissioner of Crown Lands) Of course there were exceptions

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that nominees under the new system had scarcely time to arrive yet The hon member was speaking of persons who had come out under the old system

Mr REYNOLDS was speaking of the old nominees The old nominees would not do at all, and he questioned whether the new nominees were any better (Laughter) In Victoria very little was now paid for importing labor It would be better to keep the money here than send it to import labor which we would not have capital to employ when it arrived The hon member concluded by again suggesting that Mr Glyde should withdraw his motion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reference to what fell from the hon member (Mr Reynolds) as to the character of the resolution of the hon member (Mr Glyde) would say that but for the disclaimer of that hon member he would certainly have taken the motion to imply that the hon member had not confidence in the Government in reference to their dealing with the Estimates But whether the resolution had been tabled or not, it was proper that the subject should come under the notice of the Committee At the same time, he could not see any reason for the statement of our position and prospects which the resolution contained The Estimates were prepared when there was no prospect of a deficiency in the harvest, but when, on the contrary, the hon member (Captain Hart) whose position enabled him to form a most reliable opinion, thought that the crops would be so far above an average as to compensate for the deficient harvest of last year, though the character of the weather since had been such as to falsify the prediction as to some parts of the colony Speaking from the information of persons who ought to be authorities, he would say that although in some places there would be a total failure, in others the yield would not be below an average harvest But he would ask any hon member what would be his feelings and that of the House, if there was such a harvest as we had promise of eight or ten weeks ago At the time of the preparation of the Estimates the Government were abundantly justified in assuming such a revenue as appeared on the Estimates, He would not go into detail but he would say that judged by any test ordinarily applied to matters of the kind, the calculations of the Government could not be attacked But there was a very general apprehension as to some impending occurrence—something in the character of a panic which led people to think that ordinary calculation did not form a safe basis to rely upon He did not pretend to say how far this feeling was well founded or otherwise, but except it there was nothing in existing facts to lead the House to any other conclusion than that the Government calculations would be borne out These calculations, or even those of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde), might be upset Something might happen beneficial to the colony beyond what was anticipated, and the revenue might rise, or something disastrous beyond what was anticipated might happen, and the revenue fall But there was nothing in ordinary calculation to show that the revenue would not be realised The matter was not one of calculation, but of expectation It was a calculation in the American sense that hon members might guess, but it was not a calculation from figures, but in anticipation of the future from the experience of the past The object of the Government laying the Estimates before the House was, that they might be considered under every possible aspect in order that the House might make such reductions as were required or as the Estimates would admit of The hon member (Mr Burford) spoke of a fixed proportion which should exist between the revenue and the expenditure , but he (the Attorney General) would ask the House to consider that there was absolutely no analogy between the business of a productive establishment and a Government which did not pretend to produce but to administer the Government The object of a Government in this country was to protect person and property, to see that no destitute person should die of starvation, or be without medical attendance, and to provide safe custody and support for criminals and lunatics, not one of which functions was productive but all of which were essential to the well-being of the community, and to maintain our position amongst civilized states Would the hon member Mr Burford, say that we were to strike off half the amount for each of these purposes, in order to maintain the proportion between revenue and expenditure (Mr Burford—"one-tenth ") The Attorney General proceeded to explain how he had been misled by Mr Burford s having stated the sum which he proposed to economise at £54,000 Would the hon member because there was a deficient harvest, and the necessities of life were scarce, diminish the income of every schoolmaster in the country? The hon member concluded by pointing out that the Legislature must either entrust the whole distribution of the expenditure to the Government, or keep up a costly system of checks and counter-checks like that now existing, and of which the Audit-Office was about the most costly item of all

Mr MILDRED said it was hardly necessary to add any remarks to those which had been made upon this very interesting subject, which had been discussed by hon members in every tint and shade in which it could be presented He would recommend the hon mover to withdraw his motion, and considered that great good would result from the discussion which had taken place. He for one could not sanction the proposition that the House should throw £80,000 into the hands of the Government, and say "there do what you please with it " He would never sanction such a course as that The Government had prepared a plan of expenditure which they no doubt thought best for the interests of the country, and it was the duty of the members of that House to criticise every item, and either sanction or reduce each item as it came before them It would be throwing a most improper power into the hands of the Government if the House were to say "There's so much money, do what you like with it " That House should remember that it was their duty to look after the interests of the people, and to consider the interests even of the meanest officer in the Government service So much had been said upon the subject, that he trusted without further discussion the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) would withdraw the motion, or if the hon member would not consent to do so, he (Mr Mildred) would take the opportunity of moving that the Chairman report progress

Mr BARROW wished to explain that he did not recommend the House to knock off a certain sum, but he had said they must resort to that alternative and leave the Government to adjust the distribution, or they must go into detail He had stated that he was quite prepared to take up the items one by one and see where reductions could be effected

Mr GLYDE would say one or two words in reply to what had fallen on the previous day from the hon member for Onkaparinga. He hardly knew if it was worth his while to take any notice of what had fallen from the hon member, nor did he think the hon member had improved his position by the attack which he had made upon him He would just remind the hon member, however of the good old proverb, "that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones" especially when their panes are so very large Nothing would have been easier than for him to hold up the hon member for Onkaparinga to the derision of the House He might have reminded the hon member how he had attempted to snatch the reins of Government by bringing forward a motion upon distillation

Mr TOWNSEND rose to order The hon member was not at liberty, by the rules of the House, to refer to a previous debate

The SPEAKER said the hon member would be out of order in referring to a previous debate

Mr GLYDE would not then refer to the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga, but would merely remark that nothing would be easier than for him to hold the hon member up to ridicule, by referring to his well-known antecedents and probable future Nothing would be more amusing than to allude to the personal appearance of the hon member and his peculiarities, but in that House he should be sorry to resort to anything which would detract from the high respectability and gentlemanly feeling which characterised the discussions of that House He could not agree with the hon member for Onkaparinga, in the amendment which he had brought forward He believed that amendment was calculated to do the very mischief which he (Mr Glyde) was desirous of avoiding He would say a few words in reference to what had fallen from the hon the Treasurer Since the financial statement had been made the hon gentleman had stated he had discovered that the exports had not fallen off for some months as he had expected, and that during several months there had only been a total decrease to the extent of 114,000*l* He was aware that the conclusions likely to be arrived at from a comparison of imports and exports were very likely to prove fallacious, as, for instance, goods consigned to this market might not realize nearly as much as the amount at which they were valued, and the same remark would apply to exports, so that in both cases it would appear that goods to a much larger than the actual amount had been imported or exported Looking at the returns for the last quarter of last year, it would be seen that the amount of exports had been fearfully overrated , for instance, 16 000 bales of wool were valued at 281,756*l* , being nearly 18*l* per bale, though anyone knowing anything about wool must know that nothing like that amount was realized to the exporters At least, 50,000*l* should be taken from that amount Then there were 9,000 tons of flour, which were valued at 20*l* per ton, though everyone who knew anything about the flour market, must know that it was worth nothing like that amount, that the flour trade was depressed at the time, and that 13*l* or 14*l* per ton would be the full value, so that there would be fully 50 000*l* to take off the gross amount of this item Fortunately it would be principally the South Australian Bank who would have to bear the loss Then there were 600 tons of copper exported during the last quarter of 1857, valued at nearly 120*l* per ton, and one equal to 400 tons of copper valued

similarly in excess of actual value The valuation in this instance was fully 20,000*l* too much, so that the total amount overvalued was fully 120,000*l*. It might be said that this excess of valuation was redeemed in the next 6 months, but such was not the case, for he found there were then exported 1,100 tons of copper, valued at 115*l* per ton, 7,000 bales of wool, at 18*l* per bale, 8,000 tons of flour, valued at 15*l* per ton, &c The real falling off in the exports during the last few months might he believed be put down at 250,000*l* instead of 127,000*l*, as estimated by the Treasurer He did not want to exaggerate matters, but he felt that the financial depression which existed was attributable to the falling off in the exports of our three great products He was glad to find that the Treasurer in anticipation of the disallowance of the 10,000*l* for assessment on stock had very unexpectedly discovered another 10,000*l* which had been put away somewhere Of course he would not dispute this being the case, as he had not the same access to documents that the hon gentleman had As regarded the Customs revenue he could not but express surprise that the hon gentleman should still adhere to 77,000*l* as the probable revenue for 1859 He had shown that the spirit duty had fallen off greatly, and that recently it had not exceeded 1,000*l* per week, and the House had passed a resolution to the effect that cornsacks should be admitted free, though that source had produced during the last six months £2,000 There were so large a number in store, however, that even if the duty were continued, it could not be expected to amount during the next six months to more than a quarter what it had the last The Treasurer had said that even supposing these calculations were correct, and that the amount calculated in excess of the revenue were taken off, still the expenditure would not exceed the revenue, but he would remind the House, that there were Supplementary Estimates which were always presented to the House, and the probability was that when they assembled in April they would be asked to vote another £50,000 Of this he was certain that the revenue for the first six months of 1859 would not meet the expenditure, and if that was not commencing badly he did not know what was The Commissioner of Crown Lands had made a very extraordinary statement, though a very pleasing one, to the effect that the Surveyor-General was aware of a lot of land which could be sold for £53 000 within the next month He was certainly taken by surprise to hear such a statement, but was glad to hear it, and had no reason to doubt its truth He thought, however, that the Commissioner of Crown Lands was mistaken in what he said about immigration, for if he understood the hon gentleman rightly, he had stated that every ship cost £4,400, but that if one ship monthly were sent the expense per annum would be £40,000 Explanation was certainly required on this point, as he had always understood that one ship a month could be sent for £40,000, per annum, but this clearly could not be the case if each ship cost £4,000 The Commissioner of Crown Lands had referred to the probability of the advanced price of wool having a favorable effect upon the land sales, but he questioned this, as those who would probably feel disposed to buy had no pecuniary resources, and the Banks were such severe losers last season by allowing parties to overdraw their accounts against their shipments of wool, that the probability was, they would be exceedingly cautious this time Against this good news in reference to the rise in wool he might mention, however, that the lambing season was exceedingly bad, and he did not exaggerate when he stated that the average deficiency was at least one-third His hon colleague (Mr Barrow) had stated that the hon the Treasurer had amply provided for any deficiency in the revenue, but he could not understand this when last year the amount asked for the whole year was £450,000, and it was now £250,000 for six months Every hon member, indeed, who had spoken on the subject, had admitted the first portion of his proposition, that the revenue was decreasing, and, independently of this, the balance in hand was rapidly slipping away He challenged the Treasurer whether he was not correct in stating that the balance in hand on 1st January, 1859, would only be 150 000*l*, and as 18 months ago it was 280,000*l*, it was clear that during that period the expenditure had exceeded the revenue by 130,000*l* The hon member for the Sturt had taunted him about aspiring to the office of Chief Secretary, but it was hardly fair he thought that independent members should be subject to taunts and sneers for merely standing up upon occasions when they considered the interests of the colony were so deeply involved He denied that he had any ulterior or sinister motive in bringing forward this motion Every member of the Ministry was a personal friend, and would, he was sure, acquit him of anything like intriguing for the purpose of ousting them, but he claimed his right as an independent member to put upon the paper such a motion as that to which he had drawn the attention of the House He would however state that it was his intention to withdraw the motion (Hear, hear) He repeated that he did not wish to turn out the Ministry, but he had merely drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the prospects of the colony were not encouraging, and that it was, therefore, essential they should look to the expenditure, which it was desirable should be cut down If the hon member for Onkaparinga would withdraw his amendment he (Mr Glyde) would withdraw his resolution

Mr TOWNSEND, previous to withdrawing his amendment, would make a few remarks Persons who had not been present in the House would be induced perhaps to think that he had grossly violated the forms and rules of the House, but he confidently appealed to the Speaker and hon members to support him when he stated that he had not made use of a solitary sentence or word in violation of the Standing Orders of the House When he found the hon member for East Torrens putting a motion upon the paper, and seeking to accomplish what he could readily have accomplished by other means—when he found the hon member professing friendship to the Ministry with his lips, but putting on the paper a motion of a directly hostile character, he was perfectly justified in imputing to him the motives which he had On looking at the hon member's notice of motion, he felt bound to say that he never in any deliberative assembly in his life heard a more direct vote of want of confidence in the Ministry It was one of direct hostility to the Ministry, and he was in consequence led to imagine that the hon member was desirous of obtaining a seat upon the Government benches It was not improbable that the hon member did aspire to that position, although the House had not backed his aspirations He had no desire to make a personal attack upon the hon member, but had merely made fair and legitimate comments upon the course which he had pursued He would make a few remarks upon what had fallen from the hon member for Encounter Bay, who was in the habit of dealing with all questions which came before the House in his own funny way, so that it was impossible to tell whether he intended to support or oppose them That hon member came to the rescue of the hon member for East Torrens, and made some complimentary remarks in reference to a clown in a circus He (Mr Townsend) did not know much about such things, but he believed there were generally two clowns and perhaps the hon member for Encounter Bay was aspiring to the position of second, only that some little wisdom was required for the character, and he was sure no one would give the hon member credit for possessing that (Laughter) He repeated that he had no desire to make a public attack upon the hon member (Mr Glyde) nor in any way to wound the feelings of that gentleman If he had done so in the slightest degree he begged to express his regret, and to withdraw any offensive expression which he had used He had taken an opportunity privately of stating the same on the previous evening to the hon member He believed that the course which he had taken had been perfectly parliamentary, finding as he had before said that the hon member professed friendship to the Ministry with his lips, whilst his motion was of a directly opposite character The hon member proceeded to point out the difference between his motion and the amendment, and concluded by expressing his willingness to withdraw it

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS, in reply to Mr Solomon, stated that although he might have stated each ship with emigrants had cost 4,400*l*, at the time that expenditure was incurred the Commissioners in England had a balance in hand, so that not more than the 10,000*l* voted was actually taken from the revenue It it was determined that only 10,000*l* should be expended upon immigration, and that there should only be one ship every two months, the sizes of the ships would be so regulated that the aggregate amount would not be exceeded

One hon member, we believe Mr BURFORD dissenting from the proposition that the mover have leave to withdraw the motion, the Chairman said he must put the motion, which was negatived, and the House resumed

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the further consideration of this Bill was postponed till the following day, and the House adjourned at five minutes past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

---

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 19

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock

THE ESTIMATES

Mr PEAKE asked permission of the House to postpone the motion in his name—"That this House considers it essentially useful to the exact performance of its duties as guardians of the public purse, that the Estimates should be presented to this House within 14 days next following the meeting of Parliament" He observed that there was a good deal of business on the paper, some of which was of a pressing nature, and he would, therefore, move that the motion in his name be an Order of the Day for Wednesday next

Carried

SELECT COMMITTEE UPON TAXATION

Upon the Order of the Day for the report of the Select Committee upon Taxation to be brought up being called on, the TREASURER stated that he was not prepared to bring up the report, and asked for the time for doing so to be extended another fortnight, the Committee having just commenced another branch of the subject which would occupy at least a fortnight

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

The Order of the Day for bringing up the report of the Select Committee on Longbottom's Patent Bill lapsed, there being no member of the Committee present

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the Order of the Day for the consideration in Committee of the Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill being called on the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that the consideration of the Bill be made an Order of the Day for Friday next

Carried

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Bill be adopted

Carried

Upon the motion of the hon gentleman, the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

RAILWAY CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the House resolved itself into Committee for the consideration of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment Bill The hon gentleman stated that the main principle of the Bill had been maintained, and that the alterations which had been made were merely verbal He therefore moved that the amendments be agreed to

Carried

The House resumed, the Chairman brought up the report which was agreed to, and a message was directed to be sent to the Legislative Council, intimating that the House had agreed to such amendments

DATE OF ACTS BILL

Upon the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS, the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Date of Acts Bill was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that he was quite prepared to proceed with the Bill, but as there were other matters upon the paper which were in a more forward state, he would move that the consideration of the Bill be made an Order of the Day for Wednesday next.

Carried

ASSESSMENT BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in consequence of the thinness of the House he was not desirous at present of moving the second reading of this Bill, but as he observed that the consideration of the Impounding Act Amendment Bill appeared as an Order of the Day upon the paper, he would move that take precedence

Carried

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the House went into Committee upon this Bill The hon gentleman remarked that since the Bill had been reprinted he had gone carefully through the Bill, and found that various verbal alterations were required, but they would occupy a very short time The clauses in which such amendments were required were Nos 3 to 5, 10, 12, 14, 16 to 22, and 26 to 32

Mr STRANGWAYS understood that when the Bill was reprinted, the whole of the amendments which had been agreed to would have been made.

The CHAIRMAN stated that those amendments had been made, but that those which were now referred to by the Commissioner of Crown Lands were merely verbal

Mr SOLOMON wished to make an alteration in the 6th clause, to the effect that no publican should act as poundkeeper

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would make such alteration

Mr LINDSAY wished to move a substitution for clause 9 He understood during the previous discussion upon this Bill, that free discussion would be permitted upon it when it was reprinted, and he regretted that several country members who took an interest in the Bill were absent It appeared to him that the 9th clause was really the most objectionable of this paste and scissors Bill, for he could call it nothing else, as it was only a copy of preceding Bills It contained all that was objectionable in the old Bill He hoped the House would judge for themselves, and not be led by the Government If hon members would refer to the schedule in connection with this clause, they would find the schedule unnecessarily complicated, and that the scale was unjust The object of fees was to remunerate the poundkeeper, who acted as gaoler to the unfortunate animals who were placed under his care, and he objected to the charges for some animals being four or five times as much as for others, though the animals for which such increased fees were charged really gave no more trouble than others For instance, he found that for an entire horse the poundkeeper was at liberty to charge half-a-crown per day, and for a bull a shilling a day, although these animals gave no more trouble than other descriptions (Oh, oh) Besides this, it should be remembered that the owners of these animals for which the poundkeeper was at liberty to charge such exorbitant fees, were liable to a penalty of £2 for the animals being astray He also wished some proviso to be introduced by which the poundkeeper should vary his charge for fodder according to the market price of that article. The hon member proposed three clauses in lieu of clause 9, but these were rejected, and the clause was passed as printed

Upon the suggestion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, an alteration was made in the 10th clause, debarring a poundkeeper from charging for two days feed until after an animal had been in pound more than 24 hours

Mr MILDRED suggested that in localities where there were no District Councils the price of fodder should be regulated by the Justice of the Peace in the vicinity

Mr DUFFIELD said that this was provided for in the District Councils Act, and also by the third clause of the Bill before the House

Mr LINDSAY moved the insertion of a clause of which he had given notice after clause 12 The clause was rejected

In clause 19, Mr GLYDE moved the insertion of a proviso that no poundkeeper should be required to deliver cattle on Sunday

Mr DUFFIELD thought at the same time there should be a proviso that poundkeepers were not bound to receive cattle

Dr WARK pointed out that milch cows might be impounded, and the animals would be spoiled for the season if they were kept in pound during the whole of Sunday without being milked

Mr LINDSAY thought the cruelty of detaining the animals in the pound far more sinful than delivering them

Mr ROGERS was in favor of putting a stop to impounding cattle on the Sabbath

Some discussion took place as to whether the poundkeeper should have power to milk cows which were impounded, in the midst of which, upon the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday next

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The ATTORNEY GENERAL rose, pursuant to notice, for the purpose of moving that a Bill, entitled "A Bill for an Assessment on Stock," be read a second time It would be in the recollection of the House that upon a previous occasion when he moved the second reading of this Bill, he was prevented from proceeding with the Bill in consequence of some hon members who expressed themselves not unfavorable to the principles embodied in the Bill, who stated nevertheless that they were not in possession of sufficient information to enable them to form a proper opinion as to whether the measure was just in itself, that is—whether it would be just to levy an assessment at all, and if so whether the amount proposed could be fairly imposed upon the holders of pastoral leases at the present time. An amendment was in consequence brought forward that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and the Government assented to the proposition for the purpose of enabling the squatters, as they were termed, to appear before the Committee, and prove if they could that there was anything unjust in the principle of the Bill, or that the assessment which was proposed was excessive That Committee had taken evidence and had presented their report to the House The recommendation of that report was not in accordance with the policy of the Government nor in accordance with what he believed to be the best interests of the country Shortly after this report was laid upon the table of the House a notice of motion was placed on the paper by the hon member for Encounter Bay, asking the House to adopt the report of the Committee, and it appeared to him and other members of the Government that when that motion was brought forward would be as favorable an opportunity of discussing the whole principle involved in the report and the Bill as could be found, and, therefore, till that motion could be discussed no steps were taken for the second reading of the Bill If the discussion upon that motion had come on, and the House had adopted the report, they would of course have declared against the principle of the Bill, but on the other hand, if they had rejected the report the Government would have considered that the House were disposed to affirm the principle of the Bill When, however, the day came for the discussion of the motion to which he had alluded, the hon member for Encounter Bay allowed it to lapse, and it was then that the Government immediately gave notice for the second reading of the Bill He wished to say, in the first place, that though he considered in all cases the report of a Select Committee was entitled to the respectful attention of the House, he did not consider the House bound by the recommendation of a Committee It was the duty of the House to examine the reasons upon which the recommendations of the Committee were based No report of a Select Committee could be binding upon the House, the position really being that the House referred questions to a Select Committee in order that such Committee might collect evidence to enable them to form an opinion upon the question submitted to them, and also to enable the House to form an opinion The House would form its opinion from the character of the evidence which the Committee had chosen to call, and the character of the witnesses who had been examined He must say, in reference to the Committee appointed in this case, that upon looking at the evidence which they had called, that alone was sufficient reason to his mind to refuse to be bound by the report of the Committee, for that report professed to be based only upon the evidence which the Committee had taken The first witness was Mr

Wm Jacobs, a squatter, the next the Hon John Baker, a squatter, the next, Mr R R Torrens, to whom he would refer presently, the next, Mr John Taylor, a squatter, the next, Mr J H Brown, a squatter the next, Mr J Ellis, a squatter, the next, Mr W J Morris, who expressed no opinion, and the last, Mr Hallett, a squatter When a Committee was appointed to form an opinion upon the justice or expediency of a measure, and when all the persons who were called to give evidence upon this subject were persons directly interested in opposing the measure, that in itself was sufficient to cast such suspicion on the evidence as to justify the House in refusing to adopt the report, bearing in mind that the report was based, or professed to be based, upon the evidence alone He would direct the attention of hon members to the report, by which they would find that the report was based solely upon the evidence The Committee gave as their only reason for deciding against the Bill, that every person whom they had examined was opposed to it, forgetting apparently that every witness whom they had selected was known to be hostile to the measure and was interested in opposing it That reason alone was sufficient to induce him to refuse to give his assent to the report No one could look at the evidence called to decide upon a question between the country and the squatters, and not feel that that alone was sufficient to induce him to refuse to give any weight to the report of the Committee That one reason he considered sufficient, but the Committee had given other reasons for the conclusions at which they had arrived Those were based upon the examination of documents before the House, but the principal reason for adopting the report was the uniformity of the evidence given before the Committee The Committee, however, proceeded to give certain reasons in favor of certain conclusions, stating that though in point of law it would be perfectly legal for the Legislature to impose the assessment which was proposed, that no exception could be taken to the assessment upon the ground of illegality, still that the leases did not express the meaning of the orders in Council or the meaning of Sir Henry Young when those orders were issued The Committee appeared to imply that there would be something like bad faith in exercising the power which the Legislature undoubtedly possessed of imposing this assessment He was at a loss to conclude by what train of reasoning the Committee had arrived at such a conclusion, but so far as he had been enabled to gather, their reasons appeared to be, in the first place, that Messrs Bonney and Macdonnell in the outline of a scheme did not recommend an assessment upon the squatters in addition to the rent Another reason was that Sir Henry Young spoke of rent in lieu of assessment, and there was another passage in the despatches of Sir Henry Young in which he made use of the term "for local purposes" For these three reasons the Committee appeared to have come to a conclusion that there was a bargain between the squatters and the Government that rent should be held to be payable as an equivalent for every charge to which lands and cattle could be subjected, except for local purposes, which the Committee interpreted as the improvement of the locality in which the runs were situated He thought he should be able to convince the House that the Committee could not have found more unsubstantial reasons In the first place the opinion of Messrs Bonney and Macdonnell was asked, to show what their opinion was but it was of no value to show what were the intentions of the Government The Government consisted of the Lieutenant-Governor and the Executive Council, and their recommendations had always been regarded by Her Majesty's advisers in England in preparing the Orders in Council Mr Bonney held highly radical, almost republican opinions but he had a peculiar tendency to the class to which he originally belonged, and his virtue had an appropriate reward in a contribution from the squatters upon his departure He did not intend to dispute that Mr Bonney did not intend to secure the squatters against any other payment than the rent, but Mr Bonney was not the Government, nor could anything which he said be considered to represent the opinions of the Government It would be a monstrous thing indeed if in a great public matter mere gossip should be held to fetter a Government He put out of the question altogether the private opinions of Messrs Bonney and Macdonnell, they were the private opinions of two Government officers, and could not be regarded in coming to a conclusion upon this Bill It was said that Sir Henry Young contemplated that the rent should be equal to the assessment named in No 10, 1848, and no doubt such was the case, but what was that assessment? Why, it was an assessment which the Legislature might have raised at any moment they pleased The assessment then was about equal to the rent which it was proposed to impose The rent was in substitution of a particular assessment to which stock was liable, but that assessment was capable of being raised at any time the necessities of the colony demanded Was there, then any pretence for saying that that which was taken as a substitution for what then existed was taken as a bar to anything else which might be imposed Because in a bargain between the squatters and the Government something was commuted, was that to be taken as a bar to anything else being imposed? Would any one contend that commuting an existing payment in favour of something else, substituting a fourteen years lease for an annual license, of which the squatters might have been deprived at the end of the year (for the squatters' right was at an end at the end of the year—he had no claim whatever for a renewal—he was simply not a tenant at will, but a yearly tenant, the Government having no necessity to give him six months' notice—could any one say that commuting this into a fourteen years' lease which was the real boon which the squatter obtained, was to be a bar to assessment? But to say in addition to this that the power of the Legislature, which they previously possessed to increase the assessment, was taken away, was something which appeared to him utterly unwarranted But then came the grand point upon which the Committee relied—the expression in the despatch of Sir Henry Young, "local purposes" It was singular that this should be relied upon by the Committee, as he should have thought it would have been clear to any mind beyond the possibility of cavil that local purposes were made use of in contradistinction to Imperial purposes He was surprised how a gentleman of the sagacity of the hon member for East Torrens, who was Chairman of the Committee, had failed to see this What would be meant by the Local Legislature but the Legislature of the province, and why should any other meaning be given to local purposes than as applied to the whole province in contradistinction to Imperial purposes? At that time there were no District Councils, and absolutely no existing organization to which the term local could be applied To say that local Legislature meant the Legislature of the province, but that local purposes meant something else than the general purposes of the province, would be to place an interpretation upon the term which no one who had not some purpose to subserve would place upon it The hon gentleman, having alluded to the evidence of the Hon J Baker proceeded to state the system adopted in the early history of the colony in the expenditure of the revenue. The Committee had, he considered, committed a grievous error in placing the construction which they had upon the despatch of Sir Henry Young, or in supposing that the language in which it was couched was intended to limit the power of the Parliament of South Australia It would, indeed, have been an assumption of authority on the part of Her Majesty to attempt to impose a restriction upon the representatives of the people as to the laws which they should pass for the purpose of deriving a revenue from this particular source The recitals showed that Her Majesty had no power given to her to limit the right of the Legislature The Legislature of the colony was as independent of the right of the Crown as the House of Commons He did not claim an equality in all respects with the House of Commons, as Her Majesty had the right of refusing her assent to Bills, but she had that in England He was quite sure that so to restrict the Legislature of the colony would have been an assumption of power on the part of Her Majesty which she would never have been advised to take, and he was quite sure that no such intention was included in the expressions to which he had referred Her Majesty never would have been advised to interfere with a Legislature to which an Act of Parliament had given sanction He felt assured of this, knowing how tenderly the Crown shrunk from anything which would bear the semblance of interfering with the rights of these Legislatures In the first place, then, if such power were assumed, it was perfectly unwarranted, but he said, also, he was perfectly certain there was no intention on the part of the Crown to assume any such power He approached one portion of the subject with some little hesitation It appeared that amongst the gentlemen examined was the Registrar-General, Mr, Torrens, and if that gentleman had reconsidered his evidence he was sure he would have seen he was inaccurate in some particulars, for Mr Torrens had assumed that he was Treasurer at the time the leases were being discussed, but in reality that gentleman did not hold that office till four or five months after the leases had been signed so that at the time of which Mr Torrens spoke it was impossible that he could as an officer of the Government have been called upon to offer any opinion upon the question It was true that any officer might give his opinion to the Governor or the Government upon a question of general policy, but what he wished to call the attention of the House to was that Mr Torrens being Collector of Customs at the time, and not being in the Legislature, it was not within the ordinary scope of his duty that he should have been consulted, or have offered any opinion upon the subject Under such circumstances he questioned whether Mr Torrens was the most suitable person to give evidence before the Committee The leases were prepared by the present Commissioner of the Insolvent Court, then Advocate-General, and the first thing which he (the Attorney-General) did when he accepted office, was to settle those leases At that time he never heard it suggested by any person or from any quarter, though frequently in communication with the Commissioner of Crown Lands, that the payment of rent was a bar to the imposition of a tax upon the squatters He had never heard it said that the covenant on the part of the lessee to pay taxes was more extensive than the power of the Legislature to impose them He wished to show to the House that, although the Committee might have obtained evidence from members of the Government at the time, whose duty it was to prepare the leases, and who were consequently enabled to express an opinion upon them, still no evidence of that kind was taken, but they had apparently in preference taken the evidence of a person whose official position gave him no peculiar knowledge upon the subject It was true that Mr Torrens might have conversed with Sir Henry Young, but Sir Henry Young was always guided by his Executive and the question, after all, was not what was the opinion of Sir Henry Young, but what were the intentions of the Government But it appeared that Mr Torrens had been called not merely to give evidence in reference to the liability of lessees, but he was asked as to the expediency or inexpediency of the proposed imposition He would allude to the scheme proposed by Mr Torrens as opposed to the Government proposition Mr Torrens proposed that instead of there being an assessment on stock there should be an assessment on the land itself, and that the amount raised should be expended in the construction of roads, bridges, and harbors, but if those were not general objects he was really at a loss to conceive what were general objects If they looked at the Orders in Council, and read them in that way, they would find they were excluded from taxing land as much as stock If the language of the Orders in Council were in reality to have the meaning which had been placed upon it by the Committee, it would be seen that the House was as powerless to place a tax upon land as upon stock It would be for the House to say whether they would adopt the conclusion that in making the Orders in Council Her Majesty had so tied the hands of the Legislature as to prevent them from imposing any tax till the leases had expired, except such tax were devoted to the particular improvement of the land from which it was levied Such a supposition was preposterous He would not refer to the evidence in reference to conversations which had taken place on the subject, but he would refer to the evidence of Mr John Ellis, who stated very truly that he saw the position in which the squatters would be placed when they accepted their leases, and protested against it, as he fully recognised the right of the Government to impose an assessment Mr Ellis took his lease with his eyes open, and every one else had the same means of knowledge Mr Bonney, he would remark, was not the authorised agent of the Government, but was a mere tool—he might say—an official (Laughter) Mr Bonney had no power beyond defining the boundaries and getting the parties to sign their leases He did not know that he had any necessity to go over other portions of the case He understood if he had read the evidence rightly, that the majority of those who gave evidence before the Committee admitted that the assessment which was proposed was moderate and reasonable Take for instance the evidence of Mr Taylor That gentleman admitted the assessment was not unreasonable, and considering the class to which he belonged, he was not likely to speak more favorably of it than it deserved, yet he was found recognising the assessment as reasonable In the case of Mr Torrens, also, he found there was no objection to the amount That gentleman pointed out the great inconvenience of the proposed assessment, but ended by saying that the theoretical inconveniences would have no practical effect He was satisfied to take it in that way Mr Torrens said that he believed £80,000 or £100 000 a year were lost by the squatters having their leases, but as the Government only proposed to raise a fourth or fifth of that amount, that surely could not be deemed unreasonable He thought he had sufficiently shewn that the House should not be restrained by any legal or moral consideration from imposing the tax, at all events, if he had not done so, or if there were doubts upon those points on the minds of any hon members, he felt assured he should be enabled to remove them in reply He understood partly from what he had heard out doors, that the objection on the part of the squatters was not so much to the nature or extent of the proposed tax, that they did not consider it oppressive or unfair, but they regarded it as it were as the thin end of the wedge They thought that if they conceded that the Legislature had a right to assess them, there would be no end to it In this respect he sympathized with them, and although he believed that the squatters did not contribute a proper amount to the revenue that they were most lightly taxed, and that they gave little in return for what they received and though he supported the present Bill with the view of equalising the taxation, still at the same time he admitted that he should shrink from anything like the exercise of unrestrained power of taxation It was desirable to conciliate the rights of the public with the claims of the squatter He was not an enemy to the squatters on the contrary, he believed that in introducing this Bill he had shown himself the best friend of the squatters, but he was prepared to assent to an amendment of this nature —The squatters said that if they were sure what was proposed by this Bill was all that they would be called upon to pay during the currency of their leases, they would have no objection, and he would say, let that compact be entered into Let the squatters give up their existing leases, and let the Governor grant them leases for the remainder of their term subject to rent and the assessment proposed by this Bill, in substitution for all charges, except those for a strictly local purpose, during the currency of such leases Let that be a compact binding upon both parties, and to that extent he was prepared to assent to an amendment But if that offer were refused, and the squatters succeeded in throwing out the present measure, then he felt bound to say, as the representative of a most important constituency, and as a Minister of the Crown representing the whole constituency, that the Government would use all the power the law gave it, for securing all the benefits it could for the public, even at the expense of the squatters He would ask hon members to read the evidence of Mr John Ellis, as to the nature of the squatters' tenure He would ask them to look to the power which the Government had to put an end to that tenure, in strict conformity with the letter and spirit of the Orders in Council He would ask the squatters or their representatives in that House, if it would be wise to drive the Government to use the power which the Government unquestionably possessed, to protect the interests of the public against what he believed to be an unwise resistance on the part of the squatters If they rejected this small demand, assuredly, at no distant period, an accumulated demand would be made upon them The people looked upon the squatters as a class possessing large public properties for which they made little or no return, that they bore but a small portion of the public burden, and would they be satisfied when as sooner or later they would be called upon to return representatives, unless those representatives were pledged upon this one point, and would they then be satisfied with the moderate demand which was now made? Resistance to moderate demands always ended in ruin to those who resisted them Need he allude to the English Reform Bill or to the French Revolution, or numerous other instances If the squatters would take lessons from these events, they would see that they would be acting wisely in agreeing to the present proposition It was, however, for them to decide, but, as a member of the Government, he would say that what was now asked was the least which the people were entitled to, and so long as he held office, he should do his best to secure it

Mr STRANGWAYS believed that hon members had pretty well made up their minds upon this subject, but as a member of the House he was desirous of commenting upon the report of the Committee before the motion was put for its adoption, and in taking this course he believed he was following the one which many hon members were desirous of taking In the first place he wished to make a few remarks as to the course pursued by the Government This Bill belonged either to the department of the Treasurer or of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and yet it was not introduced by either of these hon gentlemen They preferred relying upon the able advocacy of the hon the Attorney-General—and he (Mr Strangways) knew that that hon member was an able advocate—instead of relying upon the justice of their cause (Laughter) The hon the Attorney-General said he was not aware that there was anything unjust in the principle of the Bill Hon members were sometimes told that the meaning of an Act of Parliament was a mere matter of opinion, and so perhaps the Attorney-General could not see any injustice in the measure, for he would do the hon member the justice of believing that if he thought the Bill an unjust one he would not have introduced it (Hear, hear) But it was well known who the prime mover of this Bill—the mainspring of this movement—was, and it was also well known that the majority of the Ministry did not from their hearts approve of the measure, though the truth of this remained to be proved hereafter The hon the Attorney-General, in commenting upon the proceedings of the Select Committee, had alluded slightly, though only slightly, to the composition of that Committee But he (Mr Strangways) would state that when a list of the Committee was prepared and shown to the Ministry, that list was approved by them The Ministry, therefore, had no right to complain, for they were privy to the arrangement of the Committee, and its constitution was approved by them The hon the Attorney-General also complained of the manner of taking evidence (Hear, hear) He complained that all the witnesses called to give evidence were squatters But who were more competent to give evidence than squatters? (Hear, hear, and laughter) Of course the squatters knew more about squatting than any other persons At the first meeting of the Committee the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker) was asked whom he was desirous of calling as witnesses The next person to whom this question was put was the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands That hon member said he did not want to call any witnesses, that he would rely upon his cross examination, and a pretty cross examination it was, for by it there was more elicited against the Ministry and the Bill than in their favor. The list of witnesses handed in by the hon member for Victoria included the name of the hon the Chief Secretary That certainly did not look as if the hon member for Victoria was desirous that any unfair or one-sided view should be taken of the matter He believed the Committee had taken a fair view (Oh, oh) Hon members might cry 'Oh,' but the result of a division would show the opinion of the House. Although exception might be taken to the report, it was, individually and collectively, the report of the Committee Hon members would see how far it was borne out by the evidence, and for his (Mr Strangways') part, he believed it was fully borne out There were one or two members of the Committee who did not want to hear any evidence on the subject, and these hon members were, of course, in the same position which they were in before These hon members had stated to the House that they were fully informed already on all matters connected with the Bill He hoped the House would remember that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who held a place as a member of the Committee, called not a single witness on behalf of the Bill. He (Mr. Strangways) did not regard the Bill as either just or politic, or one which should on any ground be permitted to pass. The hon. the Attorney-General had made a great point of the construction of the leases, but he had treated the question purely as a matter of law; whereas it was not a matter of law, but of justice and policy. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.") The hon. member had stated that if the House rejected the Bill, it would be an admission that the Orders in Council had effect, and if the Orders in Council had any effect, he attributed it to a usurpation of authority on the part of the Crown. As to the law, there could be no doubt that the House had a strictly legal right to pass the Bill, but the question was one of justice and good faith towards the squatters. Upon this point the hon. the Attorney-General had said very little. The hon. member seemed to think "the least said the soonest mended," but he had gone at great length into the law of the case, with the view, no doubt, of inducing hon. members to adopt a similar course. The hon. member (the Attorney-General) had alluded, amongst other things, to the "peculiar tendencies" of Mr. Bonney. That gentleman might have had such tendencies or not, but he was a man who had always done his duty in the colony, and who deserved a testimonial, not only from the squatters, but from all other classes in the colony. If the hon. the Attorney-General had chosen to go more fully into the justice and policy of the matter, he might have gone into the evidence of Mr. Taylor, but he had only alluded to that gentleman as one of the witnesses who had been called. He (Mr. Strangways) did not expect that the hon. member would have gone into the evidence of Mr. Taylor, seeing that it would prove that the statements of the hon. the Treasurer to the House were not warranted by the facts of the case. Mr. Taylor's evidence went to prove that the contributions to the revenue by the agricultural, mining, and pastoral interests were not nearly so disproportionate as was generally supposed, and that as concerned the agricultural and pastoral interests they were about equal. Another thing to be taken into consideration was that every 1,000*l.* worth of wool raised was a clear gain to the country. Hon. members should on this account regard the pastoral as different from the mining interest. They should bear in mind that in exporting wool nothing was sent out of the country but what was produced in it; but when ore was sent out of the country, the mineral resources of the colony were reduced to precisely the value of the ore exported. (Laughter.) Hon. members might laugh, but it had been found in old countries that mines were worked out, and he believed the same thing had occurred in some instances in this colony. (No, no.) On the other hand the increase of wealth to the country from squatting was clear gain. The squatter not only raised produce, but at the same time he improved the land. His flocks manured it and propagated grasses. The result was that there were many miles of country which a few years since were not thought fit to be occupied even by squatters now in the hands of the agriculturist and converted into good farms. The Hon. the Attorney-General had stated that his Honor the Commissioner of Insolvency, when he occupied the post of Advocate-General had prepared the leases, and that he as Attorney-General had settled them, and the Government inserted this covenant between the Government and the squatters. He (Mr. Strangways) could not see that that statement contradicted the evidence of Mr. Torrens, which was to the effect that there was an understanding between the squatters and the Government that the rent imposed should be in lieu of an assessment. If the House believed that to be the case, they could not, on any ground of justice, hesitate about throwing out the Bill. As to the policy of the measure, if it would tend, as many of the witnesses believed, to prevent the occupation of distant runs, and thereby retard the progress of the pastoral interest, there could be no doubt that it would be highly disadvantageous, as nothing could be more opposed to the progress of the colony in general. He (Mr. Strangways) believed it would be better that the squatters should have the land rent free than that it should remain unoccupied. He did not mean to say they should have the land rent free, but that even that would be preferable to its remaining unoccupied. The hon. the Attorney-General had spoken of the assessment as moderate in amount and observed that various witnesses had admitted it to be so. But the hon. gentleman also spoke of it as the thin end of the wedge, and suggested that a compact should be entered into with the squatters. But what was the value of a compact? (Hear, hear.) The Committee and the squatters said there was a compact already. (Hear, hear, and no, no.) He (Mr. Strangways) believed there was the evidence of Mr. Torrens before the Committee to shew there was a compact; and if a bargain in the one case was to be violated, could it not be in another? He (Mr. Strangways) believed it would. But the hon. the Attorney-General was not content that the squatters should give up their leases, and enter into a compact which might be broken. The hon. member also threatened the squatters that if they opposed the Bill, he (the Attorney-General), as the representative of a large constituency, and also as a member of the Government, would feel it his duty to exercise all his power to pass a measure which would place the squatters in a still worse position. The hon. member should bear in mind the majority which he (Mr. Strangways) was certain would throw out the Bill, could prevent the hon. member from attaining his object. He (Mr. Strangways) did not believe the hon. member would attempt to do anything of the kind. He believed that nothing would please him (the Attorney-General) more than to see the Bill thrown out. (Laughter.) He believed the entire Ministry were against the Bill and that nothing would please them better than to see it thrown out. He quite agreed with Judge Haliburton, and would not, therefore, attempt to drive the Government, but would use "soft solder." That was far the best way, though neither the squatters nor any other class had tried it. What the squatters said was, "You have enquired into our case now give us the justice we are entitled to." (Hear, hear.) He was sure that justice would be such as the hon. the Attorney-General would be very glad that the squatters should receive. The hon. the Attorney-General said that the squatters made no adequate compensation for the privileges they enjoyed, but hon. members would see, from the evidence of Mr. Taylor, that they did. The average of exports per head for the three producing interests were—pastoral 50*l.*, mining 15*l.* 7s., agricultural 48*l.* 10s. It also appeared in the evidence that a large number of persons set down in the census returns as engaged in agriculture were engaged in squatting. Hon. members would also see that there was a vast disproportion between the estimate of labor employed by the squatting interest framed by the hon. the Treasurer, and that in Mr. Taylor's evidence of what that gentleman and others believed to be the correct number. At the end of the report there was a return given in by Mr. W. L. Beare, a person in the employment of the hon. member Mr. Hawker, the number of persons engaged on that gentleman's station was 139 for 27,463 sheep. That was a much larger number than was stated by the hon. the Treasurer to be employed by the squatters. He trusted the House in this case would look into the matter for themselves, and that hon. members would bear in mind that the hon. the Attorney-General had most carefully avoided touching upon the justice or policy of the Bill, and confined himself merely to the question of law. No one could deny that the House had the power to pass the Bill; but as to the justice of doing so let hon. members look at the evidence of Mr. Torrens and of Mr. Bonney, that the rent on the runs was in full satisfaction of all claims and in lieu of the assessment, notwithstanding the clause in the lease. He contended after this that the Government was not justified in asking, nor would the House be in granting an assessment on stock. If the House passed the Bill, whenever any pressure or financial difficulty arose, the Treasurer for the time would come down to the House and ask for an additional assessment, perhaps of 9d. per head, as they had in Melbourne; and the House would be quite as much justified in putting such an assessment on as imposing one in the first instance. Hon. members should remember that the runs which were most valuable and profitable had only five or six years of their leases to run; and was it worth while for these few years to adopt a line of conduct which might be construed—and he (Mr. Strangways) had no doubt would be—into a repudiation of existing engagements. (No, no.) Of course, if hon. members believed that there were no engagements, there was nothing to repudiate, but that was his opinion. The hon. the Attorney-General had alluded to great popular movements—to the French revolution and others—but what had the squatters to do with the French revolution? (Laughter.) It was true that a great popular movement, if it were against them, might affect the squatters; but he (Mr. Strangways) believed that if a general election were to take place shortly, no person, or at least very few, would be returned who were opposed to the squatters. (Oh, oh.) He believed if the question was put fully and fairly before the districts, that not one of them would return a man who would repudiate existing engagements. (Oh, oh.) He (Mr. Strangways) had a better opinion of the constituencies than those hon. gentlemen who cried "oh, oh." Hon. members were evidently impressed with the idea that the constituencies would return men who would cut covenants. (Oh, oh.) If hon. members consulted their constituencies on the question, they would find themselves considerably mistaken. He had now referred to the principal matters alluded to by the hon. the Attorney-General, who had spoken only on the question of law; but he (Mr. Strangways) hoped the House would consider the questions of justice and policy also. He trusted no half-way course would be adopted; but that hon. members would say "yes" or "no," that they would either pass the Bill or reject it; and he was confident the majority would reject it.

Mr. NEALES said the last speaker had objected that the best advocates had been put forward to speak in favor of the Bill; but if the worst had been wanted to speak against it, it would have been the hon. member who had just sat down. They had heard such a rigmarole about law and justice, that if the House was pestered with much more, they would not know which was law and which was justice. The hon. the Attorney-General had addressed himself to the justice, and not to the law of the question. There could be no doubt about the law, taking it from the very lease signed by the squatters themselves. But as he had already said, there was no necessity for going into Committee in order to obtain information on this subject, which persons who had been in the colony for some years had at their fingers ends. There was not a fact elicited in the evidence before the Committee which was not known before. He did not mean that persons who had been here but a short time could without some extra industry learn that which all old hands were acquainted with The House was legislating for the whole community, and not for the squatters, and this Bill would be justice to all others besides the squatters In England, when the people were determined to have a cheap loaf, the landlords were more powerful than the squatters here, and yet the people obtained their cheap loaf, and in like manner the people here would have an equalization of taxation When all classes came to an equalization in this respect, it would be time to think of new taxes It appeared to him that one great difficulty with the squatters was, that at the expiration of their leases the leases were to be put up to auction He (Mr Neales) considered that a miserable system, as a good tenant ought to be valued in again (Hear, hear) He had it on the word of some of the largest squatters that this was what they most complained of So long as they held leases with the tenor of what was to come in three or four years, they would oppose an assessment, but if this system was altered, the whole of the twopenny difficulty would be overcome (Hear, hear) They would not then ask for the splendid bargain which the hon the Attorney-General was prepared to give them, of a compact Not but that he (Mr Neales) as a moderate man was prepared to acquiesce in such a bargain He believed he could poll three squatters to one in favor of that arrangement The last three years of the leases would be of little value in consequence of the risk of being turned out at the end of that time He believed it a division were taken that day it might result in the defeat of the Bill by one or two votes, but if the House only allowed the Bill to stand over for a few days it would be carried It would be carried if they only waited until hon members favorable to the squatters should receive further instructions He was not in the habit of making long speeches, and as he understood that every hon member of the House was going to speak on this question—(laughter)—he would only make the one remark he had made respecting the auction system If this were abolished the opposition to a sheep tax and cattle tax would fall of itself, and hon gentlemen would be left in the extraordinary position of finding that they were demanding what their clients did not want

Mr Hay said that a good deal had been said by the hon member for Encounter Bay, about cutting covenants, but having looked through what took place when the leases now held by the squatters were granted, and having paid attention to the evidence given before the Committee, he had come to the conclusion that if hon members threw the Bill out and so acknowledged that they had no right to levy an assessment on stock they would do an injustice to the country In coming to this conclusion he had been led, to some extent, by a paper No 176, laid before the House last session When a person was about to take a lease from, or enter into an engagement with a private individual, he generally took care to see what covenants were in the lease or agreement If the squatters came to the House and said that although an absolute power was retained in the lease to levy an assessment, their attention or that of the public had not been drawn to the matter, their statement would be worthy of notice But Captain Bagot, at the time of issuing the leases, particularly drew attention to the clause in a letter dated January 26, 1849 That gentleman mentioned the clause, and objected that the rent went into the Land Fund, whilst the Assessment went into the general revenue He (Captain Bagot) distinctly stated that the rent was part of the Imperial, and the assessment, of the local revenue Messrs Bagot, Jacob, Hagen, Bonney, and Macdonald knew of this clause Had it been a matter which had been passed over and no attention drawn to it, these gentlemen might make out a case But the squatters themselves drew attention to it, and yet it was retained in the Orders in Council and in the leases The Legislature and the country must therefore have had some good reasons for retaining it Every hon member could remember how it was proposed to impose a reserve upon minerals, and that such an agitation was set up that the plan could not be carried into effect The same attention was drawn to that point as to this clause in the leases Had the public felt the injustice done in the one case as they did in the other, no such clause would have been left in the leases But in the first case all above and below the soil was given to the purchaser, and in the other it was thought better to alter the assessment to a rent He believed that a great injustice would be done if the runs were alienated for 14 years, at a rental of 10s a square mile Whatever leases were granted, must be in accordance with the Orders in Council [The hon member here quoted the passage, reserving the rights of the Colonial Legislature] When he found in the leases a provision introduced in accordance with the Orders in Council conferring upon the Local Legislature the power to place an assessment upon a run, or upon the cattle depasturing thereon, it showed him distinctly what was the intention of the Legislature of that day How any hon member could argue about cutting up covenants when it was set forth in every paper on the subject that there was a reservation to be made in the leases and signed by the very parties taking them, he (Mr Hay) could not understand He would take the witnesses examined before the Committee on the Assessment on Stock, and he would ask hon members to say from what they knew of these gentlemen whether if they were about to enter into a compact with any hon member to lease a portion of land, they would be likely to allow any objectionable clause to remain in the agreement if they could strike it out (Hear, hear) When the proposal was made to alter the assessment into a rent, every attention was given by Mr Baker and other gentlemen to get the best terms possible, and if they had the power they would have excluded this clause from the lease He was greatly surprised at one thing, and that was the addendum made to the report by the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) Knowing that hon member's character, and how attentive he was in matters of business, to think that he could have put Mr Bonney's name forward as a party to this arrangement between the Government and the squatters—to see that the part taken by Mr Bonney should have the least weight with the hon gentleman, really surprised him (Laughter from Mr Glyde) He had too high an opinion of that hon member's ability to think that if he were taking a lease, and were to enter into conversation with some clerk, who should tell him that a clause was something not intended to be acted upon, that he would be satisfied with such a statement He gave the hon member credit for greater judgment and discrimination though he thought the hon member had not shown great wisdom in signing this small document (Laughter from Mr Barrow) He believed with the hon member (Mr Neales), that it would be better if an arrangement could be made with the squatters to collect the whole amount as rent It would be better for the House to say when the first seven years of the lease had determined, "now you are in our power to assess you for whatever amount we think proper, but the clause will not be acted on if you pay an additional rent" He thought the Crown Lands should be let for the first seven years at a very low rent, and that for the second seven there should be a valuation or some understanding as to what the rent should be It was scarcely proper that a party paying rent should be liable to an increase or decrease from year to year A rent of 10s a square mile was a wholly inadequate payment, and was nothing compared to the advantages which the squatters were deriving from their leases of the Crown Lands, which the public knew well were worth £20 to £40, instead of 10s It was therefore only fair to expect the squatters to pay something more It would be better for the squatters to say "Let us come to a full and distinct understanding, and hold our runs for the next seven years, unless the land is wanted for proclamation into hundreds, or for purchase or settlement If such an arrangement was not made the present would be a fair law The squatters had no right to complain They had had their runs for seven years at 10s the square mile, although when it was proposed to issue the leases it was intended to charge 10s , 15s , and 20s , but by the influence of the Government, the whole of the leases were granted at 10s , though when the Government issued the leases at 10s they should have retained the power to raise them to 20s As to the construction to be put on the word "local," he would only refer to the letter of Captain Bagot, who was then a member of the Legislature What did that gentleman understand the word to mean ? In Council Paper 176, he (Captain Bagot) distinctly stated what interpretation he put upon the word He spoke of part of the "local" revenue in contradistinction to the Land Fund, which went into the Imperial revenue When he considered the low rate at which the lands were now held, he saw no reason why the House should not pass the Bill There would be no covenant broken Whilst he hoped to see the second reading passed, he hoped also that some attempt would be made to bring the matter to a more satisfactory issue

Mr Solomon said that when on a former occasion the question of an assessment on stock was discussed, he had been fully satisfied in his own mind of the justice of it, and he thought at the same time that the Legislature deserved the best thanks of the squatters for suggesting such a low assessment Although he had anticipated that the evidence taken on the Select Committee appointed in this case might have altered his opinions, yet the contrary had been the result, and there had not been one single answer given in the whole of that evidence, or one solitary fact elicited which had had the slightest effect in changing his views On referring to the form of the lease, which was no doubt known to all hon members, it would be seen that so far from an injustice being attempted upon the squatter, that there was a covenant in their leases which provided for an assessment With the hon member for Encounter Bay he fully agreed in saying that no covenant should be broken, he (Mr Solomon) trusted no attempt would be made to cut covenants, for if there were he should be the first to object to it But this assessment he did not consider to be any breach of faith but on the contrary, that the squatters had been let off too long without paying their fair share to the public revenue, and that they had been occupying land at one-third of what they were entitled to pay for it Of course it was natural that those gentlemen should object to this , but it was also natural on the part of the Government and the country at large, that they, the squatters, should pay a fair and equitable sum in aid of the revenue of the State When the question of an assessment was first introduced it was said to be unjust, and he (Mr Solomon) had formed an impression that it was so, but that impression had been completely dissipated by his having subsequently perused the Orders in Council But when the opponents of this assessment found that all else failed, the wind shifted, and they turned their argument upon the word "local," which they said was intended to apply to District Councils or Corporations, but that it had not a more extended meaning. If this argument had been tenable they would have had one ground of complaint. But they had not proved their assertion that the assessment was only to be levied for strictly local purposes, or that the word "local," as used in that sense, had any other meaning than to distinguish the amount from the Land Fund. At first the rents from the runs merged into the Land Fund, but the Orders in Council afterwards separated these two sources of revenue, and made the contemplated assessment apply to local though not district purposes. He congratulated the Government upon the stand they had made on this measure, and if as it had been intimated, the question were remitted to the country by the Ministry, no doubt it would be a battle-ground worthy of their ambition, and he believed no hon. member who voted against this Bill now, would be returned a second time by his constituency. (Oh!) As to the question of justice, it had been shewn that this assessment had been provided for in the leases. Now there were large quantities of land held in this colony for squatting purposes, and held to an advantage, in all some 24,500 square miles, which produced a revenue of 13,400*l.* at the average rate of 10s. 10d. per square mile. He would take Mr. Bonney's statement of the number of sheep that each square mile would feed, viz., from 100 to 200, and he (Mr. Solomon) would strike an average on those numbers and say 150. Now 150 sheep per square mile, taking the number of sheep estimated by the Inspector, Mr. Morris, as being outside the hundreds, would give 11,405 miles; and as the average payment per mile was 10s. 10*d.*, it would follow that the squatters paid seven-eighths of a penny for each head of sheep. Then, as to cattle, taking Mr. Bonney's estimate, that each square mile would feed 25 head, or in proportion to sheep one head to every six, it would make 190,400 head, which would amount to 7,601 miles, or 5d. per head for cattle. Then, as to horses, Mr. Baker's calculation was that two horses would eat as much as three bullocks, so that one mile would feed 16 head, or 7,010 head, equal to 438 miles, which, at the average of 10s. 10d. per square mile, would be fed at a cost of 8d. per head. These three items, viz., 11,405 miles for sheep, 7,601 miles for cattle, and 438 miles for horses, would give a total of 19,444 miles as against the stated quantity of 24,500, so that there was a deficiency of some 5,000 miles. Now, the rates paid as he had enumerated were for sheep ⅞-penny per head per annum; for cattle, 5d. per head; and for horses, 8d. per head. But he had to account for this 5,000 miles which was deficient, and to meet it he would assume that the quantity of stock was under estimated, and he would allow 20 per cent. for land not stocked, and they would have 5,000 miles or 20 per cent. of the whole, thus bringing stock up as follows:—sheep, a fraction over 1d. per head; cattle, 6d. per head; horses, 9½d. per head. Hon. members would be aware of the fact, that the squatters in Victoria paid 9½d. per head on their sheep, and if after that, and the figures he had given, any hon. member, or the squatters, could say that an injustice was being attempted by the proposed assessment, he (Mr. Solomon) would give in. With respect to the Select Committee which had been appointed, and which had presented its report, he would remark that he never saw the utility of it, and his opinion had been borne out by the result. He must congratulate the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Barrow) on the tact which he had displayed whilst sitting on that Committee, in eliciting such answers from the witnesses as entirely supported the position of the squatters, and he thought on that account he might well aspire to the seat which the Attorney-General held, because in eliciting that evidence, he appeared to be not even second to the learned and hon. gentleman he had referred to. There was one portion of the evidence which he (Mr. Solomon) could not disregard, and that was the evidence of Mr. Jacob, from which it would appear that the squatters, instead of being a rich class of men, were entirely in a different position, and deserved a public subscription to be got up for their relief. Were this evidence correct, indeed, he should not be surprised to see the squatters passing along the highways, like the "poor frozen gardeners," saying, "pity and assist the poor sewn-up squatters." (A laugh.) But what was the truth? The squatters did not, nor ever had, contributed a fair share to the revenue, and he thought the House would not be deviating from the strict rule of common honesty in imposing an assessment. At the same time, he agreed with the hon. the Attorney General that in imposing this assessment something should be done to give the squatters a fixity of tenure.

Mr. BURFORD thought there was another thing to be shown besides that referred to by the last speaker—that was, whether the operation of this proposed tax would be of an equitable nature to the squatters. The Attorney-General had said if they adopted the language or views of the Select Committee they would have to vote against the Bill; but although he (Mr. Burford) did not adopt their views, yet he should protest against the Bill. With respect to what had been said by the Attorney-General, he thought its tendency was to drive hon. members off the proper scent. (Laughter.) The great question had been blinked, and that was the operation of that assessment upon the squatters as a class. He (Mr. Burford) knew that if he were to apply the principle on which the Government had acted in this case—and they must remember that he was no advocate of the squatters—he should be almost hooted by every member of the House. (Laughter.) Suppose he had advocated a tax upon copper, or an impost upon capitalists or dealers in money, or any other class of industry, what would be thought of it? And yet that would really be the operation of the Bill before the House. It was a system of class legislation of the most abominable character. (Oh, and laughter.) He (Mr. Burford) maintained that if he were to apply the same principle to any other branch of industry, if he were not scouted he would certainly not be listened to. If the House passed this Bill the Government would be bound to lay an impost upon all other branches of industry—(Oh, and laughter),—and if they wanted revenue there was plenty of scope before them. Mr. Neales had said—and he admired his child-like innocence in saying so—that the effect of the Bill was an equalization of taxation; but how could that possibly be? What was the object of putting a value on land unless to fix some rule of value; therefore the 10s. per square mile was a quid pro quo from the squatters, and the 1*l.* per acre was the same from the agriculturists. He (Mr. Burford) gave the Government credit for having done the thing right when they fixed the rate at 10s. per square mile, and if so why attempt to impose an assessment now? And again a compact was suggested. Well, suppose a compact were entered into, it might be remarked that if one compact were not binding, another would not be; and then if a compact was entered into to put away this difficulty, and the Government pursued a consistent course with every other difficulty, then they would have scores of compacts. (Laughter.) He maintained that it tended fast to this conclusion, and while going on in this piecemeal way, they would eventually get into such a position that they would have some difficulty in getting out of it. He objected to this Bill on broad grounds. Allusion had been made to a probable appeal to the country, and with him it would be simply a matter of expense, and it would be doubtless of no moment, except to those who were not honest in their views, and who wished to strengthen their position by a compact or a compromise. (Laughter.) Let the appeal come, and notwithstanding such a threatened infliction he hoped hon. members would not allow themselves to be hoodwinked.

Mr. HART thought the opposition to this assessment was not only an unwise one, but it was also unwise in those who opposed it. He thought with the Attorney-General that if the squatters succeeded in staving off this assessment now they would be subject to a more serious tax at some future time. He (Mr. Hart) had visited Melbourne lately, and he had been told that the squatters in Victoria had made a great mistake at first in endeavoring to get rid of a reasonable demand and had brought down upon themselves an enormous rate of assessment. He wondered that in this colony the squatters did not take a lesson from this, and especially so as their runs were more valuable, from the good faith which had been kept with them. In the evidence taken before the Select Committee it would be seen that every squatter examined had said the assessment was unjust. For his (Mr. Hart's) part, he did not require the appointment of a Select Committee, as he was fully informed without it; but he thought it might have the effect of satisfying the minds of others, not so competent as himself, from various causes, to come to a decision, and he therefore voted for it. The evidence, however, taken upon that Committee had been of the most meagre character, and entirely calculated to favor the squatter. But he (Mr. Hart) would have been able to call evidence to say that the assessment, as well as being just, was originally contemplated. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for Gumeracha that as when the leases were first granted the amounts realized were paid into the credit of the Land Fund, and belonged to the Imperial Government, it was quite clear that if the assessment was to be for local purposes that both the rent and the assessment were contemplated at the same time. Unless contemplated, why mentioned? The very fact of the assessment being called for local purposes showed that it was contemplated to impose the assessment besides the rent. It was a singular fact that every squatter who was examined on the Committee, with the exception of one, had stated that he had not read his lease, and professed to be unacquainted with its tenor. What value was such evidence as that. It was quite clear to him that the verbal understanding with the then Commissioner of Crown Lands could have no weight with what appeared in the lease itself. It was strange, too, that those who could not recollect the terms in which their leases were drawn out could yet recollect a verbal understanding upon which they based their charge of injustice, although they threw such discredit upon the compact. But all the covenants in the leases were against this alleged understanding. He (Mr. Hart) must, however, confess his dissatisfaction at the way in which this Select Committee had been managed. He felt, with other supporters of the Government, whose private sympathies in point of friendship were with those whom they opposed, that they had not been well treated. No sooner had the Chairman announced to the House the names of the members of the Select Committee, than he became convinced that their decision must be against the assessment. Who composed that Committee? Why there were three persons on it who were avowed squatters. Then another member of it was the editor and manager of a newspaper started in the pastoral interest, and who had moved for the appointment of that Committee

Mr Barrow said he did not move for the appointment of the Committee

Mr Hart said he found he was wrong Mr Hawker had suggested the Committee be believed ("No, no, Mr Hallett," from an hon member) However, that was not the question The hon member for East Torrens was on that Committee, there were the gentlemen he had referred to as being in the squatting interest, and out of the seven members which composed it there was another member who, though not actually opposed to the Bill, was more against it than otherwise He felt that the supporters of the Bill were sold when he heard the names of the Committee, and the context had shewn that he was right Of those persons called to give evidence there was not one single person called in support of the Bill, in fact, he believed that the result intended to be brought about was that the Bill should not pass What appeared more extraordinary to him still was that they summoned a public officer who was at the time the leases were granted Collector of Customs He could understand such a gentleman being called in connection with anything pertaining to the tariff, but he really could not understand his being called on this Committee But how much more strange was it that those gentlemen who composed the Executive at the time the leases were granted were not called Why did not the Commissioner of Crown Lands call upon the members of that Executive to give evidence? Why had not Mr Hughes, who was thoroughly familiar with the pastoral interest, been called? That gentleman had declared the assessment to be a just and proper imposition But Mr John Baker had been called and examined, and he was known to be unfavorable to the assessment He (Mr Hart) had been told that it was suggested to the Ministry that Mr Hughes and the Chief Secretary should be called, who could have given good evidence on the question He was sorry to be compelled to make these remarks, but he believed the supporters of this measure had not had justice done to them, and that the measure had not been supported in the proper quarter He feared that many hon members who were wavering before would now take the side against the Bill—(no, no)—because the evidence was altogether in favor of the report, from no other evidence having been called (Hear) There was a one-sidedness about it which was not at all satisfactory, and he believed, from the way in which the thing had been managed altogether, that the Government would lose several votes which they formerly might have calculated upon

Mr Bagot said when the subject of an assessment was introduced he was against the assessment on the principle that when a person took a lease he should be bound by the terms of it But when he read the form of the leases and found that the assessment was contemplated he changed his mind If the assessment were not contemplated why should the clause be placed there? With regard to the policy of the assessment he thought every member who voted for this Bill should be satisfied of the justice of it, as well as that the squatter did not pay a fair share to the revenue For his part he could not see how it could be argued that those gentlemen who paid 10s per square mile paid taxes in the same proportion as those who purchased land at 1*l* per acre At the same time he would say that he did not record his vote for the Bill with the same pleasure as if the Government had called more explicit evidence It appeared to him that when a Select Committee was appointed, it was the duty of the Government to see that a proper selection of witnesses were called, and when he found that the Commissioner of Crown Lands had not brought forward a single agriculturist, merchant, shipmaster or any other person who would be competent to give an opinion, he had felt extremely dissatisfied It might have been an oversight, but he must, nevertheless, express his dissent to the course adopted by the Government He could not, however, record his vote against the Bill He hoped the opposition to it would be withdrawn when the justice and policy of it were considered

Mr Peake moved the adjournment of the debate, which was carried

THISTLE RETURNS

The Commissioner of Crown Lands laid upon the table the above returns, which had been previously called for

SURVEY OF NORTH-WEST COAST

Particulars of the survey of the North-west Coast were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT

An extension of time was given to Tuesday next to bring up the report of the Select Committee sitting on the above.

PETITION OF Y B HUTCHINSON

Ordered on the motion of Mr Lindsay to be printed

The House then adjourned till 1 o'clock on Tuesday

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Tuesday, November 23.

The President took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Samuel Davenport, the Hon Captain Scott

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

The President announced the receipt of Message No 22 from the House of Assembly, intimating that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment Bill Also, Message No 23, intimating that the Assembly had passed the Civil Service Bill, and desired the concurrence of the Legislative Council therein Also Message No 24, intimating that the Assembly had agreed to the Date of Acts Bill, with amendments, and desired the concurrence of the Legislative Council

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The Hon the Chief Secretary moved that the Civil Service Bill be read a first time

The Hon A Forster wished before the motion was put to state that he would not oppose the first reading but he hoped sufficient time would be given for the consideration of the Bill before the second reading was moved

The Bill was read a first time, and the Hon the Chief Secretary stated that he had intended to move the second reading be an Order of the Day for Thursday next, as the Estimates in some measure depended upon this Bill, inasmuch as if it did not pass the Council the good service-pay might be struck out As it appeared to be the wish of the House that the second reading should be delayed for a longer period than he had intended, he would move that the second reading be an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday Carried

The President informed the Council that pursuant to resolution he had presented address No 5 to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that His Excellency would lay upon the table of the Council copy of a despatch received from the Secretary of State in reference to the Insolvent Act and suggesting alterations therein Also, the opinion of the hon the Attorney-General upon the amendments suggested in that despatch

LUNATICS

The Hon Dr Davies gave notice, that on 30th November, he should move that it be an instruction to the Executive that when parties were committed as lunatics to any of the gaols of the colony, they should be transmitted to the Adelaide Lunatic Asylum so soon as they had been ascertained to be lunatics, and that it be a recommendation to His Excellency, that visitors should be appointed to all places which were used as temporary Lunatic Asylums

THE RIVER WEIR

The Hon Dr Davies gave notice that on 20th November, he should move that the Hon the Chief Secretary report for the information of the Legislative Council the opinion of the Hon the Attorney-General, as to whether any legal proceedings could be taken against the late Engineer of the Adelaide Water Works, for the unscientific manner in which that work had been constructed If so, whether the proceedings would be of a civil or criminal character, and if not, whether the Government would pass a moral censure by advertising the late Engineer in the Government Gazette, as unworthy of employment, and whether it was intended to dismiss him from any office under Government to which he might have been appointed

THE SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

The Hon Captain Hall brought up the report of the Select Committee upon the Smillie Estate Bill The report was read by the Clerk of the House, and stated that the Committee found the preamble proved, but suggested the introduction of a clause rendering it imperative that the trustees should invest the proceeds of future sales either in the British funds or in South Australian Government Securities Upon the motion of the Hon Captain Hall, the report with the evidence were ordered to be printed

Upon the motion of the Hon the Chief Secretary, the Council adjourned at half-past 2 o'clock, till 2 o clock on Tuesday next

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Tuesday, November 23

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter past 1 o'clock

PORT GAWLER

Mr Peake presented a petition from certain landowners and occupiers of land residing at Port Gawler, praying that the Government main line of road in that district be defined The hon member moved that the petition be received

The Clerk accordingly commenced reading it, but before he reached the termination an informality was discovered, and the petition was accordingly rejected

THE ESTIMATES

The Treasurer said, as there was a great deal of business upon the paper, hon members might not feel disposed to proceed with the Estimates He therefore moved that they be postponed to Thursday

The motion was agreed to

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

On the Order of the Day for the third reading of this Bill being read,

Mr Reynolds suggested that the order should be postponed to another day, and hoped the hon the Treasurer would comply with the suggestion There were many hon members who would wish to discuss the question as to whether the Bill should pass, and these hon gentlemen would, no doubt, have been present, but that they supposed the debate on the Assessment on Stock would have been proceeded with He (Mr Reynolds) understood that there were great doubts entertained as to the value of such a Bill It was well understood that, during the last session, he had supported the Bill, because tas a member of the Government he was bound to do so, as the Bill was in accordance with the wish of the House as expressed through a Select Committee But as an individual member he should pursue a very different course, as he did not believe the Bill would be a benefit to the country, or the officers themselves, and he should therefore oppose it He could very well understand the hon member for the Port (Capt Hart) supporting the Bill, as he had taken an active part in bringing the question forward He believed the Government were bound to bring on the Bill, and as the hon gentleman had assisted in getting the Government into difficulties, he should also assist in getting them out again Still he thought that the present Bill, instead of getting the Government out of their difficulties, would get them deeper and deeper into them They might pass the Bill now, but another session would not pass before they would have to introduce another Bill to remedy the blunders of the present one

Mr Peake remarked that there was a very thin House, the reason of which probably was that it was believed the discussion of the day would take place on the assessment on stock He thought in such circumstances it would be unwise on the part of the Government to persist with the third reading He believed the calculations of the Bill were false and the conclusions equally false He believed it had been proved by unmistakeable calculation that the calculations of the Bill were incorrect He trusted the Government would waive the measure for that day at least Hon members should be thoroughly aware of what they were doing in the matter and not allow themselves to be led in a thin House to pass a Bill like this He did not wish to take any extreme action, but he would urge upon the Government to postpone the Bill

The Attorney-General said that on the second reading the principle of the Bill had been supported by more than a majority of the whole House ("Hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works) The Government had framed the Estimates in accordance with the Bill, and therefore it was important that the fate of the Bill should be settled either in one way or the other If the Bill was thrown out the Government would have to reframe the entire Estimates As more than a clear majority of the House had already expressed their approval of the Bill, there was no reason why it should be postponed

The question that the Bill be read a third time was then put, and the House divided with the following result —

Ayes, 12—The Attorney-General, Treasurer, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Duffield, Macdermott, Hay, Milne, Hallett, Harvey, Barrow, and Captain Hart

Noes, 10—Messrs Reynolds, Peake, Wark, Strangways, Mildred, Dunn, Young Cole, Burford, and Rogers

The motion was accordingly carried, and the Bill was read a third time and passed

DATE OF ACTS BILL

This Bill was also read a third a time and passed without opposition

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The House resolved itself into Committee upon this Bill, resuming its consideration at clause 25

Mr Hay moved the insertion of the words "within six hours," and also of the words, "if not claimed by the owner"

Mr Mildred said he had seen no notice in the papers in reference to clause 22 He wished to know whether the clause had passed

The Chairman replied in the affirmative.

Dr Wark believed that clause 25 was one of those which had worked well in the old Bill, and that there had never been any objection to it It had been agreed to by the House before, and its only fault was that it was a little too lenient

The amendments proposed by Mr Hay were then agreed to Mr Strangways moved the insertion of the words, "in the Government Gazette, or"

The Attorney-General did not think the amendment would be a proper one The notices were not in reference to private but to a public matter, and, therefore the Government Gazette would not be the proper place for their publication It was true that the colony might at some time have but one newspaper, but when it came to that condition the people would be so few in number that the owner of any stray cattle would be easily found (Laughter)

Mr Strangways said that such a state of things as the Attorney-General referred to existed only a few months ago

The amendment was then put and negatived

Mr Duffield moved that the word "dogs" should be inserted in the 35th line, and that in the 41st line the word "fowls" be struck out and the words "poultry and dogs" inserted His object was that the useless curs which infested the country should be destroyed

Mr Strangways suggested that dogs with collars on their necks should be exempted

Mr Mildred said, if the clause was qualified so as to apply only to unregistered dogs, he would not object

Dr Wark supported the amendment

Mr Peake asked the hon the Attorney-General whether under the common law of England it would not be competent for any owner of sheep or cattle to destroy dogs which were injuring his cattle, and if so whether there was any necessity for special legislation on the point

The Attorney-General said it would be impossible to give a definite answer There was an action brought at one time against a person for killing a dog, and it was proved that at the time the dog was running away, and the man was held responsible A man might be justified in shooting a dog which was doing mischief, but if he halloed out, and the dog ran away, he might be held responsible, even though the dog had done mischief (Laughter) There could be no general principle laid down as to whether a person would be justified in killing a particular dog It depended upon the circumstances of the case.

Mr Duffield did not propose to confine the clause to unregistered dogs He knew a person at Gawler Town who had lately lost 36 sheep by dogs

Mr Bakewell had, during the last six weeks, seen nine sheep killed by one dog Under the clause a person would not be justified in killing a dog unless he was trespassing

Mr Strangways said the clause might work in some parts of the country, but it would not in others To permit a person to shoot a dog which was merely trespassing in a garden and doing no harm would be monstrous

The amendment applying to all dogs was then agreed to, that in reference to unregistered dogs having been previously negatived

Mr Lindsay said this was one of the worst clauses in the Bill (Hear, hear) He said one of the worst, but not the worst, as there might be others as bad (Laughter) The clause never existed in any Act in the colony until that other Parliament, known as the Associated District Chairmen, placed it in the Act some two years ago The clause was not only objectionable, but it contained absurdities which it would be well to remark on To say that a person possessed of enclosed land might destroy dogs trespassing was one absurdity In another portion of the Bill there was a clause defining what a good and substantial fence was, and it meant a two-rail fence But how was that a good and substantial fence against goats, pigs, poultry, and rabbits? Besides a garden equally valuable, but having no fence, could not be protected Again, to authorize the shooting of domestic animals would encourage people in taking the law into their own hands, and it was only in a state of savagery that people should take the law into their own hands If the House was to adopt this principle, they had better at once revert to the spear and waddy law of the natives, or adopt, as in America, lynch-law Any power of this kind would encourage ill-feeling amongst neighbours, and serious damage would be done very often A pig worth £5 would be destroyed, when he had not done damage to the value of a shilling, and the owner's feelings would be to take his gun and shoot the man who shot his pig (Laughter) He did not say the man would actually shoot his neighbour, but that would be the tendency of the law There were clauses in other Acts permitting animals to run at large, but to give other people the right of shooting them seemed to him an absurdity, to give it no worse name The true remedy was to make it unlawful for mischievous animals to run at large, and if this were made a fineable offence, there would be no necessity for such a clause He hoped members would not divide when he had done speaking, but that they would express their opinions on the clause, for it was of more consequence tha some matters to which the House devoted several days' discussion He had given notice months ago of a clause instead of this, which would be found in the votes and proceedings By that clause goats, pigs, poultry, and rabbits, would not be allowed to stray at all, and there would be a penalty not exceeding £5 for the first offence and £10 for any subsequent offence for allowing them to do so That clause would meet every object to be attained by the clause as it now stood The laws of the colony at present expressly allowed pigs to run at large, inasmuch as they were included amongst small cattle He wished also to raise the question whether such a clause as that now proposed, was not repugnant to the law of England It appeared to him to be repugnant to it, inasmuch as the English law was made to protect property, and this clause was made to destroy it It was now a question whether this clause was repugnant to English law, although an hon member had urged some days before that it was not repugnant to the law of England for a man to have six wives (Laughter)

Mr Townsend rose to order Was the hon member addressing himself to the question before the Committee?

The Chairman replied that the hon member certainly was not

Mr Lindsay said he was considering what was repugnant to English law, and he wanted to know from the hon the Attorney-General what was the meaning of that clause which prevented the House from passing laws repugnant to the law of England It appeared to him that this clause was as repugnant to the law of England as anything could be,

though he did not insist upon this being the case. But after the clause was passed, it would be for gentlemen of the legal profession to say whether it would have any effect. He hoped hon. members would consider the clause fully and fairly, and not pass it without consideration.

Mr. Reynolds said that the hon. member for Encounter Bay was decidedly at large, but he (Mr. Reynolds) hoped the Government would not be influenced by the reasons given by that hon. member against the clause. He looked upon the clause as a proof of the superior ability and wisdom of the House. He knew of no clause more useful, and if the House struck it out they would strike out the cream of the Bill. It would only render it necessary to give his neighbors notice that their pigs and dogs and goats must be kept in a proper place. The very intimation of an intention to shoot trespassing animals would be sufficient to keep them off. It often happened that a neighbor could not make compensation for the destruction of a tree or a shrub. One could not always estimate its value, and no compensation that could be given would at times be equal to the mischief done.

The clause as amended was then agreed to.

On clause 26,

Mr. Duffield moved that in the 8th line after the word "shall" the word "knowingly" be inserted.

Mr. Strangways objected that the amendment would throw upon the person laying the information the onus of proving that the incorrect description was given wilfully, and would thereby to a great extent prevent poundkeepers from being punished. The object of the clause was to throw this onus on the poundkeeper. In the event of the justices being of opinion that although the poundkeeper described the cattle in an improper manner, it was done innocently, or that the prosecution was malicious, then the justices could fine the poundkeeper sixpence, or any sum, however small, or if the prosecution was malicious, they might make the the plaintiff pay the whole of the costs.

Mr. Duffield said that sometimes it was very difficult, owing to the length of hair in the animals' winter coats, to describe the brands at all, and the consequence was that the misdescriptions occurred every week. In the very last Gazette there was a steer described as a heifer. (Laughter.) This occurred at Hamilton. He would move as an amendment, the addition of the words "and if any poundkeeper by error shall incorrectly describe any cattle, these cattle shall be re-advertised, and after such two advertisements, the cattle shall be kept the full time in such pounds as hereinafter provided, and that the additional cost arising from the advertisement, and maintenance of such cattle, shall be paid by the poundkeeper."

Mr. Milne considered the objection of the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) very reasonable, and to obviate it, it was necessary to throw the onus of proof on the poundkeeper. After the word "pound" he would insert the words "unless he can prove to the satisfaction of the Justices that the insufficient description has not been wilfully made."

The Attorney-General was about to propose something like the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Milne. The mere circumstance of the cattle being incorrectly described should be a prima facie case against the poundkeeper. He would suggest the insertion of the words "without sufficient excuse the proof to lie with the poundkeeper." He might state that his only objection to the proposal of the hon. member (Mr. Duffield) was that the cost of advertising and keeping the cattle might be such that even if the poundkeeper saw the incorrect description he would keep up that description sooner than incur the cost.

The amendment of the hon. the Attorney-General was then agreed to.

Mr. Strangways moved that all the words after the word "pound" in the eleventh line be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

The clause was then passed as amended, and the Chairman reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. Peake, in rising to oppose the second reading of this Bill, would confine his address chiefly to disputing the first proposition which appeared in the preamble. The questions of the legality and fairness and justice of imposing an assessment had been argued in the House, and reported upon by a Select Committee, and it would therefore be useless for him to take up the time of the House in discussing them. But he objected to the preamble of the Bill, which said that it was expedient to impose an assessment on stock. He believed this was nothing but class legislation and bad political economy. It was a bungling attempt by legislation to cover our bungling Waste Lands Regulations. He (Mr. Peake) had on a late occasion asked the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands if he was prepared to uphold these regulations, and the hon. member replied that he was. He regarded this Bill as a mere expedient to raise an income which the Waste Lands Regulations were incapable of producing, but merely because these regulations were to be upheld, the House was called upon to affirm what was opposed to all the legislation of the old country, and to impose a tax upon the produce of the land. It was only part of that system of protection which was dead and gone in the old country, for if they began by taxing these persons, they would by-and-bye have to protect their produce. This was his first objection to the Bill, which he regarded as a bungling expedient to cover our bungling Waste Lands Regulations. For these reasons he would ask the Government to take a fair and business-like view of the matter, in order to get a fair return from the waste lands without adopting a system of legislation opposed to the soundest and best principles of political economy. He now felt it necessary to allude to the part taken by the hon. member who had moved the second reading of the Bill. (The hon. member was here about to quote from the speech of the hon. the Attorney-General, as reported from the Hansard.)—

The Speaker said the hon. member would be out of order in quoting from the speech.

Mr. Peake would merely allude in a few words to the address of the hon. member. The hon. member complained first of the constitution of the Committee. ("No, no," from the Attorney-General.) He (Mr. Peake) had certainly understood the hon. member to say so. (Cries of "Hear, hear.")

The Attorney-General must call the hon. member to order. What he objected to was the character of the evidence, and not the constitution of the Committee. ("Hear, hear," from Mr. Neales.) He understood that the preponderating majority of witnesses were persons directly interested in the Bill.

Mr. Peake did not wish to misinterpret the hon. member, but he certainly understood him to object to the constitution of the Committee and the evidence taken. Now, what was the constitution of the Committee? First, there was the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was especially responsible to this Bill. Then there was another hon. member, who had looked carefully into the calculations—the hon. member for the city, Mr. Neales. What course did these hon. members take in order to prove their case? Did they examine the living witnesses who were present at the agreement between the Crown and the holders of the waste lands? The Committee reported upon the evidence; but what course did the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands take? That hon. member and the hon. member for the city (Mr. Neales) said that they wanted no more information. He (Mr. Peake) would do no more than quote the words in the dissenting memorial. (The hon. member here read the substance of the document in question.) From this it would be seen that the hon. member did not want any more information. But let the House see whether the hon. member had all the information which he ought to have. The hon. the Treasurer, as one of the Government, specially responsible for the Bill, had stated in the House, that the number of hands employed by the squatting interest was something like 1,600, or 1,700, yet it was demonstrated in the evidence, that the number was far larger. The Treasurer had said that the number of these persons was 1,860, but there was a calculation before the Committee which he (Mr. Peake) saw no reason to doubt, to the effect that the actual hands in the pay of the squatters numbered 4,500, and that the families connected with these persons numbered something like 11,000. (Laughter.) Yet they were told that no further information was required, although the hon. gentleman who had moved the second reading did not give one iota of evidence to show that these figures were wrong. He (Mr. Peake) did not believe that Mr. John Taylor would give false evidence, and the hon. the Attorney-General had never attempted to impugn that gentleman's testimony. The hon. the Treasurer said there were from 1,600 to 1,800 persons in the employment of the squatters, and the hon. member (Mr. Neales) said there were something like 1,500 persons so employed, so that these two hon. members had shewn that their information was very incomplete indeed; yet the hon. the Treasurer said he did not want information, although his information was very imperfect indeed.

The Treasurer would ask that when the hon. member made a quotation, he should quote an entire sentence. He had not said that he wanted no information, but that he wanted no further information than was contained in papers before the House.

The Speaker said the hon. member could quote as much or as little of a document as he pleased, and it would be for the House to judge whether the quotation was a fair one.

Mr. Peake resumed. The hon. the Treasurer stated that there were 1,800 persons employed by the squatting interest, and that they raised half a million of produce, and the hon. member, Mr. Neales, estimated the number at 1,500 to 1,600, and expressed his opinion that the squatters did not pay a fair share towards the revenue of the country. He thought the House would have been better pleased if the hon. the Attorney-General, in moving the second reading of the Bill, had met the figures of Mr. Taylor fairly, but they had never been met, and they now stood unchallenged. When the hon. the Attorney-General, moved the second reading of the Bill he should have gone a little deeper into the subject, and commented upon these figures. It struck him that hon. members had not all the information they required, and he challenged the hon. the Attorney-General with being uncandid and unfair in not having gone into these figures. He (Mr. Peake) could only exercise what little judgment he possessed in comparing the figures quoted on both sides, and he was of opinion that the Committe had found rightly and arrived at a fair and just conclusion from the evidence before them. (The hon member was at this point about to quote the speech of the hon the Attorney-General)——

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member would not be in order in quoting the speech

Mr PEAKE had not quoted the speech, but merely referred to it. He admitted the ability with which the hon the Attorney-General had spoken, and the great power of the learned gentleman s address But the hon member, seeing no way of contradicting the living witnesses who were present at the bargain concluded between the Government and the squatters, said that Mr Bonney was a tool, and that he had been nearly though not quite bribed This was not just, for Mr Bonney was the agent of the Government, and he (Mr Peake) had heard that gentleman give evidence before the House as to what was the agreement between the Government and the squatters He (Mr Peake) had never disputed the legality of an assessment, but left it to the living witnesses, and he considered it scarcely fair to throw discredit upon the evidence of Mr Bonney and Mr Torrens It was not quite ingenuous to throw a shade of doubt upon Mr Torrens because he was not Treasurer during the first month in which these leases were granted Mr Torrens was Treasurer within a month or two after the leases were issued, and he (Mr Peake), therefore, thought that gentleman's evidence was worth something as concurrent testimony of what took place between the squatters and the Government. There was another witness also who should have been called by the Government He alluded to Mr Macdonald, who, he believed was acting with Mr Bonney as joint Commissioner when the leases were drawn (No, no,) Well, at least Mr Macdonald was a party to the framing of the regulations If he (Mr Peake) was not so well up in this matter as the hon the Attorney-General, he trusted that hon member would correct him, while he stated his objections to the line of argument which had been adopted The hon the Attorney-General had spoken of the proportion of revenue contributed by the squatters, and had set about deducing an argument from the fact that from the proceeds of waste lands a moiety was sent home for Imperial purposes, as contr distinguished from local purposes He thought for the hon member to say that there was any difference between sending home money to bring out immigrants to cultivate our fields, man our ships, and dig minerals from the soil—that there was a difference between this and local purposes, was a very fine drawn conclusion, and he (Mr Peake) was afraid a little bit of sophism The money was sent home then just as it was now, and the people had a guarantee of protection from the Imperial Government, now that they had got the entire management of their affairs, the policy from the beginning to the end was the same The fact that they now managed their affairs better than the Home Government would not enable any such inferential argument as that of the hon the Attorney-General to be upheld He thought the hon the Attorney General was not at home in this matter The hon member could not be entirely clear, inasmuch as he had spoken of a compromise If the people s interests were sacrificed—if a bad bargain had been made for the Crown Lands, where was the necessity of a compromise? If the assessment was just and right let it be upheld He (Mr Peake) was not averse to a compromise, but he merely wanted to show that there was something on the part of the hon the Attorney-General, which indicated that that hon member was afraid of this piece of legislation which he wanted the House to enact Hon members would recollect the other day when the justice of taxing another class was considered, how strongly the hon the Attorney-General condemned class legislation He (Mr Peake) rejoiced to assist the Attorney-General in opposing class legislation at that time, and the whole of this Bill was class legislation, and a bungling expedient He had heard the address of the hon the Attorney-General with great delight because of its ability, but he had heard the conclusion of it with great regret, as he was sorry that an hon member of that House should almost threaten those hon members who might give conscientious votes in this matter—(hear, hear)—that he should have placed before such hon members the prospect of a general election if they presumed to vote as they thought right in this matter

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member was imputing language to him which he had not used He was not conscious of having made any reference to a general election He must emphatically deny any recollection of having said anything of the sort

Mr PEAKE regretted having misunderstood the hon member, but when allusion was made to the obstinate aristocracies of other countries, he fancied that allusion was made to a possible general election (Hear, hear) The hon member seemed ready to carry the red flag through the streets of Adelaide. (Laughter) He thought it was some electioneering movement that was referred to It seemed like hounding one class against another—the million against the few It looked as if, on a pinch the hon member would be prepared to hound on the multitude against the few He differed with the hon member, and would take the liberty of expressing his dissent, and if those who sent him (Mr Peake) to the House would not permit him to vote conscientiously, they would do well to send some one else to represent them He contended that taxation should be raised from surplus and not from capital, but the tax now sought to be imposed was one upon the holders of land It was easy to see where the money must come from ultimately Hon members would scarcely take his word for it, but he would give them the opinion of a very first-class man—James Stuart Mill [The hon member read a brief extract, to the effect that the tax must ultimately fall upon the consumer, which gave rise to some laughter] He was aware that the hon the Attorney-General might say that, as the consumer would have to pay the tax, the squatter had no right to complain It was true the consumer would ultimately have to pay, but in the meantime the exertions of the producers would be hampered by this species of legislation For what would be the effect? It would be a premium to those who held a large amount of territory not above half stocked, whilst those who had their country well stocked would pay in a larger portion In fact, the man who was merely keeping others out of the land would not pay in the same proportion as the man who stocked his land well This was another objection to the Bill The measure was, in fact, only an excuse for the present imperfect Waste Lands Regulations The Government would go on letting the land on 14 years' leases, at 10s the square mile, and yet they came down to the House and complained that the land was alienated for an insufficient consideration Was this a business like way of going to work? Was there any fair excuse for singling out one class as the object of legislation and holding them up to the special obloquy of the people in the event of the Bill being rejected? There was one suggestion made by Mr John Taylor which he believed offered a more business-like solution of the question, and would prevent the agitation of classes, and the setting of one section of the community against another He believed we had not seen the end with regard to the Victorian and New South Wales squatters, although these persons were in a very different position from the squatters of this colony, in fact, they enjoyed transcendant advantages over the squatters of this country in having a better market, and better soil and territory, and many other advantages which did not exist here He believed that the system pursued towards the squatters in the other colonies might yet turn out to be a false one, that it might work great injury, and that it would lead to still greater injury here He had already alluded to Mr Taylor's proposal That gentleman had expressed his view that the squatters would not be averse to yielding to the present demand, provided they were placed in a fair position otherwise The 14-years' leases were mere bungling and should not be issued at all The unstocking of the runs which would take place for three or four years previous to the expiration of the leases would be a great evil, and the stocking of them by the new tenants on coming in would be a further source of loss The system would work very badly, and he should be very glad to see it done away with He believed that, until the lands were wanted for sale or for hundreds, there should be no break in the occupation Every hon member must see the impolicy of a break in the tenure. The way for Government to get a fair revenue from the land was to have the runs valued periodically—say every four, five, or six years—so that the squatter would have his rent regulated by falling or rising prices This was the course every man followed in the management of his private property Why not follow out the principle in the present case? Why set one class against another? and why not endeavor to get a larger rent for the waste lands than the present regulations allowed? The leases were suicidal in themselves, and, far from protecting the revenue, injured it. The operation of this Bill would interfere with the interests of those in the outlying districts who were struggling to establish themselves, notwithstanding that the Bill professed to leave the runs free for three years, in order that an opportunity might be given to the holders of them to stock them But he maintained that three years was not a sufficient time even then to enable them to stand an assessment on stock He hoped the Government would abandon this Bill, and so alter the Waste Lands Regulations, that the justice of the case might be met, and that they should hear no more of the cry of "Down with the squatters and up with other classes of the community" He (Mr Peake) had not heard that the squatters had expressed one word of unwillingness to pay a fair rent for their runs, all they wanted was that the question should be put in such a light that they might do so without compromising themselves He believed they took their runs under the understanding that there should be no contribution from them asked under the shape of rent, and this assessment was a rent although introduced under the guise of an assessment

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR

A message was received from His Excellency the GOVERNOR intimating that in compliance with addresses from that House, items for sinking wells at Blanche Town, for the erection of lock-up at Mount Remarkable, and for a grant to the Aborigines, would be placed on the Supplementary Estimates for the ensuing year Also Message No 18, enclosing to the House despatches relative to temporary postal arrangements

DEBATE RESUMED.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS rose to support the second reading of the Bill, and in doing so he would say that he had never on any former occasion supported a measure so just, expedient, and liberal in its principles as that before the House. Before he proceeded to speak on certain portions of the provisions of the Bill, he would allude to one or two remarks which had fallen from the hon. member for the Burra and Clare (Mr. Peake). That hon. member had said that he hoped the House would hear no more of the cry of "Down with the squatters, and up with the other classes of the community." But he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) thought he would be borne out when he said that anything approaching such an expression had never fallen from the present Administration—(hear)—but on the contrary the squatters had no better friends in that House than the present Government, and that, he thought, had been fully proved by the liberal measure which had been brought forward. Again, the hon. member for the Burra and Clare had raked up his oft-repeated opinion that so far as the expediency of this measure went, the Government would get a full return from the squatters by altering the Waste Lands Regulations. Now, he (Mr. Dutton) thought that that hon. member who had paid so much attention to getting up cases and to reading Council papers, would have made himself more fully acquainted with the subject, than to have made such a statement as the foregoing. That hon. member should surely know that no alteration of the Waste Lands Regulations could possibly be productive of any further revenue to the State, because the greater portion of the leases, in fact nearly all those of the most considerable value, were held at a rental fixed in the lease, and that no alteration in the Waste Lands Regulations could possibly enable the Government to compel the squatters to pay a higher rental. Again, in answer to another statement of that hon. member, he would say that the rate of 10s. per square mile for that country, lying far from the settled districts, was a very fair rental, and that the grazing quality of such land could not be compared with that granted under lease since the year 1851. The reasons therefore of the hon. member for the Burra and Clare fell to the ground, and he hoped that that hon. member would in future look more into the salient points of his case before he accused the Government under what must surely be a misconception. The hon. member for Burra and Clare (Mr. Peake) had also taken exception to the remarks of the Attorney-General, but as his hon. and learned colleague was well able to take care of himself he would leave him to reply. (Hear.) He would in the next place address himself to a few leading points which had occupied attention during the debate, in which the Government incurred grave censure as to the manner in which they had conducted the Select Committee on the Assessment on Stock Bill. And in reference to this he would remark that if it had been any other time of the year than the present, when the business of the House was so pressing, or at a season when the Government had more time upon their hands, there would have been some cogent reason for these remarks, but he trusted after the candid explanation he would now make, the Government would be absolved from any intention on their part to take any course calculated to bring about the defeat of the Bill. The Select Committee appointed on the Assessment on Stock question was entirely an exceptional one. The Government introduced the Bill, and in doing so said they were quite satisfied of the justice of imposing an assessment upon the stock of the squatter, and that they were not in want of any further information than was contained in the printed documents laid before the House. But in the debate it appeared that there were many members who thought they were not in a like position as regarded the possession of facts or evidence to lead them to such a conclusion. The Government therefore consented to the appointment of the Committee, with the especial view of enabling the squatters fully to state their objections. But this being done, at a late period of the year when the Estimates were pressing close upon the attention of the House, which the Government knew would require to be sanctioned as soon as possible to prevent financial inconvenience, it could well be imagined that it was of importance to bring up the report of the Committee as soon as possible. This Committee was appointed on the 27th September, and on the 3rd November it brought up its report. It sat, therefore, 38 days, and during that period it was found utterly impossible to have more than 10 sittings, or to examine more than eight witnesses. He hoped hon. members would just consider the limited time which was at their disposal, and the impossibility of their being able to do more than they had done under the circumstances. On the first day's Committee being held Mr. Hawker presented a list of something like 20 names, all of course intended to be produced against the Bill. These were witnesses simply to be called on behalf of the squatters, and when the Government considered that there would, at least, have to be called on the other side an equal number to give it any appearance of impartiality, they considered that it would be impossible within any reasonable period of time to terminate the labors of the Committee, and he (Mr. Dutton) therefore at once determined to call no witnesses at all, and to limit himself to cross-examination. He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) was also influenced in his not calling certain witnesses, by the generally expressed feeling of the House, which had been reiterated by the Attorney-General, that the squatters should have an opportunity of stating their case plainly and fully, and of showing what they considered to be unjust in the assessment. That being the case, and with the desire on his part to give the squatters that opportunity, he had not summoned any witnesses. That was his candid explanation of what had tended to bring much censure upon the Government, but he considered that the House would see by this, that in taking the course they had done, it was plainly with the view of carrying out its wishes and saving valuable time. He might mention another matter—that was, that he had refused to be Chairman of that Select Committee, and his reason for so doing was, that the squatters or their friends should not have the opportunity of saying that, as he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) was in the chair, they (the squatters) had not the same opportunity given to them for proving their case as they would have had otherwise, and he therefore had pleasure in supporting the appointment of Mr. Barrow to that post. However, independently of this, there was the hon. member for the city (Mr. Neales), who was a member of the Committee, and also a strong supporter of the Bill, and yet that hon. gentleman had not thought that the Government had taken any action, or refrained from taking any action, with the view to defeat the objects of the Bill. He might say in reference to a statement which had been made by an hon. member in that House, that it had never been suggested to him (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) to call the Chief Secretary or Mr. J. B. Hughes, for if so he certainly should have complied with the suggestion. He thought, therefore, that those hon. members who had referred to these matters in an invidious light would reconsider the conclusions which they had come to. Furthermore he would say on this subject that although the amount proposed to be raised by an assessment upon stock was placed amongst the Treasurer's Ways and Means, it would not interfere with them in the least though it should not be allowed, for the balance on the Estimates would simply be reduced by £10,000, the amount proposed to be raised, still it was desirable that the report of the Committee should be brought up before the Estimates were considered in Committee. With regard to the evidence taken upon this Committee, he would call the attention of the House to one fact, and that was, that although the witnesses examined declared the assessment illegal, yet they all admitted without exception that it was moderate in amount and unobjectionable in details. They all agreed on this point, and he (Mr. Dutton) was quite sure that amongst the body of the squatters there were some not so unreasonable as many he could name. He could speak of one case from his own personal knowledge, where one of the most extensive of the squatters, a relative of his own, who had since left the colony, had said in a conversation with him (Mr. Dutton) before he left that he did not object to a moderate assessment. He (Mr. Dutton) had forseen at the time this conversation took place that such an assessment would be sought to be levied, before long, although without, of course, the least suspicion of the part which he was to act in it, and in asking that gentleman he had referred to his opinion about it, he was told in reply that he should have no objection to a moderate assessment. And he would remark that the gentleman he alluded to paid proportionately a higher rent than any other squatter for his runs, thus shewing that at least some amongst that class of persons called squatters were not so unreasonable as might be supposed from what had been said about them. During the debate on Friday last a good deal had been said, and insinuated of the intention of the Government to "sell" the House by their action with respect to the Select Committee on Stock. He regretted that any hon. member should have indulged in such expressions when there was not the slightest ground for them. He also regretted that hon. members should do that by innuendo which they would not say openly and fairly. He did not mean that such hon. members were of the opinions they then expressed. In reply to these remarks, he would state that as far as he and his hon. colleagues were concerned, they were perfectly sincere in all they had done, and had no other view than to enforce that which they believed to be just and equitable. He would refer to one portion of the report of the Select Committee which stated that the assessment was calculated to retard the development of new country. But he would ask them to look to this Bill itself, which provided that new runs should not be assessed for a period of three years, in order to give the occupier every opportunity of establishing himself. One hon. gentleman (Mr. Baker) had said that the term of exemption should be 14 years, but, though the Government said three years, it would, of course, remain with the House to say what the length of the term should be. The hon. member for Encounter Bay had sneered at him (Mr. Dutton) in his usual happy way, in reference to his cross-examination of the witnesses on the Select Committee. But he thought if hon. members referred to that examination, they would find that it was not so bad as had been represented, for he had elicited two or three facts which it would be admitted were valuable to know. The first of these was, that stock with the run was twice as valuable as without the run. The next fact he had elicited was that extracted from a gentleman who was considered an oracle on most matters (Mr. Torrens), to which gentleman he (Mr. Dutton) had put a question, which he would read. (Read, question 222 and answer on Minutes of Evidence on the Assessment on Stock Bill.) He begged therefore to say that his cross-examination was not so profitless as had been implied. The Attorney-General had gone so fully into the question as a whole that he (Mr Dutton) might be well excused from dealing any further in the matter. In conclusion, he would say that he could not conceive of a more liberal measure as regarded the interests of the squatters than that which was now before the House. He agreed, at the same time, with the Attorney-General, that it was desirable to place the leaseholder in a position of security. But could that be called a compromise? Certainly not; it was no compromise, but an acknowledgment on the part of the Government that though the assessment was just and equitable, yet that the squatters were entitled to protection, and that they should not be called upon during the currency of their leases to pay any further assessment to the State. And he (Mr Dutton) was quite sure the Attorney-General's statement would have due weight with the House, that it would not be interpreted as a compromise, and that much opposition to the Bill would be thereby softened down.

Mr MACDERMOTT was not disposed to consider this question in a financial point of view, and certainly not in a party spirit. On a former occasion he had called attention to the disadvantage leaseholders rested under, that was their uncertain tenure. He thought this was the proper time to deal with such a question, embracing one of the most important branches of our industry. He had also on another occasion called attention to the probability that the inconvenience to the squatter might be so great by this uncertain tenure that they would find it more to their advantage to decrease their stock than to hazard the possibility of their being outbid. If the leaseholder had a more certain tenure given to him by the value of the lease being assessed every 4th or 5th year, then he (Mr Macdermott) would vote for this assessment, but if not he should reject it. He thought, however, that it was important that all party feeling should be left out of the question—that every one should consider the question as one affecting the interest of the community at large, and that the matter should now be so adjusted as to prevent the necessity of the assessment being periodically re-discussed, and this would be an example to the other colonies which they would do well to follow. The certainty of tenure was all important, if, as the Attorney-General had suggested, there was a provision made that no further imposition should be levied during the currency of the lease, then he should support the assessment.

Mr MILNE would oppose the Bill. The question had been argued in two ways both by its supporters and by its opponents. The supporters of this measure had argued its acceptance from two points. The first of those was that the squatter did not pay his fair share to the revenue, and that therefore he should be specially taxed, and the other was that he received his runs too low, and that the country should therefore take advantage of a certain clause in the lease for the purpose of legalising a further assessment. Now with regard to the first point he took the ground that no one man could be said not to pay his fair share to the revenue, because it was entirely voluntary in one sense, how much each should pay, as it was left free to consume more or less of dutiable goods. He maintained that it was only right that a general tax should weigh upon all classes alike, and that a special tax should only be imposed for local purposes, where the occupier would get the benefit of such taxation. With regard to the squatters not paying a fair rent, he agreed that they did not do so, but that was the fault of their leases being drafted for 14 years, and he could not feel surprise that the Government had taken advantage of a circumstance to increase that rental. With respect to the understanding the squatters had when the leases were granted, he thought the balance of evidence went to show that there was no assessment contemplated, and therefore that there would be no assessment imposed. He maintained that the Bill did not meet the justice of the case in another point of view. To assess stock at the same rate in all parts of the colony was perfectly inequitable, the only proper and fair way being to assess the leases. They all knew the value of stock was very different in one part of the country and another. It was a fact certainly that runs in settled districts fetched enormous sums, but, on the contrary, that in the outlying districts their value was not in the least approximate. Therefore, to make one uniform assessment upon stock, wherever they might be depastured was, he considered, the height of injustice. He hoped the question as a whole would be met by some compromise, and that such an arrangement would be made as would preclude the necessity for an assessment at all, except for local purposes. He thought the new leases should not be issued for a longer term than seven years, with the power to assess their value, say at the the 3rd, 4th, or 5th year of the term. He thought the present mode of disposing of the leases by auction would be an objectionable mode as either the squatters would suffer oppression or they would combine not to bid against each other, and thus reduce perhaps the value of the leases, to the great injury of the colony.

Mr REYNOLDS had never listened with greater pleasure to any speech made in that House than to that of the hon and learned Attorney-General on Friday last, and the only regret he had was that that hon and learned gentlemen did not let his voice be heard before—before the Committee had brought up its report. He (Mr Reynolds) could not agree with the opinion expressed by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), who said that it would have been more fitting for the Commissioner of Crown Lands to have moved the second reading of the Assessment on Stock Bill. He (Mr Reynolds) had other impressions, and he believed the reason for the Attorney-General taking the matter up was a good one—it was because his colleague made such terrible messes of everything he took in hand. (Laughter.) Why was not the Commissioner of Crown Lands entrusted with this measure? Because he was not competent for it. It was no use to entrust it to an individual who made such messes of what was entrusted to him. (Great laughter.) He (Mr Reynolds) therefore concluded that, for this reason, the Attorney-General had taken charge of the measure. He (Mr Reynolds) had listened to the reasons of the Commissioner of Crown Lands for not calling witnesses with pain and with pity. What were the reasons of that hon gentleman? Why that he found he had to call certain witnesses, but not having the time to do it, he left it all in the hands of the squatters. But that hon gentleman, said "look at my cross examination and see what a wonderful discovery I have brought out of it, which posterity shall bless me for"—(laughter)—and he supposed on the principle of being thankful for small mercies they should be satisfied. He (Mr Reynolds) did believe on a former occasion that the Government were not sincere in their advocacy of this Bill, but when he (Mr Reynolds) found that combined with other circumstances the, Commissioner of Crown Lands neglected to call evidence which would have been in favor of the Bill he could only take it for granted that the Government did not want the Committee to report in favor of the measure. What was the course usually adopted in the case of a Select Committee being appointed to report upon a Bill?—why, that evidence should be called in the first instance to prove the preamble. But, instead of this, what did they think had been done? Why, evidence had been brought to disprove the utility of the measure, and the members who had supported the Government had been sold. ("Hear," from the Attorney-General.) The Attorney General said "hear," and as that learned gentleman was so accustomed to compromise, so accustomed to look at both sides of the question, it did not come amiss from him. (Laughter.) He insisted what was the House to think, but for the disclaimer made by the Attorney-General, but that the Government did not want the Bill to pass. And as to the question of a compact, he thought it only tended to support this view of the case. His view of the justice of this assessment was not newly inculcated. Three years ago a lease was submitted to him, and he was asked by a squatter whether, under that, he considered they were liable to an assessment. He (Mr Reynolds) had answered yes, that they were liable, and that was the opinion also of the squatters themselves; as to the threat which had been made by the Attorney-General, he thought the inference plainly was that if they did not support this Bill—looking at what had taken place in reference to the Reform Bill, and the French Revolution, they the dissentients, would be referred to their constituents to be turned about their business. That certainly was his impression of what the Attorney-General had said, and he was sorry to think that that gentleman found it necessary to take such a course. It might be he meant to declare fresh hundreds, and thus get over the difficulty in that way. This Select Committee had been appointed because some hon members wanted further information—and how was that attained—why, by taking the evidence of the squatters alone, and the Government, instead of taking evidence to support their position, suffered the evidence to be confined to persons who were entirely opposed to the measure. With the views he (Mr Reynolds) had previously expressed, he could not vote against the second reading of the Bill, but he did hope that on another occasion of the members of the Government wanting support, they would adopt a different policy from that which they had pursued in this instance.

Mr MILDRED could not allow a subject of such interest to pass and give a silent vote upon it, without expressing his opinion in reference to it. He would take an early opportunity of stating that he had ever been a friend of the squatters in South Australia. He was one of the earliest squatters—that was he was one of the earliest who had sheep at a time when such really were squatters. He repeated that he was a friend to the squatters, many of whom had made fortunes. But now the class might be termed sheepowners and cattle-owners, and they had assumed the highest grade in the province, from a combination of circumstances they had become the millionaires of South Australia. They had obtained that position, however, by class legislation. The present sheep-owners and cattle-owners had been a favored class of the community, and it was now proposed, finding that others were suffering great depression, to bring them to an equality in reference to the burdens which they were called upon to bear by imposing the tax mentioned in the Bill before the House. This was proposed in order to meet the exigency of the State. It was found essential to impose fresh taxes. He regretted the position in which the Ministry were placed in connection with the present Bill, for he believed the cause was a noble one, and the ground which they stood upon was firm. The Ministry had the Liberal members at their back, and those members had the people at their back. Let the people declare upon the subject, let the Ministry take their stand, and be assured they would carry their point. Something had been said about the injustice of this measure. It was quite clear that a compact had been made between the sheep and cattle-owner and the Government, but the question was, whether he paid a fair proportion of the burdens of the State. So long as it was not necessary that the sheep and cattle-owner should be called upon to pay more than at present, why he saw no objection to his being permitted to enjoy this fertile province. The wool would grow whilst the sheepowner enjoyed himself, golden nuggets dropped from the sheep whilst the owner was in his marble halls. (Laughter.) Sheep, instead of being only of the value of half-a-crown, suddenly rose to twenty shillings, and the sheep and cattle owners continued to depasture them, paying a mere peppercorn rent, sending sheep away to the colony of Victoria, and depriving the people of South Australia of them, or at all events so regulating the markets that the people of this colony had to pay for their supplies just double what they otherwise would. The sheepowner all this time derived large profits, and though he did not object to any man investing his capital in the most profitable way he could, he certainly objected to the sheepowners doing so at the expense of the public, as had been the case for some years. He should support the Bill, but would confess he should have been better pleased if there had been an assessment upon the land instead of the cattle. That was his theory, and he believed the time would come when it would be seen that it would be more beneficial to impose a tax upon the land than the cattle. He believed that course would indeed be most beneficial to the squatters. He was quite prepared to admit that the squatters should be allowed to hold the land which they at present held at a valuation, which should take place from time to time until the pressure of circumstances required that it should be taken from them. But those who were familiar with the subject would know that seven years hence the runs would become increased in value, and he would give the squatters the value of them just in the same way that he would give the agriculturists the value of the improvements. Such a system as that which he had suggested, that is of taxing the land instead of the stock, would prevent the runs being only a half or a quarter stocked. There would, under such a system, be as much stock upon a run as it could well bear, as parties would not take more land than they were prepared to stock, because they would have to pay for it. If such a system as that which he had suggested could be carried out or introduced in the present Bill he should have supported the Bill more freely, but although he did not think it secured all the advantages which it might secure, he should still support the second reading.

Dr. WARK could not agree with the last speaker, that the squatters had been a favored class. He was sorry that the hon. member had left his seat the moment he had closed his speech, as he should have liked to ask him how the squatters had been so highly favored. He should like to have asked the hon. member what he got for his sheep when he sold out, and what he paid for them. It was all very easy to say that sheep and cattle farmers were a favoured class, but he defied the hon. member to shew that they had been. He would grant that circumstances had placed them in a favourable position since the diggings, but he denied that any class of the community at the commencement of the colony lost so much as the squatters. Those who bought stock at the commencement of the colony paid 20s. a head for them, and many of them kept them on till they were glad to take half-a-crown for them. He had himself bought stock for 18 pence a head, for which 25 shillings had been paid. He merely mentioned this as one fact, but there were many circumstances to which he might allude to shew that there was no truth in the statement that the squatters had been a favored class. He was one of those who had gone through all the changes connected with squatters, till just at the last rise, previous to which he sold out, and consequently derived no benefit from that which benefitted many others. The squatters, however, were not benefitted till that period. The squatters were the pioneers of the colony, and though many of them were gentlemen of education they had voluntarily become the discoverers of new country. He would remind the House that the whole amount which it was proposed to raise in one year by the assessment on stock had been swallowed up by the Government sending out an incapable as an explorer—formerly an hon. member of that House. He repeated that the squatters had not been a favored class, but circumstances had placed them in a favorable position. Other classes had, however, been favored also in this respect. With regard to the remarks which had been made relative to Select Committees, it appeared to him that the Government liked Select Committees very well when they worked just as the Government liked, but when they did not, they endeavored to cast ridicule upon them. The Government did not like the report of the Committee upon this Bill, and so the Attorney-General, with the acumen peculiar to him, and his extraordinary powers of debate, had made out a noble case against it. Instead of using those powers when the Bill was first introduced he kept them back, and did not bring them out till the House, or those who were opposed to the Bill, believed that the brunt of the battle had been fought. When he and other hon. members who were opposed to the Bill considered they were in security, when they thought that the decision was against the Bill, and that it would in fact be withdrawn, then it was that the Attorney-General roused himself and came forward with that rhetoric and argument peculiar to himself in support of the Bill.

Mr. YOUNG said, that although he was sitting immediately behind the hon. member who was addressing the House, he could not hear a word which he said in consequence of the noise in the House.

The SPEAKER observed several hon. members standing behind the bar, and requested them to take their seats.

Dr. WARK was glad that the attention of the Speaker had been called to the noise in the House, as he had been unable to hear himself speak. He was talking, he believed, about the Attorney-General, and how the hon. gentleman objected to the Select Committee. He observed the Chairman of the Committee appointed to consider this Bill was in his place (Mr. Barrow), and he would much rather that he had not been, for he felt bound to say that the report prepared by that hon. member was the most perfect specimen of a report he had ever seen. (Hear, hear.) He stated fearlessly that there was not a single opinion expressed in that report that there was not data given for. He defied even the Attorney-General to say that the report was not in accordance with the evidence. He wished every Select Committee would act as this Committee had. (Laughter.) He repeated that he wished every Committee would act as this had, and in the report which they presented to the House produce an abstract of the evidence. He only wished that the Chairman of this Committee had moved the adoption of the report, he believed had he done so that he would have been successful, so well and ably had the report been prepared. He could not help expressing a belief from what had fallen from the Attorney-General in reference to this Committee, that the real object of the hon. gentleman was to get rid of one of his own colleagues. (Laughter.) He believed so from the line of argument pursued by the hon. gentleman, that evidence had only been taken on one side. The Commissioner of Crown Lands had been appointed upon the Committee for the purpose of seeing that the evidence which could be brought forward in support of the Bill was brought forward; but in what position did the Commissioner of Crown Lands now stand after having brought forward no evidence whatever in support of the Bill. Taking the matter as it stood, it would appear that the Commissioner of Crown Lands had no evidence to bring forward, for not a shadow of evidence had been adduced. That was a prima facie view of the case. He took it then that the Commissioner of Crown Lands had no evidence, for he regarded the statements about it being so late in the day and so on as all moonshine. (Laughter.) Why was the House not called together sooner, in order that these matters might have been fully investigated? It was all "bosh." (Renewed laughter.) If the hon. gentleman had no evidence to bring forward, he would ask, was he justified in adhering to the Bill? If the hon. gentleman, on the other hand, had evidence in support of the Bill to bring forward, he should have brought it forward, and have been true to his colleagues. The hon. gentleman had been selected as a member of the Committee for the express purpose of bringing forward evidence to show that this Bill should pass, but he had not done so. The hon. gentleman was a party to this Bill, and he would ask, was he treating his colleagues fairly if he had evidence which he might have brought forward, but which he had omitted to bring forward? If, on the other hand, he had no evidence on behalf of the Bill to bring forward, was he treating the country fairly in adhering to the Bill? If the hon. gentleman had evidence, why suppress it? Why not bring it forward? The only reason urged by the hon. gentleman was, that the season was late, and the weather was hot. (Laughter.) It was clear to his mind that the hon. gentleman was either incapable of the duty with which he had been entrusted, or he was insincere; and he believed, as he had before stated, that the object of the hon. the Attorney-General was to get rid of him. It was too bad to treat a Select Committee in such a way as this Committee had been treated. Was the Committee to be weighed down by the great ability of the Attorney-General? It was the duty of the House to weigh well the evidence which had been taken by the Select Committee. If the Government appointed an individual who was either incapable or insincere, they had themselves only to blame for it, and not that House. The Government had had every opportunity afforded them of shewing that the Bill was such as should receive the sanction of that House, but he did not believe that any member of the Government was sincere in supporting the Bill. He (Dr. Wark) did not wish the Bill to pass, nor did he believe that the Government wished it to either. He wished to see the Ministry with a policy clear and defined, and let them stand or fall by that policy. He wished them to point out clearly what they considered for the good of the country, and let them stand or fall by any measures founded upon that, but he objected to the Government having any little motions (laughter) or little amendments, such as they were constantly bringing forward to secure a majority in that House. He considered the Attorney General, in moving the second reading of the Bill, made one of the best speeches ever delivered in that House; but that arose from the merits of the hon. gentleman and not from the merits of the cause; in fact it was a piece of special pleading. Great stress had been laid upon the steps which had been in taken in connection with this question in New South Wales and Victoria, and no wonder that such steps had been taken in those colonies, for there the people were oppressed and the squatters had the rule. The squatters there had the pre-emptive right of purchase at 5s an acre, and the people found this out and considered it an enormous acquisition A spirit of opposition was raised towards the squatters, and told a terrible tale though not a bloody one That opposition recoiled upon the squatters, but it was the pre emptive right of purchase which was considered by the people to be the sole point The hon member for the Port (Captain Hart) had mentioned what had taken place in Victoria, and he (Dr Wark) was enabled to corroborate the hon member s statements, for he had recently been in Victoria The squatters in Victoria regretted that they had not accepted the offer of the Government, they sincerely regretted they had not, for in consequence of having refused to be shorn to a small extent, they were now taxed to the extent of 8d per head for sheep The squatters here had never refused to contribute anything reasonable until their leases had been tendered to them He (Dr Wark) took his after having objected again and again to the covenant upon which the Government now relied, upon the assurance of the head of the staff again and again given, that the covenant never would be exercised except for local purposes That was the clear and distinct statement of the head of the department at the time, but the Attorney-General said this was merely a piece of gossip It was gossip, however, from a party who had been raised to the Treasury benches Gossip, indeed! (Laughter) The simple-minded squatters accepted as a substantial Government fact what the Attorney-General now wished to make it appear was mere gossip The squatters accepted it as a substantial Government fact, coming from the head of the department connected with the Government of the country But the Attorney-General had stated that Mr Bonney had a leaning to the class to which he originally belonged the squatters, and that this met its reward by the subscription which was handed to that gentleman upon his departure from the colony He would, however, remind the Attorney-General that Mr Bonney left the colony with an honorable name, to that gentleman's public career there was public testimony, and his private character was quite equal to that of the Attorney-General or any other member of the Government The statement to which he had alluded as having been made to the squatters had a fair right to be regarded as something more than gossip, as it had been fully confirmed by the statements of Mr Bonney in that House when he occupied a seat in it Even if the Bill were passed by the House, it would be an unequal measure A party within 100 miles of Adelaide, who had opportunities of bringing fat stock to market, would feel the Bill press but lightly, but those who were resident a considerable distance in the interior would be very differently affected, and, perhaps, they might some day be compelled to sell off at 2s 6d a head stock which had cost them 25s He objected to the principle of raising a rent merely because the class had been successful Such a course, for instance, would not be pursued with a farmer at home. The whole thing appeared to him to hinge upon this that, because the leases had been granted at a time when the runs were of no value, and when the squatters could hardly exist, they should, now that the class were prosperous, be exposed to additional taxation Since the period, however, at which the leases had been issued, all classes had experienced a season of prosperity, and why should the squatters be singled out to come down upon? The proper plan was, to let the squatters enjoy the lands to the end of their leases, and then let the House get from them all that could be got, or all that they could fairly be called upon to contribute The Attorney-General had entered upon a long argument in reference to the legality of the proposed tax, but he thought it useless to enter upon that point, as the legality was pretty generally admitted, and all that the House had to deal with was the equity and fairness of the proposition The Attorney-General had threatened that, in the event of the Bill being rejected, hon members should be sent to their constituents, but he (Dr Wark) for one was quite willing that such should be the case, and all he could say was, that if his constituents could find a better man than himself to represent them he should be heartily pleased, as it would be far better for him He was at a loss to conceive why the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) after so much talk in that House had not brought forward a few questions in Committee to shew that the Bill was a right one, but he had not done so (No, no) No, the hon member had not done so, and a "No," or a coarse sneer from that hon member was nothing more from him than a knock from his hammer (Laughter) He, for one, always looked for manners according to a person s position, and they must always look for grossness from a gross source (Laughter)

The SPEAKER said the hon member was not in order in imputing grossness to any hon member

Mr NEALES trusted that he would not be considered in the matter at all, but merely the House

Dr WARK considered that if, as he thought he had shewn, the Commissioner of Crown Lands had placed himself in the position of proving that he was either incapable or insincere, that the hon member for the City (Mr Neales) had done the same His opinion was that a Ministry with a little more talent could have done all that was required or was proposed to be done by this Bill without one dissentient voice. He saw as clearly as noonday how it might be done, but certainly not as proposed by a Bill which the Government endeavoured to thrust down the throats of hon members In conclusion, he moved that the Bill be read again that day six months

Mr YOUNG, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, could not avoid making a few remarks expressive of the disappointment and regret which he felt at the position in which he found the Bill that afternoon He had hoped that the report would have been adopted, and that it would have been left to the country to decide this important question His opinion was that the occupants of the waste lands of the Crown would not then be asked to accede to so mild a measure as the present If the matter had been left without discussion, it would have borne altogether a different aspect If the Government had manifested the zeal when they first introduced the Bill which they now exhibited, he believed they would have carried it by an overwhelming majority, that they would have had the thanks of the country for the course which they had taken, and he believed there would have been very few complaints on the part of the occupants of waste lands He was satisfied of the justice of the Bill, having gone through the whole of the evidence, the whole thing appeared perfectly clear to him The demand was low but, as he had before stated, he regretted the position the question now assumed, supposing the Bill to pass He would rather that the question should be thrown upon the hands of the country, and let the country express an opinion It was not a question indeed, between the Government and the squatters, but a question for the country It was a question of political economy It was not a question whether the squatters had made large fortunes or whether they had been subject to severe reverses in former years, for all classes had been subject to such, there was not a class that could be named which had not passed through some adversity, and had experienced some prosperity He was desirous of leaving individuality out of the question and taking a broad view of the question as one of political economy He wished all hon members would view the question in the same light, and he was sure that the country would then come to the conclusion that there were some advantages in responsible Government, though he was afraid that at present the country could not look to the proceedings of that House upon many matters with any great satisfaction

Mr LINDSAY said the arguments for and against the Bill were nearly worn threadbare He should address himself principally to the speech which had been made by the Attorney General in moving the second reading of this Bill, and the comments which had been made by hon members upon that address He would first see what the arguments advanced by the Attorney-General amounted to The hon gentleman had insisted upon the legal right of the Government to impose this tax, and although it did not distinctly appear in what sense the hon gentleman had used the term "Government," if he had used it in its large sense, and had included the Legislative bodies, there could be no doubt that the Government had such power But the question was, from what source was that powered derived? Was it from the covenant in the leases?—if so, why not enforce the covenant without coming to that House at all? No doubt the power to impose any tax belonged to the Legislature, but to argue that it was derived from the covenant in the leases would be an absurdity, as without any covenant the Government had full power to levy a tax It had been objected to the proposed tax that it would be only partial, and that was his strongest objection to it If it were upon the whole colony he might perhaps consider it expedient, but as it would be only a tax upon one particular interest, unless it could be shown that class-legislation should be employed, he could not advocate a tax upon one particular class or interest The Attorney-General had entered quite unnecessarily in his opinion into a very long argument to show that the term local purposes had been used in contradistinction to imperial purposes No doubt the hon gentleman was quite right in the interpretation which he had placed upon the term The term local purposes could only be used in any other sense since the establishment of District Councils There could not be a doubt about the power legally to impose this tax The Attorney-General had stated that after the leases had been prepared he settled them, he did not exactly understand what was meant by settling them, but at all events it appeared that the hon gentleman had had something to do with them, and that the leases had been accepted It was absurd to suppose it was possible that the leases could contain any covenant which could abridge the powers of that Legislature There was, in fact, nothing that he could discover in the leases to prevent the imposition of a tax either upon the land or the stock The Attorney-General, in the course of his address, had spoken of Mr Bonney as a tool That was a term which was generally used with some degree of disrespect, and he could not understand it being used in connection with Mr Bonney's name. No doubt Mr Bonney was a Government servant, and was, consequently, to some extent, a tool, and the same might be said of every gentleman who held office of emolument under the Government (Laughter) But he was satisfied that if Mr Bonney had been asked to cut a covenant he would have been found a very awkward tool, whose sharpness would probably have been used against the Government The Attorney-General had argued that the tax was not excessive, but was politic and fair, well it might be, but the Government had certainly failed to prove that it was, The Government had not yet satisfactorily shewn to the House that the squatters did not pay a fair proportion towards the general revenue It had been ably argued by Mr Milne that the taxes being all indirect, the squatters contributed in the same way as any other parties, according to their consumption of taxable articles It had been argued that there was no compact at present existing between the Government and the squatters, yet the Attorney General actually proposed to make a compact more objectionable than that which some contended already existed, for he proposed to tie up the hands of the Legislature during the whole currency of the leases This would be highly objectionable, for it might, before those leases had been determined be found desirable to tax all the stock in the colony in order, for instance, to pay the interest upon the railway bonds It might, perhaps, be found desirable to place a tax of one shilling per head upon stock, and consequently it would be exceedingly unwise to tie up the hands of the Legislature In the last part of the Attorney-General's address, the hon gentleman made use of what he (Mr Lindsay) certainly regarded as a threat at the time, and it still appeared like one The hon gentleman referred to the Reform Bill and to the French Revolution and other circumstances, calculated to cause an impression that a cry would be raised against the squatters, for the purpose of enforcing demands upon them, if this Bill were not passed He thought these allusions had better have been omitted The true meaning of the covenant in the lease, he believed to be a saving clause, that is a saving clause to prevent any claim for exemption being set up, in reference to taxes falling upon all classes The object was that when a general tax upon all classes was imposed upon land and stock, the squatters should not be enabled to come forward and claim exemption He opposed the Bill, because he regarded it as a proposition to tax a class, it was completely class-legislation He could not understand the argument of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who had first endeavoured to shew that the squatter paid a tolerable price for his run, and had then brought forward the evidence of Mr Torrens, elicited by himself, which was to the effect that the lands occupied by the squatters should produce £80 000 or £100,000 a year These statements appeared to him irreconcilable If the squatters did not pay a fair rent for their runs there could be no objection to the adoption of the suggestion that they should give up their leases and allow the lands to be fairly assessed The only argument he had heard in favor of the Bill was that the Government had made a bad bargain, that the squatters had got the best of it, and that, therefore, they should be called upon to contribute the amount proposed by the present Bill Several hon members had proposed that the land instead of the stock should be assessed, and he must confess he was in favor of that proposition, but he should strenuously oppose any proposition to cut covenants Precedents, however, might be brought forward For instance, in the early days of the colony there was a compact between the Government and certain parties that leases should be issued for certain lands for a period of three years, but it was considered that this compact would be so detrimental to the general interests of the colony that the compacts were broken It might, therefore, be argued that it would be no more unjust to break the compacts with the squatters than with the early settlers but he should oppose any such proposition The original three years' leases ought to have been granted, but were not, the 14 years' leases had however been granted, and that House and the Government were bound to preserve faith with the lessees If, however, the lessees were prepared voluntarily to surrender their leases and to accept fresh ones, he had no objection, but it would be unjust to break the compact which already existed It had been argued by some hon members that this tax could with justice be imposed upon the squatters, because they were the wealthiest class, but this in reality was a most faulty argument A few years ago that would have prompted the imposition of a large additional tax upon the farmers It certainly did appear at that time that a farmer coming from the diggings and being enabled by his own labour to raise £500 worth of wheat from a section, was a very fit object for taxation, but if such a proposition had been made it would have been resisted from one end of the colony to the other So with the squatters it would be unjust to impose an additional burden upon them merely because the Government had made a bad bargain with them If it were necessary that there should be more revenue, if it were necessary that fresh taxes should be levied, let them fall equally on all Let there be a poll tax including the squatters, and he should not object to the proposition There had been a threat held out, and he thought very improperly, that if this Bill were rejected, the Government would exercise all the powers they possessed to impose a tax upon the squatters, but all he could say was that if he were a squatter he should defy the Government, for he should say to them, do the worst you can legally by virtue of the covenant in the leases, but the Government should not, merely because they had the power, call upon the Legislature to pass a law which was opposed to equity

Mr MILDRED moved that the House divide

Mr HAWKER rose at the same moment to move that the debate be adjourned till the following day

The latter motion was carried, and the House adjourned at 5 o clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

---

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o clock

KAPUNDA

Mr SHANNON presented a petition, several yards in length, and containing many hundred signatures of the residents of Kapunda, in reference to railway communication to the north, and the construction of a terminus at Section 1411

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT

Captain HART brought up the report of the Select Committee upon Longbottom's Bill The report was read, and stated that the Committee considered the preamble proved The hon member gave notice that on Friday next he should move the second reading of the Bill

THE LANDS TITLES REGISTRATION OFFICE

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on Friday next he should ask the Attorney-General if it was true that Mr Belt, one of the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners, had tendered his resignation and if so, whether there would be any objection to place the letter of resignation upon the table of the House The hon member also gave notice, that on the same day he should move there be laid on the table of the House copies of the report made by the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners to the Registrar-General, containing suggestions for the amendment of the Real Property Act

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS

Mr NEALES gave notice that on Friday next he should move the adoption of the report of the Committee upon the petition of Captain John Finnis

KAPUNDA

Mr SHANNON gave notice that on Friday next he should move the petition presented by him from the inhabitants of Kapunda be printed

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER placed upon the table of the House correspondence which had taken place relative to the want of accomodation for Committees of that House

WINE AND BEER LICENCES

Mr BAKEWELL having moved the House into Committee, moved that it was expedient that so much of the Licensed Victuallers Act as related to the issue of Wine and Beer Licences should be repealed He had intended to have brought in a Bill at once for the repeal of the portion of the Act referred to, but found that by a Standing Order of the House of Commons, by the practice of which House that House was bound, no resolution effecting an alteration of the law relating to trade could be considered, except in Committee of the whole House It was simply a matter of form, as after the resolution had been arrived at, it would be necessary to introduce a Bill which would, of course, have to go through the regular stages He would not further enter upon the question, but would leave the discussion to take place when the Bill was read a second time It was proposed by the Bill which would be introduced, so to alter the law as to do away altogether with wine and beer licences It was thought desirable that this should be arrived at from certain evidence which had been recently given before a Select Committee of the House That report, it was true, had not been adopted, nor indeed was it desirable from circumstances that it should be, but he would refer to one portion of the evidence which showed that the holders of wine and beer licences enjoyed many privileges which the holders of general licences did not, that their premises were not necessarily so large, that they were not compelled to have stables, nor was it necessary that they should have lights in front of their premises Nor were they subject to the surveillance of the police He thought that evidence alone was sufficient to induce the House to assent to the resolution which he had proposed, but he did not think that any substantial valid reason could be shewn why these licences should exist, and that the holders should enjoy the privileges which they at present enjoyed On the understanding that the discussion upon the Bill was to take place at the second reading, he would merely at present move that so much of the Licensed Victuallers' Act be repealed as related to the issue of wine and beer licences

Mr MILNE wished, before the question was put, to point out some difficulty which appeared to him likely to be created by the proposed alteration He cordially agreed that such licences should be done away with in large towns, and had expressed himself to that effect when the question was first mooted, but if an alteration were to be effected in the Licensed Victuallers' Act, he thought it should embrace such an alteration as would enable the Justices to grant licences in the out lying districts at a reduced rate He suggested there should be such an alteration, as there were many places in which parties could not afford to pay £25 for general licences It was desirable at the same time that licensed houses should exist in such localities for the convenience of travellers, and also for the purpose of relieving the neighbouring settlers from having their hospitality too much drawn upon Such licences he thought the House would agree should be granted at a reduced rate, and he would suggest that the motion of the hon member (Mr Bakewell) should embrace an alteration to the effect that the general licences in the outlying districts should be issued at a reduced rate He could not help commenting upon the nature of the evidence which had been taken before the Committee, although from his knowledge of the trade he really did not require any evidence to be afforded to him by a Select Committee to induce him to arrive at the conclusion that it was not desirable to have wine and beer licences in towns He did not think the Committee had called evidence of a proper character, as the witnesses merely consisted of two licensed victuallers and one Inspector of Police No one had been examined who was connected with the trade which it was proposed to abolish He thought some members of that trade should in common fairness have been called, as strong charges were brought against the respectability and morality of those who were connected with the trade Those establishments for which wine and beer licences had been granted were stigmatised as places where the grossest immorality was tolerated Whether these accusations were true or not he could not say, but he would say that in common fairness to those who would be affected by this resolution, and whose character had been so seriously attacked, some members of the trade should have been called, but they had not been

Mr BAKEWELL said, as a member of the Committee, he was enabled to state that no name had been mentioned, and therefore he did not think that any holder of a wine and beer licence had any reason to complain The witnesses who were examined had not more particularly alluded to individuals than hon members in that House had alluded to them The Committee called the most respectable parties they could think of to afford information upon the subject, and they considered the evidence very conclusive, so much so indeed that they felt it would have been waste of time to call further evidence It was certainly stated that some of this class of houses were improperly conducted but Upton's, in Rundle-street, and Barron's, in King William street, were spoken of as well conducted He was of opinion that the Committee had acted quite rightly in taking the course which they had, and he repeated that as there had been no mention of the name of any person no one had a right to complain With regard to the question alluded to by the hon member, Mr Milne, he thought that might be more properly dealt with when the Bill was before the House, but he did not think it would be right to embody it in the present Bill It had better form the subject of a separate amendment

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was surprised to hear the hon member for Barossa say that no evidence had been brought before the Committee which had not previously been stated in that House If the hon member had read the answer to question 45 he thought the hon member would have seen that a distinct class were named, and allusions were made to that class of such a character as he trusted he should never hear in that House He was exceedingly sorry that more evidence had not been taken in order that both sides of the question might be heard Although some of the establishments which formed the subject of the resolution before the House might be improperly conducted, it was quite possible that many of them might be equally well-conducted, as indeed it was admitted that some were It was for this reason that he was sorry more evidence had not been taken, but he was glad to learn from the hon member for Barossa that no names had been mentioned

Mr BAKEWELL said the evidence merely stated that certain Government officers of high respectability were in the habit of visiting such establishments, but as he had before stated no names were mentioned If Government officers chose to visit such establishments he did not see why they should be prevented, nor did he see why such indignation should have been exhibited by the Commissioner of Public Works It was possible those gentlemen might merely go there for refreshments, or it was possible that when there they might misconduct themselves but whether or not, as he had before said, no names had been mentioned, and he therefore did not see why the members of that class should complain He would however admit that the description of these establishments which he gave when he first brought the question before the House was not borne out by the evidence No doubt the witness who had made reference to Government officers who, as he had before stated, he did not think had any reason to complain, as no names were mentioned, would be prepared to support what he had stated, as he was a highly respectable person who had been connected with the police force for 20 years It was creditable to those houses which were respectably conducted that respectable parties should visit them (Laughter) The respectability of an establishment might be determined by the respectability of those who visited it, and he repeated that many of these particular establishments were considered highly respectable

Mr MCELLISTER had understood when the subject was formerly under discussion, that it had been admitted the issue of wine and beer licences was unjust to the holders of general licenses, who were called upon to pay a heavy tax for the general licence He did not see that any evidence which had been given before that Committee was at all calculated to alter that decision The Committee he believed were unanimously of opinion that wine and beer licences were not wanted If it were considered necessary that the names of the parties, Government officers and others, visiting such establishments should be obtained, no doubt they could easily get a great many, but it was not considered desirable that any names should be mentioned before the Committee He should certainly support the proposed alteration

Mr HARVEY thought that wine and beer licences might very well be done away with in Adelaide, but he did not think that it would be wise to abolish them in the country districts In many places in the interior such houses were absolutely necessary, although there was not sufficient business or population to support a general licence If none but general licences were issued, and the same amount now charged for them were exacted, the result would be that there would be very inadequate accommodation for travellers In Adelaide a different state of circumstances existed, as there were a great many houses holding general licences, and wine and beer licences were really of no advantage to the public, as the same prices were charged at both descriptions of houses, and consequently the holders of wine and beer licences, who were not subjected to nearly so much outlay as the holders of general licences, were placed in an advantageous position at the cost of those who contributed the largest amount to the revenue He was prepared to support such a proposition as that which had been made by the hon member, Mr Milne, but was certainly opposed to the total abolition of wine and beer licences both in town and country

The resolution having been carried, the House resumed and the report was adopted

THE HARBOR TRUST

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that he was desirous of helping forward the adjourned debate upon the Assessment on Stock, and he would therefore postpone till Wednesday next the motion in his name

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to appoint Henry Simpson, Esquire, one of the Trustees for improving the Harbor of Port Adelaide, in the place of E G Collinson, Esquire, resigned"

DISTRICT COUNCILS

The following motion in the name of Mr BURFORD lapsed, in consequence of the absence of that hon member—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return showing the number of acres of sold lands, the number of acres within District Councils, the number of square miles in runs, distinguishing those at 10s, 15s, and 20s, the amount of rates in Corporations and District Councils, the number of acres under 14 years' lease, including aboriginal reserves under lease, and rate per acre

CAPTAIN J F DUFF

Upon the motion of Mr BAKEWELL, the time granted to the Committee for bringing up a report upon the petition of Captain J F Duff was extended to Friday

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr MILNE stated that the Committee upon Railway Management were considering their report, and would, he believed, shortly conclude their labors, but, for fear of accidents, he had to ask for an extension of a fortnight to bring up the report

Granted

THE ESTIMATES

The following motion, in the name of Mr PEAKE, lapsed in consequence of the absence of that hon member —

"That this House considers it essentially useful to the exact performance of its duties, as guardians of the public purse, that the Estimates should be presented to this House within 14 days next following the meeting of Parliament"

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the consideration in Committee of the District Councils Act Amendment Bill was postponed

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS, the House went into Committee upon this Bill In clause 27 an alteration was made upon the suggestion of Mr Duffield reducing the charge mentioned therein, from one shilling to sixpence per mile. Clauses 28 to 30 were passed with verbal alterations Upon clause 32 being proposed, Mr DUFFIELD moved "That cows with calves or mares with foals which were suckling, should be regarded as one animal" He did so because he knew that poundkeepers were in the habit of selling the cow first, and the calf afterwards, and charging just the same as though cow and calf had been full grown animals

Dr WARK supported the proposition, remarking that he had been repeatedly applied to, to state whether a suckling should be sold with the mother, and he had always stated that he thought it was impossible they could be separated

Mr DUFFIELD'S proposition was carried

Clauses 32 to 39 were passed with verbal alterations

Upon clause 40 being proposed as follows —

40 It shall be lawful for the ranger appointed in that behalf by the Government, or by the Municipal Corporation or Council of any district constituted as aforesaid, to impound any cattle found trespassing upon the waste and unsold common lands of the Crown, or upon any road within any district, and it shall be lawful for any occupier of any fenced-in land, whether within such district or not, to impound any cattle found wandering, straying, being fed, although tailed, or lying on parts of the main or district roads immediately adjacent or fronting to the fenced-in land of such occupier, and the owner of such cattle shall pay for each of such cattle, if impounded, the fees specified in the Schedule hereto marked A, and also the rates for sustenance specified in the Schedule

hereto, marked B according to the description of such cattle, and the same cattle, and the money to arise from the sale thereof (if sold), shall remain and be subject to such and the same provisions as are by this Act made applicable to cattle impounded for damage by trespass, and to the money arising from the sale thereof.

MR STRANGWAYS said he had understood when the clause was under consideration some time back that the Attorney General had stated he would see if some alterations could not be made in it so as to prevent it from operating injuriously in the unsettled districts He thought that in districts in which a considerable quantity of the land was unfenced, but where there was perhaps one section fenced, the clause as it stood might operate most injuriously This would apply to the south particularly He confessed he did not see how the difficulty was to be got over, and would therefore suggest that it be postponed He agreed that the clause was likely to operate well in the settled districts

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL should oppose any postponement of the clause, but if the hon member (Mr Strangways) would bring forward any amendment, he should be happy to consider it If the hon member would state what was the precise nature of the amendment which he desired to introduce, he would endeavor to find phraseology for it, and then consider whether the proposition would really be an amendment or not This was particularly a matter for the consideration of the country members It was one upon which those who were acquainted with the requirements of particular districts were better capable of forming an opinion than the Attorney General He was not aware that passing the clause in its present form would be likely to lead to peculiar consequences in one or two districts different from the beneficial effects which it was admitted it would have in others, but if the hon member, Mr Strangways, would state exactly what his wishes were, he should be happy to assist him in carrying them out if possible

Mr STRANGWAYS hoped the House would agree to a postponement of the clause, in order that he might have time to consider the amendment

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS objected to any postponement, as since the Bill had been in Committee the various clauses had been carefully considered by him, and he was satisfied they would meet all the requirements of the country

Mr LINDSAY certainly considered that the clause required alteration

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that the latter portion should be struck out, and he would give notice of an additional clause to the effect that this portion of the Bill should not operate in any district except by proclamation under the hand of the Governor

Dr WARK protested against any postponement of the Bill, which had already occupied the House for a considerable time, and the sense of the House had been fully taken upon it, more particularly upon that portion which was now under discussion

Mr MILNE thought there was not so much difficulty as might appear at first sight, as if the District Councils told the Ranger not to make impoundings, of course he would not do so

Mr STRANGWAYS said the District Councils had no power in the matter, as any owner of fenced-in land might bring the clause into operation in the district in which such land was situated He would suggest that the clause should have no effect in any district unless it were brought into operation by the Governor's proclamation, upon the application of the District Council of such district

Mr LINDSAY again urged the postponement of the clause, remarking that if there were such a quantity of grass upon the roads as to render parties desirous of depasturing cattle there, they could not be regarded as roads He would point out to the hon member (Mr Milne) that the power of impounding was not left only with the Ranger, but that any person might impound cattle from the roads He would appeal to parties connected with the squatting interest to state what effect the clause would have in its present form Any malicious person might render the land leased by the squatters perfectly valueless In reference to trespasses upon roads, an instance had come under his own observation in which an animal had been maliciously impounded upon the plea that it had been trespassing upon a road, but when the case came on for hearing, it turned out that it was impossible to prove there was any such road in existence

Mr STRANGWAYS moved an addition to the clause—

"Provided this shall not apply to any district not brought under the operations of this Act by proclamation in the South Australian Government Gazette"

Mr MILDRED hoped that the clause would be allowed to stand as read, as the Bill had already taken up a large portion of the time of the House, and he trusted the House would speedily bring their labors in connection with the Bill to a conclusion, as he was convinced that it was well adapted for the public benefit

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 41 was as follows —

41 If any cattle shall be found trespassing upon any unfenced land after the expiration of three days after notice not to trespass upon any such land by or on behalf of the owner or occupier thereof shall have been served upon the owner of such cattle, or left for him at his last known place of abode, or after fourteen days notice not to trespass on such land, describing the same by the numbers of the sections, or other precise and accurate description, shall have been inserted in the South Australian Government Gazette, the owner or occupier of such land may lawfully demand and recover in respect of such cattle, one-fourth of the same rate as though the land upon which such cattle shall be found trespassing, were enclosed with a fence, and the owner of such unfenced land shall be authorised to recover by action, as and for ordinary damage, by trespass of cattle, one-fourth only of the rate specified in the schedule hereto marked B, according to the description of cattle trespassing, and according to the description of land and crop mentioned in the same schedule

Mr LINDSAY said he had understood it was the intention of the Attorney-General to remodel this clause His principle objection to the clause was that if the onus of keeping cattle off unfenced land rested with the owners of the cattle, it appeared strange that the owner of the land should only be able to recover one-fourth of the damage, why should he not recover the whole as in any other case? If he had any kind of sham fence, the whole amount could be recovered, and, in fact, the whole thing appeared to him so monstrously absurd, that he wondered how any persons possessed of common sense could support it as it at present stood Why should a man with a mere apology for a fence be placed in a better position than a man who did not put up any at all till he was in a position to put up a good one? He never sought redress from the law, in consequence of his fences having been broken through, but if they were broken, he considered they were bad, and put up others The practical effect of the clause would be, that parties would put up cattle traps in order to recover the full damage The only protection which persons with fences required, was against exceptional animals which were habitual fence-breakers, and which should, he considered, be as much prohibited as bulls or entire horses. Some working bullocks were habitual fence-breakers, and were as great nuisances as bulls or entire horses A great many persons in the country got their living by putting up cattle-traps in preference to cultivating the ground, and were enabled to make a better living by it, in consequence of defects in the Impounding Act The country members so frequently endeavoured without effect to amend the objectionable parts of the Act, that he had almost considered it useless to attempt further, but he had prepared a clause, which he begged to move as an amendment upon the one under discussion —

"The ordinary damages for trespass shall, in all cases, be (one farthing?) for each head of cattle, whether the property trespassed upon be fenced or unfenced, pasture or under crop but if it shall be proved that any animal shall have broken or leaped over a fence consisting of strong posts of not less than seven inches wide, and three and a half inches thick, and three strong rails firmly fixed, the upper edge of the top rail feet (four feet?) inches (nine inches?) from the ground, and the upper edge of the second and lower rails feet inches (three feet three inches?) and feet inches (one foot nine inches?) from the ground respectively, the owner or person in charge of such animal shall, for the first offence, forfeit and pay a fine of not less than (one pound?) nor more than pounds (five pounds?) for suffering such animal to run at large, and not less than pounds (five pounds?) nor more than pounds (ten pounds?) for every subsequent offence."

It appeared to him from looking at the Bill that the District Councils had made certain suggestions which had been adopted, and the squatters had made suggestions which had been adopted, although some of these were quite antagonistic and irreconcilable That would account for the Bill being as they now found it

The amendment was negatived and the clause was passed as printed with verbal amendments

Upon clause 43 being read as follows —

43 It shall not be lawful for any person to suffer any cattle belonging to him or under his charge to stray, or be at large, or to be tethered or depastured in any street or public place within any town or village, and any person who shall so offend, shall incur a penalty not exceeding two pounds, such penalty to be recovered by any person duly appointed for that purpose, and it shall be lawful for any person to seize and impound in the nearest pound, any such cattle as aforesaid, there to be detained, and to remain subject to the provisions of this Act, in like manner as cattle impounded when found wandering or straying at large upon main or district roads Provided that this clause shall not apply to any town or village, which shall not have been brought under the operation thereof by Proclamation in the South Australian Government Gazette,

Mr STRANGWAYS considered that it should be left to the Justice to determine what was a good and substantial fence, otherwise it would be necessary to take up two or three pages in defining what good and substantial fences really were He thought it would be better to leave the Justices to decide than to attempt by any legislation to define what a good and sufficient fence was The Attorney-General, he was quite sure, would see that there were various ways in which this clause could be evaded For instance, a cattle trap might be erected 11 feet high, and the posts might not be more than two inches in diameter, so that any old cow might knock them down at once

Mr Lindsay, though he agreed to a great extent with the hon member who had just spoken, had a strong objection to leaving the Justices to decide what was a good and substantial fence The great difficulty at the Local Courts was in determining what was a good and sufficient fence Six witnesses probably swore that it was, and as many more that it was not. Although it was felt that the fact of an animal having broken through was prima facie evidence that the fence was not good and sufficient, still there were, as he had previously stated, exceptional animals who would break fences, so that the fact of fences having been broken must not always be taken as proof that the fences were insufficient Generally speaking, however, where cattle constantly trespassed the fences were bad The evidence upon the point was generally so extremely contradictory that the result was very unsatisfactory He had been particularly requested by numerous parties resident in the country districts, when the Impounding Act was under discussion, not to allow that portion which related to fencing to pass without the fullest discussion The experience of 20 years had taught him that, generally speaking, a two-rail fence was not a good and sufficient one Again, he considered four feet from the ground too low A horse would have a strong temptation to leap such a fence , and if the top rail were placed as high as it should be, then the space between the rails was so great that it was a strong inducement to cattle to go through He believed that it was necessary to have a good and sufficient fence, that there should be three rails He hoped they would have the sense of the House as to what a good and sufficient fence ought to be Let them do their best to define it, and then the country would have nothing to complain of, but he protested against assenting to the Bill merely because it was introduced by the Government nor did he believe that the House would be doing its duty by taking that course, particularly as the Government did not profess to understand the question He regretted that so many country members were absent, but probably, though satisfied of the impolicy of the Bill, they thought it would be useless to oppose it, and therefore determined upon permitting it to pass without discussion

Mr Dunn was in favor of leaving the quality of the fence to be determined by the Justices who were called upon to decide cases of trespass In many parts of the country it would be out of the question to construct fences of posts and rails, but still there was material at hand to construct a good substantial fence with In many places parties were erecting stone walls, and in others fences were constructed of small timber He thought the present wording of the clause would tend to confuse those who were called upon to pronounce judgment in reference to the quality of the fence It had been proved that in many cases two-rail fences were better than three, and in many cases for horse paddocks only one rail was used

Dr Wark considered the clause required amendment, as it comprehended only one class of fences, either rails or wires The last speaker had shown that other descriptions might be and were used In many places there were log fences, which were ultimately used for firewood, and these were the best of all fences Then there were others made of stone, and there were live fences which were certainly most beautifying to the country, and he thought parties should be encouraged to construct such fences He moved that all the words after "ground" be struck out

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said he had inserted this clause in the Bill, at the particular request of the hon member for Kapunda (Mr Shannon), who had drawn his attention to the necessity of defining if possible what a good fence was He had endeavoured to elicit the opinion of the House upon the subject The hon gentleman amended the clause by striking out a portion, and inserting the words, "of good and substantial fences or enclosures," remarking that it would then be for the Magistrates before whom the case was brought, to determine the quality of the fence

Mr Hawker thought this alteration would meet the case, and remarked that in the Victorian Act the description of fence was not mentioned, but there was no provision for greater damages upon the land "not securely enclosed" than upon that not cultivated

Mr Duffield supported the proposition of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and remarked, in reference to the observation of the hon member for Encounter Bay, that there was no use in country members bringing forward amendments in this Bill, that he (Mr Duffield) considered himself a country member, and amendments suggested by him were always carefully considered, and frequently adopted If the hon member, in bringing forward an amendment, were not to mystify it so much by so many speeches, it was quite possible that it might receive more attention from the House

Mr Milne thought it would be as well to introduce a provision in the clause to enable the District Councils to declare what was a good and sufficient fence He thought that any person resident in the district should be enabled to call upon the District Council to decide whether his fence was good and sufficient The District Council would receive a fee for inspecting the fence, and after being satisfied that the fence was really good and sufficient, they could give a certificate to that effect, and the production of that certificate should be considered sufficient evidence as to the quality of the fence

Mr Strangways intimated that he wished the words which he had proposed to be in addition to the amendments proposed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands That is, he wished it to be left to the Justices to determine whether the fence was good and sufficient

The Commissioner of Crown Lands did not object to this amendment

Mr Lindsay said the very difficulty was in determining what was a good and sufficient fence He remembered a case which came before the Port Elliot Court, and ultimately before the Supreme Court , and the result was that the decision given by the Judge of the Supreme Court was quite as unsatisfactory as that which had been previously given He had an interview with His Honor upon the subject, and His Honor stated that in determining the question they must be guided by the custom in the district the custom in the particular locality (Laughter) The Court before which the case was originally brought could not determine the question, as half a-dozen witnesses swore one way and half-a-dozen the other , and the Judge of the Supreme Court at last stated that they must be guided by the custom of the district (Laughter) He would call the attention of the House to a paper which had been placed upon the table, containing suggestions from the District Councils and poundkeepers, a document of which, probably, many hon members were as ignorant as though it had never been there

Mr Milne brought forward an amendment to the effect that it should be competent for a resident within the boundaries of a District Council to call upon such Council to determine whether his fence was good and sufficient, and if so, that the District Council should issue a certificate to that effect, which should be received as evidence of such fact in Courts of Law

The Attorney-General pointed out an objection to this proposition, inasmuch as this was not a matter between an individual and the public, but between two individuals It would be very wrong that private individuals should be deprived of their rights because a District Council had made an error The private rights of individuals ought not to be dependent upon the decision of a District Council

Mr Shannon pointed out another objection to the proposition, as though the fence might be very good at the time the certificate was given it might, from fire or something of the kind, be in a very different state shortly afterwards

Mr Milne withdrew his proposition, and the clause with the amendments proposed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Mr Strangways was carried

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands the date at which the Bill should take effect was altered from the 1st of January to the 1st of March

Upon the schedules being brought under consideration, an alteration was made upon the suggestion of the Attorney General, preventing the poundkeeper from making an additional charge to one day's sustenance till the expiration of 24 hours from the impounding of the cattle

An amendment was made, upon the suggestion of Mr Duffield, rendering cattle liable to trespass for getting upon land from which the grain had been cropped but not removed The hon member remarked that he was aware of cases which this amendment was intended to reach, in which considerable damage had been done by cattle, and yet the parties injured could obtain no redress

Mr Hay proposed that the charge per day for the sustenance of any horse, mare or gelding be increased from ninepence to one shilling He thought it would also be well if a clause were introduced giving the District Councils power to alter the scale of charges as circumstances rendered necessary

Mr Shannon would be happy to support the proposition if the hon member for Gumeracha would convince him that the horses would really receive threepennyworth additional food if the charge were raised, but he was afraid that would not be the case In the majority of cases the poundkeepers, in fact, gave the animals no food at all, but merely turned them out for a short time Independently of the ninepence per day, there was the sixpence a day for poundage fees, making a total of fifteen pence per day upon every animal impounded , and this very soon mounted up to the value of the animals He believed that in the generality of cases animals were shamefully treated by poundkeepers, and that they would not be treated any better if threepence per head extra were allowed

Mr Hay admitted that he had not had much to do with poundkeepers, but those who had appeared to have a "down" upon them He thought it would be only fair that the poundkeepers should be allowed a fair price for the sustenance of the animals before they were charged with starving them

The Commissioner of Crown Lands pointed out that, by the third clause, the District Councils had the power of varying the charges

Mr Lindsay did not think that the hon member for Gumeracha understood the objection in its full force, which he (Mr Lindsay) formerly raised in reference to an alteration in the charge for fodder He admitted that the District Councils had the power to alter the charges, but the process was so slow and tedious, occupying some weeks, perhaps months, that the probability was by the time the change had been effected the necessity for it had ceased to exist. The whole difficulties in connection with the Impounding Act arose from the Government not having examined the question sufficiently before legislating upon it. There was an Act passed in England, not many years ago, to be applied to Ireland, the object being to put a stop to parties vexatiously impounding; and if the members of the Government had read that Act they need not have gone to France or Belgium or anywhere else, where legislation upon this question was so much better than elsewhere. Although some hon. members might consider the residents of the Emerald Isle semi-savages, he was sure the hon. the Chairman did not entertain that opinion. (Laughter.)

Mr. STRANGWAYS would like, if the hon. the Attorney-General was not too much engaged with the last number of Punch, to ask the hon. gentleman's opinion upon Schedule D, as he found that the trespass fee chargeable upon cattle for trespassing in a grass meadow was one shilling per head, whilst upon a growing crop it was half-a-crown. Now it appeared to him that a grass meadow was a growing crop.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if the hon. member desired any amendment he should be happy to give it his consideration, but he was not aware that any amendment was required, "growing crop" being used to imply something cultivated, in contradistinction to grass, which was the natural product of the land. He was not aware that any practical difficulty was likely to arise.

Mr. MILDRED drew the attention of the Attorney-General to the penalties under the head of "growing crops," remarking that when animals got in they frequently did such damage that no amount would indemnify the party who sustained the mischief. There were many parties residing a short distance from Adelaide who were subject to the trespasses of small lots of sheep kept by butchers. As the trespass-fee for a goat was five shillings, he would suggest that the trespass for a sheep should be raised from half-a-crown to five shillings.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL pointed out that the charges which were named were those which might be made without any proof of damage. If, however, the party whose property had been trespassed upon could prove a greater amount of damage, a greater amount than that named could be imposed. He questioned, however, whether they ought to make animals liable for a larger amount than that named, without any proof of damage whatever. If the amount named were all that the party could recover he should probably go for a much larger amount, but as the sums named did not preclude a claim for actual damage done, he was opposed to any alteration.

The schedules were passed as printed, the House resumed, the Bill was reported, and the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for the following Friday.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—RESUMPTION OF DEBATE.

Mr. HAWKER said he had refrained until now from addressing the House because he was anxious to hear the opinions of hon. members on the reintroduction of the second reading of this Bill, after they had had the opportunity of reading over the evidence given before the Select Committee and the report which accompanied that evidence. He had delayed partly for that reason and partly in consequence of a suggestion thrown out in the speech of the hon. the Attorney-General, in reference to a proposed compact which the squatters might be disposed to accept. It would not do for him (Mr. Hawker) to have at once addressed the House on that proposal before he had had time for consideration, or until he had time to see some of the leading squatters out of the House, and ascertain the opinions of these gentlemen upon the matter. He had delayed for these reasons as if he had immediately either rejected or accepted the offer, he might be either sacrificing the interests of his constituents on the one hand, or on the other hand making a factious opposition to some amendment or alteration of the Bill which would meet the difficulties of the case and be acceptable not merely to the squatters but also to the people in general. But he could not allow some remarks of the hon. the Attorney-General and the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and some other hon. members who had spoken during the last two days, to pass without making a few observations in reply. He quite agreed in the opinion of the House that the hon. the Attorney-General had made a most eloquent speech. It was impossible to listen to that hon. member's lucid explanations of the legal portions of the case without having to some extent forced upon one's mind a conviction of the truth of his (the Attorney-General's) views. He (Mr. Hawker) regretted that he could not altogether agree in the opinions of the hon. member, but there was far more doubt now upon his mind as to whether the hon. member was not right than there was before he had made that address. (Hear, hear.) Still he (Mr. Hawker) thought it quite possible, that when the Orders in Council were framed, the assessment might have been put on for local purposes meaning in the same sense as the county rates in England or the county cess in Ireland. But the hon. member had only taken up one point in the case, judging by his speech on the first attempt at the second reading, and that was the legal point, and that point was not of such importance that it should totally override the equity of the matter. (Hear, hear.) The hon. the Attorney-General did not make the slightest allusion to the equity of the case or as to whether when the leases were granted there was an understanding on the part of the Government and the squatters that the rent was to be instead of an assessment, and was to constitute the entire payment for the duration of the lease, a period of 14 years. When the hon. the Attorney-General first addressed the House, in alluding to this legal view of the case, he said that there was also a moral view to be considered under which it might assume a different aspect, or words to that effect. The hon. member also said that if any person could come forward and say that when he agreed to give 10s. a square mile for the right to depasture stock on Crown lands, that his agreement was made on the understanding and faith that the Legislature would not impose any further assessment during the period of the leases, except for local purposes, he (the Attorney-General) considered that that person would have a claim to consideration. (Hear, hear.) But in his address on Friday, the Attorney-General had never alluded to this statement at all. (Hear, hear.) Yet he (Mr. Hawker) was still of opinion that so far as the equity of the matter was concerned this particular case had occurred. (Hear, hear.) He believed that, morally speaking, the squatters should not be called upon to pay the assessment proposed in the Bill as now introduced. In support of this argument, when the Select Committee was appointed by the House, and the evidence was about to be taken, he had endeavoured in the best way he could to bring persons who were well informed on the subject before the Committee. Independently of the statements of Mr. Bonney and every other stockholder who had taken out a lease shortly after the time of their being issued, he was told, accidentally, that Mr. Torrens knew something upon the subject. He could not remember to which member of the Committee he had spoken but he suggested that Mr. Torrens should be called before the Committee as a witness. If he had been aware that the present Treasurer (Mr. Finnis) was Chief Secretary at the time of the leases being issued, he should have asked to have that hon. gentleman examined also, as his (Mr. Hawker's) object was not, as had been insinuated by the hon. member for the Port (Captain Hart), that the squatters wished to burke the evidence, but to bring all possible evidence before the Committee, and let them judge fairly of the case. He did not believe that any cause could be benefitted by a portion of the evidence being kept in the dark. (Hear, hear.) One portion of the hon. the Attorney-General's address which he most objected to was that he had never gone into the equitable portion of the case, but stated that the squatters founded all their opinions on what was said by Mr. Bonney. Instead of trying to prove this the hon. member only attempted to damage the character of Mr. Bonney, and to throw discredit on that gentleman's evidence. Hon. members would remember that last year they had heard the opinions of Mr. Bonney. The hon. the Attorney-General commenced his allusions to that gentleman by saying that it was well known that Mr. Bonney entertained republican opinions. But if the private opinions of members of the Government were to be called in question and their efficiency doubted in this way, there might be many members of the Government found whose opinions on political or social matters would not bear stricter enquiry. It was, therefore, ill-advised to try to establish a case by crying a man down in this manner and trying to injure the character of a gentleman who was now absent from the colony, but upon whose evidence in this matter the squatters chiefly depended. All through the talented and learned exposition of the hon. the Attorney-General, wherever he alluded to Mr. Bonney it was in the same disparaging manner. "That gentleman was not the Government." (Hear, hear.) "He was not authorized by the Government." "He was not the agent of the Government in the matter." (Hear, hear.) In fact, he had nothing to do with the matter; he was only "a tool" and always took the part of the squatters, whether they were right or whether they were wrong," and that, as the speech read in the papers, or would be understood by persons out of doors through bribery, because the hon. member (the Attorney-General) had said that "Mr. Bonney had reaped the reward of his virtue in the contribution of the squatters." (Hear, hear.) This was the opinion expressed by the hon. the Attorney-General in the House on Friday last. This was his statement respecting a gentleman who for many years was the only means of communication between the squatters and the Government. There was absolutely no other means whatever of communicating with the Government. Mr. Bonney had such power that he could at any time resume runs. The only appeal of the squatters against his doing so was to the Governor, and whenever such an appeal was made it was referred back to Mr. Bonney. Yet, the hon. the Attorney-General said that this gentleman was "a mere tool," "an official," and that all his conversations respecting the waste lands were mere gossiping conversations. Mr. Bonney was the only medium of communication between the Governor and the squatters, and therefore these statements of the hon. the Attorney-General insinuated what was not the case. It struck him (Mr. Hawker) as curious, that the hon. the Attorney-General should come to these conclusions when Mr.

Bonney was not in the colony or in that House. If Mr Bonney were in his place in that House, the hon the Attorney-General, would not take the liberty of making such observations. He would read a portion of the speech of Mr Bonney in the House last year, on the occasion of the hon the Attorney-General attempting to throw out the Torrens' Ministry, and when, singularly enough, the gentleman who seconded the motion of the Attorney-General, was Mr Bonney himself. Mr Bonney said—"He was responsible for the recent regulations. In New South Wales there was unlimited power to tax the squatters. He objected to that, as it was not fair to the squatter to keep him liable to an uncertain amount of taxation, and the South Australian regulations were altered in that respect. He intended to have given the power of taxation for local purposes, meaning that when the colony was divided into districts, the residents should bear the district expenses to the relief of the general revenue. Persons would not build on an uncertain tenure or risk their capital if they were liable to indefinite taxation. It had been said the squatters did not pay their fair share to the revenue. They paid £20,000 a year, and their expenditure was £350,000 a year, which being principally spent in wages, the greater portion of it was spent in such articles as spirits and tobacco, which contributed largely to the revenue. Then the stockholders scarcely used the roads in many of the districts." It seemed to him (Mr Hawker) very extraordinary that the gentleman who had been spoken of in that sneering sarcastic manner which the hon the Attorney-General knew so well how to make use of—(laughter)—should have been the gentlemen selected to second so important a motion as the one of last session for turning out the Ministry. It was strange that the hon the Attorney-General should have stood by and heard that gentleman make statements which the Attorney-General must have known were not true. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr Hawker) would say that the position of the hon the Attorney-General was a very false one, and that on due consideration that hon member would regard it as such himself. Then, the hon the Attorney-General, when he came in his speech to the evidence of Mr Torrens, said he must approach it with a great deal of caution, or rather hesitation. (Laughter.) The only reason he (Mr Hawker) could detect—and it was a good deal the opinion out of doors amongst those who had read the strictures of the hon member on Messrs Bonney and Torrens was, that it required no hesitation or caution to approach the evidence of Mr Bonney, inasmuch as 16,000 miles of ocean rolled between the hon the Attorney-General and that gentleman, whereas in the case of Mr Torrens there was only 18 inches of stone wall intervening—(laughter)—and it was well known that Mr Torrens was a hot-tempered and irascible Irishman—(laughter)—who was not likely to receive an affront from the hon the Attorney-General, or any other hon member of the House, without resenting it. He could therefore understand how the hon the Attorney-General approached the evidence of Mr Torrens with such hesitation. In calling Mr Torrens before the Committee he had only endeavored to obtain the best light he could upon the subject before them, and if he could have got any other witnesses he should have called them.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to order. The hon member was imputing personal cowardice to him (the Attorney-General). The language could be taken in no other way. He asked the hon member, through the Speaker, whether he meant his words in that sense?

Mr HAWKER understood, from the way in which the case as put in the papers——

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—The hon member has used language which can bear only one interpretation. He accuses me of personal cowardice and I ask, through you, Sir, does the hon member mean that?

Mr HAWKER did not mean to impute personal cowardice to the hon member, but he referred to the speech delivered in the House. No one could dream of personal cowardice in the case of the Attorney-General, but what he (Mr Hawker) meant was, that the hon member should have been more cautious in approaching the question of Mr Bonney's evidence. When the hon member said he approached the evidence of Mr Torrens with hesitation, he himself pointed to the conclusion to which he (Mr Hawker) had referred.

The SPEAKER said the hon member (Mr Hawker) in his allusions had drawn the attention of the House markedly to the fact that the hon the Attorney-General was influenced by personal motives. The hon member had therefore gone beyond the bounds of order altogether.

Mr HAWKER resumed. It was not his intention to have gone beyond the bonds of order, but he was sometimes rather impetuous and acted like an Irishman himself. But now, before going into the evidence he should make a few remarks as to the appointment and composition of the Committee. When the Committee was appointed it was not intended to take the evidence of squatters alone. He (Mr Hawker) thought from the expressions of opinion of many hon members, the hon member for West Torrens and others who were present, that it was the wish of these hon members to have not only the whole case of the squatters before them, but if the Government could throw any light upon the matter they should show their side of the case also. The hon Commissioner of Crown Lands and he (Mr Hawker) were placed at the top of the list, and it was thought that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would look after the interests of the people generally, whilst he (Mr Hawker) would endeavor to bring forward such evidence as would support the statements made on behalf of the squatters in the House. He (Mr Hawker) believed that all these statements were very successfully proved. He (Mr Hawker) had called Mr Torrens as a witness, because he found that that gentleman knew something about the matter, as he was consulted by Sir Henry Young and had several interviews with Sir Henry Young on the subject. He had since seen Mr Torrens, and that gentleman had informed him that he believed the present hon Treasurer (Mr Finniss) was present at several of these consultations, and if he (Mr Hawker) had known this in time he should have called upon the hon member (the Treasurer) also.

The TREASURER must state that he had not the slightest recollection nor did he believe that he was present at any such consultations.

Mr HAWKER only repeated what had been told to him. The hon the Attorney-General had remarked that the hon the Treasurer had not been called, but if that hon member could give any evidence in favor of the Bill, he should have come forward and given it, and therefore the argument of the Attorney-General told against his own side. It was expected that the hon the Commissioner of Crown lands would have also told what he knew upon the subject, but he had not done so. It also happened that in taking down the evidence the gentleman who reported it was rather deaf, and one portion of the evidence was omitted, in which Mr Torrens said that he could not be sure whether he was Collector of Customs or Treasurer at the time of the leases being issued, but that he was consulted respecting them. He (Mr Torrens) stated that the matter was discussed between himself, Mr Bonney, and Sir Henry Young, and that his opinion tallied with that of the squatters, who, to a man, believed that they would have to pay nothing for their leases beyond the rent, except for local or district purposes. In his speech on Friday last the hon the Attorney-General had alluded to what he termed a compact. The hon member said that he understood the great objection of the squatters to the assessment was, that they believed it was only "the thin end of the wedge," and that perhaps some compromise might be made which would induce the squatters to assent to the assessment. He (Mr Hawker) did not like to express any opinion at that time, but he would do so now. He believed the hon the Attorney-General was right in his opinion on this matter. Although the squatters considered that in the Bill as now introduced an injustice not legally but morally would be done them, still their principal objection was, that they believed it would be "the thin end of the wedge," and that if it was introduced, the House would be perpetually adding to the assessment until squatting property would not be worth holding. He would allude to one other point in the speech, which he thought arose from some misapprehension. He was afraid that the terms which the hon member proposed one day, he was inclined to withdraw on another day. The hon member said if the squatters would not come into terms, he, as a member of the Government, would take such steps as would be legal to compel them to give way, and compared the discussion as to the meaning of leases with the French revolution or the American war of independence, and prophesied that it would end in the ruin of the squatters. He thought that in making allusion to what the hon the Attorney-General had said in reference to Mr Bonney, that it would have been unfair on his part to sit by and listen to such assertions respecting a gentleman who held as high a character as any Government officer in the colony, but with this exception, he had no objection to make to the hon the Attorney-General's advocacy of his cause. He would now make some remarks on statements made by the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands in the House. He (Mr Hawker) could not agree with that hon member that he was not bound to call any witnesses. For the first day or two of the Committee's sitting, the hon member seemed uncertain how to act. When he (Mr Hawker) was called upon to state whom he would wish to examine, he put down a long list of names from which he was to make a selection. This list included the names of the Hon Wm Younghusband and Mr J B Hughes. To the best of his (Mr Hawker's) recollection, the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands asked, "What do you want of Mr Younghusband?" He (Mr Hawker) replied that, if Mr Younghusband did not wish to be called, he (Mr Hawker) would not insist on calling him, as he did not want to embarrass the Government. Mr Younghusband was not called, and he (Mr Hawker) also struck out the names of Mr J B Hughes and others.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that although the hon member (Mr Hawker) might be under that impression——

The SPEAKER said the hon member was out of order.

Mr HAWKER said he might be wrong as to the hon Commissioner of Crown Lands having spoken to him on the subject, but not as to his having put down the names of Messrs Younghusband and Hughes, nor as to the fact that at the suggestion of some member of the Committee he struck the names of these gentlemen off. His impression had been that it was at the suggestion of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands. He knew that one day when on the sitting of the Committee the Chairman asked whom he should call in the morning, and he (Mr Hawker) suggested to the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands to call Mr Ferguson, whom he had said it was his intention to summon But the hon member did not wish to call that gentleman, so that it was manifest he did not want to call any evidence The hon the Attorney-General said the Government did not call evidence because they did not want any, and the Commissioner of Crown Lands said because there was not time to examine witnesses But his (Mr Hawker's) witnesses were called, and if the hon member wished to call his, and there was not time for both, then the number on both sides would have been curtailed But there was one other point which he (Mr Hawker) would call attention to, and that was the difference between the hon member's address of this year and that of last year In seconding the second reading of the Bill the hon member said that having satisfied any doubts which he might have as to the legal points of the Bill, he should most cordially support it, because he considered that the occupiers of the Waste Lands never contributed to the revenue in proportion to the benefits which they derived from the lands The hon member also said that there was nothing in his speech then at all different from any speech he had made on the subject He (Mr Hawker) would now quote a report of a speech of the hon Commissioner of Land and Works, when he was not Commissioner—when he was with the outs, and not with the ins The passage was—"He (Mr Dutton) regretted the lamentable blindness exhibited by his colleague (Mr Burford) when he said that stock-holders did not pay anything like a fair proportion to the public burdens" (Great laughter) The hon member had changed his opinions, since he left the opposition and entered the Elysian fields on that (the Government) side of the House (Laughter) For the hon member (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) went on to show in the most forcible and convincing manner they paid as reported by Mr Bonney £350,000 to the revenue, that directly and indirectly the squatters benefitted the country—the number of ships which came here on account of the squatting interest, the quantity of produce they consumed, and the large amount of money spent by the sailors and others who came out in the vessels—and that considering all these things the squatters contributed their fair share to the expenditure of the country The hon member (Mr Dutton) saw at once that the hon member Mr Burford was in a state of Egyptian darkness—(loud laughter)—and he proceeded to set that hon member right If he (Mr Hawker) had made the speech himself, he could not have put it into stronger language than the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had done last year The hon the Attorney-General had defended himself when he was accused by the hon member for the Port as not acting in the way in which that hon member could expect, and when one or two coarse minded individuals accused the Government of having sold them (Laughter) But he (Mr Hawker) thought that the Government found that the evidence was so overwhelming that they could not combat that of Messrs Taylor, Brown, and Hallett, whose words no man could dream of disputing, and so they (the Government) considered that discretion was the better part of valor, and called no witnesses at all The hon Commissioner of Crown Lands indeed said he had discovered that the value of stock without a run was one-half the value of stock with a run But the only other place in which he (Mr Hawker) had seen that statement was in a new publication called Allen's Twopenny Trash (Much laughter) When he purchased the first number of that publication he thought he might be wrong in supposing that the statement did not appear in the evidence of the Committee, and he accordingly looked over the evidence But he could not find the statement, although in the Twopenny Trash the writer had called attention to it in letters six times as long as the remaining letters (Laughter) However, when he found the statement confirmed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, as if that hon member had written the article—(immense laughter)—he (Mr Hawker) thought it time to look into the evidence again for fear he should have overlooked that portion So that morning being on two Committees, and finding that he could not attend both, he went to neither, but looked over the evidence (Laughter) In question 170, he found the following question put to the hon Mr Baker—"What is the relative value of stock with a run and without a run?" The answer was "That depends on circumstances" Again, question 208 put to Mr Torrens was, "What would in your opinion be the relative value of say 10,000 sheep with a run and the same sheep without a run?" Answer—"All things should be valued separately and distinct from one another The sheep have their value, and the run has its value" Again in question 300, Mr Taylor is asked "Would you consider sheep without a run to be worth half as much as sheep with a run?" Answer—"They are worth very much more to a person who purchases them, and who has an object in making the purchase Question, "Then consequently sheep with a run are more valuable to the owner than sheep without a run? Answer "Yes, sheep with a run are more valuable than sheep without a run" But he (Mr Hawker) would call attention to an answer of Mr Brown to question 396, which he thought would settle the matter Mr Brown said "Store sheep are worth 12s per head, and mixed flocks 18s I sold a run with 13,000 sheep at that rate, and I have expended more than £2,000 on that run" Thus Mr Brown considered the sheep, with an improved run to be worth 14s 11d against 12s without a run, and he (Mr Hawker) had sold that gentlemen after the shearing season a flock at that rate He thought hon members would find nothing else in the evidence on this point There was one more reply to a question put to Mr Torrens to which he would refer In reply to what the runs were worth, that gentleman said the rent should be from £80,000 to £100,000 He (Mr Hawker) found on making a calculation, that this would be as much as the entire profits of the runs to the holders of them, and he had spoken to Mr Torrens on the subject That gentleman explained that he did not allude to the 24,000 square miles at present under lease, but to the whole country not sold when the leases were issued Mr Torrens meant that with good management, meaning if all the District Councils were left without pasturage, such a rental might be raised, though even this was doubtful, The truth was that both the question and answer were misunderstood The hon member next expressed his regret that Mr Hughes had not been called, inasmuch as the change in that gentleman's opinions had taken place since he retired from squatting pursuits He (Mr Hawker) would now state the course which he meant to adopt in reference to the proposal of the hon the Attorney-General That hon member had suggested whether a compact could not be made He was quite willing to acknowledge that the House had the power to put on any assessment it pleased The law authorized it, and his (Mr Hawker's) only doubt was whether the House could do it consistently with the agreement already made with the squatters It was now suggested that no further opposition should be offered to the Bill on the part of the squatters, and on the part of the Government that the old leases should be taken up and new leases issued with the assessment endorsed thereon, as a final payment for the remainder of the term, except such taxes as might be raised for local purposes, or what he had spoken of as local taxation Of course if there was a general tax upon all the land of the country, or an income tax, the squatters would be as liable to it as any other individual (Hear, hear) The hon member (Mr Neales) whom no one would accuse of suggesting anything unfair towards the country generally, had said that he was always opposed to putting the runs up to auction This had always been a vexatious question, for it was always held in terrorem over the heads of the squatters that towards the close of their leases they must either get rid of their stock, or run the risk of being compelled to pay an exorbitant price for their runs The hon member (Mr Neales) had proposed that there should be valuations of the runs, and that the squatters should take them at these valuations The hon member for Noarlunga (Mr Mildred) had proposed the same, and he (Mr Hawker) believed that the valuations should be made at intervals of seven years He believed these arrangements would meet the wishes of the squatters (Hear, hear) He thought both the doing away with the leases and the introduction of valuations would be endorsed by the House and accepted by the squatters Supposing the House would agree to carry out these alterations in good faith he was prepared to withdraw his opposition to the Bill He would accede to the proposal of the hon the Attorney-General, and hon members on that side of the House, and use his utmost efforts to carry this measure, which he felt assured would prove beneficial to the country and satisfactory alike to the squatters and the people of South Australia.

The TREASURER said that before the debate closed he would make a few comments upon remarks which had fallen from various hon members And, firstly, he would refer to that which had fallen from the previous speaker That hon gentleman had taken occasion to bring up private conversations, which were only, after all, repeated secondhand Those conversations took place, it appeared between Mr Bonney and Mr Torrens on the one hand and Mr Torrens and Sir Henry Young, in which he (Mr Finnis) was represented as taking a part, on the other, but, after all, they were mere private conversations, which could not possibly be considered in any official light, and which had no reference whatever to the action of the Government He had felt surprised, too, at what the hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Hawker) had imputed to the hon the Attorney General that he (the Attorney-General) was acting in a manner towards an absent person which he would not do during his presence, and he was equally surprised at the allusion to Mr Torrens, with which this imputation was combined He was quite sure that Mr Torrens would not appreciate this mark of favor That gentleman had been held up as an irascible specimen of an Irishman, and the implication connected with it was, that he was the "bully" of the House Surely Mr Torrens could not thank any one for pourtraying him in such an unamiable character He would not say any more on this subject than merely that he regretted such invidious allusions had been made, and that he was quite convinced that what the Attorney-General had said in the absence of the gentleman referred to he would not for one moment hesitate to say in his presence (Hear) With respect to certain conversations which had been alleged to have taken place between himself and certain gentlemen in connection with the subject of the leases, he would take this opportunity of saying that he never had any conversation with Sir Henry Young and Mr Torrens—that was together—on the subject of the leases, and he had never had any conversation with Mr Torrens until within two years of the present period and that was long after the time in which these alleged conversations had taken place Until within the last two years he (Mr Finniss) had never understood that the interpretation sought to be put on the leases by the squatters was the true interpretation The subject had never been mooted in his presence, and he was confident that there was no understanding between the Government and the squatters which had not been fully carried out in the Orders of Council and in the leases themselves He knew, in fact that there were men then composing the class called squatters who were far too keen to commit themselves to anything on which there could be the possibility of a doubt They must therefore judge of those leases by the Orders in Council and the clauses in the leases themselves He would now say a few words on the report of the Select Committee, but perhaps before he did that he might refer to the remarks of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and for which that gentleman had been taken so severely to task Now he (Mr Finniss) thought that hon gentleman had shown himself a most sagacious statesman, for, seeing that the cause was a good one, he had refrained from calling witnesses, and notwithstanding this, the evidence and the report tended in the fullest manner to prove that the assessment was proper, both as it regarded equity and expediency The fact was those witnesses had rope enough given them, and the House must admit that they had used it to their destruction, in endeavouring to prove their case they had proved too much For instance, in the 8th clause of the report, the Committee said —" Your Committee have taken ample evidence on all these, and upon many collateral points, and have to report to your Honorable House that every witness examined by them has, without exception, stated that the understanding between the Government, by whom the leases were granted, and the parties to whom they were granted, was, that the rental was in lieu of, and in full satisfaction for the previous assessment, and that no assessment would be levied, except by a remote possibility, and for local purposes " They, therefore, had come virtually to the same conclusion as the Government had come to That "remote possibility" had evidently arrived What could that expression mean otherwise? It could not extend to a term of 14 years, which was the length of the leases, but surely to some period within the currency of those leases The reference made by Sir Henry Young to this "remote possibility" was in 1849, that was 10 years ago, and the present time might then in colonial computation be very well considered a "remote possibility" That remote possibility, then contemplated, he believed had now arrived The other point at issue rested in the interpretation of the word "local," and notwithstanding all that had been said on this subject, he could not help adding to these expressions of opinion his views of the proper interpretation of the word He saw that the word "local" was used by Sir Henry Young, Mr Bonney and Mr Hagen in one sense, and that was 'colonial" Let them look at the evidence taken on the Select Committee, and they would see in the official documents produced, several references to the word "local" "Local" Ordinance, 'local" Act, and whenever the word "Ordinance ' was used, they would find attached to it the word "local" Then they had another authority still—Sir Henry Young had used it in the same construction which he had put upon it (The hon gentleman read an extract in which it occurred) Mr Hagen had used it in the last paragraph of his letter in the same sense, viz —"Power to rest with local authorities to alter," &c But then they had a still higher authority The Secretary of State had used the word in despatches referring to the Land Fund in 1855 in several instances, such as "these portions were plainly not of a local character," speaking of colonial, and clearly leading to the inference that local and colonial meant one and the same thing In fact, every authority which he had quoted used the word "local" as meaning " colonial," and not district Therefore one point was clearly set at rest, and not only was this borne out by the foregoing, but one of the witnesses on the Select Committee (Mr Torrens) gave it as his opinion that "local purposes" meant for "roads, bridges, harbours," &c This was the definition by one of the witnesses upon whom the squatters relied It had been said that the equity of this assessment had not been proved, inasmuch as the profits of the squatters were not so great as had been represented, but let them refer to the evidence Mr Taylor stated, when examined on that Committee, that the total produce of the pastoral interest per annum was £518,400, that the expenses in wages of 6,000 producing persons at £89 per head, was £534,000, which was the cost of raising so much produce, and with rents and fees under the Scab Act, £17,814, making a total of £551,814, so this, compared with the cost of production, shewed a loss of £33,414 Taking this for granted, he would say that the squatter must surely be unable to meet the proposed tax But it must be clearly seen from the context that the statements put forth on the basis of such figures must be grossly exaggerated The figures which he (the Treasurer) had placed before the House on a former occasion had been cavilled at, and declared to be erroneous, but he had carefully considered the means by which he had arrived at these figures, and he saw no reason to doubt that the number of persons as engaged in pastoral pursuits was any other than he had represented He could not see that they could be far wrong, as the facilities at disposal by means of the police who visited all the stations, would enable them to come to a correct approximate of the number Still he was willing to be corrected, and to take the experience of gentlemen engaged on the spot is very good data He was also willing to admit that he had understated the amount of tobacco used by those in the employ of the squatting interest Taking however, the figures he had referred to, he would show that the squatters did not contribute £6,000 to the revenue Mr Taylor took the pastoral population dependent on wages at 12,000, and assumed that they contributed to the Customs revenue of £151,000—the whole population being 115 000—the sum of £16,070 The fallacy of this was shewn by taking a few of the principle articles of import, for instance, on cornsacks, beer, porter, &c, drapery, haberdashery, spirits, cigars, and wine, there was a duty raised of £93,500, which was more than three fifths of the whole revenue, and the pastoral population, it must be remembered, contributed next to nothing to this portion of the revenue £1,000 would probably more than cover the contribution from the squatter on this head Mr Taylor observed that the principle articles of consumption by this class were tea, sugar, and tobacco Now the revenue on these articles, to which he would also add apparel and slops, was £24,000 The number of men employed in producing amounted to one-tenth of the whole population, and allowing that they would consume about the average, they would contribute, say, £3,000 on the above articles Then under the head of "luxuries," a revenue was derived amounting to £33,500 Certainly they did not use much of these, and taking the quantity consumed under that head at 5 per cent, they would have £1,675, so that reckoning the sums under three different heads he had referred to, they would have as the total amount contributed by the squatters £6,000 or something less He thought, after this, it could not be questioned for one moment that the squatters did not contribute in that proportion to the revenue which their position entitled them to do At the same time it must be remembered that the colony was at special expenses on their behalf, which last year amounted to no less a sum than £20,000 spent in their own districts, while they had only contributed the amount which he had stated Take Mr Taylor's estimate of 12 000 as the number of those employed in pastoral pursuits, and it would appear that they received more in expenditure in their own districts than they contributed, in addition to which they had received their share of the general revenue They had also facilities for obtaining land at little more than one farthing per acre It was clear from the foregoing that the squatter contributed less in proportion to the advantages they derived than any other class of the community, and this was a special reason for their being singled out in order that an equalization of taxation might be brought about This tax would, he was convinced, not do more than place them on an equality with others In support of this he might allude to the statement made by Mr Torrens, who said that the pastoral interest contributed less to the revenue than any other It was a singular fact that the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Hawker), though he urged the evidence of Mr Torrens on various points as conclusive, yet when anything occurred which did not coincide with his opinions, warded it off by saying it was a mistake in the evidence But he (Mr Finniss) thought the questions and answers were put very clearly in the printed evidence, and that they did not bear even the semblance of a mistake, but on the contrary, they bore the impress of truth He would read the portion he alluded to (Read the question and answer) Now he thought the course adopted by the hon member for Burra and Clare was not a correct one, when the statements made by Mr Torrens suited his own purpose he took them for granted, but when they differed from his views he ran off to that gentleman, and got him to make an explanation, which he gave the House the benefit of hearing He thought it was evident that the report of the Select Committee condemned their own conclusions, and that altogether it contained such manifest exaggerations that it could not be relied on He need not make any further statements It was clearly established that the Government had right and equity on their side, that there had been no injustice attempted by them in endeavouring to impose a special tax upon the squatters, as they were shown to derive greater benefits than other classes of the community, in proportion to the amount they contributed to the revenue He should, therefore support the second reading of the Bill

Mr DUFFIELD would not occupy the time of the House long, for he could not imagine that what he had to say would have any effect in altering the views of any hon member But having been a member of the Select Committee referred to, he could not allow the subject to pass without notice He had heard the Commissioner of Crown Lands on the previous day, but he had not taken the view of the subject which he expected he would have taken, inasmuch as he (Mr Duffield) looked upon this as a great political question —a question on which the Government held one view and the squatter another It was evident that there was a decided difference of opinion The evidence on the side of the squatters showed that they held one opi-

mon, and that had been substantiated by the expressed views of Mr Bonney He thought there was no question but that that gentleman was armed with authority from the Government in the action he had taken, and he had studied, no doubt, the legal documents placed in his hands, and must have been aware of the understanding which was come to between the squatters and the Government But it appeared that a misunderstanding had occurred now, and he (Mr Duffield) was anxious that it should be cleared up as soon as possible, that that political agitation which had so long occupied their attention, and which had retarded the development of the country, should be settled without delay When this Bill was introduced, he had felt it his duty to oppose it, and if the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, was now sought to be passed he should still oppose it But, as the Attorney-General had suggested an alteration in its provisions which would, at the same time it gave a greater source of revenue, secure a better tenure to the squatter, and remove these political differences, he should with that understanding support the Bill The position of the other colonies had been referred to, wherein the squatters paid a much higher assessment But it must be remembered by hon members that there all the available runs had been occupied, and therefore the necessity for a higher contribution to the revenue But in South Australia they had yet estates to realize upon, they had vast tracts of country yet to be turned to account And although some portions of this land was occupied at a low rental, there were thousands of square miles yet which were not taken up And why? Because it was considered they were not worth what was asked for them It was therefore the duty of the Government to offer every facility for turning their lands to advantage He had felt that this continual agitation had retarded the occupation of these lands, for they had evidence that there had been plenty of land equally bad which had been taken up As a case in point he would mention the country taken up by Captain Ellis, called the "Hummocks" When Mr Ellis took this country up first it was entirely unproductive, but he had expended a large amount of capital upon it, and now it was capable of containing 50,000 head of sheep, and no doubt that gentleman had secured to himself a good return for his outlay But that would be small in comparison to what the country had lost, and seeing that they had thousands and thousands of miles of the same description of country, it was not well to retard its development by any restrictive enactments As to the legality of this measure he had never attempted to oppose it on these grounds, that point had been fully proved But he did not know that the squatters represented that they were not able to meet this tax, on the contrary, they had stated their willingness to contribute to any general assessment They might, however, form some idea of the expenses to which the squatters were subjected in developing the runs, by the fact that a well between Truro and Blanche Town had cost the Government a sum of £500 The House would be ready to admit that the Government were able to construct such works as reasonable as private parties seeing they had every facility at hand The squatters were put to expenses similar to these, and if the cost of such works were the same to them, which from what he had stated they would be, it could be easily understood that in first stocking a country no great benefit would be derived He hardly liked to refer to the Select Committee which sat on this question as he was one of its members He imagined from all that had been said about it that it would be called a celebrated Committee But as to the question of not calling more evidence, the Commissioner of Crown Lands had said he had not time to do so Now he (Mr Duffield) found that the Committee reported on the 3rd November, and the Government did not take action until the 19th November, thus leaving 16 clear days during which the Government surely had time to call any further witnesses In conclusion, as it appeared that there was some prospect of an amicable arrangement being made with the squatters, from what the Attorney-General had intimated, he should on that understanding feel great pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill

Mr DUNN moved the adjournment of the debate, which was carried

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS presumed the House, at that late hour, were not prepared to proceed with the Bill, and its further consideration in Committee was in consequence postponed till Wednesday

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

Upon the motion of Mr MACDERMOTT (for Mr BAKEWELL), the second reading of the Associations Incorporation Bill was made an Order of the Day for Friday

The House adjourned at a quarter to 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 25

There was not a quorum of members present

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 26

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

MITCHAM

Mr REYNOLDS presented a petition from a number of the ratepayers of Mitcham, having reference to some reserves in that district, which the Government had intimated their intention of submitting to public competition

The petition was received and read

MR DAVID SUTHERLAND

Mr NEALES presented a petition from Mr David Sutherland, complaining that the Government had taken away portion of an 80-acre section belonging to him for the purpose of forming a road

The petition was received and read

WINE AND BEER LICENCES

Mr BAKEWELL gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Licensed Victuallers Act

MITCHAM

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move that the petition presented by him from the residents of Mitcham be printed

KAPUNDA

Mr SHANNON gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move the petition recently presented by him from the inhabitants of Kapunda be taken into consideration

MR DAVID SUTHERLAND

Mr NEALES gave notice that on Wednesday next he should move the petition presented by him from Mr Sutherland be printed

THE ESTIMATES

Mr PEAKE gave notice that on Wednesday next he should renew the motion in his name relative to the expediency of the Estimates being presented to the House within 14 days of the opening of Parliament

SOLICITOR TO THE LANDS TITLES COMMISSIONERS

Mr REYNOLDS put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson,) whether there is any truth in the report that Mr Belt one of the Solicitors of the Lands Titles Commissioners, has tendered his resignation, and, if so, whether the Attorney-General will lay the letter (if any) tendering such resignation on the table of this House"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the question was, whether there was any truth in the report that Mr Belt, one of the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners, had tendered his resignation He had put himself in communication with the Registrar-General, who informed him that there was no truth in the report that Mr Belt had tendered his resignation

Mr REYNOLDS put the second motion standing in his name—

"That there be laid on the table of this House copies of all reports made by the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners to the Registrar General, and of all correspondence between them, relative to the amendment of the Real Property Act of 1857-8, and in reference generally to the Laws relating to the Transfer of Real Property"

In putting this question it was necessary to refer to another report, but whether there was any foundation for it or not he could not say It appeared, however, from that report that one of the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners had forwarded to the Registrar-General or the Commissioners his views in reference to the working of the Real Property Act, and also his views as to the amendments which it was necessary to make in order to make the Bill a workable one The report which was current was that the Bill was not a workable one, and that one of the Solicitors had forwarded his suggestions for amendments It was very desirable, if any suggestions had been made, that hon members should be in possession of them, as, according to report, at no distant period they would be called upon to consider an amended Real Property Act

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion, but hoped the hon member for Sturt would assent to the addition "and also the report of such Solicitors, giving generally and particularly their opinion of the Real Property Act of last session" The object which he had in view was to obtain a special report on the Real Property Act of last session, not merely upon those points required by the Lands Titles Commissioners, but upon the Bill generally He believed when the report was obtained it might be totally different from that which hon members would imagine, considering the large majorities by which the Bill was carried in that House

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said with regard to the first part of the motion, there was no objection on the part of the Government to accede to it, and if any report had been made up to that time by the Solicitors, or if any correspondence had taken place upon the subject, the Government would be prepared to lay it upon the table. With reference to the amendment, however, he could only say, as he had said to the hon member for Encounter Bay, upon adopting the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), that there should be be a distinction between that which had actually been done or facts, and what after all was a mere matter of opinion The two returns should be laid upon the table separately, and the former should not be delayed in order that the latter might be procured.—The motion was carried.

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS.

Mr NEALES moved that the report of the Select Committee upon the petition of Captain John Finnis be adopted. The hon. member remarked that the case had been some time before the House, and as hon. members were no doubt well acquainted with the facts, it was unnecessary to enlarge upon the matter.

Mr SOLOMON seconded the motion.

Mr REYNOLDS would like to hear the report read, as he must confess that he had not read it.

The Clerk of the House read the report, which recommended that the balance of the contract be paid to Captain Finnis, who would then be a heavy loser, by having been compelled to undertake a contract for epitomizing the debates of the Legislature during last session, which had been undertaken by Mr James Allen, for whom Captain Finnis had become surety. The only member of the Committee dissenting from the report was Mr Strangways, who considered the work had been too much condensed.

Mr STRANGWAYS said that his opinion upon the point was substantially communicated in the rider which was attached to the report. It was only his private opinion, however, and hon. members would be enabled to form their opinions by inspecting the work; but it did strike him that the work was not of that character which was required by the House. If that were the case, and the work, moreover, was not of the character which the Government had contracted for, he could not see that the petitioner was entitled to the balance of the contract. No sufficient evidence could be obtained by the Committee as to the nature of the contract entered into between the Government and Mr Allen, for whom Captain Finnis became surety, and consequently he had had to consider whether the work was really of that character which was required. He had arrived at an opinion upon the point, and he would suggest that each hon. member should refer to the work and see if it were of the nature which was required. If it were so, then payment should at once be made; but it was quite clear that if the work were not of that character which had been produced by Captain Finnis and equal to that which had been contracted for by Mr Allen, Captain Finnis could not be entitled to the balance. If, on the other hand, that work had been produced equal to that which had been contracted for by Mr Allen, Captain Finnis was clearly entitled to the amount which he claimed. He observed some intimation in the evidence that the amount which was to be paid for the work was an indication of its quality, but he could not agree with this because the original contractor, Allen, must have known the character of the work which was required, and if he had fixed the sum of £500 for the work with the view of obtaining the future contract for the Hansard, if the work produced were not such as Allen had undertaken to produce, Allen could not have obtained the amount, and he consequently could not see that his surety, Captain Finnis, should obtain it either. The best way he believed would be to let the parties who had made the bargain say whether the work was such as had been contracted for. He could not see any decisive proof either one way or the other, and having no sufficient proof either one way or the other, he then exercised his own individual opinion whether the work was such as the House required or not.

Mr SOLOMON supported the adoption of the report. The hon. member (Mr Strangways), who was the only member of the Committee who dissented from the report, said that the work was not of such a nature as to warrant the House making payment for it; but he had heard noting to support the hon. member's statement, nor had the hon. member himself pointed out where the work was defective. It was true that he (Mr Solomon) was not in the House at the time, but he had perused the work, and assuming it to be correct, and he had not heard its accuracy challenged, he considered it well worth all that had been charged for it. He considered that the question which had been raised as to its value, ought not to be raised. The sole question was whether the contract had been fairly carried out, and the report of the Committee affirmed that it had. A certain work had been agreed for, and unless some fault could be pointed out either in the printing or in the contents, Captain Finnis was, he contended, entitled to payment. It was true that the work might perhaps be found fault with by some hon. members as not containing the full amount of the speeches which they had made during the session, but he would put it to hon. members whether it was not fortunate for themselves that they had been so curtailed, and that they should feel much indebted to the compiler for having done so. It was quite evident that an arrangement had been made with Mr Allen to do a certain work for a certain price; Mr Allen failed to complete his contract, and Captain Finnis, as surety, was compelled to complete it. The Government had opportunities afforded them of inspecting the work as it proceeded, and they should, as the work proceeded, have pointed out those portions which were unsatisfactory, if there were any. But they had not done so, and the work having been completed and placed in the hands of hon. members, it was certainly not now compatible with the dignity of the House to refuse payment.

Mr PEAKE rose for the purpose of expressing the disappointment which he felt at the position in which this affair placed the House. It was no part of the duty of this House to deal with the traffic, the bargains, made by the Government. It was throwing a very ungracious and undignified office upon members of that House. Let those who made the bargains be responsible for carrying them out. If this were a mere question of the expenditure of public money the House could deal with it; but it was certainly no part of the duty of that House to deal with the question as it stood. He hoped the Government would take the responsibility of settling this matter; they had made the bargain, and let them settle it in a right and equitable manner. The matter had no right to be brought forward in the shape it was, as he was quite sure there was sufficient business talent amongst the Executive to enable them to settle it. It would form a bad precedent if the House were to decide upon the point, for hon. members were not there to take any portion of the Executive functions of the Government. The Executive had plenty of time and ability to settle such questions as the present. He should vote against the adoption of the report because he objected to public accounts being settled by the authority of that House, when the Executive were the proper parties to incur the responsibility.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was surprised at the speech of the hon. member for the Burra, because it implied that in matters involving the expenditure of public money that House was not to interfere. (No, no.) Then, if the hon. member said "no no," he wished to know upon what grounds the House should not interfere. Was it because not only the expenditure of public money was involved, but the rights of an individual. Because there were only these two points involved in the question before the House? He was surprised to hear the hon. member say that this was a question upon which the House should not express an opinion. If he were asked whether Captain Finnis had a legal claim upon the Government, he would say that he did not think he had; that he did not think Captain Finnis could establish in a court of law a claim for the price of the contract entered into with Allen. He believed that he had expressed a similar opinion when the Supplementary Estimates were under consideration, when a vote for the Hansard was asked for. It was, indeed, for that reason that the Government had not paid the amount. Having said this much, however, he would say that he could quite understand that there might be circumstances, such as the desire displayed by Captain Finnis to carry out this contract, though at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, and to honestly and faithfully do it to the best of his ability, which would constitute a strong reason for the House recommending the Government to pay the amount, for which, nevertheless the petitioner had no legal claim. If the Government had believed that Captain Finnis had a legal claim for the amount, they would have settled it, but believing that he had no legal claim, the Government left it to the House to take into consideration those circumstances which gave him an equitable claim. As custodians of the public purse, the question was clearly one for their consideration. The House would remember that a sum had been placed upon the Estimates to meet this claim, but the Government had distinctly stated that they would not liquidate it until the House had expressed an opinion whether, under the circumstances, payment should be made by the Government or not. Subsequently, a petition had been presented to the House, and the matter had been referred to a Select Committee, which Committee had reported favorably for Captain Finnis, for whom he felt strong sympathy, believing that he had endeavored honestly and faithfully to complete the contract. He was, therefore, quite willing to support the motion that the report be adopted, not because he felt that Captain Finnis had a legal claim, but because there was that sort of equity in the case which entitled him to not only the fair but liberal consideration of the House. If the report were adopted, the Government would have no hesitation in immediately paying the amount. It was a question for the House to consider whether they would, looking at all the circumstances of the case, give Captain Finnis a fair and moderate remuneration for the expenses which he had incurred and the labor which he had undergone in the compilation of this work, although, under the circumstances, he might not have a strictly legal claim.

Mr PEAKE wished to say a few words in explanation. He had understood the hon. the Attorney-General to say that he (Mr Peake) had denied that it was the duty of the House to deal with this question or any like it, and that he had also dissented from interfering in questions in which the rights of private individuals were concerned; but he (Mr Peake) had never said so. What he had really said was, that he did not like the Government to throw upon the House a duty which devolved upon themselves. He did not wish to infringe the powers of that House as guardians of the public purse, nor did he wish to interfere with the action of the House in protecting the rights of individuals.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he had not charged the hon. member with having so stated, but it was certainly included in his argument.

Mr REYNOLDS thought the Attorney-General had made out that Captain Finnis had a good moral claim, and a sum having been placed upon the Estimates to meet this claim, he thought the matter might be left entirely with the Government. If a really good moral claim existed, it might safely be left with the Government to liquidate. He considered the resolution before the House a censure upon the Government, for not having liquidated the claim, and as he should be sorry to pass a vote of censure upon the hon gentlemen opposite, particularly as it was now admitted that a good moral claim existed he trusted the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) would withdraw the motion, otherwise he should feel disposed to vote against it

Mr BURFORD hoped the hon member would not withdraw his motion The matter had been referred to a Committee, the evidence and report were very conclusive, and it appeared to him like child's play to withdraw the motion for the adoption of the report

Mr NEALES did not believe when he rose to move the adoption of the report that there would be a single dissentient voice, particularly as the only dissentient member of Committee had not a seat in that House at the period to which the work had reference The hon the Attorney-General had admitted that Captain Finnis had a strong moral claim, and notwithstanding the opinion of the learned and hon gentleman, he was disposed to think that he had also a claim in a court of law Having admitted that there was a strong moral claim, it appeared to him rather jesuitical to enter into the legal objection to the claim Although in the report of the Committee it was stated that Captain Finnis would be a heavy loser even though the amount which he claimed were paid, the report was not based upon that evidence, but upon the evidence that Captain Finnis had done what Allen had undertaken to do originally He believed that the Government would now feel strong enough to pay the amount even if the report were not adopted, but he could scarcely believe that the House would reject the report, for the books had been bound, and he would remind the House that the work was never intended to be anything more than an epitome The discussions in the early part of the session were much longer than those in the after part, and the proportion as observed in the newspapers had been carefully preserved in the Hansard He trusted the report would be adopted, as if it were not it would look very much like repudiation

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to be informed how many members of the Committee signed the report

The SPEAKER said it was necessary that five members should be present to agree to the report, and that the Chairman signed it

The motion for the adoption of the report was then put and carried

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

Captain HART, in moving the second reading of Longbottom's Patent Bill, said that it was a private Bill to secure Mr Abraham Longbottom a patent for the unexpired term of 14 years He need say very little about it, as the evidence sufficiently showed the advantages which were likely to arise to the public by the introduction of a patent to this colony, which would no doubt be followed up by lighting-up the principal towns in South Australia with gas of a very superior quality, and at a cheap rate He believed it would be said at a no distant date from the introduction of this Bill that one of the greatest luxuries had been introduced to the colony, a cheap and good light, which had hitherto been denied them

Mr COLLINSON seconded the motion

Mr MACDERMOTT thought, before the House assented to the second reading of the Bill, they should understand some of the advantages which it was said would be conferred by the present Bill He perceived by the report that it was suggested the charge for gas manufactured by this process would be 15s per 1,000 feet Now that appeared to him a very long price, and he would remark that if gas could be manufactured cheaply the public should enjoy some of the advantages of that economy He believed that the taverns in Melbourne were charged about the same price, and they complained of the enormous price, even after making every allowance for the difference between the cost of materials here and in England He had thought it well to draw the attention of the House to this fact, as he certainly thought, in granting this patent, they should see that the protection of the interests of the public was properly provided for

Mr COLE, as one of the members of the Committee who had investigated this subject, begged to offer a few words of explanation It was true that Mr Ewbank, who had been examined before the Committee, had named the rate of 15s per 1,000 feet, but that was the maximum rate But the House should bear in mind that the gas which would be manufactured by this process would be so superior that one foot would be equal to two feet of coal gas, so that even if the price were 15s per 1,000 feet it would be little more than equal to 7s for coal gas Another thing was, independently of the quality o the gas, that the refuse as compared with that from coal gas, would be valuable for the supply of locomotive engines

Dr WARK said there was another point of great importance in connection with this question which had been left untouched Coal gas emitted many noxious properties which this gas did not He believed coal gas to be very injurious to respiration He quite agreed with the hon member (Mr Macdermott) that some provision should be made to guard the public against any overcharge on the part of the party having the patent

Mr SOLOMON understood this Bill to be to secure a patent to a party for the manufacture of gas from oil and fatty matter The object of the Bill, as he understood, was to prevent other parties from using anything of the kind in the manufacture of gas, but he would remind the House that the ingredients mentioned in this Bill had been used in the colony in the manufacture of gas for the last two years Mr Nitschke had made very excellent gas from similar matter, and so also had Mr Gouge It did not appear to him there was anything new in the process, and it would be interfering with the rights of those citizens who had hitherto adopted the system were that House to give one individual the exclusive right of manufacturing gas by such a process

Mr BURFORD did not believe that the principle disclosed in the evidence which had been taken before the Committee had ever been acted upon in this city There was a peculiarity about this process which justified the Committee in recommending it to the notice of the Parliament He alluded to those portions in connection with refining oils and resin Of course, all the matters connected with this particular process were not entirely new, one or two were sure to be known in time past, but what he understood was that unless a party used all the elements combined, as proposed by the patentee, there would be no infringement of the patent The objections of the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) would not, therefore, hold good, as any person might use the materials mentioned so long as he did not use the combination mentioned in the Bill He should be glad to see the city lighted with gas, and the House, he thought, should afford every facility for so doing

Mr LINDSAY said that although the Bill had reference to improvements which had been made in the manufacture of gas from oil and fatty matter, the improvements had reference more to the machinery than the material There was in fact nothing new in the manufacture of gas from the materials named, they having been suggested many years ago by one of the English professors of chemistry, and a Company had been started for the purpose of manufacturing gas from these materials upon an extensive scale, but the Company, he believed, spent £50,000 without getting any return He understood the patent asked for to be merely an improvement in the machinery for the manufacture of gas as originally recommended, he believed, by Professor Daniels, and that there was no attempt in the Bill to exclude others from using oils and fatty matter in the manufacture of gas

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was desirous of saying a word or two before the second reading of the Bill was assented to He should take the course in this instance which he had always taken in reference to private Bills, and although not opposing the second reading, reserved to himself the right, when the Bill assumed its ultimate shape, to express his opinion to the House as to what appeared to be the rights of parties He would call the attention of the House to the fact that this Bill was to secure to the inventor certain rights in this country, in consideration of his discovery being made public He thought it would be quite right to give the party a patent if he took steps to use it here, but he did not think it would be right to give him a power which would prevent others from introducing the improvement here if the patentee would not do so himself He believed the patentee was going to carry out the improvement in this colony, but still he thought the House should have some security that he would do so He stated so before the hon member for the Port put the Bill into Committee or took it out of Committee

Captain HART said the patentee certainly had no desire to pass this Bill through the House without making use of it On the previous day his mill at the Port had been lighted up as it never had been before, the fact being that he had anticipated the second reading of this Bill, being determined to see how the process would answer He was gratified to say that he had never seen such good gas either in the colony or at home He had never seen any thing more satisfactory He believed that at the present moment there was sufficient material in the colony to light up not only the Port, but a very considerable portion of the city The patentee was only waiting the passing of this Bill, when White' 'Rooms would be lighted up immediately In reference to the remarks of the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) the hon member would have seen, had he read the Bill, that the fatty matter referred to was not similar to that which had been in use for some time past, but was peculiar, being oil procured from resin in some way which was also protected by patent in England By this process gas could be made at a cheaper rate than from coal, and there could be no question whatever that gas being manufactured, as was proposed by this Bill, would prevent coal-gas being manufactured here, because coals were much more expensive here than in England, yet in England gas by this process could be manufactured at a cheaper rate than from coal, though coal there was not more than one-third of the price it was in the colony Independently of this he believed that the material from which the oil was obtained could be obtained in the colony He believed that large quantities of resin might be obtained in the forests here which would be available for the manufacture of the particular oil required in the manufacture of this gas He hoped hon members would in a few days be enabled to see the superiority of this gas over anything of the kind that had been seen in Melbourne In reference to the remarks which had fallen from the hon member (Mr Macdermott), he would remark that the hon member was mistaken in reference to the price of gas in Melbourne—the price there having till lately been 25s per thousand feet During the last few weeks the price had been reduced to 22s 6d If Adelaide got a supply of gas of the quality proposed by this Bill, at 15s per thousand feet, it would be far cheaper than the price at which Melbourne was supplied, for it was quite true, as had been remarked by the hon member (Mr Cole), that one foot of this gas was equal to two feet of gas manufactured from coal But this was not the only advantage, for the process referred to in the present Bill did not require a large factory, but it could be manufactured upon the premises intended to be lighted with ease and safety He had at that moment a gasometer at his mill, and independently of finding this description of gas much cheaper than any other, he had already received intimation that on account of its safety there would be a reduction in the premium charged for the insurance of his premises The advantages to South Australia could indeed scarcely be estimated, and he thought that the House would see that the view taken by the Attorney General would be met by the intention and acts to the present time of the attorney for the Bill

The motion for the second reading of the Bill was then put and carried

The Attorney-General asked the hon member (Captain Hart) not to go into Committee upon the Bill, as it was important that the House should proceed with the discussion upon the Assessment on Stock Bill, and, in addition to which he should like to provide a clause to the effect that the Bill should cease if steps were not taken to carry it into effect within a certain time He was not desirous of imposing an obligation upon the patentee to carry the Bill into effect, but he simply wished that if he did not, others might not be prevented from doing so

Upon the motion of Captain Hart the consideration of the Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works the consideration in Committee of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following Friday

CAPTAIN J F DUFF

Mr Collinson obtained an extension of time till Wednesday next for the Committee to bring up their report

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands the report of the Committee of the whole House upon this Bill was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

KAPUNDA

Upon the motion of Mr Shannon, the petition recently presented by him from the residents of Kapunda, relative to the site of a railway terminus, was ordered to be printed

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Attorney-General the consideration of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill, was postponed till the following Friday

THE ESTIMATES

Upon the motion of the Treasurer the consideration of the Estimates was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL - RESUMPTION OF DEBATE

Mr Dunn did not intend to trouble the House with a long speech, although fully alive to the importance of the question, in fact, when the Bill was first brought under consideration and was referred to a Select Committee he had made up his mind to give a silent vote, and to support the second reading of the Bill He had arrived at this conclusion chiefly from the fact of having read the lease and the particular covenant under which it was contended the squatters were quite liable to be taxed There could be no doubt that such was the case All leases contained covenants, and notwithstanding what might be said by the attorney, land-bailiff, or steward, who might be present at the time the lease was signed, the lessee was bound by the covenants in his lease, and it was to those covenants in the leases of the squatters that he had carefully looked in order to guide him to a correct conclusion in this instance. Although he had stated that lessees must be bound by the covenants in their leases, those covenants he was aware were not always carried out to the very letter, but the lessees were always under a penalty as it were of having them carried out Having no doubt of the liability of the squatters, he had originally made up his mind to give a silent vote in support of the Bill Having perused the covenant in the squatters' leases, by which it was quite clear that they were liable to be called upon for other payments than those which they at present contributed, he was only surprised that the squatters should endeavor to resist the claim He must confess to surprise, too, when he saw the Bill, for at that time he felt assured that the tax could not be fairly imposed, but afterwards, upon perusing the leases, there could not be a doubt of the squatters' liability Another reason which had determined him to support the Bill was that he believed the squatters held their runs for less than their real value At the time the leases were granted, probably the rentals paid by the squatters were as much as the runs were worth according to the returns but at the same time the squatters took their leases with a proviso staring them in the face, rendering it quite clear that they might be called upon to pay more for the land in the shape of a tax such as was proposed by the present Bill Those were the reasons which had originally determined him to go with the Ministry and vote for this Bill, but still at the same time he voted for referring the question to a Select Committee as he thought it possible that by so doing more light might be thrown upon the question He was perfectly astonished, however, at the one sided report which the Select Committee had brought up It was said out of doors that though the Commissioner of Crown Lands was one of the Committee, and that although the hon gentleman had brought in the Bill, he in his heart wished that it might not pass Be that as it may, he had always understood that the object of referring a matter to a Select Committee was, that they should enquire thoroughly into both sides of the question, and throw all the light upon the question which they were appointed to consider that could be collected, but in this case no disinterested party had been called, unless indeed it had been Mr Torrens, who appeared to be trimming between the squatters and the people With the exception of that gentleman, the whole of the witnesses were deeply interested in the squatting question He had been told in Hindley-street that so cautious was the Hon John Baker not to commit himself before the Committee that he frequently took five or ten minutes, and even a quarter of an hour, to answer a question (Laughter) He did not blame the hon gentleman for this, as he had a right to make out the best case he could for himself, but he blamed the Committee for not calling evidence on the opposite side No doubt if such evidence had been called it could have been shewn that the squatters were realising much more from the waste lands of the Crown than other gentlemen were from their real property, and if evidence had been brought on the other side, it would have been impossible that the report could have borne the aspect which it did A great stress had been laid upon the word "local," but he did not think there could be any serious doubt in the mind of any hon member that the interpretation placed by the hon the Attorney General upon the word local, or upon the expression "local purposes" was correct, and that it was used in contradistinction to Imperial purposes He had been astonished during the debate at remarks which had fallen from the hon member (Mr Burford), who, though formerly wishing to have direct taxation through the length and breadth of the land, now denounced it in the highest degree and called this Bill class legislation and all sorts of names He had been for many years a dealer in grain, and was desirous of giving every man a cheap loaf, and as the hon member (Mr Burford) was a tallow chandler, he presumed the hon member did not wish the people to eat their bread in darkness, but to give them a cheap candle, and this was probably the cause of the hon member having expressed the views which he had The squatter occupied the people's country, it had been shown that he did not pay a fair rental, and as there could be no doubt about the power of the House to tax him, he was only surprised that any opposition should be made to the reasonable demand imposed by the Bill He acknowledged that the squatters labored under some disadvantages from their liability to have their runs put up to auction at the termination of their leases, but from the remarks which had fallen from the Attorney-General relative to the disposition of the Government not to impose any further taxation during the currency of these leases, he believed the squatters, with a better tenure than hitherto, would be quite prepared to pay a higher rate than they had hitherto The squatter was not placed in the same position as a merchant, for if the latter were turned out of his store, he could find another in which to place his goods, but if the squatter were turned out of his run, where was he to go to with his stock? He did not believe there was a squatter in South Australia who was opposed to paying a fair share towards the revenue, according to the advantages which he derived from the occupation of the people's estate He could not help alluding to the fact, that when a short time since it became known that a large quantity of new country had been discovered here, there were numerous applications from neighboring colonies for portions of it, many of the applicants offering to pay rent in advance This was sufficient to shew that great profits were derived from the occupation of Crown Lands, and if the squatters could be secured in the occupation of such lands, no doubt they would be willing to pay a fair value for the privilege which they enjoyed He should support the second reading of the Bill

The Commissioner of Public Works said that as the debate had now lasted a considerable time, he was desirous of making as short a speech as possible He would have been as well pleased if he could sit quietly and make no remarks, but for some remarks which had been made by some hon members It had been said that the majority of Ministers were not in favor of the Bill, and as a member of the Government he would not feel justified in refraining from an indignant protest against such an assertion (Hear, hear) He felt strongly the necessity, the legality, and the justice of the measure The debate had now extended over two days, and the House was entering upon the third. The legal portion of the argument against the Bill had already been given up, and the difficulties in its way had been further diminished by the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria. Allusion had been made by the hon. member for the city (Mr. Neales), and also by the hon. member who had last addressed the House, to the difficulties which would arise under the present system of letting the lands at the termination of the leases. Upon this point he (the hon. Commissioner) would remark that there were probably no discussions so unreasonable as those which arose between a landlord and tenant at the termination of a lease which had proved peculiarly advantageous to the tenant. The landlord in such cases very frequently demanded too high a rent, whilst the tenant expected a renewal of his lease at unreasonably advantageous terms. In reference to this Bill it was essential that the rights of the people should be carefully guarded, and he hoped that in Committee this point would receive more attention than it had yet occupied. It was a very important matter, and the squatters could point out many matters which were not yet known. With regard to the evidence which had been given before the Committee, he always felt that it was a very strong case which could be decided against persons on their own evidence solely; but he believed such was the case in the present instance, and that this was the true reason of the course pursued by the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands. The course taken by that hon. member he (the Commissioner of Public Works) could not but feel was not such as to warrant the strong remarks made by several members. One very extraordinary feature in the proceedings of the Committee was the number of witnesses who had not even seen the Bill. Some of these gentlemen contented themselves by reading the cursory abstracts which appeared in the papers, and one of them had not even read a document still more important to him—his lease. It was strange that persons should discuss a measure like this, and sometimes not with the very best temper, without first informing themselves on the subject, by carefully reading the Bill, and also the leases by which they were bound. He would now state again what he had already stated on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, that he considered the proposed assessment a very moderate one. That was the language used in the speech of His Excellency at the opening of Parliament, and he (the hon. Commissioner) fully believed that that language was borne out by the Bill. Knowing the proposed assessment to be legal and firmly believing it to be equitable, he should give it his most cordial support. If, on the other hand, he believed the measure to be of a legal but not of an equitable nature, he should adopt a very different course. He would cheerfully resign his place in the Government or his seat in that House, rather than support any Bill which he did not believe to be justifiable—not merely legal but also in an equitable sense.

Mr. Rogers, in rising to support the second reading, agreed in all that had fallen from the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works. He would say nothing upon the evidence, but he believed that an injustice would be done to the colony in not passing the measure. He did not believe that any hon. member who studied the interests of the colony would oppose the second reading.

Mr. Cole feared that if he did not make some remarks on this subject he might be considered an exception to the general rule, as he believed every other hon. member had spoken upon the question. (A laugh.) He would not, however, detain the House with a long speech. He felt confirmed in the views which he had taken of the matter when the Bill was first introduced. He believed that the equity, legality, and expediency of the measure had all been proved to demonstration; and he would, therefore, only make one or two remarks on what had fallen from hon. members in the course of the discussion. Some hon. members had charged the Ministry with not calling evidence to oppose that which had been brought forward against the Bill. But hon. members should bear in mind that when the Bill was first introduced, several hon. members remarked that there was no necessity for a Committee at all; and he (Mr. Cole) had concurred in that sentiment, as he believed the House had already sufficient light to warrant them in coming to a conclusion on the subject. In that opinion he believed the hon. the Attorney-General likewise joined. He (Mr. Cole) thought that, if evidence was brought forward, it would tend rather to darken than to enlighten the question; and so he now believed it had done. He considered the Government fully absolved from the charge of not calling witnesses for, as the hon. the Attorney-General observed, there was sufficient evidence before the House in favour of the Bill. It was a mere act of courtesy on the part of the House to allow the opponents of the measure to bring forward such evidence as they could against the measure. The result was now already known. The case of the squatters was indifferent, as it was before, was very little better now, or rather it was worse. He had one other observation to make on an expression which had fallen from the Government benches in reference to a gentleman who had lately held a high position of trust. He alluded to Mr. Bonney. The hon. the Attorney-General had been charged with being uncourteous, nay, ungentlemanly, in designating that gentleman "a tool." (Laughter.) He (Mr. Cole) believed that nothing could be further from the hon. the Attorney-General's mind than to use that term in an offensive sense. He believed that the hon. member meant that the Government was a machine, and that Mr. Bonney was only a portion of it. (Laughter.) He (Mr. Cole) could view the matter in another light, and he thought it unfair on the part of the opponents of the hon. the Attorney-General to put a wrong construction on the words. As to the hon. member for Victoria, who in speaking of hon. members who could not see the matter in the light in which that hon. member himself saw them, and who had made an allusion to coarse minds—(laughter)—he (Mr. Cole) would stand between the wind and that hon. gentleman's nobility and say that the squatters did not pay a fair share of the public burthens—("hear, hear," from the Attorney-General and some other hon. members)—and he thought it came with a very ill grace from these gentlemen to stand forward now in opposition to a tax like the one proposed. His (Mr. Cole's) advice to these gentlemen was to accept the present offer, for he was fully assured that if the offer was rejected, and the Government forced to extreme measures, the squatters would regret not having accepted this offer. He did not say this as a threat, but the interests of the public should be consulted as well as those of the squatters. Hon. members were the guardians of the people, and should protect their rights. There was a covenant, and though he did not speak like Shylock demanding his pound of flesh, that covenant must be adhered to. If this demand was made when things were at very low prices, there might be some show of justice in resisting it; but the Government had not made their demand at such a time. They had waited until the squatters could well afford to pay an assessment, and he (Mr. Cole) thought this should determine the matter. He supported the Bill.

The Attorney-General rose to speak, but his first sentence was quite inaudible. The hon. member proceeded to say—he should not go through all the speeches during the debate, especially as the result of the discussion was no longer doubtful. Very few hon. members had declared themselves hostile to the measure, and the probability was that even these hon. members would not attempt to give effect to their hostility by voting against the second reading of the Bill. He should therefore have considered himself free to remain quiet in the matter if nothing was involved except the question as to whether the Bill should be read a second time; but there had been so many statements made reflecting upon himself individually, and against the Government of which he was a member—so many imputations upon his conduct and motives, and the conduct and motives of the Government—and so many denunciations of the principle upon which the Bill was founded, that he felt it was only just to himself, the Government, and the country, whose interests were involved in the matter, to make some few remarks at least upon the subject. With regard to the first matter which he had alluded to, the statements made with regard to himself and his motives and conduct, he would begin by stating what he thought would have been apparent to every hon. member of the House, and what had been very kindly stated by the hon. member who had just sat down, Mr. Cole, namely, that in using the word "tool" in reference to Mr. Bonney, he had done so with no intention of casting any slur upon that gentleman—(hear, hear)—whilst at the same time he confessed, as every one might have to confess occasionally, that in the hurry of the moment he had not selected the most appropriate phrase to convey his meaning. "Instrument" would have been a much better phrase than "tool" for the purpose; but he had used the word simply to express what he believed to be the real position of Mr. Bonney. He meant that that gentleman was not an agent having a discretionary power to treat, that he was merely an instrument to carry out a foregone conclusion from which he had no power to deviate to the right or left, or to alter in any way. No hon. member, so far as he (the Attorney-General) was aware, had said that Mr. Bonney's position was different from this. No person pretended that that gentleman had any power from his office under the Government of the colony, or from the Home Government, that he had any power from either of these sources which entitled him to represent the Government, or which entitled his (Mr. Bonney's) word to be taken as representing the opinions of the Government. He (the Attorney-General) was compelled to say that there had been an unfair use made of the language which he had employed in this instance. He had also spoken of the fact that Mr. Bonney, whilst that gentleman held extreme radical opinions, was most friendly to the squatters. He did not condemn Mr. Bonney's opinions. He did not know that that gentleman's extreme radical opinions went further than his (the Attorney-General's) own; but what appeared to him to be an inconsistency was, that whilst holding those extreme opinions which implied a negation of class-feeling, and a sense of strict justice to the whole country, Mr. Bonney entertained a very tender feeling towards the squatting class, of which he had himself originally been a member. Then, when he (the Attorney-General) said that Mr. Bonney had been rewarded, surely no one could think that because that gentleman was rewarded a year after he had done certain acts, that therefore he was bribed. Did not everybody know that on two different occasions he received large money subscriptions from the squatters for performing his duty in a manner which was beneficial to that class? He (the Attorney-General) was quite willing to believe, and he did believe, that Mr Bonney performed his duty to the best of his ability, with fairness between the squatters and the Government, but it was well known that Mr Bonney's leanings were towards the squatters, and that the benefits which he conferred upon that class were sufficient to secure to him those rewards in the shape of subscriptions which he received This circumstance indicated the bias of Mr Bonney's mind and his leaning towards the squatting interest in all his measures It showed his friendly feeling to them, and the squatters on the other hand gave a practical recognition of the services rendered to them by Mr Bonney He (the Attorney-General) need say no more upon this point He had always recognised Mr Bonney as an able and upright public servant, but he always felt that gentleman had an unconscious feeling in favor of the squatters, which was called forth by his past positions, that being originally a squatter, he sympathised with the class to which he had belonged, that however sincere his intentions might be, he had a leaning towards that particular class He would now refer to one other matter of a personal nature which he approached with great regret. He was surprised that any one who had seen him in that House, when Mr Torrens was a member of it should think of imputing to him a personal fear of that gentleman (Hear, hear) He (the Attorney-General) had often had to oppose himself to Mr Torrens in a very decided personal manner, and he would appeal to the Legislature and the country to say whether on such occasions he had ever been turned aside from stating what he believed to be the truth by any personal fear (Loud cries of hear, hear) He regretted very much that anything which bore the slightest resemblance to personal fear should have been imputed to him (Hear, hear) In speaking with reference to the evidence of Mr Torrens, he had said that he approached the subject with hesitation He said so because the statements of Mr Torrens were inaccurate to an astonishing degree He did not impute anything like deception to Mr Torrens, but when a person saw another make statements which were inaccurate, it was his duty to take care on the one hand to point out the errors, and on the other not to say anything which would imply what he did not mean to convey, or to impute any intentional deception He (the Attorney-General) acquitted Mr Torrens of any such deception, but that gentleman had given evidence which was calculated to deceive the Committee, and as it appeared in the papers would deceive the country He (the Attorney-General) thought the impression, and the only impression which any one could receive from the evidence was, that Mr Torrens had been consulted by His Excellency the Governor (Sir H Young), as an officer of the Government holding a position which entitled him to give an opinion respecting the leases He (the Attorney-General) had shewn conclusively that Mr Torrens was not at the time a member of the Legislature or of the Government, and that he held no position which would make consulting him a matter of duty on the part of the Governor The Governor might ask the opinion of the Collector of Customs, but the Collector of Customs had nothing to do with the land regulations, and it was not natural that the Governor should consult him There was no official connection between the Collector of Customs and Sir Henry Young which should induce the former to ask the opinion of the latter on the subject He (the Attorney-General) assumed that Mr Torrens was right in saying that he had conversations with Sir H Young on the matter, but Mr Torrens was incorrect in supposing that his opinion should have been taken as an officer of the Government, inasmuch as he was not entitled to offer an opinion It was said that Mr Torrens was badly reported, but all that he (the Attorney-General) knew upon this point was that it was the practice of the House, when witnesses were examined before a Committee, to forward the printed evidence to each witness for correction Those who knew Mr Torren's habits knew that that gentleman was not likely to neglect examining the print There must therefore have been some extraordinary misconception, or Mr Torrens could not have exercised his power of correcting the evidence He (the Attorney-General) thought that the same misconception must have existed in Mr Torrens's mind when he was giving his evidence, and when he was correcting the print He (the Attorney-General) perceived that a letter had appeared from a correspondent of the newspapers on this point, but he considered it unnecessary to refer further to the matter The statement of Mr Torrens was no more than that of any other individual, as that gentlemen had no official means of knowing the views of the Government He would say more than this, that whatever passed between Mr Torrens and Sir Henry Young was no more than a communication between two private gentlemen Mr Torrens also spoke as if a correspondence had taken place with him upon this subject He (the Attorney-General) referred to this point for the purpose of showing how completely that gentleman was under the impression that he was Treasurer at the time Searches had been made in the offices of the Chief Secretary and the Treasurer, but no correspondence of the kind could be discovered If the correspondence had taken place it would have been preserved, so that none could have taken place, as it was not in either of these offices Mr Torrens's position in the matter was unofficial, and he was, like any other individual, talking with Sir H Young He was not specially entitled by his position to offer advice, and certainly he was not in a position to call upon Sir H Young to accept his advice in the matter Having referred to these matters he should now say something as to the conduct of the Committee, as the conduct of the Government, and of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who represented the Government on the Committee had been made the subject of comment in the House—comment which affected the good faith of the Government as well as the good faith of the hon Commissioner of Crown Lands The Committee had been assented to by him (the Attorney-General) The names proposed were submitted to him and he had agreed to them, so that if there was any ill faith in this respect it was upon him (the Attorney General) the charge should fall From the time the Bill was first introduced until within a very short time before the Committee brought up their report he never supposed that it was the intention of the squatters to bring up a report against the Bill (Hear, hear) He understood that the squatters were not desirous of escaping from the assessment, which they admitted to be a fair impost, but of showing the cause of their being entitled to consideration in two particulars referred to during the debate, the first being that they should not be liable to an indefinite increase of taxation, and, secondly, that their runs should not be put up to auction at the expiration of the leases He did not state this in order to impute to the squatters any intention of deceiving the Government, but in order to justify himself If he had supposed that it was contemplated by those who moved for the Committee that it should be made the means of bringing up a report against the Bill, he should either have opposed the appointment of the Committee or struggled for the appointment of far different individuals His mistake was that he was quite willing that the squatters should have an opportunity of stating their case on the points he had just referred to If the Government were to be judged by their actions, as he presumed they were, the moment they ascertained that the opponents of the scheme did not intend to pass the Bill, they (the Government) met the matter in a spirit which showed that they were sincere in their desire to carry the measure (Hear, hear) There was one inconsistency to which he should refer On the one hand the Government were accused of being too lukewarm in the matter, and, on the other hand, he (the Attorney-General), as the mouthpiece of the Government, was accused of making use of unfair threats in order to terrify the House into giving its assent to the measure (Laughter) He would refer to this point again shortly, but he wanted to show that there was some inconsistency (Hear, hear, and laughter) Hon members might think the Government did not care about the Bill, or that they were taking improper means in order to carry it, but they could not believe both (Laughter) He had disclaimed already any intention of making use of any words which might be construed into a threat of a dissolution He believed hon members were satisfied that the language which he employed did not imply anything of the sort, but he did mean to warn hon members of the consequences of throwing out the Bill He believed, and he believed now, that the opinion which he was told was that of a decided majority of the House—for on the very day on which the debate was introduced he was informed that there was a majority of three against the Bill—was not that the opinion of the electors who sent hon members into the House (Loud cries of "Hear, hear") And knowing that any person who came into that House to legislate for the benefit of the country would be again responsible to those who sent him, he (the Attorney-General) had a right to warn hon members that the time would come when they would be responsible to their constituents again, and that they should bear in mind the opinion which those constituents would express on their conduct (Hear, hear) He would not have hon members sacrifice their own opinions to those of their constituents, but they should always regard the opinions of their constituents, and remember that for the votes they gave there would be a day of reckoning (Hear, hear) It might be said that he had threatened the squatters, but he had only warned them and had appealed to the cases of bodies analogous to their own The squatters were not an aristocracy like that of France or England, but they were our aristocracy ("Oh, oh!" from Mr Strangways, and laughter) He was delighted to hear the "Oh, oh!" of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Laughter) But those who had the opportunity of seeing the course of affairs in the colony had very sufficient reason for supposing that the squatters regarded themselves as the aristocracy, and the people looked upon them in that light (Hear, hear, and laughter) It was not therefore, unreasonable to warn them that if they joined in opposition to a popular claim too far, it might end in the popular claims being carried even to a more serious extent, and that if the claim was opposed in the first instance it might be made the next time not in such moderate tone (Hear, hear) There was, therefore, nothing incongruous in his warning to the squatters not to resist, too long (Hear, hear) He rejoiced, whether it was the result of his warning or of more deliberate consultation amongst themselves, that the squatters had come to the conclusion that the Government was as good a friend to the squatters, or a better friend than they were to themselves—(hear hear)—that this being a fair measure and just towards the squatters and the people had given them the means of placing themselves on a secure basis, and had for a long time secured to them the privileges they enjoyed, whilst at the same time it did justice to the people by giving them a fair return for the land He believed the squatters had come to the conclusion that the Government had acted a just and reasonable part, and that they were gladly prepared to acquiesce in the second reading of the Bill on the terms proposed by himself (the Attorney-General), to which he would advert shortly hereafter He would now say one or two words with regard to the expediency of this assessment The hon member for the city (Mr Burford) told the House that they should have none but direct taxation, that they should tax the land, and nothing that was produced from the land The hon member for the Burra and Clare (Mr Peake) said they should tax surplus capital, and not the produce of labor Other hon members had also spoken of the inexpediency of the tax But he (the Attorney-General) would say to the hon member for the Burra and Clare that if anything in this country was to be considered as realized property, it was the invested capital of the squatter (Hear, hear) Surplus capital, in the ordinary sense, he believed we had not any in the colony (Laughter) If, therefore, the hon member confined himself to surplus capital as the basis of taxation, we must give up taxation altogether (Laughter) He (the Attorney-General) was not aware in what direction we would even search for surplus capital with any reasonable chance of finding it (Great laughter) There was no capital here beyond the wants of those possessing it, or for investment beyond what the colony itself afforded the means of investing And if we were to tax the land held by the squatters, there was no better test that could be applied to ascertain its value than the number of sheep it fed Therefore, on the hon member for the Burra and Clare's own showing, the objection of that hon member on the ground of expediency failed altogether (Hear, hear) There was one other point, perhaps, to which he should revert, as he had forgotten it at a former period That was the conduct of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, in not calling evidence before the Committee He the (Attorney-General) was much amused, when the hon member for Light (Mr Bagot) spoke strongly on this point, to hear the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) and the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) cheer loudly (Laughter, in which Mr Barrow joined) It amounted to this, that these hon members thought that if such evidence was brought forward, the character of the report would have been changed (Hear, hear, and much laughter) There was no sense in attacking an individual for not calling evidence, if such evidence would not alter the case, and therefore the cheering of these hon members implied that there was no necessity for the Government calling any evidence (Hear, hear, and laughter) Looking now at the character of the debate he (the Attorney-General) regretted that evidence had not been called on the part of the Government—(hear, hear)—but he believed if he, in place of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, had been the representative of the Government on the Committee, he should have taken the same course as that hon member had followed From the knowledge which they all had, following various trades and occupations, no person reading the evidence could fail to come to the conclusion that the case of the squatters was so overstated as to deprive the evidence of all value If hon members said they should have the evidence of A and of B—if they said in the case of merchants, we will have the evidence of merchants, or in the case of farmers, the evidence of agriculturists, to say what amount they should contribute to the revenue, he (the Attorney-General) would answer "You merchants, or you agriculturists tell us your opinions in the House, and we shall listen to you there If you contribute your fair share say so With the information in our hands there is not one of us who with a few hours' reading cannot say what you contribute, whether from the mercantile, the agricultural, or the mining community, in order to enable us to form an opinion which will justify us in legislating without calling for any further evidence " If he had occupied the position of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands on the Committee, unless guided by the representations of others he would have said that he was satisfied the squatters, on their own evidence, would destroy their own case But, now, looking back upon the matter by the light of the experience they had had, he admitted it might have been desirable for the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the hon the member for the city (Mr Neales) to have called evidence, though, at the time, he fully agreed with those hon members in the course they pursued He thought anyone, looking to the evidence, would admit that no counter-evidence was necessary to enable the House to form an opinion adverse to that of the Committee He thought he need not advert to the political economy of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), who said that by getting ore out of ground, sending it out of the country, and receiving all kinds of wealth in return, we were impoverishing the country (Great laughter) That was a novel kind of political economy (Laughter)

Mr Strangways had said nothing of the kind What he had said was, that if there was £1,000 worth of ore taken out of the country that there would not be £1,000 worth left in—(great laughter)—that there would not be so much by £1,000 worth remaining

The Attorney-General—The same principle applied to wool If £1,000 worth of wool was sent away there would not be so much by £1,000 worth remaining If the ore went there would not be so much left as if we had kept it, and if the wool went there would not be so much left as if we had kept it With this new light upon the subject he should not pursue it further (Laughter) With regard both to the ore and the wool they were the representatives of the labor employed in procuring them Everything upon which labor was employed was perishable in its nature, and we could not eat our cake and have it He had taken down the hon member's words "that the colony was impoverished by sending out its ore " He thought they were used in the ordinary sense, and he thought it necessary to refer to so extraordinary a discovery in political economy (Laughter) He would like to know how much poorer Cornwall was for the hundreds of thousands of tons of ore she exported, or England for the hundreds of thousands or hundreds of millions of tons of coal Did any one suppose that the coal of England was of less value to her than her crops? Or would anybody draw the inference that we were to favor the squatters by exempting them from taxation because their sheep continued to feed upon the soil? (Hear, hear) There was only one other point, and he could hardly understand its being taken up again He had already shown that to make a compact there must be two parties, and who were they? On one side there was the Government of the colony which had nothing to do with the waste lands legislation That Government was as powerless except in giving advice as the squatters themselves The Queen was invested with Legislative powers by the Act under which the orders in Council were issued, she was in fact made the law-giver for the time The Queen issued certain orders in Council which gave the Legislative of the colony the power of doing certain things But there was no compact, for the orders in Council were issued in 1850, before the conversations of Mr Bonney took place These conversations took place after the law was passed, and, therefore they could not affect the law There was something stated by Mr Bonney as to what the law was, but all that could be said was that in the opinion of the present Legislature Mr Bonney was mistaken in what he stated Allusion had been made to his having said that if any one could show that he had taken a lease on the faith of the Legislature not having the power to tax him, that such a person was entitled to consideration But what he had said was that if any one could show that he had taken a lease on the faith of the Government not having power to impose a tax upon him, and that such a person found he had made a bad bargain, which he would not have made if he knew that he was liable to be taxed, that such a person had an equitable claim to have his lease taken off his lands (Laughter) He (the Attorney-General) did not believe that any squatter coming and offering to yield up his lease would find the Government unwilling to take the lease off his hands, and this he was fairly entitled to at the hands of the Government (Much laughter) If the hon member for Encounter Bay had been in his place at the commencement of his (the Attorney-General's) remarks, he should have congratulated that hon member on the fine sense of justice he displayed Hon members remembered the fine moral lesson which that hon member had on the first day of the debate administered to the hon member, Mr Townsend, in consequence of some personal remarks made by that hon member But when imputations a thousand times more offensive were made against him (the Attorney-General), he had heard the voice of the hon member for Encounter Bay, loudest amongst the cheers (Hear) When an hon member attacked him (the Attorney-General), or other members to whom he (Mr Strangways) was opposed, that hon member could cheer, though the remarks were most strongly personal, but on other occasions he was ready to assume the office of a censor It was not, however, necessary to go further into that point He (the Attorney-General) had now referred to all the matters which he considered necessary to answer in the speeches on this subject, and would only say a word or two on the form which the Bill would ultimately assume With regard to what he had proposed to the effect that some provision should be made to save the squatters from further taxation for the residue of the term of occupation, as this had been made a mere matter of compact, the Government proposed to introduce clauses for the purpose With regard to another point referred to by the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) namely, a proposal for the renewal of the leases from time to time, say every five years, he (the Attorney-General) individually believed that this would be most desirable both for the squatters and the public But it was most important that care should be taken to secure the people against anything which might lead to a sacrifice of their rights (Hear, hear) He (the Attorney-General) would, therefore, require, and he was satisfied the Government and the House would require that in any provisions introduced for this purpose, the rights of the public should be guarded carefully and jealously The Government would not assent, and he was sure the House would not assent to anything which did not provide ample security for this purpose Because he believed the present system to be injurious alike to the squatters and the public, he should be prepared to consider any amendment to the effect he had last referred to, but he would require, and the Government and the House would require to be satisfied that no clause was adopted which would prevent a fair amount of rental being received for the public lands

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR

Message No 19 was received from His Excellency the Governor, returning the draft of the Standing Orders of the House as approved

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL they were ordered to be printed

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—RESUMED

Mr PEAKE rose to explain, in reference to remarks of his alluded to by the Attorney-General, that what he (Mr Peake) said was, that it should be their policy instead of taxing the produce of land to tax the "surplus income and capital"

Mr HAWKER wished to explain, in reference to allusions which he had made to the hon the Attorney General in his speech on Wednesday last, that he (Mr Hawker) had not the slightest intention of imputing, as had been implied, personal cowardice to that hon gentleman, and he regretted his remarks had been taken in that light (Hear, hear)

The Bill was then read a second time, and its consideration in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, in reply to Mr Stringways, that the amendments proposed to be introduced by the Government in the Assessment on Stock Bill were not the result of any compact between the squatters and the Government, as no compact, as far as his personal knowledge went, had been entered into What he (the Attorney-General) said was that the Government were prepared to introduce certain amendments in the Bill which would secure the squatters against any further contribution, but the Government would at the same time be prepared to consider amendments proposed by any members of the House

It was then moved by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL that the Estimates be proceeded with, as, he remarked, otherwise, at that early hour of the day, it would involve a loss of time

The SPEAKER, however, intimated that as the Estimates had been made an Order of the Day for Tuesday, he was of opinion that the Standing Orders of the House would not permit of their being then considered

There being no other business on the notice paper the House then adjourned at half past 3 o'clock, until 1 o'clock on Tuesday

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon A. Forster, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Major O'Halloran the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon the Surveyor-General

MITCHAM

The Hon H AYERS presented a petition, signed by 78 ratepayers of the District of Mitcham, showing that certain portions of land which had been set apart for reserves were about to be sold, and craving the Council to give an expression of opinion upon this subject

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

THE DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Hon J MORPHETT gave notice that on the following day he should move that the amendments made by the House of Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill be taken into consideration by the Council

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the House of Assembly, intimating that they had passed the Impounding Act Amendment Bill, and desiring the concurrence of the Council therein

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, seconded by the Hon H AYERS, the Bill was read a first time, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO MR STIRLING

The Hon A. FORSTER wished before the business of the day was called on to ask for an extension of the leave of absence granted to the Hon Mr Stirling, who, from unforeseen circumstances had been prevented from returning to the colony so early as had been expected, and it was not probable he would arrive here for six months He was desirous of moving for leave immediately as he believed that the leave which had been granted to the hon gentleman would expire on the following day He thought that under the circumstances the Council would have no hesitation in granting the extension, although he admitted that he objected to extended leave of absence, and believed that if 18 months had been asked in the first instance he should have objected to it By granting the extension the country would be saved the cost of an election, which was some consideration, and he understood that Mr Stirling had been prevented from returning entirely by circumstances which he did not anticipate at the time leave was originally granted He therefore moved that leave of absence be extended for six months

The Hon Dr DAVIES seconded the motion, which was carried

TEMPORARY LUNATIC ASYLUMS

The Hon Dr DAVIES, in bringing forward the motion of which he had given notice—

"That it be an instruction from the Executive to the parties concerned that when, in future, persons said to be lunatics are committed to any gaol or house of correction in any district of the colony, they be transferred to the Adelaide Lunatic Asylum immediately on its being ascertained that they are insane Also, that it be a recommendation to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, that visitors be henceforth appointed to every gaol or house of correction that may be liable to be used for the temporary detention of lunatics, &c, such gaols being, strictly speaking, lunatic asylums while insane persons are detained there"

Said that he could only repeat what he had stated on a former occasion, that he had nothing to urge against the medical men who had been in the habit of attending Redruth Gaol He was acquainted with one of the gentlemen, Dr Mayne, and was quite sure that nothing could be urged against that gentleman professionally or privately, but still he was sure that if those gentlemen were consulted they would agree with him as to the propriety of the motion

The PRESIDENT pointed out there was some difficulty in the wording of the motion, and he questioned whether the two matters could be included in one motion The first portion spoke of an instruction to the Executive, and the other of a recommendation to His Excellency to do something else

The Hon Dr DAVIES said this arose from his ignorance as to the proper mode of wording the notice Probably the difficulty would be met by his moving that an address be presented to His Excellency upon the subject The hon gentleman ultimately acting upon the suggestion of the President, withdrew the motion on the understanding that he would bring it forward at a future day

THE RIVER WEIR

The Hon Dr DAVIES, in bringing forward the motion in his name, that the Honourable the Chief Secretary report, for the information of the Legislative Council, the opinion of the Attorney-General as to whether any legal proceedings can be instituted against the late Engineer of the Adelaide Waterworks for the unscientific and shameful manner in which he has allowed the weir for the said Waterworks to be constructed If any proceedings can be taken, will they be so? And, if so, will they be of a criminal or of a pecuniary nature? Also, if no legal proceedings can be instituted against the said Engineer, will the Executive deem it expedient to pass on him a moral censure or punishment, such as, e g, advertising his name in the Gazette as totally unworthy of the confidence of the Government, or of being entrusted with public works of any description for the future, and, moreover, will he be dismissed from any situation he may at present hold under the Government?"—stated that he was desirous with the leave of the House, of striking out the whole of the latter part, stopping at the word "constructed" It was solely upon public grounds that he had been induced to bring forward the question, as he knew nothing of the parties, nor was he urged on by any one in the back ground who had an animus against the late Engineer of the Adelaide Waterworks He felt that as an Engineer received the full praise if he succeeded in any undertaking connected with his profession, so he should bear the full blame if he failed In this case, as the Council were aware, there had been a total failure, and the citizens had a right to complain as not only had a large sum of money been expended uselessly, but the value of their properties was actually diminished by the increased rate which they would be called upon to pay in consequence When a supply of water was at length obtained by the citizens, when they obtained their whistle, they would find that they had had to pay a high price for it He should not have brought this subject forward had he not observed that the Engineer upon relinquishing his office of Engineer to the Water Works, had immediately obtained another appointment without any reprimand from the Commissioner of Public Works From a letter which appeared in Council Paper 73, from the hon the Commissioner of Public Works that hon gentleman should certainly have hesitated before again allowing Mr Hamilton without remonstrance to be employed in another department—(letter read) It was against the public welfare that such an appointment should have been made so soon after such a stigma had been cast upon the individual by the Commissioner of Public Works, and it was, he considered, beneath the dignity of a Minister of the Crown, under the circumstances, to allow the appointment This gentleman, the Commissioner of Public Works, was, it should be remembered, the member of the Executive, upon whom only the other day the Council had been called to bestow the superintendence of all the Public Works of the colony He (Dr Davies) had not only objected to the Bill which proposed to do this, from the objectionable principle which it contained, but because he saw that it would throw a great deal of patronage into the hands of the Commissioner of Public Works This was an example of the place for the man and not the man for the place The parties connected with the construction of the Weir were the Commissioners, the Engineer, the Clerk of the Works, and the contractors; and he had no hesitation in expressing an opinion that all the blame in connection with this undertaking should rest upon the Engineer. Upon referring to Council Paper No. 73, it would be seen that Messrs. Freeling, Hanson, and Kingston had reported in reference to the Weir, and the House, he hoped, would pardon him for reading at some length from Council Papers Nos. 19 and 73, for it was upon the evidence furnished by those papers that he principally relied, independently of having visited the Weir on two occasions, and although not an engineer himself, he had been attended by parties capable of giving him information. The duties of the Commissioners principally appertained to looking after the expenditure. If there were any blame it was in the appointment of gentlemen who were ignorant of the duties which they had to carry out, and not in the men themselves. The fault did not rest with the Commissioners, as they felt they could not use their individual opinion in opposition to that of the Engineer. On one occasion, indeed, it would be found after the defective state of the Weir had been discovered, the Commissioners candidly stated that they were disposed to agree with the report, for they had felt bound to abide by what the Engineer had said. It was quite evident from one paragraph in the report that the Commissioners blindly followed every proposition made to them by the Engineer. In reference to the contractors, it would be found that the Engineer passed the highest encomiums upon them; and, moreover, the most important and defective portion of the Weir was undertaken under his own superintendence. In the Council Paper 19, the Engineer spoke of how desirable it was that every encouragement should be afforded to the hard-working contractors, &c. He wished to show that the parties who were blamed in reference to this matter were not really to blame, as the contractors were spoken of by the Engineer as trustworthy and intelligent. The contractors complained that the specifications were constantly altered. The Enginher reported that they were inexperienced in and unused to such work, and there was every reason to believe that they imagined they were proceeding honestly with it. In reference to the Clerk of the Works he would draw the attention of the Council to the fact of that officer not having been appointed until after the most important portion of the work which had proved so defective had been completed under the superintendance of the Engineer himself. The Clerk of the Works had not been appointed until after the foundation had been laid. Six months after this had been completed, Mr. Sands, the Clerk of the Works, was highly praised by the Engineer. (Extract read.) How soon, however, "a change came o'er the spirit of the scene;" for, in one short month afterwards, when it was ascertained that the Weir was defective, the Engineer, instead of eulogising Mr. Sands, attempted to cast all the odium upon him. It was then that the Commissioner of Public Works stated that he held the Engineer, not Mr. Sands, responsible; yet, although a censure had been cast upon the latter, the Engineer had escaped. Mr. Hamilton had throughout been so constantly present, so energetic and persevering in his interference, that the Clerk of Works was entirely exonerated, or should have been. Mr. Hamilton, the Engineer, upon whom the blame rested, might be able to draw plans and specifications; but from the circumstance of his being so loquacious he was induced to believe that he was more a theoretical than practical man. At all events, if the Weir were a specimen he had very little ability to put his theory into practice. The ashlar work had been replaced to about the extent of 20 feet by 12, and it appeared to him that not only was the Enginee wrong in matters connected with engineering, but he should proceed to show that he was not to be relied upon for veracity. The hon. gentleman proceeded to show that Mr. Hamilton's statements had been contradictory in reference to whitelead and spunyarn having been used for caulking the seams, and that although the statements of Mr. Sands had been borne out, Mr. Hamilton had accused him of a gross perversion of the truth. Mr. Hamilton attempted to make it appear that he should be exonerated on account of the amount of business which he had to attend to, declaring that he had worked like a galley slave, that he had made 86 visits of inspection to the Weir, and that his health had suffered in consequence of the duties which he had had to attend to; but the Council would not attach much weight to these statements. He was prepared to shew how some of the work had been done, as he had some of the spunyarn which had been used with him, and should like to exhibit it to the House. The specifications had not been carried out, as from personal inspection he was enabled to state that in some instances the stones did not touch by an inch and a half in front of down-stream ashlar work, and whereas behind many spaces were from three to nearly six inches. The cement was only tape-joint, as it was termed, and upon the least scratch in the world it would crumble away. At least 100 or 150 yards had been caulked with spunyarn. The rubble work had not been properly executed, as the stones ought not to have been large, but one was taken out which weighed nearly a ton, and had evidently been knocked off a neighboring rock and left to tumble wherever it might. There were large cavities in which sticks might be inserted, and there was no mortar. The mud had settled in the holes, the mud upon the lime being clearly visible. Such large stones had been used that some were bigger than his head, and that was not a little one. (Laughter.) He took out some of the concrete with his nails and a small knife. The mortar was bad. On the up-stream side the work was certainly the best, but there the lime was of inferior quality. But he now came to the crowning piece of absurdity on the part of the Engineer, and which clearly showed what experience he had had. The Weir was actually in the wrong position. It should have been a quarter or half a mile up, and the supply pipe was actually 20 or 21 feet above the bed of the river, so that in the event of a scarcity of water it would have been found essential to have a steam engine to assist.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT, at this stage, drew the attention of the hon. gentlemen to the specific object of the motion, which was to obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General in reference to the liability of the late Engineer to the Adelaide Water Works. He apprehended there could be no objection to the hon. gentleman referring to documents before the House, but to make statements without affording the party affected by them an opportunity of answering them was, he thought, hardly fair under the circumstances, in addition to which these statements must be placed before the Attorney-General if they were to have any influence with him in forming his opinion.

The Hon. Dr. DAVIES said if any public undertaking had been mismanaged, how was a member of Parliament to bring it forward, as it was his duty to do as a representative of the public. All that he had done was to state the grounds of his complaint. He did not know how he was to afford Mr. Hamilton an opportunity of reply unless he waited till that gentleman had obtained a seat in that House. He did not think that the Commissioner of Public Works, as a Minister of the Crown, had acted rightly in passing a vote of censure upon an underling and omitting it as regarded the Engineer. He had brought forward this motion thinking that, as a guarantee that public works should be properly carried out, some token of disapprobation should be passed on public servants who misconducted themselves, particularly as the Commissioner of Public Works had passed a censure upon a subordinate.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY regretted the violent attacks which had been made by the previous speaker upon the late Engineer of the Waterworks. He had never had the slightest doubt of the integrity of that gentleman, who had already severely suffered by the loss of a lucrative appointment. Errors of judgment occurred in all positions of life and were not confined to engineers. The most celebrated engineers of the day were liable to such errors, and had fallen into them—Brunell, Stephenson, and, in fact, hardly a name that could be mentioned, which was not chargeable with errors of judgment. Although Mr. Hamilton had been employed since, it was in an entirely different capacity, namely, staking out part of the Gawler Railway, a task for which he was quite competent, as well as for the higher branches of his profession. He must say he thought the hon. gentleman was rather hard upon the Engineer.

The Hon. Dr. DAVIES wished to know if he was to receive an answer to his notice of motion.

The PRESIDENT said that had to be decided by the House.

The Hon. S. DAVENPORT wished to say a few words in justice to the gentleman against whom such heavy charges had been brought. There appeared to be great difference between the object sought to be attained by the Hon. Dr. Davies, as expressed in his address, and that which would be inferred from a perusal of his motion. The hon. gentleman said that he merely wished a token of disapprobation, others having received such a token, but, as had been remarked by the Chief Secretary, the Engineer had already received a heavy punishment in consequence of his unfortunate connection with the Weir. For the credit of the Council he was glad that the latter part of the motion had been withdrawn. Such denunciation would not be warranted towards an individual even who had criminally committed himself. Where was the hon. gentleman's charity, that he would for a mere error of judgment, exhibit a gentleman as though he were the verest miscreant in society. The Engineer was not unknown to members of that House, nor was the country without its debts to him, for there were records in previous Legislatures shewing that he had devoted much energy to the advancement of the colony. In great public works, such as railways, for instance, he had brought to bear his talent and activity with the most useful results to the public; and he happened to know that this gentleman in deep silence regretted what had occurred, from far higher motives than those which might be supposed to attach to loss of salary. It would be committing a great moral sin towards him—to attempt to bring down punishment upon him which it could not be shown he merited. The Engineer had rendered some good service to the colony, and let him have the credit of it. The hon. mover had failed to show how he could connect the slight token of disapprobation which he had spoken of with the adoption of such language as was contained in the motion placed before the House.

The Hon. J. MORPHETT did not wish to detract from the soothing effect of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Davenport. The appeal which that hon. gentleman had made to the House was quite in accordance with his high and gentlemanly feeling. In justice, however, to the Hon. Dr. Davies, he must remark that there was a good deal of common sense involved in his motion, although he should have unquestionably opposed it if the latter part had not been expunged It was farcical, he considered, to ask if any proceedings could be taken against the Engineer, because the utmost which could be laid to his charge was an error of judgment If the hon gentleman had so worded his motion that the Council were called upon to express their approval of the course which had been taken by the Government in dismissing the engineer for neglect and want of judgment, he should have entirely gone with him He entirely approved of his dismissal The eloquence of the Hon Mr Davenport must not, however, make them forget that this was a very serious matter, as there was an absolute loss of £8,000, and, independently of this, there would probably be great loss of time in supplying the citizens with water Messrs Freeling, Hanson, and the Speaker of the House of Assembly had declared the work utterly worthless, and it might cost £3,000 or £4,000 more to remove it It was true that similar mistakes were committed by Engineers, and as a proof he might refer to old Westminster bridge, upon which a large sum £100,000 had been expended in placing stone upon the abutments, and it was now found when they were building a new bridge that it would cost £100,000 to remove these stones He believed that the site of the weir was wrong, and that it would be found necessary to go a quarter or half-a-mile up the river The pipes were here, and but for this error the works might be progressing Although he thought the public indebted to the Hon Dr Davies for bringing this matter forward, he could not vote for the motion as it at present stood

The Hon Captain FREELING could not allow the motion to pass without saying a few words He fully agreed with the remarks which had fallen from the Hon S Davenport and having been in connection with the late Engineer to the Waterworks for many years, it was but just to him to state that he never had the slightest reason to believe that he had been actuated by any other than a desire to serve the country which he had adopted He thoroughly exonerated him from any collusion with the contractors, but his fault had been in placing too much confidence in the party whom he appointed to superintend the work Mr Hamilton had constructed many public works, and had been eminently successful There were standing monuments of his zeal and activity He did not believe that the accident which had happened to the Weir would have the effect of impeding the Waterworks, as the earthwork could be going on as though this had not occurred Although Mr Hamilton had failed in this particular portion of the work, he would ask if no credit was to be given to him for other portions, such as the reservoir, the plans for the pipes, the culverts, &c Was he to have no credit for these because one portion was defective

The Hon Dr DAVIES having replied, the motion was put and lost by a majority of 9 The votes on a division being Ayes 1, Noes 10, as follow —

AYES —The Hon Dr Davies (teller)

NOES —The Hon J Morphett, Major O'Halloran, S Davenport, Captain Scott, H Ayers, Captain Bagot, Dr Everard, A Forster, Captain Freeling, Chief Secretary (teller)

CIVIL SERVICE BILL

The CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it involved no new principle It sought to repeal two Acts relating to the Classification of Officers and a Superannuation Fund The progress of the colony since 1852 and the augmentation of the Government service, rendered an additional classification of clerks necessary, and it was proposed by the present Bill to apportion a portion of the good service pay towards the establishment of a Superannuation Fund, so as to allow of retiring allowances being granted to officers who had attained old age, or who were suffering from sickness and infirmity which prevented them from longer retaining their appointments with benefit to the public service The Bill was founded on the recommendation of a Select Committee of the House of Assembly The hon gentleman referred to the third clause, and others which embodied the principle of the Bill, and stated that after careful calculation it had been found that the sums which would be payable to the fund and the balance remaining of the £10,000 voted for a similar purpose, would be sufficient to meet all requirements It would be observed that there was a provision by which any surplus over and above £10,000 which might accumulate would be paid back to the public Treasury Provision was also made for the repayment of contributions to the Superannuation Fund under a former Act, with 10 per cent interest, and also that those who had retired under the Superannuation Act of 1854 should receive such annuities as they were entitled to for the term of their natural lives The schedule was sufficiently explanatory, but he would mention that it was intended no pension should exceed £400, nor could any officer retire without first obtaining a certificate to the effect that he was in ill health, or that he had attained the mature age of 60 years He thought it would be found that the Bill remedied the radical defects in the two former Acts Under those Acts contributions were voluntary but this was taken advantage of by many who never contributed at all No certificate of ill-health or infirmity was necessary under the former Acts, and the consequence was that many who had served the period mentioned in the Acts retired in the prime of life and energy This had brought a heavy claim upon the Government He would only say that he believed it was good policy to enable officers in the public service to look forward to a comfortable pension for their support when overtaken by old age, or sickness, or infirmity It was equally good policy that officers so situated should be allowed to retire, in order that they might be succeeded by younger and more capable men It might be said that Government officers should be left to make a provision out of their salaries for their declining years, but it was notorious that they did not do so, and they relied, after their energy was gone, upon provision being made for them when they appealed in forma pauperis No doubt such provision would be made for them, but the Bill before the House would in fact enable the officers to make a provision for themselves, and he therefore begged to move it be read a second time

The Hon Captain SCOTT seconded the motion

The Hon H AYERS rose to oppose the Bill for many reasons, not the least of which was that he was opposed to pensions altogether The Bill should more properly be called a Bill to provide pensions for every officer whose salary amounted to £120 per annum, except responsible officers and the Judges He had yet to learn that civil servants of the Government had any peculiar claim for pensions He had yet to learn their avocations were such that they injured their health or shortened their lives Their habits were of a very peaceful nature, for they walked or rode into town at a not very early hour and left early in the afternoon He really thought such labor might be undergone without any destruction of the physical powers If any one class were better able to make provision for old age than another, he believed it was Government officers, as they were not exposed to those contingencies which parties were who were in private employment They had fixed salaries and were in a position to put by a certain sum as a provision for sickness or old age Government officers as a class were in a better position to provide for themselves than any other class in the colony So much for the general principle of pensions He had hoped the Chief Secretary would have pointed out why it was found necessary to repeal the laws in force in reference to provision for Government clerks Some time ago, in 1854, a former Legislature offered, as a sort of nest egg, £10,000 to assist in forming an insurance society amongst themselves, and if the officers had taken any interest in the matter they could readily have raised a fund by which they could have given assistance to those who became unfitted for labor The Act left it open to officers to contribute or not, but as the Government took no action in the matter, the officers allowed it to drop through, and subsequently, in consequence of a resolution of both Legislatures, the present Government or a recent Government, paid back a large sum of contributions which had been received as would be seen by Council Paper 57 of 1858 No doubt the Government having taken that course were placed in a most awkward position in reference to claims under the Act of 1854, but he believed if the present Bill were passed it would soon place the Government in a still more awkward position The Chief Secretary had stated that careful calculations had been entered into, but the hon gentleman had not given the House a single figure, he had not shewn what amount would be raised, how many were already on the pension list, and how many would probably be when this Bill became law The Chief Secretary had stated that this Bill was founded upon a resolution of a Select Committee of the House of Assembly, but there was nothing in the evidence taken before that Committee to warrant the conclusion which they had arrived at Not a single figure, not a single table had been produced, there was no comparison between the relative pensions and premiums, and those which would be charged and granted by insurance companies All was surmise—all was guess-work There was nothing whatever to justify the Council in passing such a Bill If it were passed it was quite possible that within two or three years they might be called upon to grant a large sum to make up a deficiency which had been created under this Bill The only thing in reference to which there was no doubt was that the Bill was to secure a pension to every Government officer who had a salary of £120 per annum It was not a question whether the balance of the £10,000, and the contributions would amount to sufficient to grant pensions, but there was a positive pension set forth by this Bill, and that, too, without any authority in the shape of figures He should, therefore, move that the Bill be read again that day six months It was nonsense to apply the term good-service pay as it was applied in this Bill What he understood by good service pay was a reward for extraordinary services rendered by a man, as distinguished from others, but here every officer was to receive good service pay, as it was termed, and he consequently objected to the use of the term in that sense Allusions had been made to public faith He was the last man to propose to cut covenants or to run from a bond, but the Government had provided £10,000, and he would say, secure those who came under that fund, but stop there, and that was going far in advance of what the Government were pledged to The Chief Secretary had said that it was good policy to hold out to a Government officer the prospect of being provided for in his old age, but he (Mr Ayers) contended it was degrading to him, as it was the duty of every man to provide for old age, and if Government officers were bound to do so they would be found more self reliant Then he would suggest that the Government should look amongst subordinates for heads of departments, and hold forth a prospect to them of raising themselves to the head of the departments with which they were connected This would do more to raise the character of the Government service than any promise of a pension which would never be received He would also point out that if an officer were called suddenly away from the colony he would not receive a farthing of this good service pay, as it was termed, for all his contributions to the fund would be swept away simply by his retirement from the province This was a point which required grave consideration Age, health, occupation, and habits, must all be taken into consideration before any scale could be framed by which the House would be guided Who ever heard of an insurance Company granting an annuity without knowing something of the health habits &c, of the party He looked upon the Bill as a crude, indigested measure, and certainly not such as the Council would be justified in passing

The Hon A FORSTER seconded the amendment, because he was desirous of defeating any attempt to impose a huge pension list upon the colony, and to convert the Government into a life assurance association The Chief Secretary had stated that no new principle was involved in the Bill, but that only convinced him that the hon gentleman had only cursorily considered the measure He contended there was a new principle introduced in the Bill, and that was that every person entering the Government service should be entitled to a pension after a certain period of service It placed the country in this position, that it would be saddled with a pension in connection with every person who entered the Government service No reduction could be made in departmental expenditure without considering the interests of every officer connected with the Government Every one entered the service is a life tenant, and could not be discharged without his claims for compensation being considered That was a state of embarrassment in which the Government ought not to place itself But he objected altogether to the principle of pensions, which he contended were degrading, corrupting, and debasing to public servants The present Bill placed a Government officer in this position, that he was recognised as a person who could not take the ordinary precautions which society generally took in reference to old age The Government had no more right to pension every Government officer when he was past service, than they had to pension every colonist similarly situated If the Government thought they were bound to establish a pension list in reference to those who had received the Government money for 20, 30, or 40 years, they were certainly bound to make similar provision for those who contributed to the taxes of the colony But what after all was this Pension List? Notwithstanding all that had been said about the careful calculations which had been made, it was clear that no such calculations had been made Supposing it were right that every Government officer should receive a pension after a certain time, then it was quite clear that the payments proposed to be made could not by any possibility be paid by the contributions contemplated Those amounts went to the extent of £400 per annum and he would make the remark that they had not to think the Government that that amount had been fixed as the maximum as originally the Government intended to go much further Even that amount could not be paid without doing injustice to a great many subscribers to the fund The average of retiring annuities under the fund would be about £300 per annum It was not probable that parties generally would retire until they were in a position to claim something like that amount The hon gentleman referred to the People's Provident Society and the Australian Provident Society to shew that there was a difference of fully 50 per cent between the annuities proposed to be granted by the Government and those which could be secured by similar payments to either of the above named institutions He was aware that the difference in the value of money would be urged, but the scheme was, he contended, crude and untangible. He could not conceive anything more depressing than young men 20 years of age entering the service, and having to look forward to a dry service of 45 years before they could become recipients of the fund to which they were called upon to contribute But he had another objection to the Bill, for he believed it was an attempt to initiate a scheme of life insurance, to enable persons to retire upon pensions of £400 per annum who had in reality contributed very little to the fund It would be found that under this Bill persons, at the end of five years, who had contributed about £200 would be enabled to retire for life upon £400 a-year If the Government could carry out such a scheme fairly and equitably to all parties, they would be clever indeed, but he trusted that House would not commit the country to such a Bill The greater portion of Government officers had petitioned against it, and had stated that they did not wish to have anything to do with it (Chief Secretary—"No, no") The hon gentleman must be aware that a memorial had been sent in from a large number of Government officers, praying the House not to proceed with the Bill Another objection which he had to the Bill was that the colony could not afford it The public would rise up in arms against the Bill if it were passed He should actually be afraid to face his constituents if he assented to enforcing so heavy a burden upon them If the Chief Secretary asserted that good and efficient officers could not be obtained without some such provision as was proposed by this Bill, he could only inform the hon gentleman that if it were known through the length and breadth of the land that the whole of the Government offices were vacant, and that no pensions would be given, there would be more than sufficient applications from competent parties to fill the whole of the offices in one day If the Government thought it absolutely necessary to say that Government officers could not make provision for themselves in the ordinary way—if they were such a set of spendthrifts—so below the ordinary status in prudence and economy—that it was absolutely necessary that the Government should make provision for them and that the parties should contribute, then he would suggest that the premiums should be deposited not with the Government but with some Insurance-Office in London or in the colony He would never be a party to supporting a proposition that Government clerks receiving a salary of 120*l* per annum and good service pay should be called upon to contribute 35*l* a-year towards a fund from which they had no chance of receiving the slightest benefit The hon gentleman here referred to the good-service pay, showing it was quite possible that a clerk might be receiving a higher salary than one in a nominally higher rank, and consequently that there was no inducement for him to aspire to a higher rank

The Hon Captain FREELING supported the second reading of the Bill, remarking that some time ago a Bill had been introduced for providing for the increase of salaries of Government officers, and that Bill had not yet been repealed It might be presumed that many persons had remained in the service on account of that Bill not having been repealed, and although their position had been improved by the Estimates of 1858, he considered that full justice would not be done unless some Bill, such as the present, was made the law of the land He did not suppose that advantage would be taken of this Bill, if passed, by officers who were not in ill-health, because if they did retire it would be upon considerably less salary than they had previously been receiving It had been said that this Bill was an attempt to fasten an enormous burden upon the country, but what was the simple fact? why that an officer merely received the half of his good-service pay, the remainder going to form a nucleus from which a provision might be made for his old age It was not proposed that the higher officers should receive one penny, and it was not until a number of years that any officer could look forward to receiving a moderate allowance This was the principle of Government service in England, and which rendered it so popular

The Hon J MORPHETT intimated that he should oppose the Bill, considering that the Chief Secretary had not stated any good and sufficient reason for its introduction He believed that gentlemen entered the Government service at as high or higher pay than they could get elsewhere, and were immediately, by virtue of their office, placed in a position in regarded society which many struggled for all their lives He believed that the present Bill would offer a premium for recklessness, and that parties would feel indifferent about making a provision for sickness or old age There might be some cases in which public servants had a right to look to the country for support—military men for instance—but he believed that the scale proposed by this Bill was much higher than the half pay allotted to military men The principle of voluntary contributions was not acceptable, and that was the reason he presumed that it was now proposed to make it compulsory upon a large and intelligent body that they should contribute for the purpose of enabling them to become dependent upon the country for the future In England the calculations of all Life Assurance Societies were based upon hundreds of thousands or millions, but here he believed that only 170 persons had been taken as the basis of calculation

The Hon Capt BAGOT supported the amendment of the Hon Mr Ayers Though not altogether opposed to the principle of Government officers acting in conjunction, providing from their own means for the retirement of those who might have the misfortune to fall under incapacity for performing their duties, he must oppose this Bill, the strong argument against which had been brought forward by the hon Mr Forster, that the country was not in a position to afford it Within the last five years the expenditure upon establishments had been doubled, and those must be blind indeed, who could not see that the prosperity which had favored us was fast vanishing away, rendering retrenchment absolutely necessary

The Hon Captain SCOTT stated that he had merely supported the second reading, in order that the question might be fully discussed in Committee He believed that provision should be made for Government officers, though not in the way proposed by this Bill He did not understand the Bill to be, as stated, a project for the establishment of a Life Assurance Association, but merely to provide for officers retiring from the public service He regretted that the Chief Secretary had not favored the House with a statement regarding the number of officers likely to retire, and the amount of good-service pay which would be contributed The House would then have been better able to decide He should like the House to have a fair view of the amount likely to be paid in, and the number of officers likely to retire under the Bill during the next five years Not that he would for a moment countenance a pension list, but it was to keep out of it that he supported the second reading, thinking that amendments might be made in Committee They would never get rid of a pension list in some shape or other, and, if there were no provision made for retirement of officers from old age or sickness, they would have the Government service lumbered up with old men, unable to work, and too poor to retire He admitted it was the duty of every man to provide for old age, but they must deal with the world as they found it, and, in the absence of some such Bill as the present, he believed that Government officers would be but poorly provided for in their old age

The Hon S DAVENPORT should support the second reading, presuming that the Chief Secretary would be enabled to show that the contributions, with the balance of the £10,000, would be adequate to meet the payments contemplated by the Bill

The Hon Dr DAVIES supported the amendment, entirely agreeing with the remarks of the Hon H Ayers and the Hon A Forster

The CHIEF SECRETARY was conscious that the Bill was not perfect but still considered it calculated to effect the object in view The Hon Mr Ayers had stated he was opposed to good-service pay, and yet good service pay was perpetuated in the Act of 1852, which this Bill proposed to repeal The hon gentleman was proceeding to state that £4,600 of the £10,000 were remaining, and that with the contributions it was estimated the fund would at the end of ten years amount to £50,000, when ——

The Hon H AYERS rose to order, contending that the Chief Secretary was out of order in entering upon matter not previously touched upon, and to which hon members would have no opportunity of replying

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN said the Government would probably lose his vote, unless the Chief Secretary were allowed to make a statement shewing the probable amount of claims upon the fund

The CHIEF SECRETARY stated he was desirous of making such a statement, and hoped it would influence the House in voting for the second reading of the Bill

The Hon A FORSTER, and the Hon J MORPHETT contended that the Chief Secretary was out of order, and the Hon J Morphett, in order to test the feeling of the House, moved that the Chief Secretary be not allowed to proceed with his "present line of remark."

This was carried by a majority of one, the votes, Ayes 6, Noes 5, being as follow —

AYES, 6—The Hon H Ayers, Dr Davies, Captain Bagot, A Forster, Dr Everard, J Morphett (teller)

NOES, 5—The Hon Captain Scott, S Davenport, Major O'Halloran, Captain Freeling, Chief Secretary (teller)

The CHIEF SECRETARY said as he had been prevented by a resolution of the House from making a statement which he believed would have been useful in assisting hon gentlemen to a correct conclusion, he would merely move the second reading of the Bill

The motion for the second reading was lost by a majority of 3 The votes Ayes 4 , Noes 7 being as follows —

AYES —The Hon Captain Freeling, S Davenport, Captain Scott, Chief Secretary (teller)

NOES —The Hon Dr Davies, Dr Everard, Major O Halloran, Captain Bagot, J Morphett, A Forster, H Ayers (teller)

The House adjourned at half-past 5 o'clock till 2 o clock on the following Tuesday

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 30

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

THE AGENT GENERAL

Mr STRANGWAYS gave notice that on the following day he should ask the Treasurer whether the Agent-General had given security for the due performance of his duties, and if so, the amount and the names of his sureties

MR J M STUART

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on Friday next, he should move that there be laid on the table of the House copies of correspondence between Mr J M Stuart and the Commissioner of Crown Lands, relative to a claim for the discovery of a gold-field

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said it was quite unnecessary to give notice of motion upon the subject, as he was prepared to lay the correspondence upon the table immediately

THE IMPOUNDING ACT

Mr STRANGWAYS was desirous of giving notice of an additional clause to the Impounding Act

The SPEAKER said the hon member was too late His only course was to move that the Bill be recommitted

THE IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS this Bill was read a third time and passed

THE ESTIMATES, 1859

The TREASURER moved that the House go into Committee upon the Estimates for 1859

Mr GLYDE said he had an amendment, or rather an addition, to make to the motion The hon member read the addition, which was to the effect that in the opinion of the House it was inexpedient to discuss each item separately, but that the Committee should simply consider the aggregate amount which should be voted for the service of each department

The SPEAKER remarked that this appeared to be in the shape of an instruction to the Committee, but the Committee already had power to consider the Estimates as pointed out by the hon member's proposal

Mr GLYDE merely wished the House to express an opinion that it was inexpedient to vote each item separately, and consider each salary separately He had carefully avoided so wording his motion that it could be interpreted into an instruction to the Committee

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it would be seen that the effect of the hon member s motion would be to curtail the power of the Committee and to limit it in a way which would be inconsistent with the very reason for which the Estimates were referred to a Committee The practice always was to vote a whole sum for each department, but not till the Committee had had full opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the various items of which that sum was composed The hon member, as he understood, was desirous of moving that the aggregate amount only be considered, but this appeared to him to be altogether inconsistent with referring the Estimates to a Committee, as the effect would be to exclude the consideration of the particular items of which the Estimates were composed

Mr GLYDE wished to understand whether he was in order in bringing forward his amendment

The SPEAKER thought it was in order but that the question that was involved could be discussed in Committee

THE NORTHERN EXPLORATION

Mr STRANGWAYS asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands if he could afford the House any further information in reference to the northern exploration He believed the hon gentleman had received further information upon the subject, and as it was one upon which a great deal of interest was felt, he should be glad if the hon gentleman would in a general way communicate the information

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he had not received any further information than that which had been already published One despatch from Major Warburton had been rendered quite illegible, having been submerged in water Mr Gregory had arrived, but had not brought any additional information

THE ESTIMATES

The House having resolved itself into Committee,

The TREASURER moved that the House agree to the sum of £520 as provision for the Governor in-Chief's establishment for first half-year of 1859 This amount was an increase upon the sum voted for the first half of the present year of £130, and this increase had been caused by an increase in the pay of the messenger from 7s to 8s per day, and there was also an item of £100 for travelling expenses for His Excellency the Governor in-Chief It was well known that the Governor had to proceed occasionally on duty to the interior It was important that His Excellency should do so Such trips were not merely for pleasure but were connected with matters affecting the progress of the colony Formerly a sum had always been placed on the Estimates for this purpose, but it had been omitted one year, and it was now deemed expedient to ask the House to restore it

Mr STRANGWAYS should move that the increased pay for the messenger be struck off, as he had heard nothing from the Treasurer to justify the proposed increase, and as it had been repeatedly remarked during the session that the price of labour had decreased, the salaries of messengers should not be increased without some reason being assigned He should also move that the item of £100 for travelling expenses be struck out If the salary of the Governor-in-Chief were not sufficient, let it be increased to an amount sufficient to cover such expenses as these, but he strongly objected to these petty items being introduced for the Governor and his attendants He had heard that this item was asked for to cover the expenses of the Mounted Police at the Rev Mr Binney s breakfast, but he could not say with what truth

Mr GLYDE said if the Treasurer would consent only to ask a certain lump sum for each department, that would exactly meet his views

The CHAIRMAN presumed that the Treasurer would, in the usual form, move a gross sum, and that it would then be competent for hon members to go into the items

Mr STRANGWAYS presumed from what had fallen from the hon member for East Torrens that he merely wished the gross amount put, and, if so he saw no objection to this course, but the Treasurer would have to explain the various items, and any hon member objecting to any particular item would, he presumed, be at liberty to bring forward that objection It appeared to him that the point raised by the hon member for East Torrens was a distinction without a difference

Mr GLYDE rose to explain the course which he thought the Committee ought to adopt Last year sometimes the Treasurer asked for a gross sum for a particular department, and sometimes the various items were considered separately He wished to lay it down as a distinct principle that the House had no right to go squabbling through the various items Let the Treasurer ask a certain sum for a department, and let him explain the various items, if he liked , but he would remind hon members who thought with him that there should be economy and retrenchment, that if they proceeded to the consideration of each item, they would probably find, when they had got through the Estimates, that they had not reduced the total amount by more than 2½ per cent If the Government were allowed to ask for sums in detail, the Government being combined were sure to beat (Laughter) The House might agree that a certain amount should be struck off the total cost of a department, but when they came to consider separate items personal feelings arose, and the party whose salary it was proposed to reduce probably had friends in the House who took his part, and the probability was that, after a tedious discussion, little or no reduction was effected If they really wished the cost of establishments to be less, and that they should be enabled to effect retrenchment, their discussions must be free from petty squabbling in reference to items What was more monstrous for instance than that that House should be solemnly engaged in discussing whether the pay of a messenger should be 7s or 8s a day He was prepared to withdraw his motion if the Treasurer would merely ask a total amount for each department It was the duty of the Executive, he considered, to take upon themselves the unpleasant duty of cutting down the salaries of officers or turning them off, and not to throw the onus and odium upon that House

Mr PEAKE supported the views of the last speaker, which were similar to those which he had expressed during the last session He believed the House had taken up an invidious function in dealing with the items upon the Estimates seriatim The result of this was that hon members were canvassed by one clerk wanting an increase, and by another who contended that he had been unfairly dealt with, in fact, members of that House were hunted about by Government officers Members did not go to that House to exercise the functions of the Government, to whom the details belonged If hon members thought that any department should be curtailed, the onus of doing so should rest with the Government It was for the Government to see how this could be effected, and not for the House to tell them The Government should know how the Government service could be best carried out He hoped the House would insist upon the Estimates being dealt with in the manner which had been suggested by the hon member (Mr Glyde) He believed it would have a most salutary effect, and that it would be the only way in which the House would be able thoroughly to economise He recollected last session one hon member moved that "sundries" be struck out, but the Government said that they could not do that, because it was from that very item that the soap and candles and other sundries were supplied If, however, the hon member who objected to this item had moved that the departments be managed for a certain sum, it would have rested with the Government to determine how the necessary retrenchment could be effected

Mr BARROW considered this question one of the highest importance, and that a proper time had been chosen for its discussion The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) had stated that the Government were firmly bound together but he had not stated whether they were bound together for the purpose of promoting or resisting retrenchment He had heard nothing, as yet, to convince him that the Government were enemies to reasonable retrenchment (Hear, hear) There was a decreasing revenue, and an increasing expenditure upon establishments That was a great fact, and had not been altogether satisfactorily accounted for by the allusion to the Lands Titles Office For the ensuing half year there was an increase for establishments of £10,000, and this in the face of a considerably decreasing revenue As representatives of the people and guardians of the public purse it was their duty to put a stop to such a state of things (Hear, hear) He should be glad to see £10,000 flow into the Treasury from a measure which it had been thought by some would not have passed that House, and now that they had obtained that they should endeavor to obtain another £10,000 It would be a disgrace to that House if, with a considerably decreasing revenue, they assented to an increased expenditure upon establishments He quite agreed with the remark that they would not succeed in effecting the retrenchment which was so desirable if each item were considered seriatim He was not unwilling to take the trouble of going separately and singly through the salaries, if it were thought desirable to do so, and if that plan were adopted he should certainly go with the hon member (Mr Strangways) and place the messenger at Government House upon the same footing, which he had occupied during the present year, but he should first like to be informed whether it was not possible that the item might be struck out altogether, and if the duties were not of such a nature that they might be discharged between the Private Secretary and the keepers of the Government Demesne (Laughter) Of course an admirable case could be made out for the retention of this messenger, and so he had no doubt there could be for another He should like to be informed also, whether it was necessary that the paltry sum of £30 should be expended on furniture upon Government House, considering the immense sums that had been lavished already He thought it would be the best way to deal with the Estimates in a lump sum, leaving the Government the duty of dividing it as they might think fit He fully concurred with the hon member for Encounter Bay as to the objectionable nature of the £100 proposed for His Excellency's travelling expenses No doubt the Governor travelled, and so did the Chief Secretary and so would the Treasurer no doubt, when he got time, but that House was not bound to pay every gentleman's travelling expenses, particularly when the gentleman had an income of his own to enable him to pay for his his own picnics and excursions, and he should, therefore, move that item be struck out He should like to see the item of £520 reduced to £317 12s as he had indicated That was his own view, and he threw out the remarks which he had in order that the question might be discussed He repeated that he had heard nothing from the Government to induce him to believe that they were opposed to moderate retrenchment, and he thought the least they could do would be to strike off the £10,000 additional upon the Establishments for the first six months of the coming year as compared with the past, particularly as they had just cause to apprehend a deficiency in the revenue during the first six months of the year 1859

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it had been truly stated by the hon member for East Torrens, Mr Barrow, that this was a question of the highest importance He could quite understand the feelings of hon members upon the question, who, though desiring retrenchment, felt how difficult it was to combine economy and efficiency, and who were desirous of recognizing what was due to a falling revenue with what was due to the persons who were in Government employ He could quite understand hon members endeavoring to escape the difficulty of solving this question by throwing it upon the Government If the House, after a full discussion of the Estimates for any particular department, would say that there should be retrenchment, without consideration of the various items, the Government would then endeavor to effect retrenchment in that department consistently with the claims of public servants, but he would remind hon members that, although they had escaped, or would by this means escape, the unpleasant feeling consequent upon cutting down any particular item, the Government, in doing so, would, in reality, only act as the representatives of that House, and what the Government did as the Executive would, in reality, be the act of the Legislature and of hon members in their legislative capacity He merely wished to point out that, although hon members might escape the unpleasantness of being called to account by any particular individual for having cut down his salary, they would, in reality, be as much responsible for having done so as though they had entered upon the consideration of each particular item That was one remark and the other was that although the House voted a special sum for services, which sum was included in the Appropriation Act, he had shown already that it was impossible to arrive at that sum without a consideration of the various items of which that sum was composed For instance, in reference to the amount under discussion, no one had objected to the salary for the Private Secretary, nor did he think that anyone could No one had objected to the Keeper of the Government Demesne or his assistant, and supposing the Estimates were amended as had been suggested by the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), the Government would understand that the items not objected to were approved, and that the deduction must be made from those which had been objected to If, however, without considering whether officers received more than a fair salary for the duties which they had to perform the House merely said that there must be retrenchment, they would leave the Government in the dark, and the Government in effecting retrenchment might strike off some officer according to their views of the subject whom the House might be desirous of retaining It was possible that the Government might effect retrenchment precisely in that part where the House considered it should not be made If the Government were told simply to effect retrenchment, but to do it in that part which was considered most susceptible of retrenchment, he had no objection, but the House should give what should always accompany responsibility—the power of acting according to their judgement without reference to the views of hon members If the House adopted what he believed would be the proper course, they would consider the items in detail and inform the Government what views the Legislature had as to the items which ought to be reduced The Government would then carry into effect the views expressed by the House in reference to reduction If the House did not do this the Government would carry out reduction according to their own views

Mr BURFORD said the great advantage of the plan he advocated would be the saving of time which it would effect It was notorious that there was a great sacrifice in going through all the departments separately The House should not forget the absolute necessity which had arisen for reducing the expenditure, from two circumstances Some time ago, in consequence of the greatly advanced price of all articles, it became necessary to add a bonus to all salaries, and that bonus had since become incorporated with the salaries, but now that the country had arrived at a time of considerable trial and difficulty, it could not maintain its expenditure at such a rate as formerly That was a strong argument in favor of reducing the amount in the aggregate. He approved of the suggestion that the House should not go into the items They should only regard each department as a whole, and by so doing they would escape the invidious task alluded to by the Attorney-General He was sorry that the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), whilst suggesting in unison with his colleague that the House should not go into details, had himself done so. His (Mr Burford's) idea was, as he had said before, namely, to adopt a per centage upon the amount which should run through the whole Estimates, as by that means there would be the greatest possible fairness in going through the departments. He would suggest something like 25 per cent. as the amount to be struck off. (A laugh.) With action like that the House would get through the business quickly, even though it should not prove quite agreeable to certain parties. (Hear, hear, and laughter.)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had shown the course which the House should take if it followed the plan of that hon. member's colleague, viz., to strike out every item but the allowance of the Governor-in-Chief. They should either strike out the details or make them agree with the gross deduction, and in the latter case they would have to go through the Estimates in the regular way. If the Committee thought, as he believed on mature consideration they would not, think that 520*l* was not the proper sum, then they would have to say in what particular the saving was to be effected. He believed it would be found necessary to follow the old plan.

Mr SOLOMON quite concurred in the amendment of the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde).

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired whether the amendment of the hon. member (Mr Glyde) was before the House, or whether in fact there was anything before the House except the item.

The CHAIRMAN said the question before House was that instead of 8s. per day 7s. should be substituted.

Mr SOLOMON understood that the amendment was before the House.

Mr GLYDE said there was a misunderstanding. His amendment was "That this House is of opinion that it is inexpedient to discuss and vote each salary and item of expenditure on establishments separately, and that the Committee of Supply should therefore proceed to consider the various aggregate amounts to be granted for the services of each department as appearing on the Estimates." Although this amendment was not formally before the House he intended moving it.

Mr SOLOMON found that for the half year ending on the 30th June, 1858, this item amounted only to £410 9s., whilst for the half year ending 30th June, 1859, it was set down at an increase of £109 1s. These were not times for an increase in the Estimates. If they handled the items in the gross and determined by how much they should be reduced they would leave the Government to carry out the intentions of the House in the best manner they could. But if this were impossible, he should be prepared, in some instances, to vote for reductions of large amount, and in others for striking out the whole sum. It was rather unusual, when there was a probability of a decrease in the revenue, to have an increase in the expenditure. Amongst other items there was one which, if the House took the Estimates item by item, he should oppose altogether. He alluded to the sum for the Chief Commissioner of Police.

The CHAIRMAN said that the only question before the Committee was, the allowance under the head "Governor-in-Chief."

Mr SOLOMON—Then I am to understand that I am not to go beyond that item.

The CHAIRMAN—Not beyond that department.

Mr SOLOMON said, in reference to this particular item, he did not consider the present a time to undertake excessive expenditure, but instead of going beyond the expenditure of 1858, the House should endeavor to reduce it. If it could be shown that one messenger was necessary, it might also be shown that two or three were. The House should cut its coat according to its cloth, and say what was and what was not necessary. He (Mr Solomon) was willing to take the onus of doing this upon his own shoulders. (Hear, hear.) He did not consider it necessary to have a keeper of the Government demesne and a messenger also, as in all probability one individual could do the business of both, or if the keeper did not do the work of the messenger the assistant keeper could. He would move that £109 1s. be struck off the total amount, and let the Government decide how the reduction was to be effected.

Mr REYNOLDS thought that the plan of voting lump sums would be found very inconvenient, whereas if one hon. member suggested a reduction in one place and another in another, some saving must be effected. He looked upon the item of £100 for travelling expenses for His Excellency as one which, having been omitted from the Estimates for two years, should not be put on now. He understood that the Governor's allowance of £4,000 a year included everything; but if the amount was not sufficient, let the Government say so, and come forward with a proposal for an increased salary. He believed the sum was never intended to be put on again, and therefore he should vote against it.

Mr COLLINSON moved that the House divide.

The motion was then put, and carried without a division.

On the next item, "Assistant Keeper of Government Demesne, 155 days, at 7s."

Mr GLYDE moved the amendment of which he had previously given notice.

The CHAIRMAN considered the amendment inadmissible at that period of the debate.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL suggested that it was important that the question submitted by the hon. member should be discussed. He would suggest whether the matter could not be put in this form, that instead of voting on each item the House should proceed at once to vote upon the total sum for each department.

Mr GLYDE had understood the hon. the Treasurer to ask for £520 for the department. He had not before had the opportunity of moving his amendment, but it appeared now that the House had got back to the item of £72 8s. for the messenger. He was not surprised that the Government did not like the responsibility which he sought to impose on them. It was natural that the Government should try to throw the unpleasant duty of making reductions upon private members; but as the Government had salaries for doing this duty they should perform it.

Mr STRANGWAYS said if the hon. member was desirous of relieving the House of all responsibility and the Government also of all responsibility, he could adopt no course more easy than the one proposed. The Treasurer would have nothing more to do than to take a small sheet of paper and mark down the various sums on it, and the House could not make him responsible. The course proposed would be very convenient to the Ministry, and very inconvenient to the House, inasmuch as the discussion would be three times as great as under the old system.

Mr HAY said if hon. members would only glance down the Estimates they would see the impossibility of pursuing the course proposed. He would allude, for instance, to the large item of £18,000 for the police. If the hon. member for East Torrens were to propose that £3,000 should be struck off this amount, would not the House like to know whether it was to be taken off by abolishing the Chief Commissioner of Police, or from the private policemen? Again, in the Post-Office, if it was proposed to reduce the expenditure from £8,000 to £6,000, would not the House wish to know whether it was the letter carriers who were to be dismissed, and whether the effect of the reduction would be that the public would have to wait half an hour at the window for their letters. It was for the House to say when the Estimates were brought in where reductions should be made. The responsibility rested with the House.

Mr BARROW said his only objection to the amendment was lest the Government would have to take back the Estimates for amendment. ("No, no," from the Attorney-General.) He quite agreed with the hon. member (Mr Glyde), and thought there were strong reasons for the course which that hon. member recommended, but there were serious practical difficulties in the way. It was said that if the £18,000 for the police was to be reduced the House would insist on knowing where the reduction was to be made. But he (Mr Barrow) believed that if the House went through the Estimates item by item they would not effect such reductions as were necessary. It would be not only in order but quite reasonable to say to the Government, "You have put £95,000 down for establishments, and we can only give you £80,000, so you must retrench £15,000." He had feared that the Government would have been obliged to take back the Estimates, and he did not wish that to be the case; but he was delighted to find now that such would not be the result. As to the responsibility of hon. members as the representatives of the people, it was not from any desire to shirk that responsibility that they did not wish to go through the Estimates in detail. It was not the fear of being assailed by Government clerks that deterred them from doing so, but they did not know as well as members of the Government where reductions could be made. It was not the fear of responsibility but the want of information which prevented them from acting in the matter. On some items hon. members might give an opinion, but on others it was only members of the Government who could do so, although hon. members might be convinced that on the totals a saving could be effected.

Mr PEAKE said the hon. the Attorney-General had stated that if the House considered it desirable to reduce the expenditure, the Government would be prepared to carry out those views, but the hon. member added that if the House only dealt with the details, the Government would be left in the dark. He (Mr Peake) would say that it was the duty of Government to see that every department was filled efficiently. The hon. member for Gumeracha spoke of the police as a department which could be retrenched; but they were like a hive of bees one upon another. ("Order," from the Chairman.) He (Mr Peake) was merely illustrating the impossibility of retrenchment. It had been urged as an objection to dealing with the details, that the Government would have to strike out all the items and leave nothing but the totals, and that, therefore, the House would be in the dark.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon. member had made a mistake in quoting what he (the Attorney-General) had said. He had said that if the House did not state its opinion on the items the Government would be left in the dark. But he had also said that if the House chose to throw upon the Government the responsibility of acting in the matter, and if they gave the Government the power which should accompany such responsibility the Government would accept the task

Mr REYNOLDS could not see that the Government would be left in the dark whether the House voted more or less than the proposed amounts The wish of the House was to economise, and he was delighted that the Government were prepared to assist in this object As the Government had had a long recess, he presumed they had carefully considered the Ways and Means, and, therefore, he fancied that the sums upon the Estimates were really necessary for the efficient working of the departments This being his opinion, he was pleased to find the Government prepared to pare down the items, and, perhaps, when the Appropriation Bill was introduced they could pare down a little more

The TREASURER said he should first deal with the statement that the expenditure on the Estimates was increasing, whilst the revenue was diminishing The reverse was the case, inasmuch as the Estimates, instead of an increase, showed a decrease The sum total of increase was £7,998 11s 10d, and of decrease, £8,290 14s 11d, showing a net increase of £292 3s 1d, and that covered the cost of the new department of the Registrar-General of Deeds, amounting to £2,164 It also covered a sum of £880, caused by placing the salaries of clerks of Local Courts who were hitherto paid by fees upon the Estimates The fees would in future be paid into the Treasury, and the clerks' salaries placed upon the Estimates Then there was an increase of £200 on the present Estimates for the relief of the destitute poor, the number of whom must necessarily increase with the increase of population, and an increase of £744 for education, so that the Estimates for this year were less than those of last year in respect of the items which appeared on the Estimates of last year Of course there must be new establishments when the House legislated on important matters like the Lands Titles Registration Department Again the Observatory and Electric Telegraph Department was a new department The Government could not be said to increase the expenses of establishments when the old establishments were reduced, and the only expense was caused by adding new establishments to meet the legislation of the House Not one of the salaries had been increased except in the Observatory and Telegraph department which had been necessarily remodelled In all the other salaries there was no increase With regard to the Insolvent Court and the Registrar of Deeds, there had been an increase in these departments, but these were owing to the legislation of the House, and the increases appeared upon the Supplementary Estimates which had already been sanctioned by the House, and he (the Treasurer) had given the reasons why the Government made the increases

Mr BURFORD thought it of no consequence that the House should know for the time how the reductions were made If any injustice was done, the House would be made acquainted with it, and could then rectify it As to the proposal of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), for a reduction of the police estimate from £18,000 to 10,000, it would be a very sweeping alteration, but he believed it was wanted

Mr DUFFIELD, although had he known in the beginning of the session that the Government could strike off such a sum, he would perhaps have wished to strike off £10,000 from the Estimates, still thought as the House had gone into Committee there was no other course but to go on item by item Otherwise hon members would say that the Government, instead of taking £100 a-year off the pay of John Smith' ought to have taken it from Jack Jones Hon members should not shirk the responsibility For his part he had never been hunted by any Government clerk, and he hoped hon members held such positions that Government clerks would feel that it was of no use for them to make any applications for favors

The item was then put and passed

The item, travelling expenses of Governor and suite, £100, was negatived

Mr DUFFIELD remarked, in reference to the keeper and assistant keeper of the Government demesne having each 7s a day, that it was unusual for a superior and an inferior officer to be paid at the same rate

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the keeper had a cottage rent free, which the assistant had not

Mr GLYDE moved that the total amount for the department be reduced to £380 19s The amount voted for the last half-year was £410 12s, instead of £520 He would strike off from this the £30 for furniture and sundries

The £30 for furniture, &c, was then put and lost, and the total of £380 19s was agreed to

On the next item Executive Council, £165

Mr BURFORD moved that the first clerk be reduced to £110, and the incidental expenses from £25 to £15

The TREASURER explained that the sum of £20 set down as good service pay was already provided for by the Civil Service Bill which the House lately passed

Mr SOLOMON moved that the item be struck out altogether, as he believed there was no necessity for the office The Private Secretary had time enough to take the minutes of the Council meetings

Mr BURFORD'S amendment was then put and lost

Mr HAY wished to know from the Treasurer whether if the Civil Service Bill now before the Legislative Council passed, this good service pay would be made an addition to the salaries of officers or not If necessary he should move that the £140 in this case include the good service pay

The TREASURER said the good service pay was only put down to show how it would affect each individual If the Bill was thrown out in the Council the Government would not pay the good-service pay unless the House passed a resolution authorising such payment

Mr PEAKE said the hon member had laid down a doctrine from which he (Mr Peake) must dissent If the reporters understood the hon member as he (Mr Peake) did the report would have a very curious appearance (A laugh)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that any such vote of the House would be embodied in the Appropriation Act, which must have the sanction of both branches of the Legislature

Mr REYNOLDS understood that at present the House was not voting the good-service pay at all ("Hear, hear," from the Attorney-General)

Mr HAY asked whether it was necessary to have it distinctly stated that the £140 included the good service pay, as he would rather such should be the case

Captain HART stated that if the Civil Service Bill was rejected by the Council, another Bill would require to be brought in to repeal the Acts at present in force

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL corroborated this statement

Mr BARROW thought a great deal had been said about the £20 and very little about the £140 It might have been a very unreasonable proposition of the hon member (Mr Solomon) to strike the item out, but it was just what would occur when the House was called upon to express an opinion on matters which only members of the Government could be acquainted with He presumed the Executive Council did not meet very often, or that its proceedings were not very laborious (A laugh) He should like very much to have a return of the amount of service rendered by its Secretary Not having the honor to attend Executive Councils, he did not know how far the office might be laborious It really did not appear so very absurd a proposition that the Private Secretary of his Excellency should attend the Governor at meetings of the Executive Council, and take minutes of proceedings The Private Secretary was a gentleman of very obliging demeanor, who did not seem to spare himself trouble In fact, this gentleman sometimes even acted as messenger, and he (Mr Barrow) could not see why he should not act as Secretary to the Executive Council If he was wrong in supposing this possible, perhaps the Government would set him right

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Executive Council was a body which was recognised not merely by Her Majesty as one which should advise the Governor in the exercise of all his functions, but it was also recognised by the Legislature of the colony, which required the Governor to do all important acts by and with the consent of the Executive Council It was therefore necessary that there should be a Secretary to the Council, and also that, as a person being present at the confidential discussions on matters with which the Government had to deal, he should be a person whose position and character were such as would enable the Government to rely upon his secresy and fidelity He (the Attorney-General) could bear testimony to the thorough fitness of the present Secretary, who had filled his post for several years and performed the duties efficiently and faithfully With regard to the Private Secretary being able to fulfil the duties, as far as he (the Attorney-General) could judge he could not do so without one office or both suffering The duties of both offices had increased very much within four or five years, and though at one time it was quite possible that one person could perform both duties, the combined duties were now more than quadrupled as compared with what they were, so that it was not possible for one person to perform the duties without assistance, the cost of which would nearly equal the amount now asked for He did think that where the duties had been for years performed efficiently and faithfully by one gentleman the House should not deprive that gentleman of his office for the saving here involved He believed too that independently of the personal matter the saving would not be warranted on other grounds

Mr SOLOMON said the hon the Attorney-General had referred to the private respectability of this gentleman, and this was just what he (Mr Solomon) anticipated from the system of taking item by item He (Mr Solomon) did not know this gentleman, who might be of as high respectability as any one in South Australia, but that was not the question The question was, could the office be dispensed with? and he (Mr Solomon) had not heard the Attorney-General say that it could not He had heard the hon member say that if the office was abolished further clerical assistance would be wanted, but hon members who knew how plentiful such clerical assistance was here knew that it could be procured at a very small cost

The item £140 for the Clerk's salary, was then put and carried without a division

The next item, Incidental Expenses £25, was reduced to £15

On the next item, President of the Legislative Council £325

Mr BURFORD was desirous of seeing the total of this department reduced from £2 150 to £1,600, and the reductions arranged by the President and Speaker

Mr Strangways said the easiest way would be instruct the hon the Attorney-General to prepare an Appropriation Bill and bring it in at once This would relieve hon members from their attendance in the House and remove many small difficulties Unless however, the hon member could point out his objection to the vote he had no right to ask the House to go with him

The Treasurer moved an alteration under the head "salaries" to the effect that occasional assistance and short-hand reporting be made £250, and payment of witnesses £50

Agreed to

Mr Hallett asked whether this sum included the index

Mr Glyde moved that the amount for shorthand reporting be £125

Mr Strangways asked whether the largeness of the amount was not caused by the unusual number of Select Committees during the present session

The Treasurer, in reply to Mr Hallett, said that no part of the vote was for the index, as that went in the present year

Mr Hallett moved that the present vote should include £50 for the index Considering that the index of the Hansard cost £39, £50 was only a reasonable remuneration for the index

The Treasurer said the hon member could not move an increase in the item without an address

Mr Hallett did not want to make any increase, but that the £50 should be included in the vote

Mr Reynolds thought the clerical assistance of the House was sufficient to provide an index without any special vote

Mr Hallett explained that this was not the usual index of the session, but one for a previous period

The amendment was then agreed to

Mr Glyde moved that the total of £2,150 for this department be reduced to £1,800 He declined to say where the reduction should be made, as it was not his place to do so, but the place of those gentlemen who were paid for doing so unpleasant a duty (Laughter)

Mr Hallett said, unless the hon member could show where there was extravagance, the Government could not reduce the amount

The Chairman declined to put Mr Glyde's amendment

Mr Glyde would move that the Hon the Speaker consult with the Chief Secretary as to where the reductions should be made

The Chairman said that the Speaker knew of nobody beyond that House

Mr Reynolds enquired whether it would not be possible to strike out all votes and insert a lump sum

Mr Strangways asked, why not withdraw the Estimates and introduce an Appropriation Bill at once That would be the simplest plan

Mr Barrow suggested calling the plan of the hon member for Encounter Bay the silliest rather than the simplest plan (Laughter)

Mr Burford was only trying to reduce the amount, and thought that the objections of the Speaker would only have the effect of throwing the whole thing over It would bring him (Mr Burford) in opposition to the hon the Speaker

The Attorney-General reiterated his views of the necessity of going through the items seriatim

Mr Solomon moved that the sum be reduced to £1,935, as he wished to have 10 per cent deducted from every item He acknowledged it would be no part of the duty of the House to call the Government to account after having once given them authority to expend the money

The Chairman said unless the hon member moved some special item he could not put the motion

Mr Peake could not see the difficulty of dealing with the totals instead of the items The House having decided how money was to be appropriated for each section, the Government could revise the Estimates and bring them in again If the custom was adopted here which prevailed at home of laying the Estimates on the table within 10 or 14 days after the meeting of Parliament, all the difficulty would have been avoided

Mr Reynolds said if hon members wished to reduce this department by £200 or £300 or more he would point out that there was far more work in that branch of the Legislature than in the Council, and yet in the Council they had a clerk, an assistant clerk, a keeper of the records and a sergeant-at-arms He would move that the £100 for the assistant clerk and sergeant-at-arms be struck out

The Treasurer remarked that by the Constitution Act the country was obliged to pay the officers of the Upper House not less than those of the Assembly

Mr Reynolds was aware of that, but had yet to learn that that involved the necessity of keeping an assistant clerk

Mr Barrow wished to know whether the provisions of the Constitution Act included any obligation to have the same number of officers in the Council to do one-fourth of the work of the Assembly He wished also to know whether, when the Appropriation Bill, containing the totals for the various departments was brought in, it would be competent for hon members to reduce the items set down against each department If so, why not do it now ?

The Chairman said that when the Committee had gone through the Estimates, the resolution would be reported to the House, and if the House agreed to them, the Appropriation Bill would be ordered to be prepared in accordance therewith, and that he did not think such a thing had ever occurred as to alter the Appropriation Bill thus prepared by order of the House

The Attorney-General was not clear that hon members would be violating the Constitution Act in passing the resolution but he felt that it would be a very curious thing, and almost unseemly without having any communication with the other House, to refuse paying the salaries of officers which that House appointed The Council was the equal of that House in legislative power, except in one respect, and this being the very point in which the two Houses were not equal it would be most unseemly to refuse paying He did not think the House had any right to say that the Council would perform its functions with a smaller number of officers than it had appointed It might be that the Council could spare some of these officers, and, in that case, it would no doubt carry out that spirit of economy which the Assembly was now manifesting

The Chairman said that, by the Standing Orders, the House recognised these officers

Mr Reynolds did not wish to do anything unseemly, but he trusted the spirit of economy in the other branch of the Legislature would induce them to yield this point

Mr Solomon moved for a reduction of 10 per cent, but the amendment was negatived

The original motion was then put and carried

"Office of Chief Secretary," £350

Mr Reynolds suggested that some reduction should be made in this item by reducing the number of clerks by one or two to make up for which those remaining might work a greater number of hours in the day

The item was passed as printed

"Audit, £7[illegible]"

Mr Glyde wished some explanation from the Treasurer as to this item He (Mr Glyde) believed they wanted a different system of audit, one that should be simpler and equally accurate, and which would involve less expense He was not acquainted with the details of the system now in vogue but he knew that in Victoria the whole cost of auditing the Government accounts there was £10,000 per annum and they turned over some seven millions annually, being seven times the amount turned over in this colony, and involving, he presumed seven times the labor

The Treasurer was glad that the hon member had given him an opportunity of explaining, because he could show very clearly that the system in use here was much cheaper than that in Victoria and he could show it in three different ways The hon member proceeded to show that, estimating the revenue of the colony at £450 000, and the auditing at its cost, they would have a per centage of 4s 10d That was exclusive of the loan fund, &c, which, if added, would reduce the percentage to 3s 3d Taking the Victorian transactions at £7,000,000, and the cost of auditing the same, he found that the proportion was 2s per cent in that colony as against 1s 9½d in this, that was with the whole of our transactions included That would shew our audit system was not defective, and that it really cost less than that in Victoria. The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) had asked if they could not audit in a less expensive manner, and he (the Treasurer) answered "Yes," if the House would be satisfied by the mere checking of the figures in the Treasurer's cash-book But if every payment was to be audited, vouchers to be shown for it, and the auditors were to enquire into the authority for these payments they could not possibly do it for a less sum In support of this they might be aware that some time ago a Commission was appointed to report upon the Audit Office, and it came to the conclusion that no alteration in its system or reduction in the expense could be effected with any benefit

Mr Barrow bore testimony to the Audit Department being efficiently conducted, and said no one could doubt the zeal and ability of the gentleman who presided over it But the question was, could not a simpler method be devised which would afford equal security It had been suggested to him that such was feasible, but after all it was a question on which that House could scarcely be expected to suggest what should be done, as it would more properly form a matter of enquiry by a Select Committee, if the Government would not undertake the responsibility The Treasurer, in comparing the relative cost of audit in this colony and Victoria, had made out a case against himself, for if that hon member had added the loan account of Victoria in his calculations of the cost of audit in that colony, as he had done with regard to this, he would have found the cost of audit in South Australia was more in proportion than in Victoria

Mr Glyde rose to explain in reference to a statement he made on a former occasion as to the cost of audit in Victoria He should have said 2s per cent However, he had a paper in his hand which would prove what he now said, that the cost of audit in this colony was double that of Victoria, seeing that we paid 4s 10d per cent

Mr Reynolds would like to know what was the system of audit used in Victoria, they might find that it was a very dear system And under those circumstances, he should not advise a reduction in this department

Mr Strangways said the system in Victoria appeared to be that of allowing public officers to retain any amount of public money in their pockets (A laugh) There was a case of this nature some few months ago, and what was considered very justly a crime in one individual, and punished accordingly, was not so with others, the difference being that some were able to pay up when called upon to do so, and others were not in that position He was assured that the adoption of such a system in this colony might lead to the same results

The item was then put and passed

Police, £18,378

Mr SOLOMON proposed an amendment, That the first item for the salary to the Commissioner of Police should be struck out He considered if the Commissioner of Police could be spared in the exploration in which he had recently been engaged, and which had involved a considerable length of absence, without injury to the force, it was evident such an officer was not required He admitted that the Commissioner of Police had shewn considerable ability in his explorations, and perhaps at some future time the Government would give him other employment It was evident to his mind that there was no necessity for a Commissioner of Police, as the duties of the department had been carried on in an efficient manner during that officer's absence by a subordinate, and he presumed that, in this case, hon members did not require any further illustration to show that a Commissioner of Police, at £650, was not wanted

Mr McELLISTER, who was partly inaudible in the gallery, was understood to say that a great deal of the time of the Commissioner of Police had been expended in visiting the out-police stations, and he thought it was not the business of that officer to do so as the men were instructed to send in monthly accounts While the requisite information, therefore, could be got in this way, he thought it was not at all necessary for the Commissioner of Police to visit each separate station He contrasted the difference between the metropolitan and the mounted police force, the former of which had only one inspector and no clerk, while the latter had two inspectors, a sergeant-major, and a clerk He supported the amendment

Mr REYNOLDS could not go so far as the hon mover of the amendment, because that hon member seemed to confuse Major Warburton with the Commissioner of Police They must have some one at the head of the department The present Commissioner of Police he believed was not to blame ("Hear, hear" from Mr Solomon) It was the Government who were to blame—at all events they had a primâ facie case that there were too many in the department Having said this much, he would suggest that the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) should reconsider his amendment, as it was quite clear that whatever reduction they made they would still want a Commissioner of Police The police were no doubt very expensive and he felt inclined to strike out the whole item of Metropolitan Police, because he thought the Corporate towns should be made to pay for their own police protection He could understand the necessity for keeping up the Mounted Police Force, for in many respects they would be exceedingly useful—in the squatting districts for instance—and he thought the "aristocracy"—(laughter)—might very well be called upon to pay some contribution towards their support The mounted force was composed of a respectable class of men, and from their smartness and general appearance they would be quite an ornament to the squatter's run (Laughter) He was in favor of such an alteration in the system as would provide for the wiping out the Metropolitan Police altogether, and which would leave it to the citizens to provide their own police protection

Mr HAWKER was willing to support the hon member for the Sturt in wiping out the metropolitan police, and he could assure him also that the squatters would be willing to pay for what police protection they required, which would be none at all (Laughter) He could not see why the country should be called upon to pay for police protection in the town The expense of the force was enormous, and he thought the sooner the metropolitan police were supported and regulated by Corporations in which they were wanted the better

Mr STRANGWAYS said, whether they had a Commissioner of Police or not, they must have some chief officer, and it was also desirable that he should be a military man (No) But he maintained the efficiency of the police would be considerably enhanced by having such a person at their head, as thereby, if called upon to give assistance to the military, they would be better fitted to render such assistance and otherwise, instead of being of assistance, they would be likely to be an impediment With respect to the present Commissioner of Police being engaged in exploring, that officer was sent by the Governor, and he might say through the agency of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, at his (Mr Strangways') suggestion (Laughter) It would be found that the officer alluded to had gone 60 miles further than the Government Explorer Mr Babbage ("No, no,") and had given a large practical value to a country the features of which had been hitherto unknown He agreed with the hon member for the Sturt, that the metropolitan police, both in Adelaide and at the Port, excepting the water police, should be struck off, and left to be supported by the city or wherever else they might be required, but he was not prepared to do this at once, because it was evident some scheme would require to be devised to take the place of that which was now in force—perhaps that of levying a police rate in the city, and even if this were decided upon he thought it would be very doubtful whether an Act could be passed between this and the 1st of January to authorize such a rate. He was rather inclined to let the question stand over until the session in June, 1859, and, if some alteration were not made before then, he should vote for the metropolitan police being struck out altogether,

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS hoped the House would not seriously entertain the amendment Everyone must admit that a person to be in the position of Commissioner of Police should be a person of some standing, as the whole moral training of the force depended upon the person who was at its head, and there could be no doubt but that the police force had been brought to a great state of efficiency under the present Commissioner of Police With respect to that officer being appointed to explore, the Government had made such appointment because they thought him peculiarly fitted for the duty, and the context proved that they were not mistaken in their impressions He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) thought it very desirable that the head of the police should have at all times a knowledge of the locality of newly discovered country, as by that means he would be in a position to visit it and provide for police protection to those who might settle in it He had great pleasure in subscribing to what the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had said, viz, that that hon member had suggested that the Commissioner of Police should be sent out He was not inclined to detract from the merits of such suggestion, but he also took credit to himself in recommending the Commissioner of Police to that appointment, and especially when he saw the results which were brought about that of the discovery of a passage across what was supposed to be Lake Torrens This was one of the greatest discoveries which had been achieved in the colony, he considered, and one for which Major Warburton deserved thanks at their hands He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) would say that that gentleman was not deserving of the slightest censure for having been absent on this exploration, as he had been ordered by the Government on this service, and he had performed his duty in obeying that order He had never heard any objection raised to Major Warburton's former absence, on his exploration to the westward, on which occasion as on the present, he had most efficiently performed the duty imposed upon him by the Government As to whether the Metropolitan Police should be supported by the City funds, he thought as the feeling was prevalent amongst hon members, they would be likely eventually to carry such a proposition But the House should remember that the first step after that would be that the Corporation would insist upon receiving all the licence and other fees, which would cause a very considerable reduction in the revenue of this department

Mr SOLOMON said that it might be implied from what had been said by hon members that he censured the Commissioner of Police But he had done nothing of the kind, for he believed him to be a very efficient officer The very fact that he was so efficient, that he was such a splendid explorer had placed the House in the position of knowing that no Commissioner of Police was needed He wished to disabuse them of the impression that he had censured the Police Commissioner It was the office not the officer he alluded to, and he was satisfied they could do without a Commissioner The Inspector, by a slight addition to his salary, could perform all the duties of both Inspector and Commissioner

Mr McELLISTER explained a remark he had before made in allusion to this question

Mr LINDSAY could not support the hon member for the city altogether, as he considered he had not proved his case The temporary absence of the Commissioner of Public Works was no proof that this office was a superfluity Some one must be appointed to the head of the force, and if they increased the salary of a subordinate it would come to pretty much the same thing in the end If the motion had been for striking out the metropolitan police he should have supported it, inasmuch as what was proper for the country in this case was also proper for the town The ingenious principle by which the country was taxed for roads and police protection might be very well applied to the town

The ATTORNEY GENERAL would just allude to the remark of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Lindsay as to the ingenious method they had of providing police in the country districts by local taxation, and he might say if the same plan was adopted in the town that it would be very likely to be attended with the same results, that was, that they would have no police at all The hon member for Burra and Clare had spoken of the high moral standing of South Australia, but no one, he supposed, would deny for a moment that the efficient organization of the police force in this colony had tended to produce this result by driving away from our shores persons of disreputable character, ticket of-leave men, and others, who finding they could not live comfortably in South Australia, had gone off to Canada or elsewhere In England, where there was a desire to throw the burden of the constabulary upon the districts, the police were under the direct supervision of the Secretary of State Crime in a community should be dealt with by the Government In this colony they had by means of the police in Adelaide and at the Port stopped criminals from getting loose, and when they did come here made them feel that it was impossible for them them to remain with safety There would be some justice in a portion of the expense of supporting the metropolitan police being contributed by the city, but then there were other portions of the police, doing duty at the Gaol, at the sittings of the Supreme Court, the Detective Police, all of which should be provided for by Government, and when the House passed an Act, if they did so, to compel the city to support its police, they would find that provision would also have to be made for those portions he had alluded to With regard to the Commissioner of Police, he thought the House would be acting a very ungracious part in dispensing with that gentleman's services in the manner proposed

Mr PEAKE would not go into the items in detail, but would vote on the total He had sufficient confidence in the Commissioner of Police to know that he would not place anything down which was not really required

Dr WARK was very glad to find that the Attorney-General was taking the popular view—(laughter)—but he thought it should not be at the expense of the country districts He thought the time had arrived when the whole system should be adjusted

Mr GLYDE asked whether the House was to understand that the Government would bring in a Bill to provide for the support of the metropolitan police by the city If so, he as a country member would them support the item

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could give no pledge He thought the city should contribute a portion towards the support of the metropolitan police The House must consider too what proportion of the police they would withdraw supposing the city refused He would engage that the whole subject of police protection should be considered by the Government, but not with respect to the city alone

Mr NEALES said the only rowdyism they had in town was that which attended the visits of the country members (Much laughter) It was the collection of persons in the city from the country and the Port, and not the citizens themselves that necessitated police protection

Mr BARROW said one great disadvantage which was experienced in the suburbs was from the fact of the rogues being driven out into them from the city (Laughter) There had, to his knowledge, been frequent and loud complaints made of the unprotected state of those localities, and he hoped in any revision made in the police the suburbs would be included It was very easy to see that the motion to cut out the first item would be lost But they could not say but that they had an efficient police force without a Commissioner —(hear)—and as that spoke volumes of itself he would say nothing further

Mr MILDRED referred to the organization of the police in in England, which in London was under the supervision of a Commissioner of Police, although the citizens paid for their support, and he thought such a principle might be very advantageously adopted here As to the City of Adelaide receiving all the licence fees if they maintained a police force, he took a different view of the case The District Councils that maintained a constabulary did not receive licence fees

Mr LINDSAY moved that the item of £25, "Fees for the destruction of dogs" should be struck out

Mr GLYDE again put the question to the Attorney-General as to what the intentions of the Government were with respect to introducing a Bill He thought it better they should have an explicit understanding

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL repeated that what he said was that the Government would not introduce a Bill to compel the city to entirely support the metropolitan police, but that a measure should be framed by the Government by which the city would be called upon to pay some portion of the expense

Mr SOLOMON moved that the sum of £100 for "fire-engine" be struck out, as, from there being no Fire Brigade, it was unnecessary

Mr STRANGWAYS called the hon member's attention to the great fire at the Port, which occurred some time back, at which the police engine was so much out of order that it was impossible to work it effectively If they wished to keep the engine in a workable state, the item should be allowed

After the several amendments had been put and negatived, the item in the total, was then put and carried

"Sheriff, £360"

Passed as printed.

"Gaols, £1,874 17s 6d"

Mr PEAKE, before this item was put, would wish to elicit the views of the Government as to whether the duties of the Comptroller of Convicts and the Keeper of the Gaol might not be amalgamated and performed by one officer Also, as to the necessity of keeping a separate gaol in Adelaide when they had an establishment at the Stockade

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the gaol in Adelaide was sometimes so filled as to seriously interfere with the classification If they were to remove the gaol in Adelaide, they would have to erect new buildings at the Stockade, and the expense of those would probably exceed any saving they might make for several years to come The subject had before then received the careful attention of the Government, and they had come to the conclusion that no beneficial change could be effected

Mr BARROW called attention to the fact that there were 10 guards, the salaries of whom amounted to £832 for the half year, and that the items for "rations and provisions" had been reduced to £450 from £750 Therefore, either they must have a great stock of provisions on hand, or the number of prisoners must have been reduced If the latter, he could not see that the same number of guards should be required

The TREASURER explained that the sum voted last year for provisions and rations was considerably in excess of what was wanted, and that there therefore was a surplus carried forward

The item was passed as printed

"Post Office £8,702"

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, in answer to Mr Strangways, that the subject of the Telegraph clerks doing extra duty in connection with the Post Office, was under consideration

Item passed as printed

"Education, £9,796 19s 6d"

Mr MILNE asked whether the £200 for competitive examinations would be open to competition by those who attended schools not receiving Government aid

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought no distinction of that nature was thought of, or would be attempted, but that it would be open to all

Mr BARROW was glad to hear that such was the case, and he would ask whether the Educational Board had considered the details of the proposed grant

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said they had been fully considered in one sense, but not in a way that would finally settle the matter There were so many conflicting views, and besides there was some hesitation until the amount was voted

Mr STRANGWAYS said, with respect to the general question that he had received a letter from Yankalilla complaining that the Education Board had refused to license a second school there, although there were sufficient children to attend it, because they, the Board, were short of funds

Mr MACDERMOTT, one of the members of the Board, had reason to believe that the statement contained in such letter was not true The Board certainly objected to establish two schools in one neighborhood, and also on the ground of insufficient building, but not because they were short of funds

Mr MILDRED suggested that the first four items for Inspectors and Clerks should be struck out The Inspectors' visits went only to show that the walls of the schools were whitewashed, and that the children appeared in nice white pinafores Their visits were often anticipated, and a larger number of children were collected than actually attended the school He thought the whole system was defective, and he would advocate any change in the system which would provide for the scholars being taught even the simplest elements of education—say reading, writing, and arithmetic Also, that where a person opened a school with only 10 pupils, he should receive Government aid in the same proportion He thought there had been a good opportunity of opening an industrial school at Woodford, and they might have had attached to it a normal school

Mr BARROW would be sorry to see the items for Inspectors struck out, although he should have been happy if the hon member for Noarlunga had supported him (Mr Barrow) in striking out certain items which he had voted against (A laugh) He thought if a Select Committee were proposed by the hon member for Encounter Bay, Mr, Strangways (laughter), they might get some information that would be of service to them He thought the hon member for Noarlunga could not have read the report of the Board of Education, and the tables and columns of figures and information therein comprised—which not only stated that the children met in "white pinafores," but gave a variety of really useful information, or he would not have spoken as he had done Still he could not say but that some change in the system was desirable, such as by the establishment of a normal school, but he would not have education reduced to infant schools alone, as really proposed by the hon member for Noarlunga in teaching only reading, writing, and arithmetic History and grammar might surely form some part of the education of our youth, and singing, which was so much practised on the continent might also be continued Give the children all the reading, writing, and arithmetic they were able to impart, but do not exclude the higher branches of study But the hon member for Noarlunga proposed not only to strike out the Inspectors, but also the Secretary and Clerk in fact to abolish the Establishment He thought the subject too large to be dealt with when the Estimates were under discussion He should like not only the education of children but that of the adult population to be considered They could not but be aware that with each emigrant ship that came into port there were a large number of persons arrived classified over 14 and 21 years of age, and unable either to read or write, who it would be desirable should receive the advantages of education Seeing there was such an influx of ignorance it was desirable that something should be devised to remedy it He should support the item as it stood

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor intimating that he complied with the terms of the address with respect to the appointment of a third Judge in this colony

ESTIMATES—RESUMED

Mr MACDERMOTT should be sorry to subscribe to the views of the hon member for Noarlunga, and he was quite prepared to say that the educational system as it existed had done great good In Adelaide, the proportion of children who attended school was 1 in 8—as large a proportion as would be found attending in any town If they did away with the Inspectors and Secretary, they might as well do away with the whole establishment He believed Inspectors were absolutely necessary for the efficient working of the system With respect to the buildings, the Board never objected to such as were suitable

Mr HAWKER moved that the House divide, which was carried

Several amendments were then put and lost, the only one which was carried being that by the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), viz, "Attendance fees to members of Board, £44 2s" With this reduction the item in the total was then put and carried

The House then resumed, the Speaker reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Wednesday

PRIVILEGES OF PARLIAMENT

The ATTORNEY GENERAL laid upon the table a Bill to define the Privileges of Parliament, which was read a first time, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

The second reading of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Friday

The House adjourned at shortly after 5 o'clock until 1 o'clock next day

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock

GOOD SERVICE PAY

Mr MILNE gave notice that contingent upon the item on the Estimates for good-service pay being moved, he should move that it be struck out

CLERKS' SALARY ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that on the following day he should move for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the Clerk's Salary Act of 1852

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr REYNOLDS wished to ask the Attorney-General whether the Government intended to introduce a measure to bring the various Boards of Public Works in more direct responsibility to the Government

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would rather that the hon member should give notice of the question, as he should like to give a formal answer Perhaps the hon member would give notice for the following Friday, but if the question could be answered sooner, it should be

Mr REYNOLDS also begged to ask the Attorney-General when the Government intended to introduce a Bill to provide for the maintenance of main roads

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was hardly prepared to answer the question at present, because he did not know, after the House had refused to adopt the principle involved in the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works, whether sufficient advantages would arise from an alteration of the existing system to justify the Government in introducing a Bill upon the subject at that period of the session If the Government had carried out their views by providing a fund for the maintenance of roads which had been constructed, they would have introduced a Bill immediately, but he questioned now whether it would be worth while to introduce a Bill to effect an alteration in the system

THE INNER BAR

Mr STRANGWAYS, at the request of Mr Peake, gave notice that on Wednesday next he would move an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor recommending that tenders be called for deepening the inner bar to the same depth as the outer bar

POWDER MAGAZINE

Mr COLE gave notice that on Wednesday next he should ask the Commissioner of Public Works a number of questions relative to the Powder Magazine at the North Arm

GOLD DISCOVERIES

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether he was prepared, as he had stated he should be, to lay upon the table of the House the correspondence which had taken place with Mr Stuart relative to alleged gold discoveries

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated that he had given the letter to be copied, and so soon as this had been done he should lay it upon the table of the House

CAPTAIN J F DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL brought up the report of the Committee upon the petition of Captain J F Duff The Committee reported that they considered the Government had committed an error in consequence of which Captain Duff had been subjected to a loss of £153 8s, which amount they recommended to be paid him The evidence was ordered to be printed

WINE AND BEER LICENCES

Mr BAKEWELL moved for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal so much of the Licensed Victuallers Act as related to the issue of wine and beer licences The Bill consisted of but one clause, which proposed to repeal so much of the existing Act as authorized the Licensing Bench to issue wine and beer licences The House would remember that the question had recently been twice brought under discussion—once when he moved for a Committee, and secondly, when he brought up the report It was therefore unnecessary to go into the consideration of the matter involved in the Bill, as the House had assented in some degree to the principle, but on the second reading the whole question could be fully discussed

Mr McELLISTER seconded the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to ask the Speaker a question as to the course which he should pursue He was desirous of introducing in the Bill a clause to authorise His Excellency the Governor, in remote country districts, where a public house would be a great convenience to travellers, but the profits were not sufficient to enable the party keeping it to pay the full licence-fee of £25, to remit one-half that amount He merely wished to authorize His Excellency to do this upon the recommendation of the Licensing Board He was also desirous of introducing a clause to enable the holders of licences to refuse to serve comers in certain cases At present the holder of a general licence was bound to serve all comers, although the holder of merely a wine and beer licence was not He was desirous of introducing a clause to provide for that, and also to enable His Excellency to remit one-half of the licence fee in certain cases He wished to know whether the course which he should pursue was to give notice of these clauses, or to suggest them when the Bill was in Committee

The SPEAKER said the hon member could bring forward any amendment he thought proper when the Bill was in Committee

Leave having been granted, the Bill was read a first time, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for the following Wednesday

MITCHAM

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the petition recently presented by him from a number of the residents of Mitcham be printed The hon member intimated that he intended to take action upon it

Mr MILDRED seconded the motion, which was carried

KAPUNDA

Upon the motion of Mr MILNE, the following notice of motion, standing in the name of Mr Shannon, was made an Order of the Day for the following Wednesday —

"That the petition of the inhabitants of Kapunda and the surrounding districts be taken into consideration, with a view to the granting of the prayer thereof"

THE ESTIMATES

The following motion, in the name of Mr PEAKE, lapsed in consequence of the absence of that hon member —

"That the House considers it essentially useful to the exact performance of its duties as guardians of the public purse that the Estimates should be presented to this House within 14 days next following the meeting of Parliament"

THE AGENT-GENERAL

Mr STRANGWAYS put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Government whether the Agent-General has been required to give, and has given, any security for the due performance of the duties of his office, and if so, the nature and amount of such security"

There was a Council Paper upon the table intimating that the Government had given the Agent-General notice upon his appointment that he would be required to find security to the amount of £20,000, but no information had been afforded to the House that such security had been given

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that the Agent-General had given security, two gentlemen being each bound to the extent of £10,000 for the due performance of his duties by the Agent-General The gentlemen were of high respectability, and had been approved by Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies

MESSAGES FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR

Messages were received from his Excellency the Governor-in-Chief intimating that His Excellency, in compliance with addresses from the Assembly, had placed on the Estimates sums for the construction of Artesian Wells, searching for gold in the Barrier Ranges, extension of the jetty at Port Lincoln, and construction of the main road through Gawler Town

MR. J M STUART

His Excellency also transmitted a Bill to authorize the granting to Mr J M Stuart, of a lease of certain waste lands of the Crown in accordance with a resolution of the Assembly

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands the Bill was read a first time, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for the following day

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

In the absence of the Commissioner of Public Works the Attorney-General moved that the consideration of this Bill in Committee be made an Order of the Day for the following Friday

Mr Reynolds could not see why there should be any further postponement of this Bill Time after time had it been postponed in order that the Government might go on with the Estimates, but he must object to such a course These constant postponements did not look well The Attorney-General had that day informed the House that it was not the intention of the Government to go on with a Road Bill, and it was quite clear to him that when the Government had induced hon members to pass the Estimates, they would say good-bye to them It appeared to him that the policy of the Government was to push on the Estimates as rapidly as possible in order to enable them to keep their seats He should certainly oppose any further postponement of the District Councils Bill, which was admitted to be a most important matter If the Commissioner of Public Works were not present to take charge of the Bill, no doubt some other member of the Government would be able to do so

Mr Strangways should also oppose any further postponement of the Bill, particularly as he saw present two or three hon members who had come from the country no doubt for the purpose of taking part in the discussion upon this Bill, and having come to town expressly for that purpose upon two or three previous occasions, upon which however, they had been disappointed in consequence of the Bill having been postponed, he should certainly oppose any further postponement He knew the object of these repeated postponements, the fact being that the Government wanted the Estimates passed, and then to prorogue Parliament If the Government could only accomplish this the District Councils Act and all other Acts would be put off If it were the intention of the Government to move that the Estimates take precedence of the other Orders of the Day, their duty was to give distinct notice to that effect, in order that hon members who came from the country for the purpose of taking part in the discussion upon the Bill might be apprised in due time of the intentions of the Government

Mr Dunn also protested against a postponement of the Bill, remarking that he came prepared to move certain trifling alterations in the Bill in consequence of a letter which he had received from the District Council which he had the honor of representing

Dr Wark also objected to any postponement He had come to the House prepared to take part in the discussion of the Bill, and had heard no sufficient reason whatever for its postponement Whether the Government had been counting heads or not, he could not say, but certain it was that they constantly postponed measures which some hon members attended the House expressly for the purpose of discussing The same course was pursued in reference to the Civil Service Bill and the Impounding Act Amendment Bill It appeared to him that when it suited the Government they proceeded with Bills in their regular course, but when they expected opposition from members who perhaps seldom attended the House, but came expressly for the purpose of expressing their views upon certain Bills the Government postponed the Bills Such a course was most unfair, and he trusted the Bill would be proceeded with

The Commissioner of Public Works (who had just returned to the House) stated that from what he gathered the House were desirous of proceeding with the District Councils Amendment Bill He had been unavoidably absent for a short period, having been called out to decide a matter of some moment The Government were not deserving the terms which he believed had been applied to them during his absence, as they were quite prepared to proceed with the Bill They had frequently desired to do so, but the House had intimated that they preferred proceeding with other business Upon a Government day the Government would regulate the business as they considered necessary, and with respect to the remarks which had been made relative to country members attending for the purpose of taking part in the discussion of particular measures, he had to remark that it was the duty of hon members to be present at all times

The Attorney-General wished to say two or three words in reference to the remarks which had been made relative to the alleged desire of the Government to postpone the District Councils Act Amendment Bill So far from this being the case, the Government on two or three occasions had proposed to go on with the Bill, but hon members had refused to do so The postponement had hitherto been not the act of the Government, but had arisen from the opposition of those who now charged the Government with a desire to postpone the Bill He admitted it was the wish of the Government to get through the Estimates, and to prorogue the House before the Christmas holidays He was sure that every hon member who was a member of that House during last session would admit it was not desirable to repeat the experiment of continuing discussions through the heat of January and February, particularly as it was proposed to call the House together in April It was not becoming to accuse the Government of a desire to send the House about their business without discussing matters of general interest

Mr Milne would not express any opinion as to any alteration in the order in which the business appeared upon the notice paper With respect to the remark that country members attended the House specially for the purpose of discussing this Bill, he thought that country members should be in their places at all times

Mr Reynolds rose to order The hon member was not in order in addressing the House, as the Attorney-General had replied

In Committee,

Clause 70 provided that notice of assessment should be given, and the copies open to inspection at all reasonable times

Passed as printed

Clause 71 related to the grounds upon which appeals against assessment might be made

Mr Strangways moved the insertion of the words, "the whole, or any, or some particular part of the property for which his name appears as owner or occupier is not liable to be assessed"

Mr Reynolds thought this was embodied in the clause as it stood

Mr Strangways merely wished by the addition which he had proposed to enable a party to appeal against the assessment upon the ground that he was not liable to be assessed This was not a ground of appeal given by any of the five grounds mentioned in the Act

The Attorney-General really did not understand the amendment If it related to property which was not rateable, he imagined there could be an appeal upon that ground. Did the hon member wish to draw a distinction between property rateable and that which was liable to assessment

The amendment was negatived, and the clause passed as printed

Clause 72 provided for the correction of errors in assessment

Clause 73 related to notices of alteration and appeals therefrom

Clause 74 provided that the Council might use the assessment of the previous year, making necessary alterations

Clause 75 empowered the District Council to make rates not to exceed 1s in the pound

Clause 76 provided that a rate might be made by ratepayers

Clause 77 gave the ratepayers at meetings power to adopt, vary, or refuse the proposed rate These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 78 provided for the raising of money by District Councils by loan

Mr Strangways pointed out to the Commissioner of Public Works that this clause was superfluous, as there was really no possibility of a District Council being enabled to raise money upon the security of its rates

The Commissioner of Public Works said that, although at present it might appear there was no possibility of a District Council getting a loan upon its rates, still he thought it was as well to retain the clause, as it was possible that cases might arise in which District Councils would be enabled to raise loans

Mr Reynolds believed that there was a similar clause in the old Act

The Commissioner of Public Works said there was, and the clause was passed as printed

Clause 79 provided that a special meeting might authorize or refuse to authorize raising money by loan

Clause 80 provided that a second special meeting of ratepayers might adopt or reject a loan

Clause 81 provided that loans should be agreed to by two-thirds of the voters

Clause 82 provided that the rate should not be more than 2s in the pound

Clause 83 provided that the assessment-books should be produced at meetings

Clause 84 gave the District Councils power to issue bonds

Clause 85 provided for the recovery of rates

Clause 86 referred to the person primarily liable to pay rates

These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 87 provided that the person in receipt of the rents should be considered liable

Mr Strangways moved that this clause be struck out Other clauses provided that the occupier should be primarily liable, and if there were no occupier then the District Council could come upon the owner

The Attorney-General would ask the House whether it would be quite right that persons residing out of the colony should have the immunity which the striking out of the clause would give them The land not being occupied there could be no one primarily liable, and was it right that there should be no means of reaching any one There were absentee proprietors in receipt of large incomes who he thought should be reached

Mr Strangways observed that absentee proprietors who were in receipt of enormous rentals must have occupants for their properties, otherwise they would have no rentals

The Attorney-General remarked that the hon member appeared at a loss to conceive how it was possible that an absentee proprietor could have more than one property in the colony (Laughter) It was quite possible that an absentee proprietor might be in receipt of a large income from properties which were occupied, and have others which were unoccupied

The amendment was lost and the clause passed as printed

Clause 88 related to the names and privileges of District Councils

Clause 89 provided for the signing and execution of deeds

Clause 90 gave power to District Councils to accept lands and tenements for public purposes

Clause 91 gave District Councils power to lease or improve lands

Clause 92 gave the Councils power to accept conveyances of lands from trustees

Clause 93 provided that the ratepayers at a public meeting might compel trustees to convey land to District Councils in certain cases

Clause 94 provided for vesting lands in new districts

These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 95 related to the transmission of liabilities to new districts

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to move an amendment on this clause, for the purpose of providing for cases similar to that which had occurred some time since in Encounter Bay A new district was formed out of an existing district, and it was found no provision was made for the transfer of the liabilities of the district, or of that portion which related to the newly-formed district, to that district He was therefore desirous of moving that in such cases the rights, duties, and liabilities of the district should be transmitted to the new district

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not object to the principle of the amendment proposed, because as the law at present stood it might be so interpreted as to effect injustice, but he thought it necessary to guard carefully that a proportionate part of the liabilities only should be taken when one district was formed into two—that is, that only the proper liability should attach He would not make the new district liable for the whole of the liabilities of the district from which it had been severed

Mr STRANGWAYS merely wished for a transfer of the liabilities in respect of that portion forming the new district The Attorney-General would he was sure see the necessity of such a provision, when he referred to a case which occurred three or four years since at Encounter Bay, in reference to a section at Rosetta Head, which had recently been under consideration

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL having admitted that the present law might cause individual injustice, the amendment was carried

Clause 96 referred to water reserves, and gave power to District Councils to sell the same

Mr MILNE wished to point out to the Commissioner of Public Works that the District Councils had power to sell He was aware that this power was guarded by subsequent clauses, but he could not imagine any case in which by any possibility it would be desirable that a District Council should sell a water reserve He moved that the words "or sold" be struck out

Mr REYNOLDS wished to ask the Commissioner of Public Works what was meant by a water reserve

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was a reserve for the purpose of affording necessary accommodation to man and beast Hon members would see that water reserves were guarded by clause 99 and he could imagine that circumstances might arise in which it would be desirable that a water reserve should be sold in consequence of the District Council being unable to effect an exchange for some better site. They might, however, be enabled to sell their water reserve and purchase a better one He could not see any objection to the clause, as it would be observed that before any sale could be effected, a meeting of the parties interested would be called, and their assent must be obtained

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to know if a township were laid out by a private individual, and a water reserve were provided for that township, would that constitute such a reserve as would vest it in the District Council He did not think that they should compel parties laying out townships to place the water reserves under the control of the District Council, as such might be against the wishes not only of the owner, but of the purchasers of the allotments He wished to know also, whether under this clause the reserves made upon the seashore were not included, and whether the District Council would, consequently, not be enabled to sell them

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the reserves last alluded to by the hon member were certainly not the reserves which were contemplated by this Act Any remedial matters were, in fact, placed in the hands of the ratepayers He considered that where District Councils existed they were the proper parties to have the care of the water reserves

Mr McELLISTER should certainly support the proposition of the hon member for Onkaparinga, that the power of sale be taken from the District Councils, as he considered it most undesirable that such a power should be vested in them

Mr DUNN took a similar view, considering that the reserves should be held sacred, as although they might not be required by the inhabitants of the districts in which they were situated, they were, nevertheless essential for the accommodation of travellers He had thought that during the previous session an Act was passed by which these reserves would be kept sacred, and that they could not be disposed of in any way He had no objection to District Councils having charge of the reserves, but certainly would not give them power to sell them

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS pointed out to the hon members who had opposed the clause that he did not think they could have read the two following clauses which provided that maps and plans should be prepared and deposited in the Surveyor-General's office, and any person interested, no matter whether he were a ratepayer or not, could give notice of his objection to the sale or exchange of the water reserves The power of sale appeared to him to be carefully guarded, but the Government had no wish to press it if it were contrary to the wish of the House

Mr REYNOLDS had not distinctly understood the reply of the Commissioner of Public Works a short time since, when the hon member, Mr Strangways, asked him if the reserves upon the sea coast were under the control of the District Councils

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had stated that they were not

Mr MILDRED wished to know whether this clause would embrace Brownhill Creek, which had been reserved by Colonel Gawler Would that creek, under this clause, fall into the hands of the District Council? as if so he believed it would be a dangerous precedent He wished to know whether this clause would embrace water reserves which had been given to the public for ever

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was impossible for him to give an answer how far a particular clause would apply to some reserve, of the particulars of which he knew nothing, and of which the hon member himself only appeared to have a general recollection But he would say, in reference to placing such reserves under the management of District Councils, that existed at the present time and the result had been highly beneficial, for until such reserves were placed under the management of District Councils, there was no party whose duty it was to take care of them or to punish wilful injury done to them So far as giving the control and management of water reserves to District Councils was concerned, he thought that was a step in the right direction, and that it would be very unwise to repeal that portion of the law In reference to the power of sale, he could only repeat what had been stated by the Commissioner of Public Works, that there was no desire to press that if the House considered it objectionable The power proposed to be given was guarded in the same way that the power given to District Councils in reference to roads was guarded That was an arbitrary power given to the District Councils to deal with private property for public purposes, but still it was so guarded as to prevent injury to private individuals It had been suggested that cases might arise where a District Council could not procure what it desired to procure by exchange, namely, a better water reserve, and that therefore the power should be given to them to dispose of the water reserve which they possessed for the purpose of purchasing a better, but if the House thought that the objections to the power outweighed that convenience there was no desire on the part of the Government to press for that power being conceded

Mr LINDSAY said it appeared to him there was great doubt as to what could be called a water reserve No records had been kept, and hence the difficulty arose If reserves were made, they should be reserved in a proper manner, proper records should be kept, and most of the doubts and difficulties which arose in connection with them would then be obviated He objected to give the District Councils the power of sale, for District Councils were not always to be trusted, and what was done by one District Council could not be undone by their successors The power which District Councils possessed in reference to roads was conferred upon them as a matter of necessity, as lines of communication could not be opened up unless they had power to alter Water reserves were however given to the public for ever, and could not require, like roads to be sold or exchanged They should be inviolably kept for the purposes for which they were reserved He was not aware that there were any water reserves anywhere except such as it was necessary or desirable should be open to all

Mr MILNE agreed that the power was sufficiently guarded, but he must contend that the reserves were not merely for the District Councils but for the public Public reserves were of great convenience to travellers He could imagine when the District Council was needy, if the power of sale were given they would sell the reserve, as they would have no difficulty in getting the ratepayers to assent to such a course He should persist in his amendment, that "or sold" be struck out

Mr SCAMMELL regretted to hear the statement that District Councils were not to be trusted If it were so, there had better be a Bill introduced to abolish District Councils instead of to amend the existing Act regulating them He should support the clause as it stood, as he thought District Councils might be trusted notwithstanding the remarks of the hon member for Onkaparinga

Mr MILNE said he had not stated that District Councils could not be trusted

Mr SCAMMELL assured the House that the hon member had reflected very strongly upon District Councils, as well as the hon member for Encounter Bay, for he had stated that any District Council hard up might convene a meeting of ratepayers who would be sure to consent to the sale of the water-reserves If this were not a reflection he did not know what was He did not think so badly of District Councils, but he thought, as the direction of the roads was so constantly changed, it would also be desirable sometimes to change the water-reserve It was no uncommon thing for the road to be altered, so that it was placed perhaps at a distance of half a mile from the water-reserve, it was desirable the District Council should have the power of exchange in order that they might obtain a reserve nearer to the road He might not have put the matter so clearly and forcibly as he saw it himself, but if they trusted District Councils with the roads he thought they might be safely trusted with the water-reserves

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS referred to the 100th clause, by which it would be seen that the sale must be confirmed by the Governor so if a Council were in a needy state, and wished to sell or exchange its water-reserve, it could not do so until the sanction of the Governor had been obtained

Mr STRANGWAYS wished "public convenience" struck out, and the word "public" inserted before "water," so as to prevent water reserves, against the wishes of the owner, from being placed under the control of District Councils He confessed he was not satisfied with the explanation of the Commissioner of Public Works as to reserves on the sea-coast, believing that if the clause were passed the District Councils might dispose of such reserves

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL hoped that hon members would consider well whether it was desirable to take from the District Councils this power When reserves were made for the public convenience was there any body to whom they could better be entrusted than the District Councils? It was absurd to say that the Governor might grant private property, as he could only convey property belonging to the Crown, but not any which was not vested in him or the Crown He could not give any title to any other It would be for the House to consider whether there was any better body to take charge of the public reserves than the body representing the public If they were dedicated to the public there were no rights of private individuals, and no other persons had power to deal with the reserves but the District Councils Unless power were given to them, there were, in fact, no persons to protect the reserves

Mr STRANGWAYS contended that, as the clause stood, it did not matter whether the property was vested in the Crown or not That was the meaning of the clause as it stood, but if the object were merely to vest the management of public reserves in District Councils, he could not see what objection there could be to his amendment As the clause stood, if private property were set apart for public convenience, though the owner might resume it, the management of it would vest in the District Council He could not see why the Attorney-General should object to the verbal alteration which he had suggested

The clause was passed as amended

Clause 97 provided for agreements for exchange of water reserves

Clause 98 provided that plans, when water reserves were exchanged, should be deposited in the Surveyor-General's Office

Clause 99 provided for meetings for the consideration of sale of water reserves

Clause 100 provided for agreements for exchange of water reserves and confirmation or rejection of the same by the Governor

Clause 101 provided that upon being confirmed a sale might take place

Clause 102 provided for compensation for loss by exchange

Clause 103 referred to voidance of agreement

These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 104 provided that all district roads should be under the care and management of District Councils

Mr GLYDE was informed there was some difficulty under this clause, as parties were in the habit of carting sand off the roads

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was not aware of any instance in which it was done without the consent of the District Council

Mr SCAMMELL said that in the district with which he had been connected for a number of years some fees had been derived from allowing the sand to be carted away, but only sufficient to pay the cost of filling up the holes again He moved the insertion of the words "the sand of streets of all townships containing more than 25 dwelling houses"

Mr STRANGWAYS opposed the insertion of the words, though they might answer very well in the case of Hindmarsh If a township were laid out and 25 or 30 houses built on it, the owner would of course be desirous of keeping open such roads as would conduce to the convenience of purchasers but it might not be for the convenience of such persons to have all the roads open The amendment would be the means of throwing all the roads in a township into the hands of a District Council, as this could be done by merely building a few hovels upon the land

Mr SOLOMON supported the proposition of the hon member for West Torrens He could not agree with the hon member for Encounter Bay, that when the owner of a township laid out his property he should be at liberty to shut up the roads as soon as he liked If such a person sold only one allotment on a property having certain roads through it, he was bound in equity and justice to keep those roads open, and he (Mr Solomon) could not see why the district should not take charge of them for the benefit of the public If he understood the matter rightly, and he would refer to the hon mover in corroboration of his views, its meaning was that as soon as a man thought proper for his own benefit to open up certain roads these roads should become the property of the public

Mr MILDRED suggested that villages should be included, as though persons residing in villages were called upon to pay an assessment to the Councils, the Councils would not lay out a penny on their roads

Mr STRANGWAYS said the hon member seemed to mistake the nature of the amendment as read by the hon member for Yatala The hon member seemed to put a strangely different construction upon meum and tuum from his (Mr Strangways') In the event of lands being sold and roads marked out, the roads did not become the property of the public The hon member (Mr Mildred) seemed to think that the motion referred to the time at which a particular quantity of land was sold, whereas it referred to a given number of houses being built

Mr LINDSAY thought the hon member (Mr Glyde) had made a most extraordinary statement, viz that the District Councils had not legally power to prevent people from carting sand or doing other unlawful acts If that was the case, it was most deplorable, considering that Roads Acts and several District Councils Acts had been already passed Such legislation must be so deplorably defective that the sooner hon members "shut up their legislation shop" and went to school again the better

Mr DUNN made some few remarks which did not reach the reporter's ear

Mr REYNOLDS thought the difficulty would be met by striking out the word "may" and inserting the word "shall" in the 105th clause

Mr SCAMMELL had no objection to the proposed amendment, but it would not meet the case he intended, as the 105th clause was intended to be prospective rather than retrospective in its action He would like the opinion of the Attorney-General

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL confessed he had great doubts as to the propriety of the amendment On principle he thought the House should never interfere with private rights for the public convenience without providing for compensation to the person interfered with and he was sure he need only state this in order to ensure the concurrence of the hon member (Mr Scammell) There might be cases in which people had laid out townships and sold comparatively a small portion of land on which there might nevertheless be 25 houses, and it would be a great injustice to such persons that whilst the roads were never used these roads should be taken possession of by the Councils At the same time he did not say that the Councils should not have the right of opening up the roads, but it should only be given on condition of their granting compensation for any injuries which they might inflict on the owners There were great impediments on either hand, arising from the difficulty of deciding when the road was properly dedicated to the public under the present Act, which defined some as main and some as district roads When any road or street was dedicated to the public it became the property of the Road Board, or the District Councils as Commissioners of Roads What he wanted to point out was that this was a question between the public and individuals Where the public obtained possession of the roads the care, control, and management of the roads vested in the District Councils as Commissioners of Roads, but when a man had the right to close the roads against particular persons, then the House had no authority consistently with those principles of justice which were always the basis of the proceedings of the Legislature, to deprive an individual of his private rights without granting him compensation He would, therefore, feel compelled to oppose the amendment in its present form upon that ground, and he was sure the hon member himself would not through mere considerations of public convenience, take away from an individual his private rights without granting him compensation

Mr REYNOLDS thought the hon the Attorney-General had only stated one view of the question He (Mr Reynolds) considered that where a party laid out a township, and sold allotments, all the purchasers were entitled to roads, and therefore he considered the laying out of the township a dedication Otherwise, in consequence of the roads not being vested in the Council the Council would not lay out a penny on them as was the case at Mitcham He would suggest the postponement of the clause As the Attorney-General had agreed to the 95th clause, he (Mr Reynolds) thought that hon member was rather late in attempting to object to the amendment now proposed If these private roads were reserved for the public convenience the House had already placed them in the hands of the Council

Mr SCAMMELL, lest the House should be guided by the picture drawn by the hon the Attorney General, would state in a few words a case which actually occurred A township was on one occasion defined of 134 acres divided into lots, and roads marked in every direction This occurred nearly 20 years ago, and a District Council had been established in the locality for some years, but no longer than four years ago, though nearly the whole of the land in the township had long since passed out of the hands of the original owner, that individual claimed and obtained from the Government a sum of money, for which he sold the right of way through the streets of the township, and so enabled the Government to close these streets. In fact, while he sold the right-of-way, he sold a large population along with it. Moreover, the persons who had purchased years ago on the faith of the roads being open had no remedy. As to the multiplication of roads, which had been alluded to, it was the policy of the Councils to avoid this, for though these bodies knew that roads could be multiplied to any extent, still they found that the funds could not be multiplied to a similar extent.

After a few words from Mr. STRANGWAYS,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reference to what fell from the hon. member for West Torrens (Mr. Scammell) thought that hon. member must be mistaken as to the facts of the case to which he had referred, inasmuch as he (the Attorney-General) thought it impossible that any power to stop the roads could be possessed either by the owner of the soil or the Government.

Mr. SCAMMELL had not said that such power was possessed, but that it had been exercised.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if the power was exercised illegally the parties aggrieved had their remedy either by a civil action or an indictment against those parties who obstructed them in the exercise of their rights. He (the Attorney-General) believed the fact of the case was that the soil of the land in question belonged to the original purchasers, and when it became necessary to convey this over for public purposes, that individual had a right so to convey it. There were other cases in which roads were taken by the Government, and as the soil belonged to individuals, these persons were compensated when the land was taken for any other than its present use. The ownership of the soil over which roads were marked out, was an inherent right in the English law. He (the Attorney-General), therefore, believed that the individual referred to received nothing more than compensation for what actually belonged to him, and that he neither professed to convey nor the Government to stop up the roads. The roads were stopped by the authority of the Legislature, and if persons complained of such action, it was of the Legislature and not of the Government or the original owner of the land they should complain.

Mr. LINDSAY saw strong grounds for taking the advice of the hon. member for the Sturt, and postponing the clause. The doubts which the hon. the Attorney-General expressed as to what was a public dedication of land and what was not showed the necessity of further legislation. Such a state of the law in such matters was not what it ought to be. When the House was legislating, it should know what it was legislating on. This was the third District Councils Act, and he hoped the House would not have another next and another the year after. As to the Impounding Act he knew that was an annual. (Laughter.) It surely could not be beyond the ability of the House, aided and assisted by the hon. the Attorney-General, to prepare a clause which would settle such a question as that now before the House. He would neither oppose nor support the amendment. One or two hon. members had spoken of its being objectionable to multiply district roads, and it should be avoided. It certainly was most unfair for the Government to induce districts to tax themselves and undertake the management of roads, which were often quite useless, so much so, that the Councils frequently had to make new roads when some person was certain to put in a claim respecting the old road, saying that it was useful to drive cows over or something of the sort, for which the road was just practicable and nothing more.

Mr. NEALES said it appeared that the hon. member would make his censure annual like the Impounding Bills of which he had spoken, for the hon. member scarcely favored the House with a speech in which he did not sneer either at something upon which the House was at the time engaged, or which it had just passed. He believed if the people went properly to work, they could protect any roads which they once possessed. It was, however, necessary that the House should say what was a public dedication, but this could not be included in a District Councils Act. No postponement would enable the House to legislate for the matter in such a Bill. The case about Payneham had been alluded to, and the intention there was that all the streets should be public, but the public did not come forward. (A laugh from the Attorney-General.) The hon. the Attorney-General laughed and he (Mr. Neales) could not remember on which side he (the Attorney-General) had been engaged, but he had no doubt he was on one side of the case. To say that, because a man laid out a village, he should not be entitled to close up the roads was absurd. He (Mr. Neales) had laid out a village of 3,000 allotments and, with streets innumerable. He sold allotments at 10s. a-piece, and had subsequently to give £90 to purchase back what he had sold for 30s. But the owner of the property would have been ruined if he could not have stopped the roads. The result of the proposed system would be that there would be no country roads at all, for the villages would have their own roads made, and there would be no roads for waggons.

Mr. REYNOLDS said that any person laying out 4,000 allotments in 134 acres deserved to be ruined.

Mr. NEALES had not said that there were but 134 acres. There were 700 acres.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the hon. the Attorney-General what he considered a public dedication, as if the hon. member was not prepared to answer the question, he (Mr. Reynolds) should recommend that the clause be reserved.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that it was impossible to answer the question. He could tell the hon. member the rules which would guide a Court in coming to a decision, but not the effect of these rules on a particular case.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had no desire to oppose a postponement. Or the clause might be passed with the understanding that, if any motion should subsequently be made for recommitting the clause, no opposition should be offered to the proposal.

Mr. SCAMMELL had no objection on these terms to withdraw his amendment.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 105 was agreed to.

On clause 106, compelling Councils to procure maps of roads in their districts—

Mr. MILNE said many Councils had already lodged plans in the Survey office. Would these Councils be compelled to lodge fresh plans?

Mr. STRANGWAYS enquired what the plans were required for. In the districts of Port Elliot and the Goolwa it would take four or five years to prepare the plans, as no person—not even the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands—would say what were the roads in that locality. In one case there were four or five different surveys, all starting from different points. One man would get one plan, and another another, each asserting itself to be the original, and no person unless he had been in the colony for some time, would be able to come to any decision respecting them.

Mr. BURFORD thought that under these circumstances the hon. member would only be doing his duty in giving a notice of motion on the subject, as such a state of things was beyond all bearing.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that in the early days of the colony the survey of the locality in question was very badly performed. There were few districts consequently which gave so much trouble, as almost every month claims were arising out of the original survey. The district has now however been very carefully surveyed, so that every section could be pointed out. With regard to the roads as they were originally laid out, it was desirable, as far as possible, to reconcile conflicting interests, inasmuch as some of the original roads ran where houses had been built, and in other instances there were valuable gardens where the roads should be. The hon. member for Encounter Bay was right in saying that the original survey of the district was very badly performed, but the person responsible for it had not been in the public service for many years past.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said the survey, which was badly made, had not been made during the tenure of office of the present Surveyor General. He (Mr. Strangways) had had many communications with that gentleman, and whilst he had always found him (Captain Freeling) ready to afford every possible information, still the records of his office occasioned great difficulty in procuring such information, and sometimes when the information was obtained it was not correct. In one instance he (Mr. Strangways) was only able to get plans on a scale of two or four miles to the inch, and in another nothing but a double square of five lines. He believed, too, that although the Surveyor-General had for a year and a half been doing all he could to set the roads right, and to settle the conflicting interests of proprietors, matters were still in much the same state, as nobody knew which was the original plan.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that this was no new clause. It was copied almost word for word from the 17th clause of the old Act. He thought it would be an excellent thing that each Council should have a map showing the roads in its charge.

Mr. LINDSAY was happy to hear the assurance of the Hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, that a survey of the district which he (Mr. Lindsay) represented had been attempted, and that, after twenty years of confusion and difficulty, the Government would be able to point out the roads. He was afraid, if the new system was not brought in, that all the roads would be stopped up; and even now it was impossible to go from Hindmarsh Valley to Port Elliot. He could confirm what had been said of the original maps, inasmuch as they all differed, and each professed to be correct when it was made.

After some few unimportant remarks the clause, as printed, was put and carried.

Clauses 108 to 112, both inclusive, were agreed to with verbal amendments.

Clause 113. "District Councils may appoint Inspectors of Slaughterhouses and brands."

Mr. HAWKER moved that after the word "liable" in the 23rd line the words "and such Inspector shall act as Inspector of Nuisances" be added.

Mr. STRANGWAYS raised an objection to this clause, as under it one brand might be used by different persons; and after considerable discussion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that the clause had been in operation for six years with perfect satisfaction to all but the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways).

After further discussion, in which Messrs. Reynolds, Hawker, Strangways, Scammell, and Lindsay joined, the clause was passed, with Mr. Hawker's amendment.

Clauses 114 and 115 were passed as printed.

Clause 116. "Any cattle, above the age of twelve months, unbranded, the property of the District Council in which they are found."

Mr. ROGERS proposed as an amendment that the sum of 20s. in the last line should be struck out, and 10s. inserted in its place.

The amendment was put and passed.

Mr. LINDSAY said this clause would have an extraordinary effect in its present state, as it would allow the District Council to claim all escaped cattle. It was unjust, and they might as well declare all private property to be public and have a general scramble for it.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that such a construction could not be put upon the clause. It could not be supposed for a moment that an animal which was kept in a paddock, and got out for a short time, would be claimed by the District Council, or that it could be said to be at large within the meaning of the clause.

Mr. NEALES said the remedy was in the hands of the owners of cattle, who could secure themselves by branding their cattle after the age of twelve months.

The clause was passed as previously amended.

Clause 117. "Hours for burning stubble, and may be altered."

Mr. MILNE called attention that in the second last line the provision for a public notice was not sufficiently defined, and he moved the insertion after the word "given" of the words "in the Government Gazette, and by affixing the same on the doors of the District Council Office."

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause was passed as amended.

Clause 118. "District Council to have all powers, and under the Act to prevent spread of Scotch thistles."

Mr. HAWKER moved that this clause be struck out. £1,300 to £1,400 had been spent under the Thistle Act to very little purpose. There was considerable difference of opinion as to the noxiousness of the thistle, some considering it was a very useful plant and others the contrary. He mentioned an instance in which persons who had been employed to cut down thistles were found one fine morning in a gentleman's garden cutting down his artichokes, and on being remonstrated with they replied that they had walked several miles and these were the only thistles they had seen. (Laughter.)

Mr. LINDSAY supported the motion for striking out the clause, as he considered the Thistle Act a perfect absurdity. The thistle instead of being a noxious weed was a very useful plant.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said that what was called the Scotch thistle in this colony was nothing more than a kind of artichoke.

Mr. MILNE was in favor of the clause being retained, and he thought the £1,300 or £1,400 referred to had been very well spent.

Mr. DUNN was also in favor of the clause being retained.

Mr. HALLETT should vote against the clause, because the Act was inoperative, and the sooner it was repealed the better.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought the clause should be retained, as benefit had accrued from the existing law. The question now was, whether the District Councils should have certain powers under a law which he believed to be useful.

Mr. NEALES would go further than previous speakers and say that the existing law went to encourage the growth of thistles. Many persons now left thistles to grow in order to obtain the trifling remuneration for cutting them down. He thought the Act should be intituled "an Act for the encouragement of the growth of thistles."

Mr. MILDRED was in favor of the clause being retained.

The clause was then put and carried.

Clauses 119 to 126 inclusive, were passed as printed.

Clause 127. "No bye-law to be repugnant to any Act of the Legislature."

Mr. LINDSAY asked who was to be the judge of what was repugnant.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government, in the first instance, and ultimately the Supreme Court.

The clause was passed as printed.

Clauses 128 and 129 passed as printed.

Clause 130. "Annual meetings to be held in second week of next July."

Mr. DUNN moved that "March" be inserted instead of "July," as the financial year had now been altered. It was the wish of the Council in the district which he represented that it should be so.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it might be so in the case alluded to, but it was the request of the majority of the District Councils that the clause should remain as it was, as no inconvenience would be suffered from it.

The clause was passed as printed.

Clauses 131 to 142 inclusive were passed as printed.

Clause 143—"Persons who may vote for Councillors."

Mr. STRANGWAYS proposed, as an amendment, that no person should be allowed to vote except having property in the ward. He thought the clause was not sufficiently definite in its present form.

The amendment was lost, and the clause was passed as printed.

Clauses 144 to 153 inclusive were passed as printed.

Clause 154. Passed, with an amendment by Mr. STRANGWAYS.

Clauses 155 to 162 inclusive passed as printed.

Clause 163. "Persons removing timber, &c., without licence liable to a fine."

Mr. STRANGWAYS thought this clause required amendment, as its effect was too general.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in many cases amendments introduced by hon. members and carried without sufficient consideration had defeated the intentions embodied in certain portions of the Bill. That was the case in the last amendment made by the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways), as it did away with something which was included in another part of the Bill.

Mr. STRANGWAYS thought the Attorney-General should have stated his objections, especially when such amendment was under consideration.

The clause was passed as printed.

Clauses 164 to 169 inclusive passed as printed.

Clause 170—"Council to have power to remit fines, except those imposed on constables, auditors, councillors, &c., elected and refusing to act."

Mr. MILDRED would give the Council power to remit all fines and penalties without limitation.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it would be unwise to give the Council power to remit penalties on members of their own body who refused to act. Not that he thought such a contingency would arise, but it would be possible for such persons to evade the penalties by collusion with other members of the Council. The alteration proposed would be inconsistent with the policy of the Act.

Mr. REYNOLDS called attention to the fact that the Corporation Act gave the power to reduce penalties on members resigning to one shilling.

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved an amendment that the Council should have power to remit "any penalties imposed by virtue of this Act."

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought the clause should be either struck out or left in its entirety.

Mr. STRANGWAYS' amendment was then put, and declared to be lost.

A division was called for, which resulted in a majority of 4 against the amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS wished to know whether after Justices of the Peace had inflicted penalties under the 166th clause, the District Council would have the power of remitting such penalties. He did not see how power could be given to the District Council to remit penalties inflicted by Justices of the Peace.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said that by this clause five District Councillors would possess a power which should only be exercised by the Governor and Executive Council. Five District Councillors responsible only to a small constituency, would have the power of remitting the penalties inflicted by Justices of the Peace, so that if the Justices inflicted a penalty to-day, the District Council might remit it on the following day.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was quite clear that the District Council would not be able to remit imprisonment, but perhaps they would a pecuniary penalty.

Mr. HAWKER did not think that the District Council should have power to remit the fines under clauses 165 to 167, and, unless there were a proviso to that effect, he should vote for the clause being struck out.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the insertion of the words "or for any offence against the 166th clause," and the clause as amended was carried by a majority of one, the votes on a division being Ayes 9, Noes 8, as follow:—

AYES 9.—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, Messrs. Burford, Scammell, Cole, Milne, Rogers, Dunn, the Commissioner of Public Works (teller).

NOES 8.—Messrs. Reynolds, Mildred, Townsend, Wark, Harvey, Lindsay, Hawker, Strangways (teller).

The House resumed, the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following Friday, an amendment by Mr. STRANGWAYS that leave be granted for the following day being lost.

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL.

The consideration in Committee of Longbottom's Patent Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

THE ESTIMATES.

The consideration in Committee of the Estimates was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

The House adjourned at quarter-past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2.

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

GREY'S BRIDGE.

Mr. NEALES presented a petition from the Chairman and four Councillors of the District Council of Noarlunga against the project of Grey's Bridge, for which a sum of £1,000 had been placed upon the Estimates The petitioners stated that the bridge would be useless, that it would obstruct the river, and not be used by the settlers

The petition was received and read

GOLD DISCOVERIES

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table a copy of a letter received from Mr J M Stuart, and answer thereto, in relation to a supposed claim for gold discoveries

The documents were ordered to be printed

THE IMPOUNDING ACT

Mr LINDSAY gave notice, that upon the 8th December he should ask the Attorney-General whether, by the law of England, it was not felony for a person to shoot another man's pig, which was trespassing (laughter), and whether a portion of the Impounding Act was not repugnant to the law of England

GREY'S BRIDGE

Mr NEALES gave notice that, on the following Wednesday, he should move the petition presented by him from the District Council of Noarlunga, in reference to Grey's Bridge, be printed

CAPTAIN HART

Mr HAY asked leave of absence for one month for Captain Hart, the hon member for the Port Leave was granted

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the House go into Committee upon this Bill

Mr GLYDE wished before the question was put to make a few remarks, believing that he should be in order in doing so He was absent from his place in the House when the Attorney-General replied upon the second reading of the Bill, and now wished to say a few words in reference to the strictures which had been made by various members upon the Select Committee He was a member of the Committee appointed to consider this question, and when he had the honor of being appointed, for he considered it an honor for any hon member to be appointed by his brother members upon a Committee for the purpose of investigating a very important and difficult question—when he found that he had been elected a member of the Committee, he felt that he had a very difficult and responsible task before him He saw that there were two members of the Committee who were pledged to support the Bill, he alluded to the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the hon member for the city (Mr Neales), and there were two hon members pledged to oppose it—he alluded to the hon member for Victoria, and the hon member for Sturt There were two other hon members who might be considered impartial and disinterested, he alluded to the hon member, Mr Duffield, who though a squatter would not have to pay a shilling under this Bill, if it were passed, and the hon member, Mr Barrow He believed that the tendency of the hon member Mr Duffield would be against the Bill, and he anticipated that his hon colleague, Mr Barrow, would be in favor of it He felt that his position was most difficult

The SPEAKER thought the hon member was out of order unless he intended to move an amendment upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands that the House go into Committee

Mr GLYDE submitted that he was perfectly in order, and there was nothing in the Standing Orders to prevent him from addressing the House upon the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands

The SPEAKER did not say that the hon member was out of order, but unless he was going to move an amendment, it certainly was not usual to address the House upon the motion for going into Committee He would refer, however, to the Standing Order, which prevented any hon member from alluding to a former debate on a subject not then under discussion, except with the permission of the House

Mr GLYDE again submitted that there was nothing in the Standing Orders to prevent him from addressing the House, but if the Speaker ruled he was out of order he would resume his seat

The SPEAKER did not say that the hon member was out of order, but it was not usual for any hon member to speak upon the motion for going into Committee unless he intended to oppose going into Committee The hon member would have an opportunity of making his remarks in Committee, when the motion for the postponement of the preamble of the Bill was brought forward

The House having gone into Committee, and the postponement of the preamble having been moved,

Mr GLYDE would take that opportunity of making a few remarks in reference to his own conduct and that of other hon members who had been alluded to in the debate upon the second reading of this Bill The members of the Committee were supposed to have allowed the force of the remarks and strictures which had then been made upon them, but he for one could not sit silent under the strictures which had been passed He understood the Attorney-General to take exception to the report upon three grounds, first, the finding against the legal and moral aspect of the case, secondly, that the evidence was incorrect, and thirdly, that Mr Bonney had no right to pledge the Government, and that no verbal agreement could possibly override a written document He believed that was the pith and gist of the hon gentleman's argument With regard to the first point, he in a great degree agreed with the Attorney-General, and his opinion indeed was on record, and attached to the report, that the term "local purposes" was intended by Sir Henry Young, and by Her Majesty's orders in Privy Council, to mean general purposes, and not district purposes He saw no reason to alter the opinion which he formed upon that point although the discoveries of the hon member (Mr Barrow) of certain expressions in the despatches of Lord Grey might have an effect upon many hon members upon the point He was satisfied that the meaning intended to be conveyed by the term "local" was general The Attorney-General went on to say that the evidence was incorrect, therefore the Committee ought not to have founded the report upon it He was surprised to hear the Attorney-General use such an argument, as he must have known that he as the Prime Minister had the power to call for or send counter evidence If the hon gentleman conducted cases in the Supreme Court as he had conducted the Assessment on Stock Bill, he feared that he would soon lose his character as an accomplished special pleader What would be thought of the hon gentleman in the Supreme Court, if, after all the evidence on one side were called, he were to decline to call any evidence upon the other, but were merely to tell the Jury that he was sure they wouldn't believe the evidence they had heard, because it was all on one side There were only two courses open to the Committee—either to believe the evidence given before the Committee, the witnesses being gentlemen of unimpeachable veracity, honor, and intelligence, or to tell those witnesses that they believed they were telling lies He saw no reason to disbelieve the witnesses, every one of whom stated that certain representations were made to them by the then Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was a member of the Committee, though requested to call counter evidence, declined to do so Then the Attorney-General went on to say that, admitting for the sake of argument that Mr Bonney had made these representations to the squatters, he had no right to do so, and the Government could not be bound by those representations The hon gentleman proceeded to apply a number of disparaging names to Mr Bonney, which he was surprised to hear He was surprised to hear the Attorney-General, who was generally so acute in matters of this kind, resort to an argument which defeated his own intentions The more the hon gentleman called Mr Bonney a tool, the more were the Government bound to carry out Mr Bonney's pledges If the Attorney-General had had to argue on the other side, he could have made a much better case of it The hon gentleman could have quoted many cases to show that principals were bound by the acts of their agents, and would no doubt have been most eloquent and lucid upon the point A case had lately occurred in which an official, low down in the scale, pledged the honor of the whole British nation He alluded to the conduct of a British officer at the taking of Delhi, who, in a moment of weakness, pledged his word that the life of the King of Delhi should be saved, and although the officer was severely censured for giving the pledge it was considered binding on the British Government, and the life of the King was spared Cases were constantly occurring in which the agent bound the principal, and he was therefore astonished to hear such an argument as that to which he had alluded used by the Attorney-General Then the Attorney-General went on to say that no verbal arrangement could override a written document He was not disposed to dispute the learned gentleman's law, but cases were constantly occurring in which verbal arrangements overrode written documents Suppose, for instance, a mercantile man promised verbally to renew a bill upon its arriving at maturity, would he not be scouted if he sent the acceptor a writ upon the bill falling due? Another description of case constantly occurred Suppose a section of land were let and a lease drawn up, and the tenant upon perusing it found that the rent was payable quarterly, and remonstrated, saying that he could only pay it yearly—if the owner acquiesced, and the lease were signed upon that pledge, would not the owner be acting most dishonourably by distraining upon the tenant at the end of six months? Cases were constantly occurring in which verbal arrangements overrode written documents The witnesses examined before the Committee agreed that Mr Bonney gave a pledge to the effect that no assessment should be imposed

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked the hon gentleman to state upon what portion of the evidence he relied, as he differed entirely with him

Mr GLYDE could not do so at that moment, but the witnesses examined certainly stated that Mr Bonney gave a pledge that no such assessment should be imposed as that which was proposed by the present Bill, and, as the Attorney General was the head of the Government, and had, no doubt, consulted with the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was a member of the Committee he must have known how the evidence was going, and might have tendered rebutting evidence, if any could have been brought forward The hon gentleman, therefore, had no right to find fault with the finding of the Committee He protested against the hon gentleman doing so as it was his duty to call evidence of a contrary character if he could He (Mr Glyde) was a juror as it were, between the squatters and the Government, the Government being represented by the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the hon member for the city (Mr Neales)

Mr NEALES could not allow that remark to pass All he could say was that the Government did not pay him any salary (laughter), although he might be a friend of the Government

Mr GLYDE would then say that the Government were represented by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the squatters by the hon member for Victoria and the hon member for Sturt He listened as attentively as he could to the evidence which was given before the Committee, and although he did not profess to possess the powers of cross-examination possessed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, still, if the House looked at the questions which he put, the House would see that they had clearly not been put with the view of enabling the squatters to make the best of their case On the contrary, indeed he went upon the Committee with a leaning towards the Bill The Government however, in putting that Bill before the Committee did not use the means at their disposal in placing evidence before the Committee No impartial set of men could, from the evidence adduced, have brought in any other verdict than that which had been brought in by the Committee

Mr TOWNSEND wished to ask whether the hon member was in order in discussing the principles of the Bill, and if so whether it would be competent for other hon members to pursue a similar course

The SPEAKER said it was certainly competent to do so upon the motion that the preamble be postponed, but he was only aware of one instance in which that course had been pursued in the Commons, which was upon the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill

Mr GLYDE having said so much in reference to his own conduct, would say a few words about the compact or compromise which had been entered into He had joined in a verdict for the squatters, and had recommended the withdrawal of the Bill, but now as the hon member for Victoria was making a bargain on behalf of the squatters, he should look very closely into it, and as a representative of the people should take care that the Government did not make another bad bargain He believed that Mr Bonney did make a bad bargain He agreed that the squatters did not pay sufficient towards the revenue of the country, and as he saw there was something in the shape of a compact proposed by the Government, and something like a compromise by the hon member for Victoria, he should feel bound to look very closely into them Unless they took great care it was quite possible that they might discount the squatters' bills at seven years date at a little too high a rate, and that in order to secure £20,000 at the present time they might give the squatters too many advantages seven years hence He could not assent to the amendments of the hon member for Victoria in their present form He was curious to see how the Government would deal with them, and should closely watch their action in the matter when the Bill was going through Committee It was possible he had taken advantage of the forms of the House in making the remarks which he had, but he had been accidentally prevented from making those remarks upon the second reading of the Bill He had considered it only right to defend the course which he took as an honest man when a member of the Committee

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had not expected to be called upon on the present occasion to make any remarks upon the decision of the Committee, or upon the grounds on which it was based With regard to what the hon member had said to the effect that if the Attorney-General conducted cases in the Supreme Court as he had conducted the Assessment on Stock Bill, he would soon lose his character as a special pleader, he could only state that his object in the Supreme Court was, as it was in that House, to be successful in the cause in which he was engaged So far the Government had been successful with the Assessment on Stock Bill, and he therefore did not think that any imputation upon the wisdom of the course which they had taken could now be fairly made The Government had never desired that the introduction of this measure should expose the squatters, during the currency of their leases, to unlimited assessment He did not think it necessary to go into other points, indeed, perhaps, it was not necessary that he should refer at all to his address upon the second reading of the Bill, but when he spoke of any arrangement, as it had been termed, which had been made by Mr Bonney not being binding upon the Government, he did so because Mr Bonney had certain defined duties which were as well known to the squatters as they were by Mr Bonney and every member of that House Every one alleged to have been spoken to by Mr Bonney, knew that Mr Bonney had no authority whatever except as derived from the Orders in Council, and those Orders being framed by the Queen in Council, were not liable to modification in any way by anything which could be done in that colony The Legislature had no power to modify those Orders and therefore it was quite clear that Mr Bonney could not To say that the honor of the Government was pledged by loose conversations with the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who knew what his duties were, with which also the squatters with whom he conversed were equally well aware, and must therefore have known that he had no authority to bind the Government—was going to an extent not warranted by any rule founded upon law or justice Hon members appeared to forget what he looked upon as the gist of his argument, that not only was Mr Bonney not the Government, but that he had no right to represent the Government in this way Mr Bonney had certain defined duties, for instance, he could define the boundaries of leases and had power to appoint the valuer with regard to the runs, and so far the Government were bound by what he did, but he had no power beyond this, and the squatters knew this perfectly well as a proof of which he might refer to the evidence of Mr Ellis who stated that he knew the conversation with Mr Bonney was nothing, and that he took the lease because it was Hobson's choice, he must take that or nothing It was true that Mr Baker said he understood the rent was to be paid in lieu of assessment and so it was, but the assessment, as he had previously explained, might have been raised at any time Mr Baker did not speak of any pledge from Mr Bonney, nor did Mr Torrens speak of anything of the kind
