SOUTH AUSTRALIAN

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

SECOND SESSION,

OPENED ON FRIDAY, AUGUST 27, 1858.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

FRIDAY, AUGUST 27, 1858

The second Session of the Parliament of South Australia, under the new Constitution, commenced on the 27th instant, but the event did not appear to excite as much interest as usual, the galleries being but thinly filled. Shortly before 12 o'clock, a military guard was drawn up in front of the Houses of Parliament, and in a few minutes the shrill sound of the trumpet announced the arrival of His Excellency the Governor in Chief. The members of Council present at this period, were the Honorable the President, the Honorable the Chief Secretary, and the Honorables Messrs Forster, Davies, Hall, O'Halloran, Ayers, Morphett, Davenport, Everard, Baker, Captain Scott, Bagot, A. Scott, and subsequently the Surveyor General. His Excellency arrived at a few minutes after 12 o clock, and was received at the door of the Council Chamber by a number of honorable members. His Excellency, who was in full uniform, was attended by the Private Secretary, Major Nelson, and the usual military suite. A chair was placed on the right of the President for the accommodation of His Excellency, who immediately directed that the gentlemen of the House of Assembly might be requested to attend. A considerable number of members, preceded by the Honorable the Speaker, promptly obeyed the call, and His Excellency then read the following address —

"HONORABLE GENTLEMEN OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY —

"1 Since I last had the gratification of meeting you in this Chamber, I have received the official notification of the marriage solemnized between Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of England and His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia. I am convinced that this most suitable alliance and auspicious event will be hailed by the representatives of Her Majesty's faithful and loyal subjects in this province with no less hearty and sincere demonstrations of loyal attachment to Her Majesty's person and throne, than it has elicited from all classes of the nation elsewhere.

"HONORABLE GENTLEMEN OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL—

"2 I have had much satisfaction in transmitting the address to the Queen, which you presented to me last Session, and in which you expressed your sympathy for the sufferings of so many British subjects through the mutiny in India, and your appreciation of the courage and firmness shown by Her Majesty's officers and soldiers serving in that dependendency. I am commanded to inform you that your address having been laid before the Queen, Her Majesty 'was pleased to receive it very graciously, and to express her sense of the loyalty and sympathy conveyed thereby.'

"3 I have further to inform you that, in compliance with your address of the 20th of last January to myself, I requested, through Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, that Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to direct a portion of the trophies taken by the British troops during the late Crimean war to be presented to Her Majesty's loyal subjects in this province. I have directed the correspondence on this subject to be laid before you, and you will have the satisfaction of learning that Her Majesty's Government has ordered two guns taken in the Crimea to be handsomely mounted, and presented to this colony, on behalf of Her Majesty.

"HONORABLE GENTLEMEN AND GENTLEMEN—

"4 I have directed to be laid before you the correspondence which (in compliance with your addresses of last session on that subject) has passed between myself and Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, relative to the annexation to this Colony of the territory intervening between its western boundary and the eastern boundary of Western Australia.

"You will, no doubt, learn with satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government agrees with you in opinion that the tract in question should form part of South Australia, though some previous communication with the Government of New South Wales may render some delay unavoidable in carrying out your wishes.

"5 I congratulate you that the indications of substantial prosperity, to which I have on former occasions alluded in addressing you, continue to manifest themselves.

"6 The imports and exports have increased during the past year in a sound proportion, and our Revenue has exceeded the estimated amount.

"7 In further confirmation of this favourable view of our financial position, it appears by our latest advices that South Australian Government Securities bearing interest at 6 per cent., have realized a premium of upwards of 10 per cent. in the London money market. This latter circumstance may be regarded as satisfactory evidence that the position and prospects of the colony are generally understood and appreciated abroad as well as at home.

"8 I am happy to inform you that the balance of Revenue at the disposal of the Government during the past financial year, sufficed to cover the expenditure and liabilities incurred, leaving a surplus available for the service of the current year, beyond the amount estimated, when the Estimates of the present year were authorized by you.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY—

"9 I have availed myself of this balance to propose for your consideration a further considerable expenditure on several important public works. These you will find detailed in a Supplementary Estimate, which I have directed to be laid before you.

"HONORABLE GENTLEMEN AND GENTLEMEN—

"10 It has been deemed advisable that, for the future, the financial year should commence on the 1st July, instead of the 1st January, as hitherto. In addition to other advantages anticipated from this change, especially as connected with the large expenditure on roads and public works generally, it will enable my Government to meet the wishes expressed in an Address from you, hon. gentlemen of the Legislative Council, and to provide that the sittings of the Legislature shall be held at a period of the year less inconvenient to many members than that which has hitherto prevailed.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY —

"11 With this view, I have caused Estimates of Receipts and Expenditure for the half year commencing the 1st January, and ending the 30th June 1859, to be prepared and laid before you.

"12 As respects the expenditure proposed under the heads of Government Establishments, these Estimates have been framed with a careful regard to economy, and when compared with the provision made by you for the current year, exhibit a small general increase, which is, however, unavoidable, arising out of the requirements created by the Department of the Registrar-General, under the Act for the Transfer of Real Property which came into operation on the 1st of July last, and the necessity of providing for extended Telegraphic communication

"13 Relying on your desire to extend the system of railway communication, I have directed a Bill to be submitted to you to authorize the extension of the Northern Railway as far as Kapunda

"14 In this Bill it will be proposed, in accordance with the precedent established during the last Session, to make one-third of the whole cost of the undertaking a charge against the balance of General Revenue, and to raise the remaining sum by the issue of Government Securities.

"15 Of the three Bills which I reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, two, relating respectively to Aliens and to the introduction of Convicts have received the Royal Assent, the third, relating to Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, is still under the consideration of Her Majesty, pending the result of certain legal proceedings in England, which, it is supposed, may affect its operation

"16 Among the measures which will be laid before you, I may specify a Bill to confer upon the Supreme Court powers in Matrimonial Causes and in Divorce, and to enable Magistrates to protect the earnings and property of wives deserted by their husbands similar in its general provisions to that which lately passed the Parliament of Great Britain, a Bill for the better regulation of the Civil Service, similar to that which was introduced during the last Session, and a Bill to impose a moderate Assessment upon Stock depastured upon the Waste Lands of the Crown, as well as Bills to consolidate and amend the present Impounding Acts, and the Acts regulating District Councils It is also proposed to amend the Waterworks Act, by altering the mode of assessment so as to distribute the burthen of the rates more equally in proportion to the advantages conferred upon the ratepayers

"17 Your attention will also be invited to a scheme for amending the existing system of constructing and maintaining the main roads of the province, and a series of resolutions will, with this view be introduced, which may afterwards form the basis of legislation upon that subject

"18 The Act to amend the Law of Real Property has been brought into operation by my Government in the manner which appeared best calculated to ensure its complete and efficient working

"19 In accordance with the provisions of Act No 4, 21st Victoria, I have appointed an Emigration Agent in London I have directed the correspondence on this subject to be laid before you, which will inform you of the nature of the arrangements entered into for the future conduct of emigrants to South Australia from Great Britain The benefits expected to be attained from the working of the new system cannot, however, be realised until the nomination orders under the old system are exhausted The rate of immigration decided upon by you last session, of one ship per month, appears to meet the present requirements of the colony

"20 The Act 'To encourage the culture of the vine in South Australia, by permitting distillation of the fermented juice of the grape,' which was passed during the last session, will, I trust, under a liberal interpretation of its clauses, be found to have removed the main practical objections to the existing distillation law But while my Government desires to remove any proved inequality or injustice of the former law so far as is consistent with the collection of the revenue at present derived from the duty on imported spirits, it does not feel that it would be justified in introducing or sanctioning any measure which would have the effect of placing this large source of income in jeopardy—thus necessitating new and untried financial arrangements which might seriously impair the resources and credit of the province, as well as complicate our relations with the other Australian colonies

"21 No result has hitherto attended the communications of this Government with the Governments of the other colonies on the subject of federation,

"22 The unsettled conditions of the relations between the various European Governments, to which my attention has been called in a despatch from Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, renders it prudent that the means of defending the province against external aggression should receive the early and serious attention of the Government and the Legislature With this object, I have obtained a report on the most suitable measures of defence consistent with economy, and have made a communication on the subject to the Right Hon the Secretary of State in a despatch, a copy of which I have directed to be laid before you I feel assured that you will cordially co operate with the Government in devising and giving effect to such measures as may be adequate to the occasion

"23, I regret that the anticipations expressed in my Address to you at the close of the last Session with respect to the completion of the arrangements to enable the Ocean Steamers to call at Kangaroo Island on their homeward route, have not as yet been fulfilled It is, however, satisfactory to know that all the parties to the Postal Contract have agreed to that arrangement, and that the delay which has occurred appears to be solely attributable to the financial difficulties of the European and Australian Royal Mail Company It will be satisfactory to you to learn, from a despatch which I have directed to be laid before you, that the Imperial Government is taking immediate measures, by entering into another contract to provide for the efficient execution of the the mail service in future

"I now declare this Session to be opened"

ADDRESS TO HIS EXCELLENCY

The CHIEF SECRETARY in accordance with the usage of the Legislative Council, moved that a Select Committee be appointed to prepare the draft of an address from the Council to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief in reply to the address which His Excellency had then read to the Council

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

FRIDAY, AUGUST 27

The SPEAKER took the chair at 12 o clock

Immediately afterwards a message was received from His Excellency the Governor in Chief requesting the attendance of the members in the Legislative Council Chamber

The members accordingly proceeded thither, and on their returning

The Speaker announced that His Excellency had delivered an address to the members of both Houses in the Council Chamber, and that printed copies were prepared for distribution amongst hon members The Speaker then read the speech to the house

RESIGNATIONS AND RETURNS

The Speaker informed the House that he had received letters from Messrs Matthew Torrens, Kingsmill, and Marks, resigning their seats in the House, the two former on account of acceptance of office under Government, the latter on private grounds

The Attorney-General moved that the Speaker be instructed to issue writs to supply the vacancies

The Treasurer seconded the motion

Mr Townsend wished, before the motion was put to call attention to the facility with which the law as it now stood, enabled hon members to vacate their seats In one instance an hon member, having been returned, resigned without attending even on a single occasion Great expense was incurred through this practice which he hoped would be put a stop to when the Constitution Act came to be revised

The motion was carried

NEW MEMBERS

The following newly elected members took the requisite oaths and their seats for the electoral districts which they respectively represent —Mr G C Hawker member for Victoria was introduced by Mr Bagot and Captain Hart, Mr J H Barrow, member for East Torrens, by Mr Reynolds and Mr Glyde

Agreed to

WATERWORKS COMMISSION

The Commissioner of Public Works laid upon the table various correspondence relative to the Waterworks including what had been moved for during last session, and also down to the present date

MEMBERS PLACES

Mr Bagot said he wished to ask a question of the hon the President respecting the seats occupied by hon members He (Mr Bagot) had occupied one seat during the whole of last session, and since the House opened and as it appeared that the style of tables was still kept up he wished most respectfully to ask whether or not each hon member was entitled to the seat which he had sat upon during the former session It appeared to him that the system of moving about from one seat to another might cause great inconvenience, as many hon members might not be aware that there was any alteration If the tables were to be kept up, it would be only reasonable and just that each member should retain (unless he vacated it at his own option) the seat he occupied before Many hon members had come up to the House before others and for his part he was not aware that there would be any movement whilst there were other hon members who were also disappointed in this way He wished now to know whether or not hon members were in courtesy entitled to keep the seats which they had held last session

The Speaker replied that in the former Council the practice had always been for members to take seats at the commencement of a session Members who were there that day when he took the chair were entitled to select their seats and to retain them In England seats were held of right only for one day

Mr Bagot thereupon gave notice of motion for the removal of the tables, and for the substitution of other accommodation

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

The Treasurer with the leave of the House, moved that the House, at its rising adjourn to Tuesday next, at 1 o'clock

Agreed to

THE NORTHERN RAILWAYS

The Commissioner of Public Works laid upon the table of the House a report from Mr Hargreave C E, relative to the Valley of the Gilbert as a route for a railway

Ordered to be printed

PRIVILEGE

The Speaker having intimated that in the event of there being no further business to be brought forward, the proper course would be to adjourn the House

Mr Peake begged to call attention to a power inherent in the House which he thought it was desirable should be upheld He meant that at that stage of their proceedings a Bill should be brought up and read a first time in order to assert the privileges of the House to proceed as a deliberative body

The Speaker stated that the House had transacted much formal business besides passing several resolutions and thus asserted their privileges before he read the Governor's speech

The Attorney General said that although not attaching individually much importance to the matter still as it had been the practice of the House and had been handed down from the old Legislative Council, he had intended himself to read a Bill pro forma, until he was informed by the Speaker that it could not then be done

LIBRARY COMMITTEE

Mr Blyth enquired whether it was necessary to reappoint the old Library Committee, or whether they still retained their powers

The Speaker replied that it was better they should be reappointed

Mr Reynolds asked if it would be necessary to reappoint the Committee for the decision of disputed returns

The Attorney General replied that they were appointed for the whole duration of each Parliament

Mr Blyth moved that the former Library Committee be reappointed

Agreed to

The House then adjourned until Tuesday next, at 1 o'clock

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Tuesday, August 31

The President took the chair at 2 o'clock

The members of Council present were —The Hon the President the Hon the Chief Secretary and the Hon Messrs Hall Bagot, Morphett, Major O'Halloran, Forster, Davies, A Scott, Captain Scott, Everard, Ayers, and Baker

DIVORCE BILL

PRESERVATION OF THE SQUARES OF THE CITY

The Hon Mr Davies gave notice of his intention to ask the Chief Secretary if the Corporation of the City had power to grant leave to destroy the squares or whether the Government had power to prevent such destruction

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS

The Chief Secretary said that before proceeding to business he would lay before the House the following documents —A despatch from the Secretary of State, enclosing a copy of an Act relating to divorce and matrimony Also a communication relating to the marriage of the Princess Royal

These documents were read and ordered to be printed

The President laid on the table a return of the City Corporation for the years 1855 and 1856 and a corresponding return for the Corporation of Port Adelaide The President remarked that the usual course would be to take no notice of those documents at present, but to ask the House as a matter of course to receive them

The Chief Secretary said that the papers should be laid on the tables of both Houses of Parliament

STANDING ORDERS

The Chief Secretary moved—

"That the Standing Orders Committee for the present session consist of the following members viz —The President the Honourables Messrs Morphett, Baker, Davenport and Younghusband"

The Hon H Ayers seconded the motion, which was carried

TROPHIES OF THE CRIMEA

The Hon Major O'Halloran moved—

"That this House has received with much satisfaction the answer from Her Majesty's Government to their Address of the 20th January last, in which Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to accede to a request from this Council, that a portion of the trophies taken by the British Troops during the late Crimean War might be presented to Her Majesty's loyal subjects of this Province"

The hon gentleman remarked that our Gracious Sovereign had in this instance, as on all similar occasions displayed a desire to meet the wishes of the colonists, and her graceful accession to the expressed desire of the colony required an acknowledgment such as was contained in the motion which stood in his name

The motion was carried

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY

The Hon A Forster had much pleasure in moving, pursuant to notice, a resolution expressing the gratification of the House at the steps proposed to be taken by Her Majesty's Government for annexing to this province the territory lying between its western boundary and the eastern boundary of Western Australia The hon gentleman said that such a proceeding would afford gratification to all colonists, as if the territory were not of present benefit, it would be at some future time It would be a subject of regret that any territory should be annexed which might afterwards be claimed by another colony, but the territory in question lay so far beyond the jurisdiction of New South Wales, that it could be of no material benefit to that colony Besides, it was obvious that police protection could be most efficiently and economically afforded by the nearest Government Then South Australia possessed harbors adjoining the territory in question, which belonged naturally to this province, and it was therefore, no act of aggression to attempt to annex it It was gratifying to think that there was a prospect of adding so extensive, and possibly valuable a tract of country to our own, which stretched six degrees north, and three degrees in a westerly direction, and contained more than 80,000 square miles, a great portion of which was likely to be available for the use of flocks and herds

The motion was carried

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

The Hon J Baker moved—

"That a congratulatory address be presented to Her Majesty on the occasion of the marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of England with His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia"

The hon gentleman did not consider that a Select Committee was necessary to prepare the address If he might be allowed to suggest a course to be pursued, he would wish to take the sense of the House on an address prepared by himself, and he would move that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, and for this purpose would move the suspension of Standing Order No 38, that the address should be taken into consideration The hon gentleman then read the address

The Hon H Ayers seconded. He would remark, in addition, that the hon gentleman who had moved the address was now about leaving South Australia for England, and he thought the opportunity was a suitable one for appointing him as their messenger to carry the address to Her Majesty He moved the suspension of the Standing Orders to enable him to give notice of motion on the subject

Leave granted

The Hon A Forster was happy to express his concurrence with the preceding speaker on the subject of the address, and he also concurred with him in the proposition to confide the custody of the address to Mr Baker, on the occasion of his sailing for England Such a course was not without precedent, as in the case of the Mayor of Melbourne

The Hon. J Baker, in reply to the observations which had fallen from Mr Forster, remarked that he was shortly about to visit England, and he would be happy to be the vehicle of conveying the congratulations of the colonists

The Hon H Ayers obtained permission to amend the following resolution, which stood in his name, viz —

"That the days and hours of the Council's meetings for the despatch of business be taken into consideration"

He remarked that Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday in each week, at 2 o'clock, were convenient times, and judging from his experience of the last session, they could not do better than continue that arrangement.

He then moved—

"That the days of meeting of this Council be Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, in each week, at the hour of 2 o'clock"

Carried

CONVICTS FROM SWAN RIVER

The Hon Mr Morphett wished to ask a question from the Chief Secretary, as to whether he was aware if the three men who had been lately committing highway robbery, and who were convicted and sentenced to six years penal servitude in this colony, were prisoners of the Crown illegally at large, and belonging to the province of Western Australia The hon gentleman was of opinion that, under such circumstances, they should be sent back to that colony, instead of remaining here at a cost to this Government

The Chief Secretary said he would make enquiries, and report to the House

THE GOVERNOR'S SPEECH

The Chief Secretary moved the suspension of the Standing Order, No 38, for the consideration of the present address, in reply to the speech of His Excellency

The Hon H Ayers in moving the Address, would make a few remarks He regretted in the speech of His Excellency that there was no allusion to the present depression in trade, but, on the contrary, a congratulation on the satisfactory state of the finances of the colony Perhaps the Government did not consider the omission important, but there was no closing their eyes to the fact, that the present commercial depression had been unequalled for many years past He had endeavoured to discover the cause, and he imagined it might be traced to the excess of imports over exports In the half-year ended June 30th, the imports amounted to 842,986*l*, and the exports to 524,017*l*, leaving a difference of 308,969*l*, and this in a population of 110,000 souls The cloud which was hanging over the commercial horizon was further affected by a dull season of the year, and a peculiarly restricted market for discounts, and all this depression was in the face of a very flourishing revenue No doubt this state of things would pass away, for the overstock of goods would deter consignors from shipping, and consequently the excess of supply would be reduced The hon gentleman remarked that on the subject of railway communication he had felt it his duty to oppose the measure brought in by the Government during the last session, but the expression of public feeling had convinced him that the colonists at large were strongly in favour of the extension of this line to Kapunda, and he felt disposed now to give that measure his support. The question of an assessment on stock should be approached with caution So important an interest as that of the flockowners should not be made the subject of hasty legislation, and he thought a strong case should be shown in favour of the necessity of such a tax With regard to the Real Property Bill, which His Excellency had commended there was no information furnished by the Government which proved that the Act was working efficiently and completely Indeed, so far from this being the case, capitalists refused to lend money on property which had been brought under the Act The hon gentleman concurred with the Government in the opinion that it would be unwise to interfere with the arrangements passed last session relating to the Distillation Act

The Hon A. Forster would follow the hon gentleman in an expression of regret and surprise that the Government had not made allusion to the commercial depression at present existing It was possible that the abounding wealth of members of the Administration had prevented them feeling the monetary difficulties under which the public were suffering, but they could scarcely have their eyes entirely closed to the effects felt in commercial circles Such a reference would have been most appropriate, and it was a matter of regret that it had not been made It was also matter of regret that Government had not taken the trouble to supply themselves with information on the subject The speech from the 5th to the 7th clause contained the following remarks —

"I congratulate you that the indications of substantial prosperity, to which I have on former occasions alluded in addressing you, continue to manifest themselves

The imports and exports have increased during the past year in a sound proportion, and our Revenue has exceeded the estimated amount

"In further confirmation of this favorable view of our financial position, it appears by our latest advices that South Australian Government Securities, bearing interest at 6 per cent, have realised a premium of upwards of 10 per cent in the London money market This latter circumstance may be regarded as satisfactory evidence that the position and prospects of the colony are generally understood and appreciated abroad as well as at home"

This statement was not borne out by figures and facts, and was wanting in that necessary confirmation Referring to the difference between the imports and exports the hon gentleman remarked that the excess of the former had nothing to do with the tightness of the money market and the general welfare of the colony The export of wool amounted in the first half year of 1857 to £404,928 against £447,372 in 1858 The export of copper in the first half of 1857 amounted to £220,801, and in 1858 to £167,535, showing a falling off in this particular of £53,266 Then, in the article of breadstuffs a considerable deficiency was manifested, the exports in the first half year of 1857 being £276,237, against £146,680 for 1858, showing a deficiency of £129,557 for this half year Then the reduction in the price of wool in England would cause a loss to sheepfarmers here of more than £..,000, and the total deficiency could not be estimated at less than £237,843 The imports and exports certainly did not bear a fair proportion Contrasting the depressed state of the community with the present state of the revenue, it was to be considered that the wealth of a Government was an abstraction of wealth from other portions of the community Lands were forced into the market with the object of raising a revenue, and frequently these lands were sold from under the feet of the squatters. The cause of the depression might be traced in some measure to the banking system which was not sufficiently expansive to meet the increasing requirements of commerce. The accommodation which would have been sufficient four or five years ago was not sufficient now. But more than this the banking capital in the colony had proceeded at a ratio inverse to the number of the population. For example, in 1853, the total coin and bullion in all the banks was £1,319,000, with a population of 67,000; in 1855 coin and bullion were £782,817 with a population of 96,982; in 1856, coin and bullion were £414,362, for a population of 104,230; in 1857, coin and bullion £347,772, against a population of 109,917; and in 1858, coin and bullion were £319,110, with a population of 112,000, showing a yearly increase of population, and a yearly diminution of coin and bullion held by the banks. At the present time the banks had not available funds to meet the wants of our increasing community.

The Hon. Mr. HALL rose and requested that the hon. gentleman would simplify the matter, and separate the question of amount of coin from the amount of bullion.

The Hon. Mr. FORSTER would give the hon. gentleman the advantage, especially as he was a manager of one of the Banks of the colony; he would simplify the matter by describing the total capital as bullion alone. He believed that the Banks had afforded the colonists accommodation to the utmost limit of safety. The existing depression he attributed to the circumstance that the Banks had not funds enough at their command to meet the growing wants of the colonists. It was well known that latterly bills had been refused to the amount he would say of thousands and tens of thousands of pounds, which had the Banks had more money at their command would not have been refused, and he believed that for years past they had granted accommodation to the extent of their whole available means. In making those observations he was desirous of shewing that the imports and exports did not bear a fair ratio to each other during the latter portion of the financial year; that the present depression was not the consequence of any serious difficulty but arose chiefly from the banks not having the means to afford accommodation in accordance with the increased demand. With regard to the main road question alluded to by His Excellency in his address, he (Mr. Forster) perceived that an allusion was made to legislation by resolution: upon the subject of legislating by resolution that House had fully and freely expressed its opinion last session, and although he did not expect that the present Government would endeavour in the face of the clearly expressed opinion of that House to establish such a principle, he trusted that whatever resolution was introduced, would be introduced so as to have the effect of forming rather the basis of legislation, than legislation itself; as otherwise he should be compelled to oppose any attempt on the part of the Government to legislate in that particular manner. He held it to be a sound principle that no branch of the legislature should legislate upon any question without submitting the question for discussion to the other branch.

The Hon. Mr. BAKER agreed with the hon. gentleman who had last addressed the House, that some allusion should have been made to the present commercial position of the colony; but he thought that gentleman had scarcely taken a right view of the question. With reference to the capital of the Banks, he (Mr. Baker) did not think that the amount of bullion was the sole evidence of the amount of capital; there were other circumstances to take into consideration, for instance the state of the accounts with establishments in England; in many cases large balances might be standing to the credit of Banks here, which of course would swell the amount of the means of those establishments. He agreed, however, that there had not been a commensurate increase in the circulating capital of the Banks considering the great increase of our population, for what was adequate years ago for the wants of the community was found inadequate now. Again, it might have been in some instances that the Bank authorities had been led into transactions which compelled them to occupy positions as merchants themselves by which they might have made great losses, and transactions of that character would naturally have an injurious effect upon other Banks. The truth would be found perhaps, that there had been excessive shipments upon which large advances had been made, and that the Banks were now compelled to curtail accommodation. As an instance of this, some two or three days ago he met a gentleman, who denounced the conduct of the banks as most atrocious to him individually, that they (the Banks) had actually discounted his paper to a very large amount, and, as he said, refused to go on. (A laugh.) It was such cases as these that had had the effect of bringing about the present limit of accommodation. He thought, however, that the depression was merely of a temporary nature, and would have the effect of introducing more money in the colony, when the present state of things would soon cease to exist. He understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forster) to say there was a falling off in the exports of wool, whereas on the contrary, there had been an increase; and as to the fall in the price of wool, it must be remembered that the price of that article had ruled very high of latter years, and they must look forward to a further depression in the market. He was certainly surprised that no allusion had been made to this circumstance, as it would be calculated at least to allay alarm. He thought, too, that the all important question of education should have been touched upon especially as the Ministry had already promised to deal largely with that question. With regard to the question of legislating by resolution, the House would remember that the first Ministry were turned out upon that question, and doubtless the present Ministry deemed it wise to ascertain how far they could go in committee before bringing forward the great road question. There was another question that he would mention and that was the question of Free Distillation. He certainly thought that this important matter demanded serious consideration. The public had been led to expect some measure which would meet the growing requirements of the colony in this respect. There was no question of more vital importance to the colonies generally, and the wine-grower particularly, as little would be done in this branch of agriculture until some measure was passed which would enable the wine-growers of this country to compete with other countries for the production of wines suited for the English markets. He did not think that the falling off of the revenue returns for spirits was sufficient reason for shelving the question. Free distillation must come sooner or later. The population of South Australia would have it. He had a letter recently from England, which he regretted he had not with him, in which it was stated that it was not the light wines, such as hocks, clarets, &c., which were required for the home market, but strong bodied wines which cannot be made without the assistance of the still; and he trusted the Government would turn their serious attention to this subject without delay. He for one would gladly submit to the infliction of a property-tax to make up any deficiency which might arise in the revenue consequent upon the passing of the measure, and should the Government omit to reconsider the matter and meet the views and necessities of the case, he should deem it his duty to take the opinion of the Council upon the subject. As to the Real Property Act mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Ayers), that was a subject of the greatest importance; the Act he had been informed was so incomplete and unworkable that it would require great alterations to render it an effective measure. The Act was of a most sweeping character, affecting or repealing almost every Act which existed in the province; he had also been informed that the cost for placing an estate on the register would be enormous, and although lawyers were proverbially good hands in making a long bill, he had been informed that under the Act the costs would be far heavier. That the Bill was good in principle there could be little doubt, but to go on in the face of difficulties which the Act presented, was folly.

The Hon. Mr. FORSTER begged to explain. He had been informed by the Registrar that the Bill was working most satisfactorily, and that very little alteration was required to perfect it.

The Hon. Mr. BAKER resumed.—As to the waste lands of South Australia, he considered the regulations most unsatisfactory and such as required the immediate attention of the Government. He considered the auction system was very unjust to the squatter. He knew a country at the present moment which he would be willing to spend money upon for improvements if the system rendered the purchase secure at a fair rate. At present there was no surface water on it, and were any person to make an outlay for sinking wells, though he could secure a lease for 14 years, there was no guarantee that the run would not be immediately put up to auction. Again, on the score of discovery it was difficult to ascertain what constituted a discovery under the present regulations. He held that "discovery" was giving information to Government of the existence of land not before explored; but under the present regulations it was left to the discretion of the Government to declare what was and what was not a discovery. This principle was unfair to explorers, as there was no limit or rule to guide the explorer in his claim. Government should mark out on maps the present boundaries, and should any individual subsequently discover any other portion of territory, he should be entitled to the benefit of it even although it was just without the boundaries marked out. He deemed it his duty to call attention to the matter, so that the present land regulations might be discussed with the view of adopting measures for the removal of the objections to which he had called attention. As to the defences of the colony, that was a question which required much consideration. He thought that the means of the colony were not adequate to undertake the expenses of erecting fortifications, and indeed they could hardly be expected to do it.

The Hon. Mr. MORPHETT said that as the motion was in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor, he must express his opinion that a more dove-like document could not be conceived. (Laughter.) It was delightful the mesmeric influence which must have been exercised by the hon. the Chief Secretary over the Committee who acted with him in framing the reply. Messrs. Baker, Ayers, and Forster had been all on the Committee. Each of the hon. gentlemen of the Committee had addressed the House, and he (Mr. Morphett) could only remark that if they had said one-tenth on the Committee of what they had said to the House they would have had an address much more suitable to the dignity of the House. He confessed he looked upon the document with contempt, for it was not merely—as such documents when adopted by other Legislatures usually were—a mere echo of the speech, it had been, item by item and paragraph by paragraph, an echo. He could have understood it but it was a succinct and short and ought to have been a valuable document but now many important points had been taken up by hon gentlemen who ought to have brought these matters up before in the Committee Mr Baker and Mr Ayers had both during the last session expressed themselves strongly in reference to the extension of railways, and yet in this most mild and beautiful address there was no allusion whatever to railways They might go to Kapunda or anywhere else but there was not a word said about them Again, the address congratulated the colony on the extent of its imports but the Hon the Chief Secretary ought to know that the extent of our imports was not a matter for congratulation Imports were a drain upon this colony and a loss to the merchants and shippers from England, although he admitted that their excess was in a great measure owing to excessive orders from this country However it appeared that the Committee considered this a matter for congratulation The Chief Secretary had also announced that there was a large available balance for public works

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY reminded the hon member that the speech was that of His Excellency the Governor

The Hon Mr MORPHETT was quite aware of that but still he believed he was acting in accordance with Parliamentary usage

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY had only mentioned it as a matter of form

The Hon Mr MORPHETT continued—The hon the Chief Secretary had said that there was a large balance available to be expended in public works What were these public works to be? He (Mr Morphett) thought it would be more just to expend the balance in lieu of the proposed assessment on stock for he presumed this assessment was necessary in order to meet some payment As he thought it would be very unjust and very unwise to impose it unless there was some large deficit or some large expenditure to be met They were told however that there was a large balance The Hon Mr Forster in his speech on this subject had as he (Mr Morphett) thought inconsiderately arrived at rather an unjust conclusion when he referred the present state of the colony to the condition of the Banks which he compared with their condition in 1853 He (Mr Morphett) thought that the Banks had at present coin in their possession in accordance with the sound principles of banking, or rather in excess of that amount The hon gentleman had said that there was not as much coin in the Banks now as there was in 1853, but did he remember that 1853 was the year of the gold escort, and that the coin in the Banks then was that deposited by the successful gold-diggers To compare this quiet time with the wealthy time of the gold escort was most unjust But he could congratulate the Council in connection with this subject, on the fact that there was another Bank about being established, and he thought the hon member (Mr Forster) had something to do with the new Land Bank

The Hon Mr FORSTER must correct the hon member He had nothing to do with the Land Bank or any other bank

The Hon Mr MORPHETT resumed He was not prepared to move any amendment on the address He could only say that since it had come before them it was not a very creditable document, and he did expect that better consideration would have been given to the important subjects which had been alluded to

The Hon Mr BAKER, as a member of the Committee could only say in reference to the subject of Railway construction, that although the address did not allude to it he had not altered his opinion on the subject He held now the precise views which he held when he recorded his opinions on the matter before, but he thought the question had been virtually decided when the Council had consented to the extension beyond Gawler Town, and that it would therefore not be necessary to bring about any angry discussion on the point It was not a very usual accusation against him (Mr Baker) to say that he was too dove-like (Laughter) All the things which had been mentioned had been spoken of in Committee, but it was considered better that the address should be too dove like than that, in a reply to a speech of Her Majesty's representative there should be any difference of opinion and perhaps much time wasted in consequence He was very happy to find that the hon gentleman (Mr Morphett) could not say anything more against the address than that it was too dove-like (Laughter) He was glad that hon gentleman could not move an amendment, and that with all the desire and inclination which he possessed to do so he could not suggest the alteration of a single word He would conclude by again stating that all these matters had been considered in Committee

The Hon Mr FORSTER, as a member of the Committee would also state that various matters which the hon member (Mr Morphett) had said were not mentioned he would find referred to if he would read the last clause [The hon member here read the clause]

The report of the Committee was then brought up and

The Hon Mr AYERS moved that the report as agreed to by the Committee, be adopted as the address of the Council in reply to His Excellency's speech that it be presented by a deputation of the Council to His Excellency at such time as His Excellency may appoint, and that the deputation be headed by the Hon the Chief Secretary owing to the indisposition and unavoidable absence of the Hon the President, in consequence of indisposition

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned to 2 o'clock next day

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY, AUGUST 31, 1858

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three minutes past one o'clock at which time the members in attendance were the Honorables the Attorney General the Commissioner of Public Works, the Commissioner of Land and Emigration, Messrs Macdermott, Duffield Peake, Reynolds, Strangways Barrow Mildred and Hawker

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYOR

Mr MACDERMOTT gave notice that on Wednesday, September 8th he should move—

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that a sufficient sum may be placed on the Estimates to secure the services of a Geological Surveyor, with special reference to his knowledge and experience in boring for water on the Artesian principle and that an efficient party may be organized to be permanently employed in boring in such localities as he may indicate, as offering a reasonable prospect of success under such regulations as His Excellency in Executive Council may from time to time approve.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr REYNOLDS said the House had been taken by surprise by the new Standing Orders which had been adopted They were very different from the Standing Orders of last session, and it would have been far better at least it was thought so by many hon members that the Standing Orders of last session should have been adopted instead of the very voluminous Standing Orders which had been substituted, so voluminous that it would take hon members at least a month to understand them He did not know if he would be in order in bringing forward a motion to rescind the resolution adopting the new Standing Orders, but he repeated that the House had been taken by surprise by their adoption, and he was desirous of bringing forward a motion to rescind them

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the new Standing Orders would probably be taken into consideration that day week

RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on Friday next he would ask the Honorable Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether any explanations had been furnished by the Railway Commissioners in reply to the queries of the Auditor General on the railway accounts of 1856—forwarded to the Commissioners on or about October last wherein the Auditor General has pointed out to the Commissioner of Public Works that a sum exceeding £30 000, purporting to have been paid to workmen, has not been properly vouched for by the receipts of the parties represented as being paid, what has been the nature of the explanations (if any), and whether he has approved the accounts

That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether any inquiry has been instituted into the charges made against certain parties on the Railway, as having had an interest in some contracts on the line, the names of the persons making the inquiry and the result

INTERCOLONIAL TELEGRAPH

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table Telegraphic Regulations and scale of charges in connection with the Intercolonial Telegraph, remarking that he would not move that they be printed as they had already appeared in the Government Gazette

LAND ON RAILWAY LINES

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS laid upon the table a return, moved for by an address to His Excellency, No 23 during the last session, showing the quantities of unsold land on the proposed lines of railway and moved that it be printed

LAND DISCOVERED BY SURVEYORS

Mr PEAKE gave notice that on Wednesday 8th September, he should ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration (Mr Dutton) if any Waste Lands of the Crown recently discovered by the officers and at the expense of the Government of this colony, have been leased by private treaty and, if so, what lands have been so leased, and to whom, and on what conditions Also, what portion (if any) of the Waste Lands of the Crown so discovered have been offered by public auction, and what was the result of such public auction

STANDING ORDERS

Mr STRANGWAYS gave notice that on the following day he should move that the new Standing Orders be discharged, and that the Standing Orders of last session be adopted until the new Standing Orders which had been prepared had been considered and approved by the House.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The TREASURER laid upon the table Supplementary Estimates for the colony for the present year and gave notice that he should move their consideration in Committee on Tuesday next.

REPLY TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S ADDRESS

The Attorney-General laid on the table the proposed reply to the address of His Excellency the Governor in Chief, upon the opening of Parliament and moved in accordance with the Standing Orders that it be printed and taken into consideration in connection with the Orders of the Day on the following day. His object in having it printed was that honourable members might have an opportunity of perusing the proposed reply before the question was brought under discussion.

Carried.

CONGRATULATORY ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY

The Attorney-General moved pursuant to notice —

"That a congratulatory Address be presented to Her Majesty on the occasion of the marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of England with His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia."

He did not think it necessary to occupy the time of the House further than by a few brief observations. He could hardly imagine that any person would object to a recognition on the part of the House of the alliance which had taken place, it being a matter of great interest to that House as representing the community of South Australia. They must all feel a deep interest in whatever affected the welfare of the country of which they were still citizens, or of the Royal lady who presided over the destinies of that State. In one respect, perhaps, this was a matter of private consideration, affecting the personal and individual interests of the persons immediately concerned, but at the same time it had another and a wider aspect. It was an alliance affecting not only the Prince and Princess, but it was an alliance with a country over which the Prince would in all probability one day be called to govern, and the house to which the Princess belonged. On all grounds, not only of usage but as expressing the feelings of hon. members, it was right that they should offer congratulations upon the occasion such as had been offered by all similar bodies throughout the British dominions. The hon. gentleman concluded by reading the address, which was as follows:

"May it please your Majesty,

"We, your Majesty's loyal subjects, the House of Assembly of South Australia, avail ourselves of this earliest opportunity, to offer our heartfelt congratulations on the marriage lately solemnized between your royal daughter, the Princess Royal of England, and his Royal Highness the Prince William of Prussia.

"We trust that this suitable and auspicious union, while conducing under the Divine Providence to the happiness of Her Royal Highness, may cement the bonds of alliance between two powers long connected by treaties, and may tend to secure a continuance of our peaceful relations with the States of Europe."

The Treasurer seconded the motion.

Mr. Reynolds would like to make one or two remarks before the resolution was put. It was a very interesting matter, and one not merely very gratifying to the Government of this colony, but very gratifying and satisfactory to the members of that House. At the same time he could not help remarking upon the vacillating policy of the Government of that country, a Prince of which was now united to one of England's daughters. It had been supposed in consequence of a crowned head of Prussia being connected with a crowned head of Russia that that had something to do with the vacillation of Prussia, but he now hoped, as the royal family of Prussia had become united with the royal family of England, that instead of vacillation Prussia would now take a more prominent and determined part in the politics of Europe. He had hoped that the Attorney-General would have allowed a gentleman who represented the country with which England had formed an alliance to propose the motion, and that his honorable colleague, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, would have moved the address, but perhaps after all it was better that the Attorney-General should have done it himself, because it might have been considered bad taste on the part of the representative of Prussia. (Laughter.) If report spoke truly the Commissioner of Crown Lands was the representative of the Prussian Government. (Renewed laughter.) He confessed he felt some surprise when he heard it, but as the House were probably aware, he merely stated public rumour when he said that the honorable the Commissioner of Crown Lands was the Prussian Consul. He had hoped on the present occasion that that honorable gentleman would have appeared in official uniform, with cocked hat and feathers, to give proper weight to the address which it was proposed to present to Her Majesty upon the occasion of the marriage of one of her daughters with a Prince of Prussia. Perhaps the Attorney-General thought that the remarks contained in the address were so complimentary to Prussia that the representative of that country might have hesitated to propose them, or probably he expected the Hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands to respond. At all events, and under all the circumstances, he thought there would have been bad taste in the Commissioner of Crown Lands moving the address, for he repeated that he merely stated public rumour when he said that the hon. gentleman was the Prussian Consul, and also the representative in that House of Her Majesty's Government. This was a close alliance — should they call it a holy alliance? (Laughter.) He had been induced to make these remarks in the hope that the Commissioner of Crown Lands would duly respond.

Mr. Peake regretted that the hon. member for the Sturt had made the remarks which he had, as they clearly referred to a matter which had no connection whatever with the subject under discussion. What possible connection could there be between the appointment of the Commissioner of Crown Lands to the office of Prussian Consul, and the presentation of a complimentary address to the Queen upon the marriage of her daughter? He hoped that the subject to which the hon. member for the Sturt had alluded would be dropped for the present, however much it might be discussed at a future time, and that the House would at once vote the address, which as loyal subjects they were bound to do. He was convinced there was no British subject in that House or in the colony who would not cordially endorse the loyal and fervent aspirations contained in the address. He was sorry that any irrelevant matter had been introduced into the discussion.

Mr. Burford fully agreed with the hon. member who had just sat down that it was most improper to mix up the two questions which had been referred to. He was sorry that the hon. member for Sturt had made any allusion to the vacillating policy of Prussia, as Prussia did not stand alone in that respect; in fact he would not be the man to stand up in defence of his own country on the score of vacillating policy. (Laughter.) Where it was thought that a vacillating policy would answer best he never yet knew the Government that would not adopt it. (Renewed laughter.) He hoped the present Ministry would prove an honorable exception, and that they would not adopt a vacillating policy, but go forth in earnestness, determination, and sincerity. He trusted that all irrelevant remarks in connection with the subject under discussion would cease.

The Attorney-General would merely say one word, and that was to express his regret, and perhaps he might say his surprise at the tone which had been adopted by the hon. member for the Sturt. Whatever of personal feeling he might have anticipated in the conduct of that hon. gentleman, he had trusted that an occasion like the present would not have been sullied by an exhibition of feeling of that sort. He could not help expressing the surprise and regret which he felt at being disappointed in that reasonable expectation.

The Speaker put the motion, which was carried.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY

The Attorney-General moved —

"That this House views with satisfaction the steps proposed to be taken by Her Majesty's Government to annex to this province the territory lying between its western boundary and the eastern boundary of Western Australia."

He did not know that in introducing this motion it was necessary to do more than make a very few remarks. The House was probably aware that between the western boundary of this province and the eastern boundary of Western Australia there was a tract of country which was nominally included in New South Wales. Practically it was almost impossible that any efficient Government of that country could be exerted by New South Wales. No power by the colony by which the territory was nominally possessed, could be exerted for good, whilst at the same time, the exercise of legal authority by any other State or community was prevented. His Excellency the Governor in Chief called the attention of the legislature to the circumstance, and that House and the other branch of the legislature presented addresses to Her Majesty asking for a removal of the difficulties which might arise from such a state of things, and that the country situated as he had described, might be annexed to South Australia. It was with great satisfaction, he was sure, that the House had learnt from His Excellency's address that the Government at home had recognised the reasonableness of the request, and were prepared to initiate a measure for the annexation of the territory to this colony, but courtesy to New South Wales rendered it necessary that that colony should be consulted, and this had created some delay prior to steps being taken to carry out the arrangement.

The Commissioner of Crown Lands seconded the motion.

Captain Hart was glad to hear the Attorney-General state that the important piece of country referred to was about to become a portion of this province. He believed there would be found in that space of ground some most important sheep-runs, probably as important as any in the country. There was no question that the spot could only belong to South Australia, as the only port available was Fowler's Bay, after which for a distance of 400 or 500 miles to the west, there was no place where a ship could anchor at all. He felt convinced that some very valuable discoveries would be made in the neighbourhood of Fowler's Bay, as the change of country in the vicinity was very apparent, and from there to Cape Arid the cliffs were 600 or 700 feet in height. No doubt the table lands inside would be found of great value to the pastoral interests of the colony, and he greatly rejoiced that the Home Government consented to annex the spot to South Australia.

The Speaker put the motion, which was carried.

CRIMEAN WAR

The Attorney-General, in pursuance of notice, moved that an Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking her for the promise made by Her Government that this province shall receive a portion of the trophies of the Crimean war He did not think it necessary to say one word in recommendation of this motion, because he believed it would commend itself to the universal feeling of the House He should, therefore, content himself by simply moving it The hon gentleman then read the Address, which was as follows, and moved its adoption —

"May it please your Majesty—We, your Majesty's loyal subjects, the House of Assembly in South Australia, have learned with much satisfaction that your Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct that a portion of the trophies won by the valour of your troops in the late Crimean war should be presented to this province

"We beg to offer to your Majesty our grateful acknowledgments of the interest thus shown in this dependency of the empire, and we shall carefully preserve these trophies of war as mementoes of the glory of our mother country"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS seconded the motion, which was agreed to without discussion

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that on Tuesdays and Thursdays, during the present session, Government business shall take precedence of all other business

Mr STRANGWAYS called attention to a point of order The notice had been given by the Attorney-General verbally for Tuesday and Friday, but it appeared on the paper for Tuesday and Thursday He was not aware whether the Attorney-General erred when he read the motion or whether he subsequently altered the notice

The SPEAKER said the mistake arose in the Attorney-General's reading, as the notice was written as it now appeared on the notice paper

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had selected Tuesdays and Thursdays for the dispatch of Government business, because he believed they would be found the most convenient By this arrangement a day for the dispatch of general business would intervene between the days devoted to Government business Thus if important business happened to be postponed in consequence of a pressure of Government business upon a Government day, it might be taken on the following day without interfering with business of equal importance This had been the practice of South Australia since there had been an elective legislature, with the exception of last session, when the arrangement was altered, and the experience of last session had fully shown that Tuesday and Thursday would be more convenient than Tuesday and Friday

Mr REYNOLDS did not rise for the purpose of offering an objection to any particular plan which the Government might deem it expedient to adopt, but would point out that there were some exceedingly important motions for Thursday next, and wished to know if it were intended that Government business should take precedence on that day He did not wish to offer any unnecessary opposition to what was proposed by the Government, lest this should be construed into personal feeling He regretted that such had been the case when he previously addressed the House, although so far from having been influenced by any such feelings, it was in fact a most kindly one Presuming that the Government did not intend to put any business on the paper for Thursday next, he had no objection to the proposed arrangement

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was not aware of there being Government business for Thursday, but if such were the case it could be postponed till the following Friday

Mr REYNOLDS had much rather that the Government should give way, and say that no Government business should be entertained on Thursday next

Mr BURFORD had given notice of a motion for Friday next, and was not aware until that morning that it had been set down for Thursday

The SPEAKER put the motion which was carried

HOUR OF MEETING

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved—

"That, during the present Session, this House do meet for the dispatch of business on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays in each week, and that the hour be 1 o clock"

He imagined there would be no difference of opinion as to the days upon which the House should meet for the dispatch of business, and the purposes of legislation, but there might be considerable difference of opinion as to the most convenient hour In order to open up discussion upon the point he would move in the first instance that the hour be 1 o clock, upon which the hon member, Mr Bagot, would move as an amendment, of which he had given notice, that the hour be 5 o clock He had originally intended to vote for 5 o'clock as the hour of meeting, but he had since ascertained from the statement of a number of the members of that House that if 5 o clock were fixed it would interfere greatly with their private arrangements and prevent them from giving that attention to their legislative duties which they were desirous of devoting to it, and which the country expected He felt that he had no right in a matter of mere personal convenience to himself, to attempt to carry out an alteration which would have an effect of that character He should therefore move that the hour of meeting be one o clock in order that it might be made a subject of amendment if considered desirable

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS seconded the motion

Mr BAGOT rose to move the contingent notice of motion standing in his name, that the hour of meeting be 5 o clock He had hoped, in fact he had reason to hope that the hour which he proposed would have been supported by the Attorney-General and by the array of Government officers but after what had fallen from the Attorney General he, of course, could not now hope for the support of that hon gentleman or his colleagues But although the hour he had proposed might be inconvenient to some, he felt assured that it would be found much more convenient to the majority of those whom it was desirable to have in that House, than the hour which had been named by the hon the Attorney-General There were many reasons to be given why 5 o'clock was the most desirable hour He would call attention to the analogy between 5 o clock and the hour at which other Parliaments and other Assemblies met There was no Parliament in the world, that he was aware of, which was in the habit of meeting at such an hour as that which the Attorney-General had proposed, or at which the Parliament of South Australia had been in the habit of assembling In the Australian colonies, in Canada, and he believed in the United States they all met at an hour much later than that which the Attorney General had named He was aware that there had been some discussion upon the point, but he wished to shew that notwithstanding the discussion which had taken place in the public prints, the hour which he suggested was preferable, and he did not think that they should be coerced by any opinion expressed through such a quarter, no matter how strongly or personally opinions might be put forth in the public press He had heard it said that if this motion passed, and the House agreed to meet at 5 o clock, it would become an evening debating club, and that the measures would not be so good as the country had a right to expect, as they would be discussed and passed whilst members were suffering from dyspepsia (Laughter) It was said that legislation after dinner was not good (Renewed laughter) As to the House being turned into "an evening debating club," the Parliaments of England, Victoria, Sydney, America, Canada, and other places did not meet till nearly the hour he had named, and they were called upon to consider questions of very great importance, nearly as great as were brought under the consideration of that House (Laughter) Yet he had never heard of their being turned into evening debating clubs, nor had he heard that the members were subject to dyspepsia, nor that they failed to pass good measures in consequence of meeting at so late an hour The fact was, that the vital portion of the question had not been touched The vital point was, whether men of business, whom he wished to see as representatives in that House, could, or would, offer themselves as candidates for legislative honors and attend to their duties when elected, if the hour of meeting were one o'clock It was well known that there were at that moment constituencies vacant, and it was an exceedingly difficult thing to get really suitable candidates to present themselves He regretted that such should be the case under responsible government, but it was so He believed that a great cause of men of business not presenting themselves was that hitherto, in consequence of the hour of meeting, some of the best business hours of the day were taken out (No, no, hear hear, ironically) Of course he would not expect that those hon gentlemen who intended to vote against him would give him anything but an ironical "Hear, hear" He believed that very many more men of business would look for seats in that House if the hour of meeting were 5 o clock because, if that hour were fixed, business men would be able to finish their business before attending the House With regard to himself, although personal motives had been imputed to him, he had not been induced to bring forward his motion from any personal considerations, but he would admit that the hour of meeting which had been hitherto adopted had been felt by him most inconvenient, although he had always put up with that inconvenience He would defy any one to say however pressing his private engagements had been, that he had ever shrunk from the performance of his public duties His object in endeavouring to bring about an alteration in the hour of meeting was that men of business might be induced to come forward, and that the representation of the country might not be almost exclusively confided to large and independent capitalists whose time was entirely in their own hands He wished to see men of business as representatives, capable of carrying on the business of the country as it should be Unless the suggestion which he had made were adopted, he felt assured that the only parties who would offer themselves as representatives would be gentlemen and large capitalists who were looking forward to advancement From the feeling which had been expressed by the House he did not expect to carry his motion, but he hoped the House would give him credit for having brought it forward from no other desire than that the public should be benefited

Mr BARROW intimated that he should support the motion of the Attorney-General, although if the hon gentleman had moved that the hour of meeting be 2 o clock instead of 1, he should have supported him (Hear, hear) He claimed the indulgence of the House whilst he made a few remarks in reply to what had fallen from the hon member for Light That hon member had said that he would not be coerced He was sure that he (Mr Bagot) need not have given the

House that assurance, for they all knew that he never had been and never would be coerced He could not help thinking however, on looking at the notice paper, that the hon member himself had been trying his hand a little in that direction, with the view of coercing members of that House, for he had endeavoured not only that day to coerce them into an alteration of the hour of meeting, from 1 to 5 o clock, but for the following day there actually appeared a notice of his intention to take away hon members' tables (Laughter) The hon member appeared determined to be the Arbiter of their Parliamentary destinies, standing forth in that House, holding Time in one hand, and Space in the other (Renewed laughter) The hon member had grounded his opposition to the hour of 1 o clock upon the fact, that in no British Parliament were there day sittings But, admitting there were not, it was clear that day sittings had not worked badly in South Australia, for in constitutional progress South Australia was in advance of the other Australian colonies "Hear hear" He defied the hon member to point to any injurious or disastrous measures, and say "these are the effects of early sittings" The honorable member had remarked that it had been said late hours would quickly convert the House into an evening debating club, but he (Mr Barrow) did not know where that had been stated, he had certainly never seen it so stated, nor did he apprehend there was any danger of that House becoming a debating club even though the sittings were held in the evening instead of the day He believed that the business of the country would be better attended to and more satisfactorily despatched by day sittings than by night sittings The honorable member for Light had said that the vital part of the question was whether men of business should have seats in that House or not But were there not many men of business, eminent in commercial circles, and conspicuous in commercial attainments, who already had seats? (Hear, hear) He did not think that all the business members would range themselves by the side of the honorable member for Light, they would prefer 1 o'clock to 5 He should therefore support the motion of the honorable the Attorney-General reserving to himself the right of voting for 2 o clock instead of 1, should the motion take that turn

Mr Duffield had intended to have risen for the purpose of seconding the amendment of the hon member for Light He should not have enlarged upon the subject but for a remark which had fallen from the Attorney General, from which he was led to believe that hon members could not conveniently assemble at the hour which the hon gentleman had intended originally to have proposed, and that unless their convenience was consulted in determining the hour of meeting they would resign their seats He was sorry that the gentlemen who had made this threat had not made similar remarks at the hustings He should adopt the course which he presumed others would take, and vote for that hour which would best suit his own convenience (Laughter) He did not, however, say that he should resign if the House should happen to determine upon an hour which was not the most convenient to him It was a matter of little consequence to him whether the House assembled at 1 2, or 3 o clock, as it occupied the whole day for him to attend the House He was compelled to leave Gawler Town by the first train, and the House usually broke up too late to enable him to return Whatever hour might be fixed upon he should feel bound to hold his seat so long as his constituents wished him to do so

Mr Hughes was glad to find that the Attorney-General was likely to be so ably supported When the hon gentleman brought forward his motion for affirming the days of meeting without mentioning the hour, it was thought that the hon gentleman wished to consult his own convenience, and to name an hour after that at which the Supreme Court would probably have risen Hon members would remember the inconvenience which was felt last session by the inability of the Attorney General to attend to his duties in the House, and he (Mr Hughes) presumed that the hon gentleman wished to remove that inconvenience and intended to exert his eloquence to persuade hon members that the most convenient hour of meeting would be later than hitherto The hon gentleman admitted that after having consulted a number of hon members he had been induced to alter the hour to 1 o clock, in fact, it might be assumed that the hon gentleman having counted heads and not wishing to bring forward a proposition upon which there was every probability of being defeated felt bound to bow to the wishes of those who preferred 1 o clock to 5 He should support the motion for meeting at 1 o clock He had ever been in favor of meeting at an early hour, as the surest way of consulting the convenience of settlers in the country, and those residing in the suburban districts By assembling at an early hour those residing at a distance were enabled to return to the family circle without remaining in town all night If the proposition of the hon member for Light were adopted the government of the country would virtually be thrown into the hands of parties residing in the City of Adelaide He would sooner even support a proposition for meeting at 10 o clock in the morning in order that they might give a whole day to legislation when it was found necessary That would be more a step in the right direction than the proposition of the hon member for Light It had been asserted by the hon member for Light, that in no colony under British rule did legislative assemblies meet at such an hour as 1 o clock, but that was no rule for South Australia, because in most countries there was a much larger population than there was here, and, consequently, there was a much larger number of persons who were in a position to attend to Parliamentary duties That was a statement which could not be controverted It was altogether out of place to institute a comparison between the hour of meeting in the House of Commons and in that House Every one who had been in London knew that there was comparatively little difference there between night and day (Laughter) He meant that the conveniences which were afforded in that city made it a matter of very little difference whether the meetings took place by night or day He was glad that the hon member for Light, with a great deal of tact, had refrained from alluding to the Legislature of the neighbouring colony of Van Diemen's Land, for he had been informed that the scenes which too frequently occurred there, were owing to the unfortunate practice of meeting in the evening He felt that the motion of the Attorney General would be supported by the House, but if there were a proposition brought forward to meet still earlier, he should certainly support it It was their duty to give the greatest facilities to bring every class into that House, that was a more essential point than consulting their own personal convenience

Mr Peake supported the motion of the Attorney-General At the first elections hon members who had been sent to represent the various constituencies consented, upon entering that House, to a certain hour of meeting, and he thought it only fair that that hour should be adhered to till the end of the period for which they had been elected For himself he should prefer the evening sittings The hon member for Light had stated that difficulties would be experienced in getting suitable representatives for the various constituencies which were and would become vacant unless the hour of meeting were 5 o clock, but he could not see how the fact of the sittings being deferred until that hour was likely to assist in getting a better class of men than if they were at an earlier period of the day He had no doubt that every member had come fully determined for what hour he would vote, and he believed this question would be the subject of downright hard voting Such it was intended to be, and he had no doubt every one would vote as best suited his own convenience If some hon members could not attend at the hour fixed he had no doubt that at future elections the people would relieve them from all difficulty by declining to re-elect them He thought the hon member for Light had acted wisely in refraining from making any allusion to Van Diemen s Land, and was happy that the House of Assembly in this province had not yet arrived at such a pitch as the Legislature in Tasmania

Mr Burford wished to move as an amendment that the hour of meeting be 2 o clock instead of 1 (Hear, hear)

The Speaker ruled that the amendment could not then be put

Mr Burford was happy to say he was not one of those who would be influenced in his vote by any considerations of personal convenience He came to that House as a representative, fully determined to make any sacrifices for the benefit of the country which might be demanded by circumstances Personal considerations should be entirely thrown aside in the consideration of the question The sole consideration should be—how could they best discharge their duties to their constituents, with advantage to the country? He was desirous of altering the hour to 2 o clock, because he believed that the additional hour would be sufficient to enable commercial men to finish their business before coming to that House, It seemed that no hon member could bring forward a motion without having personal insinuations thrown out Thus the hon member for the Port stated that before the Attorney-General brought forward a motion, he counted heads, and if he found he could not carry it, he pursued another policy But surely the Ministry were above such a dodge, he hoped they were, and that they would enter upon the public business with earnestness of purpose, honor, and straightforwardness

The Commissioner of Public Works had been present at several debates upon this question, and he believed that meeting at 2 o clock would be found a great mistake, at all events it had been found so in a former session If he remembered rightly, it was the hon member for the Port who on a previous occasion had supported 2 o clock, and who subsequently was the first to admit that a very great mistake had been committed He believed there was no middle course between 1 and 5 o clock He was sure that neither his own eloquence nor that of any other hon member, could change the determination at which hon members had arrived All had come down fully determined, and he thought the sooner they proceeded to that "hard voting" which had been spoken of the better

The Attorney-General, in reply, would trouble the House with but few remarks He believed there was no member of the old Legislature but would admit that 2 o'clock, which had been tried, was a great mistake All were ready to grant that; the additional time secured to the individual would be very trifling, and the loss to the Legislature would be very great He believed there was no medium between 1 and 5 o clock Personally he should have been prepared to support 5 o clock He was indifferent about the motives which were imputed to him, if parties thought he was such a coward that he was not prepared to bring forward a motion without a majority to back him, he must leave them in the enjoyment of that reflection As a member of the Government he was not justified in merely supporting that hour which would be most convenient to himself, his duty was to support that hour which he believed from enquiry to be in accordance with the general feeling of the House and most conducive to the interests of the public. If the House were to carry 5 o'clock, he believed the legislation would not be so satisfactory as it would be if they persisted in meeting at the hour which had hitherto prevailed He should feel still more bound to vote against 2 o clock than 5

The motion of the Attorney-General for meeting at 1 o'clock was carried.

Mr BURFORD was desirous of pressing his amendment that the hour be 2 o'clock

The SPEAKER ruled that it could not be put, adding that such ruling was precisely in accordance with the practice of the Imperial Parliament

MR BABBAGE'S EXPLORING PARTY.

Dr WARK moved that there be laid on the table a return of all sums of money paid or contracted for on account of the exploring expedition under charge of Mr Babbage, and the dates of such payments or contracts It would be remembered that during last session the House voted a considerable sum—he believed £3,000—for the purpose of exploration, and since that time it had been patent to every one that the money had been expended, and not only that, but a much larger sum They were in a position to know the movements of the gentleman under whose care this undertaking was carried out, they were aware of the perils which he had already encountered, and they could see that still greater perils would have to be encountered before the party could perform their task Of course, a large party required a correspondingly large sum of money to maintain them, and he thought it only right that the House should be placed in possession of a statement shewing the various items of expenditure.

Mr TOWNSEND seconded the motion

Mr HUGHES was desirous of making an addition to the motion, to which he trusted the hon mover would assent It was unquestionably most important that the House should know what money had been expended since last session, but there was another point upon which it was also desirable that they should be informed, and that was what they were likely to get for their money If the additional information would not give any considerable trouble, it was desirable it should be afforded also, the date of Mr Babbage's appointment, and a statement of the distance he had travelled in that portion of the interior, previously unexplored, at the date of the last advices received from him

Mr PEAKE seconded the amendment, as he was desirous of knowing how far Mr Babbage's ride in the bush had extended, and what were the results A large sum of money had been expended, and from rumours which were afloat, it was desirable there should be some authentic information as to what had really been achieved Unpleasant questions were sometimes put to hon members as to what had been done with the money, and he was sure the Commissioner of Crown Lands would be happy to afford all the information in his power

Dr WARK adopted the amendment

Mr BAGOT asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands, if he intended to lay tracings on the table of the House, showing the different exploring expeditions? This was done last session on several occasions, and it was found to conduce very much to make hon members understand what had been done.

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS said every possible information upon the point had been prepared, and was being printed. He hoped in a few days it would be in the hands of hon members

Mr REYNOLDS asked if the information would include tracings

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS said the tracings were not yet in hand, the reason being that further plans were expected, and at a later period of the session the Government would be enabled to place on the table a lithographed map in a more perfect state than if it had been previously prepared

Mr BAGOT said he alluded to the exploration not only of Mr Babbage, but of others who, he believed, had made important discoveries

LIBRARY COMMITTEE

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS moved that the hon the Speaker, the Attorney-General, and Mr Bagot, be appointed a Library Committee for the present session, with power to confer with the Library Committee of the Legislative Council, and that a copy of such resolution be sent to the Legislative Council

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS seconded the resolution, which was carried

The Hon the PRESIDENT was not aware of any inconvenience having arisen in consequence of the old Standing Orders having been made use of It was desirable that the decision of the Courts in Tasmania respecting the Standing Orders of the House in that colony should be received before new ones were adopted here, as it would be well for the House to ascertain how far their powers to make such orders extended

RIVER WEIR.

Mr TOWNSEND asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the correspondence which he laid upon the table on Friday last was to the 31st August

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS believed that the correspondence was to the 28th August, but a correspondence was still going on upon the subject

ELIGIBILITY OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr HUGHES rose to ask the House to assent to the resolution in his name—

"That, in the opinion of this House, none of its members, except those who for the time being are members of the Administration, should hold any place of profit or emolument in the Public Service "

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor in Chief, transmitting a copy of the foregoing resolution, and requesting him to issue regulations providing that whenever any person holding office under Government (the salary of which office is provided for on the Estimates or under the provisions of any Act, whether by fees or otherwise) shall be elected to represent any electoral district in this House, he shall by such election be held to have resigned his office, and some other person shall be appointed in his stead, and, also, providing, that whenever contracts are entered into by the Government, a notification of the fact that such contracts have been entered into, and the names of the contracting parties, shall be published in the Government Gazette "

He stated most emphatically in submitting the resolution to the House that he regretted it had not fallen into more experienced hands, fully acknowledging that few resolutions submitted to the House were of more importance to the constitution than those which he had the honor to lay before it The principle affected by the resolution had been raised within ten days of the first meeting in the Parliament in the case of Mr Hare, and the debate on that occasion took a turn which he believed rather unfortunate, as it went entirely upon the unfitness of that gentleman to retain his pay as Comptroller of Convicts and his seat in that House at the same time It did not go upon the broad principle that they should have no more Government officers in the House than were allowed by the Constitution Act If the matter were allowed to remain in that position they would have the unpleasantness of having to discuss the personal merits of each individual in each case which arose. In bringing forward these resolutions he was actuated only by a desire to induce the House to affirm a great constitutional principle. He was not influenced by any wish to exclude from the House a gentleman who held the office of Registrar-General under the Real Property Act. He brought the resolution forward partly from a sense of duty, and partly from a feeling of personal honor. When Mr Hare was returned as a representative for Yatala the question was raised but it was shelved for a time by the resignation of Mr Hare, and he then determined upon the first opportunity to bring the question forward upon its broad principle. On the retirement of Mr Smedley, for the county of Light, he considered it was his duty to communicate with Mr Maturin, who had intimated an intention of standing for that county, and told that gentleman that if he were returned he should certainly bring the question forward, and that he (Mr Maturin) must be prepared to defend the principle of parties receiving salary or emolument under the Government sitting in that House or resign his salary as Commissioner of Waterworks. Mr Maturin ascertained the feelings of several hon members and found that many were adverse to his position, but still determined to contest the district and to test the principle. After his return Mr Maturin received a more lucrative appointment, and in consequence resigned his seat. It was, therefore, favorable that the question could be discussed without reference to any individual, and upon the broad principle which he had laid down. He would proceed to call attention to the Constitution Act, an Act which, like most others, was capable of being read two ways. Some hon members, whose opinions were entitled to considerable weight, contended that no Government officers but those named in the Act were eligible for seats in that House, and others contended that the disqualification merely extended to those who accepted office whilst holding seats. The 16th clause of the Constitution Act pointed out what class were eligible for electors, whilst the 14th clause provided that parties eligible for members should merely possess the same qualifications as electors. The only disqualifying clause upon the meaning of which there was any difference of opinion was the 17th, and the 18th imposed a penalty of £500 upon any person who should sit and vote as a member of the House after being disqualified. The question was whether the 17th clause would bear the construction which had been placed upon it. It appeared to him that it was a matter of very little importance whether a person came into that House holding office, or whether he afterwards received an appointment. The spirit of the Constitution Act was that every individual who had resided six months in the colony, should be entitled to vote, and that the representatives of the people should have the same qualification thus giving the electors the broadest possible choice, but that there should be no more Government officers in the House, than those named in the Constitution Act. To show that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution Act, he would refer to the sentiments that were expressed at the time the Act was under discussion. On the 5th December, 1855, the clause to which he had alluded was brought under discussion, when the Colonial Secretary stated that the clause had been drawn for the purpose of preventing members receiving Government appointments from retaining their seats without going to their constituents. The hon gentleman stated that the people were the best judges of their own interests and that if they thought fit to re-elect members after receiving Government appointments, they could do so. Of the five members who took part in the discussion, three expressed themselves opposed to salaried officers having seats in that House, except those named in the Constitution Act. It was true that the then Chief Secretary boldly declared that if any member accepted office, his constituents were the best judges whether he should still remain their representative, but it should be remembered that at that time a circular had just been issued, intimating that Government officers were not expected in any way to oppose the existing Ministry. It was not right that the explanation given of the debate recently before a large assemblage of colonists, should be allowed to pass without challenge. He had referred to what had actually taken place on the occasion of the Constitution Act being under discussion and contended that the construction which he had placed upon the clauses to which he had alluded, was quite as reasonable as that placed upon them by others. As to who was to interpret the Act, there could be no doubt that the House alone was to decide as to any question relating to its powers privileges, and practices. In this view, he was supported by the Standing Orders the 27th clause of the Act stating that the House might make Standing Orders for its own guidance, and the very first Standing Order affirmed that each House should be the sole judge of the privileges, &c., of its own members. It had been affirmed in that House upon the celebrated debate upon the Privilege question, that the privileges of that House were analogous to those of the House of Commons, and if so, he found the views which he had enunciated fully borne out, upon reference to May, page 57. He had so worded the first paragraph as to confine the effects to that House, wishing to avoid any interference with the ways and customs of the other House, so long as the other House did not interfere with theirs. With regard to the last paragraph of the resolution, it had merely been inserted with the view that the House should become aware of any members accepting lucrative contracts from the Government. Upon the House becoming aware of such, it would be for it to consider whether it brought the parties under the disabilities laid down by May. The hon member quoted from May, page 34 showing that Government contractors were disqualified. If it were decided that persons holding salaried offices were not eligible to occupy seats in that House, they should certainly take notice of those beneficially interested in contracts with the Government. He believed that one member of that House, in the last session, had become disqualified by accepting contracts, his interest in which he believed he had since resigned. The practical effect of these resolutions, if adopted, as he hoped they would be, would be to explain to those constituencies about to hold elections for vacancies which existed the interpretation placed by that House upon the Constitution Act. It would explain that the House affirmed the principle that no Government officers but those named in the Constitution Act should be members of that House. It was very necessary that that principle should be affirmed, for it was obvious that the Government entertained the opinion that they had a right to influence the votes of those who were in the public service, the circular which had been addressed to them distinctly stating that they would not be allowed to take any position antagonistic to the Government of the day. He might have been wrongly informed, but there was a rumour which was entitled to credit, that even in the appointment of Registrar General a stipulation was made that that officer should not do anything to unseat the present Ministry. If the rumour were untrue he hoped the gentlemen opposite would state so and he should place confidence in their assurance more than any rumour. He had been informed that many members were likely to object to so broad a principle being laid down as that contained in these resolutions. For instance, he had heard it urged that any Justice of the Peace acting as Coroner and receiving a fee would be ineligible for a seat in that House, but it was not necessary he thought to alter the resolutions, as the cases were few in which Justices of the Peace acted as Coroner. Such cases only occurred in the outlying districts, and as Justices of the Peace were only called upon to act where there was no Stipendiary Magistrate within a distance of 20 miles, and no Justice of the Peace would perform so unpleasant an office if he could avoid it. The framers of the Constitution had in view to establish a system of representative responsible Government, superseding the close system of Government, which up to that time existed—to supersede in fact the nominee element. But if there were a district in the colony—he would not say a family borough, because there was no such thing in the sense in which the term was understood in England but if there were a district in which there was a strong feeling of affection towards a family of wealth, or one who had endeared themselves to the constituency, that constituency would virtually exercise a right of nomineeism as objectionable as that which had previously existed. If they were to have nominees at all, it would be better that they should be placed in the House by the Government, who were responsible to the House. To shew that he was not wrong in speaking of Mr Maturin, when that gentleman started for the Light, he stated that if he were to lose his salary by retaining his seat he should assuredly resign his seat and not his salary. Since that time Mr Maturin had received a still more lucrative appointment, and had resigned, shewing that his seat as a representative for Light was altogether a secondary consideration. The remarks which he had made were perfectly justifiable, for Mr Maturin had held all offices, from Master of the Ceremonies at Government House to Commissioner of Waterworks, and they had all seen him last Friday in a fancy dress, taking a prominent part in a public pageant. (Laughter.) He had said that the gentleman was nominally Commissioner of Waterworks, but really to superintend the squandering of large sums, which he was firmly persuaded were being squandered in connection with water supply. Mr. Maturin had now accepted a most mysterious office—Commissioner under the Real Property Act—an office which he never could understand, and which had been created apparently with no other view than to give the holder a salary, for it was expressly stated that the gentlemen who held these offices were not to understand the duties which they had to discharge. (Question, question.) He wished to explain that he was fully justified in alluding to this question, and to show that there was really nothing in the previous public career of Mr Maturin which entitled him to be elected by the members for Light, but the electors were influenced by feelings of respect for the family with which Mr Maturin was connected. He alluded to the question because he believed that the electors had a far higher duty to perform than their mere duty to their neighbours and friends, they owed a duty to the colony at large. Seeing that the new Constitution was only just being brought into working, it was only by such resolutions as the present that it could be brought into proper working. Constituencies could not be too cautious in sending men to that House as their representatives, who would not be biassed by office or the Government. Let them come as the independent representatives of an independent people. He should always unflinchingly adhere to the principle contained in the resolutions. He did not know whether they would be carried, for he had not consulted hon members generally, and had merely been promised the support of four There might some day be an organized opposition in that House, but at present they had not arrived at such a state The position of a member of that House occupied a great deal of time, and he had really not had an opportunity of ascertaining the views of hon members before bringing his resolutions forward He relied however on the public spirit in that House, and was prepared to allow the question to be decided upon its own merits If he could not induce hon gentlemen to affirm the principle of the resolutions let them ignore it and set it aside He believed, however, that it would bear the light of day, and speak to hon members from its own intrinsic merits more than anything which he could say He wished to see members of the House what they ought to be—that was virtually the representatives of the electors who elected them In proposing an address to His Excellency he believed he had adopted the best mode of getting over the difficulty, as it would obviate the necessity of interfering with the Constitution Act All that he wished was that representatives should be enabled to prove that they were in a position to give an independent vote by shewing that they were not dependents upon the Government

Mr PEAKE wished before the question was put to make a few remarks He agreed with the abstract proposition put forth by the hon member for the Port, that in the opinion of the House no persons should hold seats in that House who held office of profit or emolument in the public service He did not believe there was a single dissentient to that, but probably there were some who believed that such a proposition was not embodied in the present Constitution Act Many thought that the clause which had been alluded to by the hon mover had been drawn to enable the electors if they thought fit to elect Government officers as their representatives He admitted that the wording of the clause was defective, and rendered its literal meaning doubtful The proper course he apprehended, would be to remove the doubt by the introduction of an amended Constitution Act He objected to the presentation of an address to His Excellency, because it would be asking His Excellency to do what they were in a position to do for themselves The Constitution Act proved to him that they had that power, and he objected to the House taking so indirect a course as to ask His Excellency to interfere when the House had so clear a course before it. It was the opinion of many that the Constitution Act did not prevent Government officers from sitting in that House, but he repeated, why take an irregular course? Why not amend the Constitution Act? The hon mover had read copious extracts from the debates upon the Constitution Act, but that Act he must still confess was most ambiguous They were all, he believed, agreed upon that point, but they were not agreed upon the remedy He would ask the Ministry why no steps had been taken to amend the Constitution Act? He would ask the Treasurer why the Bill which had been promised had not been brought forward? Why the necessity of bringing forward such a resolution as that which had been brought forward by the hon member for the Port? He would ask the members of the Ministry, amongst whom he saw two gentlemen who spoke so ably and eloquently upon the Privilege question, why they had not brought forward an amended Constitution Act? It seemed to him that the gentlemen had been wandering in the Elysian fields of office and required waking up (Laughter) He begged to move an amendment to the resolution to the effect that an address be presented to His Excellency praying him to direct the law officers of the Crown to amend the Constitution Act, and set at rest the questions in connection therewith upon which the House had expressed its opinion It was of no use to attempt to legislate by resolution or to define the meaning of the Constitution Act by a resolution of that House The more delay there was in introducing an amended Constitution Act the more complication was likely to arise

Mr LINDSAY seconded the motion

Mr BURFORD supported the motion of the hon member for the Port, which he thought was a proof of the clear foresight and correct judgment of the hon member (Hear, hear) The Governor had power to make regulations, but the House could not prevent the operations of the Constitution Act It would be a great misfortune if that session were allowed to pass without an amended Constitution Act being introduced There were some eight or ten points in which it required to be altered to make it workable When any defect in the Act was discovered it should be discussed and recorded with a view to an ultimate alteration, but he saw this difficulty if they waited for an amended Act they would probably have to wait 18 months or two years before it could come into operation, whilst there would be no delay if His Excellency would issue such regulations as would effect for a time those alterations which were deemed essential

Mr HALLETT opposed the motion from a conviction that the Constitution Act already sufficiently provided that members accepting Government office became disqualified He referred to the 17th clause, which shewed satisfactorily to his mind that no person holding office of profit and emolument under the Government could hold a seat in that House, except indeed, such offices as were specially provided for by the Act

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated that he agreed to a considerable extent with the views enunciated in the first part of the proposition Many and great inconveniences he admitted were connected with that portion of the Constitution Act by which a Government officer was clearly eligible for a seat in that House, if elected by the constituents whilst holding that office That was his construction of the Constitution Act, and he admitted there were inconveniences of a very grave character connected with it But it should be remembered that this matter had been brought very fully before the Legislature at the time the Constitution Act was under discussion, and the Legislature deliberately affirmed that the choice of the constituents should not be limited by the office of the individual If the constituents thought their interest could be served by parties holding office they had full power to elect them Unquestionably there was a good deal to be said on the other side, but still he did not regard this as a new matter The House had by a unanimous vote affirmed the principle involved in the resolution in the case of the Comptroller of Convicts, and he thought it should be understood that this was not a shifting principle, available against an unpopular but not a popular person an engine which might be used against the weak, but not against the strong, but it should be affirmed as applicable to all cases He was prepared to acquiesce, and the Government would do all that they could to give effect to the resolution, but he would suggest that the motion should be altered, because what it asked for in its present form was more than it was in the power of the Government properly to do In effect, for instance, it asked the Governor to alter the law under which the Civil Service received their salaries He thought that the issue of a circular to all Government officers, or an intimation in the Government Gazette warning Government officers that they might be called upon to resign their appointments if they accepted seats in the Legislature, would accomplish the object in view He did not know whether this would meet the views of the mover and seconder of the motion, but he felt bound to suggest it, as it would be beyond the power of the Governor to assent to the resolution without the assent of the other branch of the Legislature He wished to see action taken in the matter, without violating the principles of the Constitution

Mr TOWNSEND regretted to have to differ with the Attorney-General He was convinced that nothing but a strong resolution of the House would prevent the House from being filled with Government officers Circulars such as had been suggested by the Attorney-General, had been issued by the Government of a former day, and the effect had been seen It had been said that Mr Hare's was an exceptional case, and that what the House did in that case, it was not bound to do in others, but he wished to see a broad principle laid down applicable to all cases He believed that the 17th and 18th clauses of the Constitution Act already provided for this or any other case, but a resolution would at once decide the matter, and show the constituencies the temper and feeling of the House He did not want to see the Constitution Act amended until after the termination of the first Parliament The hon member for the Burra (Mr Peake) had taunted the Ministry with having been wandering in the Elysian fields of office, but he did not know whether that hon gentleman, amongst his other pursuits, had been looking over the fence, that he had discovered they were so remarkably sweet (Laughter) He wished the hon member had tried his hand at amending the Constitution Act It had been said that the constituencies had a right to decide who should represent them, and that the House had no right to place a bar between the representatives and the represented He admitted that was a sound principle, but he considered that the united constituencies through the medium of their representatives had a perfect right to decide whether a particular representative came within the scope of the Constitution Act Better return to the nominee system than that the Government Benches should be filled with Government officers

Mr BARROW said that before the question was put he should offer one or two remarks on the resolution before the House Should no third course present itself, he would vote for the resolution, though not without reluctance, for if the resolution were to have the effect of excluding Justices of the Peace performing the duty of coroners, and other persons similarly circumstanced, he thought it would be rather a hard case He would have wished that the hon. member for the Port had dwelt more fully upon that portion of the subject, and had shown the House that the course which he proposed to adopt would not involve any such difficulties He must, however, support the resolution if he were to vote upon this question at all, and he should consider himself wanting in the duty which he owed to his constituents, if he were not to vote upon it With respect to the proposition of the hon and learned the Attorney General to the effect that a notification should be published in the Government Gazette intimating that Government officers returned to the House might be called upon to forfeit their offices, he could only say with regard to that proposal that it appeared to him to leave the question in the undefined position which the Attorney-General himself complained of when speaking of the present state of affairs For who was to say whether the notification would ever be carried into effect or not? It might, as the Attorney-General had said on another point, be powerful against the weak, and powerless against the strong Feeling as he (Mr Barrow) did, that such a notification would not tend to make clear that which was now undefined, he could not see any particular benefit which would result from it, and was unable to support it. With respect to the proposed amendment of the Constitution Act, although he was of opinion that that Act required emendations, he thought it would be better to introduce them in a new Parliament, and to let a general election intervene; for hasty amendments would lead to frequent amendments, but if the whole thing were done on a broader basis, the next amendments introduced might probably be the last required. He had understood that some hon. gentleman intended to move that a limitation should be placed to the interdict, to the effect that any person in the receipt of say £50 per annum should forfeit his seat, or resign his office; but it appeared that in this impression he had been misinformed. He was not prepared himself to move an amendment to that effect, and should, therefore, vote for the resolution.

Mr NEALES would suggest to the hon. mover of the resolution that he should introduce a proviso that the emoluments of an office should exceed some certain amount annually, and he believed that if this were done, the amount of support which the resolution would receive would be much greater than it would otherwise be, when the forfeiture of a seat would be involved by the receipt of one guinea. He should recommend the insertion of words to the effect that the fees should be of the aggregate of 50*l.* or 100*l.* a year, and he thought if such words were not inserted, many hon. members would not vote in favour of the motion. But even if the hon. member for the Port would not make this addition, he (Mr Neales) should still vote for the resolution, though he thought it would be much better if the words which he proposed were inserted. With respect to the proposal of the hon. and learned the Attorney-General, he thought that proposal would have no effect, or, if otherwise, it would have this effect, that it might be turned into a machine to favor the existence of any Ministry which might happen to be in power. (Hear, hear.) It would not affect the friends of the Ministry, but it would affect their enemies. (Hear, hear.) And, for his part, if he were a Minister, and there were no law to keep his friends and supporters out of the House, he would certainly not feel so vicious towards them as he would towards his political opponents. He thought the reading of the Act put before the House by the hon. member for Sturt seemed to him to be hardly borne out. The spirit of the Act was, that no Government officer or party in receipt of Government pay, should occupy a seat in the House; but he thought that the original vote hardly bore out the view of the hon. member. The only thing they could do was to support the proposition which had been laid before them by the hon. member for the Port. He thought, also, that the modesty of the hon. member for the Sturt would prevent him from pressing his views as to the interpretation of the Constitution Act, after the statement of the hon. and learned the Attorney-General. He would not speak on the subject of legislating by resolution, although it was involved in the question now before the House.

Mr YOUNG would support the resolution. As to members of the House being Justices of the Peace and acting as coroners, he considered that a case which could be met more readily than by interfering with the resolution before the House. It was only on extraordinary occasions that a difficulty occurred in supplying the place of a coroner, and in which it would be necessary for a magistrate who was a member of that House to act in that capacity, for it was seldom that the gentleman representing the district in Parliament was the only available Justice of the Peace.

Mr COLE would suggest another amendment in the resolution. In the second clause it was merely provided that the names of contractors should be published in the Gazette. He wished to see the amounts for which the various parties contracted published at the same time with and set against the names of the contractors.

Mr STRANGWAYS said he would support the motion of the hon. member for the Port, although he would have supported the hon. member for Clare if that hon. member had put it as a substantive motion; for he was of opinion that there were many things in the Constitution which required to be altered. As to the difficulty that had been raised with regard to Commissioners, &c., these would be removed if the Commissionerships were abolished; and as to the Justices of the Peace, they only received their fees in the capacity of Coroners, and would not under the Constitution Act vacate their seats unless they held offices of interest or emolument. He could not agree with the hon. member for the Sturt that there was any provision in the Act which would meet the case, for he believed that it was open to the constituencies to return any person who might have accepted office if they chose. He would support the motion, as it would have the effect of preventing the House being filled by nominees of the Government.

Mr MILDRED would support the resolution in its entirety. When the present Constitution Act was framed, whatever might be the wording of the Act, the impression on this subject was that no person holding an appointment under the Government, except hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, should hold seats in the House; and on that ground he should support the resolution. The second part of the proposition he considered proper and desirable. He believed that there had already been questions amongst persons holding office as to what the position was in which they would be placed, if they became candidates, and were to be returned. He hoped the intention of the Act was to keep the House free from persons holding Government appointments; but at all events every person holding such appointments should know the effect which the obtaining of a seat would have on his position.

Mr REYNOLDS, before the question was put from the chair, had one or two observations to offer. He agreed with the motion of the honorable member for the Port, but he did not agree with the amendment. That amendment would have the effect of preventing the object which they had in view, and by means of it, the House would be kept "haggling," if he might say so, at the Constitution for months to come. When the Constitution was dealt with, it should be dealt with at once, and in a summary way. He questioned whether hon. gentlemen fully perceived the extent of the motion of the hon. member. He had heard no reference made to the sweeping character of that proposal, although for his part it was not on that ground he objected to it, for he was a sweeping radical himself, and desired to see all abuses rectified. It would have the effect of excluding all Commissioners from the House, Commissioners under the Waterworks, the Railways, the Harbor Trust, and the Central Road Board. It would exclude, if he was not mistaken, even the solicitors to these Boards, for these gentlemen were or were presumed to be, paid by the Boards, under Acts of the Legislature. Nothing afforded greater regret to him (Mr Reynolds) than to see his hon. and learned friend opposite (the Attorney-General), with whom he had worked so harmoniously for a long time, put out of his seat—(laughter)—for it was well known that that hon. and learned gentleman could not be spared, that it was absolutely necessary to every Government formed here that he should be a part of it. But whilst he (Mr Reynolds) admitted this, he did so with extreme regret, because it might in time prove disastrous to the hon. gentleman, for when gentlemen had become so essential they very often became non-essential, which in the case of the hon. and learned member, he was sure they would all regret. It was well known that the hon. member was the legal adviser of the Railway Board, and as such he could not receive his fees. He (Mr Reynolds) would support the motion of the hon. member for the Port, because it dealt with matters only connected with that House, and therefore the motion was not an infringement of the privileges of the other House. He had great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Mr MACDERMOTT took the case of a member of the Upper Chamber, and found that the resolutions proposed to be passed by the House of Assembly interfered with such a gentleman and therefore with the privileges of the Upper House. He thought the clause was too sweeping, because there were a great many Boards, the Road Board, for instance, affected by it, and consequently the House would deprive itself of the services of many most efficient members, though it could scarcely be the intention to do so. His vote would be given for the motion of the hon. member for the Port, although he should be glad to see the motion modified.

Mr HUGHES replied. He had received many suggestions of amendments, but after carefully considering them he thought he had no course left but to submit his resolution to the House in its entirety. He was satisfied that if he were to accept the resolution of the Attorney-General it would be of no effect, as that hon. member had proposed that each case should be judged upon its own merits, whereas that was the very thing which he (Mr Hughes) wished to avoid, for the result would be that a man popular with the Government would be allowed to sit, but one unpopular would not be allowed. The question would be decided on personal grounds. He did not want to amend the Constitution Act, but simply to show the reading of the 17th and 18th sections which he wished to uphold. He wished the Governor to issue regulations for the guidance of gentlemen in the public service. As to the Justices of the Peace, he did not think it necessary to alter the wording of his resolution to meet their case, for those gentlemen were not dependant on the Government for their salaries, and they did not take their office for the sake of the miserable fees of Coroners. They were supposed to be gentlemen of independent position. He would ask the House to decide on the resolution as a whole, for there was no alternative.

The amendment was then put and lost.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to address the House, but was informed by the SPEAKER that he was out of order, as he had previously spoken to the original question.

The original motion was then put and carried without a division.

STANDING ORDERS.

Mr STRANGWAYS rose, pursuant to notice, to move—

"That the new Standing Orders be discharged, and the Standing Orders of the last session adopted until the new Standing Orders shall have been fully considered in Committee and approved by the House."

Hon. members had been taken by surprise when they had read the new Standing Orders, not having been aware of the great alterations which had been made in the old ones. The discussion which had just taken place showed the necessity for the course which he proposed, as it was evident that the Attorney-General himself did not understand the new Standing Orders. He found that there were some of the new Orders which the House did not possess the power to carry out, as, for instance, where they authorized the Speaker to order a member into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He thought it inexpedient that the Standing Orders should be adopted until they had been fully considered and approved of by the House.

The SPEAKER, in reference to some observations of the hon. member, said that under the old Standing Orders the ruling would have been the same as he had laid down that day and yesterday. The new Standing Orders were more numerous than the old, because wherever the old Orders did not apply the House was to be bound by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons; and hon. members would find that these Standing Orders, as far as practicable, were now embodied in the new Standing Orders, which would prevent the necessity of so often referring to May.

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved, that the Order of the Day be discharged.

Mr. HART seconded the motion. He would call attention to some instances in which the new Standing Orders were different from those of the House of Commons, although they had been but a few minutes in his possession. The 63rd Standing Order was to the effect, that no member should read any newspaper, book, or letter in his place unless when addressing the House. In the House of Commons the rule was, by Standing Order number 93, that no member should read any newspaper, book, or letter in his place in the House, the difference being that in the House of Commons a member should not read whilst addressing the House, so that the addition which had been made in Standing Order 63, made it just the opposite of the House of Commons Standing Order 94.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the reason why this addition had been made was that during the last session complaints were made that hon. members, whilst in their places, were in the habit of reading; and the intention of the rule was that honorable members should be brought to attend to the debates. The hon. gentleman proceeded to point out another discrepancy between the new Orders and those of the House of Commons, which was illustrated by No. 144 of the new Orders. Under this the Speaker possessed the power of reproving any member who should make a disturbance in the House, but in the House of Commons such persons are dealt with as the House might direct.

Mr. NEALES remarked that the new Orders contained a gross violation of the right of petition, inasmuch as under them no application could be made for a grant of public money, or a remission of duties, otherwise than by message from the Crown. This would "shut up" most of the petitions which had been presented to the House, inasmuch as they had been applications for money, and made on the merits of the cases.

The SPEAKER stated that according to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, such petitions could not be received; that the old rules of the House were silent on the subject, but that if any member had called his attention to such a prayer in a petition, he should have been bound to decide against its being received, as he had done last session in the case of a petition referring to a debate in the House; our first Standing Order being that in all cases not provided for, the House shall be guided by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

After a few words from Messrs. BURFORD and BAGOT,

The SPEAKER enquired whether Mr. Strangways wished to discharge the whole of the Order of the Day.

Mr. STRANGWAYS replied that he did not. He should move—

"That so much of the Order of Friday last as provided for the adoption of the new Orders be discharged, and that the Standing Orders of the last session be adopted until the new Standing Orders shall have been fully considered and approved of by the House."

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR.

Mr. BARROW, in rising to move the adoption of the Address in reply to the speech of His Excellency, said that he did not know whether the custom that was prevalent of assigning that duty to the junior member of Parliament at the time arose from a wish on the part of the Government that the indulgence which was generally asked for by the mover should also be accorded to the Address itself. He (Mr. Barrow), however, did not intend to claim indulgence, because he only purposed briefly to address the House. He wished it also to be understood that whilst moving the adoption of the Address, he did not pledge himself to the contents of the speech to which it referred. He understood that the Address was simply an expression of thanks to His Excellency for the speech delivered at the opening of the session and a promise on the part of that House that the measures referred to would meet with due consideration. He would however refer to one or two matters which held a prominent place in the inaugural address. No doubt local topics were of the most immediate importance, but they could not forget as South Australians the tie that still bound them to the parent country. It was but natural that that House should offer congratulations to Her Majesty on the marriage of the Princess Royal. He was not disposed to display more sympathy with the Prussian Government than they had obtained or deserved, but they were all aware of the salutary influence exerted upon society at home by the Court of Queen Victoria, and he believed that as the members of the Royal family were settled in the various States of Europe that they would diffuse those salutary influences under which they had themselves been trained. There were, therefore, good and substantial reasons for hoping that the influence of the recent Royal marriage would have a beneficial effect upon the foreign relations of England. In the address of His Excellency allusion was made to the privation and suffering of the troops in India and to the triumphs in the Crimea, evidence of which was on the way to the colony at the present time in the shape of trophies of war. There was in this portion of the address an appeal to the sympathies of the House and also a fair subject of congratulation and triumph, which he felt sure would be replied to with enthusiasm and pride. (Hear, hear.) Connected with allusions of this nature was the question of the defences of the colony, a subject introduced by His Excellency in his opening speech. He (Mr. Barrow) was quite certain that the House and the country would do everything that was possible to be done, but he hoped they would not be abandoned entirely to their own resources, or be compelled to rest simply on their prestige as dependencies of the British Crown. He trusted that those "handsomely mounted" guns which were on their way hither would not be the only British guns that would peal forth their thunders, if need be on their coasts. He (Mr. Barrow) was glad to find that the Government had obtained a report showing in what way it was possible to provide for the defences of the country efficiently, and with due regard to economy, and he hoped that that report would be immediately laid before hon. members in that House. The next topic he should refer to was the ocean postal service. His Excellency said in his address that satisfactory arrangements were being made by the Home Government. He (Mr. Barrow) was happy to hear that the Imperial Government were taking immediate measures to remedy the present defective service. He hoped this arrangement would prove "satisfactory," but he could not forget that every arrangement hitherto had been preceded by the remark that it was of a "satisfactory" kind (hear, hear)—and even that one which was now broken up was so characterised when the Mauritius Government wished to connect South Australia with themselves in a contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company. With reference to the question of finance there would be a more suitable opportunity to discuss that matter when the Estimates came on for consideration; but he might in passing say that he scarcely understood what His Excellency meant by the "sound proportion" which subsisted between the imports and exports of the country. He (Mr. Barrow) was not quite clear whether this "sound proportion" meant the proportion which the imports bore to the exports, or the the sound proportion which both bore to the population. (Hear, hear.) He did not wish to anticipate the regular discussion on the various topics alluded to in the speech, but he must say one word about free distillation. In the Governor's speech is was stated that the Distillation Act passed last session, under a liberal interpretation of its clauses, accomplished all they desired. But what was meant by a "liberal interpretation of its clauses?" (Hear.) Was this "liberal interpretation" intended to make the Act different to what it was before? If so they might succeed in liberating this branch of trade from difficulties which now surrounded it. With regard to expenditure, the whole question would shortly come before the House for consideration, and there would then be ample scope for expression of opinion from hon. members. It appeared from published returns that the expenditure for Government purposes had been kept within the limits of former years, with the exception of one department, viz., the Lands Titles Registration Office, which would cost for the second half of the present year about £2,500. With regard to the subject of public works, there was one particular department which demanded their attention, and this was the telegraph department. He observed that about 13,000*l.* was set down in the Estimates for telegraphic extension. Before such an outlay was confirmed by the House, it was to be hoped that measures would be taken to place the telegraphic communication on a more satisfactory footing than at present, and that instead of having to wait two or three days to effect a communication with Melbourne, it might be managed with the same dispatch and regularity as in the other parts of the world. Then on the subject of colonial Federation, the speech of His Excellency informed them that no result had hitherto attended the communications of Government with the Governments of the other colonies. He (Mr. Barrow) did not know whether this was cause of regret or congratulation. (Hear, hear.) There was one topic in the Governor's speech which would require the calm consideration of the House, and that was the proposed assessment on stock. He (Mr. Barrow) was fully prepared to make the squatter bear his equitable proportion of the burden of taxation, but the question should be most thoroughly sifted. He had no desire to legislate hastily on the matter; he wished the squatter to make out the best case he could to lay before the House. (Hear, hear.) The House had been told over and over again that the squatter only wanted time to prepare, and he had abundance of facts to prove his case. He (Mr. Barrow), therefore, felt sure that the House would afford ample time before the consideration of the measure for the collection of these facts even though they were to be obtained from a distance. So far from wishing to inflict injury upon the sheepfarmer, he was certain that the House would be quite willing to give the squatter an opportunity of proving—not only that he ought not to be taxed, but even that he should be relieved from present taxes if he could prove it. (Oh, oh.) He (Mr Barrow) would repeat the words—if he could prove it. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the various Bills that were to be laid before them the House would undoubtedly give them that fair discussion to which their importance entitled them. He concluded by moving the adoption of the Address.

Mr HAWKER seconded the motion of the member for East Torrens. He felt a natural difficulty, as a young member, speaking for the first time in the House, having only received a notice that he was desired to second the motion a few minutes before he came into the House. He had also the disadvantage of speaking after the talented member who had just sat down. He concurred in the congratulatory part of the Address which related to the marriage of the Princess Royal, but regretted that an hon. member, when alluding to that portion of it, should have made a burlesque of the Address. He would not bind himself to support all the questions alluded to. He would refer to a few points. It was satisfactory to hear that the commercial condition of the colony was so prosperous, although the information had not reached him through other channels. With reference to the Bill for Railway Extension, he was certainly of opinion that it should be in a northerly direction (a laugh), but it was for the House to determine if a more favorable line could be found than the one proposed. The question of an assessment on stock would lead to a considerable discussion, but he was satisfied the House would never consent to a breach of faith with the squatters. The squatters would do their best to put their case fully before the House. The defence of the colony was a measure that deserved adoption. In the present condition of the colony, the wives and children of colonists were at the mercy of the first French ship of war that touched on the coast.

Mr DUFFIELD, in commenting upon the address, expressed surprise at that portion of it which referred to the "indications of substantial prosperity which continued to manifest themselves," as the statement was not borne out by the facts with which hon. members were acquainted. The statement that "the imports and exports have increased during the past year in a sound proportion, and our revenue has exceeded the estimated amount" was correct so far as the latter portion was concerned, but the imports and exports had not increased in proportion. Facts and figures had not borne out the assertion contained in the address, as the balance in favor of exports over imports for the year 1857, was 95,431*l.*, while, for the present year, there was an excess of 349,239*l.* of imports over exports. That result was arrived at without taking into consideration the export of coin and bullion. He could not see how the statement contained in the address agreed with the returns of trade. Before giving his vote, he had a right to expect some explanation in support of the statement which had been made. It appeared to him that the financial state of the colony had not been properly represented. The present state of things could not last long, and he was anxious that the truth should be made known in England in order that it might have a salutary influence upon the exports from that country.

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS, in reference to that part of the address which alluded to the marriage of the Princess Royal, remarked that the member for the Sturt had spoken of him (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) as a representative of the Prussian Government, whereas he was simply a Prussian consul. He hoped the remarks were not intended in an offensive sense, and he was disposed so to regard them. The hon. gentleman then went on to show that his position as consul was mercantile rather than diplomatic. He was sorry to add, that the fees of office were so small that they would not enable him to provide himself with a cocked hat and feathers, as suggested by the hon. member for the Sturt. Some years hence the fees might enable him to adorn himself with such decorations. But to pass to more serious subjects, he would call attention to the misconception of the figures rendered in the returns—the remark that the imports and exports were in a sound proportion. This remark was founded on a statement contained in the volume of statistics laid on the table this session, and numbered 8, by which it appears that the imports for 1856 were 1,099,000*l.*, against imports for 1857, 1,408,664*l.*, whilst the exports were shown to be for 1856, 1,398,000*l.*, against 1,744,000*l.* for 1857, and he appealed to hon. members if a fair deduction had not been drawn. He would ask hon. members if the statement had not been borne out. (No, no.) It was not fair to quote figures for part of a year. The whole year should be taken. The returns for the first half of the year did not contain the shipments of wool, a very large feature in the exports of the colony, nor the dead weight taken by wool ships, which was generally copper, two items of exports which would have very much swelled the returns. It would be therefore, obvious that a just comparison could only be made for the whole year. He did not consider that the colony exhibited signs of decay, notwithstanding the tightness of the money market. He spoke as one having experience in the commercial world, and he saw nothing in the present state of things to alarm him. The statements made in another place with regard to coin and bullion were likely to mislead. In one bank in the colony the capital was 20,000*l.* larger than it ever was before, and trading operations were likewise extending. It was a natural characteristic of a go-head population such as as theirs, that a tightness of discounts should be followed by a temporary depression, but this was not caused so much by a want of capital, as by an undue demand for accommodation. If he were incorrect in this matter he would be glad to be set right. He would not then go into the details of the Assessment Act; that subject would come on for discussion by-and-bye. The measure would be found of a liberal character, and he believed it would meet the views of the House. Those who had known him for many years, would believe him when he said that he would not be a party to breaking faith with the leaseholders; he would say the same for every one of his colleagues; there might be a difference of opinion as to the construction to be put on the meaning of certain words in the Order in Council on which the leases are founded, but no one would believe him capable of wishing to break faith with anyone. The proposed assessment was moderate in amount, and liberal allowances would be made to those squatters who had expended large sums in the purchase of waste lands on their runs. With regard to the telegraph he admitted it was desirable that some improvements in the working of it should be effected, but it should be remembered that there were difficulties inseparable from such undertakings. When the new wire, now being laid on the Victoria side, was completed the cause of the present delay would be removed. He was glad to express his own strong opinion in favour of extending the telegraphs throughout the colony, and although the first cost might be large, he believed they would eventually be highly remunerative to the colony.

Mr HUGHES presumed that the Commissioner of Crown Lands was to be the leader of the Treasury benches. When the hon. the Treasurer was Chief Secretary last session in answer to a question put by the member for the Burra he stated that the Governor's speech was the exponent of the views of the Ministry, and he presumed the hon. gentleman had not altered his opinions. He congratulated the Commissioner of Crown Lands upon the rapid promotion which he had obtained, and was only sorry that he had not had a better case to make out. There were several topics which he considered should have been alluded to in the address, but which were not touched upon. He could not agree with the Ministerial programme. Some explanation should have been given of the reasons which had prompted the changes in the Ministry during the recess. There was no allusion to the doings of the Ministry during the recess. Although extraordinary means had been adopted to pass the Gawler Town Railway Bill, and it had been stated at the time that it would be matter of regret if the railway staff at that time in the colony were allowed to leave, yet nothing had been done to forward the works. Why this delay? Had the Ministry changed their policy? If railways were so important for the purpose of developing the resources of the colony, why not enter upon them with more spirit? Other works should also have been referred to, such as the Waterworks, to complete which a large sum had been borrowed from foreign capitalists on the credit of the colony, and it was rumoured that the money had been squandered—that a weir to stem a mountain torrent had been built of loose stone. He could have wished some mention had been made of the efforts which had been made to open up the interior of this continent, and what success was likely to attend them. How was it that there was no allusion to the discovery made by Mr Barry, made upon a principle which he once advocated when on the other side of the House, and which he believed to be the true legitimate mode of developing the resources of the colony. He wished to know why the House had been called together at a period which must obviously prove too inconvenient to many hon. members, as sheep shearing was about to commence, and the wheat and hay harvest would immediately follow. With regard to the prosperity of the colony, the Ministry glorified themselves upon the state of the commercial interest on 30th December last, but that was really not applicable to the present time. On looking at the returns of imports and exports to 30th June last, he found that the exports for the last nine months, compared with the corresponding nine months of the previous year, exhibited a great deficiency. There was a falling-off of 3,150 tons of flour, 5,550 quarters of wheat, metal to the value of £89,000, and although there was an increase of 600,000 lbs. weight of wool, a falling off in value to the extent of a penny or three half-pence in the pound, would more than counteract the apparent increase. He held that banking facilities had not kept pace with the progress of the colony, but in six months he believed that the colony would resume its character for prosperity and progress. He alluded at some length to the measures which the Government had intimated an intention to introduce, which he said did not indicate that the members of the Government had been very industrious during the recess. He should be happy to give the Government any support which, as a member of the opposition, he could. (Hear, hear, and laughter from the Ministerial benches.) The honorable and learned Attorney-General might perhaps laugh on the wrong side of his mouth, if he persisted in treating the House as he had, although there might not be so talented a man on the opposition benches.

Mr TOWNSEND did not believe there was a disposition on the part of any member of the community to do any injustice to the squatter, but there was a general feeling that they did not pay enough. He made this remark in consequence of some observations which had fallen from the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Barrow). He knew the feeling of that gentleman's constituents and was quite sure that they would not submit to a shelving of the question of assessment on stock. He did not know what was meant in reference to the Distillation Bill by "a liberal construction of its clauses." Did the Government mean, that if the law was violated it would not be enforced? He hoped faith would be kept upon this subject, believing that, in consequence of the favourable feelings which were expressed last session to free distillation hundreds of acres had been turned into vineyards, under the impression that the views expressed last session would be carried out during the present one. He also hoped that the telegraphic charge to Melbourne would be reduced, a positive advantage would be derived from the increased number of messages.

Mr. Burford thought this a proper time for each member to express an opinion whether the Ministry had introduced into the address such subjects as they ought to. He was not prepared to say they should be quiet and satisfied with all the Ministry had done, or were likely to do. An amended Constitution Act was promised to be prepared during the recess, also an Education Bill but nothing appeared to have been done in either. The Distillation Act was altogether omitted, though he held it to be a matter of promise on the part of the Ministry. He could sympathise with Ministers in part from the amount of mental labour required in preparing such measures, and he believed they shrunk from it. They shrunk from facing the difficulties consequent upon the falling off in the revenue by removing the duty upon spirits. He admitted there was a difficulty, but it should be taken in hand, and he was quite sure the House would gladly assist the Ministry in framing suitable measures. He was quite satisfied there must be a different system of taxation, for it was suicidal to tax industrial occupation, upon the prosperity of which the general prosperity of the colony depended. In his opinion all the Boards which had to deal with the landed interests of the country should be brought under one head, but no allusion was made to this in the address. Although little appeared to have been done during the recess, he hoped that one or two measures, which were strictly of a Government character, would at once be brought in.

Mr. Neales wished to correct the statistics of the hon. member for Barossa, who had drawn a needlessly gloomy picture in reference to the exports and imports of the colony. A very considerable addition to the imports arose from the importation of implements and pipes for the Waterworks. He admitted that many of the imports consisted of articles which never ought to be imported, such as malt, iron, soap, fruit, salt, boots and shoes, wine, beer, potatoes, starch, vinegar, butter, and bacon, all of which articles could readily be produced in the colony. He believed the principal cause of depression arose from the defective system of banking and that when they had the new system mattters would improve.

Mr. Peake had assisted to frame the reply, and his object had been to prevent a long discussion. All the subjects which had been touched upon would have to be gone into in detail at a future time. He agreed with Mr. Neales that statements should not be allowed to go forth to alarm the public when there was no ground for such alarm. He believed the sound and gradual development of the resources of the colony was thoroughly demonstrated by the returns which had been placed in the hands of hon. members. He did not take isolated periods, but on comparing the aggregate of the returns from 1854 to 1857, he found the result most cheering, there having been a gradual and healthy increase in both imports and exports, whilst the increase in the latter was greater in proportion than in the former, or as 356 of exports to 309 of imports, during the past year.

The Treasurer remarked with regard to the statement in the Governor's speech relative to the financial position of the colony, exception had been taken to it, but it was not always wise to take large returns of imports and exports as the measure of prosperity without carefully examining them. There had been a large decrease in the shipments of produce, which might arise either from a deficiency in the harvest or low prices, it was in fact too early in the year to ascertain to what this could be attributed. An examination of the Customs revenue for the last eight quarters, and the last report of the Chamber of Commerce, indicated financial prosperity. There were signs of progress in every branch of statistics. All that was meant by a liberal interpretation in reference to the Distillation Act was that those parts which were left to the discretion of the Executive would be carried out with as little restriction as the law would permit. Parties might have been required to send all their spirits to the bonded store in Adelaide, but the Government having the power of licensing bonded warehouses where they pleased gave notice that the bonded warehouses might be upon the premises of the parties distilling. The House had long since determined, from the evidence which had been given before a Committee, that the manufacture of grain spirit could not be carried out to the benefit of the farmer, because the cost of spirits made from wheat would be greater than the cost at which spirits could be imported from foreign countries.

Mr. Bakewell suggested that there was an important omission in the speech; there was nothing about law reform. The hon. member alluded to a number of Acts which had been introduced in adjoining colonies, and from the non-introduction of which here he believed this colony suffered. He particularly alluded to the Bankers' Drafts Acts, the Sale and Lease of Settled Estates Act, Fraudulent Trustees Bill, Circuit Courts Act, Local Courts Act, Landlord and Tenant's Act, &c.

Mr. Reynolds had intended to make some remarks on the financial question, but these would come more properly, as the hon. the Treasurer had observed, when that hon. gentleman's financial statement was made to the House. He would only remark on the statement of the increase of imports and exports being in a sound proportion to each other, that on taking the suggestion of the hon. member for Clare he found they were not in such a proportion. Leaving this subject, he would make one or two comments upon the Ministerial programme. He wished he could go with the Ministry upon all questions, but it seemed impossible, though he might be found voting with them upon several subjects. There were many serious omissions in their programme. The hon. gentlemen on the opposite side were gentlemen with whom he (Mr. Reynolds) had acted for a considerable time, and he hoped that if he should be found giving his vote against them they would not attribute it to personal feeling any more than they would suppose that the hon. and learned Attorney-General was actuated by fraternal motives. If he and those hon. members had disagreed on matters of such importance as had led him to leave the valuable society of these hon. gentlemen, these must be matters on which he felt strongly, and which they should not feel surprised that he should battle out. These matters appeared to him of vast importance, though they might not appear so to others, but to him they appeared such that he should yet take the sense of the House upon them. Some of these matters were of a personal nature with which the House would have to deal; but in these matters there were still some links wanting, and he had sufficient confidence in the hon. members opposite to believe that they would produce these links when they were called upon to do so. He should be found supporting the Ministry on such questions as he could conscientiously support them; but on other matters of vast importance he would be found at issue with them. In the programme of the Ministry there was one serious omission which led him to think that the Ministry were not in favor of responsible government; for if they were to bring irresponsible Boards and Commissions under the control of a responsible minister, he contended that they were not advocates of responsible government. It was well known that during the last session, an important Bill, the Public Works Bill, had been brought in by the present Treasurer, who was then Chief Secretary. That Bill had met with the sanction of the House. No deviation or alteration was made in it, but it was passed and sent to the Upper House. How was it received there? On September the 15th he found that Mr. Davenport, then Commissioner of Public Works, moved, "that the Bill be now read a second time;" but Mr. Younghusband moved, "that the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the debate be continued;" and this was carried. Subsequently, Mr. Younghusband moved, "that the Bill be read a second time that day six months;" and that accounted for the omission of which he had spoken in the ministerial programme. The fact was, that the present Chief Secretary was an enemy to responsible government, or that Bill would have been re-introduced. He regretted very much to find that the hon. and learned Attorney-General had been outwitted in this matter by a gentleman of such a placid exterior as the Chief Secretary, but not all innocence within. (Laughter.) The question was put that the bill be now read a second time. Messrs. Hall, Scott, and Younghusband voted with the noes, and Mr. Younghusband was teller. It was strange that these three gentlemen should all be members of an irresponsible Board—the Harbor Trust. That, he (Mr. Reynolds) supposed was the reason why the Government had not brought in a Bill which was received so well last session. It was because they were opposed to responsible Government. He wished to know whether we were to have responsible Government or not, and this was a question on which he would take an early opportunity of testing the feeling of the House. He hoped the House would excuse him for speaking of what was personal, but having had something to do with the Board, he could not help speaking on the matter. He felt exceedingly gratified by the remarks of the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands on the observations which he (Mr. Reynolds) made on the previous day in playfulness, although that hon. gentleman's colleague on his left had considered them very vindictive, and he trusted if he had said anything annoying to the hon. Attorney-General, that hon. member would pardon it.

Dr. Wark was greatly pleased at many of the speeches, and especially with that of the late Commissioner of Public Works. The question was, should the Commissioner of Public Works be a Commissioner or a member of various Boards, and should he be irresponsible. He was in favor of sweeping away the Boards.

Mr. Hart moved that the House adjourn, and that the continuation of the debate be made an Order of the Day for the following day.

The motion was carried and the House adjourned accordingly.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2

The Speaker took the chair at 10 minutes after 1 o'clock

PETITIONS

Mr HUGHES presented a petition from the Mayor and Corporation of Port Adelaide, praying that the House might be pleased to recommend the Government to transfer to them the custody of the North parade, Port Adelaide The hon member moved that the petition be read, and laid upon the table

Petition read accordingly

Mr HUGHES presented a petition from Thomas O'Halloran and two others retired officers of Her Majesty's military service, praying for permission to avail themselves of the same advantages in the purchase of land which had been allowed to other naval and military settlers in the colony

NOTICES OF MOTION

Several notices of motion were given, which will be found elsewhere

THE YATALA

Mr BARROW asked the hon the Treasurer whether any particulars could be given relative to the reported running ashore of the Yatala in Rivoli Bay, and whether any information had been received respecting the lighthouse which she had on board

The TREASURER replied that the Yatala had gone ashore, but that no official intimation respecting the condition of the lighthouse lantern had been received

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN RAILWAY

Mr HUGHES, with the permission of the House, would ask the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, whether the Government had any objection to furnish the House with the whole of the correspondence in the possession of the Railway Commissioners, relating to the funds for additional rolling stock If information were laid on the table, it would save him (Mr Hughes) the necessity of moving the House on the matter

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS would be happy to furnish the information if the hon member would mention what portion of the correspondence had not been furnished He was not aware that any had been omitted, but if so it should be supplied

Mr REYNOLDS wished for the whole of the correspondence arising out of the letter dated October 31

Mr BLYTH—If the hon member would favour him with a memorandum the matter should be attended to

THE CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF RAILWAYS

Mr REYNOLDS, before proceeding with the motion standing in his name, begged to ask the hon the Attorney-General whether there was any truth in the rumour that the Chief Commissioner of Railways had resigned his office

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that it was not true in one sense, but the Chief Commissioner of Railways, in accordance with the wish which that gentleman had long since expressed, had placed his resignation in the hands of the Government, to be used by them as deemed necessary Perhaps the best way would be for him to read the letter The hon member then read the letter as follows —

"South Australian Railway, Adelaide Station,
August 31, 1858

"Sir—Having seen a notice of motion by Mr Reynolds, the late hon Commissioner of Public Works, relative to my position as Engineer and Commissioner of South Australian Railways I beg to state—

"It is well known that I have been for some time anxious to resign my position as Commissioner, from the feeling that the duties involved were highly onerous and unpleasant, coupled with the fact that I received no pay or emolument, either directly or indirectly, for these duties And this desire has been greatly increased from the feeling that the new regulations have deprived the Commissioners of the power of the management, for which they, nevertheless, will be considered responsible

"Had any proposition of the late hon Commissioner assumed the shape of his present motion, I should have been ready at once to have embraced so favourable an opportunity to resign the Commissionership, but while complaints of the management of the Commissioners were still pending, I felt that it would be incompatible with respect due to myself to resign my office unless requested by the Government to do so

"I have now, however, to place my resignation in the hands of the Government, to make use of at the time which may seem to them most expedient and most conducive to the wellbeing of the public service

"I have, &c,

"W HANSON

"The Hon the Commissioner of Public Works"

Mr HAY asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the surveys through Mount Lofty, and from Gawler Town to the 39th Section undertaken for the construction of a railway, had been completed, and, if so, when the report would be laid on the table

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS said that the surveys had been completed, and the report would be laid on the table on an early day

THE COMMISSIONER OF RAILWAYS

Mr REYNOLDS asked the hon the Attorney-General whether he was prepared to state what course the Government intended to pursue in reference to the letter of the Chief Commissioner of Railways Did the Government intend to accept that gentleman's resignation?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that the Government did not feel any particular inconvenience result from the offices of Engineer of the South Australian Railway and Chief Commissioner of Railways being held by the same individual, and that, therefore, until they were prepared to propose some better arrangement for the conduct, not merely of the Railway Board, but also of other Boards, it was not their intention to accept the resignation in question, unless such should be the wish of the House The only reason they did not accept it at present was, that in the event of their doing so, it would render the appointment of another salaried officer necessary for a mere temporary purpose He might also state that the Government had had under their consideration a proposal for the formation of a Board of Works, which should be responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works That was the plan proposed, in order to remove the present difficulties attending this subject At present they were endeavouring to procure the appointment of a Commission, of which the President of the Board of Works should be Chairman, and to which should be entrusted the management of all the great public works of the colony

Mr REYNOLDS said that if a Bill to that purpose were to be shortly laid on the table, he would not proceed with the motion of which he had given notice

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in a fortnight at the latest he would be prepared to lay the draft of such a Bill on the table

Mr REYNOLDS—After what had fallen from the Attorney-General he would not proceed with his motion

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURE

In reference to the motion standing in the name of Mr Strangways—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a copy of a circular that was on or about the 23rd of January last, sent from the Chief Secretary's office to heads of departments, requiring them, in preparing the pay-sheets and regulating the expenditure of their departments, to be guided by the Estimates alone, without reference to any existing Acts of the Legislature"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that if the object of the mover was only to obtain a copy of the circular he might as well lay it on the table at once

Mr STRANGWAYS said such was his only object

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid the document on the table accordingly

DUPLICATE OFFICES

Mr BURFORD, in accordance with previous notice, rose to move—

"That the practice hitherto observed, rendering it necessary to unite in one person the two offices of Attorney-General and Member of the Administration, is highly inexpedient and objectionable, and that it is expedient to appoint a Parliamentary draftsman"

The hon member proceeded to say that under the old regime when the colony was under a Government which was purely irresponsible, it was convenient, if not necessary, that the Attorney-General should be a member of the Executive Government, and when the intermediate mode of legislation came into force, and nominees were coupled with a certain number of representatives, even then it was not so very objectionable that the Attorney-General should be a member of the Ministry, but now that they were under an entirely free Constitution it was utterly inconsistent and objectionable that that state of things should be permitted to exist It was inconsistent as affecting the office of Attorney-General itself, for although it was true that he was not initiated into the working of the law and the Law Courts, he could see that many inconveniencies must arise under the present system from the casual transfer of the office whenever a change of Ministry took place That must necessarily tend to derange the business in the hands of the Attorney-General The practice hitherto observed in consequence of this arrangement had been of a character to set limits to the operations of the members of the Legislature It set limits to their action, and still more than this, it tended absolutely to cripple them in their attempts to discharge their duties to their constituents, for when a change of Ministry took place, as had been the case some three or four times during the last session, the main difficulty of getting up a new Ministry was who should occupy the place of Attorney General It was a well-known fact, and, he might safely say, admitted by the gentlemen of the legal profession, that it was not every lawyer who could take the position of Attorney-General That had been an insurmountable difficulty in some cases It was felt by one and all, he believed, that the hon gentleman now filling the office was the man of all others most fitted for it, and under such circumstances it would be seen that a kind of immortality was conferred on his compeers who acted with him, and this was a state of things which under the present system could not be helped in a colony were lawyers were not more numerous. The Attorney-General might not always be a man of gigantic mind, as he had heard one or two gentlemen say so on the previous day, or even possessing such a mind he might do all the mischief possible. He trusted that at some future time we might be able to steer clear of this Scylla and Charybdis. The House had hitherto shewn a very deep feeling of reverence for precedent, and he had often heard hon. members saying that they should conform in all their conduct to the example of the House of Commons. But he (Mr. Burford) found that in that House the practice was against the Attorney-General holding a seat in the administration, and consequently the precedent was in his (Mr. Burford's) favor in this instance. For his part he was always found in the ranks against precedent, but he was in its favor on this occasion, for he held that the Ministers composing a responsible Government should be non-professional gentlemen. The Attorney-General should not compose a part of the Ministry, for from the character of his training and education, he was a scientific and professional man, and could not therefore in his (Mr. Burford's) opinion, occupy a position in the Ministry without being out of place. He was only qualified to act as a subordinate officer under the Government to which he was attached. Then again, under the present system, a man of business habits and vigorous intellect was precluded from office, for he knew that with all the honorable aspirations of a virtuous ambition he could not attain his object until the present state of affairs was altered; and there was no encouragement for such a man to devote himself to public pursuits, for from the union of two offices in one person there was no chance of his rising to the high and honorable position of a member of the Government. This was a bad condition of affairs, and the range of choice for members of the Government must be made as wide as possible, and not circumscribed as it was at present. Doubtless many very many, of our fellow-colonists, remarkable for their mental activity and energy, and who had an interest in the colony, were likely to be shut out from taking part in the legislation of the country by the system of which he complained. The only objection which could be urged to his motion was the expense of the appointment of a Parliamentary draughtsman to take the place of the Attorney-General in preparing any Bills which might be required; but that was so trifling a matter that he was sure the House would not hesitate to set it on one side in consideration of the more important step of opening a way for the more liberal government of the country. This officer could be paid so much per folio for the work actually done, so that the Acts prepared would not necessarily cost more than was quite unavoidable, for he would not have a large salary attached to the office. And when the Attorney-General should be relieved from his present onerous duties he could not see that it would be necessary to retain the office. There was no necessity for filling up the office which would become vacant by the resignation of the hon. gentleman the Attorney-General. Four members of the administration in his opinion, would be sufficient. There was no need of five. (No, no.) Of course the hon. member's pension would still be retained when such a change was made in the Constitution Act—(laughter)—for that would be inviolable during the term of his natural life. His (Mr. Burford's) object in bringing forward this motion was to place on record his deliberate conviction, that this was one of the points in which the Constitution should be amended. That was his immediate object. His ultimate object was the amendment of the Constitution Act itself. When they looked at the remarks which had been offered and the disclosures made during the last few days, they were reminded of the celebrated Charles Dickens, when he wrote his pasquinade, or "how not to do it." But he must say that the South Australian Government was an exception in this respect, for they did know how to do it. The fact of the Attorney-General occupying the position of a Prime Minister, for it was he who had formed the Administration, was most anomalous, and the influence which he possessed in the Cabinet was necessarily greater than if he were merely the Attorney-General. He contended that every ground for suspicion that the learned gentleman might exercise an improper influence should be removed. He had the fullest confidence in the hon. gentleman who now filled the office, but he maintained that no individual should be placed in a position of such power, for if the man were corrupt at all, who occupied such a position, he could exercise a gentle coercion which would not hurt, but only tickle and please, but which at the same time would be quite sufficient to accomplish the objects which he had in view, as, according to the old axiom "a nod is as good as a wink to a blind horse." He was going to remark, without going into this matter further, upon the necessity of amending the Constitution as soon as possible. Some gentlemen had said on the previous day, "let one session go by until we have discovered all the faults of the Constitution;" but he thought that they had found out all the faults, or at all events they had discovered such grave faults as required immediate amendment. He thought it was the hon. the Treasurer who had, during the last session, brought forward sufficient reasons for amending the Constitution, to justify the House from the charge of needlessly and hurriedly altering that Act; and he did not think the present motion could entail upon him the charge of having made an amendment for the purpose of afterwards making others. He thought the subject was one which ought to be grappled with by the Government during the present session. Another point upon which he found fault with the Ministry was, that they had not devoted their time and attention to this matter during the recess. They ought to have revised the Constitution and not have allowed twelve months to pass by without the necessary alterations being effected. Acting under these convictions, he should move the resolution of which he had given notice.

After the hon. member resumed his seat there was a short pause before the motion was seconded.

Dr. WARK rose and said that he had had no intention of seconding the motion, for he thought that the hon. member who proposed it would have provided some one to undertake that duty before he brought a resolution of such grave import before the House. But he (Dr. Wark) had looked round, and finding no one ready to second the motion, he rose to do so. He considered the motion well put forward and well timed. It was intended to amend the Constitution and to rectify a grave and serious error in that Act. The hon. member had alluded to the working of that portion of the Constitution very justly, so that he (Dr. Wark) did not think it necessary to go over the ground again. It would not be necessary to do so, as he would only be walking in the hon. gentleman's footsteps. But there were two things which struck him. One was that the hon. the Treasurer had brought in a bill last session to amend the Constitution, when the hon. gentleman was not in power. He (Mr. Finniss) had brought in that bill, and most assuredly at the time he was in earnest; but why was nothing said about that bill now? If no one else in the Ministry, why did not the hon. the Treasurer do so? He (Dr. Wark) could not see how the hon. gentleman could take office, and yet consign to oblivion the extreme doctrines which he had held last session. There was another point which occurred to him, and which came to the same thing. The Commissioner of Public Works—where was he? That hon. gentleman entered office under the Baker ministry, and what were they going to do? To revise the Constitution, to amend all its faults, and get it into harmonious working. Indeed two of the Ministry were pledged to bring in a Bill for the purpose of amending the Constitution, and yet there was not a word said about doing it now. They had not done anything about it all through the cool winter, or even now when the roaring hot winds were about to commence. He thought the Government were individually to blame for bringing the House there without taking some steps to amend the Constitution. He would now second the motion, and if he had known he had to do so he would have prepared for it, which he had not done.

Mr. PEAKE rose for the purpose of supporting, as he had done on another occasion on the previous day, an abstract proposition. He would support the motion, asking the House to go a little further than the motion itself went, which was merely an abstract principle. He hoped the House would go with him in devising a remedy for the evils which existed in the Constitution Act. He would support the present motion on two grounds—first, because he believed that we lived under an essentially English Constitution, and he found that under the English Constitution the Attorney-General was not a Cabinet Minister. He had such faith in the wisdom and prudence of those who had framed the English Constitution that he should be sorry in any matter to deviate from the rules which had been laid down by it for the mother country, and which had worked so well there. He found that the other colonies, in which what he regarded as a similar mistake had been made, were now retracing their steps, and preparing to take the same action in the matter which the present motion suggested; and they were doing this in some instances, or at least in one, at the instigation of the Attorney-General himself; he alluded to the case of New South Wales. These were the two considerations upon which he would support the abstract proposition in the motion before the House; but he would not stop there. He would ask, was the House to go on from day to day and from week to week proclaiming the evils which existed in the Constitution Act, and yet taking no action to remedy them? Or was the House to go on for ever legislating against the Constitution Act by resolution? He had proposed a motion on the previous day to amend the Constitution, and he thought there was as much reason for amending that Act then as there was to day. He hoped that hon. gentlemen would not be content with making mere assertions against the Constitution, and then walking away and doing nothing to amend it; or, if they did so, he hoped that hon. members would give their reasons, or persons out of doors would begin saying that there was something not quite reasonable or prudent in their mode of proceeding. He would move as an amendment that the words "and that it is expedient to appoint a parliamentary draughtsman" be struck out, and the following words be inserted—"and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to direct the Law Officers of the Crown to prepare a Bill to amend the Constitution." It was admitted, he believed by the House, that the presence of the Attorney-General in the Administration was neither essential nor desirable; and if so, the House should go with him, for how was action to be taken in the matter without an amendment of the Constitution? The Attorney-General held his seat in the Ministry under the Constitution Act, and held it rightly and properly so long as that Act remained in force and he (Mr. Peake) for one would never expect him to relinquish his position so long as they went on legislating by resolution. He hoped the House would now go with him and pass a resolution that this point at least was one demanding prompt action in amending the Constitution Act, and if the House thought that the Attorney-General should not hold a seat in the Administration, he did not see how hon. members could avoid supporting him. He did not look at this matter upon personal grounds, for the talents and acquirements of the hon. gentleman who now held the office of Attorney-General were such as to render him an ornament to any Cabinet, but he relied upon the practice which had grown up under constitutional rule in England, and which had worked so well for a long period, and he fell back upon this as the best support and guarantee he could have in what he proposed. The hon. member concluded by formally moving his amendment.

Mr. HUGHES rose to second the amendment, and in doing so he trusted he need not assure the hon. and learned the Attorney-General that he did not act from any personal feeling towards him or any desire to see him abrogate his office, for during the long time for which that learned gentleman had held his seat, he (Mr. Hughes) had always regarded with admiration his high legal talent and acquirements. But in a small Legislature a person possessing great moral influence like that of the Attorney-General—an influence arising from his argumentative ability and legal acquirements, was sufficient to do away with the effect of representative government. He possessed a power far greater than it was safe to entrust in the hands of an individual. Not that he would say that the hon. gentleman who now held the office would use it or exert his abilities for any evil purpose, but a person might come into the office who would use it as a political partisan. It might occur in some future time, when the present holder had vacated his office, that it would be given to the gentleman who would display the greatest abilities in debate, without taking a very high view of the qualities which should be found in an Attorney-General. There was another point also which he wished to call attention to. He believed that, according to the practice here, the highest seat on the judicial bench would be offered to the Attorney-General in the event of its becoming vacant, if he chose to take it. However, if the qualifications of an Attorney-General depended upon his abilities as a political partisan, this might lead to a very serious injury. Such cases were known to have occurred on the English and Irish Bench in days gone by, and the danger was one which should be most seriously considered. He knew himself the practical inconveniences which arose from having an Attorney-General in the Ministry, for when he himself formed one of an administration they found that they would be obliged to resign, even without an adverse vote of the House, in consequence of their inability to find a gentleman whom they could recommend to His Excellency for the office of Attorney-General. It was only a chivalrous feeling on the part of Mr. Torrens which caused the Ministry to remain in as long as they did, for that hon. gentleman had said that he would rather be driven from office on a particular question, and he would then resign. He mentioned this to show that in a limited Legislature there was danger in having too great a power in the hands of one officer taken from so small a circle as the legal gentlemen in the House. He might be told that difficulties would arise in legislation without an Attorney-General, but he did not think them insurmountable, and he hoped the House would take the same view. He would remind hon. members that they had recently legislated on the subject of real property, and that they had then thought it better to revert to first causes. He would start from that point, and he thought hon. members would be found competent to catch the legal bearing of any matters which might come before them. The office of Attorney-General should be filled not from the limited circle of legal gentlemen in the House, but from the entire bar of the Supreme Court, and the appointment should not depend upon the ins and outs of any Ministry. He should like to see it more like the appointment of a Judge, namely, during good behaviour. Indeed, if all the heads of departments in the Government were placed in that position, and paid fixed salaries, it would tend to greater economy in the law expenses at least. He would put it to hon. gentlemen to say in what position they would be at present, if the Attorney-General were to vacate his seat, and the other legal gentlemen in the Legislative Council to do the same? Where would they get a gentleman so capable of filling the office of Attorney-General, or that greater office of Chief Justice, which was dependent upon it? The question before the House was a most important one, for he felt that they would never arrive at a proper working of responsible Government, with a Constitution such as we now possessed. There could be no hasty alteration of the Constitution, for even if the motion were affirmed it would take a considerable time before any alteration could be made. He would second the amendment, that members might express their opinions on it and calmly consider the bearings of the whole question, and then say whether it was necessary to legislate upon the subject.

The TREASURER before speaking to the question would ask the Hon. the Speaker whether at this stage he could move the previous question.

The SPEAKER replied not after the motion had been moved and seconded, but he could do so if the hon. member who had seconded the motion would withdraw.

The TREASURER said that as he might have an opportunity of moving the previous question at a later period of the discussion he would now content himself with stating that he should vote against the amendment. He would do so not because he was unfriendly to its object, but because at present he was not prepared to go with the hon. member who had proposed it. He should advert presently to his reasons for taking this course, and especially as his name had been alluded to in the observations of the last speaker. He would proceed now to the arguments on the motion before the House. He did not agree with the mover of the original motion, as he did not think the offices of Attorney-General and member of the Administration could be separated, unless a minister of justice or some other high legal functionary were appointed in place of the Attorney-General. When the precedent of the mother-country was quoted he could only say that we had not in this country the materials which existed in the mother-country for filling as many legal offices as existed there. It had been said during the discussion of the Constitution Act that it would be impossible to find 36 members for the Assembly and 18 for the Council, and that there would be a difficulty in filling the offices in the Administration in a small colony like this, and the argument seemed of some weight at the time, but it was met by the more solid and conclusive argument that it was a great advantage to have a large House and an Administration of at least five members, and that these would be permanent advantages, whilst the difficulties would be merely temporary, for every year the colony grew older the lighter the difficulties became and every year a greater number of persons would qualify themselves for seats in the Ministry or in the Legislature. During the short time the Constitution had been in operation there had been no lack of men to fill offices either paid or unpaid under that Constitution, and every year we should go on with increasing numbers. With regard to separating the two offices of Attorney-General and member of the Administration, he did not know that it would improve our Constitution in any respect to render necessary the creation of two offices for the highest legal functionaries, whilst the members of the bar were and were likely to continue so few in number. The questions of law reform which would continually arise would render it necessary to have in the Administration an officer of the highest legal attainments to be found in the colony, and it would be useless to have such an officer appointed during good behaviour, for if a Ministry had not amongst themselves a man of high legal attainments their plans of law reform would be easily evaded by any lawyer independently of the popular will on the subject. The motion would, in his opinion, necessitate not only that we should pay an officer instead of the Attorney-General, to conduct prosecutions which the law required, but also another officer as a member of the Administration. He did not say that in any amendment of the Constitution Act such an officer should have a seat in the House, as that might possibly be dispensed with, and was not considered a sine qua non, but he must be a member of the Government and must hold an office which he should vacate when the Ministry resigned. These were the reasons on which he was opposed altogether to the motion. As to the arguments used in support of the economy of the arrangement, he thought it would be found quite the reverse, as instead of one office they would have to pay the holders of two. It was said there were not men in the House or in the country fit for the office of Attorney-General, but he was quite sure that the gentlemen of the bar would not admit this, or that the members of the House or even the Attorney-General would not venture to assert that there was no man fit to hold that position. It was also said that there were only a few lawyers in the House, but the Governor was not restricted to the House, but had the range of the whole colony to choose his advisers. It was true the officer chosen should afterwards appeal to a constituency to be returned to the House, but on a great occasion, where the individual was fit for his office, and where a Ministry was put out because it was not popular with the House or the country, in such a case they would find that some constituency would return the gentleman appointed by the Governor. When once the Premier had stated in the House that he had been obliged to select that gentleman, so long as the House and the country were in accordance with him, as they would be if they sustained the Ministry in office, in such a case the country would support the new Ministry and some constituency would find a seat for the Attorney-General. The Constitution Act provided that no office of emolument or otherwise under the Crown should be conferred on any individual without the consent of the Governor in Council, which consisted, with one exception, of members of the responsible Ministry, and therefore the Executive could not be added to without the consent of the responsible Ministry. As to the dangerous power which the office was said to confer upon the Attorney-General in the Supreme Court, he did not think there could be any, but if there was, it might be remedied by transferring the decision as to what prosecutions should be brought before the Court to some other functionary, or by restoring the old Grand Jury system. He would now say a few words more of a personal nature respecting himself. It had been said by some speakers on that side of the House and by many on the other, that he had proposed to amend the Constitution Act. As a member of the House he was not amenable to give any explanation on this point, but as a member of the Government he was amenable for any course which he might take. But it was as an individual member that during the last session he had proposed to amend the Constitution, and for this he was amenable to his constituents, and to them he should explain the course he had taken. But he was still of opinion that the Constitution required amendment in all the points which he had brought forward last session, and it might be in others. He had taken the opportunity last session of placing on record the points which in his opinion required amendment, and he had done that expecting and hoping for the support of the House, and that the country constituencies might express, if they desired any change, their opinions on the matter. But he found that on the meeting of the House, and before that, at the various elections which took place, there was not a single expression of a desire for any immediate change. The press was against him on the point, and therefore he thought he had done his duty in pointing out where the errors lay, and it must be some public expression of opinion which would justify him in going on. That would be his course were he still an individual member of the House, and not a member of the Government. If there were any fair indication of support out of doors he was prepared to go on, but as a member of the Government he was no longer free, and therefore could not bring forward such a measure, except with the consent of his colleagues, and he should consider with them what course to take whenever occasion arose. The cases cited during the session as points in which changes were required in the Constitution only showed that it would be premature to attempt it as yet, for the House was not yet alive to the various amendments required. He presumed these were the reasons which induced the Government, of which he had the honor of being a member, not to come forward with any amendments. He might explain that his views were not in the least altered as to the necessity for amending the Constitution, and he would be found on that side whenever the question came before the House. He objected to discussing an abstract proposition of such importance, and which could end in no result but the mere assertion of a principle. When the amendment of the Constitution was under consideration would be the proper time to discuss this question; but if it were discussed that day or that day week, or in a very short time, he should say that the proposition to separate the office of Attorney-General from that of a member of the Administration would not prove useful to the country.

Captain HART wished that the amendment might be read. It was to the effect, that an address be presented to His Excellency, praying him to instruct the Law Officers of the Crown to introduce a Bill to amend the Constitution Act. He should vote against the original motion, although he thought it very likely that he might have been induced to support the amendment had proper notice of it been given and the session had progressed a little more, in order that they might have been afforded an opportunity of judging where it was that the Constitution Act really required amendment. He could not, however, support it on the present occasion. The arguments which had been made use of rather confirmed him in the impression that the office of Attorney-General should remain, as at present, not separated from the Cabinet. Although the Attorney-General at home was not a member of the Cabinet, he had a seat in the House of Commons, and was ready to give advice and pay attention to Bills, and give a legal opinion on behalf of the Government. As, however, it had been yesterday determined that no person holding office of emolument under the Crown could be a member of that House, it appeared to him to put a stop altogether to the Attorney-General being there. (No, no.) He fancied that the resolution of yesterday prevented the Attorney-General from being in that House by any chance at all. It was necessary there should be legal members in the House, but as the House had taken away their only chance of getting honour or employment under the Government, it appeared to him they would have no legal members if they were debarred access to any office of profit, honour, or emolument. The consequence would be that the House would be thrown upon mercantile men and country gentlemen to determine what laws should be passed. It could not be argued that there would be no advantage in having some legal members in the House amongst the various other interests represented in it. It was hardly fair to say that there should be no legal members in that House, for it would really amount to that if they were to say that the Attorney-General should not be a member of the Cabinet. Although he was ready to endorse a considerable portion of what had fallen from the hon. member for the Port, he could not go the whole length. Although the Attorney General did exercise very considerable power in the House—he was going to say unlimited—he did not at the same time believe that the Attorney-General would receive the support which he did if he did not bring forward measures which were in accordance with the views of that House. All the talent which the Attorney-General unquestionably possessed would not keep him in his place if it were not for this circumstance. The measures brought forward by the hon. gentleman would not be supported as they were, if they were not in accordance with the views of a majority of that House. In fact the ability of the Attorney-General was in finding out what suited the views of a majority. (Laughter.) It appeared perfectly impossible to him for any Government or any Ministry to exist without legal members in it. Various members had expressed an opinion that there should be another legal member in the Cabinet. Several thought there should be a Solicitor-General as well as an Attorney-General. (Laughter.) Under such circumstances, he could not see how it could be desirable at the present moment to get rid of the Attorney-General. He was aware there was a great difficulty in forming a Ministry or an opposition at the present time, but if the Attorney-General were out of the Ministry, there be a much greater chance of the Ministry being ousted, than with the Attorney-General as one of its members. If a resolution of this kind were passed, no doubt they would see various changes in the Ministry between this and the end of the session. Looking at the subject in all its bearings, he felt bound to oppose the motion. The argument used by the hon. member for the Port, appeared to be that in consequence of the great ability of the Attorney General—because they could not find some other legal gentleman to cope with him—they ought to put him out of the Ministry. Now if this were a sound argument, if they happened to get a Chief Secretary who possessed such ability that he could carry the House with him on all occasions, they would require to get rid of him upon the same grounds as it was now proposed to get rid of the Attorney-General. (No, no.) The chief argument in support of the motion, certainly that of the hon. member for the Port, was the great ability of the Attorney-General. As there was no office that would fall into the hands of legal gentlemen except that of Attorney-General, they would shut them out from all chance of preferment if they did away with that office as one of the Ministry.

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS rose very much from the same feeling which had actuated the Treasurer in the latter portion of his address, namely, to give an explanation of a personal character. The House would perceive that the motion of Mr. Burford amounted in fact to a proposition to amend the Constitution Act, but only on the previous day several hon. members had declared that it would be unadvisable to consider the Constitution Act until the whole session had passed. He in common with other members had discovered imperfections in the Act; ever human undertaking was imperfect; but it was undesirable hastily to bring forward amendments in so important a measure as the Constitution Act. That Act had been referred to a Committee specially appointed to consider it, and the question whether there should not be a Solicitor-General as well as an Attorney-General received considerable attention. At one time it was deliberately affirmed that there should be legal advisers, and it was only by a majority of one that resolution was struck out. There was a time for all things, and the time would come for the amendment of the Constitution Act, though that time had not yet arrived. He could not help referring to the remarks of the hon. member for the Murray, who had stated that when he (the Commissioner of Public Works) formed part of an Administration, a specific promise was given by that Administration to amend the Constitution Act; but he would state that Ministers took office to settle the Privilege question; and without entering into the merits or demerits of that Ministry, he would merely remark that they bowed as he believed gracefully to the expression of feeling of that House. Whether they had succeeded or failed was not necessary to determine, as the matter had passed away. He believed that the House after discussing the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Burford), and hearing the views of several other members, would come to the conclusion that though some good might come from the discussion, the better plan would be to support the previous question.

Mr. ANDREWS felt bound to oppose the original motion before the House. It had been asserted that two offices were now held by the Attorney-General, but that statement was not supported by facts, the Attorney-General and one of the Ministry, being one office. But he opposed the motion upon stronger grounds, thinking it injurious hastily to amend the Constitution Act upon such grounds. The arguments which had been used in reference to the great power which was attributed to the Attorney-General would lead to the conclusion that the Ministry were thought to be too strong for the House, and that they should therefore be weakened. He was sure the House would see that this would be futile; that it would not be for the benefit of the country. The duty of that House, he apprehended, was to guard the interests of each constituency, and of the country in general. After all it appeared to him that there was no such important question involved that it could not be arranged by curtailing the powers of the Attorney-General, or such as he might possess, which might be used injuriously to the country, that is if they were such powers that they could be legislated against. Incidentally he might mention what appeared to him a very high power possessed by the Attorney-General—such a power as he thought should not be held by any one person, but should be wielded by a Grand Jury. Trial by Jury in the colony was gradually being done away with, and would, he believed, shortly dwindle down to nothing. It would soon vanish from the land altogether. They had now Courts in which one individual, judging from hasty impressions, however exemplary he might be, in a Court where there were perhaps 50 persons, and where the best order was not kept, might sentence a man to three years imprisonment without the intervention of any Jury at all—without the accused person having recourse to trial by his peers—without the right which every Englishman considered he possessed, and boasted of. Again, a man might be brought before a petty Jury, and have his character stigmatized without the intervention of a Grand Jury. He did not believe that the present holder of the office, the Attorney-General, would stoop to acts to vex his opponents or injure his enemies; but still under under existing circumstances, it was in his power to give annoyance and to inflict injury. What he held was that no bill should be merely endorsed by the Attorney-General, but it should be endorsed by a Grand Jury. Let the Grand Jury determine whether there were a prima facie case or not against an accused, and, if so, it was in their power to find a true bill, and then the accused would have justice done to him. He knew of an instance in which the Attorney-General had submitted to him an information against one of his own clients for stopping a road; now if there had been a Grand Jury, the Attorney-General would never have known of this information. He would ask was it fair to place the Attorney-General in this position, that he must throw up his office or lay an information against one of his own clients, yet if he did not lay the information he would lay himself open to the charge of sheltering his own client. There were, he considered, reasons that the powers of the Ministry should be curtailed but there was no reason that the Ministry should not have the advantage of the ability of the Attorney-General. The question, however, of the convenience of the House was another thing. He considered that the House could not be assisted by the ability of the Attorney-General if he were to be irresponsible. No man was so well kept in his place as a person who was responsible, and so long as the Attorney-General was in his place in the House he was not only responsible to the House but to the country.

Mr Barrow was very glad to hear that the objection to the Attorney General was not on account of the great talent and ability which he possessed. (Hear, hear.) At one time from the turn which the debate took there was some danger of that impression getting abroad, but he was very glad that the House had repudiated it. If the Hon the Attorney-General were all-powerful in the Cabinet and omnipotent in that House it appeared that he was at the same time a target against which members of the House launched their shafts. (Laughter.) He had heard it stated at one time that the Attorney General was omnipotent in the Ministry, but another honorable member stated that the hon the Attorney-General showed his great ability by consulting and determining what would best suit a majority of the members of the House. (Laughter.) At one time it was stated that no Ministry could be kept together without the Attorney-General, and then it was stated that the hon gentleman counted heads in the Assembly to see if he could carry his measures or suggestions. He thought these sentiments clashed a little; but with regard to the particular question before them, he must say that he did not think it had been brought forward in the best possible way, because it might have the effect of driving the Attorney-General into the Upper House. (Oh, oh!) The resolution passed on the previous day, prohibiting Government officers from holding seats in that House, would not bar them from entering the other. They might place themselves in this dilemma that they would actually lose the services in debate of so able a gentleman as the Attorney-General, and transfer him to the other House, from which the people would not be so much benefitted as by the honorable gentleman remaining where he was. It would be better to keep him in that House than allow him to go into the other. (Hear, hear.) With regard to amendments in the Constitution Act, it would be better, he thought, at once to resolve that it was desirable to bring in a Bill to amend the Constitution Act. Let them deal with the question upon its own merits. Let them go directly to the Constitution Act, and affirm that it ought to be amended immediately, rather than by a side-wind endeavor to bring about that amendment. Hon members differed as to whether amendments should take place during the present session or the next, but his own opinion was that it would be well to let them alone till the new Parliament, when they would be enabled to approach the subject not only with additional experience, but with a knowledge of the views of the people upon the subject, which at the general election they would have an opportunity of stating. (Hear, hear.) As the hon member (Mr Burford) had remarked, such grave defects had already been discovered in the Constitution Act that the probability was, before the session closed, further imperfections would be discovered; and under all the circumstances, it would be better to allow this important Act to pass through the first Parliament without alteration. (Hear, hear.) Feeling, however, that amendments were necessary he should be sorry to oppose the wishes of the House if they considered it should be amended during the present session; but he put it to the House whether it would not be better to pass a resolution affirming the principle that the Constitution Act should be amended rather than pass a series of resolutions which might prove operative or inoperative. There might be alterations effected in the office of Attorney-General. As a celebrated statesman used to tell the House of Commons, there were three courses to adopt—they could retain the Attorney-General on his present footing or under an amended Act he might have a seat in that House, but not in the Cabinet; or under another resolution he might be ejected both from the Cabinet and that House. Perhaps the public service would be best promoted by the hon gentleman having a seat in that House and not in the Cabinet; but the whole question was so largely involved in points which probably had not yet occurred to hon members that it was most undesirable they should hastily come to a conclusion. He would strongly recommend the hon member for the Burra and Clare to withdraw his amendment in order that the hon the Treasurer might move the previous question. He suggested this not with any view to shelve the question, but in order that at as early a period as possible the House might be in a position to deal with it in a more tangible form than that in which it at present presented itself.

Mr Bagot asked if the amendment were negatived, whether the previous question could be put?

The Speaker said that it could.

The Attorney-General said he had some difficulty in approaching the subject, but still he felt it would be hardly right to give a silent vote. He felt a difficulty because, however much hon members might desire to abstain from personal allusions and he was sure the House would feel how very much personal allusions had been abstained from, it was impossible to disconnect the remarks which applied to the office from those which to a certain extent applied to the individual. But whilst he felt a difficulty in speaking to the question in one aspect, he felt none in speaking to it as a question of general policy. He did not say that the present system was the best which could be adopted, but he believed it was less open to objection than any other which could be proposed. Referring to the objections which had been raised to the present system, the hon member for the Port had contended that it was an injurious and improper thing that a person who obtained office by dint of political partizanship should determine questions for instance affecting the jurisprudence, of the country or the rights of individuals. That was an inconvenience, no doubt. It was open to objection that the Attorney-General should have to decide certain matters—not because he was a sound lawyer but an able debater. But he would ask, was it not equally objectionable that the Treasurer should have to decide upon questions affecting finance, when he obtained his office, not because he was skilful in arithmetical figures, but in figures of speech. A similar objection presented itself in reference to every office. There was no member of the Administration who did not necessarily obtain the appointment which he held more by virtue of his political principles than his peculiar fitness for the particular office. There was always a danger in theory of there being an abuse of such power but he believed the danger in practice was very small. He believed this to be the case whether it was essential that the occupant of the office should be a lawyer or not. He believed there was not a member of that House who might not safely be trusted to use the power thus confided to him purely for the furtherance of the interests of the community. It would be the severest censure upon the aptitude of this country for self government if it were otherwise. It would be a bitter censure if it could be said with truth that such power could not be trusted to hon members on account of their political partizanship, however strong. The system of responsible government he pronounced a failure if such were the case, because there were not men in the colony who were fit for it. But he would not utter such a libel either upon the profession to which he belonged or upon others. He could not believe there was any member of that House who, having obtained power, would abuse it for political partizanship. Unless, then, it should be said that members of the legal profession were more likely to abuse power than others he could not see anything in that objection. In reference to the remark of the hon member Mr Peake that in England the Attorney and Solicitor General were not members of the Administration, he admitted they were not, but they were members of the Privy Council. In England, however, the powers and functions of the Government in connection with the administration of justice, which in this country are exercised by the Attorney-General, are conferred upon the Lord Chancellor. Although some inconvenience was felt as connected with that, the impression was that it was better and wiser that all matters connected with law should be entrusted to a member of that profession. (The Speaker here intimated that it was 3 o'clock, and the hon the Attorney-General discontinued his address, till upon the motion of Mr Macdermott the standing orders were suspended to admit of the debate being continued.) The Attorney-General continued—He was about to say while it appeared to him that it was inconvenient members of the bar in this colony should have the power which was possessed by the Attorney-General, he thought it far better that it should be possessed by a member of the bar than by a Judge. He thought it would in this country be matter of deep regret that a Judge should be a member of the Administration. It would be regretted if a Judge held office on account of his political position or standing, or should be expected to co-operate with an Administration in matters affecting the Executive in his department. Greater inconveniences were likely to result from giving to Judges the power possessed by the Lord Chancellor, than from giving power of that kind to the Attorney General. He was happy to find that during the debate none had attributed to himself or any one who had held the office of Attorney-General for the brief period which it had been held, any attempt or inclination to abuse the power vested in that office. It had been said that much inconvenience was likely to arise from a union of the powers vested in the Attorney-General. The only way in which it had been suggested inconvenience might be felt or surmised, was in connection with the supposition that the Attorney-General might have more power than he ought to have in the Supreme Court. It so happened, however, that the Attorney-General was absolutely powerless in connection with the Supreme Court, for the salaries of the Judges were fixed by the Constitution Act, they were made perfectly independent of any administration, their tenure of office too did not depend upon any Ministry or upon any local authority, but merely upon the will of Her Majesty, and that will could not be exercised till an address had been presented from both Houses of Legislature, so that the Judges were placed, by the Constitution of the colony, as he was bound to say they were placed by their character and intelligence, above all influence of the Attorney-General. There was nothing that the Attorney-General could offer, nothing that he could take away. He could exert no greater influence in the Supreme Court than that which belonged to any member of the profession, nothing except that which arose from his knowledge of law or his power of argument. It appeared to him that the remarks which had been made amounted to a slur upon the gentlemen who so ably filled the office of Judges. There was an imputation that they would permit themselves to be influenced by the arguments or suggestions of the Attorney-General more than if they came from any other member of the bar. The hon. member for Yatala had made allusions to the Attorney-General having been called upon to lay an information against one of his own clients, and had recommended a revival of the system of Grand Juries. He should be happy to discuss that question when it was brought under the consideration of the House at a future period, and he believed that comparing the working of the present system with that referred to, the House would not be disposed to assent to any change, but whether or not, this could not at all affect the power of the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General was the representative of the Crown or he might say the public, and in that character was empowered to lay an information against any person and appear in the Supreme Court in support of it. In America that power was possessed by the States-Attorney as amply as by the Attorney-General of England. It was essential where the public interest was concerned that there should be some person to move on behalf of the public where it believed it to be necessary, and that person must be a lawyer to represent the public in Court. The circumstance of reviving the Grand Jury would have no influence whatever upon the Attorney-General. He could only say that he had never considered himself, nor had he ever thought that the House considered him essential to any Administration. He trusted it was true that he was not without influence in the House, and he hoped that influence was due to the experience which members of that House and the country had had of the manner in which he had discharged the duties of the office which he had held. He hoped he should ever be able to exert an influence which arose from experience of the manner in which duties entrusted to him were performed. He claimed no more than this, so long as the confidence of the House was awarded to him, he should continue to discharge the duties of the office which he held, but it would be a matter not very much to be regretted by himself if the confidence of the House were bestowed upon some other gentleman. Whatever advantages were connected with the office, it was the belief that he was able to serve the community which had determined him to remain in it during the time he had occupied it. Unless he felt that he could serve the community, and, at the same time, enjoy the confidence of the Legislature, he should at any moment cheerfully lay down the office which he held. Without meeting the question by an absolute negative, he should support the previous question when it was before the House.

Mr. Strangways said the latter part of the motion, in reference to the appointment of a parliamentary draughtsman, had been entirely left out of the discussion. The only portion which had been touched upon was that which declared that it was highly inexpedient that the Attorney-General should be a member of the Cabinet, and that he should merely be the adviser. That appeared to him to be a distinction without a difference, for if the Attorney-General were the adviser of the Cabinet the decisions of the Cabinet would of course be influenced by his advice as much as though he held a seat in that House. As it was, the Attorney-General was responsible not only to the Cabinet, but to the country. It would, he thought, be highly inexpedient that the motion should be carried, and he very much wished that a substantive motion had been brought forward, to the effect that the Constitution Act required amendment, in order that the question might be fully discussed. He had a great objection to legislating by resolution, particularly when so important a matter was involved as the amendment of the Constitution Act. The Constitution Act itself distinctly stated how such amendments were to be effected. He should oppose both the motion and amendment.

Mr. Neales said it appeared to him that this resolution was for the purpose of frightening all legal gentlemen having seats in the House. One of the Bills passed last session was intended to produce that effect. It appeared to be thought by some that lawyers could not be trusted with anything, but he did not believe that they would oppose any but measures which they did not believe for the public benefit, for he felt assured they had as much public spirit as any other class. It was useless to continue these discussions in reference to the Constitution Act. If the Act really required amendment, let them enter into the whole question, and not go on attempting to patch up the Constitution. He believed that it wanted a good deal of amendment. It had a good deal of the American constitution about it, and like American ships which they got into the Thames, it was discovered that many repairs were necessary. He was of opinion with the hon. member (Mr. Barrow) that they had better get through the session before they attempted to amend it, but if others were in greater haste and could make out a good case let them go on with it immediately. Last session he voted against an amended Constitution Act because he thought they had not had sufficient experience of what the Act was, and he strongly advised hon. members to work through this session tranquilly, and not make such incessant attempts to shift themselves from one side of the House to the other. (Laughter.)

Mr. Reynolds had been listening like a juryman to what all parties had to say, and had arrived at the conclusion that the Constitution Act was so important it would be better not to meddle with it at present. A good deal had been said about his honorable friend opposite, the Attorney-General, who however omnipotent in the cabinet, was, as had been remarked by Mr. Barrow, made a target for others to fire away at. He could not agree however that honorable members were frightened at the Attorney-General on account of his great talent and ability, or if they were, he would rather recommend them to take him as a model, so that eventually they might be enabled to fight him with his own skill and tactics. The Attorney-General would excuse him for saying that such gentlemen as he (the Attorney-General) were of great advantage in a Legislative Assembly, as they not only raised its tone but sharpened the intellect and wit of hon. members, and, in fact, constituted a good model. The Attorney-General's was the only office in the Ministry for which a professional gentleman was really required. They did not require a civil engineer for a Commissioner of Public Works, nor a merchant for a Treasurer, nor a sheep-farmer nor a surveyor for a Commissioner of Crown Lands, but they must have a lawyer for an Attorney-General. It would not do for a merchant to take the office of Attorney-General, for some hon. member might jump up and ask the opinion of the Attorney-General as the legal adviser of the Crown upon some knotty point. It was the only office in the Ministry in which a professional man was required, and it appeared an anomaly, but still it was so. If, instead of an Attorney-General, there were a Minister of Justice, a merchant or squatter, or any one else might fill the office, so long as he were skilful at making a speech. He believed there was a good deal of red-tapeism and formality in the law courts, and that business might be facilitated to a great extent, by having a non-professional man in the position of a Minister of Justice. There was so much however, to be said on both sides of the question, that he should be compelled to vote for the previous question, but he was prepared to support a resolution to the effect that the Attorney-General of the day should not step into the highest position in the Supreme Court in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of Chief Justice. He had always opposed the principle of the Attorney-General obtaining the office of Chief Justice, and being placed over the heads of the Puisne Judges. If such a course were persisted in they would would never get any but inferior men to accept the office of Puisne Judge.

Mr. Burford had not heard any reasons to convince him that the arguments he had advanced were wrong, although they had been met with contra assertions. He denied there was necessarily any connection between the duties of the Attorney-General and the position he held in that House. Useful measures might as well come from members themselves, but instead of that they always came through the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General need not be a member of that House. He did not admit it would be necessary to create new offices to carry out his scheme, but even if it were, he would not object, convinced that the corresponding advantages would be far greater than the expense. The inconveniences resulting from the two offices being combined in one person were gross in the extreme. He did not find, as had been stated either by the Attorney-General or the Treasurer, that the Governor could make a selection where he pleased of individuals to assist him in the Executive, and even if it were so, he did not see that it at all affected the present question. Two members of the Ministry had only just joined that illustrious company, and he believed they would prove very useful men, but he confessed he could not say so of the whole, yet they must speak of the Ministry as a whole, they must stand or fall by their leader. He denied that the attendance of the Attorney-General in that House was necessary, as the Ministry could avail themselves of his advice as well if he were not a member. He should have moved a vote of censure upon the Ministry for their neglect during the recess, but he knew it was useless. (Laughter.) He knew it was useless, because he knew that no one could have been got to fill the office of Attorney-General. If the vote of censure had been carried he supposed that he (Mr. Burford) would have been sent for. (Loud laughter.) He was quite sure that he would not have known where to look for an Attorney-

General (Renewed laughter) He hoped the previous question would not be carried, as that would be merely shelving the question without meeting the difficulty The amendment of the Constitution Act had been shelved, and it was for that reason he felt bound to bring forward the present motion He was sure that no member of that House or the community was desirous of reflecting upon the Judges—(hear, hear)—although it was not more than a year or so since that the whole community was up in arms at the decisions of one of the Judges, and on that occasion the unanimous resolution was, that if any objectionable power were possessed by the Judges it should be removed He recommended that Bills before they were read a second time should be submitted to the Attorney-General, and by that means all difficulty would, he considered, be removed, in consequence of the absence of the Attorney-General from the House

A division being called for, there appeared—

AYES—Messrs Burford, Cole, Hughes, Lindsay, Waik, and Peake (teller)

NOES—The Treasurer, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Andrews Bagot, Barrow, Duffield, Dunn, Glyde, Hallett, Harvey, Hawker, McDermott, Mildred, Milne, Neales, Reynolds, Strangways, Townsend, and the Attorney-General (teller)

The previous question was therefore carried

COLONIAL DEFENCES

The ATTORNEY GENERAL laid on the table copy of despatch from Lord Stanley of 11th August last upon the subject of colonial defences, report of committee appointed to take into consideration colonial defences, and letter on the subject from the Major of the 40th commanding the troops in South Australia

REPLY TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH
ADJOURNED DEBATE

Mr BAGOT said it had not been his intention, if the hon member for the Port had been present, to say anything, but in the first instance he would state it was his intention to vote for the address At the same time he could not but guard himself in reference to one or two portions He could not feel as those must have felt who prepared the address He did not believe that any injurious results would arise from giving full power to the farmers of the colony to distil from grain or fruit Such permission he did not believe would jeopardize the revenue of the colony He regretted that the Ministry had not determined upon at once grappling with the question of free distillation He was desirous of supporting the Ministry as much as he possibly could, but he certainly thought they should have grappled with this question in a way which the majority of the country wished If the electors were polled, he believed four-fifths would vote for free distillation If that were the case, it was time that the Ministry grappled with it, and see in what way they could best carry out the wishes of the country If the Ministry did not grapple with this and other questions he feared they would find it difficult to maintain their places upon the Treasury benches Then again, in reference to that portion of His Excellency's speech in reference to real property, he regretted that the Ministry had not informed the House whether the Real Property Bill was working in a way that could be wished By the Supplementary Estimates, he observed that a large sum had been fixed as necessary to carry out that measure, and seeing the great importance which must be attached to a measure which affected the property of every man who purchased an acre of land it was to be regretted that the Ministry had not stated whether the bill was working satisfactorily, or whether it would be necessary to make any amendment in it He thought considering the magnitude of the measure, and that it affected such a large amount of property, the Government should have stated how the Act was working If no other member did, he should certainly take the initiative, for the purpose of obtaining information in reference to this Act, but he scarcely thought it would be necessary, as it was stated in the public press, apparently by some one having authority, that every question which came before the Commissioners under the Act, was referred to the law advisers of the Commissioners, and, if so where was the use of the Lands Titles Commissioners? This seemed to show that they could not do without lawyers, but that they must have men accustomed to look at matters on all sides and in all their bearings

Captain HART would not detain the House long The commercial depression which had been alluded to was, to a great degree, of recent origin, and at the time when the Governor's speech was penned, might not have been so obvious as at the present moment He must also say that the depression complained of, did not in his opinion arise from excessive imports, it was to be attributed to various causes Our imports might, indeed be excessive one year, and the balance be restored in the next, as for example, in the article of cornsacks, of which there was now 18 months' stock on hand The depression must be sought for rather on the export than on the import side of our commercial account There had been a loss in wool arising from depreciated prices, this deficiency representing many thousands of pounds, and as the Banks had advanced on the faith of higher prices being realised, there was less means of accommodation, although merchants were now obliged to draw heavily on the Banks to meet their wants That was one cause of the depression The Bank accommodation was not sufficient for the wants of the mercantile community, all interests had in consequence been more or less affected The partial failure of the last harvest had seriously affected, as a deficient harvest always must affect, the prosperity of every class of the community He, however, thought the depression was only transient South Australia had never been in a more prosperous condition than at present Their lands were more valuable than those of Victoria, and this was a circumstance of the utmost encouragement At the same time he was aware that greater facilities should be afforded in the way of accommodation A purely Colonial Bank would tend much to advance the colony and prevent English Banks putting on the screw The value of their bonds in England increased confidence in the resources of the colony According to the rates at which our bonds were now selling they might be said to be making railways with capital borrowed at 5 per cent With respect to the apprehension of a rupture with Europe, he thought there was little to fear, but if a rupture broke out with the United States, much damage might be done to our trade on the high seas He had little fear of an invasion It was not one, two, or even three or four frigates, that could land 1,000 men He had no faith in a gun boat, but believed that near the Semaphore and at Glenelg, the natural breastworks afforded by the sand-hills would enable a few pieces of heavy artillery to be placed in such a position as to render the landing of a small body of troops impracticable Notwithstanding some defects, he was in favour of the Real Property Act, and hoped it would become law in all the Australian colonies

Mr STRANGWAYS approved of the control of works being taken from Boards It was a matter of regret that the subject of education had not been attended to He was in favour of railway extension, and hoped it would be carried out through the colony He concluded by expressing a wish that the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would shortly place on the table all papers connected with Mr Babbage's expedition He should support the address

Mr MILDRED considered the Government programme ought to have afforded more information to the House respecting the policy intended to be pursued He should like to have seen the expenditure of the colony reduced in proportion to the present depressed state of affairs A promise was made last session to promote the cultivation of the vine by a new Distillation Bill, and he considered that the Ministry ought to have been prepared to bring forward a measure which would have the effect of removing all obnoxious restrictions With respect to colonial defences, he thought floating batteries would be most efficient Reserving to himself the right to object to any measure alluded to, he would support the address

Mr DUNN would have contented himself with a silent vote but for the omission of the subject of education from the Governor's speech The Ministry had lost sight of that subject altogether He was of opinion that a portion of the revenue should be applied to railway extension He supported the address

The Hon Mr BLYTH cheerfully supported the address The hon mover of it had alluded to the very inefficient working of the Telegraph Department Had that hon gentleman inspected the manner in which it was then being worked, he would have found it satisfactory Hon members had alluded to omissions with reference to railways and waterworks Others could not see why the financial year had been changed In reply, he would only say that the European year was unsuited to these colonies Works could be done cheaper at one time of the year than at another He might state, not only for himself, but also on behalf of his colleagues, that they were prepared to work They did not seek to wander in Elysian fields They had no desire to perpetuate irresponsible Boards, but as far as that subject was concerned he was content to go with his colleagues, although he might have to laugh the wrong side of his mouth (Laughter) The supplementary estimates were on the table, and hon members need not be afraid of increased expenditure He agreed with hon members that the colony was not sufficiently defended, and when that subject came on for consideration he hoped it would receive the attention it deserved In the working of various departments he would on behalf of the Government declare that any defects manifested would be amended He had bestowed much labour and thought on the subject of roads A measure would be brought forward similar to the one advocated by the hon member for the Port (Mr Hughes) The hon member thanked the House for the support which had been given to the Government, and resumed his seat

Mr HARVEY regretted the subject of free distillation had not been alluded to With reference to the prosperity of the colony, he admitted that mining and all other interests seemed to be progressing in the same ratio As to the defences, he considered there was not much money to spare for such purposes Every one should defend his own home and family He approved of supporting old roads and making others at the expense of the general revenue He was glad to see the Government inclined to support railway extension He should be happy to support the Ministry so long as he conscientiously approved of their conduct The change in the financial year met with his approbation He should support the address other department of Government, should have power to lay out and open suitable lines of communication. Money had been squandered to keep up lines that were useless. With reference to the defences, people should be trained and prepared to defend themselves. He could not approve of the address, and was astonished no one had moved an amendment to it.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would confine his observations to one or two points. The Governor's speech had been criticised by several hon. members, and objections had been taken on various points. He thought on the whole he might congratulate the Ministry on the feeling evinced by the House. They expected no servile support on the one hand, or factious opposition on the other. In reference to the various matters that had been brought forward he would allude to one in particular, because if it were allowed to go forth uncontradicted it might be prejudicial to the character of a particular hon. member. The hon. member for the Sturt had attempted to connect responsible Government with irresponsible Boards. As far as he could ascertain the only irresponsible Board here was the Road Board. All the others were responsible. They could not expend any funds without the approval of the Government. They were as responsible to the Government as the Ministry was responsible to that House. Thus much for the charge made against the Government of wishing to uphold irresponsible Boards, in contradistinction to responsible government. With reference to what had been said concerning the Hon. the Chief Secretary, he considered that if that hon. gentleman had taken a different course to that which he had adopted, the principle of responsible government might have been endangered. In justification of himself, and also of Mr. Reynolds, he might say there was nothing in Mr. Younghusband's vote opposed to responsible government. Had he believed the contrary he would not have undertaken to form a Ministry, nor did he imagine that the hon. member for Sturt should have become a member of his administration. No one had taken more trouble then himself to secure responsible government, and he would always endeavour to uphold it. Referring to a conversation which took place when it became his (the Attorney-General's) duty to form a Ministry respecting a change in the Chairmanship of a certain Board, and the propriety of appointing some permanent body to conduct the works, he believed the hon. member for the Sturt did not then state that such an arrangement was opposed to responsible government. If the statement which had been made were allowed to go forth uncontradicted, it would be calculated to operate prejudicially against the changes Government intended to propose. He intended to propose that a permanent body should be appointed for carrying out undertakings involving an expenditure of large sums of money, such body to be responsible to the Minister of Public Works. Without at that late hour further detaining the House, he would conclude by supporting the Address, as a courteous reply to His Excellency's speech. That was not the time for discussing the many topics which were therein alluded to. Opportunities would soon be afforded for that purpose, when he hoped the various points would be met in proper tone and spirit.

Mr. BARROW replied—When rising to propose the adoption of the address he carefully guarded himself against making any pledges to support the various measures therein mentioned. But that was no reason why he should condemn every sentence in the address which he moved the House to adopt. He would only touch upon one or two points. He had expressed a desire that the sheep farmers should have every opportunity afforded them of making out a case against the proposed assessment. That was nothing more than the barest justice. (Cheers.) Surely the House would not exercise the power of taxing any interest without giving to that interest the opportunity of showing cause against the proposed impost? (Hear.) The same privilege which was accorded to a criminal for showing cause why sentence should not be pronounced against him, would, he felt assured, be accorded by the Government to the squatting interest. He (Mr. Barrow) had demanded on the previous day, that if the squatter could make out a case even for remission of taxes now paid by him, he should have the chance of doing so. It was simple justice, although for his own part he had no hesitation in expressing his belief that they could not make out such a case. With reference to the question of finance, he had taken the trouble to examine some tables showing the amount of our exports and imports for the last three years, which exhibited the following facts:—

Imports for colonial consumption, not including coin or bullion for same period	873,943	0	0
Balance in favor of Exports	£44,527	0	0
Exports of native produce for the year ending 30th of November, 1857	£1,382,760	0	0
Imports for colonial consumption, not including coin or bullion for same period	1,400,714	0	0
Balance in favor of Imports	£17,954	0	0
Exports of native produce for the year ending 30th of June, 1858	£1,470,236	0	0
Imports for colonial consumption, not including coin or bullion for same period	£1,510,759	0	0
Balance in favor of Imports	£40,523	0	0

The balance against the colony was, he admitted, considerable, but not sufficient to create alarm, and he had taken the trouble to compile those figures, because an hon. member had strongly censured the Government for only bringing their calculations down to the end of last December. He (Mr. Barrow) had brought his down to the end of June, the result not being much more adverse to the Governor's speech than were the figures so much censured. If trade had not been healthy the balance against the colony would have been much greater. He placed some reliance on the mercantile experience of such gentlemen as the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works and the Hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands. Those gentlemen were not alarmed at the financial condition of the colony, and if the depression were only temporary what reason was there for affirming things to be in a deplorable condition? It was unnecessary to allude to any other points. He would merely add that although there was an increase in some items of expenditure, there was but a small increase in the general amount. That increase had, however, been occasioned in connection with the new department for carrying out the Real Property Act. He hoped that the additional expenditure of £5,000 in that direction would be found advantageous to the colony. He had no doubt that when the various subjects alluded to in the address came on for discussion, they would receive that attention which their importance demanded. He moved the adoption of the address.

Carried.

The House then adjourned at half-past 5 o'clock.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 1 o'clock.

On the motion of the Attorney-General, the House adjourned to half-past 2 o'clock, for the purpose of presenting the address to His Excellency the Governor.

The House resumed at half-past 2 o'clock.

Several notices of motion were given, which will be found in the usual place.

RECEPTION OF REPLY.

The SPEAKER announced that His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief had received the reply to his message in the most gracious manner.

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS explained, in answer to the question put to him yesterday, by the hon. member for East Torrens, respecting the Yatala, that the Government had received intelligence of that vessel being ashore in Rivoli Bay, but that she had sustained but little damage, and that the cargo, as far as can be ascertained, is uninjured.

PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. REYNOLDS begged to draw the attention of the Commissioner of Public Works to certain correspondence that had taken place between the Public Works office, the Auditor-General, and the Railway Commissioners. There was in the office a letter from the Auditor-General calling attention to a sum of £30,669 19s. 7d., as payment to workmen for wages, &c., and which letter, asking from the Railway Commissioners explanation, was forwarded in October, 1857. No reply having been received, other letters, dated 9th and 26th April, were dispatched, requesting early explanation, but that up to the period of his (Mr. Reynold's) resignation no reply had been received. He would now ask the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Blyth) whether any explanations had been furnished by the Railway Commissioners in reply to queries of the Auditor-General on the railway accounts of 1856, forwarded to the Commissioners on or about October 1st, wherein the Auditor-General had pointed out to the Commissioners that a sum exceeding £30,000 purporting to have been paid to workmen had not been properly vouched for by the receipts of the parties represented as being paid; what has been the nature of the explanations (if any), and whether he has approved the amounts.

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS believed he should be able to give a satisfactorily reply to the questions put to him, and would state that those railway accounts to which the hon. member referred were the accounts of the Gawler Town Railway Commissioners, and not those of the present Railway Commissioners. In the payment of those parties alluded to, the Commissioners adopted the plan followed generally in England, of paying on a pay sheet, and the Government had instructed the Auditor-General to pass the accounts.

Mr. REYNOLDS begged to ask the other question standing in his name, namely, whether any enquiries had been instituted into the charges made against certain parties on the railway as having had an interest in some contracts on the line; the names of the persons making the enquiry, and the result?

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS said that enquiry had been made into the charges alluded to—that the names of the persons who conducted that enquiry were Messrs. John Brown and R. B. Colley, and that the result of the enquiry was that, in one case, sufficient was elicited to induce the Commissioners to recommend the dismissal of the party implicated, and in the other case, the charge was not sustained.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the names of the parties who were accused.

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS stated that one was Mr Cole, the sub-engineer, and the other Mr McArthur, the draughtsman, and that the latter was the party whose dismissal was recommended.

Mr REYNOLDS enquired whether the Government had any objection to lay the minutes of the enquiry before the House.

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS replied that the Government had no objection.

ALTERATION OF THE HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr GLYDE stated that he had been induced to put the notice of motion which he was about to move on the notice paper in consequence of the proceedings of Tuesday last, in regard to the motion of the Attorney-General. He believed that many hon. members would prefer that the hour of meeting of that Assembly should be 2 o'clock instead of 1. He did not intend to say much on the question, for he did not think it necessary, as it did not involve much argument. Whatever hon. members might say about public convenience, they would decide as suited their own convenience, and he thought that 2 o'clock would be more convenient than 1 o'clock for those who wished to dine or take their lunch before the meeting of the House, as many might think half-past 12 or a quarter to 1 o'clock rather early; and those who did not care about lunching before the House met, would have another hour for their offices and counting-houses. He thought the alteration might be advantageously made, although some imagined that it would render it necessary for hon. members to sit an hour longer there. It did not appear so to him, for if such a course were adopted, members' speeches would be shortened, a "consummation devoutly to be wished." It might be urged that winter sittings would bring in darkness before the business was concluded, but under the new Standing Orders there would only be fifteen minutes grace allowed after 2 o'clock. He therefore proposed the motion standing in his name.

Mr DUFFIELD seconded the motion.

Mr NEALES, during session before last, thinking that 2 o'clock would be a more convenient hour, had introduced a motion to that effect, but it was found to work so inconveniently that the House resolved to go back to the original hour of 1 o'clock. Having already unsuccessfully tried 2 o'clock, it would, he thought, be quite out of character to try it again at a similar season of the year. The shortened grace of a quarter of an hour given in the new Standing Orders, had not yet been established. He believed the business of the House would not commence till half-past 1 o'clock. That would be the practical result. In his (Mr Neales's) opinion the alteration would not result in shortening speeches, but would prove inconvenient to journalists, who would thus have less time to revise their reports. If hon. members desired to have careful reports given, the more time given for that purpose the better. He should therefore advise adhering to 1 o'clock.

Mr YOUNG, in reference to what had been stated by the last speaker, said he might say that he should support the proposition for an alteration of the hour of meeting to 2 o'clock. In a House composed like theirs, of members most of whom were engaged in business, and some of whom had to ride perhaps twelve miles to take their places in the Assembly, it gave them scarcely any time to attend to their business in the country if they had to be in the House at 1 o'clock. His (Mr Young's) convenience, as well as that of other hon. members, would be consulted by fixing the hour of meeting at 2 o'clock, as it would give them the opportunity of doing some business in town as well.

Mr LINDSAY had certainly not heard from the hon. mover of the alteration before the House, any reason that would induce him to vote for it. For his part, instead of the alteration proposed, he should prefer making a day of it (laughter), as it would enable the House to do in three days what then required four. He therefore proposed, as an amendment, that in future the hour of meeting of that House should be 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and that the House should meet three days in each week instead of four. (Laughter.)

Mr BAGOT considered the arguments of the mover might be used in favor of meeting at 5 o'clock. In the arguments opposed to the motion there appeared to be a fear of after-dinner speeches being made by hon. members. Such speeches might be made if they had dined between 1 and 2 o'clock. He did not think that anything would be gained by altering the hour from 1 o'clock, for merchants did not usually transact any business between 1 and 2 o'clock, and they might as well be in that House as in their country houses. With regard to the length of the reports of the proceedings that would be given in that House, the debates would just be reported the same as now, if the hour were altered—they were merely an epitome of what was said, and that would continue to be given. The House of Assembly last session agreed that a certain sum should be placed on the Estimates, in order that better reports might be furnished than was then customary, and he thought therefore the convenience of the press should not be so very much studied as hon. members seemed to consider. That ought not to be a matter for consideration. He was in favor of the House meeting at 5 o'clock.

Mr BARROW said that, in reference to the allusions made to the convenience of the press, such an alteration as that proposed would make no difference. It did not matter whether the House met at 1 or 2 o'clock. The press would report as fully in the one case as in the other. But if alterations of time were made to suit the convenience of hon. members, if they agreed at one time to change the hour to 2 o'clock, and at another to 3 o'clock, and so on, it would ultimately be impossible to decide at what hour the members should meet. He thought it would be better to let well alone.

Mr COLE considered that, as much time had been already wasted this session, it would be necessary to make some alteration. Two days had been devoted to the consideration of that miserable address. (Laughter.) He would vote for 2 o'clock if hon. members would enter into a compact never to speak longer on a subject than a quarter of an hour.

Mr GLYDE had no personal interest in the success of the motion, and if the House decided to meet at 1 o'clock, he should be willing to accede to it.

The motion was then put and negatived.

IMPOUNDING ACT.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS asked leave to bring in a Bill entitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Impounding of Cattle." The laws relating to that subject were passed some years ago, and he thought it highly desirable that the several particulars relative to the subject should undergo the revision of the Houses, and that the various laws should be amalgamated in one Bill. He considered that the details of the measure would be more conveniently stated in the second reading of the Bill than then. He would therefore not enter upon them. The alterations he intended to propose were not of such an extensive nature as might be supposed, but as they affected the interests of the country population, he trusted that the country members having seats in that House would give the subject that attention which their practical experience would enable them to do, so that the Act might be rendered so perfect as to require no alteration for a great number of years.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS seconded the motion.

Leave was given. The Bill was read the first time. The second reading was fixed for Friday week.

REGISTRATION.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL begged leave to introduce "A Bill to establish the validity of certain Regulations under the Act No. 25 of 1855-6." Since the alteration was made with regard to the Registration of Land, some questions had arisen as to whether, in addition to the seal of the colony, it was necessary to have the signature of the Governor to render such registration valid, and in order to prevent the difficulties arising from these questions, he proposed to introduce a Bill making the deposits valid by seal of the colony only.

The COLONIAL TREASURER seconded the motion.

Mr BAGOT hoped the Attorney-General would introduce a clause repealing Act No. 25, instead of amending the old Act. In a case of this kind where Nos. 25 and 26 included one or two clauses, it should be repealed.

Mr STRANGWAYS understood that this Bill was intended to render valid the registration of land grants. With that impression, he had referred to Act Nos. 25 and 26, but found that instead of an Act relative to the registration of land, 25 was an Act to provide for the registration of Joint-Stock Companies, and for limiting the liability of the shareholders. He presumed, therefore, the Attorney-General had made a slight mistake.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had not previously referred to the number of the Act, as stated on the Notice Paper, but found on examination it was incorrect. How it got into the Notice Paper as 25 he was unable to say. He believed 23 was the right number. He would say, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. member for Light, that it was to confirm a law already passed, not to make it good, or to establish a new law, that he wished this Act to be passed. And as no further registrations under that Act could henceforth be made it would be absurd to repeal it and introduce a new Act, the provisions of which had reference only to things already done. He had no wish to repeal the provisions of the Registration Act of last session, but to give effect to them.

Mr BURFORD said it was to prevent those properties from being before the House under the Real Property Act.

Mr BAGOT said, had he known that the Act passed last session prevented the necessity of registration, he would not have made his previous remark.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—The only operation of that Act would be to settle the question that had arisen with regard to certain registrations that had taken place before July last, and making that unquestionably valid, which, probably, would be valid without it. His impression was that the Real Property Act provided for that, but it was advisable to settle the question, and there would be no new grants deposited after those of 1st July, 1858. He requested leave to amend the terms of his motion and to bring in the Bill.

Leave was given, and the Bill read the first time.

The second reading was appointed for Tuesday next.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS presented a report of the Public Works department for the half-year ending July 1858, which was ordered to be printed.

The House adjourned to Tuesday next.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, and Hon Messrs O'Halloran, Ayers, Davies, Baker, A Scott, Forster, Bagot, Morphett, Everard, Hall, and Captain Scott

INCORPORATION OF INSTITUTIONS

Captain BAGOT gave notice that on the following day he would move for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the incorporation of institutions and associations formed for the promotion of religious and charitable, educational, scientific, and other useful objects

PRIVILEGE

The CHIEF SECRETARY laid upon the table of the House a despatch from the Secretary of State, relative to the decision of the Privy Council upon the appeal case, Fenton against Hampden tried in the Supreme Court of Van Diemen's Land The despatch was dated Downing-street, 11th March, 1858, and the decision of the Privy Council in the case referred to was forwarded with it, as it was considered there were points involved which affected the legislature of this colony The decision had already gone the round of the colonial journals, and the circumstances of the case were briefly as follow —During the session of 1855 the Legislative Council of Van Diemen's Land appointed a Committee of their own body to enquire into certain alleged abuses in the convict department Mr T G Gregson, a member of the House, was appointed Chairman of the Committee, and summoned Dr Hampden, the Comptroller of Convicts to appear as a witness before the Committee Dr Hampden refused, or neglected to appear, and the Legislative Council then came to a resolution that Dr Hampden should be summoned to attend by the Speaker of the House The Speaker accordingly issued his summons, which was served upon Dr Hampden, who, however, still refused to attend, and the Committee were in consequence of the absence of his evidence unable to report to the Council The question was again brought under discussion, and the Council then resolved that Dr Hampden was guilty of contempt, and the Speaker was then desired to issue his warrant for the apprehension of Dr Hampden, such warrant being placed in the hands of the Sergeant at-Arms The Sergeant at-Arms acted upon this warrant, and arrested Dr Hampden, who then brought his action against the Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms for trespass and the Supreme Court gave judgment for the plaintiff The Privy Council subsequently affirmed this decision, with costs

The despatch and the decision of the Privy Council were, upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, ordered to be printed

ADDRESS TO HIS EXCELLENCY

The PRESIDENT announced that since the last meeting of the Council he had, in company with other hon members, presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief the address adopted by the Council in reply to His Excellency's speech upon the opening of Parliament, and that His Excellency had been pleased to express his approbation of the same

PUBLIC WORKS

The CHIEF SECRETARY laid upon the table of the House a report of the Commissioner of Public Works for the year 1857, which was ordered to be printed

ATTACK ON MR. FREARSON

The Hon Mr MORPHETT asked the Chief Secretary if he had made the promised enquiries for ascertaining whether the three men who had been convicted of waylaying, assaulting, and robbing a young gentleman named Frearson were escaped convicts from Western Australia

The CHIEF SECRETARY said that in accordance with the promise which he had given, he had instituted the necessary enquiries, and it had been ascertained that the three men referred to came from some of the diggings in Victoria to Guichen Bay, and arrived overland in this colony It had been ascertained that one of them had been tried for being concerned in an extensive gold robbery which took place on board the Nelson, in Victoria, some years back The two others were supposed to have been convicts at some time or another, but beyond what he had stated the police had been unable to obtain any positive information

THE WEIR AT THE WATERWORKS

The Hon Mr FORSTER hoped the Chief Secretary would answer a question which he was desirous of putting to him at once A good deal of discussion had taken place out of doors relative to the condition of the Weir in connection with the Waterworks, and various opinions had been formed as to the stability of the work He wished to ask whether the Government had taken any further steps to ascertain the actual condition of the Weir, and if so, what had been the result

The CHIEF SECRETARY said the hon gentleman had, he thought, been misinformed with regard to a variety of opinions having been expressed as to the stability of the work There was no difference of opinion upon that point On the previous day, however, the Commissioner of Public Works, accompanied by Mr Wilson, Captain Freeling, and Mr Halliday, visited the spot for the purpose of inspecting the work and reporting upon it He would avail himself of the earliest opportunity to lay their report upon the table of the House

DEFENCES OF THE COLONY

The Hon Major O HALLORAN referred the Chief Secretary to the 22nd paragraph of His Excellency's speech, upon the opening of Parliament which related to the defences of the colony, and asked if the Ministry intended bringing forward any measure in reference to that subject, which, lightly as it might be considered by some, he regarded as one of the most solemn and onerous duties which the Ministry had to perform

The CHIEF SECRETARY said that the despatch alluded to in His Excellency's speech, and the report of the Commissioners who had been appointed to investigate the subject, had been laid upon the table of the House of Assembly, and so soon as it had been printed it would be laid on the table of the Council

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES

The CHIEF SECRETARY, in accordance with the notice which he had given, asked leave to introduce a Bill intituled "an Act to amend the laws relating to Divorce and Matrimonial cases in South Australia" The purposes which the Bill sought to attain had been the subject of grave consideration by the Imperial Parliament The subject had been debated in both Houses of Legislature, and the result had been the framing and passing of an Act nearly a literal transcript of which he now proposed to introduce to the notice of that House He would endeavour briefly to apprise hon, members of the novel features which were enunciated by this measure. It proposed to give power to the Supreme Court of this colony to grant divorces in cases of adultery, or cruelty, or desertion for a period of two years or upwards That was, it proposed to give the Court power to pronounce a judicial separation—such a judicial separation as would have an exactly similar effect to a divorce a mensa et thoro, as pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Courts at home The operation would be to sever the tie between husband and wife as effectually as though they had never been united, but neither would have power to marry again There was a further provision in the Bill, by which a wife, who had been deserted by her husband, might at any time make application to a stipendiary magistrate, or a Judge of the Supreme Court, and obtain protection for any property which she had accumulated during her desertion, such protection operating, not only against her husband, but against her husband's creditors The Bill also authorised a Judge of the Supreme Court, in such cases as detailed in Clause 12, to decree an entire dissolution of the matrimonial tie It also gave power to the Judge to decree an order for alimony, after such dissolution had taken place, and to provide the best means of educating and taking care of the children by the marriage In the event of any individual obtaining, by action of crim con in the Supreme Court, a verdict for damages, the Court had power to award such damages for the support and education of the children, or the maintenance of the wife The Bill was very nearly a transcript of that which had been introduced in the Imperial Parliament, being merely altered to adapt it to the judicial system in force in South Australia. These alterations had been submitted to the Chief Justice, and had been approved of and sanctioned by him With respect to the merits of the principles contained in the Bill, he thought the House would agree with him, that there should be some law of the kind in South Australia, for he thought there were few hon members who had not, in their own individual experience, witnessed the social evils arising from husbands deserting their families, and afterwards returning, and sweeping away the hard earnings of an industrious wife (Hear, hear) Under the existing law a worthless husband might do so again and again, till the poor woman at last, in all probability, became spirit-broken, or her moral courage gave way, and she was driven to an immoral course, and her children became members of the Destitute Asylum, and a permanent burden upon the country He was confident that hon members would agree with him that social evils of that kind should be remedied with as little delay as possible (Hear, hear) As to the absolute dissolution of the marriage-tie, which the Bill also provided for Extreme cases occasionally arose in every class of society, such cases as were indicated in Clause 12 Under the existing law, he was aware of no remedy, but the injured party was obliged to pass his or her life in misery and torment, and their earthly career was probably terminated by some act of brutal violence The only course of procedure under the present state of things, was to apply to Parliament by petition for a private Bill, and this Bill, after passing through the usual formalities, and going through both Houses of the Legislature, could not be assented to by the Governor, but must obtain the assent of the Queen before it could become of any value He thought the House would agree with him that it was the duty of Parliament to give the same facilities in all matters of legislation, to the poor as to the rich, which the present Bill proposed He would not detain the House on the subject it being his intention to allow a reasonable period before moving the second reading of the Bill, and in the interim hon members would have ample opportunity of making themselves acquainted with its provisions He moved that the Bill be read a first time, and that the second reading be an order for that day fortnight

The Hon Mr Ayers seconded the motion

The Hon Mr Morphett asked the Chief Secretary whether he had promised hon members that there should be a short session, the delay of a fortnight in this matter was likely to bring about that very desirable result—a short session There was no other business before the Council, and he saw no difficulty in the Bill being read a second time in a day or two, and the House might then go into Committee upon it Such a course he believed would greatly expedite the passing of the Bill

The Hon Captain Hall said the House had already affirmed the principle that reasonable time should elapse between the first and second reading of Bills involving important principles He was opposed to hasty legislation They had heard a very lucid explanation from the Hon the Chief Secretary of the provisions of this Bill, and it was quite clear from that explanation that most important principles were involved in the measure In his opinion hon members should be in possession of copies of the Bill, in order that they might study its bearings and be well prepared to discuss its merits and demerits before they were asked to assent to the second reading He very much objected to hurrying on the second reading of any Bill, and believed that allowing ample time to elapse between the first and second readings was the best safeguard they could adopt against hasty legislation

The Hon Captain Bagot advised the Chief Secretary to take the middle course, and move that the second reading take place that day week instead of fortnight That would probably meet the views of both hon members

The Chief Secretary only desired to consult the wishes of the House in the matter, and had no objection to alter his motion to that day week

The Bill was then read a first time and ordered to be printed, and read a second time on Tuesday next

THE CITY SQUARES

The Hon Dr Davies, in putting the question of which he had given notice—"That he will ask the Chief Secretary to ascertain from the Law Officers of the Crown, if the Corporation of the City of Adelaide has the legal right to destroy the public squares in the manner proposed to be done, also, if it has not the power, is it the intention of the Ministry to adopt any measures to preserve the squares for such public uses as were originally intended when the city was planned"—said that although the question might not appear of the same importance which it formerly was, still, as the Corporation had only suspended their determination in reference to cutting through the squares till the answer of the Chief Secretary had been obtained, he thought they ought not to pass over the matter in silence Although the opinion were in favour of the Corporation or of the powers which they possessed, he still thought that the public ought to be questioned as to whether they wished the squares of the city interfered with or diverted from the purposes for which they were originally granted If the Corporation were petitioned by a few individuals to cut through a square from north to south, and acceded to the request, they might the very next day receive a memorial from other parties asking the square to be cut through from east to west, and having consented to cut it in one direction, they could not refuse to cut it in another, and if they possessed this power in reference to one square, they possessed it equally in reference to every square in the city, so that the whole of the squares might be intersected with roadways If the intention of the Corporation were to cut roadways through the whole of the squares, he did not see how they could carry out their intentions in reference to Light-square, as a monument was erected in the centre, which it would be absolutely essential to remove before the roadway could be formed Such a step, he felt assured, would be considered degrading to the city, and would never be submitted to by the citizens He considered the question of disfiguring and cutting up the whole of the squares was as important as erecting a Corporation Hall, and as the inhabitants had been called together to consider that question, he considered they should also have been called together previously to the Corporation arriving at any determination in reference to the squares He had been induced to put these questions on the paper for the purpose of giving the Corporation some information upon the subject, but independently of that, he thought the notice of question might have a beneficial effect, as it would show the civic body that the eyes of the citizens were upon them, and that they were not at liberty to cut up public places which had been ordained for certain uses, and apply them to any other purposes they chose If the present Council were to open the squares, it was quite possible that the next Council who were elected might shut the squares up again, so that there would really be no end to the mischief He was glad to find that the Corporation were not inclined to interfere with the squares, but still, in the event of the law-officers of the Crown expressing an opinion that the Corporation had the power to interfere with these reserves, if they pleased, he wished the Corporation to be warned that an injunction would probably be issued from the Supreme Court to compel them to suspend operations, should they determine upon carrying the roadways through If the Corporation possessed power to cut through the squares, and should determine upon exercising it, it appeared to him that there was no alternative but to apply to the Supreme Court for an injunction, or to pass an Act limiting the powers of the Corporation

The Chief Secretary said he had consulted the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject, and they stated that it was very doubtful if the Corporation had any power to cut through the squares, the control and management of which were, it was believed, merely vested in them for the purpose of enabling them to carry out the provisions of the Corporation Act In reference to the latter part of the question the Government were not aware that they had any power to interfere, but conceived that interference in the matter belonged to the Supreme Court of the province

The Hon Mr Ayers rose to move the motion in this name—"That the congratulatory address of this Council to the Queen on the Marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of England with His Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia be presented to Her Majesty by the Hon John Baker, on behalf of this Council, that member having expressed his intention of shortly proceeding to England" In asking the Council to assent to the motion, he did so in the full belief that it would add to the manifestation of loyalty and respect to Her Majesty, to transmit the address which had been agreed to by the Council, by the hands of one of the members of that House, at the same time that it would afford an opportunity of conferring a graceful and well-merited compliment upon the hon gentleman who had so distinguished himself as a member of that Legislature, and who, as a colonist, had ever been ready to promote the best interests of his adopted land He would not enlarge upon the subject, particularly as the hon gentleman was present, but would make one remark in reference to the time at which Mr Baker was prepared to take his departure If the address were entrusted to that hon gentleman he was authorised to state that although he would not be prepared to depart by the next mail, which would leave in two or three days, he would at the latest be prepared to go by the mail which would leave Melbourne in October next

The Hon Mr Davies seconded the motion

The Chief Secretary had much pleasure in supporting the resolution, although he had not been consulted in the matter He believed that the Hon Mr Baker was particularly well qualified for the task

The Hon Captain Hall regarded this matter as one of importance He did not rise to oppose the motion, but he wished to elicit an opinion from the House as to whether this should be drawn into a precedent He was quite willing to award the hon gentleman to whom it was proposed to entrust the address every honor which was due to him He was quite prepared to admit that the hon gentleman had been a most efficient member of that Council, but he would ask what was to become of that House if this were to be drawn into a precedent Already there were two members of that House absent, and any member might under the Constitution Act absent himself for two months without leave The question which he wished to have determined was whether addresses to Her Majesty were to be confided to honorable members of that House for presentation If that resolution were arrived at it seemed to him the House would be in danger of losing its best members He did not think that any gentleman more admirably adapted to represent the colony could be selected than Mr Baker, but at the same time, Mr Baker was a most efficient member, and no doubt the Chief Secretary would be exceedingly unwilling to lose his active support It was for the House to consider whether the precedent should be established that upon an address to Her Majesty being moved and adopted, it should be entrusted for presentation to a member of that House It involved a question incidently of members being absent from the House

The Chief Secretary presumed it was to be perfectly understood that Mr Baker would proceed with the address to England, with as little delay as possible

The Hon Captain Bagot said that if the Hon Mr Baker had been selected as a special messenger for the occasion, he should in all probability have taken the same view as the hon member (Captain Hall), but as the hon gentleman was going to England, avowedly for his own purposes, and was merely on that account entrusted with the delivery of the address, he did not conceive that any precedent could be established If on the next occasion of an address being adopted to Her Majesty, perhaps on the marriage of another of Her Majesty's daughters, the Hon Captain Hall happened to be going to England, he should certainly vote for that hon gentlemen being entrusted with tha presentation of the address, thus affording the hon gentleman an opportunity of receiving that marked attention from Her Majesty which would no doubt be bestowed upon the Hon Mr Baker

The Hon Mr Morphett was willing to agree with the motion before the House, because he trusted it would be taken as a greater mark of respect and deference to Her Majesty that the address should be presented by a member of that House, that if it were transmitted in the usual manner He should like, however, that the House should have some special pledge that the address should be presented in a reasonable time A good deal of the gracefulness of acts of the kind depended upon promptitude, and he should like the House to have a pledge that Mr Baker would proceed by the overland mail, and prosecute his journey as expeditiously as possible.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN understood the Hon Mr Ayers, in introducing the motion, to get over the difficulty which had been alluded to, as he had stated that Mr Baker was prepared to proceed to England without delay. He confessed that the only objection in his mind had reference to time, as when the motion was first brought forward he understood that it was not the intention of the Hon Mr Baker to proceed to England till December. Had it been so he should have felt bound to oppose the present motion, as he considered the House would be wanting in their duty to Her Majesty by delaying the presentation of the address so long. That objection, however, been done away with by the announcement that Mr Baker was prepared to proceed to England by the October mail, and he felt great pleasure in supporting the motion, believing that no gentleman belonging to that Council was better qualified for the office than the Hon Mr Baker.

The Hon Mr SCOTT said if it had been the intention of the Hon Mr Baker to delay proceeding to England till the departure of the Orient, he should have felt it his duty to oppose that gentleman being the bearer of the address, particularly as he believed the address from the other branch of the Legislature would be sent either by the October mail, or that which would leave on Saturday. As however, he understood that it was the intention of Mr Baker to proceed by the overland mail he should cordially assent to the motion.

The Hon Captain SCOTT considered the difficulty had been entirely got over by what had fallen from previous speakers. Having been informed by the Hon Mr Baker that he was ready to go by the October mail, there were no further difficulties.

The Hon Mr BAKER did not know if it was expected he should say anything upon this subject, but he felt bound to answer the objection which had been raised by the Hon Mr Morphett to the effect that the House should have some substantial pledge that the address should be delivered with all speed. The Hon Mr Ayers, who had introduced the motion, had been authorised by him to state that he (Mr Baker) was prepared to go at the latest by the October mail, and he was not prepared to give any further pledge than by confirming that statement.

The Hon Mr MORPHETT was sorry that the hon gentleman should labor under a misconception of his remarks. He had not understood the Hon Mr Ayers to state in his opening address that he was authorised by the hon gentleman to state that he would proceed to England by the October mail. The hon gentleman having now stated so himself, he was perfectly satisfied with that pledge.

The Hon Mr BAKER had expressed his intention of going to England and of asking leave of absence before he was elected a member of that House, and since that period he had contemplated leaving the colony and had made arrangements to do so before the marriage of the Princess Royal was known in the colony. If the Council entrusted him with the presentation of the address he should feel it as a compliment. He felt indebted to hon members for the kind manner in which they had alluded to him during the discussion. He might refer to the unnecessary compliments which had been paid him by some honorable members. He repeated that if the address were entrusted to him there should be no delay in his departure beyond the period which he had stated, although, had he not been entrusted with it, he might not perhaps have left the colony so early by about a month. He admitted that the honor of presenting the address had induced him to make other arrangements, and had determined him upon taking his departure at a not later period than by the October mail.

The motion was carried.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the Hon the President, the Hon Mr Davenport, and the Hon Mr Morphett, were appointed the Library Committee for the present session, with power to confer with the Library Committee of the Legislative Assembly. A copy of the resolution was directed to be transmitted to the House of Assembly.

INCORPORATED INSTITUTIONS.

The CHIEF SECRETARY stated that he had intended to move the adjournment of the House for a week, but he found that the Hon Captain Bagot had a notice of motion on the paper for the following day, and there was, consequently, a difficulty.

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought it undesirable that hon members should be compelled to attend the House when there was little or nothing to do. He was not anxious to push forward the Bill of which he had given notice, but perhaps it would meet the views of hon members if the Standing Orders were set aside, and the Bill now read a first time. The Bill was at present in manuscript.

The Hon Mr BAKER felt much pleasure in seconding the motion that the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the Bill be read a first time. It would be a far more convenient course, and would prevent the necessity of hon members attending on the following day, for the special purpose of entertaining the motion for the first reading of the Bill. Members could peruse the Bill between the period of its first and second reading. It was usual to introduce a Bill without any very lengthened notice, but even if it were not, this Bill was taken out of the usual category, because during the last session a similar Bill was introduced by the hon gentleman (Captain Bagot), but the adjournment of the House prevented it from being discussed. The steps taken in reference to the Bill last session fully justified the hon mover in asking that the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the Bill be read a first time that day.

The Standing Orders having been suspended,

The Hon Captain BAGOT moved for leave to introduce "a Bill to provide for the incorporation of institutions or associations framed for promoting religious, charitable, educational, scientific, and other useful objects." Hon members would remember that a Bill nearly similar in substance to the present was introduced last session by himself, but it was not followed up for reasons which it was not necessary to enter upon. The fact was that a trifling alteration was required in the Bill, and as it was the latter part of the session it was not proceeded with. The object of the Bill was to provide a remedy for what was found to operate most inconveniently in reference to the management of real property, which became vested in the managers of institutions, such as were described in the Bill. The Bill proposed that instead of vested proprietors or trustees, the institutions should be incorporated, so that the management of the property would become most simple. The Bill had been drafted with a good deal of care by a gentleman of the legal profession, and had met with the concurrence of the Lord Bishop of Adelaide, and other persons interested in property of the character described in the preamble.

The Hon Mr MORPHETT seconded the motion for the first reading, which was carried.

The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed, the second reading being made an order of the day for Tuesday next.

The House then adjourned till Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

The SPEAKER took the chair at five minutes past 1 o'clock.

PETITIONS.

Mr HALLETT presented a petition from the daughter of the late Captain Flinders, praying for some such pecuniary assistance as had been granted by the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, in consideration of the eminent services of her late father. The petition, however, on account of an formality, could not be received.

Mr GLYDE presented a petition from Major Warburton, requesting to be allowed the usual remission in the purchase of land, as granted to other military officers.

Mr HAWKER presented a petition, signed by 626 landed proprietors, praying that no further expenses might be incurred in the construction of railways without a sufficient enquiry.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Several notices of motion were given, which will be found in the usual place.

PAPERS LAID ON THE TABLE.

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS laid on the table, papers relating to the northern exploration, also, papers showing the cost of that exdedition.

Mr HAY asked if the instructions given to Mr Babbage by the Government were included in those papers.

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS said that the papers contained full information of every particular connected with that expedition.

Several returns were laid on the table of the House, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA.

Mr REYNOLDS enquired whether the Militia Bill of 1854 was still in operation, and whether the Government would be able to enrol a militia under its provisions.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, that as it was a question involving a legal opinion, he would prefer that the honorable member would give notice of it in the usual way, as he would then be able to give a more satisfactory answer.

EXPLANATION.

Mr HUGHES rose to express his regret that the remarks which he had made in reference to Mr Maturin had been construed into a personal attack. He had no intention whatever of making any reflection upon that gentleman in his private capacity.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The TREASURER, before moving that the Supplementary Estimates be considered by a Committee of the whole House, begged to enquire what was the course that ought to be adopted on the occasion, as he wished that a precedent should be established as a guide for future proceedings. He, therefore, requested the Speaker to decide whether he should proceed to lay before the House a financial statement, and then move that the House resolve itself into a Committee, or that the House should first be resolved into Committee, and the statement then be made

The SPEAKER decided that the House must be in Committee before the financial statement could be made

The TREASURER then moved that the Supplementary Estimates of 1858 be considered by a Committee of the whole House

Mr HUGHES wished, before the question was put to obtain some information respecting the ministerial changes which had lately taken place He had already expressed his opinion upon the subject, and he then repeated that when such changes took place the House was entitled to have an explanation of the reasons which had led to them Certain printed papers had been placed before the House, from which he concluded that they had had the square man in the square hole in the shape of the late Commissioner of Public Works, and he thought there ought to be some explanation in order that the country might know whether they were living under responsible government, or under the rule of a director

The ATTORNEY GENERAL understood from the hon member himself (Mr Hughes), that the papers already before the House afforded sufficient explanation, with regard to one hon member who had retired from the Ministry With regard to the other, the gentleman who had lately filled the office of Treasurer, he supposed that he was situated with what had been called the sweets of office, and that his private engagements did not permit him to attend to official duties It was no question of difference of political views between that gentleman (Mr Hart) and the present Ministry that caused him to retire, but simply the circumstance that he was unable to attend to the duties of office consistently with the claims of his private business

Mr HART would say that to a considerable extent he could corroborate what had fallen from the Attorney-General He certainly did not leave the Ministry from any general disapprobation of their policy He felt inclined at first to support their policy rather than otherwise, and he had no intention now to go into opposition He would say that in a new country and with new measures, differences of opinion must be expected to arise, and as it is almost impossible under such untried circumstances, to find five men agree in all points, there should be always such mutual concessions as would enable them to work harmoniously together Unless they would give and take, and thus mould themselves as it were into harmonious action, responsible Government could scarcely exist in this country With regard to the honorable member the late Commissioner of Public Works, Mr Reynolds, he (Mr Hart) might not possibly have agreed altogether with him, yet he was sure during the whole time they were associates they never had a single word of dispute During the time that he was in the Ministry he had formed friendships with some of its members which he trusted would never be dissolved, and having been a member of two Ministries, he had, in consequence of those feelings, left office with regret

Mr REYNOLDS could not allow the opportunity to pass without some remark, although he must confess that it had come rather unexpectedly upon him The hon the Attorney-General had stated that the papers affecting him (Mr Reynolds) personally, were before the House To a certain extent they were, but he had to ask the hon Commissioner of Public Works to furnish the House with the correspondence with the Railway Commissioners in regard to their application for a certain sum of money to construct waggon trucks, and he would ask that hon gentleman to do what he thought he ought in justice to have done before, namely, to furnish the particulars connected with the rejected tenders for those bodies That tender was put in not by parties on the Railway and he (Mr Reynolds), did not say there was any collusion between the Railway Commissioners and the parties tendering, but that tender was not received until five minutes after the time appointed for receiving tenders had expired The parties also wanted the use of the sheds and tools belonging to the Government for the purpose of carrying out the work To that he could not submit, and he wished those things to be placed before the House for their consideration The hon the Attorney-General had spoken of the harmony subsisting between the members of the Executive, and thought that he (Mr Reynolds) might not object to the hon the Colonial Secretary having taken the course he did, but he (Mr Reynolds) had always thought that Mr Younghusband was merely a make shift, and he had no idea that he would rule that House as he had done since his accession to office. Had he (Mr Reynolds) had any other idea he would not have been connected with that Administration, and if the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands chose to express the views then stated to him in regard to the appointment of the present Colonial Secretary, the House would see that the opinion he then gave was not favorable to that appointment He felt that that gentleman (Mr Younghusband) had not the good of the country at heart He (Mr Reynolds) was for placing responsible Government in responsible hands When he undertook office he expected all departments of the Government were to be responsible, but it appeared to him that every department was to be held responsible excepting the Railway Board Had he known that Mr Younghusband would act as he had done since his taking office he would not have been a party to that Administration

Mr BURFORD confessed that there was a mystery in connection with the matter alluded to, viz, in the separation of the late Commissioner of Public Works from those with whom he had been in the habit of acting He did not conceive that the whole truth had been elicited in the correspondence placed before the House. He was sorry that the question had come on quite so soon, for had there been a delay of one or two days, the mystery might have been unravelled He thought there must have been some motive in dismissing Mr Reynolds which had not been explained, and that circumstances plainly indicated such to be the case, but whether those motives were of a private character, or had reference to parties with whom they were intimate, or to whom they were related, it was impossible to say, but a mystery there undoubtedly was He could not conceive that any men who were straightforward in their intentions, and determined to serve their country, would have hesitated nearly 10 months on the question of the contracts connected with the railway He thought there must have been neglect of the public interests, and he maintained what he had previously said, that those things showed the impropriety of uniting the two offices of Attorney General and Prime Minister in one person, for de facto the hon the Attorney-General was Prime Minister, although de jure he was not He thought, therefore, the Ministry were bound to unravel those mysteries Had it been any other set of men there would not have been this delay, but he thought that the good of the country had been sacrificed to private, and, perhaps friendly feelings

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS assured the House, and the country through the House, that there was no mystery nor underhandedness in the matter referred to He was surprised hon gentlemen seemed so exceedingly willing to believe that there were officers on the Treasury Benches who could be capable of the acts which had been imputed to them It was rather difficult to tell what precise documents the hon member (Mr Reynolds) wished for The House however might rest satisfied that every paper connected with the circumstances which had been alluded to should be forthcoming, in order that the false impression which seemed to prevail might be removed

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS was taken by surprise He had heard from time to time of some great mystery connected with the removal of his former hon colleague, but he suggested whether it would not be more manly at once to give notice that he would move for the appointment of a Select Committee of the House, to investigate any point he might be desirous of bringing before that House, than to take the course he had done For his (Mr Dutton's) part, he had acted with Mr Younghusband with the greatest possible satisfaction (Laughter) He would say, in spite of the sneers of hon members opposite, that he had great satisfaction in making that statement, and if a Committee were appointed by the House, the enquiry would fail to establish anything to his discredit Mr Reynolds had met with the utmost possible consideration from his colleagues In the discussion which took place on Railway matters, as might be seen from the correspondence placed before the House, his (Mr Reynolds's) colleagues would have supported him in any reasonable reform, but they took exception to the manner in which he wished to dictate to them in this matter, and if any one would dispassionately read the letters between the Colonial Secretary and him (Mr Reynolds) they would come to the conclusion that he had received more consideration from those whose counsel he ought to have sought but did not seek, than he had a right to expect

Mr TOWNSEND hoped that Mr Reynolds would not avail himself of the advice just tendered him He believed that Mr Reynolds had with him the sympathy of the House, and he would not have him move for a Committee of Enquiry, for of whom would that Committee be composed? But he would recommend that he (Mr Reynolds) should move a vote of want of confidence in that Government who could dismiss a valuable public servant without satisfactory reasons being given (No, no) He thought that such a course would bring the whole question before the country The country believed that the late Commissioner of Public Works had served them well, and they would not be satisfied until they knew why such an efficient public officer had been compelled to resign

Mr STRANGWAYS asked, with respect to a Select Committee, who would be placed upon it, and what would be the result? The Colonial Secretary had almost entire control in the Ministry, and also out of the Ministry The Government had appointed a non-professional man a member of the Trinity Board The Commissioner of Crown Lands said he had been able to act entirely with the Colonial Secretary That might arise from the circumstance that when two persons go together, and one lays down the law and the other is content to follow it, they will not disagree He did not know whether it was the case or not In the despatches laid on the table of the House, there was not a word connected with the resignation of Mr Reynolds It had been said he should have sought counsel from his colleagues, but he never could find his colleagues, one was at the Goolwa—one here, one there, was that treating him with consideration? Then there was a large sum placed on the Estimates for expenses connected with the Real Property Act (question), and no notice had been taken of that (cries of "order"), and it should not be forgotten what the Attorney-General said when that bill was introduced into the House, namely, that if it became law, it would increase his professional income for 20 years to come No reference was made to the working of that Act in His Excellency's speech, except to say that it was in operation, and that it worked favorably (Question) He had his doubts whether that Act would have been supported had all things been explained The hon member, after some further observations, sat down

Mr BAGOT would certainly have been down punctually at the time appointed for the meeting of the House had he thought a question of such importance would have been brought forward It appeared the hon member for the Port had brought it forward without notice ("No ") He must say that he and many members of that House were not prepared at that moment to go into a question so large as that involved in the statement made by the member for the Port It was one of great political importance (hear, hear), and it was not treating the Ministry in the way in which he thought they ought to be treated, to bring it forward in the present manner There was great difficulty in appointing a Colonial Secretary when Mr Younghusband was selected The Attorney-General had consulted many members of that House with regard to their opinions as to the best course to be pursued, and it was thought the Colonial Secretary ought to be a member of the House of Assembly No one, however could be found who could act But necessity arose, and the present Colonial Secretary was named He did not therefore think it fair that the statements to which he had alluded should have been made after the formation of the Ministry He requested that when a change of Ministry, the retiring Ministry did not make the statement of the circumstances connected with their resignation which was customary on such occasions in England There, the retiring Ministers, and those who succeeded them, usually stated the reasons which led them to take their respective courses, and he thought it would be well for such a course to be followed in this colony He was sorry they did not make a short statement with regard to the position in which the honorable the Treasurer was placed in that House, but he supposed he must look upon him as the leader of the Ministry in that House (" No" from some parts of the House) He did not know how it was, but he himself and several other honorable members, thought there would be a change there. He considered the hon Treasurer as leader of that House, and certainly it was an onerous position to be placed in, especially as the hon Attorney-General was not always able to attend

The TREASURER availed himself of his right to reply He had been taken completely by surprise at the character of the debate, but statements had been made which required notice on his part. The hon member for Sturt had said that the late Commissioner of Public Works had made certain statements with regard to the causes of his (Mr Reynolds's) resignation, and in doing so he recollected also that he stated he intended making his resignation his battle-ground in that House He (the Treasurer) presumed that the hon member was waiting for full information, and for all the papers for which he had called, to enable him to place the House in full possession of the facts He was sure that hon members would wait to see those documents, because the matter could then be fairly gone into and understood He (the Treasurer) could not enter upon matters of that kind but would wait until there was some substantive motion before the House The hon Chief Secretary had been assailed during the debate The grounds of the attack, he must confess, surprised him It had been said that he was strong out of doors For his part he (the Treasurer) thought that that was a recommendation Then, with regard to the appointment of a member of the Trinity Board, the Act did not require that the members of that Board should all be nautical men He would request the House to observe that two persons were appointed by the Government, as the Board had large powers entrusted to it, and it was felt necessary for the Government to retain a control over the exercise of those powers The Act did not require the appointment of professional persons, and they had, therefore, appointed Mr Newman

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole, and

The TREASURER then proceeded to lay before the House the Supplementary Estimates He should feel that he was not doing his duty were he to neglect making some observations upon the present financial state of the colony, although he confessed it was not very agreeable to him to have to make a long statement, blended with statistics and figures, which, perhaps, would be impatiently listened to by the House It was necessary, however, that he should make that statement, because the speech of the Governor dealt more with generalities than with facts and figures, and in so doing he was only acting in the spirit of responsible government, inasmuch as other explanations were necessarily made afterwards in the House He could not enter upon that subject without alluding to the imports and exports of the colony They were referred to in a previous speech, but he would take that opportunity of stating some of the disadvantages under which he laboured in preparing his statements Up to that time he had not obtained complete returns of the imports and exports for the year ended December last, nor any for the year ended June last Therefore he had had to gather his views of the condition of the colony from the quarterly returns, and he had to put them together for the purpose of arriving at a correct conclusion That involved great labour ("No, no," from Mr Hughes), as would be seen by any one who inspected the Customs returns laid on the table of the House Hon members said "No, no" He did not perhaps possess the great ability of the late Treasurer, but he had had to work 10 to 12 hours a day for the last fortnight in order to prepare a satisfactory statement for that House, and even then he would have to supplement it when the General Estimates were placed before them With those remarks, which he had put forward in order to bespeak the indulgence of the House, he would proceed to his statement He found that the total value of imports consumed or remaining in the colony during the year ended 30th June, 1858 was 1,556,489*l*, and the exports during the same period were 1,470,236*l*, which gave an excess in the value of imports over exports amounting to 86,253*l* Comparing the values of imports and exports of this period with the corresponding values returned in the previous year, the imports in the third quarter of 1856 were 292,489*l*, the fourth quarter, 451,500*l*, the next, or first quarter of 1857, 361,546*l*, and the quarter ending June, 1857, 351,447*l*, making the total imports 1,456,983*l* as the imports for that year, and which corresponded with the year then under consideration The exports for the same periods were—third quarter of 1856, 195,336*l*, fourth quarter, 423,841*l*, the first quarter of 1857, 444,899*l*, and the second quarter of 1857, 318,684*l*, being a total, 1,382,760*l* Thus much for the financial year ending 30th June, 1857, with which he proceeded then to compare the present year The imports of the third quarter of 1857 produced 300 832*l*, the fourth quarter, 412,671*l*, the first quarter of 1858, 479,681*l*, and the second quarter, ending the 30th June last, 363,305*l*, making a total of 1,556,489*l* The exports for those quarters amounted to 1,470,236*l*, the third quarter of 1857 being 331,525*l*, the fourth, 614,694*l*, the first quarter of 1858, 316,252*l*, and the quarter ending 30th June, 1858, being 207,765*l* Those figures demonstrated that the imports of the last year had increased at the rate of six per cent over the preceding year, and the exports were in the same ratio But at the close of each year ending June 30th, the imports had been in excess of the exports to the extent of 74,223*l* for 1857, and 86,253*l* for 1858 It might be well to analyze the state of their export trade in order to ascertain if there had been any deficiency in the chief staples of colonial produce Taking the stated values of the export of corn, flour, &c., of metals and ores, and of wool, at each of the quarters previously named, and adding the amount together in each year, it would be seen there had been a gain of about 75,544*l* on the export of those articles during the past year Thus the exports of corn, &c, were for the year ended June 30th, 1857, valued at 576,744*l*, metals and ores figuring at 416,879*l*, wool, at 370 443*l*, against the year ending June, 1858, of a total of 593,584*l*, for corn, &c, 419,980*l*, for metals and ores, and 426 046*l* for wools This showed an increase in favour of last year amounting to 55,603*l* on wool, 3,101*l* on metals and ores, and 16,840*l* on wheat, total amount of increase in these exports being 75 544*l* So far the result was satisfactory, as showing that the produce of the colony was progressing But comparing the export of corn and flour during the first half-years of 1857 and 1858, there may be some explanation of the discrepancies arising from a review of the first six months in the year only He found that there had been a decrease in the value of those articles during the last six months of 129,938*l* there had been a decrease of 6,799 tons of flour, or 339,977 bushels of wheat The figures from which those results had been obtained gave for the first quarter of 1857, 7,302½ tons of flour, 4,503 quarters of wheat, valued at 138,513*l* The figures for the next quarter were 6,731 tons of flour, 15 721 quarters of wheat, amounting in value to 179,150*l* The total exports for the last half year ending June, 1858, were 8,084 tons of flour and 14,911 quarters of wheat, amounting in value to 187,725*l* Thus, in these articles there had been less exported this year than in the corresponding period of last year to the amount in round numbers of 130,000*l* That amount must be recovered during the current half-year to make the future look as well as the past It was evident that the slackness in shipments hitherto had not resulted from any deficiency of quantity in the colony, but if such existed it would diminish exportations at the close of the season It rather arose from indisposition to sell at a reduced price The slackness in the export, or the deficiency in the export of wheat would, at the current price of—say 6s 8d per bushel, more than account for the excess of 86,253*l* which was discoverable in their import trade, and was probably the solution of the apparent unfavourable relation between exports and imports It was somewhat in confirmation of that view to find nearly the same condition obtained last year and it had happened in two successive years that the tables of imports and exports exhibited a favorable result when made up to December, while the reverse was the case when the amount was balanced on the 30th June in each year Thus, in 1856, at the close of the calendar year, the exports exceeded the imports by 299,211*l* The year made up to the following June exhibited an excess of imports of £74,223 In 1857, in December last, the gain on the side of exports was £335,520, whilst, as before, the balance was against exports in June last to the extent of £86,253 It was to the fluctuations in the wheat market, and, consequently, in the periods of exportation of wheat that they must chiefly look to account for the apparent unfavorable state of the Customs Returns when made up to the latest date, because of the exports of colonial staples had, on the whole, increased about 6 per cent, and since imports had only increased 6 per cent upon the imports of last year, which was about the ratio of increase attributable to healthy progress it could not be said that imports had been excessive If the yield of last harvest proved to be deficient, or if prices of wheat fell, either of such circumstances, coupled with any permanent fall in wool, would seriously affect their future ability to sustain the present rate of imports But in attempting to speculate upon the future, further than to exercise caution in our estimates, until the prospects of the year were more fully developed, they would fall into errors of despondency at least as mischievous as those of sanguine exaggeration For whilst glutted markets were an evil, scanty supplies seriously affected the income of the consumer by inducing excessive prices He would now leave these statements of imports and exports, as when he produced the Estimates for 1859 he would have to make further remarks upon them Since he came down to the House, he (the Treasurer) had received from the Collector of Customs an abstract of imports and exports to June last, which were within a trifle of the figures he had given, the difference being more favorable than the picture he had drawn The difficulty in making up the Customs returns arose from not receiving returns from distant ports The exports of wool could not be ascertained at an early date, and they formed a very material item in their list of exports for the year He would now refer to the state of the public revenue, and in doing so would avoid going into the prospects on which the Estimates for 1859 would be calculated His remarks would be chiefly confined to the past and to the present year as explanations of the Supplementary Estimates now before the House The revenue received up to December last was somewhat less than previously, the difference being 4475*l* The chief items of decrease were on land sales, and there is a slight apparent decrease of 468*l* on the Customs But the revenue exceeded the Estimates by 29 410*l*, while the expenditure fell short of those Estimates by 72,716*l*, so that a large balance accrued at the end of the year, a part only of which is included in the sum brought forward in the original Estimates of 1858 This surplus derived from the balances of all sources of revenue, is the first item on the list of ways and means, and amounted on the 1st of January, 1858, after setting by a sufficient sum to meet outstanding expenditure, to 179,782*l* It will be found so stated at the head of the column of revenue in the Supplementary Estimates before the House The Government had not attempted to amend the items, although perhaps, the Supplementary Estimates might be amended In some instances there would be a falling off, in others an increase of expenditure, so that on the whole the revenue estimated might at least be depended on He would go into those items seriatim The first item was the land sales In 1857 they reached £220 954, in the previous year £231,023 and in 1855, £240,038, at which period they reached their highest productiveness At the end of August last the amount realised was £133,088, leaving a sum of £46,912 to make up the estimate of £180,000 This would leave £11,728 to be received during each of the next four months, which will no doubt be more than realised The revenue of the year ended June last, whilst it exceeded the estimate, exhibited a nett increase on the revenue of the former year of only 656*l* The decrease during the year was chiefly in the Customs, while the gain was chiefly in the land sales, postages, immigration deposits, and railways Bearing that in view, it would be unsafe to expect from the Customs more than the sum stated in the Estimates, viz, 154,000*l* The gross Customs receipts in 1856 and 1857 respectively were 152,135*l* and 151,676*l*, but those were only gross receipts, and although they appeared as revenue received, there were amounts to be repaid to New South Wales and Victoria during each of those years for goods passed into those colonies, so that in 1856 there must be 13,070*l* deducted from the revenue stated, leaving only 139,065*l*, in 1857 8,892*l* must be deducted, leaving a balance of 142,775*l* But this year it would probably not exceed 3000*l* Taking that from 102,613*l* which they had already received under the head of Customs there would remain 99,613*l* realized towards the Estimates, leaving 54,386*l* to be obtained during the rest of the year That would require an average receipt of 13 596*l* per month during the next four months in order that the Customs Revenue might produce the full amount Harbour dues was the next item In that the revenue would be nearly realized The next item was rents Under that head were included rents of wharves at Port Adelaide, sundry rents in other parts of the colony, and annual leases of runs All those contributed last year 22,522*l* to the revenue The rent of lands held under fourteen years leases was 18,351*l* That item would probably be slightly increased The number of leases issued had been 571, including 13 new leases The extent of country comprised in those leases was 28 024 square miles, or 17,935,360 acres, of which 1,112,928 had been resumed, leaving still occupied, as runs under lease, 16,822,432 acres, yielding an annual rent of 18,350*l*, thus giving an average rental of something more than one farthing per acre per annum The estimated amount derivable from rents of all kinds was 21,000*l*, and as 22,522*l* were received last year, it seemed probable that that estimate might be exceeded by 1,500*l* £1,300 was put down for licences He thought that would be slightly exceeded since 1,2783 had been received to the end of July Postage appeared next and he found receipts had not paid expenses since the postage had been reduced to 2d and 6d respectively for inland and ship letters, although the Post-Office revenue had been gradually increasing since 1854 The postal revenue of 1855 was 7 841*l*, of 1856, 8 925*l*, of 1857, 10,353*l*, against an expenditure of 15,032*l* in 1855, 15,715*l*, in 1856, and 17 984*l*, in 1857 To the expenditure of 1857 should also be added the portion of the subsidy payable to the European Steam Contract Company A charge on that account should likewise be added to that year's estimate, but it was difficult to state the amount The receipts for six months in 1858, amounted to 5 989*l* 19s and in July to 1,171*l* 11s That gave an average of 1000*l* a month, and it might be expected to increase the sum estimated by 2 000*l* It might also be expected that the income in two or three years would cover the Post-Office expenditure, and it should be borne in mind in considering the advantages to the country derived from that department, that the carriage of 849,946 newspapers was included in the cost of that establishment, the greater part of which were sent inwards, and the cost of transmission of which was heavier than that of letters Amongst the items of fixed revenue, fines, fees, and forfeitures afforded a considerable sum The sum on the Estimates might not be realized, as the year ending June last only produced 14,781*l* Sales of Government property stood next The late Treasurer (Mr Hart) was very moderate in his estimate, having only estimated a probable amount of 2000*l* But even that was not likely to be realized 709*l* only having been received to that time Reimbursements came next Under that head there would probably be a deficiency They came then to an item of receipt which had been gradually swelling during late years,—namely, interest and exchange, and that account suggested many interesting questions In those had been included the profit upon their Exchequer Bill transactions, and the sale of bonds The Government had decided that the latter was not a proper item of revenue, as they considered they ought to credit the different undertakings with the profit that must accrue, because, otherwise, they would be spending borrowed capital That would reduce the estimate probably to £1,000, hitherto considered available revenue They then come to Railways They appeared, for the first time, on their estimates of receipts That was the first year in which the Railways had yielded a profit The amount received was £3,497 against an estimate of £2,000, and as there were receipts to come in from the Goolwa Railway, he expected there might be a surplus of £2,000 at the close of the year The telegraph, set down at 4,000*l*, might be depended upon, for the inter-colonial wire was in full operation, and was a source of considerable revenue He had gone through the various items in detail and shewn that probably on some there might be a deficiency, and on others an increase, but it was not thought advisable to amend the Estimates, as the total estimate would probably be realized Before concluding, the House would perhaps require information respecting the bonded debt He would quote from a table in his hands There were eight different undertakings, which had been authorized to be carried out by means of loans The total amount authorized to be borrowed was 889,000*l* Up to the 25th August last 641,100*l* had been sold as advised, and there remained 49,700*l* in the hands of the agent for sale The bonds remaining amounted to 203 600*l* The colonial debt was 624,400*l* With respect to this debt he would remind the House that railways were becoming a source of means, and contributing towards the payment of interest, and in course of 18 months there would be a large amount received from the City of Adelaide Railway, available for repayment of the amount, but it would not appear in the Estimates of that year because no returns could be expected until the works were finished, which would not be for the next 12 or 15 months Having gone through all matters relating to the funds of the Government, he would turn to the Supplementary Estimates of expenditure The hon member enumerated some few of the large items proposed to be expended on public works, and concluded by moving the consideration of the first item of the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr HUGHES did not wish to take any objection to the item now before the House, but he should offer a few remarks on the statement of the hon the Treasurer On one very recent occasion the House had been assured upon the very highest authority that the revenue was increasing that imports and exports bore a favorable comparison with those of former years, and that our financial condition showed a steady progress But the hon gentleman who had just addressed the House had told them that when he really looked into the matter, he found that that statement was altogether incorrect, and that on the contrary, there was a large falling off in the principal items of our exports The hon member had shown that in the last nine months which covered the harvest, including the articles of wool and wheat, there was a great falling off in these articles, which formed the substantial wealth of the colony He agreed in the statement now made, and he only regretted that the hon gentleman had not shown more assiduity in preventing the incorrect statement to which he had before referred, and which he (the Treasurer) now admitted to be incorrect, from being placed before the House The hon gentleman had also said that it was a work of great labour to prepare the statement he had made, but the department of the Auditor General was so admirably managed, that any schoolboy could in a few hours arrive at the conclusions which the hon member had laid before the House. He (Mr Hughes) would take no great credit, nor should any person possessing a knowledge of accounts and business matters find any difficulty in doing it. The hon gentleman had also said that the premium on bonds was not to be brought in under the head of general revenue, but he (Mr Hughes) did not know that in saying so, the hon member had taken a right view of the matter. For if, for instance, the Government were to raise a sum of 100,000*l* on bonds, and if these bonds were sold at 10 per cent premium, why should not the 10,000*l* profit go to the credit of the general revenue? If it did not, he (Mr Hughes) did not know what was to become of it. Supposing this sum to be realised by the sale of Railway Debentures, would the Commissioners of Railways have the power of expending the money? Whatever premiums were received in this way should go to the general revenue, and if they then went into a sinking fund they would be well disposed of. The hon the Treasurer of that time had informed the House last year that he had made a great discovery, that he had found out that the Emigration Commissioners in London were in possession of funds belonging to this colony, with the existence of which we were not acquainted before. The accounts of the matter were laid on the table at the time, but he believed the hon gentleman (Mr Finniss) had since found that these funds existed only in the imagination of the late Treasurer, and that the discovery amounted to nothing at all, though that also was a matter which any schoolboy might find out. He was glad the hon the Treasurer did not mislead the House on these points, and he hoped he had not done so on another point when he stated we were borrowing money now at 5 per cent. He (Mr Hughes) did not know how that result was arrived at, but he could not arrive at it, though nothing would be more satisfactory to him than to find that it was the case. He found that the hon gentleman had congratulated the House that the bonds were selling in the English market at a premium of 10 per cent, but he had not stated whether the interest was included in that, and he (Mr Hughes) believed it was so—that we might find that instead of paying 5 per cent we were paying nearly 6 per cent. There was another point, and he (Mr Hughes) believed it to be the most important point of all, for it showed beyond dispute the financial condition of the colonists, and furnished the true keystone to what the colony could afford to pay for the luxuries and the necessities of life—he meant the Customs revenue. If hon members looked at the statement of the hon member again they would find that the Customs revenue for the year was £11,000 less than that that for the previous year, and how under these circumstances the House could be informed that the revenue was increasing, he (Mr Hughes) did not know. He hoped they would not in future have such statements brought before them as those which had been contained in the speech of His Excellency the Governor, inasmuch as such statements were lowering to the character of the House. He must protest against statements being put before the House which would not bear scrutiny, and he should always consider it his duty to point out such false statements, for South Australia need not fear the truth, and a plain statement of the truth, would show clearly that this colony had made, looking to the short time of its existence, a wonderful—he had almost said an unexampled—progress, that it had every element of stability and increasing wealth. He hoped, if he was wrong about the sum of money which had been said to have been discovered in the hands of the Emigration Commissioners in London, that the hon gentleman opposite would set him right. He need not go through the items of the Estimates now before the House, but hon members should not be surprised if some of them were struck out. With regard to what had been said as to his being out of order in putting the question which he had put in the earlier part of the discussion, he contended that he was quite in order, and he did not put that question with the view of initiating the discussion which had ensued.

Mr Townsend enquired to whom the sum under the consideration of the House was to go.

The Treasurer, without adverting to the remarks of the hon member for the Port, which he would take up at another time, and, he believed, would answer satisfactorily, would for the present confine himself to replying to the question of the hon member for East Torrens as to what would become of the £40 now before the House. This sum was required for extra clerical assistance in the office of the Private Secretary, as the work was beyond the power of the present staff to accomplish, and as such assistance need not always be afforded, it was desirable to make a temporary provision.

Mr Townsend hoped this custom would not be adhered to. When the question of salaries was before the House, everything was said that could be thought of to swell the importance of the offices, and then when the salaries were raised to a high amount, these additional sums were asked for in the Supplementary Estimates.

The Attorney-General said that with regard to one point which had been raised by the hon member for the Port, he regarded it as important, as involving a question of policy entertained by the Government, and on which he differed from the hon member. With respect to regarding as a portion of income the money produced by the sale of lands, he thought the Government had acted wisely and properly in treating such money as capital, and not revenue, and in devoting it to the purpose for which the bonds were issued and the loan raised. The position of the Government was, that the House sanctioned the expenditure of a large sum to be raised by loan, and to be repaid by devoting a portion of the revenue year by year, for the payment of the principal and the interest, and the House authorized the Government to raise the money by means of bonds available for that particular purpose. He took it to be the duty of the Government to see that whatever money was realized by these bonds should be applied to the specific purpose for which the bonds were issued, and that if they sold the bonds at £110, they were not to put the £10 premium in their pockets, or apply it to any other purpose. It should be used for the object for which it was raised. By this means they would not give rise to delusive impressions with respect to the revenue, by treating as revenue that which was in reality capital. To act in any other way was opposed to the spirit and the letter of the law, and would be a grievous financial blunder. Indeed, he was surprised to find that a gentleman, who had been himself a finance Minister, should make so great a blunder as to quarrel with the policy of the Government on this matter. The Government was not in favor of creating a sinking fund, but of preventing the necessity for one, and that was what they would do. They would avail themselves of the increased price of the bonds to save South Australia the necessity of borrowing all the money which they were authorized to borrow, and which under the other system suggested they would have to borrow. He would now offer a word or two on what had been said during the personal discussion. In doing so his observations would be very short, but inasmuch as these remarks were of a personal character, and had been made under circumstances which had previously prevented him from replying, he felt he would not be doing justice to himself or those with whom he acted if he did not now say something in answer to them. The hon member for the Sturt had said that when he was called upon to join the Ministry of which the Hon the Chief Secretary (Mr Younghusband) was Premier, he had had a conversation with him (the Attorney-General), and referred to what took place in that conversation.

Mr Reynolds rose to order. He thought the discussion had closed, as he would not have the right to reply.

The Chairman ruled that the Hon the Attorney-General was in order. The discussion had been initiated by the hon member (Mr Reynolds.)

The Attorney-General.—The hon member had referred to a private conversation, but as he (the Attorney-General) did not keep shorthand notes and records of all his private conversations, he did not pretend to remember every conversation with particularity, and even if he did, he should feel bound in honor, and as a tribute to the principles which bind gentlemen to one another, not to repeat one word of what passed in such conversation. (Hear, hear.) He would not therefore refer to private conversations, he had not done so but he would speak of the public conduct of Mr Younghusband in reference to the present Administration, which he (the Attorney-General) had formed. He was most anxious to have at the head of that Administration a Chief Secretary who should have a seat in that House, and with that view he had spoken to almost all the members with whom he associated himself in public business. He found, however, that he could not get a Chief Secretary in that House, unless he was prepared to take the office himself. He was not wealthy enough to do that, and he was not prepared to make the sacrifice of his professional practice which it would entail. He could not have formed an Administration unless by giving the Chief Secretaryship to Mr Younghusband. He believed, and that belief was shared by all whom he had consulted, and he was certain was held by all who joined the Ministry, that in taking Mr Younghusband as a colleague they had a gentleman who possessed the confidence of the House and the country. When it was said that the appointment of Mr Younghusband was temporary, he could only say that there was nothing whatever in what took place which would entitle any person connected with the Administration to say to the Chief Secretary that he was only there for a temporary purpose, and that he must retire. On the contrary he (the Attorney-General) had joined the Administration believing that Mr Younghusband had been selected for the office because he was competent for it, and that the inconvenience of having the Chief Secretary in the Upper House was inevitable. He (the Attorney-General) as having formed the Administration, should of course have felt himself at liberty in the event of any difference of opinion between himself and the Chief Secretary, to advise His Excellency upon such a matter, but until some difference of this nature arose, so long as any gentleman filled the office of Chief Secretary, it was due to him, and to all the Administration, that he should exercise the functions and powers of his office. It was due to him that he should be really as well as nominally, the head of the Executive. When Mr Younghusband took the position of Chief Secretary, there was no intention that he should occupy any position other than that which he nominally held. With regard to "ruling the roast," in all matters in which he (the Attorney-General) had consulted with Mr Younghusband, he had had occasion to appreciate his judgment, ability, and fairness, and he was not aware that in any opinion which that hon. gentleman had given, or in any act he had advised, he had advised or acted in contradiction or violation of the principles which were professed by the Administration when he took office, or when it was originally founded. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reynolds) or any hon. gentleman could say that in any public act—in any act done as a Government—since the Administration was formed, it had been false to its principles, that its members had violated the pledges which they had made, let him make a charge against them; and if the charge was proved, let the Administration be dismissed from office. He had no desire to retain office longer than he possessed the confidence of the House, for it was the confidence of the House which had placed him in the position he held, and that position was only valuable so long as the same confidence retained him in it. The hon. member had on several occasions referred to his (the Attorney-General's) being connected with the Chief Commissioner of Railways, but it was not he (the Attorney-General) who had put that gentleman in the position either of Engineer-in-Chief of the Railways or in that of Chief Commissioner. Undoubtedly, when it was proposed that the Engineer of the Railways should be the Commissioner, in order that the salary of a Commissioner might be saved, he had acquiesced in the recommendation to that effect to His Excellency, but the appointment did not come either directly or indirectly from him, otherwise than as sanctioning the appointment proposed by one of his colleagues. At the same time there was nothing in the relationship between that gentleman and himself, which should prevent him (the Attorney-General) from doing that gentleman justice, and from supporting him when he believed him to be in the right. Had a stranger been in the office, and had an attempt been made to place him in a false position and to treat him with injustice, he (the Attorney-General) would support him; and he would not be deterred from doing so now, merely because the gentleman who occupied the position was related to himself. Let the hon. member bring the matter fairly before the House, and let him show that he (the Attorney-General) had ever given the Commissioner of Railways any support which he would not have given to any other person in that gentleman's position, and then he (the Attorney-General) would submit to any condemnation which the House might pronounce against him. But for his part, he believed that it would be very difficult to find in this hemisphere a person better fitted for the position which he held than the Chief Commissioner of Railways. From all he had heard, no person comparing the construction and management of our railways with those of the other colonies could fail to see that ours were superior, and he (the Attorney-General) claimed for the Chief Commissioner some share of the merit of the construction and management of our lines. His hon. friend the present Treasurer, who was then Chief Secretary, had been influenced by the knowledge that that gentleman was the only one to be found in the colony who had large practical experience in the management of railways in England, when making the appointment. The Chief Commissioner had been engaged in the construction of railways in England, and in addition to this he had been for seven years engaged in the management of two of the most important lines in that country; and it was believed that his experience in these capacities would qualify him for the appointment which was given to him. He regretted having to allude to this matter, but he found that in every speech which the hon. member for the Sturt had made, he had alluded to the fraternal feeling—he had not asserted anything. Heaven forbid that he should assert anything; but he had thrown out insinuations as to the fraternal feeling existing between him (the Attorney-General) and the Chief Commissioner of Railways. He alluded to this matter because he found that what he at first took for a mere ebullition of spleen now appeared intended as a deliberate ground of personal attack against himself. The hon. member had referred in his remarks to the amended tender, and he said he did not assert that there was any collusion between the Railway Board and the persons sending in the tender. He (Mr. Reynolds) had said so because he knew perfectly well that the facts of the case distinctly repelled any such insinuations; but when the hon. member said he would not make any charge of collusion he knew that people would think that there were grounds, if he chose to do so, for making the charge; and this was the meaning of the insinuation. The reason why the hon. member did not make a charge was, that he knew that the circumstances of the case would repel any charge of collusion. He did not know whether it would be necessary for him to refer to this matter again; but as the House was in Committee, he could, if necessary, do so. He would now enter on a new matter. The hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) had referred to one matter mentioned in the correspondence. That hon. member excused the hon. member for the Sturt for not consulting his colleagues, on the ground that he could not find them; and asked, "how could he consult them when he could not find them?" He (the Attorney-General) did not know that the hon. member (Mr. Reynolds) was unable to write, and one use of writing was supposed to be that it enabled a person to communicate with persons whom he could not see. (A laugh.) And if the hon. member could not find his colleagues at their offices, why did he not write to them? which it appeared he had not done. For his part, with the exception of one week, there was not a week from the time of the prorogation of the Legislature up to the present time, during which time he had not been on four or five days in Adelaide. Besides, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reynolds) knew where he lived, and he believed was in the habit of passing his (the Attorney-General's) house going in to and coming out from town, and yet he was not aware of any desire of that hon. gentleman's to see him or any of the gentlemen who acted with him in the Government. It was, therefore, idle to say that there was any inability on the part of the hon. gentleman to consult with his colleagues. He was sorry to occupy the time of the House; but he had adverted to these matters because it was right that on the same day as such charges were made they should be replied to, and, if necessary, he should address the House again, and he had no doubt he would be able to reply satisfactorily to any charges which might be brought against him.

MR. REYNOLDS, after the observations of the hon. gentleman and the feeling which the House had shewn on the matter, would take an early opportunity of laying before hon. members, though not in the precise form suggested by the hon. member for Onkaparinga, the facts of the case. He should not act on the suggestion of that hon. member, for it was not his wish to put the hon. gentlemen opposite out of office, but he would frame his motion in such a manner that the House would have the opportunity of censuring either himself, or the hon. gentlemen opposite. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member (the Attorney-General) said that he need have had no difficulty in consulting his colleagues, that he could have written to them; but where was he to write to? It amounted to this, that the Commissioner of Public Works was to be the drudge of the Cabinet, and he was to hunt up where his colleagues were. Was he to write to the Goolwa or Cox's Creek, and was he to be at the expense of a messenger there? (Oh! oh!) But he would leave that to another day, when there would be a fair opportunity of discussing it all. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Reynolds) knew there was no collusion between the persons on the railways and the contractors. He did not believe there was any collusion between the hon. the Chief Commissioner and Engineer, and the parties who sent in the tenders, and he had said so. The hon. member had also said that he (Mr. Reynolds) had referred to private conversations, but the hon. Attorney-General himself had challenged him to do so, and he would not have referred to them but that the hon. gentleman had challenged his memory on the point. He must say, in reply to the remarks of the hon. the Attorney-General, that he had never understood that the hon. the Chief Secretary was to be Premier, but thought it was the Attorney-General himself who was to occupy that position; and, as he had said that morning, if he had known that Mr. Younghusband was to be Premier, bearing in mind the antecedents of that gentleman, he would not have had him as his leader, though he was satisfied to accept the Attorney-General as his leader. This was all he considered it necessary to say at present, for he would not allow the Attorney-General to bring him out, as it was the object of that hon. gentleman to do, before his case was entirely prepared. The hon. gentleman came there as an advocate, but he (Mr. Reynolds) would take the opportunity before another week of dealing with this matter; and, as he had said the other day, he would battle out this question as one which affected the public interest. The Attorney-General had charged him with indulging in insinuations, and complained that he (Mr. Reynolds) charged him with being actuated by fraternal feelings, but had not the hon. Attorney-General even charged him (Mr. Reynolds) with being actuated by personal feeling, and how then could he twit him (Mr. Reynolds) for attributing fraternal feeling. It amounted to this, that it was right for the Attorney-General to charge him with personal feeling, but it was not right for him (Mr. Reynolds) to twit the Attorney-General with fraternal feeling. But why should he have any personal feeling in the matter? He might have sat on the ministerial benches still if he had chosen, for he believed that his colleagues were not anxious for him to leave; but there were great public interests at stake, and he said that nothing but a bold stroke on his part would enable him to expose the gross deficiencies of the Government Departments. Passing now to the matter before the House—a matter of 40*l.* for additional assistance to the Private Secretary—(a laugh)—he did not see the necessity for this, and unless the hon. the Treasurer could make out a better case for it than he had yet done, he should vote against it. The previous Private Secretary had performed all the duties for £300 a year, whilst the present gentleman had £400, and he thought if the present Private Secretary were not capable of performing the duty at £400, they should get a more efficient man for the purpose.

The TREASURER had nothing to add to what he had already said on this vote, but rose to reply to some remarks of the hon. member for the Port. That hon. member found fault with the statement which he (the Treasurer) had made, and said that with respect to the Customs revenue that he (the Treasurer) had spoken of the prosperous state of that revenue, whilst at the same time he had admitted a falling off of £11,000 in that department. He might have mentioned another portion of his (the Treasurer's) remarks. Mr. Hughes had alluded to the programme in the Governor's speech and the arguments made use of in reference to it, and had congratulated the hon member on the statement which he had since made to the House He had said that there was an increase in the revenue which was not so large as in former years, but whilst the revenue maintained its ground as compared with former years, and exceeded the estimates, he thought there was no ground for complaint The hon member had alluded to the Audit Office, and stated how easy it would be to obtain all the information which he (the Treasurer) required He thought the hon member after filling the place which he (the Treasurer) now occupied, would have been competent to speak as an authority on the matter, but he could not have taken the interest which might be supposed in it, or he would not have made such a statement, for the information referred to was not to be had at the Audit Office, but in the Customs department, for it was in reference to the Customs revenue he had said that he had had considerable labor in making his computations The hon member had spoken of a sum of 17,000*l* profit on exchanges which the late Treasurer had stated was in the hands of the Emigration Commissioners This information was in the hands of the Auditor-General, where those accounts were kept, and to whom the hon gentleman had referred as a model In that office it was proved that a sum of 17,279*l* on exchequer bill transactions for a series of years, remained in the hands of the Commissioners, and that was the only statement which he understood to have been made on the subject But whatever the statements on this point might be, he (the Treasurer) was not responsible for them as he had never made them, but no accountant could contradict the statement that the Land and Immigration Commissioners had a balance in their hands The hon member had said that he (the Treasurer) admitted a great falling off of one of the principal articles of colonial industry, but there, again, he was mistaken, for he had shown by the Customs returns that, taking the year ended 31st June last, there was an increase in the principal staples of 75,544*l*, and that of that increase 16,814*l* was due to the exportation of flour and wheat But the hon member set aside that statement because it showed that the colony was prospering, and adverted to the fact that during the last six months of this year the exports of wheat did not realize as much as in the last six months of the previous year He admitted the falling off there, but on the year there was a balance of 75,000*l* in favor of the country He believed these were the only points which the hon member had made which he required to meet With regard to the sinking fund argument, it had been taken up so well by the Attorney-General that it was unnecessary for him to go into it He quite agreed with that hon gentleman that they should not carry to the credit of the revenue any profit derived from the sale of bonds With respect to the premium on the bonds, he had been advised that they had realised 11*l* per cent, selling at 111*l*, and he had heard on good authority that they had realised even 112*l*

Mr BARROW said that, although the House acknowledged the importance of the subjects which had been brought before it, hon members must see the inconvenience of the course which had been pursued The question before the House was an item of 40*l* for extra clerical assistance in the Private Secretary's Office, and they had heard a great deal on all kinds of subjects, so that at one time it might be supposed that they were listening to the reply to His Excellency's speech, and at another to a vote of confidence or no confidence in the Administration (Hear, hear) These topics were all of great importance, but it would save the time of the House if they were brought on in their proper course, and if they were not introduced as irrelevant matter If they were brought forward in this way, hon members who wished to speak on them must either remain silent and so be compromised, or occupy the time of the House to an unreasonable extent There were, undoubtedly, several topics connected with the late changes of Ministry of great interest but they should be discussed at their proper time He would now address himself to the only question really before them The item which they were at present considering would affect many other items It involved the question of additional assistance in the various departments If the Government made out a case for granting this additional assistance, of course the House would gladly grant it but when they had to decide whether the Private Secretary was overtasked or not, he wanted to know what the Chief Commissioner of Public Works, having resigned his office, had to do with the matter (Laughter) He (Mr Barrow) was in the dark as to the overwhelming character of the work of the Private Secretary, but the present item was one of several similar, for a little lower down he found on the same page £50 for additional assistance to the Auditor-General's office, and that amount might certainly be required, or so might the present vote but he wanted to know why they were required There was also 20*l* additional labor at the Colonial Store, when required He admired the contingency expressed in the words "when required," for the assistance might never be required There was another item of £20 for extra clerical assistance for the Supreme Court but if they could complete their labors at the Supreme Court with £20 worth of additional assistance, he thought they could very nearly complete it without any assistance. He did not mean to say the assistance was not wanted in many cases, or that it might not be in all but he would point out that they were about to affirm the principle, and leaving the knotty points which had been discussed during the afternoon, he would like to know something more about this item, and about the various other items of similar character

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL differed from the hon member in one respect, namely, in his opinion that the decision to which the House might come on this item would necessarily pledge it in any other case which would come before it, but he would refer to the department of the Attorney-General, which afforded an appropriate illustration of the circumstance which rendered the present item necessary Hon members were aware that the chief Government work was done by persons constantly and permanently employed, with regular salaries, but in his department it would require two or three additional hands at times to do all the work, though these would only be employed for three or four days in every month It was thought better therefore, that 200*l* or 250*l* should be voted for the department and then the salaries of two, or, perhaps, three additional clerks could be dispensed with The first item then under consideration was placed on the Estimates at the suggestion of His Excellency, who had stated that his Private Secretary could not get through the work He (the Attorney-General) could understand that this was something like his own department, and that a press of business came on just when the mail was about to start, from the necessity of copying despatches and other documents which a person might not be able to get through with in time, but which did not require or justify a large addition to the Estimates

Mr PEAKE would support the vote, for while not yielding to the hon member for East Torrens, in enforcing economy in the public service, he felt that when the House gave its confidence to four or five gentlemen, and placed them in possession of the seats of the Government, these gentlemen had an amount of responsibility, and were entitled to some amount of respect, and that when they placed an amount on the Estimates the House should give them the credit of supposing that they would not put a sum on the Estimates which was not wanted When he (Mr Peake) came to think that the gentlemen on the Treasury benches put £10 or any other sum on the Estimates, when it was not wanted, he would square yards with them in another way —(laughter)—for when the House thought the Ministers would waste £40 of the public money, the sooner they were told "you are not wanted in the department you fill" the better

Mr NEALES said if the argument of the last hon member was worth anything, the House ought not to waste time considering the Estimates at all He wanted hon gentlemen to show him that this 40*l* was necessary, and if they did not he should not vote for it although he would not vote the Ministry out or "square yards" with them in that way When he found that the gentleman who filled this office had a much larger salary than the gentleman who filled it before, and filled it efficiently, and when he found that the present gentleman held office on the Education Board, he thought they must dispense with his services at that Board In mercantile affairs, when the foreign post was going they worked harder, they did not subsidise men from the next office to do the work He would go with the hon member for East Torrens and vote that some of these items be struck out He was sorry to begin with a small one, but if they did not take care of the pence they would soon lose many pounds

Mr HART would vote against the motion He agreed with the hon member for East Torrens that it was very wrong to bring charges against the Ministry when their conduct was not under consideration, and to waste the time of the House by introducing matter wholly irrelevant to the question before them It was very bad taste, and as during absence from the House some observations had been made respecting himself, which were not merely in bad taste but something more, he should now reply to them The hon member might have waited until he (Mr Hart) was in his place before making accusations against him, for to act otherwise was not doing what gentlemen usually did With regard to the remarks which had been made, he was perfectly ready at all times to explain clearly to the hon member or those gentlemen who acted with him, the statements which he (Mr Hart) had made He believed that upon no occasion had he ever made a statement which he failed to justify, and when he had been called upon by that hon gentleman himself (Mr Hughes) to fill the post of Treasurer, a post which he had filled during two Administrations, he could not think that gentleman could believe that he had left office because he was unable to fill it, or because he had failed to fill it with credit to himself

Mr HUGHES enquired whom the hon member alluded to?

Mr HART—To the hon member himself (Mr Hughes) The words had been taken down by a friend of his (Mr Hart's) and they were—that the discovery said to have been made by the late Treasurer of a large sum of money in the hands of the Emigration Commissioners was "entirely a creation of the late Treasurer's own imagination" That was the accusation, which not being in the House at the time it was made, he had had no opportunity of rebutting, and it would have been a more courteous, if not more manly way to have made the remarks when he (Mr Hart) was in the House But the fact was that he (Mr Hart) had taken the hon member and showed him the books, and pointed out this sum and the hon member expressed himself perfectly satisfied with them He (Mr Hart) was not in the habit of saying what was not true, and he thought the House would believe him, especially when he mentioned that the Assistant Treasurer was present, and saw the books, and pointed out the account If the hon member thought that he (Mr Hart) received the pay of the Treasury without giving proper value for it why not bring a charge against him, as he (Mr Hart) had made a charge against a former Treasurer, and proved to the satisfaction of the House that there had been considerable loss in consequence of that gentleman's mismanagement Let the hon member enquire into the management of the Treasury department whilst he (Mr Hart) was at the head of it, and he would defy that hon gentleman to find fault with or improve it It was highly inconvenient to have these discussions, as he found when he was called upon unexpectedly to make an explanation which he could have done more fully and clearly if he had been prepared for it He should oppose the 40*l*

Mr HUGHES hoped the House would allow him to reply to the most unjust attack which had been made on him by the late Treasurer (Oh!) He understood why the sum in question did not appear to the credit of the colony, as from the mode of management of the bonds the money could not accumulate, and on the other hand there was an expenditure which had not been brought to book at all, which would balance it

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the vote

The CHAIRMAN put the question, and declared the item to be lost

The next item was 35*l* for the office of the Chief Secretary

The TREASURER explained that this sum was wanted for furniture

Agreed to

The next item was additional assistance, Audit Department, 50*l*

The TREASURER could only, in reference to this vote, repeat the argument which had previously been used on that side of the House The office was one of the best worked, and one in which the clerks were most assiduous

The item was agreed to

The next item 794*l* 15s for the Police Department, was agreed to, as were also the following —Gaols, 50*l*, convicts, 30*l*, Post-Office, 2*l* 3s 4d, education, 10*l*

The next item, Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, 211*l* 10s, was agreed to

The following items were agreed to after some slight discussions —Payment to vaccinators, £200, destitute poor, £264 6s 4d, colonial store, £80 public offices, £75, military, £150 law officers' department, £272 10s

The House then resumed and the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again the following day

RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL

On the motion of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works the Bill for the extension of the Railway from the 12th section to Kapunda was read a first time, and the second reading fixed for this day week

CONFIRMATION OF REGISTRATION BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL this Bill was read a second time

The Bill was passed through Committee without amendment, the House having resumed, the report was adopted, and the third reading made an order of the day for Thursday

The House then adjourned

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8

The SPEAKER took the chair at five minutes past one o clock

COAL BORING

Mr NEALES presented a petition from James Thompson, a coal miner, which was read by the Clerk of the House It set forth that in 1850 the petitioner was digging a well at North Adelaide, when at a depth of 100 feet, he came upon unmistakeable indications of there being coal at a greater depth Subsequently he applied to the Corporation for permission to bore upon the Park Lands in the vicinity, and there discovered similar indications, but he was, unfortunately, not in a position to continue the search, and he now prayed the House to set aside funds for continuing the search

COAL FIELD

Mr NEALES presented a petition from 250 tradesmen of Adelaide, residing in Hindley, Morphett, Grenfell, and Rundle streets, praying the House to accede to the petition of James Thompson and devote a sum of money towards the accomplishment of so desirable an object as the discovery of an available coal-field

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN RAILWAY

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table of the House correspondence relative to the construction of trucks and other property on the South Australian Railway It was the correspondence which had been alluded to on the previous day

Ordered to be printed

ARTESIAN WELLS

Upon the motion of Mr MACDERMOTT the House went into Committee for the consideration of the motion in his name -

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that a sufficient sum may be placed on the Estimates to secure the services of a geological Surveyor, with special reference to his knowledge and experience in boring for water on the artesian principle, and that an efficient party be organized, to be permanently employed in boring in such localities as he may indicate, as offering a reasonable prospect of success, under such regulations as His Excellency in Executive Council may from time to time approve"

He might venture to describe the northern portion of this colony as an arid country, where, from the deficiency of surface water, large tracts of land could not be occupied, either for the habitation of man, or for pastoral purposes And yet, he fully believed that fountains of pure waters were flowing in subterranean passages through the porous strata of the country, running to waste until they mingled with the great ocean Those waters, by the aid of skill and science, might be brought to the surface, and made available to enrich and fertilize the land They had recently heard of the great success of the French, in finding water in the deserts of Algeria And it would be difficult to over-estimate the value of such discoveries in South Australia which, if abundantly watered, would become one of the finest countries in this hemisphere He believed that a portion of the public revenue could not be better expended than in organizing an efficient party, under skilful scientific direction, to be permanently employed in boring for water on the artesian principle And he thought such expenditure would be amply remunerative, by largely increasing their staple products, and preparing the country for the maintenance of a dense population A large expenditure, however, might be incurred without any beneficial result, unless they could secure the services of a man of practical experience in such operations He understood that there was a class of men to be found in England, who had devoted their special attention to the scientific construction of artesian wells, from which class the selection should certainly be made But in a great mineral country such as this, they might reasonably hope to combine with their primary object a scientific mineralogical and geological survey of the province Many hon members were aware of the existence of the celebrated artesian well at Grenelle, in Paris, but it might be interesting to others to be informed that its depth was 1820 English feet, lined all through with pipes eight inches in diameter The water was forced by means of gravitation through a pipe to the top of a tower 200 feet above the surface, from whence it descended through other pipes, by which it was distributed through three quarters of the city of Paris, the supply being about 750,000 gallons per day, and the cost of that great work was only 12,000*l* Such wells would be extremely valuable at Port Adelaide and other populous places in the colony A difficulty would doubtless arise from the extent to which portions of this country were impregnated with salt But they should not be discouraged from that fact, as he was informed that several artesian wells which have been recently made in London, and which produced good water, yielded salt water only in the first instance Those salt springs, however, could be shut out, and better water found at a lower depth, or the water would ultimately become fresh from the preponderance of fresh water and the gradual dissipation of the saline particles contained in the soil He had also heard of several common wells which had been sunk on the back runs of the River Murray, which at first produced salt water And, although they were still a little brackish, yet the sheep and cattle which were watered from them, were found to thrive remarkably well At Augusta, which had become the shipping port of a very large district, and was likely to become a place of importance, no fresh water was to be found within a distance of 13 miles A party had been recently sent to that place with a boring apparatus, but the piping was found unsuitable While waiting the arrival of fresh pipes the party commenced boring in an old well which had dried up (Minchin's), at a place within five miles of Port Augusta, and in a short time they tapped a spring, when the water rose 17 feet and was found to be excellent, although a well of salt water existed within 200 yards of the spot The value of this discovery to the northern districts was very great, and it was to be hoped that good water would yet be found at Augusta itself He trusted this important subject would sufficiently commend itself to the hon members without any further observations of his, and he therefore concluded by moving the adoption of the address standing in his name on the notice-paper

Captain HART seconded the motion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL wished, before the question was put, to make a few observations He did not say that he rose for the purpose of offering any opposition to the motion, supposing the House should think it wise to incur so great an expenditure as that which was unquestionably involved in the motion now before it He thought the House should well consider whether they would agree to a resolution which clearly involved the fetching out from England of a person presumed to be qualified, but of whose qualification they would have no means of judging, at a very considerable expense, direct and immediate and under circumstances, too, which would certainly involve the colony in the payment of this gentleman's salary for a certain number of years, independently of keeping on foot an expensive establishment of borers with the necessary apparatus He should imagine that the motion involved at least a cost of £2,000 or £3,000 a year to the colony, and it was for the House to say, whether it was advisable to incur such a positive expenditure for the chance of the advantages which were supposed likely to result—for the mere chance of securing those advantages As he had before said, he should offer no opposition to the motion, if the House agreed to it, he thought, however, the House should not be led away by the possible advantages, but that they should keep in mind the positive expenditure

Mr MILDRED felt bound to oppose the motion upon several grounds In the first place he must join issue with the mover as to South Australia being the sterile arid country which he had described it to be From where they were then sitting to a distance of 250 miles up the Murray, the country was not as it had been described The pioneers of civilization went further with their flocks and herds, and in most cases they came to water These were the men who made the most important discoveries from time to time, and initiated the advantages of South Australia The last report, indeed, they had received from Mr Babbage, showed that he had received more valuable and specific information from the managers of various stations than had been obtained from the party who had been paid to go pic-nic-ing (Laughter) From Lake Torrens to Port Lincoln, and from Port Lincoln to Streaky Bay, there was, generally speaking, water At Yorke's Peninsula it was well known there was a sufficient supply, and when he found that going as far as Mr, Babbage had gone, and further, that there was a supply of water, and when he knew that flocks were brought from Port Lincoln across Lake Torrens, it would be making "ducks and drakes" of the public money to squander it by sending home to England for a scientific party to test the artesian principle If the motion had been brought forward a long time since with the view of testing the artesian system in the city of Adelaide, thus preventing the expenditure—he would not say an unwise expenditure on the Waterworks now progressing—he should have advocated it but he could see no reason now for agreeing to the motion, seeing that Mr Babbage was employed, and that persons were making discoveries in connection with the subject from week to week He denied that the country was arid as it had been described, certainly in those portions to which he had alluded there was a sufficient supply of water, and it would be folly to expend money upon further searches in those localities Scarcely a year passed over without new discoveries, and as there were springs from where they were then assembled to the far north, he considered it his duty to oppose the motion. With regard to the water which had been spoken of near Port Augusta, he visited that spot in the spring Within a few miles was also Minchin's Well, in which there was a small quantity of water He was exceedingly glad to hear there was 17 feet of water in the spring known as Minchin's Well, but that, he thought, must have arisen from the surface drainage There was water there unquestionably, but the quantity was the thing With regard to Port Augusta, the time might come when it would be desirable to make some attempts amongst the sands, and the attempt might possibly succeed It would be premature under existing circumstances to involve the country in such an expenditure as that which would be requisite if this motion were carried, and he should consequently feel bound to oppose it

Mr REYNOLDS would be quite willing to support a vote for a sum of money for boring for water in a particular locality, but he was opposed to forming a new department for the purpose of boring for water and establishing a department under the Geological Surveyor He was certainly not prepared to go to that extent Besides they already had a Geological Surveyor, Mr Babbage having been sent out, specially imported, as was stated by an hon member for that very purpose There might be some doubt whether he was really up to the mark and capable of undertaking such a matter as that referred to in the motion If any particular localities could be pointed out where it was desirable to bore, he should be happy to give the proposition his support, but he was certainly not prepared to establish a new department—a boring department—without any indications as to where their efforts were likely to prove successful He was glad to hear that the depth of water in Minchin's well was 17 feet it was certainly new to him, as he believed the depth to be about seven If it had increased it shewed that there was a new spring, but it was possible as the spring had been struck in the summer time He hoped the Commissioner of Public Works would inform the House as to the success of the undertakings at Port Augusta, for he felt a deep interest in the subject He should be happy to find that the piping which had been ordered specially upon the recommendation of the Colonial Architect answered the purpose As the motion at present stood he felt bound to vote against it

Captain HART thought the motion might be altered with some advantage The question was one of very great importance, and he confessed that all which had been said upon the subject, in his opinion, rather strengthened the position of the mover The hon gentleman who had last sat down said that if the hon mover would point out where there was any reasonable probability of boring being attended with success, he would vote for a sum of money being appropriated for the purpose That hon gentleman had taken a great interest in the question, and he was sure he would admit that what they wanted to know was where the water was He apprehended that the very object of the mover of this motion was to ascertain this Another strong argument in favor of the motion was, that it did not bind them to the appointment of a geological surveyor, or any one whom they were not perfectly satisfied was equal to the task which he undertook to perform, but the matter would be left with the Executive Council to make the appointment whenever they could find a suitable person They would employ this gentleman, he apprehended, upon localities which were considered most suitable, and which the Executive approved of as advisable spots at which the experiments should be made But the strongest argument of all in favor of the motion was, that it was proposed to tax the sheep-farmers of this country, and it would be well to shew that class that that House merely wished to tax them for the purpose of making them bear a portion of the burden incurred specially for their benefit (Laughter) It had been shewn by a Council Paper recently laid upon the table of the House, that a sum of £20,000 had been expended in the colony for the benefit of sheep-farmers, and that was a strong argument in favor of the assessment on stock The present motion would be a strong argument in support of that assessment, as it would shew to the sheep-farmers that the House were prepared to increase the advantages which they at present enjoyed, and enable them to extend their flocks and herds over those portions of the country which they could not at present make available for want of water The hon member, Mr Mildred, had said the question was, where should they bore for water Unquestionably that was the question of all others If that were ascertained, the House would at once, he was sure, vote the necessary funds, but how could they possibly tell where to bore if they did not employ a scientific person to point out the particular spots Even within a short distance of Adelaide an hon member, who usually sat at his right, informed him that considerable sums had been expended in sinking wells for the purpose of obtaining water, to render available a large tract of country between the Burra and the Murray A large portion of this otherwise available country could not be made use of for want of water If the Geological Surveyor would point out where water could be got, and it was actually obtained, he apprehended that every run would maintain a greater number of sheep A large additional revenue would accrue to the colony from these lands being made available He thought they had been groping about in the dark, and that if they could get scientific knowledge to assist them, it would be most desirable No argument had been adduced to convince him that it would be necessary to send to England for a competent person He was by no means convinced that it would not be possible to obtain a perfectly competent person nearer home If they advertised it was quite possible that they might find a perfectly competent person at their very doors If they could by the aid of scientific knowledge have pointed out to them where water was to be obtained, it would be a blessing to the colony

Mr HAWKER, before the motion was put, suggested to the hon mover that he should strike out the words, "permanently employed"

Mr MACDERMOTT adopted the suggestion

Mr HAWKER had no doubt that great benefit would be derived by the colony, particularly by those residing in the remote districts, if it could be ascertained that water was below the surface At present wells were frequently sunk to a depth of 170, or even 210 feet, without any water being attained Every settler could not get the necessary apparatus and the men who understood the work Large tracts of land were rendered utterly useless, although there was splendid feed for sheep or cattle, in consequence of there being no water near the surface He particularly alluded to a large extent of country in the western portions, near Port Augusta and on the north-east of the Burra, between the Burra and the Murray A well in that locality had been sunk by Mr Campbell a depth of 120 feet, when he came to salt water, but he thought if he could have got through the rock he would have come to fresh, and, if he had, that station alone would have carried 6,000 or 8,000 sheep, There were many similar instances in other parts of the colony, there were many portions in which there was splendid feed but no water, and the consequence was that country of this character was valueless to the sheepfarmer Sheepfarmers had in many instances gone to enormous expense in endeavouring to obtain water It was considered by some that sheep-farming was all profit, but if a Select Committee were appointed to enquire into the subject it would be found that thousands and thousands of pounds had been expended in attempts to procure water He believed that it would be quite possible to find many persons here who understood the practical portion of boring, and he did not think it would be absolutely necessary that they should have a scientific person They might render available the knowledge which they had already gained, and as a general rule it was known that within a certain distance of high ranges there was a better chance of getting water than further away from them If boring took place upon a squatter's run, he felt assured that the squatter would be very happy to pay the cost whether the experiment were successful or not The squatters would be very glad that there should be some party appointed by the Government for the purpose of making the necessary experiments, and such a course would he had no doubt not only be largely beneficial to individuals, but would render available a large portion of country at present valueless

Mr BARROW thought that the object which the hon mover had in view must commend itself to every member of that House, but he did not think that the hon gentleman had adopted the best course to carry out his object (Hear, hear) If they were to have another Geological Surveyor imported from England, not only would there necessarily arise a large expenditure of money, but there would be a great loss of time, as pending the arrival of this scientific gentleman, no proceedings under the resolution before the House could be taken Nor would the Geological Surveyor be in a position to commence operations immediately upon his arrival, it being absolutely essential before doing so that he should make himself acquainted with the physical features of the country (Hear, hear) The first objection which he saw to the motion had been removed by what the proposer had consented to strike out, and if instead of asking for the appointment of a Geological Surveyor from England, he would move that the Surveyor-General be required to report as to the most likely spots at which to meet with these subterranean springs, he (Mr Barrow) would support the proposition (Hear, hear) He apprehended the Surveyor-General could see quite as far below the surface as the Geological Surveyor, and, without depreciating geological science, he would venture to suggest that the experience of many in the colony would enable them to determine where to bore with the greatest probability of success If the hon mover would adopt that suggestion, he believed he would obtain unanimous support He should dispense with the importation of a Geological Surveyor, and avail himself instead of the experience of the colony, merely moving that a sufficient sum be placed upon the Estimates to defray the expenses of a boring party (Hear, hear)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought that, with the suggestion of the last and other speakers, the House would be enabled to come to a unanimous vote upon this subject His principal object in rising was to give an answer to a question which had been suggested to him by the hon member for the Sturt, in reference to the borings at Port Augusta There had been an attempt at boring at Port Augusta, of a very important character, and he might observe that Port Augusta was a very rising place The boring party sunk to a depth of 95 feet, and the boring apparatus was then discontinued, pending the receipt of pipes Some pipes had been obtained from a neighbouring colony but not sufficient for the purpose required, nor was the quality good It would be observed that the sum of £200 had been placed upon the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of procuring the necessary pipes Sinking these 95 feet, and the operations upon Minchin's well, had cost £506, and it was believed that a sufficient supply of water would be obtained from these sources He thought that if the hon mover would leave out the words in his motion, "permanent employment," and would also dispense with the importation of a Geological Surveyor, that great benefit might result from a sum of money being placed on the Estimates sufficient to pay the expenses of boring where there was a probability of obtaining water

Mr LINDSAY supported the motion, not because he did not think it was not possible to expend the money more beneficially, but because there was so much annually wasted, that he should like to see some usefully expended (Laughter) The amount mentioned by the Attorney-General as being probably involved in this motion would, he considered, be "well" expended It had been said that the country generally was a well-watered country, and not sterile and arid, but the same might be said of Algeria for thousands of years past, but since the French had bored artesian wells in it, the country had been far better than it ever had been in the hands of the Turks He knew many parts which were terribly deficient of fresh water, though the soil was good, and the country could readily have been made available but for the want of water He agreed with hon member for Noarlunga, in reference to the water supply of Adelaide The hon mover had stated that the artesian well which supplied three-fourths of Paris with water only cost £12,000, but three times that sum would have been well expended if the water could have been obtained in Victoria square If a proper artesian system had been suggested in the first instance, he should have liked it far better than the present Waterworks scheme, which was now likely to prove abortive A good deal had been said about the difficulty of obtaining a proper person to superintend operations of this character It was unquestionably desirable that there should be a proper scientific supervision in order to avoid such an error as that into which the Government fell on one occasion by sending a party to bore through granite, in the hope of finding a coal-field Any one who understood the elements of geoloy would avoid such an error as that He was happy to support the motion

Mr BAGOT rose to move an amendment with the view of carrying out the suggestions of the hon member for East Torrens, by the insertion of the words "under the department of the Surveyor-General" If the motion was passed in its present form, he was satisfied the Executive Council would take the opportunity of creating another department, for there was that in Executive Councils or Ministries, that if they could create another department they invariably would He was particularly desirous of guarding against the creation of another department, as it appeared they were to have a new one every year Last year they had a most expensive one He thought the boring should be under the superintendence of the Surveyor-General, and consequently moved the insertion of the words he had named

Mr MACDERMOTT also adopted this suggestion

Captain HART suggested that the Geological Surveyor should be under the Surveyor General

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought if this question were to be entertained at all, the better way would be simply to move that an address be presented to His Excellency, praying that a sum be placed on the Estimates sufficient for the organization of a party to be employed upon localities where it was deemed desirable to bore He would state what appeared objectionable in principle to the employment of a Geological Surveyor The party would not probably be employed where water did not exist at the present time It would be unwise to expend money to bore where there was sufficient surface-water at the present time, no matter how great the probabilities might be of a further supply being obtained by boring In other places, again, the advantages of obtaining a supply of water would be so great that that it might be desirable to expend money in boring for the mere chance of obtaining water no matter how slight the indications might be It had reconciled him, and no doubt had reconciled many other hon members to vote for this motion, when the hon member for Victoria stated that "sheepfarmers were disposed, to a considerable extent, to repay the outlay consequent upon the employment of a party of this kind, without reference to whether they were successful or not" No doubt the sheepfarmers, after what had been stated, would look upon the establishment of such a party as a great boon, as their operations would be conducted at a small expense compared with the object to be attained

Mr BURFORD said there could be no difference of opinion as to the importance of this question, but he could not agree with anything which had been advanced (Laughter) There was a subject which had long agitated the public mind, which he thought might be very properly alluded to in that discussion He referred to the Camel (Renewed laughter)

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member was not at liberty to introduce the camel in connection with a discussion upon water

Mr BURFORD thought that he was in order The Attorney-General had stated that there was no knowing what expenditure might be incurred if this motion were assented to, and he agreed with him, but the hon. member for Encounter Bay discarded the amount of expenditure altogether If, by the expenditure of £3000 they could obtain advantages which they had not hitherto possessed, it would, he thought, be well expended Scientific men, with tools necessary for boring, might accomplish one object, but he was desirous of accomplishing two objects at one stroke—an abundant water supply, and the exploration of the country He should, therefore, move, if he had an opportunity, that instead of the mode suggested in the motion of the hon member, Mr MacDermott, the House assent to a vote of £3000, for the importation of camels

The CHAIRMAN said the motion was irregular, the debate being upon a motion for the appointment of a Geological Surveyor

Mr BURFORD begged to be allowed to proceed, promising to show the analogy, but

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the motion was out of order, and the hon member resumed his seat

Mr PEAKE said as they had shelved the camels he should vote for the amendment of the hon the Attorney-General, because he regarded this proposal like one for the improvement of a man's private estate, which would be of a valuable and permanent kind If water could be obtained the means of permanently improving the patrimony of the people would be enhanced, and therefore he should vote for the organization of an efficient party for that purpose Being at all times ready to assist the pioneers of this country, he should be prepared to subsidise them, and to expend labor and capital in developing the resources of the colony He would support the motion as it now stood

Mr DUFFIELD had much pleasure in supporting the amendment It was a matter which the Government had lost sight of for some years, and it was well known to those who had a knowledge of the interior, they could, without sending out costly exploring parties, have, by the means now suggested, a much larger area of country available for stock There were some districts, particularly to the east, where he happened to possess a run, on which he had paid three years' rent, and had never been able to keep his sheep more than a few weeks, in consequence of the want of rain Such a project as the present would prove of great advantage, for many hundreds of miles in that country would be available for stock if they could find means to water the country He agreed with the hon member for Victoria that the stockholders would be agreeable to pay anything reasonable for such attempts as might be made to procure water on the runs which they might take This country was for the most part unoccupied, and in the hands of the Government, and if water could be obtained it would all be available for sheep If it were not for the continual political agitations going on for taxing the squatters, much more would be done towards stocking the country, for had it not been for the uncertainty of the last two years, he and another person who was associated with him, would have spent hundreds, and, perhaps, thousands, in trying to get water in the district which they now occupied, but when he found that there was a proposal for a tax on stock, he felt he would not be justified in spending money until the question of taxation was in some degree settled

The CHAIRMAN reminded the hon member that the question before the House was that of boring for water

Mr DUFFIELD—Of course, if the ruling of the hon, the Speaker was against him he would not pursue the subject further, but he thought he was quite in order in giving his reasons for supporting the motion

The CHAIRMAN—The hon member would be quite in order in giving his reasons, but not in entering upon a different subject altogether from that before the House

Mr DUFFIELD would support the motion, believing that by its means a large portion of country would become occupied

Mr NEALES said if hon members pursued the subject further they would not require to import boring tools, for they become such themselves (Laughter) The introduction of the camel was going far but the last speaker had gone farther (Laughter) There could be no doubt of the advantage of looking for water, and there was no rule of geology against finding it if they only bored deep enough (Loud laughter) It was merely a question of expense, for they must find water If they had engaged the gentleman, who was now otherwise employed here, in the same pursuit in which he had been employed in England, he had no doubt that long before this we should have discovered that there was no necessity for the great expense now proposed If they were going to bore the public about the matter, he did not see why we should not bore for coal simultaneously with water (Laughter)

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon member must not speak of boring for coal (Renewed laughter)

Mr MACDERMOTT considered the Government as trustees for the people, the great landholders of this country, and he believed the lands still in their hands for disposal would be greatly enhanced in value by the success of the proposition now before the House It had been well remarked by one or two speakers, that if the spot were pointed out where we should search for water, the Government would send a party there to bore, but who was to point out the spot? It required deep knowledge to indicate that, and he still thought, although he deferred to the opinion of the Committee that a practical man like the one who had been already engaged, and who had devoted his attention to artesian wells, would be the best person to employ

The motion, as amended, was then put from the chair, and carried

The House having resumed, the Chairman reported the resolution, and the report was adopted

CROWN LANDS

Mr PEAKE, pursuant to notice, asked the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, "If any waste lands of the Crown recently discovered by the officers and at the expense of the Government of this colony, have been leased by private treaty, and, if so, what lands have been so leased, and to whom, and on what conditions Also, what portion (if any) of the waste lands of the Crown so discovered have been offered by public auction, and what was the result of such public auction" In asking the question, he would only remark that he had been induced to do so as considerable discussion had taken place in that House on the subject of putting the Crown lands up to auction He also wished to elicit what would be the policy of the Government in carrying out the wishes of the House in this particular in future in order that the public might know what they had to expect

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that no land discovered by officers of the Government had been leased by private treaty In reference to the second portion of the question—in a portion of the country discovered by Mr Hack, certain runs had been put up by auction and had been afterwards taken up, one at 167*l*, one at 83*l* 7s, and one at 49*l* In Blanchewater, three lots had been offered, and two had been subsequently sold at 50*l* each The Government contemplated no alteration in the present system of leasing the runs He had not heard any complaints on the subject There was no difficulty in the way of persons discovering new country, or occupying it, availing themselves of the proper privileges under the present regulations

Mr HARVEY, pursuant to notice, asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether it is the intention of the Government to issue yearly second-class tickets for the South Australian Railway, considering that that privilege was already granted to first class passengers

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was not at present the intention of Government to issue second-class return-tickets They desired first to test the operation of the first class tickets

PETITIONS

The petitions of J S O'Halloran and others, of Major Warburton, of 626 residents of the Valley of the Gilbert, and of the Town Council of Port Adelaide, were ordered to be printed

THE MARRIAGE BILL

Mr BAGOT, pursuant to notice, moved—

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause the despatch of His Excellency forwarding the Marriage Bill, also all other papers and despatches received from the Secretary of State for the colonies respecting the Bill, to be laid on the table of this House."

Mr STRANGWAYS would move if the hon member for the Light had no objection, that the Titles to Real Property Bill be added to the motion, together with the words "and also all papers and despatches relating to the same"

Mr HUGHES seconded the amendment, and the hon member of the original motion assented to it

Mr BAGOT said that during the whole time he had the honor of a seat in the House, he had yearly made this motion for a return of the deeds registered during the prior years, and also for a table of the fees received and paid into the Treasury He hoped the Government would continue the returns in the same form as in previous years

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no objection to offer, but would suggest that no advantage could arise from returns showing the working of a new measure, which had only been two or three months in operation—(hear, hear)—as no just inference could be drawn from them

The motion was carried as amended

HINDMARSH VALLEY

Mr HARVEY found that the general heading to the question standing in his name on the paper might cause it to be supposed that he was favorable to the Cut-Hill-road, whereas he only put the question for the sake of obtaining information He thought the line of the road in question an undesirable one, and that as a main line it should go more to the westward He asked the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works whether the road by way of the Cut Hill, through Hindmarsh Valley, has been ordered to be gazetted as a part of the main road to Encounter Bay

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the road had not yet been gazetted, as the plans were not prepared An order had been made for gazetting it, but it could not be proclaimed until drafts had been made and plans prepared, and all the other conditions of the Road Act had been complied with

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY

Mr REYNOLDS, pursuant to notice, asked the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works, whether the Railway Commissioners are in treaty for the purchase of part of Section No 72, on the proposed line to Section 112 whence arises the necessity for such purchase, seeing that large blocks of unsold land are contiguous to the said section, and apparently more convenient for a station than the section in question

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that the Railway Commissioners were not in treaty for the purchase in question, but the proprietor of that section had given gratuitously all that was required of it for the erection of a station making a road through the section from one end to the other It was found that the site was most suitable, and therefore the offer to give the land gratuitously had been approved of, but no expenditure would be made on the land until possession of it was formally given up

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

On the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply,

Mr DUFFIELD, in reference to the statement of the Hon the Treasurer on the previous day, wished to put a question to that hon gentleman, in reference to the grants in aid to municipalities He found that in '57 the sums to be appropriated to municipalities and corporations were to be double the amounts collected by these bodies, but, in some instances, a much larger proportion had been given [The hon member read some items in support of his statement from the Estimates]

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that some district councils and corporations had other income besides rates, and having expended these in public works they were entitled to equal sums from the Treasury

LOCAL COURT AT CLARE

Mr HUGHES enquired whether the Hon the Attorney-General would allow him to put the question which stood in his name on the notice-paper on the previous day, as it had then lapsed in consequence of the sitting having lasted so long that he (Mr Hughes) was obliged to leave the House, in order to be in time for the railway The question was, "Whether it is true that the Clare Local Court of full jurisdiction has not been held for several months past, owing to the non-attendance of Justices of the Peace, if so the reasons for such non attendance, and the measures the Government have taken to re-establish the Court" He had been told that the Court in question had not been held for six months past, the reason of this being that the Justices of the Peace residing in the neighborhood declined to attend, in consequence of a person named Charles Webb having been appointed a Magistrate This person, he understood, was a tavern-keeper at Clare, and a warm political partisan of the Hon. the Chief Secretary.

The SPEAKER called the hon. member to order. He was not entitled to make a speech in putting a question.

Mr. HUGHES was giving his reasons for putting the question. He understood this Webb had been during a late trial, reprimanded by Mr. Justice Boothby for supplying a person with liquor, who was at the time in a state of intoxication. He wished also to know whether this individual had been since convicted of an assault, and whether he was a person of such character that the magistrates would sooner throw up the commission of the peace than sit on the bench with him.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the hon. member had a peculiar adroitness in attacking persons who, not being present in the House, had not the means of defending themselves; but, nevertheless, he (the Attorney-General) would not allow himself to be dragged into a personal discussion, but would answer the question. He did not know with certainty that the Court at Clare had not been opened for six months, but he had been informed that the magistrates declined to sit. With respect to the appointment spoken of by the hon. member, the course which the Government took in such matters was to appoint such persons as were recommended by the special magistrate.

SUPPLY.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of Supply; but previous to proceeding with the business,

Mr. BAGOT asked the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches whether they were prepared to mention any day for the consideration of the new Standing Orders. They were on the paper for that day, but the consideration of the Supplementary Estimates would render it impossible to proceed with them; and as the Estimates would shortly come on for discussion there would be no time left to decide upon the Standing Orders.

The TREASURER said the hon. member was rather late in mentioning the matter now that the House had gone into Committee. Had he mentioned it before it could have been attended to.

The following items of the Supplementary Estimates were then passed without discussion:—Supreme Court department, 20*l*.; Magistrates and Local Courts, 95*l*. 12s. 6d.; Insolvency Courts, 319*l*. 1s. 8d.

On the motion that 500*l*. be granted to the Registrar-General,

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved that the sum of 500*l*. in this department be struck out, and that 250*l*. be substituted for it, as he thought, from the spare time which the Registrar-General had, as could be seen from his letters in the Register on various subjects, his duties could not be very onerous. He also saw that there was a sum of 500*l*. for six months or at the rate of 1000*l*. a year voted for the senior solicitor, though he understood that a gentleman in every way competent for the office had offered to accept it for considerably less.

Mr. HUGHES hoped some understanding would be come to on the subject of the Real Property Act, for if the House agreed to that vote it would be taken as a precedent, and the next time the House met the amount asked for would be considerably extended. Was this vote to be exceeded, or would it be sufficient for the whole of the Lands Titles Registration department from year to year? If the amount voted for carrying out the original Act was not sufficient, a new Act ought to be brought in; for, whilst he was willing to vote a sum for carrying out this Act in order to try it fairly, it would be wrong that a single class of the community should be benefited at the expense of the whole community. If the Act was to be such a boon, as was said, to the landowners they ought to pay for it, and the House should not compel the general revenue of the colony to pay for a special interest. He hoped the Attorney-General, in whose department that matter rested, would explain whether the Act was to be placed upon a permanent basis.

Mr. BAKEWELL said his objection to the vote was that that it made the people generally pay the expense of making good titles for a few individuals. If the Bill was calculated to improve the value of real property, the vote was an attempt to tax the community to the extent of £5,000 or £6,000 for that object. The Lands Titles Registration Department should be a self-supporting institution, and the expense fairly divided amongst those who benefitted by it. There were now 800 properties under this Act at the end of only two months, and if the expense of the department were divided amongst these it would be a very reasonable amount. If the Bill was an advantage to persons of property, poor persons having no real property should not be called on to contribute to it. Another objection which he had to this vote was, that he believed the work could be done a great deal cheaper. There would probably before the Act was worked out be from £5,000 to £6,000 expended by South Australia for this purpose, and this sum would build an endowed schoolhouse in every district in the country. He believed that a much cheaper Bill might have been introduced if the hon. the Attorney-General had devoted his attention to the matter. Without that Act at all a general Bill might be introduced by which persons would get their titles cheaper. Not that he for a moment undervalued the professional character and attainments of the gentleman for whom the vote was put on the estimates; for he thought it highly creditable to the Government that a gentleman so highly qualified as Mr. Torrens should be placed in that position; neither did he object to the salaries, for if anything he should rather they were higher, but he objected to the country paying for what was done to benefit a class.

Mr. HAWKER had objected all along to the principle on which these gentlemen were to be remunerated. The Act was so entirely for the benefit of individuals that he saw no reason why the country should pay for it. If the Registrar-General and the other officers had so high an opinion of the Act, they ought to be willing to be paid by fees, and for this reason he agreed with the hon. gentleman who preceded him in opposing the item.

Mr. REYNOLDS thought the House had been rather taken aback by the vote which they had just passed. He meant the vote for the Commissioner of the Insolvency Court, whose salary had been raised from 650*l*. to 900*l*. a year, without a single remark from the Government as to the reasons for such an increase. He thought there would be a disposition in the House to reconsider this vote before long. With regard to the vote for the Registrar-General, he objected to paying him a salary of 1000*l*. a year under a Bill which had not the confidence of the people. (Oh, oh.) He said, which had not the confidence of the people, for, if it were otherwise, a larger number of people would be found putting their properties under the Act, as, notwithstanding all the outcry and clamor which had been made about it, very few persons were putting their properties under it, a proof that they had very little confidence in the Bill. If the Bill wanted amendment let the House amend it, and he was prepared to give all the assistance he could towards it, provided the principle was good. He could not go all the way with the hon. gentleman who had moved the amendment, in saying if we were to have a Registrar-General that he would not give him more than 500*l*. a year. He might be prepared from the great importance of the measure, and the advantage which the public might derive from it—if the gentlemen who were so partial to it would only throw a little light on the subject—to give even more but at present he was not prepared to give a sum, of 1000*l*. a year, seeing as he did that very little was done for the money.

Dr. WARK said that during the last session a vote of the House had been passed asking the Government to bring this Bill into operation by July.

The CHAIRMAN said the Act itself provided for that.

Dr. WARK said that now it was left in the hands of the Government to carry out the Act, and the House could not suppose that the Government were anxious to give appointments under it unnecessarily. ("Oh, oh.") They should submit to the management of the Government in the matter. As to the observations of the hon. member for Barossa and others that the Act was for the benefit of landed proprietors he would say it was also for the benefit of the poor man; for every man who had land was not rich, and the poor man who rented a section was as much benefitted by this Act as the landowner, for his business was done quickly and there was a benefit for the lessee as well as for the lessor. In bringing into operation any great system like this, they could not expect that it would work fairly when objections were raised to it in all quarters, and when all the legal gentlemen declared it would not work. They could not expect it to work before the public had confidence in it; but he thought 60 was a large number of properties to be brought under it in two months. As to the Act paying for itself, the terms could be altered when it came fairly into operation, and then he believed it would pay for itself, and it ought to be made to do so.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would say, in the first place, that that House, and the other branch of the Legislature, had, by a decided majority during the last session affirmed the principal of the Act, and carried it through in a manner which showed it to be, in their opinion at least, a point of great importance that the Act should be brought into operation under what were deemed the most favorable conditions. It would be in the recollection of hon. members that before the prorogation he had stated, with regard to the course which the Government would take that whatever doubts he might entertain, (and he had never concealed that he had very grave doubts) respecting the Act—having once ascertained the opinions of the Legislature to be unmistakeably in favor of the measure, and having reason to believe that that was the opinion of the country also—(hear, hear)—that having seen this he should induce the Government to bring the Bill into operation as efficiently as possible. The Government then offered the appointment of Registrar-General to the gentleman by whom the plan had been devised and the Bill prepared, and who, by doing these things, had obtained the confidence of the Legislature and the public—(hear, hear)—in connection with this measure; for whatever doubts there might be of his possessing the confidence of the House or the country generally, as the person who had devised the plan of the Bill, prepared the measure, and carried it through the Legislature, there could be no doubt that he had obtained the confidence of the Legislature, and was regarded as the person best qualified to bring the Act into operation with the greatest chance of success—(hear, hear)—and that was a matter which was referred to in His Excellency's speech, and which had since been referred to by the hon. member for the Port. Before an important measure like this was to be brought into operation, it would be undignified and unwise, and disappointing to the public, if they had deprived a gentleman in Mr Torrens's position of the power of procuring the assistance of such persons as he considered qualified to assist him in bringing the Act into operation It would have been out of the question to ask Mr Torrens to accept this appointment at £500 or £800 a-year, and if the Act possessed anything like the value which was attached to it by some persons the money which was now asked for would be well expended He did not say that the Act would confer all the advantages expected from it, for he was not now called on to express any opinion on the point, but he wished to show that the Government had no course but to obtain the best persons for this purpose, and they could not not do so except by offering adequate salaries, for no persons possessing the requisite qualifications would accept the appointments otherwise Mr Torrens had selected Mr Belt and Mr Gawler, and these were the gentlemen whose salaries the House were now called upon to pay It was said that another gentleman could be found who would take the appointment of Mr Belt at a smaller salary, but when the Registrar-Generalship was offered to Mr Torrens he was informed that the Government would, as far as possible, adopt his recommendations as to the individuals appointed for carrying out the Act, for to have appointed any other persons to bring into operation a new scheme as complicated as this was, would have fettered that gentleman unfairly, and therefore the Government felt there was no other course open for them than the one which they had adopted He might say, with regard to Messrs Belt and Gawler, the Government had adopted the recommendations of the Registrar-General With regard to the salaries, it was said that £1,600 for the year would be sufficient for the two salaries of these gentlemen, but in making these appointments he (the Attorney-General) had felt it his duty to make it a condition, as the solicitors were to act in a quasi-judicial capacity, or rather being assistants of a quasi-judicial body, should give up their private practice, in order that they might not have any clients whose titles might come before them in their new positions, and the Registrar felt the importance of this consideration also It then became a question what persons could be obtained for these offices, and what inducements should be offered to them The Registrar-General was very anxious to obtain the services of Mr Belt, and though he (the Attorney-General) did not say that no other person could be found equally competent, no one could doubt that Mr Belt was thoroughly competent for his duty When that gentleman declined to give up his practice for less than 1,000*l* a year, Mr Torrens asked whether the Government would make up that sum, and as Mr Gawler consented to take 600*l*, he (the Attorney-General) saw no public reason for declining the arrangement proposed by the Registrar He thought that the House would agree with him that 1,600*l* was not too much for two competent solicitors, and if these gentlemen were satisfied that one should take 1,000*l* and the other 600*l*, he could see no objection whatever to the arrangement Whatever his opinion might be of the measure, he thought it unwise to argue as to the success which might attend it from the delays and difficulties of the commencement It frequently happened that reforms of a novel character, and pregnant with the greatest benefits, were beset with difficulties at the outset If not in the course of the present session, perhaps during the next some measure would be brought forward to amend the Bill, and if so he trusted it would be brought in in such a way as would prevent the violent opposition and conflicts of opinion which had taken place on the former Bill Whatever the difficulties in the way of the measure, its object was most important, and the results sought after, if attained, would be most beneficial Even if experience should show that the present scheme was not a good one another differing from it might attain its object and if so the country would be well paid indeed for the money it was proposed to expend

Mr BARROW observed that a few days since, when certain motions were brought forward to amend the constitution it was said that any amendment of that Act should be grounded on a substantive motion And so now he would say that if the Real Property Act were to be repealed, it should be done in a straightforward manner, for if they negatived those items they would virtually repeal that Act (No, no) He could not see how the Registrar's department was to be carried on without officers, though he did not say it was necessary to retain every officer in the list, but if they took away the heads of departments, which they would do by reducing the salaries below a certain amount, they were virtually repealing the Act of the Legislature of last session, and in doing that he was certain the country would be against them For although there was some disappointment felt with regard to the extent to which the community had availed itself of the Act, if any proposition were carried in the House that day, the effect of which would tend to damage or impede the Act, there would be a loud and long cry of dissatisfaction heard throughout the country He felt as strongly on the subject as he had ever done The Act might require amendment, and if so, it would be better, instead of forcing it on in an imperfect condition, that Mr Torrens should say in a straightforward manner in what respects it required amendment, for though they might have to pay a high price for it, they had no objection to pay a high price for a good article It was said it was the landed proprietors who would receive a large proportion of the benefits of the Act, but who were the landed proprietors? They were not only the owners of square miles and preliminary sections, but the owners of little allotments, who grew a few cabbages in their gardens, and to whom these plots of ground were as dear as the great tracts of the capitalist, to whom this Bill would prove an equal benefit (No no) The hon member for Encounter Bay might cry "no, no," which did not surprise him, but had he cried "yes, yes," he (Mr Barrow) would have been startled (laughter), but that hon member's negative had simply confirmed his (Mr Barrow's) views (Laughter) He would say, give the Act a fair trial, but it could not have one if they removed the officers who were essential for carrying it out It was said they were acting on a false principle, as they were devoting the public money to advance private interests, but they were not always clear from that charge in voting, as it was only that afternoon that they had heard the argument used that it was advisable to spend money in boring for water on our runs It was true that the hon member for Victoria said that the stockholders would willingly refund the money, but he had not entered into a bond (though the hon member's word was as good as his bond) to that effect But the question was not would the money be refunded, but would the Government take security beforehand that it should be repaid? He believed not, and yet they had voted money for a particular interest that day (No, no) That was his (Mr Barrow's) opinion and hon gentlemen would, of course, hold theirs With respect to a remark that the House would have to reconsider another item it had passed, he had felt at the time that they were acting too hastily, as he had said on the previous day, after they had been discussing other matters irrelevant to the business before the House He would now like to know whether it was necessary to have a Deputy-Registrar and three clerks There were eleven people engaged besides the office-keeper and messenger, and if this was the case, to what extent would they be reinforced when the business was doubled or quadrupled, as it was likely to be He made these remarks to elicit explanation but he must express a hope that the House would not put any obstacles in the way of an Act which the voice of the country and the Legislature demanded, and which they should not now indirectly repeal

Mr BURFORD expressed his delight at the speech of the hon the Attorney-General He felt it his duty to reply to the insinuation against Mr Torrens to the effect that he had so much spare time to write to the newspapers, but he was under the absolute necessity of doing so to enlighten the lawyers (Great laughter) It was part of his duty as Lands Title Commissioner One hon gentleman voted against the item because more money would be asked for next time, but he hoped to see the Bill require a greater number of officers than were yet appointed The hon member concluded some brief observations by expressing a resolution to support the motion

Mr BAGOT was glad to observe a different temper on the part of the hon member who had just spoken, from that which he had exhibited on former occasions He was glad that he had heard no charges of "shuffling cards," or "mysteries," which required unravelling He (Mr Bagot) did not intend to offer many observations, at the same time having remarked the feelings of certain gentlemen in that House as regarded the passing of the Land Registration Act in the former Parliament, he observed a very different temper now from what then prevailed At that time gentlemen of the legal profession could not speak on the question without interested motives being imputed to them With regard to what the Attorney-General had said, there could be no doubt that the carrying out of that measure involved a large outlay of public money It had been said, that as there seemed to be some doubts as to whether the measure would work well, they ought to have brought in an amended measure He did not think the present Act a practicable measure, but he felt with the Attorney-General that there would be considerable difficulty in taking that course When the Bill was first introduced into that House, hon members appeared unanimous in carrying the measure—not a part of the Bill, but the Bill itself and therefore, he felt that the Attorney-General must have considerable difficulty in introducing any amendments, and it was his (Mr Bagot's) intention, to give him his support At the same time, he thought the salaries excessive The Commissioner of Public Works, whose duties as a working member of the Government, were very arduous, had only £700 a-year—(an hon member £800) No doubt his responsibilities were very great It was absolutely necessary for him to attend closely to his duties especially during the sitting of Parliament, but if £800 a-year was considered sufficient for his salary, when he looked at what the Registrar-General had done in former years, and what he was likely to do in future, it was not too much to say that his work ought to be at least as heavy as the Commissioner of Public Works He, therefore, thought that £800 a-year would be sufficient However, he would not stand on that He would not be the person to propose any amendment of that motion, because it was well known that he was politically opposed to the Registrar-General of Lands and Titles, and, therefore, he should support the larger salary rather than the smaller With regard to the hon member for the city, he had spoken something about caveat emptor He (Mr Bagot) inclined to think the caveats of some other person must have annoyed him. That hon. gentleman seemed to have imagined that the legal profession could not look upon the measure apart from their private interests. Now, if they had looked altogether to their private interests, would they have allowed that Bill to pass without any opposition whatever? He (Mr. Bagot) repeated what he had before said, that every one of the amendments that were worth anything emanated from members of the profession. The Attorney-General himself suggested many, and no doubt intended to have proposed some others; but neither he nor any other legal practitioners were listened to. No doubt the House thought Mr. Burford's amendments were much better than those of the Attorney-General, who was frequently obliged to sit in that House and amuse himself by reading a newspaper, while the discussions relative to that measure were proceeding. He (Mr. Bagot) might say, on his own behalf, and on that of the legal profession, that they were in favor of a registration of titles, but they wished to see that measure carried out safely, both to proprietors and purchasers of land. He wished to see the property in the country placed on such a footing that no man's property would be liable to be swept away at the dictum of one man; and he also wished to see the registration of titles carried out in such a manner as to be beneficial to the country. On every occasion on which this Bill had been mentioned in the House it had been spoken of as a means of transferring land by registration of title. The registration of titles and the transfer of land by registration had been spoken of as synonymous terms. He considered it would be the greatest blessing to the country if land could be transferred by endorsement in the same way as the transfer of a bill of exchange. But to rush into the other extreme, and allow one individual, however talented, to deal with the real property of the country, without other control than his own will, would be found to be a curse to the country instead of a blessing. He would call attention to the fact that the Attorney-General for Ireland had brought a Bill into the British Parliament to continue the Encumbered Estates Act, but did he by that Bill attempt to place the property of the country in the hands of one individual? No; on the contrary he placed it under the control of the highest legal talent he could discover on the Bench; and care was taken that the occupier of every property proposed to be placed under the provisions of that Act should have due notice, which must be served upon him personally, in order that he might have an opportunity of coming forward and objecting to the estate being dealt with by the Court. With regard to the hon. member for the city's (Mr. Burford's) remark that other colonies were only waiting to see the working of the Act here that they might adopt it, he (Mr. Bagot) had seen an article in the Argus respecting that Bill, in which it was stated that they intended in Melbourne to bring in a Bill for the registration of titles, but that they would not carry out the plan which had been adopted in South Australia; that they would not throw away the assistance of the lawyers, but that, with their assistance, they would endeavour to obtain a good and practical measure. He was glad, however, that the hon. member for the city (Mr. Burford) had come round a little, for he hoped among the members of the profession there were some men of respectability. He would, before concluding, say a word respecting what had fallen from the hon. member for East Torrens as to the country paying the expense of the transfers of land. The hon. member had said that it was the same as paying for boring for water on runs. Now it was not the same. The proposition was that borings should be made on the public lands for the purpose of enhancing the value of those lands, and of enabling stock to feed on them, which they could not now run over for want of water. That was very different from the country paying salaries for doing that for which individuals ought to pay. The boring for water, if successful, would bring money into the Treasury, and the parties to whom that land was let would be obliged to enter into a bond with two securities that they would pay the expense. But in the case of the Registration of Titles, the salaries must be paid by the Government. It was necessary that Government should provide the means for carrying out the system of registration of titles, for the country had spoken in favor of it, and registration of titles they would have, and he trusted the Attorney-General would turn his attention to the Bill, so that it might be rendered as perfect as possible.

The Treasurer thought they had enjoyed a singular advantage in having had the assistance of a member of that House, now absent from his seat. The hon. member for the city seemed to represent the Registrar-General of Lands Titles, and appeared to speak with authority on all matters connected with that Act. He seemed to have been behind the scenes. Some remarks had been made in reference to the working of the Act. It had been denominated a benefit to all classes of the community. No doubt the Act had taken from the legal profession a large amount of profits, which had been transferred partly to landholders on the one side, and to the public at large on the other side. He would not offer an opinion as to whether that principle was right or wrong. He would only say it was a principle on which the Legislature had been acting for years past. They had not hesitated to take away the profits of those who were carrying on the roads by the introduction of railways, because the railway system was thought to be beneficial to the country at large; and therefore he thought they had a right to interfere with the profits of the profession—that the House had a right to step in for the benefit of the community. But the Act under consideration, whilst it still took away from the profession, or was was supposed to do so, a large amount of profit, transferred that profit, partly into the Public Treasury and partly into the pockets of those who deal in land, because, by its operation, the expenses connected with transfers of land were reduced. There was not on the Estimates anything to show that fees had been received from registration of land titles; but there would be good profits under the new process. And it was to be presumed, when it was in full operation an amount would be received by the Treasury, not only sufficient to cover the costs of its working but also to add to the Revenue. He expected the Commissioner would be able to give some idea of the probable receipts from that source. He could form no idea at present, but before the session closed, he would have some data to go upon. With regard to the amount of the salaries to be paid to those gentlemen who had undertaken the task of carrying the Act into operation, he could only say that the House should enable the Executive to carry it out. Those gentlemen were the Registrar-General and the solicitors of the establishment. Whether those salaries were too large or otherwise, he thought depended upon the circumstances connected with the position of the parties. He could improve upon nothing that had been said on that subject by his hon. friend the Attorney-General. He had explained completely, and most clearly, the position in which the Government was placed, and the motives under which the Government acted; and he thought the House must be convinced that no other course could have been taken, and that no lower salaries than those named could have been placed on the Estimates. He considered the House bound in a measure to give its support to the Government on this matter. There was only one point of detail to which he would allude, and that because a question was asked by one of the speakers. That question was as to the necessity of having three clerks in that office. An hon. member wished to know whether subordinates were required. The Government had now to consider that matter in conjunction with the Registrar-General, and every attention had been given to arrive at a correct conclusion, and it was considered not safe to attempt to work with a less staff, lest the establishment should be found insufficient, and thus impediments be placed in the way of its working. The hon. member for the city had spoken of dividing the office, but he had not spoken without authority. He thought the House would agree to the course which had been taken by the Government. He hoped there would be no opposition to the amount on the Estimates, and as the amendment had not been seconded he presumed there would be none. Such discussion was no doubt necessary and useful in a matter of so much importance, because it was obligatory to fix permanently those salaries which otherwise would have to be discussed over again when the general Estimates were brought before the House.

Mr. Milne could almost have believed he had been listening to a debate on the second reading of the Real Property Bill. He thought that it would be much better for the opponents of the Bill to allow its operation to be fairly tried. If they were so well satisfied that the Bill would not effect the great benefits that its friends believed, let them give it a fair chance, and allow the salaries to be voted, so that the working of the Act might exhibit its defects. He believed the amount of salaries proposed, particularly the three first items, reasonable and fair. It was possible some other items might be curtailed, but on account of the great benefit which he believed the country would derive from the working of that Act, he was not disposed to throw impediments in the way. With regard to the objection that those salaries were to be paid from the general revenue of the colony, he thought that course quite legitimate. It was adopted whenever it was necessary for the public good. Similar arguments might be used in regard to the working of the Post-Office as those which had been urged in opposition to that course. But that was considered a department from which no revenue ought to be derived, as it was a national benefit, and consequently the colonists were content to allow the necessary funds for its support to be drawn from the general revenue. It was impossible to say that the measure would work at first, but give it twelve months and its effects would be seen.

Mr. Hart supported the salaries proposed, for he thought it necessary that the Act should have a fair trial. He thought that the working of the Act could not be seen for the next six months, for now there was no data by which to judge. In that time a report would probably be prepared of the amendments necessary to be made. There was no wonder the Bill was not brought into more general operation, as there were doubts thrown out as to its working, and those doubts would continue until some amendments were made in the Bill itself. Therefore it was unreasonable to expect the Bill to be made use of until it was amended. The best thing the Government could do would be to instruct the legal gentlemen to prepare a report of what amendments were necessary. With reference to the remarks of the last speaker, that this Act should be self-supporting as well as the Post Office, he would say that the hon. member was in error. If it was an understanding that the expense of the transfer of land should be in part, or wholly, borne by the General Revenue, every person in that House would resist such a motion. He felt however, that for a certain period of time, it must be so supported, for it was impossible it could support itself, as some time must elapse before the fees would equal the amount of salaries. If the Act did not work as it had been expected, it might possibly be necessary to reduce the salaries. If the work were less than was expected it might be considered that a smaller amount would be sufficient; but in the meantime he thought the salaries not too high for the duties to be performed, especially as great care would be required in considering the amendments necessary to be made. It had been said that that Act was likely to be adopted in other colonies; he did not think that, in its present shape, that would be the case, although its leading principles would probably be adopted. Bills differing from it very materially in reference to details would be introduced into them, and with regard to our own Act, the sooner the necessary amendments were made the better for the country.

Mr PEAKE would support the salaries proposed. As the hon member for Light (Mr Bagot) had addressed him (Mr Peake), he would answer him. (The Chairman called the hon gentleman to order.) The hon member for Light (Mr Bagot) had accomplished much, for he had shown himself a convert to the principle of conveying real property by registration. He (Mr Peake) was glad that the Encumbered Estates Bill in Ireland had been alluded to. The principle of that measure had been really and truly the transfer of real estate by registration, and to that principle, therefore, Mr Whiteside, who was now conducting through the House of Commons a bill to render that measure permanent, was a convert. In carrying out that Bill Judges were appointed who had to decide upon the questions brought before them in open Court. Well, that plan he thought might be adopted here. The hon member for Barossa had remarked that the Attorney-General had great doubts as to the working of the Act—that he had rushed into the subject, and the effect was to destroy that which had been so recently done. He (Mr Peake) gave the learned advocate credit for greater prudence than to do that, and he took the expression of his doubts as an earnest of his intention to carry out Law Reform truly and faithfully. The hon member for Light (Mr Bagot) had entered into an indignant protest against landed proprietors reaping advantage at the expense of the rest of the community, but who were the rest? The landed proprietors formed nearly two-thirds of the population, and perhaps there was no British colony so deeply interested in the success of the measure as South Australia. There were very few measures adopted in which public money was not necessary to be expended to some extent, and against which some class might not stand up and say, "Such a class has an excess of benefit in consequence of this measure," and therefore they ought to bear the expense. Was reform to be stopped by such untenable arguments as these? If so, they might shut up their Post Offices, because merchants and large landholders, and rich men received a greater number of letters and newspapers carried by post than the poorer classes. He was sorry to observe hon members carried away by such shallow arguments. A great deal had been said about the sum 5,174*l* being put down for the working of the department. Amongst other items he observed 625*l* for furniture and rent of office. In his humble judgment that looked like incautious expenditure of the public money. Had the present Registration Office been adapted to the working of the new Property Bill, a large portion of that amount would perhaps have been saved, and he attached blame to the Executive in consequence. Then there was a sum in the Registration vote of last year of something like 1,889*l* 11s. Now if the matter had been well considered, the two offices could have worked more in unison with each other, and a portion of the sum set down for rent saved. He thought a portion of expense might have been saved by the two offices, being amalgamated, or by working coincidently; but as the property of the country gradually came under the operation of the Real Property Act, the labour would be diminished in the old Registration Offices, and consequently the number of clerks might be reduced in a corresponding degree. He did not therefore, look upon the item under consideration, as anything to which the House should take exception. There would be an increasing revenue drawn from the Lands Titles Office, but it could not be expected to be immediately productive. He had heard it stated to-night that £1,000 a-year was too much for the Registrar-General. He believed that that gentleman had a pension of £300 or £400 a-year, under the Crown, of course, on receiving office, he would give up that pension as was the custom, and, therefore, virtually the House would only give him £600 a-year, and he thought it not too much, considering he occupied a judicial position. He had no fear of the ultimate result of the measure, and supposing it imperfect, it was not the first imperfect Act that had been passed, nor the first imperfect Act that had been amended by the Attorney-General, and he knew that the attention of the Registrar of Lands Titles had been called to the amendments necessary. He should vote for the sum on the Estimates.

Mr LINDSAY would confine himself to a few observations on the objection which had been made with reference to the expense of the working of the Act. It had been said that the expenses fell only on one class of the community, whereas he (Mr Lindsay) contended that it fell on all. The same objection might be raised to the Insolvency Court, the operations in which applied chiefly to the mercantile interests. Again the expense of the Crown Lands Commission seemed to apply chiefly to the squatting interests, and therefore it ought not to fall upon the general revenue. The same might be said of the Telegraph, but all being for the benefit of the community those expenses were not objected to. He should not object to a reduction in salaries, if all salaries were reduced. If it was considered that no gentleman at the head of a department should receive more than £500, £600, or £800 a-year, he would agree to reduce the salary of the Registrar of Lands Titles, but until that was done he should support the vote.

Mr BAGOT rose to explain. The hon member for Barossa (Mr Bakewell) had misrepresented him in one thing. For his part, he had also expressed a wish to have a Registration of Titles, but that did not imply the transfer of land by registration.

Mr NEALES would vote for these items as they stood. He believed the measure to be an imperfect one, and one that would not satisfy the public. This was his view of the Bill as it passed through the House, and it was so still. But the people approved it, and he would not oppose any difficulties in the working of it. The projector of the Bill said he knew 500 or 1,000 people who would place their property under that Act. Two months had passed since it came into operation and he believed only 50 or 60 had done so. He had on different occasions prophesied the failure of certain measures, and lived to see his prophecies verified. He should see it in this case, without the Bill was amended. He hoped the projector would not force the defects of the Bill on them, but would bring forward real amendments.

Mr DUFFIELD observed that many members appeared to have a strong objection to the Real Property Act, but it was not so much whether it was good or bad, but whether the House ought to vote the amount or not. Hon members thought it wrong to tax the community for the landed portion of the country. But that had been the practice in this country for some years. He found that 1889*l* 11s was passed for Registration last year, and he believed it was applied to the same purpose that this money was wanted for.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it necessary to state, on the part of the Government, that he considered it extremely important not to introduce amendments into a measure until its defect were apparent through experience. He condemned hasty Legislation, and in reference to the remarks as to outlay in furniture, said had the course been adopted which had been recommended of using the same building for the two offices, the Government might easily have expended 3000*l* or 4000*l*. He thought they were more likely to work harmoniously when separated.

Mr MILDRED had been a supporter of the Bill, for he thought it likely to benefit South Australia. He considered the course taken by legal gentlemen in the House as calculated to impede the working of the Act. It was not possible it could work well when such continual doubts were expressed. The Attorney-General ought clearly and distinctly to say whether it could be made a workable measure or not.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was quite sure that the House would see that he ought not to commit himself to an opinion.

Mr STRANGWAYS saw, by the Estimates, that there was £1,000 a-year for the Registrar General, and £400 for the Deputy Registrar-General, who would by the Act have the same duties to perform. He thought, therefore, the salary which was enough for one would be enough for the other also. He would withdraw his amendment.

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the salary of the Registrar-General for the six months be 400*l* instead of 500*l* as proposed. The office required no legal attainments, and he did not see any reason why the Registrar-General should be rated at a higher amount than either the Commissioner of Crown Lands or the Commissioner of Public Works.

A division then took place, with the following result:—

AYES, 9—Messrs Bakewell, Barrow, Dunn, Hawker, Hughes, Mildred, Strangways, Townsend, Reynolds (teller).

NOES, 15—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, and Messrs Bagot, Burford, Cole, Duffield, Hart, Harvey, Lindsay, MacDermott, Milne, Peake, Waik, and the Treasurer, (teller).

Mr TOWNSEND wished to know whether Mr Belt had, according to the terms stated by the Government, given up all private practice, for he had heard to the contrary.

Mr LINDSAY considered it the duty of the Government to ascertain that.

Mr HUGHES asked for some intimation as to the tenure of office, and whether if the Bill was found unworkable, the officers would be discharged?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL read an extract from the Act, intimating that those gentlemen held office during the pleasure of the Government, and during good behaviour.

Mr BAGOT considered the Government had done their duty in the appointments they had made. He thought Mr Belt cheap at the money.

Mr BARROW recommended postponing the further consideration of the present item until the Government had made the necessary inquiries. There was nothing inconsistent in a solicitor being remunerated more highly than the Registrar-General, as the latter need not be a professional man. But it was certainly essential to know whether whether Mr Belt had private practice.

Mr PEAKE thought it unfair to ask a man to relinquish private practice until the House had agreed to the terms proposed

Mr REYNOLDS thought the assurance on the part of the Government that private practice should not be allowed ought to be deemed sufficient

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL requested to be allowed to amend the Estimates by inserting on the face of them in reference to that office, "Without fees or private practice"

The CHAIRMAN then put the amendment, which was carried

Mr REYNOLDS asked if it was necessary with the present work to have a Deputy Registrar-General

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Government had agreed to appoint a Registrar-General, as they were informed it was necessary

Mr REYNOLDS could not see the necessity, and wished to reduce the number of clerks if they could not dispense with the Deputy-Registrar

Mr HUGHES thought it necessary to have a person of great practical ability associated with Mr Torrens, as should that gentleman commit blunders the House would have to pay £3,000 or £4,000

In reply to a question whether the Government would undertake that the salaries should be for six months only,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the House was voting it only for that time, and that afterwards when the general Estimates came on the matter might be discussed again, but the salaries would appear on the Estimates for the first six months of next year

The CHAIRMAN put the motion, which was carried

On the motion of the TREASURER the House resumed

The CHAIRMAN reported progress and obtained leave to sit on Thursday

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 9

The SPEAKER took the chair at ten minutes past one o clock

MR JOHN HINDMARSH

Mr NEALES presented a petition from Mr John Hindmarsh, praying that the circumstances attending the appropriation by the Government of the petitioner's land might be enquired into, and such remedy granted to the petitioner as the House might see fit The petition was read, by which it appeared that Mr Hindmarsh was the owner of a section of land at Encounter Bay and that the Government had erected a wharf upon it They had offered to refer the case to arbitration, but upon terms which the petitioner was unable to agree to, and as he stated he had in fact no remedy at law Mr Neales gave notice that on Friday, the 17th instant, he should move the petition be printed

COLONIAL DEFENCES

Mr GLYDE, observing a despatch from the Secretary of State, upon the subject of colonial defences, on the table of the House, begged to ask the Commissioner of Public Works how soon the Government intended to take action upon it

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would be glad if the hon member would give notice of the question, as he was not at that moment in a position to answer it

PORT WILLUNGA

Mr LINDSAY was desirous of asking a question of the Commissioner of Public Works, which that hon gentleman would probably be prepared to answer without notice It was whether surveys had been made in accordance with the resolution of the House at the end of last session, in reference to a railway to Port Willunga

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that a survey had been made, and was in the hands of the Railway Commissioners, who had also some other surveys which had not yet reached him, but as soon as he received them, and had sufficient time to devote some little attention to them, he would lay them upon the table of the House

Mr LINDSAY said there were also surveys which had been determined upon, he believed, at the early part of last session, in reference to the extension of the Goolwa Railway to Victor Harbour and Rosetta Cove Had they been proceeded with?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was not in a position to answer the question

CUSTOMS LAWS AMENDMENT BILL

The TREASURER stated that by mistake he had left this Bill at his office, but had sent for it, in the interim the Attorney-General was prepared to proceed with notices standing in his name

CONFIRMATION OF REGISTRATIONS BILL

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL this Bill was read a third time and passed

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved for leave to introduce a Bill to facilitate the remedies on bills of exchange and promissory notes, by the prevention of frivolous and fictitious defences to actions thereon Hon members were aware that according to the present state of the law, upon an action being brought against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, or the maker of a promissory note, he was only able to appear or to defend the action by an affidavit that he had good grounds for a defence The experience of the mercantile community in reference to the present law was, he thought he might say, so far as the law went, that it had worked beneficially and satisfactorily, but it was, at the same time, felt by many persons that the remedy which the present law afforded against frivolous and vexatious defences, was incomplete in two respects In the first place it only applied to the acceptor of a bill of exchange, and to the maker of a promissory note, it did not apply to the party who had passed it, and had obtained value for it, namely, the endorser It was incomplete because, if, from the statement in the affidavit it should appear that there really was a defence, the summary remedy was put an end to, and the plaintiff was not only subjected to the cost of bringing an action in the Supreme Court, but was subjected to a delay of perhaps three or four months between the period of the bill arriving at maturity and obtaining a verdict In England this had been so severely felt that about three sessions ago, steps were taken to remedy the law in this respect by making the principle which had been recognised in the local legislature applicable to all persons who were parties to the bill or promissory note The whole of these parties, or any of them, were liable to be sued, and the making a defence was rendered impossible, unless a Judge were satisfied there were some grounds of defence which the party ought to be allowed to allege His attention had been directed to the English Act almost so soon as it had been passed, but as they already had a law with somewhat similar provisions he did not feel disposed to introduce new measures until he had ascertained how the new law worked in England The universal feeling amongst the mercantile community in England was, that the law had effected a great and salutary improvement, and the Chief Justice, Sir Charles Cooper, who had just returned from England, bore testimony to the great benefits which had resulted from it Fortified by the experience of that great mercantile community in reference to this measure, he thought the time had arrived when it was his duty to propose a similar measure for the consideration of the Legislature of this colony The object of the Act was, that any person who passed a bill of exchange or promissory note should be precluded from defending an action brought for the recovery of the amount unless he could shew to the satisfaction of a Judge that he had reasonable grounds for defending it If for instance he could shew that he had not received any value for the instrument, or if as an endorser he could shew that no notice had been given, or if he could shew indeed any ground which the law recognised as a defence, he would be allowed to plead, but he would not be allowed as at present merely to enter an appearance for the purpose of gaining time, and put the holder of the bill to the necessity of incurring the costs consequent upon an action in the Supreme Court He thought the House would see that the bill was sound in principle, as the person who had authenticated the bill and had obtained value for it, should not be able to put the holder to such expense and delay as at present The bill was substantially identical with the Act in England, and he moved that leave be given him to introduce such a measure

Mr STRANGWAYS, before the question was put, wished to ask the Attorney-General whether there was any provision in the new Bill in reference to the plaintiff's costs He understood that in England if a plaintiff proceeded under the Act which had been referred to that he could not recover costs

Mr GLYDE wanted to ask the hon gentleman another question He had understood the Attorney-General to state that this Bill was merely a copy of the English Act, and, if so, he would ask were they not already subject to that Act?

Mr BAKER should support the Bill, which he believed would be found of great advantage to the mercantile community It might be remembered that some sessions ago, when a Bill was brought forward for amending the practice of the Supreme Court, he brought this question forward, and even wished an extension of the principle to all cases, but at that time the Attorney-General did not think it prudent to accede to the proposition He was now disposed to go further than the present Bill, and extend the principle which it contained to all actions where a writ of summons had issued showing what were the precise grounds of the action He did not think that in such cases there should be any defence, unless good grounds could be shown At present there were a great number of cases before the Supreme Court, and he would venture to say that in a very great number of them either the record would be withdrawn, or judgment would be entered up by consent, shewing that there was really no substantial defence, and that the parties merely sought to gain time If the principle of the Bill were good as applied to bills of exchange, he could not see why it should not be equally good in all cases where the plaintiff explained the whole case He could not see any difference If the creditor were bound to pay within a certain time in one case, he could not see why he should not be bound to in the other where the case was not of such a nature as to require the intervention of a jury to determine the damages

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, in reply to the hon member for Encounter Bay, that the present Bill did provide that the plaintiff should recover costs that was the costs endorsed on the writ, or such further costs as were incurred which would have to be taxed by the Master He thought the hon member must be under some misapprehension in reference to the English Act as if the Act were even so framed that the plaintiff could not recover costs, it had subsequently undergone amendments, as there was an express provision in the Act upon the point alluded to, which provision had been copied into the Bill which he now sought to introduce In reference to the question of the hon member for East Torrens he might state that no English statute in which this colony was not expressly named had any operation in South Australia If the hon member for Light would introduce a measure such as he had described, extending the principles of the Bill, he (the Attorney-General) should be happy to give it his best consideration, but there appeared to him a substantial difference between the class of cases which this Bill sought to provide for, and those which had been alluded to by the hon member for Light If a person endorsed a bill of exchange and obtained money for it he gave every person who took the bill a right to rely upon his credit that it would be paid when it became due, and unless he could satisfy the Court that he had substantial grounds of defence he should not be allowed to defend the action brought for the recovery of the bill But in reference to a person who bought goods it appeared to him that the case was widely different, there might be a number of circumstances which rendered it desirable that he should be allowed to enter a defence He mentioned this as a reason that he had not introduced such a provision in the present Bill, but it was possible that upon further reflection he might be disposed to support such a measure as that which had been referred to by the hon member for Light

Mr NEALES thought the suggestion which had been thrown out by the honorable member for Light a most valuable one He thought it most desirable that the Bill introduced by the Attorney-General should extend not merely to bills of exchange and promissory notes, but to all transactions Under the existing law upon a defendant being sued for a small amount, he might make a demand for a far larger amount—a perfectly fictitious transaction—and this constituted a defence He referred to an instance which occurred a short time since, where a party upon being sued for 300*l* made a demand upon the plaintiff for between 4,000*l* and 5,000*l*, although no transaction to that extent had taken place between the parties That was a state of things which required correction Establishing a defence by a cross-action, was a perfect fallacy, which the sooner they got rid of the better

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS considered that there was very considerable force in what had been urged by the hon member for Light He would remind the House that vexatious defences to actions were punished with very great severity in the Insolvent Court, and some such provision as had been alluded to might perhaps be introduced with great benefit at a future period, but in the meantime it would be thought better to pass the Bill as it stood, that they might see how it worked

Leave having been granted, the Bill was read a first time and ordered to be printed, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for Thursday next

CUSTOMS LAWS

The TREASURER asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the laws of the Customs in certain particulars The Bill was very short, and the amendments very trifling, but trifling as they might appear in print, he believed they would be found of great importance to the commercial community It was at the instance of the commercial community, as represented by the Chamber of Commerce, that the Bill had been introduced The amendments related to the 20th clause of the Customs Act of 1854 That clause prescribed a certain time for entries inwards of all goods It prescribed that fourteen days should be allowed for vessels over 200 tons, and seven days if the ship were 200 tons or under This long delay had been found to operate very injuriously, and the Bill which he now asked leave to introduce provided that goods by coasting vessels and intercolonial steamers should be landed or discharged within 54 hours, and those of all other vessels within four days Another clause related to the definition of the coast line, which it was desirable should be thoroughly understood Two lines for instance might be taken as the coast line, that at low water and that at high watermark, but in this Bill it was proposed that high watermark should be taken Amendments were proposed in the 28th clause of the Coasting Act, which related to goods damaged on the voyage The 28th clause provided that there should be an abatement of duties in proportion to the damage received upon proof being made to the Collector, that the damage had accrued after the goods had been shipped and before they had been landed, but the new Bill went a little further and provided that the abatement should refer to goods which received damage before leaving the wharf at the port of entry Another clause related to the landing of fresh meat or vegetables before or after Customs' hours Permission was given by the Bill to intercolonial traders to land fruit, vegetables, or fresh meat, at any time, whether before or after Customs' hours, subject, however, to such regulations as the Custom-House authorities might think fit to impose This clause was represented as being very necessary, and he believed would be found very useful He asked leave to introduce the Bill

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS seconded the motion

Mr PEAKE was very glad that one step had been taken towards amending the Customs' regulations of the colony He was not previously aware what the contemplated alterations were, but from what he had been able to gather from the statement of the Treasurer, he believed they would be found beneficial and useful He hoped this might be regarded as the first step towards the abolition of the Custom-House altogether (Hear, hear) He trusted that before long they would open their eyes to a different policy altogether, and seek to derive the necessary revenue from some other source, thus relieving commerce from the trammels by which it was surrounded and confined, and establishing a better system of legislation.

Leave having been granted, the Bill was ordered to be printed, and the second reading was made an Order for the day for Thursday next

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The House went into Committee upon the Supplementary Estimates when

Mr BAGOT asked whether it would be in order to move the recommittal of any particular item without notice?

The CHAIRMAN said it would not be in order to do so until the report had been brought up

The following items were then proposed —

Establishments under direction of the Treasurer

Extra clerical assistance, four months, £40

Mr TOWNSEND suggested that the Treasurer should give a brief explanation of each item as it was read, as this would not only tend to shorten discussion, but prevent sums being voted under erroneous impressions

The TREASURER would be happy at all times to give the House every information in his power In reference to the particular item which had been proposed, he might remark that there were times during the meeting of that House when the press of business in the Treasury was very great, and it was impossible in his absence that the business could be got through It was absolutely requisite at such times that there should be temporary assistance It would not answer to place an additional amount of labor upon each clerk or upon any particular one, as it was requisite that the clerical labor should be done within a certain time, and it was therefore proposed to take a vote equivalent to a clerk of the third class for a third of the year

Mr REYNOLDS said the Treasurer had a Secretary, and there were a number of clerks in the office He was quite sure that the department was not overworked, and should vote against the proposed 40*l* for additional clerical assistance, as he could not see the necessity for it

The vote was assented to

The TREASURER said, in reference to this item, that when the Estimates were passed last year, there were two Custom-house officers who now appeared upon the Estimates for an increase, who were passed by in mistake, and were not included in the classification in which they ought to have been placed under the principle sanctioned by the House With regard to other items, he would remark, with regard to Port Elliot, Encounter Bay, it had been found necessary either to allow the Sub-Collector of Customs house-rent, or to build him a house, and it would be remembered that this particular appointment had been made upon the address of the House itself Last year an address was presented by that House asking for the appointment of an officer to collect the duties on the River Murray, and the officer who had been appointed to perform that duty when required, had also been appointed Collector of Customs at Encounter Bay In reference to Goolwa the same reasons presented themselves, it was necessary either to build a house for the Collector, or to purchase one for him The same remark also applied to Onkaparinga and Willunga

Mr REYNOLDS begged to ask the Treasurer whether the Sub-Collector of Customs at Goolwa did not hold another appointment?

The TREASURER said the gentleman alluded to did not hold another appointment, nor had he any other duties to perform Perhaps the hon gentleman was referring to two appointments which were formerly held by one gentleman, namely, the appointments of Harbor-Master and Collector of Customs, but those two duties had been found incompatible, and the officer now only received the salary of £150 for Harbor-Master The salary as Sub-Collector of Customs was not now drawn by him The offices were now held separately, but in consequence of the injustice which had accrued to the Harbour-Master it was now proposed to raise his salary to £200, which would still be less by £50 than he had received during the previous year when he held the two offices.

Mr REYNOLDS thought the hon. gentleman had misunderstood him His remarks had reference to the Sub-Collector at Goolwa, not Port Elliot, a person named Taylor, who, when he (Mr Reynolds) was in office, applied for an appointment in connection with the Public Works Department He wished to know if he had received that appointment?

The TREASURER had misunderstood the remarks of the hon member He believed that the Deputy Collector of Customs at Goolwa did hold two appointments, as he was Warehouse-keeper to the Railway Department He also received higher pay, in consequence of the duties which he had to perform in having to supervise the other Collector of Customs

Mr REYNOLDS wished to know what salary this gentleman received as Warehouse-keeper, and what as Sub-Collector?

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to know why the reduction of the Harbour Master's salary at Port Elliot had been made without any notification to that officer by the Government A number of officers residing in the interior were in the habit of having their salaries paid into one of the banks in town, and this gentleman having no notification to the contrary, thought that his usual amount of salary had been paid in, but did not discover that his salary had been reduced to £150 for three or four months, when the discovery was made, in consequence of his sending in his bank book to be made up He hoped the Treasurer would be able to give some explanation of this circumstance, although it occurred prior to that hon gentleman taking office

The TREASURER said he was not in a position to fully explain the circumstance referred to He was not enabled to state whether notice of the reduction in salary had been given or not, but as the salary had only been voted for a year it was not considered at the termination of that period that the officer was entitled to hold both offices

Dr WARK asked whether this gentleman had his full salary voted to him last session or whether part had been taken away?

The TREASURER reminded the House that they were not then discussing any salary connected with the Harbor Department, but he was still prepared to answer the question Last year the Harbor-Master at Port Elliot held two offices, Sub-Collector of Customs and Deputy Harbor-Master, and during the passing of the Estimates through the House the salary of Harbor-Master was reduced to 150*l* At the commencement of the present year this officer only retained the office of Harbor-Master, the reason being that he was not considered fit to carry out the duties connected with the Customs As a seaman he was excellent, and consequently well adapted for Harbor Master, but as an accountant he was not considered sufficiently good for Collector of Customs On further reference to the question asked by the hon member for East Torrens as to the two offices held by the Deputy Collector of Customs at Goolwa, he had been just informed by the Commissioner of Public Works that the gentleman only held one office, having resigned that in connection with the Public Works Department

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if the Deputy Harbor Master at Port Elliot had not for a considerable time filled the office of Collector of Customs The division of these offices cost the country an extra £100 a year If this gentleman had filled the office for some years, he must surely know something about accounts

The TREASURER said the officer had been drawing a salary for an almost nominal office, but the trifling duties which he had to perform he performed them very inefficiently His accounts were full of errors, and the office since the commencement of the present year was for some time in abeyance, till the House asked for the appointment of a Collector of Customs at the Murray, and then the office of Deputy Collector of Customs at Port Elliot was filled up, the party undertaking to perform the duties at the Murray when required

Dr WARK considered it something extraordinary that the Treasurer should tell them that a gentleman was receiving a salary for merely nominal duties It was well known that the gentleman had held the two offices at Port Elliot for a number of years and there had been no complaint against him The public had a right to know why he was displaced, he was a steady man, and a good scholar, perfectly competent to perform the duties Two offices had now been created instead of one, and the salaries were so trifling that he apprehended it would be difficult to get competent parties to accept them Why not combine the two offices? The statement of the Treasurer required explanation, and the conduct of the Government appeared to him most extraordinary

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought the hon gentleman who had last addressed the House could not have heard, or certainly had not understood the statement of the Treasurer The question originally asked, he understood was whether the Harbor-Master at Port Elliot did not originally hold the office of Collector of Customs in connection with that of Harbor-Master, and why he no longer held it? The answer was that at one time that officer did hold the two offices alluded to, but that the manner in which he had discharged the duties of Collector of Customs was so unsatisfactory that it was not considered desirable he should hold it any longer The Government were blamed for abolishing that office ("No, no") It was quite clear they were, and if hon members had paid attention to the debate they would have known they were They were blamed for abolishing the office, because by so doing they reduced the emoluments of the Harbor-Master, but they now proposed to remedy that by giving him an increase of salary But for the address of that House, the office of Collector of Customs at Port Elliot would never have been filled up It was never the intention of the Government to fill it up, but a resolution was passed by the House, asking for the appointment of an officer to collect the duties on the River Murray, and in order to comply with the wishes of the House, the Government filled up the office of Collector of Customs at Port Elliot, that officer being also appointed to collect the duties at the Murray The Government had no desire to create a new office, but they merely wished to comply with the wishes of the House Instead of appointing a Collector of Customs at Port Elliot, and a Collector of Customs at the Murray, they combined the two offices If it were asked why they did not allow the Harbor-Master at Port Elliot to have the appointment, the answer was obvious, that the duties of the Harbor-Master required him to be at the Port for the purpose of boarding steamers and other vessels, and performing the duties in connection with his appointment as Harbor-Master If the hon member who had last spoken had heard and understood the Treasurer he would have seen that the Government had been actuated by a desire not to increase a department or to make a fresh office, but to save expense and meet the wishes of the House

Mr BAGOT suggested that if the hon member (Dr Wark) thought the officer who had been referred to had been dismissed without sufficient cause he had better move for a Select Committee to enquire into the matter

Mr TOWNSEND asked if the duties of that officer had increased so much as to render it necessary to pay £40 additional

Mr HUGHES had understood that that officer was to reside at the Goolwa The object of the members of that House in appointing that officer was to do away with the complaints which had been made by the neighbouring colonies that parties trading on the Murray had to take their steamers down to Goolwa to be cleared And seeing that this colony paid about £900 for collecting the revenue he would wish to know if those officers were directed to proceed to any point of the river where the steamers might conveniently be cleared

Mr PEAKE thought there was a screw loose somewhere—(laughter)—in that business of Port Elliot, because, as far as he recollected the resolution of the House, the station was to be fixed on the frontier so as to meet the views of the neighbouring colonies, to collect the duties as necessity arose from vessels passing up the Murray As well as he could recollect the resolution of that House was to the effect that the Collector of Customs on the Murray should be placed as nearly as possible to the Victorian frontier, in order to carry out the views distinctly expressed by it, and, therefore he thought the House was right in asking whether those ideas had been carried into effect, The Sub-Collector at Port Elliot and Encounter Bay had got for a house, £18 10s , and another at Goolwa, £40 He thought there must be two or three collectors down there Surely there was no occasion for those two officers Those matters looked strange, and he thought that some enquiry ought to be made He thought also, as an economical arrangement, that the Superintendent of Port Elliot Tramway might also act as Collector of Customs, as he had plenty of spare time to fulfil all the duties necessary If he could fulfil these duties at Port Elliot, Goolwa, and Encounter Bay, it would be a great saving, and would justify a small addition to his salary He (Mr Peake) hoped the House would consider these suggestions before voting those salaries

The TREASURER was rather puzzled what to say, for he was blamed on the one side for not making an appointment, and on the other side for making one, because the traffic was so small

Mr PEAKE rose to order He did not say that the traffic was so small as not to require an officer, but that an officer should be appointed to carry out the wish of the Council

The TREASURER said the hon member had mistaken the terms of the address The address recommended that an officer should be stationed below the North-West Bend of the Murray (hear, hear), and the Government in carrying out that memorandum, had nothing ulterior in view They had saved 64*l* 10s 4d in the salary of the Sub-Collector at Port Elliot, by leaving that office vacant for a time, and they now proposed to fill it at a cost, for the remainder of the year of 18*l* 10s Thus there would be a saving of 46*l* In doing this they were desirous of fulfilling the wish of the House as expressed in the resolution alluded to Should vessels go below the North-West Bend the officer would go and clear them. He could not be sent up without a house to live in, and there was not one to put him in This question had been mixed up with that of the appointment of Harbor Master, but when the House turned to the next item it would be found that the Government had effected a saving It was true that they had increased the salary of one person by 80*l* , but by the arrangements which had been made, there had been saved in this department 46*l*

Dr WARK considered the whole affair required explanation He wanted to know whether the Murray was the place named, as under that term appeared to be included Goolwa, Encounter Bay, and Port Elliot The sea would be considered the River Murray next (Laughter) The Murray was clearly understood to be the place where an officer should be placed and the stationing another officer elsewhere was clearly a multiplication of offices Those gentlemen have to go two or three hundred miles in order to grant proper certificates to vessels That was not the way to do business The Government acted contrary to the spirit of the resolution of the House, and appointed a person as

Sub-Collector at Port Elliot, whose duties were acknowledged to be merely nominal

Mr Hay said, that when instructions were given to appoint an officer on the Murray he took an interest in it, believing that every facility should be given to shipping goods up the Murray, and could not agree with the last speaker in the observations he had made He thought the Government had taken a wise course in affording facilities for the clearing of vessels, and having appointed officers for that purpose the House ought to vote the salaries He contended the course adopted by the Government was right so far

Mr Peake said Port Elliot, Goolwa, and Encounter Bay were at a considerable distance below the North-West Bend of the Murray, and if hon gentlemen in that House considered the explanations given sufficient, he considered it was a very Hibernian way of carrying the vote (Laughter) If the House approved it, however, it was well He considered the course adverse to the views of the neighbouring colony The resolution of that House had been especially supported by those gentlemen who were in favor of a Federation of the Colonies (No, no) They said it must be done, and they supported it with their voice, unless he was very oblivious respecting it (Laughter) If hon gentlemen would take the trouble to read the debates of that House, they would be convinced that members advocating the Federation of the Colonies had advised that course to be taken as soon as possible, for the purpose of preventing smuggling up the Murray

Mr Neales thought that the most sensible observations had been made by Mr Hay For his part, he (Mr Neales) was not in favour of Colonial Federation Those who blamed the Government were wrong, however much they might think their intentions right He believed the resolution as carried out, would effect the saving stated by the Treasurer, and he thought there were other impediments in and about the Murray besides the snags (Laughter)

The question was then put, and carried

The next item was £80, coast and harbour service

Mr Strangways asked if the Harbor Master was to have good service pay ?

Mr Hughes asked whether any arrangement had been made for shifting the buoys as necessity arose, for he had been credibly informed that the buoys instead of warning vessels off the sandbanks were mere decoys

The Treasurer imagined the hon member (Mr Hughes) coming more lately from school than himself (the Treasurer), was probably better acquainted with the difference between a buoy and a decoy than he was (Laughter) The Harbor-Master had brought the matter under his notice, and had received full authority to remove the buoys whenever the necessity arose, and with regard to Encounter Bay he had previously stated exactly the position of the Harbor-Master He had formerly held two offices, that of Harbor-Master, and also that of Sub-Collector of Customs In the Estimates for 1858 the salary voted was 120*l* and for the Sub-Collector of Customs, 150*l* Those two items together made 270*l* a-year, which would have been his salary had he held those two offices The hon member would find in the Supplementary Estimates the salary of the Harbor-Master stated at 120*l* Good service pay had nothing to do with salaries That was an amount given to persons who had remained long in the service, or who were supposed to be more efficient than others in the discharge of their duties It was not a salary attached to office Had the Harbor-Master held these two offices his salary would have been 270*l* a-year, but it was found he could not be useful to the public by holding these two offices, and he (the Treasurer) asked the House to sanction the arrangement the Government had made, which was that he would receive his salary of 200*l* a-year as Harbor Master, and 80*l* as placed on the Supplementary Estimates

The item was carried

The next items were, commission to Agent for South Australia in England, 200*l*, and contingencies, 50*l*

Mr Hughes asked the Government whether securities had been given for the amount of money under the control of the Agent, and whether that gentleman was instructed to transmit a periodical report of his transactions He considered the department a most important one, and that some explanation should be given as to what security was held, as very large sums were sometimes intrusted to him—sometimes as much as 54,000*l*

Mr Burford asked whether the Agent was to receive a commission on transactions in addition to his salary, and whether this colony paid the passage of the gentleman who had just now been appointed ? (Great laughter)

The Treasurer would answer the last question first The gentleman lately appointed had resided in England some years, and therefore there was no passage to pay The name of the gentleman was Walters The instructions given to him had been carefully considered He (the Treasurer) agreed with hon members that it was most important they should be placed before the House, but it was less necessary as the Government had received no intimation of his (the Agent's) having entered upon his duties It had been requested that he should go to the Colonial Office and enter into the necessary bond upon which he was immediately to enter upon his duties He accordingly had presented himself and given the required security, but the Government had not received official notice of his appointment In the meantime his salary was unpaid and the former agent had continued to act His accounts and balances were all examined, and care had been taken to secure the balances, as far as he was concerned He (the Treasurer) would observe that the salary of the new Agent had thus been saved altogether, and the old Agent had thus been remunerated, under a former arrangement, by a commission on certain sums of money which he had paid on account of the colony Every quarter a special account was sent of every thing on which commission was charged, and those accounts were audited in this colony

Mr Burford had imagined that the Immigration Department was under consideration

Mr Cole asked, with reference to the General Agent, whether he was responsible for the quality and condition of goods sent to the colony He was led to ask the question in consequence of the loss to the colony on the Glenelg Jetty When he thought of that he scarcely knew how to coin a word to express his feelings in regard to the gross neglect apparent respecting it If this country were to be burdened with the consequences of such neglect, he could not conceive that the Agent had a right to commission on such transactions

The Treasurer would be happy to give every information The very purpose of appointing an agent in England was to secure the shipment of goods of good quality, and to see them properly shipped The change that had been made was to prevent the abuses formerly prevalent The Government had altogether a new balance-sheet, and a new agent, who was a gentleman of extensive experience, and completely under the control of the Executive, and he (the Treasurer) trusted the business would be ably carried out

Mr Cole asked if he was to understand that the Agent would be responsible ?

Mr Peake said we had turned over a new leaf, and got a new balance-sheet, but he thought we ought not to have a report like the present With respect to the Glenelg Jetty, an immense loss to the colony had accrued from the bad quality of the materials used in its construction He thought it a serious question when 30,000*l* or 40,000*l* were paid for inferior workmanship, under the supervision of a paid agent Those were points to which the House should give every attention, and should be glad if such things were avoided in future

Mr Strangways considered it ought to be the last time that the colony should pay a salary to a general agent He thought those things were managed better in Melbourne It was only a short time ago that a mercantile firm in Melbourne paid a large sum to Government for the privilege of furnishing that colony with goods at cost prices He thought the plan might be adopted in this colony

The item was agreed to

Office of Commissioner of Public Works—The next item was for professional assistance and incidental expenses, £125

Passed

Colonial Architect—Occasional assistance and sundries, £330

Passed

Observatory and Telegraph—On the item 1,021*l* 6s 8d being proposed,

Mr Strangways asked if the promise made to the Observer and Inspector of Telegraphs had been fulfilled ?

The Treasurer stated that Mr Todd had made no complaint of the arrangements not having been carried out He had not even asked for an increase of salary, though his duties had been increased owing to an increase of business consequent upon opening the intercolonial line He (the Treasurer) had made enquiries and was not aware of any cause of complaint

Mr Strangways stated that Mr Todd had not mentioned the matter to him, they were only reports which he (Mr Strangways) had heard outside the House

Mr Bagot asked if any provision had been made for the extension of the electric telegraph to Gawler Town and Kapunda, as there was no provision made on the Supplementary Estimates for it

The Commissioner of Public Works stated that the telegraph to Kapunda had been delayed some time unavoidably, but that tenders were now asked for by the Government for the necessary posts

Mr Reynolds, in reference to Mr Todd, said that, although he had not complained of his salary, he had good reason to complain, as he had only 500*l* a year, and considering the duties that gentleman had to perform, it seemed a small sum If certain officers had 1,000*l* voted to them, we could not refuse to give him more than 500*l*, and he (Mr Reynolds) trusted the Government would take the matter into consideration in the Estimates for 1859, for he considered the work justly entitled to a higher remuneration than 500*l* a year Not to pay persons well who are so well qualified for the office, rendered it possible that we might lose them

The Commissioner of Public Works was glad to hear so graceful a compliment paid to the Superintendent of Telegraphs The hours of attendance necessary in that office were hardly known in any other office in the colony The Government would favourably consider the hon member's suggestion

Mr Lindsay had gone to the office at various hours, and had always found Mr Todd at his post

Mr Hay stated that £300 had been voted when the Estimates were brought forward for incidental expenses, and now

£300 more were asked for He wished to know why such a large amount was found necessary?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was in consequence of the expenses connected with the Intercolonial Telegraph, and could assure the House that every economy had been used

The amount was voted

The items for Good Service Pay and the Superannuation Fund were voted

The items of 47*l* 2s 10d for police paddocks and outstations, and of 4*l* 13s 6d for the new store at Goolwa, were severally agreed to

The next item was 300*l* for a new cellar, plastering, and a galvanized iron verandah for Government House

Mr HUGHES asked if the House was ever to know the expense of the Government House The expenses of furnishing it were a dreadful sinking of money He thought it better to adopt some general plan on which the Government should act respecting it

Mr BURFORD would like to know what the Government House would cost He thought such a statement would be a very interesting document for the House to have before them Such expenses might be very well to add to the comforts of a few, but the community had to bear the burden of them

Mr REYNOLDS said the sum of £300 was voted for a cellar, and it was found £300 was not sufficient for the purpose, and that £300 more would be required to finish it He thought £150 would be sufficient, and that the House ought not to vote more than was required, otherwise it would all go (Laughter)

Mr NEALES thought they were treating the affair in the style of a District Council They were giving £3 500 merely to put that building up, and then doubling the amount It was perfectly frightful There was £2,000 for furniture, and £1,900 more asked for There was another thing, however, connected with that furniture He thought it right that if such things could be supplied by the merchants in Adelaide they ought to have the preference, but in that instance, a Melbourne merchant had asked for and obtained the order and taken the commission in one shape or other If the Government could tell him when they were likely to stop, he might be inclined to be rather liberal, with the Government residence They had men of high standing in the colony, and unless there was a clear and unmistakeable profit in passing by them they ought to be preferred in supplying the goods required

Mr HART was afraid that it would be found, on enquiry, that a large portion of that 1,900*l* had already been spent, and, therefore, the House was too late to protest against that expenditure (Oh oh) He considered the credit of the colony must be upheld, and would wish the Treasurer to point out the exact sums he wished to carry, for he should not like to strike the whole sum out

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL believed it to be a fact that a considerable portion of the expense had been incurred, but in justice to himself and colleagues he ought to say that that expenditure had been incurred under a former Government and not under the present He believed the whole expenditure had been incurred previous to the inauguration of responsible government He was bound to say, however, that the orders sent out were limited to £2,000 for furniture, but in fulfilling those orders the expense had risen to £3900 With regard to the 1900*l* the whole of it was required to pay for goods already received, and which were in the Government House That was the only order which had not been given to persons not connected with the colony and he (the Attorney-General) sympathised with Mr Neales, when he said that those orders should be executed by persons residing in the colony, unless some public saving should render another course advisable, He thought the Government ought to furnish the House with the fullest explanation, and should such be desired, they would lay every thing fully before it

Mr HUGHES hoped the Government would lay the information before the House They (the members) were there to sanction proper expenditure, and he thought they were of no use in that respect if they only had to vote money to pay for expenses already incurred He thought the case too serious to be passed over without further explanation, he thought it as serious a case as that of the Glenelg Jetty

Mr PEAKE thought the House was in a fix about that money It appeared very plain that instead of 3,300*l* being spent, 3,620*l* more must be voted 690*l* were spent on Glenelg Cottage, including the cellar, and, as he gathered from the Treasurer the money was spent and the House had nothing to do but to pay the bill There was, however, one item for painting the Government House, including the garden, 150*l* He wished to know if that had been spent, because, if not, it might as well be saved He would be willing to vote a liberal sum towards the residence of the representative of the Queen but he was not willing to trespass so much on the colonial funds as was now asked, and he thought that item might be struck out

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that it appeared necessary to have a verandah round Government House, and that they had looked closely into the item and he believed that sum, £300, would be required He believed that true economy would be carried out best by external painting as it was necessary for the preservation of the materials, and that, therefore, he hoped the remarks of the member for Burra and Clare would not induce hon members to refuse the vote The Government were not responsible for the orders that had been given and to which allusions had been made The case was similar to that of Glenelg Jetty, the expenses having been incurred under irresponsible government, and it was not likely to take place again

Mr TOWNSEND hoped the vote for that money would be delayed until full information was given to the House Mr Hart had said the expenditure had been incurred and must be provided for, if so what was the use of their meeting

Mr HART said the last speaker had misunderstood him He did not say the House had no power to say whether the money should be paid or not They were there to say whether they would pay it or not, but supposing that House refused to pay the amount, the question arose on whom the charge would fall They would have to go back to the question respecting the goods in the Government House It was not a question whether the goods were wanted or not, for the goods were in the Government House, but they were only required to pay for those that had been received He thought great extravagance had been exhibited

Mr COLE begged to correct a mistake In speaking on that vote he had said there had been voted 3,000*l*, and the House was asked to vote so much more, but they had nothing to do with the last item He considered the Government responsible for the over charges The House had nothing to do with them

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that hon members spoke as if the House had last year sanctioned 3000*l* Now 3000*l* was voted in 1856, and no addition had been made since the introduction of responsible government When he became a member of the Administration he expected that responsibility to fall upon him which Mr Cole was desirous to fix upon the Executive, but he thought that gentleman's sense of fairness would show him that it was unreasonable to fix the responsibility of ordering goods upon persons who were not in office when they were ordered, and object to the vote when payment was asked for them He thought hon gentlemen might delay voting on the furniture until information was laid before the House

Mr BURFORD thought since the matter was an accomplished fact, the House ought to steer clear of repudiation He was not willing to incur the imputation of repudiating debts, and although the Attorney-General expressed his willingness to delay those items, he saw no good purpose in withholding the vote

The TREASURER was in the Government at the time the order was given The money was voted in 1856, and when the first order was sent home, he wrote, under direction, to the agent, requesting him to buy furniture to the extent of 1,000*l*, the real vote being for 2 000*l* for furniture and decorations Finding that sum insufficient the limit was afterwards extended to to 1,500*l* They considered that they were thus keeping within bounds Certain things were ordered according to an estimate of value, but the invoices amounted to more than was expected, and rendered it necessary to place the sum under consideration on the Supplementary Estimates There would be nothing reserved out of it for the whole amount was expended

Mr TOWNSEND thought it would be better not to pass the vote

Mr HUGHES and Mr BAGOT made several remarks condemnatory of the expense

Mr HAY trusted the suggestion of the Attorney-General would be adopted He had gone through the items from the cellar downwards—(great laughter)—and he thought explanation was required

Mr REYNOLDS could see no object in postponing the vote

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS explained that in order to finish the cellar, above 200*l* were required, and therefore it would not be safe to ask less than 300*l*

Mr YOUNG made some remarks which the Chairman ruled to be out of order, as he (Mr Young) was speaking to items not under consideration

Mr YOUNG bowed to the opinion of the Chairman, but suggested that other matters had been discussed

Mr BAGOT, with all deference, thought that Public Works were under consideration, and therefore other items might be commented on

The CHAIRMAN said hon members would bear in mind the question under discussion was Government House, 300*l*

Mr BAGOT thought it impossible to discuss the particular item without reference to other items on the Estimates

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member for Noarlunga would have been in order had he proceeded as he began Any hon member would be justified in contrasting the item under discussion with any other in the Estimates, but not in discussing the propriety of voting for one not then under consideration

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member had not been comparing sums, but discussing one not then before the House

Mr DUTTON would support the item The Government had effected many savings in other directions

Mr PEAKE thought by postponing the vote, they might possibly get some of the money back He did not misapprehend the nature of responsibility, but the present members of the Government were responsible to the House, although the successors of those who were appointed under another system

The TREASURER said that after hearing the various reasons

brought forward, and perceiving the general desire of the House to have these items reserved for further consideration, he would propose to reserve them, and he had no doubt that the explanation which he would lay before the House would show the necessity of the vote

The various items relating to Government House and Cottage were then postponed

On the next item, New Powder Magazine, 250*l* —

Mr HUGHES inquired where the building was situate He understood the Trinity Board had recommended a hulk, and that now a most extraordinary structure had been put up for that purpose

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, this extraordinary building, as the hon member called it, was a very well designed powder magazine situate at the North Arm, which would have the effect of removing a grievance of which the people of the Port had long complained The reason the sum of 250*l* was required, was, that contracts had been taken for the building, and it was found that the 2,000*l* previously voted was insufficient

Mr REYNOLDS, seeing that the Chamber of Commerce had made remarks depreciatory of the Government in this matter, and supposing that these gentlemen were to rule the Government in all matters connected with the country, would say a few words on this subject An hon member had said that the Trinity Board were desirous of having a hulk for storing powder During his (Mr Reynolds's) term of office he had endeavored to procure a hulk, and had visited Port Adelaide for that purpose, and had consulted the Trinity Board as to where one could be obtained and where the best place would be to moor it They then fixed on a site at the North Arm, as one near the Port would not answer A brig was recommended to him but the sum demanded for her by her owner was so far beyond what the Government considered they were justified in paying that they were under the necessity of building the present magazine It was a peculiar structure, and had been approved of by the Surveyor-General and the Trinity Board

Mr COLE hoped it would not be deemed presumptuous in him to offer an opinion, but he understood that the magazine was a wooden building (he heard from the Commissioner of Public Works), lined within with iron The building at high water stood some three feet above the sea, so that any person moved by malice might go under it and produce an explosion of the whole affair If this was a specimen of a powder magazine, he was at a loss to find words to express what he thought of it The idea of a wooden building, which would not be allowed to be erected in Adelaide, being considered sufficient for a powder magazine was absurd

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS differed from the hon member entirely The plan of the building was that generally adopted in Europe at present, as it had been found better to make magazines lighter than they were formerly, as it was well known that the more powder was confined the greater was its power of explosion, and the ignition of powder was so easy a matter that even with a stone or iron building any one who desired to cause an explosion might accomplish it The building was slated outside, and plastered inside and had he believed, been approved of by every one who saw it He himself had some experience in gunpowder, and he considered the building an admirable one

The item was passed

The next two items were passed without discussion, as follows —Alterations and repairs to public buildings generally, 1,500*l* alteration to Port Elliot Police Station, 55*l*

On the next item, painting, papering, and decorating Government House, 400*l*,

Mr REYNOLDS said before this item was postponed he must state that he could not understand how it was that when he retired from office, according to the statement of the Colonial Architect there was a balance of 400*l* or rather a saving to that amount, on this item, and now there was 400*l* the other way All the painting was finished at the time he retired to

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could only say that the Government would lay the fullest information on the subject before the House

The item was then postponed

The next item, Additions to Military Barracks, Dry Creek, 320*l*, was agreed to without discussion

On the next item, Verandah to Custom-House, Port Adelaide, 50*l*,

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether this sum was already expended

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS believed it was

Mr REYNOLDS believed that the present Collector of Customs at the Port had undertaken the responsibility of erecting the verandah to this Government building without having any authority for doing so and the House was now asked to vote money for an unauthorised expenditure made by a Government officer He stated this that the House might express its opinion on the subject

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS knew what that opinion would be, and he quite agreed that it was not justifiable in a Government officer to expend money on a Government building without authority for doing so At the same time he thought such a case would not occur again

Mr HUGHES would like to know why the amount should not be stopped The verandah was in the Collector's private garden and not for public use, and he believed it was built by the same officer who had built the Blanche without having any authority for doing so

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said if the hon member had listened to his reply to the question of the hon member (Mr Reynolds) he would know that this money was already expended

Mr TOWNSEND understood that the money had been spent without authority, and, in ordinary business, the practice was to make a person pay himself for any expenditure he made without authority He thought the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works must see that if a public officer went out of his way to build a verandah and a skiff he should be made pay for them

Mr HUGHES understood that the gentleman spent the money himself, and he now asked the Government to refund it He thought it should be stopped

Dr WARK moved that the item be struck out

Mr REYNOLDS must come to the rescue of the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works He believed this item would have been brought forward if he had retained office, but he had never promised to pay it He merely meant to take the sense of the House upon the subject, but the principle was so objectionable, that he thought some one should be made an example of

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired whether the sum had been applied for

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was anxious to give every information and was sorry if he had failed to convey it The money was expended before he took office, and he had already stated in reply to the question of the hon member for Sturt that he did not approve of an officer spending money without authority The sum was brought before the House in the ordinary way, but if the House persisted in making an example they would have the honor and glory of getting the verandah for nothing He believed that some good would be done by the discussion, and that nothing of the kind would occur again

Mr MILNE thought the House should not consider whether the verandah was wanting or not, but whether an officer should be allowed to expend money on public buildings without authority

Mr SCAMMELL thought they had begun at the wrong end There was an item for the painting and papering of Government House, and several others which were spent without authority, and he thought the parties who had expended these should be held responsible

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member was out of order in reverting to this subject

Mr BURFORD had no doubt that when the Collector at the Port spent this money he felt that he could afford to do so, but he took the chance of getting it back from the Government (Laughter) He thought they should expunge the item

The item was then put and negatived without a division

The next item was wall round Police Station and Post-Office, Port Adelaide 215*l* 3s 10*d*

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said this vote was rendered necessary in consequence of the fire at the Port

The vote was agreed to

The next item, Fencing Frome Bridge-road, on river bank, 140*l*, was agreed to without remark

On the next item, Additions and Alterations to Parliament Houses 1,500*l*

Mr HUGHES wished to know if this was for the completion of the Houses or were they to have an annual vote During the last session it was proposed to have new Parliament Houses with a view to enlarged accommodation It was proposed to apply a large sum for the erection of a Mechanics' Institution, and as the Parliament Houses was not adapted to the use of the hon members he thought it would not be wise to go on spending money for the purpose of making it what it was not when it was built Would it not be well to convert the present Houses into a Public Library and Institute, and commence the erection of new Parliament Houses

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that this sum was for the repairs, additions, and very great improvements, of which hon members were at present deriving the benefit These improvements had been executed under very careful supervision, and in making them the House had been aided by the valuable advice of the Hon the Speaker The sum had been already expended

The motion was then agreed to

On the next item, New Colonial Store, £1,550,

Mr NEALES would like to know what this store was for, as it was a very short time since they voted that there should be no Colonial Storekeeper He believed that for the interest on this money, at less than 6 per cent they could store all the goods of the Government in the best store in Port Adelaide The Government must be going to turn general merchants (Laughter) The Exchange which he built cost only 1 200*l*, and what did they want of an immense store, with he supposed steeple roofs like the Horse-police Barracks (Laughter) A very small expenditure on the old Colonial Store would answer all the purposes (no, no), but the fact was the Government wanted to create a new establishment They had nearly got rid of the old store, and now they were about to begin on a new one and asked for 1,550*l* without having either a plan or estimate If they voted this they would find next year in the same column a sum of 1,650*l*, and would be told coolly that the building came to a little more than then was expected

The Commissioner of Public Works said they were not beginning with a new store, for they had passed a vote a few days since for 60l. rent of a store, and the interest of 1 550l at the usual Government rate of 6 per cent would be only 93l The cost was estimated at the rate at which the work could now be done, and there was no danger of any further requisition beyond 1,550l, as he hoped and trusted there would be a saving on the present vote At the same time he did not consider it safe to ask for less, as this was the estimate of the Colonial Architect The building might, however, cost less, as was the case with the Salisbury Court-House, and many other buildings on which there had been a saving The building was intended to be erected near the Police Barracks, North-terrace, and would be a two-storied building, as it was represented, and he believed it was true that a two-storied building was necessary for a Government store, the lower story being a place where packages could be opened and placed upon the floor, and the upper story one in which unpacked goods could be placed on shelves

Mr Reynolds hoped the House would vote a sum for a colonial store, for the suggestion of the hon member (Mr Neales) could not be entertained for a moment The mere going down there for stationery would occupy a number of messengers He hoped the House would vote a sum, whether it was 1,550l or not, for this very desirable object They wanted a store for the large quantities of stationery which arrived here, but not for surplus stores, for he thought they were not worth keeping The neighbourhood of the barracks was, he thought, as good a site as could be chosen It was at first thought to put the building in Victoria-square, but there was not room for one of sufficient size. He hoped if it was placed near the barracks as much money would not be expended on a common store as had been laid out in the decoration of the other buildings in that neighbourhood This 1,550l seemed a large sum, and he thought a very good store might be had for 1,000l

Mr Peake said if the store was to be on the North-terrace near the Police Barracks the objection taken to the old store that it would require a number of messengers to go to it applied also to this one. His first objection was that it was not to be in a proper place, and next he thought the Government could hire a good store in Adelaide, for they were unfortunately unoccupied, for the interest on 1,550l, and the capital would be useful for something else A very good use for the present store would be to put it up to auction sale

Mr Duffield said, whenever the Colonial Store or Storekeeper were mentioned, they heard of stationery He thought it would be better to take tenders for stationery, instead of getting it out from England, and paying £1,550 for a store and the salary of a storekeeper, and he did not know whether anything else would follow On the next page he found a sum of £1,500 for stationery Unless Government wanted the store for some other purpose, it would be better to advertise for stationery to be delivered at the Government Offices, like all other goods, and then it would be procured cheaper

The Commissioner of Public Works said no better reasons could be urged in favor of the store than those of the hon member for Sturt, who was an excellent economist, and who had looked closely into the matter He thought that hon. member's testimony would have been sufficient without any remarks from him There were other things included in the word "stationery" There was a Government Printing Office here, where an immense amount of paper was used, and there was much also consumed in the other offices. As he had said, it was necessary to rent a store in Gresham-street, and make that the Government depot, but it was well known that the Government did not insure their goods, and on this account a store in the city was not considered quite safe There was also a yard required for many things

Mr Dunn had accepted a tender lately for building a store of 80 feet by 40, and of the best materials, for 843l, and it had three windows and five doors He therefore thought 1,500l was too large a sum

At the suggestion of Mr Burford, the motion was here amended by the addition of the words "and enclosure wall"

Mr Reynolds moved that the sum be reduced to 800l

The amendment was lost

Mr Peake moved that the item be struck out

The Speaker ruled that this was not an amendment The hon member's course would be to vote against the motion when it was put

Mr Milne moved that the sum be 1000l

Mr Hughes enquired whether the wall round the building was to be of stone.

The Commissioner of Public Works replied in the affirmative

Mr Hughes would under these circumstances vote for the original motion

After some slight discussion the amendment was put and carried by a majority of six, the numbers being as follows —

Ayes, 17 —Messrs Cole, Duffield, Dunn, Glyde, Hallett, Hawker, Lindsay, Mildred, Milne (teller), Neales, Peake, Reynolds, Scammell, Strangways, Townsend, Dr Wark, Mr Young

Noes, 9 —The Attorney-General, The Treasurer, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Bakewell, Burford, Hay, Hughes, MacDermott

The two next items were agreed to without remark, as follows —Addition to Telegraph Stations, at Mount Gambier and Robe Town, 930l, enclosing sheds at Lunatic Asylum, 140l.

On the next item, New Registry Offices, 4,000l.

Mr Hawker moved that the item be struck out After what they had heard on the previous day that the Bill was only to be allowed to exist on sufferance for one year—No, no) The Attorney-General had said that he would not interfere with it for a year—(no, no)—and, therefore, he thought this motion premature He had frequently gone to see a gentleman at the office, and he never found any one there on business—(laughter)—and, therefore, he thought there was room enough for the business to be done at present.

Mr Strangways would oppose the vote, as the Estimates would be on the table in five or six weeks, and by that time the House would have more information respecting the Act

Mr Reynolds had listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon member (Mr Bagot) on the subject of internal communication, and regretted to see so small a sum for this purpose The Land Fund was likely to be soon exhausted, and they should devote all they could to roads, bridges, railways, and tramways, and the general communications of the country, rather than to costly buildings From the Supplementary Estimates they might strike off £24,000, which, if devoted to the communications of the colony, would be of great benefit

Mr Neales, as he had said on the previous day, had no objection to give fair play to the Bill, but thought the new and old Registration Offices should be combined, and addition made to the old office The new one would then be an uncalled-for extravagance.

Mr Dunn would support the amendment He was not often in the office, but he had been there on that day, and amongst other things Mr Torrens told him that it took one clerk constantly to run from one office to the other But this was better than putting up a costly building

The Commissioner of Public Works appealed to the legal members to point out the inconveniences of the old office The Government was now paying more than the interest on £4,000 for the new office, and considerable room was occupied in the Supreme Court by papers which should all be under one roof

Mr Strangways said as it was the intention to combine the new and old Registration Offices, he would alter the mode of giving his vote. (No, and hear) He was also told that the room now occupied was wanted at the Supreme Court It would be real economy, as they were paying the interest of the money in rent for the new Registry-Office, to vote the sum at once

Mr Mildred—Though a friend to the Act, had felt some hesitation as to his vote until he heard the explanation, He hoped there would be a suitable room for the books and papers, for if a fire were to take place, the consequences would be most disastrous

Mr Bakewell hoped the old system of registration and the new would both be done away with, for he did not know which had done most to prevent a cheap mode of conveyance from being introduced He should oppose the motion, because it was voting money not for a community but for a class The Registrar might boast of his cheap conveyancing whilst his offices and salaries were paid for by Government He could well give conveyances for two guineas, but he (Mr Bakewell) wondered he did not do it for nothing, and then the farce would be complete But they were doing this for the rich class, and the time might come when the poor people in want of employment would ask what was done with the money, and it would be a strong argument for them that the Legislature had voted it away for the benefit of the wealthy

The Treasurer would say, with respect to postponing the item until the Estimates were before the House, that when the Government found they had money in hands which they wished to lay out they made a selection of such works as were most immediately required, and they had chosen this one The building was necessary, and must be put up shortly whether the Act failed or not, for if it failed it should be amended, and some Act would take its place for which a building would be required If the House thought the money could be more wisely expended on a building of more pressing necessity the Government would yield

Mr Strangways said the hon member's argument was that they should put up a building because in four or five years they might have use for it (No, no)

Mr Peake, in reply to the hon member for Barossa, said that if landowners got their conveyances cheap under the new Act, the Government could exact fees from them, and they would have to pay for the useful action of the measure

Mr Hay thought as large an amount as possible should be given to the Road Board He knew the difficulties of travelling on the road, but people also felt the difficulty of the old system of conveyancing, which pressed heavily upon them The hon member for Barossa had said this Act was only for the wealthy, but most of the people were landowners, and the small holders often paid more for their conveyances than the owners of large sections, and therefore this matter was of more consequence to the small holders

The Attorney-General thought the Legislature was not wrong in providing a building to carry out this Act successfully He protested against the statement that the present measure was intended for the benefit of one class He objected to many parts of the Act, but he always felt that its object was one in which every one had a direct, an indirect, or a prospective interest It was a feature which distinguished this colony favorably from all the others, that the proportion of landowners was greater, and that there was no man of common prudence and industry who had not a right to believe that he would be an owner of land before he died, and therefore there was no one who was not interested in a cheap and expeditious system of conveyancing The present system was devised, not for a class, but for the community, and if it carried out its object, it would be a benefit to the community It was not fair to distinguish between the landowners and the rest of the community

Mr BAKEWELL was opposed to Mr Torrens's Bill, because it was opposed, in every essential particular, to the Report of the Real Property Commission (Oh, oh!)

Mr TOWNSEND would rather vote the 4,000*l* for roads and bridges

The House then divided, when there appeared—

AYES, 14—The Attorney General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Burfield, Cole, Duffield, Hay, Lindsay, Macdermott, Milne, Peake, Scammell and Dr Wark

NOES, 10—Messrs Bagot, Bakewell, Dunn, Glyde, Hughes, Mildred, Reynolds, Strangways, Townsend, and Young

The original motion was therefore carried

The House then resumed, and the Chairman having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again this day

The House rose at 10 minutes past 5

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 10

The SPEAKER took the chair at 5 minutes past 1 o'clock

Mr BAGOT presented a petition from the inhabitants of the surrounding country, praying for the extension of the Northern Line of Railway to Kapunda He also presented several petitions having the same prayer, and one especially, to which were attached 1,153 names The other petitions, conjointly, were signed by about 180 persons He begged also to mention that he had a petition embodying the same plea, but that was written in German, and to ask whether he was in order in presenting a petition to the same effect, signed in pencil by about 450 persons

The SPEAKER considered that a petition, signed or written in pencil, could not be received, as, from the nature of the material with which it was written, it could not be considered an enduring document

PAPERS

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid various papers on the table

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid a map of Mr Parry's exploration on the table

MONEY ORDERS

Mr PEAKE rose, pursuant to notice, to propose the motion standing in his name—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the introduction into the General Post Office of this province of a Money Order Office—for the transmission of small sums of money, not exceeding five pounds in any one order—is urgently called for, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, praying him to have placed on the Estimates the sum necessary for the establishment of such Money Order Office in the General Post Office, Adelaide, with branch offices at Port Adelaide, Gawler Town, Clare, the Burra, Kapunda, Mount Barker, Strathalbyn, the Goolwa, Willunga, and Guichen Bay—at this latter port for transmission by seaboard only"

He had had the honor of bringing forward a similar motion to that of which he had just given notice, during the last session of Parliament The system of money orders which he wished to introduce was one of the modern improvements which had been introduced into other countries, as a consequence of the introduction of Railways and the Electric Telegraph The last time he brought forward the motion some honorable members appeared to think that the Banks would give all the necessary facilities for the transmission of small sums of money to the adjacent colonies and to England, and consequently that the money-order system was not needed In answer to that he would refer hon members to the state of things existing in England, and to the amounts transmitted through that branch of the public service—the money order department there Above eleven millions were sent in that manner in 1856, and the net revenue derived from it was £21,000 He did not consider the banking arrangements here sufficient No doubt the plan would entail an addition to the expenses of the Post Office, but yet it partook of the character of a reproductive work and he thought that scarcely any addition to its expenses would arise from the transmission of sums to the adjacent colonies or to Great Britain He trusted the House would take action on the matter, and put the Executive in possession of their views for the purpose of the system being introduced into the colony In order to relieve the minds of hon members of all doubts respecting the money order office paying, he thought it would be well to increase the premium on small sums of money passing through the office. In England the rate was 3s on all sums of £2, and 6d from £2 to £5 He thought that might easily be increased, in the first instance, to 6d on £2 and under and 1s from £2 to £5 He believed that many persons had no possible means of sending small sums of money through the bank in country districts He considered it would be a great convenience also to persons in Adelaide receiving remittances from the country, and he thought, seeing it was a scheme which had produced such beneficial results at home, it ought to be adopted in order that this colony might reap all the advantages possible from the Post Office establishment

Mr COLES seconded the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS would propose as an amendment that after the words "Willunga and Guichen Bay," be inserted "and such other places as might be deemed necessary"

The motion was put and carried

The House resolved itself into Committee

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, it was quite practicable to introduce the money order system into the Electric Telegraph Department, and thought it would conduce very much to the income of that department The Surveyor of Telegraphs was quite convinced he could carry out the plan, and was anxious to try it, and the Government would have no objection that that should be added to the motion It was a financial question, and if any unforeseen difficulties occurred the nature of the difficulties would be submitted to the House

Mr DUNN would move that the amount of money transmitted by the money order system be 10*l* He thought 5*l* in England would go as far as 10*l* here, and he should propose therefore, the amount being fixed at 10*l*, instead of 5*l*

Mr MILNE hoped that if this motion were carried the Government would not go to any serious expense If it could be carried out at a moderate expense he could not see any objection

Mr BAGOT hoped that before the motion was passed the Government would make enquiries as to its practicability If the money order system were introduced it would increase expenses At present they were asked to vote in the dark, and he thought enquiries should be made in order that the House should have some guide as to the expense He thought it would be a great advantage to the colony unless it increased too much the expense of the Post Office Establishment There was great difficulty in transmitting small sums now, and many persons used postage stamps for that purpose He, himself, had an accumulation of postage stamps which he would be glad to get rid of

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, to make enquiry as to the probable expense would be the duty of the Government, and they would only request His Excellency to place such a sum on the Estimates as might be required to carry out the plan But as this resolution, if carried, only assumed that some action had been taken, the House would not be committed to any particular course. There could be no reasonable objection to its being part of the system if it could be carried out at a reasonable cost The Government would take the earliest means of obtaining information on the subject, and would lay it fully before the House

Mr PEAKE, with reference to what the member for Mount Barker (Mr Dunn) had proposed, said he should not like to adopt that suggestion for the following reason, that it would not be advisable to increase more than could be avoided the expenses of that department, and as the extension of the amount to 10*l* would have that effect, he thought it inexpedient He thought the proposal of the Commissioner of Public Works, to extend the operations of the system to the telegraph, would be an advantage His object had been to bring the matter under the notice of the House, and to move it into action, and, therefore, he should leave it with the Executive after the House had expressed its opinion, and he trusted they would bring it into substantial action when they brought the next Estimates under the notice of the House

Carried

The CHAIRMAN reported progress

The House resumed, the report was brought up and adopted.

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had to ask leave of the House to introduce "A Bill intituled an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts providing for the Water Supply and Drainage for the City of Adelaide" He might state that the Bill had been very carefully prepared, and had received considerable attention from the late Commissioner of Public Works, and from himself It had been submitted to the revision of the Attorney-General, and some alterations had been submitted by the Waterworks Commission, which would prevent his laying the Bill upon the table immediately, if he had leave to introduce it Every member would be acquainted with the Waterworks Act passed during the last session of the old Legislature In it several defects had been discovered and it was to remedy those and to introduce a scale of charges, which, while they gave to every person in the city good water at a low rate, did not press unequally upon the consumers It was not an amendment of the old law but an entirely new Act He, therefore, asked leave to introduce it

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to second the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works, and would only state that at the time the original Act was passed very strong objections were raised, especially on the part of the trading community of Adelaide, as to the unfairness of the principle of rating then adopted. In the original Bill it was proposed to levy a rate in proportion to the size and value of the property. But it was felt to affect very seriously the value of buildings used for purposes of trade only, where the consumption of water was the least. The Government gave a pledge that the subject should be considered, so that before the Act came into operation they might be prepared with an amended scheme, and the rate proportioned as closely as possible to the quantity consumed; and should it appear that there had been defects in the proposed system, they would be amended. He trusted the scheme to be proposed would receive the careful consideration of the House.

Leave was given.

ERECTION OF COURT-HOUSE AT WOODSIDE

Mr MILNE, understanding that the Commissioner of Public Works had laid on the table of the House papers referring to his first question, would content himself with asking why the erection of the Court-House at Woodside was not being proceeded with?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that tenders had been called for last Tuesday for the work alluded to, and he believed they would shortly be received.

Mr TOWNSEND asked if the site was decided on?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it had been agreed to.

MR BABBAGE

Mr HUGHES wished for a return showing the distance Mr Babbage had travelled into a previously unknown country.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had laid a map on the table showing the track of Mr Babbage.

Mr HUGHES had looked at the track as described in the map, but could trace no country there not previously known.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr PEAKE asked the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether an Engineer was employed by the late Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Reynolds) to inspect the locomotive engines in use on the South Australian Railways, the name of the Engineer so appointed, and what remuneration (if any) was paid for such report, and whether the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) will lay such report on the table, with any correspondence of the Railway Commissioners or their Engineer relating thereto, and also the contingent on the motion standing in his name, No 6 for Friday, 10th September, whether the Surveyor-General is not the Inspector-General of Railways, and, if so, whether he had been requested to report upon the locomotive engines in use on the South Australian Railways, or had been consulted on the subject, and, if so, on whose authority another officer was employed and paid.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated, in reply, that Messrs Ingram and Co, were employed to inspect the locomotives on the South Australian Railways by the late Commissioner of Public Works. The examination was 52*l* 10s. He would lay the papers on the table and any correspondence on the subject. With regard to the contingent question, he might say the Inspector-General of Railways was also Surveyor-General. The Surveyor-General was a Captain in the Royal Engineers.

PENSION TO MRS PETRIE

Mr HALLETT asked leave to amend the motion standing in his name, and to add the words "not exceeding 100*l* per annum."

Mr PEAKE seconded the motion.

Leave was given.

The House resolved itself into Committee.

Mr HALLETT in moving the resolution which stood in his name, read extracts from several letters respecting Mrs Petrie. He said he did not feel it necessary to eulogize Captain Flinders, for the colony had paid a tribute to him in naming several streets, houses and districts after him. It was well known that he was taken prisoner by the French, suffered much both in body and mind, and no doubt his death was hastened in consequence. The Legislature of New South Wales, had granted Mrs Petrie a pension. He (Mr Hallett) had referred to the volume of debates of the Legislature of New South Wales in the library, and found that it was in 1853, and it was followed by a similar vote of the Legislature of Victoria. He urged upon this Government to follow that course on account of her narrow circumstances, rendering it impossible for her suitably to educate her child.

The TREASURER wished to know what amount was granted in New South Wales.

Mr HALLETT said that the Government of New South Wales gave her £100.

Mr HART seconded the motion.

Mr MILNE would be better pleased if a sum of money were given at once rather than a pension.

Mr BAGOT quite agreed with Mr Milne. He should be willing to present Mrs Petrie with £500, but objected to the principle of burdening the Estimates with a pension list, which would have a tendency to increase.

Mr BURFORD could not agree to the motion. He was sorry his views did not coincide with the advocates of these humane propositions. He did not approve of annuities, and had no doubt that while engaged in these explorations, Captain Flinders was well remunerated by the British Government. If this were granted, there would be nothing to prevent some descendant of Captain Cook's from receiving similar consideration. He must therefore vote against it.

Mr NEALES thought that in trying to prove his case, the mover had proved too much. Mrs Petrie was in receipt of about as much as the half-pay of a major in the army. He thought this was not a case in which the public money should be given away. He thought the discovery of South Australia was made almost as much by the French as by the English, as they met together at Encounter Bay. Mrs Petrie was in receipt of 200*l* a year, and though her husband was in delicate health, as he was a professional man, no doubt he was able to add something to that. He was not inclined to accede to the proposition.

The question was put, and the Chairman said the noes had it, and a division being demanded, there appeared for the motion—

AYES, 7.—Messrs Bagot, Hallett, Hart, Hawker, Hay, Lindsay, and Peake.

NOES, 20.—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Andrews, Burford, Cole, Duffield, Dunn, Glyde, Harvey, Hughes, McDermott, Mildred, Milne, Neales, Reynolds, Strangways, Townsend, and Young.

Motion accordingly lost.

The CHAIRMAN to report, and the House resumed.

Mr BAGOT moved—

"That there be laid on the table of this House an approximate return of the number of acres of sold land at a distance not exceeding 15 miles on each side of a proposed line of railway from Section 112, through the Valley of the Gilbert, to the Burra."

And also—

"That there be laid on the table of this House an approximate return of the number of acres of sold land at a distance not exceeding 15 miles on each side of a proposed line of railway from Section 112, Hundred of Light, to the proposed terminus near Kapunda, and on to the Burra."

He (Mr Bagot) moved for those returns with reference to the returns moved for by the hon member for Victoria. In that district a return was made of the unsold land, but he wished to know what number of acres were sold.

Mr HAWKER would second the motion, for he wished every information to be given to the House. He had advocated the line through the Valley of the Gilbert, because he thought it was the best line for traffic to the North.

Agreed to.

Mr NEALE'S moved—

"That the petition of John Thompson, coal-miner, presented on 8th September, be printed."

"That the petition of the 250 inhabitants of Adelaide, respecting the petition of John Thompson, coal miner, be printed."

Agreed to.

POSTPONEMENT OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The TREASURER, before the Speaker left the chair, would ask that the further consideration of the Supplementary Estimates should be deferred until the Government were able to lay before the House all the information that was required in reference to the Government House and furniture. He therefore moved for the leave of the House to take the Supplementary Estimates into consideration, on Thursday next. In reply to a question respecting the nature of the returns to be given, he said they would consist of the cost of Government House, distinguishing the amount expended each year, with particulars of furniture and decorations for five years, distinguishing the expenditure for each year.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL intimated that the Government were desirous to give every information.

Mr HUGHES suggested that the five years should be struck out, that the House might know the whole of the cost.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it would be found among the records of the House. There were returns of the expenditure in the Government House to 1851, so it would save the necessity of going further back.

MILITIA

Mr REYNOLDS, with the permission of the House, would ask the Attorney-General if he was in a position to answer the question previously put to him in regard to the Militia Bill.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—The question is not on the motion paper.

Mr REYNOLDS only wished to know if the Bill was still in operation, and whether under its provisions a militia force could be organised.

[Mr BAGOT, during the time the Attorney-General was referring to the Act, stated that some remarks made by Mr Burford had been attributed to him in one of the papers, a compliment which he had no desire to appropriate.]

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Militia Bill was still in force, and could be brought into operation at any moment by notice being given according to the last clause, which enabled the Governor to bring it into operation when necessity arose.

Mr STRANGWAYS, by permission, asked the Treasurer the question, which had lapsed, and which was on the motion paper, namely, whether the Returning Officers had been paid their charges in connection with the late registrations and preparation of the rolls, if not, the reason of the delay, and also whether any misunderstanding existed between the Returning Officers and the Government as to the mode in which their bills should be counted, with reference to the number of figures which composed a word, and whether the Returning Officers were not led to believe from a circular addressed to them by the Returning Officer of the province, that if their accounts were forwarded, made out according to the form he enclosed, the Government would order the payment The accounts had been, he understood rendered as requested, but the question was, whether the statements rendered in figures should be counted as if they were rendered in words

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL believed there was a misunderstanding between the Returning Officers and the Government with regard to those charges, but was unable to say how it had risen He was not aware that the accounts were sent in, according to any form forwarded by the Registrar There was no desire on the part of the Government to give less than a fair remuneration for the labor performed In regard to the first question, the last clause of the Electoral Act provided a certain scale of charges for the remuneration of certain officers of sixpence a folio of 72 words for copying Had they charged that no objection would have arisen, but they had also charged for copying the Electoral Lists at that rate, and they charged each figure as a word The words of the Act are, "they shall receive remuneration according to the schedule and no other" Those were the express words of the Act Had the sum voted for the expenses incurred been insufficient, and had a fair charge been made, the Government would have been justified in entertaining it, relying on the House to do the small act of justice of voting the amount, but when the Government were asked to pay for every copy prepared in that way—when the amount was estimated not according to the express letter of the Act, the Government doubted whether they were justified in sanctioning such an item, and the amount remained unpaid

THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table, in accordance with the provisions of the Corporation Act, a return showing the receipts and expenditure of the Corporation of the City of Adelaide, to the 31st December, 1857

NEW STANDING ORDERS

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the House resolved itself into Committee for the consideration of the New Standing Orders The hon gentleman suggested that the marginal note only should be read by the Clerk, and the Chairman, in reply to a remark made by Mr Burford, stated that he had marked all those clauses which were mere transcripts of regulations in force in the House of Commons

Some doubt having been expressed whether the mere reading of the marginal note would afford sufficient information to the House as to the intent of the clauses

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he was quite prepared to adopt any plan which it was thought would economise time It was probable that hon members had made themselves tolerably well acquainted with the new Standing Orders, and he thought they might even pass a whole chapter at once, omitting those clauses upon which any difference of opinion existed

Mr STRANGWAYS, before proceeding with the Standing Orders, wished to ask the Attorney-General whether it would not be better that a Bill should be introduced defining the powers of the Legislature, or of that House He apprehended that the Standing Orders were founded to a great extent upon those of the Imperial Parliament, but it had been decided by the Privy Council that the privileges of the Imperial Parliament did not attach by analogy to the local Legislatures If the Standing Orders were passed as they at present stood, the House would find that they had adopted many which they had no power whatever to enforce

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had been looking for the English Act, under which that Legislature was constituted, but unfortunately it was not upon the table of the House, or he could have shewn the hon member that Standing Orders passed by that House, and receiving the assent of the Government, became law Whatever privileges the House chose to give themselves, if they received the assent of the Legislature and the Governor, they became law, but it would be well, after the Standing Orders had been passed, to pass an Act for the purpose of removing all doubts as to the privileges which they claimed The Government intended so soon as the Standing Orders were passed, to introduce a Bill for the purpose he had stated

It was determined that the marginal note only should be read, and the various clauses were passed without comment, up to clause 12 in the second chapter, the marginal note of which was "Decision between two candidates for the Speakership,' and the clause itself as follows —

"The question shall then be put by the Clerk, that the member first proposed 'do take the chair of this House as Speaker,' and if the question be resolved in the affirmative, the member shall be conducted to the chair, but, if in the negative, the question shall then be put by the Clerk, that the member next proposed, 'do take the chair of this House as Speaker,' and, if it be resolved in the affirmative, that member shall be conducted to the chair"

Mr NEALES remarked that it appeared to him by this clause, if there were three candidates a poll could be demanded, but if there were only two, the decision would be viva voce In any other matter it was competent for any member to call for a division, but in reference to the Speakership it appeared, for instance that if A were declared by the Clerk to be duly elected, there was no power for the friends of B, another candidate, to call for a division

The CHAIRMAN said this was provided for

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL considered if there were any doubt upon the point it would be as well to make it clear He apprehended that the meaning was, that the matter should be decided according to the rules of the House If it did not say that it could only be determined by the apparent preponderance of ayes and noes, that is, that no division could be called for, the obvious meaning was that the question should be decided as all other questions were, by the rules of the House

Mr NEALES thought that by implication the difficulty did arise under the 13th clause

Mr MILNE said that in the one case, even if there were a division, it would be in the ordinary way, whilst the 13th clause appeared rather to contemplate the course adopted in the appointment of a Select Committee, partaking to some extent of the nature of a ballot The difficulty he thought would be got over by excluding the 12th clause altogether, and introducing in the 13th clause in the first line—"in the event of there being more than one member" instead of two as at present

Mr PEAKE considered there was a great deal of force in the observations of Mr Milne It was very desirable he considered, when a difference of opinion existed as to the merits of gentlemen who were candidates for the Speakership, that hon gentlemen should be allowed to vote by ballot He was very much inclined to support the hon member's view

The TREASURER apprehended the meaning of the clauses as they at present stood was, that where there were only two candidates, the question would be determined in the usual way by the predominance of the ayes over the noes but if a division were called for, he saw no objection to the ballot being then resorted to, so that members would not be compelled to arrange themselves on one side or the other When there were three or more candidates, it appeared to him there was no alternative but to have recourse to the ballot, as if the question were to be determined by the ayes and noes, it was clear that the Speaker would have to put the question several times over

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS wished that the suggestion of Mr Milne would meet with the concurrence of the House, as it would simply affirm that the election of Speaker would be by ballot The general feeling of the House was, he thought, in favor of such a course

Mr GLYDE pointed out that if the suggestions of Mr Milne were to be adopted, it would be necessary to make an alteration in the 11th clause

The CHAIRMAN said that both the 11th and 12th clauses had been copied from Orders of the House of Commons

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought that all the House should look at was that such a Standing Order was adopted as would ensure the election of Speaker by the free vote of that House Perhaps it would be as well, as it appeared to be the general feeling of the House, that the 11th clause should be altered so that the first line should read "if two or more members," instead of as at present —

"If two members be proposed as Speaker, a motion shall be made and seconded, regarding each such member 'That Mr —— do take the chair of this House as Speaker,' and each member, so proposed, shall address himself to the House"

The clause was ultimately altered so as to read in the commencement "if more than one member," and in this form was carried, the 12th clause being struck out

Some discussion took place upon the 13th clause, as follows —

"In the event of there being more than two members proposed and seconded as Speaker, each member of the House shall deliver to the Clerk, in writing, the name of the candidate whom he considers the most fit and proper to be Speaker of the House, and the candidate who has the greatest number of votes shall be the Speaker, provided he has also an absolute majority of the votes of the members present, but if no candidate has such absolute majority, the name of the candidate having the smallest number of votes shall be withdrawn, and a fresh ballot shall take place, and this shall be done as often as necessary, until one candidate is declared to be elected as Speaker by such absolute majority"

Mr REYNOLDS thought that where there were two candidates the ballot should be adopted

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the clause commence "In the event of there being more than one member," and that the words "between two or more candidates," be introduced in a future portion of the clause

The clause, as amended, was agreed to, and subsequent clauses up to 18, which provided that "A member returned at other than a general election should be introduced to the House by two members"

Mr GLYDE did not consider it advisable in so small a House that such a regulation should exist It was quite possible that an unpopular man might be elected, and that he could not find two members out of the 35 disposed to introduce him, and consequently he would be unable to sit.

Mr NEALES remarked that when Mr Wilks was returned for the second time for Middlesex, two very brave men brought him in, and in the House of Commons, there being 650 members, there was of course less difficulty in finding two members to undertake the task than in so small a body as that House. This was one of the instances in which he thought it undesirable to follow the practice of the House of Commons.

Mr REYNOLDS thought if this clause were not adopted the House might be placed in a very awkward position, as a person might walk in who was unknown to any hon. member, and represent that he had been duly elected, though such might not prove to be the case. He certainly thought there should be some introduction.

Mr GLYDE suggested that an introduction by the Clerk of the House should be sufficient.

Mr BURFORD thought as it was a mere formal matter that the Sergeant-at-Arms would be the better party.

The TREASURER said that, in the first instance, he had felt at a loss to determine why a party having been duly elected by a constituency should require an introduction by any one. He imagined there could be no other motive than to identify the individual. Such was the custom in the House of Commons, where, of course, from the number of members, there was greater difficulty in the identity than in a small assemblage. It was possible that a stranger, bearing the same name, perhaps, as the successful candidate named in the writ, might introduce himself, and to guard against this he would move that an introduction by one member be sufficient.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

Clause 19 provided that members seated upon petition need not be introduced.

Mr GLYDE asked why this provision was made.

The CHAIRMAN said it was the rule of the House of Commons.

Mr GLYDE objected to the rule of the House of Commons being followed in this instance. It was just as necessary that members seated upon petition should be introduced as others.

The CHAIRMAN explained that it was considered when members were seated upon petition that they had already appeared before the House.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL thought the fact of the rule having been found necessary in the House of Commons, was a primâ facie reason for its adoption here till some ground had been shown for it not being adapted to the local Legislature. He did not say that they were bound to adopt all the regulations of the House of Commons.

Clauses to 28 inclusive were passed.

Clause 29 provided—

"The Chair shall be taken on every day fixed for the meeting of the House, as soon after the time appointed as a quorum shall be present, but if, at the expiration of a quarter of an hour after that time, there be not a quorum, the Speaker shall declare the House adjourned to the next sitting day, or, if the Speaker should also be absent, the House will stand adjourned to the next sitting day, the names of the members present, in either case, being entered in the Journals."

Mr PEAKE considered the latitude of a quarter of an hour insufficient. It was known that most of the members had a good deal of private business to attend to, and he thought it would be tieing them up too tightly to compel them to attend within 15 minutes of an hour.

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that half-an-hour's grace be allowed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said his feeling was that the House should meet at some fixed hour, that the Speaker should then take the chair, and if there were not the requisite number of members present the Speaker should immediately adjourn. If the position of hon. members were such from having notices of motion on the paper or other circumstances as involved them in the necessity of attending the House, they run the risk of losing a large amount of time. He had frequently attended the House at the appointed hour of meeting and had waited for 20 or 25 minutes in a state of uncertainty as to whether a House would be formed or not. Whatever time were fixed for meeting there should be as brief a period as possible before the chair was taken, and the House adjourned if there were not a sufficient number of members present.

The clause as originally proposed was passed.

In reference to a subsequent clause, relative to the appointment of tellers, the CHAIRMAN, in reply to Mr Strangways, stated that the tellers were appointed either by the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees, upon a division being called for.

The TREASURER thought the House had inadvertently passed the 31st clause, which was as follows:—

"When the attendance of the House in the Council Chamber has been desired, the House, on its return, will proceed with business, although less than a quorum be present, until notice be taken thereof."

The House might not be required to attend at the Council Chamber but at Government House, as the Governor could require their attendance anywhere. He moved an alteration of the clause, so that the wording be "when required by the Governor."

The amendment was assented to.

Mr GLYDE wished to amend the clause, which was so worded that it was possible hon. members who were punctual in their attendance might be required to stop in the House all night, and during the next day. (Laughter.) The clause was as follows:—

"A member having entered the Chamber after the time appointed for the meeting of the Assembly shall not be permitted to withdraw prior to a House being formed and the Speaker taking the chair."

The CHAIRMAN said if there was not a sufficient number of members present to constitute a House, there would of course be an adjournment, and then all who were present would be at liberty to depart.

Mr GLYDE denied that any such construction could be placed upon the clause as it at present stood. It distinctly stated that no member would be permitted to withdraw prior to a House being formed, and the Speaker taking the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said there was the same rule in the House of Commons and that no difficulty arose in practice.

Mr STRANGWAYS could not see why the rule of the House of Commons should be followed in this particularly, as there a very small proportion of the entire number constituted a quorum, but here the case was different. In the House of Commons, cases had been known in which members had been locked up for several hours.

The CHAIRMAN said the hon. member was in error. It was impossible for members to be detained more than a quarter of an hour. In the House of Commons at a quarter to four o'clock, the time fixed for the meeting of the House, the Speaker went to prayers and if there were not a House at 4 o'clock, an immediate adjournment took place.

The clause as proposed, and the intervening clauses, up to 42 were passed.

The 42nd clause provided:—"Every member shall attend the service of the House, unless leave of absence be given to him by the House."

Mr BURFORD asked what was meant by the "service of the House?"

The CHAIRMAN—The sittings of course.

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the whole of the clauses from 43 to 47 be struck out, the subject to which they related being provided for in the Constitution Act. They were as follows:—

43. "No member, during the session, shall absent himself for more than fourteen days at a time, without an express leave of absence from the House, and any member wilfully infringing this order shall be held guilty of contempt."

44. "Leave of absence may be given by the House to any member, for any sufficient cause, to be stated to the House."

45. "Notice shall be given of a motion for giving leave of absence to any member, stating the cause and period of absence."

46. "A member shall be excused from service in the House, or on any Committee, so long as he has leave of absence."

47. "Any member having leave of absence, shall forfeit the same by attending the service of the House before the expiration of such leave."

The CHAIRMAN said the Constitution Act related merely to an absence of two months by which he vacated his seat, but these clauses related to less periods.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought 14 days rather short notice, 30 days would, he thought, be better. Two months under the Constitution Act involved loss of seat, but a more serious matter was involved in the present clause, as members were guilty of contempt. He suggested 21 days instead of 14.

Mr REYNOLDS was in favour of the proposition to extend the time, as hon. members might inadvertently be guilty of contempt, and would be handed over to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the clauses be struck out, as they had really no power to enforce their provisions until an Act had been passed by both Houses of Legislature and had received His Excellency's assent.

Twenty-one days were inserted in clause 43, instead of 14.

The TREASURER suggested that there should be another amendment by which a member would receive notice that unless he attended on such-and-such a day, he would be deemed guilty of contempt.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL remarked that if the hon. member, Mr Strangways, questioned the power of the House to make and enforce these Standing Orders, he had merely to refer to the Constitution Act, by which it would be seen that Standing Orders passed by that House had the force of law when assented to by the Governor.

Mr STRANGWAYS apprehended that that House had no right by a Standing Order to affect the liberty of the subject. The only way that could be done, was by an Act passed by both branches of the Legislature, and assented to by the Governor. If the clauses were passed, the House would be unable to enforce them, for the Privy Council had decided that the privileges of the Imperial Parliament did not attach by analogy to local Legislatures.

The clauses referred to, and subsequent clauses to 55, inclusive, were passed as printed.

Clause 56 provided that members should be entitled to retain the seats occupied by them at the time of the Speaker taking the chair at the commencement of the session.

Mr MILNE would like some alteration in the clause, which led to a regular scramble for the best seats. Because some parties did not happen to be present at the opening of Parliament, they lost the seats which they had previously occupied. He moved as an amendment that "Parliament" be substituted for "Session," which at all events would make the scramble less frequent.

Mr. REYNOLDS supported the proposition, which he believed was in accordance with a regulation during the existence of the old Legislature. He was not aware that there were always scrambles for seats, for he thought he occupied the same which he had held for two sessions.

The TREASURER thought the clause would do very well, as it was because the amendment would only have the effect of making the scramble once in three years instead of every session. He did not think that the loss of an accustomed seat was likely in every instance to result from the absence of a member at the opening of Parliament.

Mr. BURFORD thought it better to let the clause remain as it was, as it would secure a good attendance of members at the opening of Parliament.

Mr. NEALES was decidedly in favor of the proposed amendment, substituting Parliament for Session. The effect of the clause as it at present stood would be that in the scramble the most powerful men would get the best seats.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said there was one advantage in the proposed arrangement that the old members would, by seniority, get into the first places, and it was not undesirable that they should attain such a distinction.

Mr. HAWKER wished to know when it was intended to take action upon this clause.

The CHAIRMAN said not till after the present Parliament.

The clause was amended by the insertion of "Parliament" for "Session," also the succeeding clause.

Clause 63 provided that no member should read any newspaper, book, or letter, in his place unless in addressing the House.

Mr. NEALES strongly opposed this clause, remarking that it appeared to him it would have the effect of preventing hon. members getting the information which they required in addressing the House. There were many members of that House whose other avocations would not permit them to devote their whole time to legislation, and to say that they should not have a paper of any kind to consult when in the House appeared to him to be shutting up the schoolmaster altogether. He had no objection that the matter should be left to the discretion of the Speaker, who would, of course, prevent hon. members from drawing caricatures or reading song-books—(laughter)—but it would be very hard to say that they should not read up for the purpose of assisting them in addressing the House. He did not say that a member should be permitted to sit down and read three volumes of the last novel, but this resolution or standing order would actually prevent a person from reading "May" in the House.

The CHAIRMAN said that at the discretion of the Speaker an hon. member was allowed to read a paper when addressing the House.

Mr. NEALES thought it desirable that members should be allowed to read newspapers at all times.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said if there was no intention of acting upon the clause he would move that it be struck out.

Mr. PEAKE moved that the clause be struck out. It was said that hon. members should not be allowed to refer to books for the purpose of information. There were other things certainly more objectionable—such as eating biscuits and taking luncheon in the House. It was much more reasonable that mental refreshment should be going on than the refreshment in which some hon. members indulged.

Mr. HAWKER supported the striking out of the clause. As the previous speaker had said mental refreshment was occasionally very much needed in that House. On the previous day an hon. member addressed the House seven times on the same subject, and after that a new novel, or even an old one, would have been acceptable mental refreshment. (Laughter.)

The CHAIRMAN said it was a rule of the House of Commons that no member should read any newspaper, book, or paper in his place unless in addressing the chair.

Mr. NEALES considered this was a case which the rule of the House of Commons did not apply. There members could go to the library and refresh their memories for any motion which was about to be brought forward. It was notorious that in the House of Commons there were whippers in for both sides, and there was no fear of a question being passed over during the absence of any hon. member who took an interest in it, but here, if a member absented himself for a few moments, the question in which he was interested might be disposed of.

The clause was struck out.

The 64th clause referred to the admission of members of Council and other strangers below the bar of the House.

Mr. GLYDE asked if it was intended that no strangers should be admitted except by the Speaker's order. On interesting occasions many might be desirous of obtaining admission to the interior of the building.

The CHAIRMAN said that upon such occasions, if the House wished, space would be reserved.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL considered that the House belonged to the Legislature, and that the House had a perfect right to carry their wishes upon the subject into effect.

The clause was carried, also the subsequent clauses of the chapter.

The clauses of the succeeding chapter, relating to the arrest of members and others for contempt, being read,

Mr. STRANGWAYS moved that the whole of the clauses be struck out, as it was clear, if they were carried, the House had no power to enforce them. If such clauses were introduced, they might witness such scenes in the House as had been witnessed in the Legislature of Van Diemen's Land.

Mr. BURFORD apprehended that to carry out the views of the hon. member for Encounter Bay it would be necessary to strike out the first clause of the Standing Orders relative to following the custom of the House of Commons.

Mr. NEALES remarked that that clause was qualified by the insertion of the words "so far as applicable." The case of Dr. Hampden showed that they had no such power as that mentioned in the clauses under discussion, and it would be bringing the House into contempt to pass clauses which they had no power to enforce. The point might be tested by the very first witness who was summoned to attend; he might say that he wouldn't, and he needn't if he didn't like. He hoped the House would keep within the scope of their powers, as the papers in the case of Hampden had actually been laid upon the table of the House as a caution to them.

Mr. BURFORD did not consider the case of Hampden a parallel one. In that case he believed the Legislature wished to interfere with a department under the Imperial Government, and with which they could not interfere. (No, no.)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL regretted very much that the decision of the Privy Council in Hampden's case had not been printed, as he thought it would clearly show that the House could exercise the privileges which it claimed by these clauses. Whilst the House had a perfect right to take steps to prevent any interference with its proceedings, it had no right to treat as contempt what did not affect the proceedings of the House in the absence of any special law giving that power. The clauses under discussion referred to matters affecting members of the House, or the conduct of strangers within the walls of the House. The House had no right as in the case in Van Diemen's Land referred to, to send a summons to a distance and treat as guilty of contempt the party disobeying it.

Mr. STRANGWAYS contended that in the decision of the Privy Council it was distinctly stated that the privileges of Imperial Parliament did not apply to colonial Parliaments. The clauses which they were called upon to adopt were founded upon the privileges of the Imperial Parliament; but it was quite clear, if they did not possess those privileges, they could not possess the power. The Attorney-General had entirely omitted this portion of the decision of the Privy Council.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the essential part of the decision of the Privy Council was that local legislatures did not possess adjudication upon cases of contempt committed out of doors. It was admitted that if the contempt had been committed within the walls of the House so as to affect its proceedings, the House would have power to deal with the contempt. It was idle to argue from the decision of the Judicial Committee that the House did not possess those powers which any Court of Judicature possessed to ensure the ordinary mode of procedure within its walls. Neither that nor other legislatures could be disturbed in what was necessary to secure the orderly conduct of its business. If, for instance, any stranger were to interrupt the proceedings of the House it would be quite competent for the Speaker to order him into custody, and the seizure would be upheld by the Supreme Court and the Privy Council. In the case of Hampden, the Legislature depended on the privileges of the House in the absence of any laws. The Legislature of Van Diemen's Land claimed the privileges inherent in the Imperial Parliament, and the Privy Council decided that it was not so, but the Constitution Act of this colony enabled the House to make Standing Orders for the ordinary conduct of its business. It was distinctly stated that such Standing Orders, upon being assented to by the Governor, should have the force of laws. The decision of the Privy Council had no bearing whatever upon the Standing Orders, but the power conferred by the Constitution Act was to be exercised by the concurrence of the Governor and Legislature.

Mr. MILNE said the object of summoning Dr. Hampden before the Legislature of Van Diemen's Land was to make enquiries from him relative to the management of the Convict Department—a department exclusively under the control of the Imperial Parliament, and which the Legislature of Van Diemen's Land had no control over.

Mr. NEALES must persist in thinking and stating, notwithstanding all that had fallen from the Attorney-General, that the 72nd clause referred to precisely such cases as Hampden's. Hampden refused to attend and it appeared there was no law to compel him. He could not place upon the Constitution Act the construction which the Attorney-General had. He could not understand from that Act that the House could make Standing Orders to have the force of law upon receiving the assent of the Governor. If so, it was clear they could legislate without the other House. The 72nd clause never could be carried out. Summons a witness, let him refuse to attend, and the House could not compel him.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said Hampden's case arose from the Legislature of Van Diemen's Land assuming that they possessed the powers of the House of Commons. The Legislature of that colony did not say that they possessed power to make Standing Orders, but the mere fact of their being constituted a Legislative Council conferred upon them the powers and functions of the Imperial Government He had always claimed the right of enforcing the Standing Orders which were adopted by the House and assented to by the Governor

Mr STRANGWAYS contended that the Constitution Act conferred upon them the power of making Standing Orders for special purposes and special purposes only They had no power whatever to introduce any penal clauses, but merely such as were essential for the regulation of business The House had no power to deal with cases of contempt, except as any other body would, by giving the aggressor into custody, and allowing him to be dealt with by the police The hon member concluded by reading the clause in the Constitution Act relating to the power of the House to frame Standing Orders

Mr BURFORD would be sorry to have recourse to the machinery of the Police Court, to punish either members or strangers If they had not power to frame regulations for their protection in conducting the business of the House, he considered that they ought to have, and that they should be enabled to hand offenders into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some other official He had heard no sufficient argument against the clause in question

Mr REYNOLDS said that whatever power they might have to make the regulation, they would find some difficulty in carrying it out, as they required some times to summon members of the other branch of the Legislature, and had these hon members when called on refused to come, they would be guilty of a contempt, and hence a great practical difficulty would arise. There was no necessity for such a clause, and therefore he should oppose the motion

The CHAIRMAN stated that when it was desired to examine members of the other House, a message was sent asking leave of the House to examine them

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member had properly spoken of these as the Standing Orders of that House and not as he had supposed of the Legislature generally He apologised to the House for having fallen into this misapprehension (Laughter) He had thought these Orders were for the regulation of the business of Parliament, and he quite agreed with the hon member (Mr Strangways) that they had no power in the matter

Mr REYNOLDS was glad that the hon the Attorney-General had been enlightened upon this matter, as from the lucid manner in which that hon member had argued upon it, he (Mr Reynolds) was disposed to go with him

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL trusted hon members would admit that he never pressed his views when he found that he was in the wrong He always admitted his error

Mr NEALES thanked the hon the Attorney-General for his very satisfactory statement on the subject

Clause 72, constituting the refusal by a witness to attend a contempt of the House, was struck out

On chapter 77 —"Fees for arrest and commitment"—

Mr MILDRED asked how the fees payable to the Sergeant-at-Arms were to be appropriated, would they go to that officer?

The CHAIRMAN replied only the £2 a day for sustenance

An hon member—Does that include wine? (Laughter)

Mr MILDRED considered the fee too high Hon members if taken into custody might pay it, but some poor stranger might misconduct himself who would be unable to pay

Mr REYNOLDS enquired what would become of the fees?

The CHAIRMAN replied they would go to the revenue

Mr REYNOLDS—Then they would not be for the enjoyment of hon members (Laughter)

Mr PEAKE thought it better the sum should remain A man would want to spend that much for he would feel rather solitary If he (Mr Peake) were shut up, he should spend that much on the Sergeant-at-Arms and himself (Laughter) He would like the consolation of having to spend it (Laughter)

The CHAIRMAN said the Sergeant-at-Arms would have to provide bedding and other requisites

Mr NEALES said it would be making the Sergeant-at-Arms a lodging-housekeeper He moved that the sum be 1l

The amendment was put and lost, and the original motion was then agreed to

Mr STRANGWAYS said he had moved that the whole chapter (clauses 70 to 78) be struck out

The CHAIRMAN said the House had affirmed it

Mr STRANGWAYS had had no opportunity of calling for a division

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member had allowed the time to pass

Clauses 79 to 84 inclusive were agreed to

On clause 85, "Every petition to be signed by the persons themselves,"

Mr MILDRED moved the addition of the words "or by his or their agent or solicitor duly authorized" His object was to enable this to be done by power of attorney, on behalf of persons absent from the country

Mr GLYDE thought this would be met by the agent or solicitor petitioning for the party

The CHAIRMAN thought this would be a very curious power of attorney

Mr MILDRED—There might be a power of attorney given for the express purpose

The CHAIRMAN thought that, when such a circumstance arose, it could be specially provided for

Mr NEALES thought that, when a person was absent from the country, a power of attorney to sign for that person should be admitted as sufficient He would suggest the addition of the words, "or his or their agent or solicitor, in cases of incapacity, sickness, or absence"

Mr MILDRED would ask the opinion of the Attorney-General on that point

The TREASURER (in the absence of the Attorney-General) said that hon member would not be long absent, and he would reply on his return, if the House wished to defer the clause, but he thought the matter was not of sufficient importance

The clause was then agreed to without amendment

Clause 86 was agreed to

On clause 87,

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the words "breach of privileges of the House" be struck out, inasmuch as the House had no privileges

Amendment agreed to, and clause struck out accordingly

Clauses 88 to 92 inclusive were agreed to

On clause 93—"Applications respecting money must be recommended by the Crown,"

Mr NEALES would do away with this clause altogether It was all very well at home, where there were numbers of members by whom petitions would be presented for persons having grievances, but here it would have the effect of preventing justice being done One-third of the petitions at least, and one-half the important petitions presented to the House, would be shut out by retaining this clause He hoped not only that the clause would be removed, but that something would be inserted in its place, to the effect that the House would not be bound by the rules of the House of Commons, which in this matter he was very sure were not applicable to this country

Mr PEAKE coincided with the idea of the hon member, and believed that the clause should be struck out There was no question on which the people had not a right to petition There was a right inherent in the subject to approach the Crown on any matter on which he might have a grievance, and he had also a perfect right to approach that House on any subject on which he might feel himself aggrieved

Mr STRANGWAYS was also of opinion that the clause should be struck out, as it was unnecessary He would add nothing to what had already been said, as the old Standing Orders and the new were the same on this point Under the old Standing Orders, a petition on any subject might be presented, and they would continue to be, in spite of the new Orders

The CHAIRMAN said the Order was taken word for word from No 320 of the Orders of the House of Commons, although the practice hitherto had not been in accordance with it, as no copy of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons had until a few months back been in the colony

Mr MILDRED hoped they would not have Standing Orders which did not apply to the country, and this did not, and was opposed to the views of the House

Mr GLYDE asked the hon the Speaker whether if the Standing Order was struck out, he would consider himself bound to reject money petitions?

The CHAIRMAN replied that the Speaker would be bound by the decision of the House that the rule of the House of Commons was not applicable to this country

Mr TOWNSEND was glad to hear the ruling on this clause, and thought it should be embodied in the Standing Orders, that any petition might be presented which was respectfully worded

Clause struck out

Clauses 94 to 121 were agreed to without amendments

On clause 121,

"A reply shall be allowed to a member who has made a substantive motion to the House, or moved the second reading of a Bill, but not to any member who has moved an Order of the Day (not being the second reading of a Bill), an amendment, or instruction to a Committee"

Mr HAY was of opinion that the words 'not being a second reading of a Bill'' should be struck out If for instance a notice of motion were postponed and made an Order of the Day, the hon member in whose name it stood would be deprived of his right of reply

The CHAIRMAN said, that though made an Order of the Day it would still be the motion of that hon member, and, therefore, he would not be affected in the way referred to

Mr STRANGWAYS moved, "that all the words after the word 'Bill' in the third line (before the word 'but') be struck out"

The CHAIRMAN said the clause was in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons

Mr HAY thought if a rule of the House of Commons were not properly understood, the House had better dispense with it No member who moved an amendment or an instruction to a Committee should be allowed a reply, as it would be a waste of time

Mr GLYDE did not see why a member moving a third reading should be deprived of the right of reply They had had one instance in a most important Bill in which this had been the case, he meant Mr Torrens's Bill, and they might have others

The CHAIRMAN said that in making this rule they had been guided by the same motive as the House of Commons—to limit discussions and waste of time in speaking more than was required

Mr GLYDE would be happy to be guided by the House of Commons, but the debate on a third reading might be the most important, for a Bill might be so altered in Committee as to be quite different from what it was originally

Mr YOUNG was understood to support the right of reply, but was very indistinctly heard

The ATTORNEY GENERAL thought the hon member's remarks most disinterested, for nobody could accuse him of any anxiety to speak—(a laugh)—but it was more important to limit the debates than to afford hon members an opportunity of saying in reply what they could say in their opening speeches Another reason for the clause was that it was very frequently the case that hon members in introducing a matter to the House, left out a great deal of what they intended to say, thinking that as they would have the right of reply, it would be a good plan to have the last word when it could not be answered (Laughter)

Amendment put and lost, and clause agreed to

Clauses 122 to 127 inclusive, were agreed to without amendment

On clause 128, "no member shall use Her Majesty's name irreverenntly in debate,"

An hon member suggested the addition of the words "or Her representative"

The CHAIRMAN thought it unnecessary

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in England it was held that the name of Her Majesty should not be used to influence a debate

Mr MILNE thought it better to substitute the word "sovereign"

Mr NEALES wished to know whether the words "Her Majesty" were used in the time of George the Third

The CHAIRMAN read the clause from the Standing Orders in which the words "Her Majesty" were used

Mr MILNE moved as an amendment the substitution of the word "Sovereign"

The TREASURER said they should not contemplate the death of Her Majesty, but if such an event occurred they could easily amend the Standing Orders

The original clause was then agreed to

Clause 129 to 358 were passed without amendment

On clause 359, "members may speak more than once to the same question"

Mr HAWKER that after the word "once" the words "but not more than twice except in explanation" be inserted He was not long in the House, but from the specimens he had had of the discursive habits of some gentlemen, moved instead of having a short session as they had been promised, the whole twelve months would not be sufficient On the previous day one gentleman had spoken seven times and another six times, and if this system were to be permitted the whole time of the House would be monopolised by some four or five gentlemen He thought if hon gentlemen could not concentrate their ideas into one speech, when they were not limited in the time that speech should occupy, they had better not speak at all At present, the ideas of some hon members were like the tracings of a spider crawling over a wall, and marking it in a very indefinite manner If his amendment were carried, these hon gentlemen might try to concentrate their ideas, and give the House the benefit of them in a shorter time

The TREASURER said that although much time might be wasted under the present system, the rule proposed by the hon gentleman would be very injudicious indeed In conducting the Estimates, for instance, through Committee, the officer in charge of them for the time would frequently be required to give information upon new points which arose in the discusssion, and, if the House adopted the amendment this object would be defeated

Mr PEAKE opposed the amendment, though he could not but admire the ingenious description of the hon member (Mr Hawker) of the spider crawling over the wall and marking it in a very indefinite manner indeed A discussion in Committee should be more like a conversation than a regular debate. It was necessary that members should speak more than once If the remarks of the hon member for Victoria as to the time wasted applied, it was rather to the debates of the House In future they must begin to study the views of the hon member for Victoria, who was evidently a critic, but he (Mr Peake) could not go with that hon member in destroying the real object of Committees of the whole House, which should be for conversational rather than for speech-making

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked whether the proposal would not tend to increase in a greater proportion the speeches in length rather than to shorten them in frequency

The amendment was permitted to lapse and the clause was agreed to

Clauses 360 to 377 inclusive were passed without amendment

On clause 378—

The TREASURER said that this and the two following clauses would require further consideration He therefore moved that they be struck out with a view of being introduced in a Bill of Privileges

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill, for even if these Standing Orders were adopted he thought it desirable that they should not be carried into effect until a Bill of Privileges were passed, as there were many of the Orders which the House had no power to enforce

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it desirable not to insert anything in these Standing Orders which it was not competent for the House to carry out, although the old Orders went as far beyond the powers of the House as the new ones, and as yet they had been productive of no inconvenience But they might give Committees the power of calling for books or witnesses, though they would not attempt to enforce such demands against persons unwilling to comply with them He would leave this power to the Committees

The three clauses were then struck out

Clauses 379 to 386 inclusive were agreed to, the word "law" being substituted for "statute" in the latter

Clause 387 was struck out

Clause 389, "Evidence of proceedings not to be given elsewhere"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said this clause should be struck out, for they had no power to prevent a person attending a court of justice and giving evidence on any matter on which the Judge thought he should be questioned

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether, in the case of a false and malicious statement being made by witness, he would be entitled to protection

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL imagined that a witness could not be proceeded against for anything said in answer to a question put by that House, any more than for an answer given in a court of justice, for the answer was supposed to be given under compulsion It was necessary if there was any doubt as to the existence of such protection—and he had no doubt himself—that the House should protect, as far as lay in its power, every witness who might come before it There was a possibility of a person being charged with giving evidence before the House of a false and malicious nature, an evidence which was itself false and malicious, and the House should protect its witnesses against this

Clauses 390 and 391 agreed to without amendment

Clause 392 struck out

The remaining clauses (ending at 399) were agreed to without amendment

Mr PEAKE enquired if it was competent for him to revert to chapter 14, and ask the House to insert an additional clause He was absent from the House when the chapter was passed, or he would have called attention to a slight omission which it was desirable to amend It was desirable that no amendment should be allowed on the third reading of a Bill unless notice was given of it It was injudicious to have amendments made after a Bill had gone through Committee without notice, though twice or three times during the last session such amendments had been introduced

The CHAIRMAN said the hon member was under a misapprehension, no amendment could be made on the third reading The course was that the Bill should be recommitted

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member would see by referring to No 270 that this case was provided for

JOINT STANDING ORDERS

The Committee then proceeded with the Joint Standing Orders, which (27 in number) were agreed to without amendment.

The House resumed, and the Chairman brought up the report of the Committee

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the report be printed and then it would be competent for any hon member to move that any clause be recommitted

The motion was agreed to

The House resolved itself into Committee

Mr HART thought the 144th clause should be struck out altogether in the first place, because the rules of the House of Commons were taken as rules for the House

The CHAIRMAN said that clause 174 of the House of Commons, was the same as this one, No 168, was the rule the hon member referred to

Mr STRANGWAYS wished that time should be given to reconsider this clause, as he wished to move that the whole chapter be struck out, until the Bill of Privileges was brought in

Mr HART said the difference between the new clause and that of the House of Commons was, that by the former the Speaker was to call a member by name and then censure him, whereas in the House of Commons the Speaker called upon the House to say whether the member was out of order The new clause gave a power to the Speaker which he for one would not like to sit under, for although he had the greatest dependence on the hon the Speaker, he considered it too much power to confer upon him to enable him, without the sanction of the House, or without calling on the House to say whether a member was in order or not, to call down upon that member the censure of the House

The CHAIRMAN said that the rule in question was copied word for word from the Standing Order of the House of Commons, and reminded the House that whatever the ruling of the Speaker might be, a member might appeal against it to the House, and he had known that to be done in the former Council

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the clause authorised the Speaker to call upon a member by name, but the censure was not called down by that, but by the conduct of the disorderly member, and unless a person misconducting himself and thus called upon were to meet with censure, he could see very little use in having a Speaker at all

Mr GLYDE supported the clause, though he did not read it like the Attorney-General, for he thought the words "every such member" meant every member so called on, and not every member so misconducting himself

The subject then dropped

Mr TOWNSEND said that after what had passed it was quite time that a Bill was introduced to define the privileges of the House

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that, as he had already stated, it was the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill but he had previously taken a different view of the Standing Orders, thinking that they might first be adopted and that then the Bill should be introduced

The House again resumed, and the consideration of the report was made an order of the day for Tuesday

The House rose at 10 minutes to 5 o'clock

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14

Present—The Hon the President, the Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon the Surveyor-General, Hon Messrs O'Halloran, Davenport, Forster, Captain Scott Hall, Ayers, Everard, Morphett, Bagot, Davies and A Scott

DEFENCES OF THE COLONY

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN observing that some documents relative to the defences of the colony had been laid upon the table of the House, wished to ascertain whether the Ministry intended to initiate measures to carry out the recommendation of the Sub-Committee of the Executive Council The answer which he received would determine him as to giving notice of motion on the subject He wished to know what sum the Ministry proposed to place on the Estimates for the defence of the colony

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY could not state from memory the exact sum, but would give the information which was required at an early opportunity Upon the sum proposed being sanctioned by the House of Assembly measures would be immediately taken to carry out the recommendations of the Committee

MR BABBAGE'S PARTY

The Hon Captain HALL wished to ask the Chief Secretary a question arising from rumours which had obtained ground out of doors to the effect that Mr Babbage's exploring party had been broken up, that the men had deserted, and were in confinement either at Mount Remarkable or Port Augusta. He wished to know whether the Government were in possession of any information upon the subject

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY had no information whatever upon the subject. The Government were not in possession of any information to lead them to supppose that anything such as the hon gentleman had referred to had taken place

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

The PRESIDENT announced that since the last meeting he had received a message from the House of Assembly intimating that they had passed a Bill to establish the validity of certain registrations, and that they desired the concurrence of the Legislative Council

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the Bill was read a first time and the second reading made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

EXPLORATION

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY laid upon the table reports connected with the exploration of the northern interior

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY remarked that after the explanation which he gave the House when he obtained permission to introduce this measure he did not deem it necessary to occupy the time of the House with any further explanation, and he would therefore at once move that the Bill be read a second time

The Hon Mr AYERS seconded the motion which was carried, and upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole for the consideration of the Bill

The preamble was postponed Also, the first clause determining the period at which the Bill should come into operation

Clause 2, giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction over causes matrimonial, was passed as printed

Clause 3, providing that no decree for divorce a mensa et thoro should be made after the passing of the Bill but that a judicial separation should be substituted, was passed as printed

Clause 4 providing that a sentence of judicial separation might be obtained by husband or wife for adultery, was passed as printed

Clause 5, providing that application for restitution of conjugal rights or judicial separation might be made by husband or wife by petition to the Supreme Court, was passed as printed

Clause 6, providing that a wife deserted by her husband may apply to a Special Magistrate, or Court, or Judge, was passed as printed

Clause 7 provided that the Court should act on the principles of the Ecclesiastical Courts, upon the CHIEF SECRETARY moving that it stand as printed,

The Hon Mr AYERS drew the attention of hon gentlemen to the fact that the words "said Court" rendered the meaning rather ambiguous There could be no doubt in his mind that the Supreme Court was meant, but the clause which immediately preceded it, the 6th clause, providing that certain acts were to be done at the Local Court of Full Jurisdiction, he certainly considered that the term "said Court" was not sufficiently clear

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the clause was an exact transcript of one in the English Act

The Hon Mr AYERS said it was the introduction of the term "the Local Court of Full Jurisdiction," in the previous clause which made the difficulty In nearly every subsequent clause the expression "said Court" was made use of, and this would seem to imply that the Local Court was intended, although there could be no doubt the Supreme Court was really meant, and if the clauses were permitted to remain as they were, some confusion was likely to arise

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY suggested, as the hon gentleman had apparently studied the clause, that he should move an amendment upon it, for the purpose of getting over the difficulty which he had pointed out

The Hon Mr AYERS thought that the introduction of the word "Supreme" before "Court," would get over the difficulty

The Hon Mr MORPHETT was quite content that such alteration should be made, but would point out that if it were it would be necessary that a similar alteration should be made in all the subsequent clauses in which the term "said Court" was used

The Hon the CHAIRMAN did not think it would be necessary to make the alterations in the subsequent clauses If the term "Supreme Court" were introduced in this clause, "said Court," in subsequent clauses, would clearly apply to the Supreme Court

The Hon C DAVIES suggested the introduction of a special clause, providing that where no specific Court was mentioned, the Supreme Court should be meant

The Hon the CHAIRMAN approved of this suggestion, which would prevent an alteration in a great number of clauses

The Hon Mr AYERS was willing to withdraw his amendment—that is, the introduction of the word "Supreme," and substitute a clause at the end of the Bill

The Hon the CHAIRMAN suggested that the amendment should remain also, and the clause, as amended, was passed

Clause 8, providing that a decree of separation, obtained during the absence of husband or wife, may be reversed, was passed as printed

Upon clause 9 being read, providing that the Court may direct payment of alimony to wife or to her trustee,

The Hon A FORSTER called the attention of the Chief Secretary to the fact that unless this payment of alimony was secured in some way it might be very contingent The husband might be subject to a decree to pay the money, and this would be enforced so long as he had property, but when he ceased to be possessed of any the wife would cease to receive her allowance He suggested to the Chief Secretary whether it would not be desirable to reserve this clause to see if some alteration could not be made to enable the Court decreeing alimony to secure it upon the husband's property This important point involved in fact the chief principle of the Bill, that the wife should receive support in case she obtained a divorce As the clause at present stood he feared that in very many cases the wife would be deprived of alimony

The Hon Captain HALL thought the object which the hon gentleman sought to attain might easily be attained by the introduction of a few words in the clause He would suggest the insertion of the words, "in order to secure the payment thereof," which he thought would meet the views of the Hon Mr Forster

The Hon Mr MORPHETT call the attention of the Chief Secretary and of the House to the fact that the words which it was proposed to introduce were not in the English Act The clause before the House was an exact transcript of a clause in the English Act, and when they considered the great amount of legal and legislative ability which had been brought to bear upon the English Act, and that it had been so recently introduced, it would be well, he thought, not at present to make a difference, but to adhere as closely as possible to the Act of the Imperial Parliament The clause, as it at present stood, gave power to the Court to impose any terms or restrictions which the Court might deem expedient, and this, he thought, gave them full power He could not see that the Court were barred from making any order they pleased

The Hon A FORSTER was quite sure that this clause had received very careful attention from high legal authorities, but as he had not had an opportunity of ascertaining what the views of those authorities were, nor any opportunity of consulting them, he merely suggested that there might be some better arrangement for guarding the alimony due to the wife by the decree of the Court If the hon gentleman who introduced the Bill before the House would decisively state that it was the intention and meaning of the Act that the Court should guard the alimony as he had suggested, he should be perfectly satisfied but he might mention to the House that he had the opinion of legal gentlemen to the effect that such would not be the effect of the clause under discussion, that no such power was in fact vested in the Court, but notwithstanding that opinion, if the hon gentleman who had charge of the Bill would state that such was its intention, he should at once bow The reason that he had called attention to the clause was, that it was supposed by persons who should be able to give an opinion upon the subject, that the amount granted to the wife by the Court was not secured by the Court, and that they had no power to secure it He was not desirous of making any unnecessary alteration in the Imperial Act

The Hon S DAVENPORT believed that this clause was an exact copy of a clause in the English Act, but he perceived that a new Act was proposed to be introduced in the Imperial Parliament, to correct some informalities in the original Act, and he rather thought that a copy of the new Act which it was proposed to introduce was in the colony It was quite probable that the new Act might have reference to the reconstruction of this very clause, and it was quite possible that before the next meeting of the House he might have an opportunity of seeing the new Act He would therefore suggest that the clause should be postponed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that all the information which the Government had upon the subject was embodied in the despatch No 33, in which there was certainly no allusion to any amended Imperial Act No doubt the clause under discussion had been been well considered and discussed in all its bearings in the Imperial Parliament He agreed with the hon Mr Morphett that the words of the clause giving the Court power to impose any terms and restrictions they might deem expedient, included all the power that the Court could desire He thought at present it would be very unadvisable to interfere with the wording of the Act of the Imperial Parliament

The Hon Captain HALL admitted it was silly to attempt to "gild refined gold," or "paint the lily" but he contended it was entirely within the province of that House to attempt to render more clear any proviso introduced in an English Act He thought it would be much better that the words which had been proposed should be introduced, so that the real intent and meaning of the clause would be rendered intelligible to every reader of common sense He considered that when alimony was decreed it should be secured upon the husband's estate, or that some restraint should be placed upon his person, and no doubt this was the meaning of the clause, but in order to make it self-evident, he would also move the insertion of the words "for securing payment of such alimony"

The Hon Dr EVERARD seconded the amendment

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought the insertion of these words would have the effect of narrowing rather than extending the powers of the Court Their powers, it seemed to him, would be narrowed to the mere payment of the alimony

The CHAIRMAN suggested the words "or otherwise"

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thought it better to postpone the clause, in order that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown might be obtained as to the effect of the proposed alterations

The clause was accordingly postponed

Clauses 10 and 11, providing that in case of judicial separation, the wife shall be considered a femme sole with respect to property she may acquire, and also for the purposes of contract and suing were passed as printed

Clause 12 provided that upon adultery of wife, or incest, &c, of husband, a petition for dissolution of marriage might be presented

The Hon Captain HALL asked if this clause were a transcript of a clause in the English Act? It appeared to him that the clause had a one-sided bearing merely relating to the wife. There was no provision for adultery committed by the husband

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said it referred to both, though under different circumstances

The CHAIRMAN referred to the 20th line, and the Hon Captain HALL having admitted he was mistaken, the clause was passed as printed

Clauses 13 to 16 providing that an adulterer shall be a co-respondent to a petition, that the cause may be tried by a Jury, that the Court shall be satisfied of the absence of collusion, that the Court may dismiss the petition, and, that the Court may pronounce decree for dissolving marriage, were passed as printed, without discussion

Clause 17 provided that the Court might direct the husband to secure alimony to the wife

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY presumed this would meet the objection which had been raised in an early stage of the Bill

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 18 provided that a husband may claim damages from adulterer

The Hon Dr DAVIES wished to know how it was that upon a petition going forth a Jury were to be called upon to assess damages, when it was distinctly stated in the the 38th clause that after the Act had come into operation there should be no action in South Australia maintainable for criminal conversation,

The CHAIRMAN said that although no action could be brought the damages would be assessed

The clause was passed as printed

Clauses 19 to 22, giving the Court power to order the adulterer to pay costs, to make orders as to the custody of children, to try questions of fact, and to reduce questions to writing to be tried by a sworn jury, were passed as printed without comment

Clause 23, relating to bills of exceptions, special verdicts, and special cases, was upon the application of the Chief-Secretary, postponed

Clause 24, giving the Court power to direct issues to try any fact, was passed as printed

Clause 25, relating to affidavits in support of petition, was passed as printed, but the Hon C DAVIES remarked in reference to certain terms which it contained, that although the Act was intended to supersede previous Acts, there was no explanation in it relative to certain terms which were used, such as nullity of marriage and jactitation of marriage He thought it would be much better that these terms should be defined in contradistinction from the terms previously in use

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY remarked that the Bill would again be considered in Committee

Clauses 26 to 34—Providing for service of petition, examination of petitioner, adjournment, giving power to the Court to order settlement of property for benefit of innocent party, and children of marriage, defining the mode of taking evidence, giving power to the Court to issue commission or give orders for the examination of witnesses abroad, or unable to attend, regulating costs, enforcing orders and decrees, and giving the Court power to make rules, &c, for precedence, and to alter them from time to time, were passed as printed without discussion

Clause 35 provided that the Court should have full power to regulate the scale of fees

The Hon Dr DAVIES wished to ask the Chief Secretary what guarantee in the face of such a clause as this they had of the beneficial working of this Act A subsequent clause provided that the rules and regulations should be laid before Parliament before they were adopted, but he wanted to know whether the Parliament would have any control over the fees, otherwise they might be made so excessive that the Act would be abortive In the Consistory Court of London the lowest cost of an application, such as was contemplated by this Act, even where there was no opposition, was 120*l* or 130*l*, and if there was opposition the cost was 200*l* or 300*l*, and sometimes 1000*l*, whilst in Scotland the cost was only 20*l* The House should have some guarantee that the fees would be reasonable, otherwise the Act would be a nullity

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the House would have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon this point when the regulations were laid before Parliament They would then be enabled to determine what the fees should be The hon gentleman would observe there was a clause enabling poor persons to sue in forma pauperis

The clause was then passed as printed

Clause 36, providing an appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court, was, upon the application of the Chief Secretary, postponed

Clause 37, relating to liberty to parties to marry again but providing that no officiating minister was compelled to marry them, was passed as printed

The Hon Captain HALL observed that there was provision for an appeal in this case, although clause 36, which more particularly referred to appeals, had been postponed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY had no intention of striking out the 36th clause, but merely wished to alter its form

Clause 38, providing that after the passing of the Act no action for criminal conversation should be maintainable in South Australia, was passed as printed

Clause 39 providing that the rules, &c, in connection with the Act, should be laid before Parliament was amended by the insertion of the word "calendar" before month

The Hon Captain BAGOT pointed out that this clause provided that the rules and regulations should be laid before Parliament, but it did not at all follow that the Parliament had anything to do with them when they were laid there The 35th clause gave the Court power to fix and regulate the scale of fees and the 39th provided that the rules should be laid before Parliament, but did not state that Parliament had any power to alter or reject those rules or any of them

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the fact of the rules being laid before Parliament was for the express purpose of enabling Parliament to come to some resolution respecting them

The Hon H AYERS moved an additional clause to the effect that in the construction of the Act, the term "Court" unless otherwise explained, should mean the Supreme Court of this province

Carried

The Hon H AYERS moved the addition of another clause, remarking, that for the purpose of convenience it was necessary to have a general title to Acts He therefore moved that this Act be cited as the Divorce and Matrimonial Act

The CHAIRMAN thought that question had best be considered when the title of the Act was under consideration

The Hon Mr MORPHETT thought it would be necessary to introduce "Matrimonial causes" on the title of the Act

The Hon H AYERS adopted the suggestion, but ultimately withdrew the proposition with the view of introducing it when the Bill was again under consideration in Committee

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and the House resumed, when leave was given to the Committee to sit again on Tuesday next, till which day the House adjourned

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14

The SPEAKER took the chair at 5 minutes past 1 o'clock

NEW MEMBERS

The SPEAKER announced the return of the writs, declaring David Shannon, Esq, duly elected for the district of Light, and Edward McEllister, Esq, for the district of Burra and Clare

The two hon gentlemen took the oath and their seats

PETITION

Mr BAGOT presented a petition from 200 proprietors of land and property at Kapunda and its vicinity, being inhabitants thereof, stating their willingness to give the necessary space of land, either gratuitously or at a fair valuation, for the purpose of carrying out the portion of the railway within the township of Kapunda

PAPERS

Various papers were laid upon the table.

MR BABBAGE

Mr HAWKER wished to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands, without notice, whether he had received any information that Mr Babbage was now at Mount Remarkable, and that having failed to carry out the objects of his exploration, he had placed the whole of his party in charge of the police

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS could not give any authentic information on the subject He had been told that such was the case, but did not know whether it was correct or not

GAWLER LINE TO KAPUNDA

Mr BAGOT begged to propose the motion standing in his name—"That the petitions respecting the extension of the Gawler Railway to Kapunda, signed by 1313 persons, be printed "

Granted

COLONIAL DEFENCES

Mr GLYDE asked the Commissioner of Public Works the question standing in his name, namely, how soon the Government intended to take action upon the despatches and reports upon our Colonial Defences

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the Government had already taken some action on the subject of the despatches laid on the table, and that when the Estimates for 1859 were before the House the question would be placed more fully before them.

RAILWAY EXTENSION

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a plan accompanied by a memorandum of the comparative advantages of the extension of the railway to Kapunda and the Valley of the Gilbert

Mr REYNOLDS asked if it was a working plan

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it exactly corresponded with the former plans submitted to the House

Mr REYNOLDS said those plans were not working plans

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had followed the precedent previously adopted

Mr REYNOLDS said, in passing the Bill for the extension of the Railway last session, all the stations were placed on Government land but now he found they were not to be placed on Government land He considered that the using of Section 70 for station purposes was contrary to the provisions of that Bill

STANDING ORDERS IN RELATION TO RAILWAYS

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired if there were any Standing Orders in regard to railways in this colony, similar to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons in England He believed that there the plans and specifications were obliged to be laid on the table of the House, but, that here, if any member wished to inspect the plans, he must go to the Surveyor-General's office

The SPEAKER said that the rule of that House in regard to private Bills was defined by two Acts of the late Council, and was the same as that of the House of Commons, but that railways here being public undertakings, there were no Standing Orders applicable to them

KAPUNDA RAILWAY BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would have risen with great diffidence to submit the motion standing in his name to the House, had it been the first action that had been taken on the subject of railway extension, but it had already engaged the attention of the Legislature He believed, both in the House and out of it, the general feeling was in favor of a gradual extension of the railway system, and the House had arrived at that conclusion after considerable and careful enquiry The duty of every member in moving the second reading of a Bill was to state the principles of that Bill The principle of that Bill was precisely the principle of the Bill for the extension of the Gawler Town Railway to Section 112 The same plan was followed as was adopted at the commencement of public works of that nature, of providing one third of the necessary amount from the general revenue, and borrowing two-thirds from the money market of England He need not enlarge on the direct and indirect benefits of railway communication after so much had been said and written on the subject He took it for granted that it was admitted on all hands, but it was possible there might be objections to the Bill The form of the Bill might be objected to by some hon members, because of the reference in the title to certain powers granted to the Railway Commissioners, but a Bill was prepared and in the hands of the Government printer, and he thought it would be before the House in a fortnight, which would probably meet that objection But there was another question to which his attention had been called by petitions presented to the House, and by articles in the daily papers He alluded to the question of route That question might be referred to in the discussion about to commence The Government last session referred a Bill for the extension of the Railway to Gawler Town and Kapunda to a Select Committee It received careful enquiry at the hands of several hon members of that House, and they unanimously agreed to extend the Gawler Town Railway to Kapunda He regretted that plan was not in the hands of hon members, because they would then have been sufficiently convinced that that was the best line that could be adopted He was on that enquiry, and he believed when the difficult gradients between Gawler Town and Section 112 were known, it would be seen that it was not advisable to extend it to that section The gradients on the Kapunda line were far more favorable than on the other, and it was also two to three miles shorter So much had been said, so much had been laid before both Houses of Parliament on the subject, and so much evidence had been given by the engineers under the Surveyor-General, and by the leading engineers of the colony respecting it, that as he would have another opportunity of combating any arguments that might be used on the other side, he would leave it in the hands of the House It was for the interests of the country that the Gawler Town Railway should be speedily put forward He considered that the line in question fell back on a good country and that it was required for the interest of the settlers, and seeking those objects, he felt that that line must be selected as the best He therefore relied on the support of the House He felt fortified by the names of those who had petitioned, and would conclude by moving the second reading of the Kapunda Railway Bill

Mr HAWKER begged to move an amendment, which he would first read and then speak to it He moved—

"That this Bill be referred to a Select Committee to report thereon, with power to call for books and documents, and to summon witnesses "

He gave the House to understand that as far as the question of railways might be under notice he was not interested personally, because no matter which line was chosen, the nearest point to his property in the north was the point of junction Although he represented a district—the ultima thule of Burra and Clare—all petitions were sent thence to him to present, and the members for Burra and Clare were requested to support them He took great interest in the question before the House, because he thought, in initiating the main trunk railways of the colony, it was necessary not merely to look at the present moment, nor where the largest amount of traffic was to be realised, but they ought to look a little into the future He utterly denied that the Kapunda and Light Line was the best line for the Northern Railway traffic The interest now existing should not be everything, for they ought also to look to 10 or 20 years hence in order to make a line likely to be of benefit to the colony The Surveyor-General had made a return of the unsold land on each side of the railway It was perfectly absurd It was necessary to look far beyond 15 miles On one side they found an outlying country on to the Murray Plains, and on the other side the Eastern Plains, where he believed the agriculture of the colony could not be extended They had the evidence of the hon member for Barossa (Mr Duffield) that for two years no rain had fallen on the eastern plains of the Murray He contended that that was not an agricultural country But he did not call the line a main trunk line to the north, but a railway to the Kapunda Mine There was an agricultural population on that line, it was true, but not equal by far to that on the other line Should hon members say it was not the case, let them look at the flour-mills on the Valley of the Gilbert line—let them look at Mr Masters's beautiful mill, another at Auburn, another at Penwortham, and a fine mill at Clare—all steam mills—and also at the meeting which had been held at Mintaro for laying the foundation stone of another mill What other evidence was wanted to show the agricultural wants of the community? The question had never been freely discussed when the Bill was passed last session He thought it would be more beneficial to the colony that the line to Kapunda should be knocked on the head, and that fresh contracts should be asked for the Valley of the Gilbert line He believed this plan was for the benefit of the farmers in that district No doubt great good had resulted from the discovery of the Kapunda Mine, and the manner in which the Hon Captain Bagot had worked it reflected great credit upon him, but one point had been altogether forgotten, namely, that which affected the agricultural population, and the cost of taking their produce to market. He would compare the cost of about a ton of wool and ore and wheat. The carriage on each he would estimate at 3l. But the wool and the ore were each worth about 100l., on which the carriage was 3 per cent. but estimating the wheat worth 15l., the carriage was 20 per cent. What they had to look at was where the largest amount of produce came from, and how it could be most cheaply got to market. He considered the line he advocated was the most beneficial for the interests of the colony, and thought it necessary when an enormous sum of public money was spent, that it should be spent not with reference to the present time only, but with a view to what would be most beneficial at a future time. We could not afford to spend so much money on railways if they were not in the best direction, for if a mistake were made in one line, we could not afford to make another. He considered also that information was wanted on the subject. Many members were in the dark as to the relative values of the two lines, and in moving the amendment he had not been asking too much. He was only asking for evidence in order to be able to form a fair and honest opinion. The hon. member for Kapunda mine, presented a petition signed by 600 landholders, but he thought the House ought to wait until opinion could be expressed before they proceeded to legislate. He contended it was not fair to the northern portion of the Valley of the Gilbert, and he thought if hon. members would go up and look at the country they would be satisfied. What was there to the right of the line? Next to nothing. There was one large run of 30 miles long, and outside that line there were plains which could never be cultivated. On the other side were the dews and rains of Heaven and a fertile soil. He considered that in making a great trunk line, the interest of the public ought not to be sacrificed to that of individuals, who now alone could reap the benefit.

Mr. MCELLISTER thought the line should be carried by the Valley of the Gilbert. He seconded the amendment.

Mr. BAGOT wished that it had not fallen to him to continue the discussion as he was suffering from severe hoarseness, but he could not hear the speeches made by hon. members without saying a few words in reply. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) had made a statement, on which no doubt he relied implicitly as a statement of facts. It became him when he made use of such statements to be correct, but it would be seen that the hon. member had not got up his case so well as he might have done. The principle which the hon. member for Victoria wished to act upon in the extension of the railway system of the country was that we should not look so much to the present time—to the men who had invested their money in the land, and paid their money into the Treasury—but to those who might do so 20 years hence. But he (Mr. Bagot) thought the principle on which to construct railways was that they should endeavor to benefit those districts where the largest amount of land had been bought. In consequence of that a railway through such a district would pay better than a railway extended to a wilderness, and the House ought to deal with the question on that principle. It should not extend the railway to a thin sparse population, and leave out that district where there was a large population and a large amount of land purchased, merely for the purpose of selling land. That principle had never before been advocated in that House. The same principle should be adopted with regard to railways as to the main lines of roads, in which it was assumed that the route should be for the benefit of those who had produce to take to market. He thought it the duty of the Government to bring forward such measures as they thought likely, if not to give an immediate return for the large expenditure necessary, at least to present a prospect of reproductiveness. He wished to extend the railway to the north, because an enormous quantity of land had been sold, and settlers were there who for 3, 4, 5, or 6 months in the year were not able to bring their produce to the market, and who were thus deprived of the benefit which agriculturists on main lines of road enjoyed. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) had entered into a statement respecting the Kapunda mine. He regretted he (Mr. Bagot) had no interest in it, but matters should not be judged by the personal interests of members. He had heard that the hon. member, however, represented the squatters in that House, and he (Mr. Bagot) thought probably the motion for a Select Committee might be the mode adopted by the representative of the squatters for shelving the Bill altogether—(no, no)—and if that measure were not carried, he thought it probable that railway extension might be thrown over. (No.) Hon. members said "no," he said "yes," for if this measure were referred to a Select Committee—if the evidence before them and before the House was to be gone over again, the probability was that it would be too late in the session to get the Bill brought forward again. There were hon. members in that House who would be glad of the opportunity of cooking all railway extension for a considerable time. Last year the House passed the Bill for extending the railway from Gawler Town to Kapunda. That was passed after a most careful and searching investigation by a Committee, in which there were members of all shades of opinions, including himself, and the member for the Burra and Clare (Mr. Peake), but he thought they must look at the question in reference to the neighboring colonies, in which large sums of money were being spent for extending railway communication. If they did not proceed with those extensions other colonies would have the start of them, and he considered that the House ought to agree to the necessity of doing something. He trusted the House would consider the question, and not allow the representative of the squatters to throw the Bill overboard. The member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) said he did not know the reason why the memorials in regard to that question came down to him. He (Mr. Bagot) would not for a moment think that the gentlemen who signed that petition had not confidence in the member for Burra and Clare, but no doubt they looked upon the member for Victoria as the representative of the squatting interest, and probably thinking that the railway from Section 112 to Kapunda, if it were put off to another year, some chance might turn up to give greater excuse for delay, and that then might be more readily heard. [Mr. Hawker—"No, no"—You are wrong."] He looked upon the House as pledged by the vote of last year to extend the railway to Kapunda, because the second reading of the Bill was carried by a large majority, and the present Bill must be considered a mere continuation of it. The House passed that Bill deliberately, and when the Railway Bill was thrown out by the Upper House they came forward and, almost to a man, urged the Government to bring in the Bill again, for the purpose of extending the railway from Gawler Town to Kapunda. The House having thus twice pledged itself to the Bill, it would not be treating the country and those parties who had purchased immense tracts of land with fairness and justice, were it not now to adopt the Bill. Railway communication should be first given to those districts which were great centres of population and where large investments had been made in land, and at some future time it might be extended to other portions of the country where the land was sold, but he protested against the doctrine that railway extension should be for the purpose of enabling the Government to sell land.

Mr. MILNE felt disappointed that every proposition made by the Government to extend railways had been in reference to the extension of the system to the north. It was his wish that the Government would express their intention with regard to other portions of the colony. He was a great advocate for railways, and was as well convinced of their benefit as any member of the House. He was thoroughly convinced of the advantage, but he objected to their being monopolized. The general revenue of the colony was pledged for the purpose of extending railways, and it was only fair that every part of the colony when the system could be carried out should participate in the benefit. He was satisfied those works would be reproductive and that the Government ought to take up the question as a whole, and give the advantage of that system to all quarters of the colony. He would oppose the second reading of the Bill unless the Government would state whether or not it was their intention to extend the benefits of railway communication to other parts of the colony.

Mr. GLYDE intended to support the amendment. He did not think that he could be said to be interested in the measure, and he did not think that the new members of the House had had an opportunity of gaining sufficient information on the subject. Those who were in the House when first the Bill passed might be possessed of that information and might have pledged themselves to the completion of the line. For his part he was not in the House at that time. It was possible that if a Select Committee sat and reported they might decide in favor of the line to Kapunda but he wished to see that Committee appointed. There was one thing which appeared a remarkable oversight on the part of the Government. They had distinctly stated that when that Bill was proposed, one-third of the cost should be charged on the revenue, but on that Bill before him it was proposed to raise £50,000 by loan, and only to advance £20,000 from the revenue. It appeared to be rather an unnecessary step on the part of the Government and for that reason he certainly could not support the Bill in its present form, and if the resolution was agreed to he would move an amendment when it went into Committee. He must support the amendment for a Select Committee.

Mr. NEALES hoped hon. members would not take the trouble to disclaim interested motives. He considered that if this measure were not carried the Government would be breaking faith with the public. (No, no, hear, hear.) If new members were to have the question opened up again, there need only be a succession of new members to keep the matter in abeyance for ever. If they were ignorant on this subject, they must go to the Blue Books, where they would find all the information they needed. The opinion last session was in favour of the line to Kapunda, not to 112 only. He objected to the principle enunciated in the amendment, that we ought to legislate for those who might or might not exist twenty years hence. If a railway were made to the North there would be no excuse for not adopting the Kapunda line. He had no particular objections to a Select Committee, but he would undertake to get up a better case for starting afresh at Adelaide to go to the north than could be made out for extending the line to the Valley of the Gilbert, from Gawler or Section 112.

Mr. SHANNON had no intention when he entered the House of taking part in the discussion, but he was acquainted with the country, and with the proposed line of railway, and therefore could give an opinion upon it His (Mr Shannon's) impression with regard to railways was, first—that they should be laid out so as to accommodate the greatest number of individuals and secondly, with a view to the greatest amount of revenue to be derived from them in proportion to the cost of construction He thought the line proposed effected those objects He thought there were better methods of estimating the necessities of a neighborhood than that of counting the mills That was not the reasoning he should consider conclusive, he would take the population of the district and its productive capabilities The proposed line passed through a good country, not only immediately adjacent to it, but on the east of the line there was not a mile of scrub for 25 miles, and all the intervening country was valuable for agriculture He would only refer to the land sales of last Thursday, and hon members would see the prices of land east and north-east of Kapunda, some of it fetched £2 per acre The quality of the soil was good—in fact, second to none in the colony and some near the proposed line of railway had been settled for some considerable time, and every day presented an increase of the capabilities of the land in that direction Reference had been made to the Kapunda mine The amount expended annually in wages was 40,000*l* and the mines were very rich He thought, therefore, the Government ought to be supported in this measure, especially as the question had been discussed last session He hoped hon members would think well before they altered their views, and that they would not do so without good reasons He considered the question best understood from the Engineer's reports He trusted, therefore, the proposition of the Government would be carried

The Attorney-General felt some difficulty in addressing the House because ever since he had had the honor of being connected with the Government, he did not wish to appear to oppose himself to enquiry when statements were made that there was not sufficient information, where public interests were at stake And although he felt no hesitation in voting for the second reading of the Bill, and believed that every honorable member present in that House during the discussion of last session who had read the report of the Committee could form no other conclusion than that the line proposed by the Government, was the line that must ultimately be adopted, he did not like to oppose himself and say to others that inquiry was not needed The Government attached great importance to carrying out the railway system, and when they introduced that motion, they did not expect to meet with a formal opposition, because it had been already before that branch of the Legislature If the House wished, by the appointment of a committee, for further information, he would not oppose himself to it Having said this he would refer to the arguments used in support of the motion for a committee of enquiry He need not refer to the strange proposal of the member for Victoria that that House should legislate not for the present, but so completely for the future, that it should look twenty years forward to the population that might be and construct railways without return for them He thought it would be wise and more economical for those in the colony twenty years hence to make another railway through the district through which the hon member proposes the railway should go than that the House should legislate on such grounds That plan would ignore the population now in existence, and he himself should shrink from adopting it There was a report on the table in accordance with a motion by the member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), showing that the quantity of unsold land within fifteen miles of each side of the proposed line was within a trifle the same When then they found that there were 120,000 acres more of unsold land in the proposed line by the Valley of the Gilbert, what did that prove, but that on the other side there were 120,000 acres more land purchased, and in possession of parties who had paid their money into the Treasury, and who had a right to be considered sooner than those who might never be He only thought it necessary to refer to one other topic, and that was the subject suggested by the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Milne), who said that he thought hitherto all railways had been carried towards the north and he thought there should be something done for the south In that he cordially agreed, but in reference to that particular railway the Government was placed in a position that would render them liable to a charge of breach of faith were it not completed Hon members would remember that when that Railway Bill was passed through that House and rejected by the Upper House, it was distinctly announced by the Government, and acquiesced in by the House, that a measure precisely similar should be introduced to complete the railway to Kapunda That Bill, when rejected by the other branch of the Legislature, could not be again introduced that session, but the Government felt distinctly that they were expected to introduce that Bill, and had they not done so they would have been liable to a charge of breach of faith They were fully aware of the importance of railways to the south, and from Strathalbyn to Goolwa He believed though the traffic was not at present sufficient to justify the expense of a locomotive, a tramway would be an advantageous thing The Government would be prepared to receive favorably any scheme for that purpose, if there was any reasonable prospect of its being self-supporting They had taken no action in the matter this year, for they felt it their duty to complete the line to Kapunda as was promised, but should the present Ministry remain in office, the next work would be to give to the South-East districts railway communication He would support the second reading but would not object to the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee if it was the wish of the House

Mr Lindsay said the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works had stated in his speech that it was desirable to extend the railway system, and as he (Mr Lindsay) had been an advocate of the extension of railways over the colonies when that hon member was the advocate of, what in colonial phraseology were termed tramways, but which were in reality nothing more than badly designed railways only fit for horse-traffic he was glad to find that the hon member had been converted into so strong a supporter of the railway system He thought more information was required on the subject before the House (Hear, hear) During the last session there had been a discussion on the subject, and it was then stated by the supporters of the Kapunda line that the question of future route would not be affected by going to the 112th Section, but it appeared now that having carried the line so far, the House was told it must be carried on to Kapunda It appeared that the Government having made a mistake in going so far were to continue their mistake by going farther They had not had any proper report from the Government as to where the line was to stop or where it was to go to Eight years ago Sir Henry Young had proposed that a line of railway should be surveyed from Willunga to the Burra, and if that line had been carried out they need not now be squabbling as to whether they should go a mile or two on one side or the other of the line, as they would have their principal line made and a general idea of what their railway system should be when completed The views of the hon member for Victoria had been attempted to be controverted when he said that they ought to look to the future as well as to the present (Oh, oh) But he (Mr Lindsay) could not see anything to ridicule in that Had they looked merely to the present ten years ago when he was in favor of the commencement of railways, they would have made a system for the South alone, for at that time the population was settled in the South, but they should consider what the country would be in a few years, and not adopt a system which would be applicable only for a few years but one which should be useful for ever, in order that people might not hereafter say that it was a mistake to construct a line in such a place If the people of the North were prepared to pay too dearly for their whistle in this matter he could have no objection to their doing so for he was satisfied that in due time the people of the South would be considered, and he had no fear of their claims not being admitted But he neither approved of the general system adopted by the Government, nor of the details, and he was of opinion that more information was wanted Estimates for the Strathalbyn and Goolwa line varied from 18,000*l* to 26,000*l* He could not sit down without referring to some particular points in the Bill In all other countries but this, railways carried goods cheaper than they were conveyed on common roads, but here the rule was reversed for carriage on the railways was doubled From Willunga passengers were carried in conveyances quite as luxurious as a railway carriage, for 2d and 4-10ths per mile, whilst on the railways the maximum charge was 4d per mile In Belgium they charged less more than 1d for the first-class, and in America the same Believing that more information was wanted upon this subject he should without at all opposing the Bill, support the motion for referring it to a Select Committee, not with any desire to shelve the Bill or delay the works, but in order that the railway, if carried out should be on the best principle which could be devised He should make a few further remarks on our railway bills He did not know by whom they were drawn, but they seemed to him the greatest mass of absurdities conceivable He found in the Bill a clause which he believed was taken from the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Act, enacting that any persons or corporation running their own carriages or locomotives on the line, could do so on paying 70 per cent of the tolls To have this clause in a Government Railway Bill was a very curious mode of legislating, to say the least of it, and he thought that such a clause should be expunged from any railway bill in the present day He found also that the 10th clause referred to railway-crossings Whether there were any other but level crossings on the contemplated line he did not know, but there did seem to be a desire on the part of our engineers to make every crossing on the level if possible, thereby rendering necessary expensive gates and gate-keepers Perhaps, in making these remarks, he was going beyond what he should say, as he was referring to clauses which would come under discussion at the proper time He should say no more, but would vote for the Select Committee, not with a view to prevent the extension of railways, but with the view of obtaining such an enquiry as would prove a benefit to the country

Mr Barrow trusted that if they were to have a Select Committee on the Bill, there would be no attempt made to discuss the clauses on the present occasion, whether in support of the views of the hon member who had just sat down, or in opposition to them He would go with the hon member for Victoria in favor of the appointment of a committee, though not with entire satisfaction to himself, and he should certainly vote against the amendment if he thought it would have the effect of shelving the question before the House They must have railways, and he thought in saying that he might add that they must have railways to the North At the same time he agreed with the hon member for Onkaparinga that they should do something for the southern districts but they could not make railroads in all directions, and for the present they must be content to make them towards the North Whether they were to adopt the line by the Gilbert or that by Kapunda was the question now before them, and he thought that, though there was much information to be had on the subject from the Blue Books in the library of the House, such information might not be altogether reliable He had seen statements in official documents, and had seen these statements afterwards refuted, and he saw no reason for placing implicit reliance in Blue Books One story was good until another was told, and if, as had been represented, the arguments in favor of the Kapunda line were so overwhelming that there was no chance of making head against them, then he apprehended they need not have much delay in committee, for in such a case, he presumed, they would come to a unanimous and a speedy conclusion The hon member for the Sturt had said in the commencement of the discussion that the Government land should be rendered available for stations, instead of purchasing private lands for the purpose, and the hon member had also spoken of the necessity of having working plans and drawings These topics had been only touched upon, but sufficient had been said to warrant the House in referring the Bill to a Select Committee, and they would be further justified in doing this, as the Government was inclined to give way on the point He would not insinuate the slightest censure against the Government for bringing in the Bill in its present form, inasmuch as from what had taken place last session, he considered them bound to do so But was it because the principle of a Bill had been approved of in one session that they were to be bound by it in another? For if so, they might as well at once move the House into Committee of the whole on the various clauses, as the principle was already affirmed Every Bill in such circumstances should be introduced de novo, and they should discuss this Bill as if it had never come before the House previously If in a former session a public work was left in such a state that no party was pleased with it, they must necessarily open up the whole question again, both in principle and in details As to what the hon the Attorney-General had said with respect to the quantities of unsold lands upon one of the proposed routes, proving the quantity of sold land upon the other it was a non sequitur The report did not speak of a strip of land 15 miles wide throughout, for if so, the comparison between the sold and unsold lands would apply, but the report spoke of lands sold "within a distance not exceeding 15 miles" Scrub or mountain ranges might approach the line within a breadth of three or four miles, and the distance still be "within" 15 miles He did not therefore see how the figures would establish the principle laid down Upon that point, as well as upon some others, he wished for more information, and should therefore support the motion for enquiry He hoped it would not be considered necessary to bring witnesses from all parts of the country, as there probably was sufficient documentary evidence already collected, provided there was time to go into it He thought they were bound to have a railway, and one in a northerly direction, but they should also have a view to the probable increase of population, and on this point the Committee might require some information He should therefore vote for the Select Committee if the question should come to a division, which he thought would not be the case but he should vote against the amendment in a minority, however small, if he thought that its effect would be to shelve the question now before the House

MR REYNOLDS said there seemed to be a very important omission in the Bill, and that it did not tally with the Bill of last year, to extend the Railway to Kapunda He was surprised that hon members had not adverted to that circumstance The Bill which the Government introduced last year for the line to Kapunda asked for power to raise a sum of 180,000*l* The next Bill asked for 120,000*l*, while the present Bill asked for 80,000*l*

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the matter referred to was a mistake The amount asked was 40,000*l* The 60,000*l* in the Bill was a mistake The whole sum asked for was 80,000*l*

MR REYNOLDS had thought the Bill was to be depended on, but the Engineer he found had made a mistake, and he (Mr Reynolds) was not surprised at it But finding that the plans and estimates were not as they ought to be, and that those laid before a former committee were not as they ought to be, he hoped at least that those laid before the Committee which the Government on this occasion conceded so gracefully, would be as they ought to be He was glad the Government conceded the Committee, for if they had not done so they might be left in a minority, and there was nothing the hon members disliked so much as to be in a minority upon any subject He would count heads and noses to any amount to avoid it, and so he should be very sorry to see them in such a position He had never seen so complaisant a Government, for they would do anything the House might tell them, only don't let them be in a minority With respect to the Bill before the House, it would be exceedingly inconsistent for him, having been a member of the previous Select Committee, to oppose the Government on this question But he must confess notwithstanding what had been said by hon members with respect to obtaining additional information on this subject, that he had obtained some additional information and was possessed of a little more light on the subject and that if the question came before the House now as it did at that time, he would vote for the route by the Gilbert, but having now got up as far as the 112th section, it was a question whether they could retrace their steps

MR PEAKE supported the motion for a Committee, and in doing so was anxious to explain that he by no means fell in with the views of the hon member for Light (Mr Bagot), that those who did so did it with a view of shelving the Bill Ever since he had been a member of that House he had advocated railway extension under much more unfavorable circumstances than the present His chief reason for wishing the question referred to a Committee was, that the House might have more detailed and correct information The House had expressed a wish for a survey by the Valley of the Gilbert, with a continuation to the Burra, and the head of the Executive had promised that this survey would be made During the recess the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches seemed to have been slumbering at their posts, so that the surveys were not made, and the meagre information furnished was that contained in the report of Mr Hargraves now before the House He would, for a moment, call attention to this most elaborate report and to the extraordinary plan laid on the table with it, to guide the House in coming to a conclusion on a point like that now before it The whole plan consisted of a couple of red lines without plans or sections [The hon member here read one or two brief extracts from the report.] That he presumed was the survey which the Executive laid on the table in reply to the address from that House asking for surveys of the two routes by the Valley of the Gilbert and Kapunda He thought he was justified in saying that they could not give their consent to the extension to Kapunda on such information as that Some hon members wished to lead the House to this vote because they had already got to the 112th section, but was it because they had made a mistake in going to the 112th section that they were to go 10 miles further in the same direction and still making the same mistake? He would be prepared to go even further than was proposed if the engineers had properly certified and sent in plans and sections showing that this was the best route which could be taken The House of Commons would never entertain such a document as that now on the table as a reply to such an address as had been adopted by the House When the Legislature was about to vote money in this way for the public accommodation they required the most accurate information, with plans and sections and certificates from a person properly qualified to inspect them They were not considering the question of a line to Kapunda, but that of a main line to the Murray, and the House should require accurate information as to which was the most economical and best line for the purpose He disclaimed all personal or local motives in giving his vote on the matter, and he would throw back on the hon member for Light (Mr Bagot) any such insinuations that hon member had made use of and trusted he would never hear any such imputations indulged in again

MR BAGOT—I said nothing of the kind

MR PEAKE said if hon members would refer to the debates of last session, they would find that the advocates of the Kapunda line told the House that if they went to the 112th section they could then go either to Kapunda or the Gilbert (Hear hear, and No) That was the argument which had been used in the House, and that was the understanding on which he (Mr Peake) had voted for the Bill In proof that such was the case he would point out that the House had asked surveys to be made, in order to ascertain whether a line to Kapunda or one to the Gilbert would be preferable, and therefore he considered it an idle argument to tell hon members that because they had supported the previous Bill they must support the present measure On the 16th January, 1857, the head of the Survey Department, in speaking of the northern extension, laid it down as a leading advantage of the Kapunda line that it would open up an accessible roadway to the mines in the north, and afford an opportunity of an extension from the Burra into 120 miles of country not yet occupied or known But he would remind the House that at that time none of the new discoveries in the west had been made, which had been brought to their knowledge since The mines and settlements had been going westwards, and mineral discoveries were being made in that direction, so that it might turn out in a little time that the traffic in the west would exceed any likely to arise in Kapunda, and that was another reason why they should not go on with the line until they were satisfied that the route to the north was the right one If his supposition that the north-western traffic was likely to increase were correct, then it would be of immense importance that the main line should be in that direction with branches to Mount Remarkable and elsewhere Hon members who knew anything of the country (and the hon the Speaker would bear him out in this) knew that they must go westward in order to find an opportunity of an extension beyond the Burra, for there was a splendid leading country there which admitted of easy extensions being made In Mr Hargreaves report, that gentleman stated that he had given in a report recommending a line the Gilbert, and that his reason for doing so was, that it afforded economical and good gradients, and that the line was also short That was the evidence had been given before him (Mr Peake) on the committee of which he was a member, and he apprehended that at that time Mr Hargreaves had made a proper survey of the country with his level in hand [The hon. member here quoted one or two passages from the evidence of Mr Hargreaves] There was one point he would refer to It was to express a hope that the House would in future take a decided course as to the amount of information which it required before voting money for public works, as it would not do to be led on, first to Section 112, and next to be led on a little further in the same direction, because they had gone to 112 This was not the line of policy which the country would expect from the House, and it was a line which the House would have reason to regret having taken The House should not be asked to consent to any roads, railways, or public works until the plans and estimates were laid on the table so that hon members might know precisely the nature of the works on which the money was to be expended

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

At this stage of the proceedings a message from His Excellency was announced

The SPEAKER announced the receipt of two messages from His Excellency, one acknowledging the receipt of an address from the Assembly, praying that a sum of money might be placed on the Estimates to defray the cost of boring artesian wells, and the other acknowledging the receipt of an address praying for copies of certain papers relating to the Marriage Bill and the Real Property Act His Excellency announced that he would cause both these prayers to be complied with

The TREASURER moved that the addresses be printed

RAILWAY DEBATE RESUMED

Mr HART thought that on an occasion of that kind the more information they had the better, but he confessed that, seeing that the House had passed in the early part of last session a Bill authorising the extension to Kapunda, he could not see how the hon member for the Burra and Clare could complain of their having gone to Section 112 The fact was, that on being stopped from going the whole distance, they had done the next best thing, they went halfway He (Mr Hart) felt that the submitting of this matter to a Select Committee would delay the work very considerably indeed (No, no) Hon members might say "no," but he thought it clear that if the report of the Committee should be in favor of the route by the Gilbert instead of that by Kapunda, the Government must introduce an entirely new Bill The present Bill would not be the one they passed, but another under a different title, and coming forward in an entirely different shape The whole question of the expense would have to be considered, and if the Select Committee should say that the Gilbert route was the best, there would be a very considerable delay indeed He did not intend to go into the question of the two lines, for he had not sufficient knowledge on that subject, but he would say, in answer to some remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay, with reference to tramways and railways that if that hon member looked at the papers he would find that in the year 1857 the Gawler Town line had made no revenue, that there had been no profit The present question was whether the railway to Kapunda was wanted, for if the Valley of the Gilbert route was taken, Kapunda would be without a railroad at all He would call the attention of the House to one great reason why railways might now be extended in this colony beyond what twelve months since it would have been prudent to attempt This was the altered rate at which we could borrow money It was of great moment whether we borrowed money at 6 per cent or at 5 per cent, for we might extend our railway much more at the latter price than at the former Thus, for instance, if our bonds for £100 sold for £111, on which we paid 6 per cent annual interest, we were actually paying less than 5½ per cent, seeing that £6 2s would be the interest on that sum But as we received now £111 and had only to pay back 100*l*, and, supposing the bonds to be payable 22 years hence, the 11*l* would furnish a sinking fund of one half per cent, this clearly showing that we were actual borrowers at less than 5 per cent He was glad to hear the manner in which the Attorney-General had referred to the Strathalbyn Tramway, which he believed would do a great deal of good He thought that where a railway, owing to the smallness of the traffic, would not pay, a tramway might, and, in fact, the Goolwa Tramway proved this, for it could be clearly shown that locomotive traction could not be employed there advantageously, and yet there was a clear profit of 2,000*l* a year on the present line, a fact which quite upset the arguments of the hon member for Encounter Bay He would suggest to the hon the Treasurer that, as we are now getting money at 5 per cent, the correspondence showing that fact would be of interest He hoped the principle would be adhered to in this Bill of paying out of the general revenue one-third of the cost of the work as the principal had enabled us to borrow money at 5 per cent

The TREASURER was surprised at the argument used by the hon member for the Burra He could scarcely call to mind at first whether that hon gentleman was a member of the Committee of last year, but thought he was laboring under some misapprehension in supposing so until he referred to the minutes and found he was Yet the hon gentleman now wanted information, though it seemed rather late in the day When the hon member spoke of good country being discovered to the westward, he (the hon Treasurer) presumed he, meant country north of Port Augusta, but Port Augusta was the outlet for all traffic from that country, and none of it would ever find its way to the railway, either by the Gilbert or Kapunda But a railway passing near the Burra, would form an outlet for a large tract of country, which he apprehended would then prove available and valuable In fact it would be the outlet of all the interior lands on the north east, for the country could not be approached by water either from the Murray or the Gulf The reasons why the line was adopted had been very carefully examined by the Government when the Bill was introduced last year, and he had heard nothing that day to alter that opinion [The hon member here read an extract from a report of the Surveyor-General's in favour of the line, as compared with eight others] When the matter came before the committee, there was no dissentient against the Bill If they adopted a different route now from that of last year it would only show that the route then adopted was agreed to without due consideration, which he believed was not the case He could understand why new members asked for information but not why old ones should do so He thought the Government were right in allowing enquiry, and had no doubt the enquiry would show that the proper course had been recommended He agreed with the hon member for Light Towers that we could not have a railway in every direction and railways were not like ordinary roads where small sums might be spent here and there advantageously, but must be completed to a certain extent before they were at all available The hon gentleman concluded some further remarks by expressing his conviction that the Government were justified in the course they had pursued both in introducing the Bill and in submitting to further enquiry

Mr TOWNSEND said that the Government could not do less than introduce this Bill He believed the Bill of last session for the extension to Section 112, was one introduced to meet the difficulty of introducing the same Bill twice in one session, and he thought that after the report of the Committee which had sat for, he believed, 18 days, the extension to 112 should be carried out He was surprised at the remark of the hon member (Mr Peake), as that hon gentleman was on the Committee, the report of which he would now read [The hon member here read the report] He found the hon member was present at the meetings and had taken evidence, yet he had never entered his protest against the report, though there were two protests from Mr Whitehouse and Mr Reynolds respecting the Lattice Gully He thought the Government was open to the charge of neglect for not having completed the line either to Section 112 One argument in favor of the extension was, that there were a number of skilled labourers in the colony whom it was necessary to keep here, yet after the Bill was passed months were allowed to roll on before Government proceeded with the works He hoped if the present Bill was passed, the line, whether by the Gilbert or Kapunda, would be proceeded with at once The hon member for Victoria was surprised at his having been entrusted with all the petitions in favour of the Gilbert route, but he (Mr Townsend) thought the reason was that no other hon gentleman would venture to make the statement that we should not take a railway where it was wanted, but where it would be wanted in 10 or 20 years, and that whilst we were making the lines with borrowed money He hoped the champion of the squatters would make a wiser statement on the next occasion that he addressed the House The Attorney-General had stated that if a well-digested scheme for railways to the south were brought forward he would support it, but whose duty was it to get the information? Were hon gentlemen to sit on the Government benches and merely follow the decisions of the House? This Government, by proxy, would be a very easy thing indeed He would vote for going into Committee, but with the understanding that it was to give information to hon members who were not in the House last session and not from any desire to shelve the Bill He hoped that it would be a positive instruction to the Committee that a number of days should be given them to report in, for as this was a short session, some hon members might make the enquiry a means of shelving the Bill With regard to the line going to Kapunda, he would only say that railways to be productive must go to the centres of population, where was not only a goods but likewise a passenger traffic, and a likelihood of bonds being repaid He would vote for the Committee, not that he wanted information, for he had read every scrap of information which he could procure on the subject He hoped the Government would turn their attention to the south as well as to the north, for, as the hon member (Mr Barrow) had said, "We must have railways, and we must take them to the north, so he would say we must have railways and we must have them to the south

Mr BAGOT did not think he should incur the charge of presumption if he opposed the hon gentlemen who asked for a committee, for though these hon members had jumped in one after another, they need not conclude that therefore they had all the strength on their side, and there might still be as many in favor of the second reading To him it seemed extraordinary that there should be a desire on the part of any hon members to resuscitate the immense amount of information and discussion elicited by the committees last session He sat there to do business, and he was persuaded they could not throw time away more than by having a select committee on this subject Some hon gentlemen had told the House that day that they knew the country east, west, north and south, and the position of the proposed lines, and he thought those who, like himself, did not possess that knowledge, having the testimony of the other hon gentleman, ought to be abundantly satisfied Allusion had been made to the immense supplies of agricultural produce, wool, and minerals, but the produce of the two staples of the country—ore and grain—was largely produced on the Kapunda line, and it was their duty to construct lines of railways in the directions in which most of these staples were raised, He thought it most extraordinary that any gentleman should think of legislating for ten or twenty years hence The least that could be said against going into committee was, that it would entail delay, and delay would entail hurry but this would be very satisfactory to those who opposed going on with the Bill now The Government seemed to have a peculiar facility for giving way, but he would much rather they would take their stand somewhere and then he should know how to act

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the only argument against the Committee was that the Bill would not bear the light The Bill was passed last session, and yet there were no working plans or estimates prepared, nor had anything been done for months, although the Government had said that unless something were done, the skilled labor would leave the colony They allowed it to do so, and he supposed would allow it to do so again He viewed the question, not as one between the Valley of the Gilbert and Kapunda, but as to what should be the grand trunk line of railway Mines, mills, and everything else should be provided for by branch lines It was from overlooking this fact in England that the immense expenditure in railways had been incurred The hon member proceeded to advocate a system of tramways, which could be converted by a moderate outlay into locomotive railways

Mr YOUNG spoke in favor of the Select Committee He supported the Bill of last session, not as the best that could be made, but as the best they could get Since then fresh facts had been elicited, and he thought the Committee desirable. He did not want to prevent the extension of the railway or to retard the progress of the colony, but to prevent the undue expenditure of money in one part of the colony at the expense of another

Mr HAY also supported the amendment, believing that the requisitions of the address of the House had not been complied with and proper information furnished He objected to the report and the slight tracing which accompanied it, and observed that any person acquainted with the country must say that the Surveyor looked through glasses very different from what could have been anticipated, when he found that in a quarter of a mile the line crossed the River Light four times Although the line through the Valley of the Gilbert might be more expensive, he thought the advantage of going to the east rather than to the west of Gawler would compensate for the expense He believed if they proceeded from section 112, direct across the Light, although it should cost £5,000 a-mile more for two or three miles it would be better Mr Bagot had said that he would take the country which was more settled now, and that he would not look forward It was true that about Kapunda the most settled country was to the North But this was on account of the mines and the large amount of money laid out there, which caused people to settle on inferior land The speaker, in reply to an observation of Mr Bagot's, eulogised highly the country in the neighborhood of the Gilbert, where he stated all the Crown lands put up for sale had been sold, and that more would be purchased if it was put in the market

Mr DUFFIELD thought that the whole question was settled last session, but he now thought the committee had not gone as far into the matter as they ought He had voted for the former bill, which appeared much the same as the present one, but after what he had heard he would wish the matter referred to a committee He thought they should have a northern railway, and the only question was where it should join the Kapunda line, which must be now carried out

Mr HARVEY voted for the amendment, though he should be sorry that the important district of Kapunda should be without a railway He thought the petition of 600 inhabitants of the Valley of the Gilbert should be taken into consideration, as they were all persons holding land, and the petitions from Kapunda were not of the same character, as amongst the miners and general population such things could be easily got up

Dr WARK thought more information was requisite Had Mr Hargrave's plan been a working plan, they would not then be so much in the dark He hoped railways would be taken east as well as north

Mr COLE thought it well they had not proceeded with the line to Kapunda, as they would have found it a great mistake He cordially supported the amendment, but not to shelve the question

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS briefly replied The hon gentleman was not afraid of a Select Committee, if the subject were fully discussed He admitted that the demand, as coming from new members, was a reasonable one He concluded by eulogising the railway works of this colony, which were complimented by every visitor who travelled upon them

Mr GLYDE moved the insertion of the words "and that the Committee report to the House within 21 days"

Agreed to

The amendment was then put and carried, and the following hon members were appointed on the Committee —The Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs, Barrow, Bagot, Glyde, Milne, Peake, and the mover (Mr Hawker)

The other business was postponed to Thursday following, and the House rose

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1858

The SPEAKER took the chair at three minutes past 1 o'clock

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE

Mr TOWNSEND presented a petition from the Oakbank, Mechanics' Institute, expressing satisfaction at observing that the sum of £4,000, had been placed on the Estimates for the erection of a South Australian Institute in Adelaide, setting forth that the absence of a commodious reading-room was severely felt by parties from the country visiting the metropolis, and expressing a belief that if the objects contemplated by the proposed vote were carried out, a great number of the country institutes would seek to become incorporated with the town institution

Mr GLYDE presented similar petitions from the East Torrens Institute, the Munno Para West, the Glenelg, the Sturt, and the Hindmarsh, District Library Institutes

Mr PEAKE presented a similar petition from the members and friends of the Burra Institute praying that the sum of £4,000 might be expended as proposed This petition was signed by nearly 300 persons There were some additional paragraphs which, upon the motion of Mr Peake, were read They set forth the great importance of having a museum erected without delay, and expressed an opinion that if a suitable building were erected, most, if not all, the existing country institutes would seek to become incorporated with the parent society, and thus that they would be enabled to achieve more than they could possibly now in their isolated condition The petitioners stated that they observed £250 had been placed on the Estimates for the Burra Institute, and prayed that there might be a grant for a resident librarian It was stated, that in no part of the colony was the necessity for adult education so severely felt as at the Burra Two adult private schools were represented as being liberally supported,

GAWLER TOWN

Mr DUFFIELD presented a petition from the Mayor and Corporation of Gawler Town, signed by the Mayor on behalf of the civic body The prayer of the petition was that the House would recommend His Excellency to place a sum on the Estimates to assist the Corporation in making the main-road through Gawler Town When the Corporation was called into existence the Central Road Board gave up the charge of the main-road and the petition stated that the Corporation were not aware at the time that the charge of the road would devolve upon them Upwards of £1,000 were required for the formation and repair of the road, and the Corporation had no funds It was stated that this case formed an exceptional one, in consequence of the very large amount of traffic upon the road

RAILWAY TO KAPUNDA

Mr HAWKER presented a petition (which he stated was very similar to the one which he had previously presented) from the inhabitants of Glenlaro and neighborhood in favor of the fullest examination in reference to the line of railway to Kapunda The petition was referred to the Select Committee appointed in reference to this question

GAWLER TOWN RAILWAY

Mr PEAKE presented a petition from 300 of the most respectable and influential settlers on the main line of road by the Valley of the Gilbert in reference to the line of railway affecting that locality It was referred to the Select Committee upon the Gawler Town Railway

MR BABBAGE

Mr BURFORD wished to ask the Commissioner of Public Works a question which that hon gentleman would probably have no objection to answer without notice He had been informed that the hon gentleman had been honored by a personal visit from Mr Babbage, and he wished to know if such were the case

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that he had been sitting all the morning in that House upon a Select Committee, and that he had not received a visit from Mr Babbage.

Mr PEAKE begged to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands if he had been honored with a visit from the Northern Exploration party?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had not had that pleasure

THE IMPOUNDING BILL.

Mr MILNE wished to put a question without notice to the Commissioner of Public Works He wished to know whether copies of the Impounding Act had been furnished to the Chairmen of the various District Councils, as he had received a letter from one of the Chairmen, dated the 11th inst., in which he stated that he had not received a copy of the Bill

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the hon member would perhaps allow him to answer the question, as it was connected with his department Since the Impounding Act had been laid upon the table of the House, he had received a great many suggestions for its improvement, and in consequence a considerable number of alterations in the original Bill had had been determined upon The Bill was being reprinted, and a copy of the new Bill would be sent to the Chairman of every District Council

HARBOR TRUSTEES

Mr PEAKE, in accordance with notice of motion, asked the hon the Commissioner of Public Works why there had not been furnished a report from the Harbor Trustees, to June 23, 1858 similar to that sent in by other public Boards He was induced to ask the question because it appeared to him something exceptional that all other public bodies should be requested to report to the Commissioner of Public Works, and that exception should be made, or rather a liberty taken by the Harbor Trustees in not sending in a similar report

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought the hon member had put this notice on the paper by mistake, as although there was no report from the Harbor-Trustees to June 23, there was one to June 30, which was embodied in a report which had been presented to the House, that being the date fixed by the department over which he presided to which reports should be rendered

Mr PEAKE—I had not received it at the time

The SPEAKER—Order

Mr PEAKE—May I explain?

The SPEAKER—The hon member has already explained

THE GLENELG JETTY

Mr PEAKE asked the Commissioner of Public Works who was responsible for the imperfect state of the structure and bad quality of the material used in the construction of the Glenelg Jetty (see report laid on the table of the House), and whether action had been taken to bring such responsibility to bear on the parties liable? He asked the question because he thought the time had come when the House should set its face against the acceptance of a report such as that which had been laid upon the table of the House The House would not be doing its duty, were it to allow it to pass without comment It was impossible that they could be silent when such a monstrous act of public injury had been committed, such as was detailed in that report He would ask the Commissioner of Public Works to relieve him from any intention of casting an imputation upon himself, or upon his department, he had no such motive, but it did appear monstrous that a public work involving an expenditure of 20,000*l*, 30,000*l*, or 40,000*l*, upon approaching completion should be found by the officer who had inspected it, in such a state as had been described in the report which had been presented to that House On referring to that report it would be seen that there had been greatly increased expenditure in connection with the Glenelg Jetty, in consequence of the bad quality of the materials used in its construction If the public were to be defrauded in so monstrous a way, and the House were not to adopt energetic measures to put a stop to and punish such frauds when attempted, the public would lose all confidence in that House as a guardian of the public interests He hoped that the Commissioner of Public Works, in addition to affording the required information, would be enabled to state that some plan would be adopted for the purpose of preventing similar frauds for the future He should like to ask distinctly whether any action had been taken in that direction?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that the full particulars in connection with the Glenelg Jetty and breakwater had not yet been developed, but steps were being taken to examine those portions of the breakwater which had not yet been looked at, in order that they might get at the whole truth, and when this had been done, he would give the case his most careful consideration, and ascertain who was responsible, and whether it would be advisable to take any proceedings in the matter

DISTRICT COUNCILS

Mr PEAKE moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, a great saving in the collection and expenditure of District Council rates could be effected if the rates were collected by, and works executed under, the supervision of officers retained in the service of several adjoining districts, and who should be required to devote the whole of their time to the service"

He had been induced to table this motion from reading the official report, which stated the receipts and expenditure of Corporations and District Councils, which had been laid upon the table by the Commissioner of Public Works He begged to disclaim at once any wish whatever to interfere with the rights, powers, or privileges of District Councils He did not wish to interfere with their right to deal with the money which they collected from their fellow-colonists, and to expend it as they thought best, but it should be remembered that that House gave them the powers by which they expended that money, and the Executive called them into existence It was the duty of the House to see that the system which had been established was suited to the public interest, and was acting in a manner best calculated to promote it His opinion was that the present constitution of District Councils did not tend to promote to the greatest possible degree the interest of those for whose benefit those Councils were called into existence He found by the return which had been laid upon the table of the House that 43 District Councils had expended a sum of £26,335, and that the sum expended in salaries to officers had been £4,631 In some cases nearly all that had been collected from the ratepayers had gone to pay the officers of the Council This certainly appeared anything but an economical arrangement, and he would put it to the House whether it was not time for them to take action in the matter, when they found that the Corporation had expended £28,851 with salaries for officers, &c. only £2,816, or only about half the amount which had been expended by the District Councils He could not see the necessity for District Councils saddling themselves and the ratepayers with such an enormous expenditure as £4,631 It was a wild lavish, and thoughtless expenditure of the funds of the ratepayers, and it was such wild and thoughtless expenditure that he was desirous of checking That House was called upon to vote sums in aid of District Councils, and were bound to see that those bodies were so organised that the votes would not be wasted It was their duty to check such altogether out-of-the way establishments and expenditure to carry out such small ends He found by the return to which he had alluded that there were 10 District Councils within a very small area—Aldinga, Clarendon, Echunga, Macclesfield, and six others They abutted upon each other The 10 Councils expended £916 upon salaries, and expended only £7,500 upon works Any hon member upon looking at these figures must see that there was great want of economy and proper management in the District Councils He did not find fault with the District Councils, but he did with the District Councils Act There was a different plan altogether in the home country At home they would never dream of appointing in ten districts such as he had named ten collectors or ten inspectors, but one man would do the business of the whole ten more effectually, and at less than half the cost He thought the Executive should take action, and endeavour to improve the organisation of the District Councils That House was asked to vote money in aid of these Councils, and it was perfectly legitimate that they should require those bodies to be economically managed, and that their funds should be skilfully applied What was required was, a different system of organisation amongst District Councils, and a more skilful application of the money which was entrusted to them to expend In travelling through the country no one could fail to observe the absurd waste of which the District Councils were guilty, merely because they did not know how most judiciously to apply the money It was not their fault but their misfortune (Laughter) They did not know how to expend the money, and the consequence was, they wasted it (Hear, hear) Seeing things in this state, he hoped there would be such an expression of opinion on the part of the House as would induce the Executive to take action in the matter, so that when the House voted money in aid of the District Councils, they might have some guarantee that it would be judiciously applied and not frittered away in idle and useless expenditure

Mr SCAMMELL regretted that he could not go with the hon member of this resolution on the present occasion, however, much pleasure it might give to him at any time to be able to support any proposition emanating from so fertile a brain (Hear, hear) On a former occasion the hon mover had suggested that the District Councils should be made accountable to a public officer—he believed the Commissioner of Public Works, who, having a seat in that House, would be accountable to that House At that time he (Mr Scammell) reminded the hon mover that the District Councils Act had passed, and that the Councils were directly responsible to the ratepayers, and to them only The members of the District Council only took office for a short time, and the abuses to which the hon member had alluded could not be carried to any great extent The hon member's motion after all was merely a repetition of the idea which he had formerly brought forward, it was centralization on a smaller scale If the hon member had asked by his motion that no district containing less than a certain number of inhabitants should have a District Council, he should have been inclined to go with him, but when the hon member came to that House with recommendations based purely upon theory, for the hon member had not had an opportunity of observing the working of District Councils —it would do him good to become chairman of a District Council, as he would then know some of the difficulties which District Councils had to encounter—he felt bound to oppose the motion, as he did not think it would in any way act as a remedy for those evils which had been alluded to With reference for instance to the ten District Councils which had been alluded to by the hon member, in which 15 per cent. of the amount contributed by the ratepayers had been expended upon salaries, the hon. member recommended those Councils to club together and to have but one set of officers between them. Why, those ten District Councils embraced the area of at least 600 square miles, and what unfortunate clerk would undertake to superintend the number of petty works which daily required to be undertaken, extending over an area of not less than 600 square miles. The hon. member having displayed a disposition for theory, he would put this case:—Suppose the hon. member were jointly with his neighbour Smith to employ a man-servant. The first time the hon. member rang for his boots, they would, in all probability, not be forthcoming, John being engaged in cleaning Mr. Smith's horse, and when the little Peakes required a drive out, he would, in all probability, have no servant to drive them, John having gone to drive Mr. Smith's car home. (Laughter.) That was precisely the position in which the District Councils would be placed if only one set of officers were employed for several, and no chairman could ever hold office if he were compelled to employ servants with the surrounding districts. The effect of such a system would be that the interests of smaller districts would be rendered subservient to the larger; they would never know where their servants were employed, or where the work was done. The ultimate effect would be that the servants would be the masters. The question was beset with these difficulties and many others which had not occurred to him, but which would probably present themselves to others. But he would ask what weight would a resolution of this kind have if carried. He and the hon. member for Noarlunga, and the hon. Commissioner of Public Works, would not be disinclined to receive lessons in this way upon this or any other subject which the hon. mover knew nothing practically about, but what would be the feelings of each District Council throughout the province? Many of the members of such Councils might not participate in the willingness to learn which he and other hon. members possessed. The statement made by the hon. mover in reference to the receipts and expenditure might be correct, but it should be remembered that the District Council year did not commence at one uniform period, and it might so happen that all the payment might be in one half-year and the expenditure in another. This and many other circumstances, should induce them to pause before relying on the statement in reference to the application of funds which had been made. If there had been any real extravagance on the part of the District Councils, he deplored it as much as the hon. mover could, but that House having deputed the power of self-government to the District Councils, had no right inconsiderately to step in, and by this resolution take from them the pledges which they had previously conferred. If he thought the resolution would be carried, he should certainly move the previous question; in fact, under the circumstances, he begged to move the former question.

Mr. DUFFIELD was happy to second the proposition of the hon. member for West Torrens, because it appeared to him that the proposition of the hon. member for the Burra was so perfectly ridiculous that he was quite surprised to find the hon. member had thought it necessary to bring it forward. If the hon. member had added two or three words to the motion, he would have made it complete—that is, if he had added that the officers should devote the whole of their time to each of the District Councils. (Laughter.) He really felt that there was no necessity to enter at any length upon the question the last speaker having so fully shown the absurdity of the motion. A few days ago he had asked a question in reference to the amount of rates collected by a District Council and the grant in aid, and he then found, that the District Councils did not send in their returns at the same period, there was no regularity, and under these circumstances the returns were of very little use. He hoped the members of the Administration would take steps to compel the District Council to send in their returns at some given time, so that the House and the country might know what the District Councils were really doing. The returns before the House gave a very indefinite clue, and until the returns were sent in as he had suggested, they would not be able to arrive at a correct conclusion upon the point. He found that three District Councils had not made any rate at all, and what object there could be in calling these into existence, he was at a loss to conceive. The District Council of Clare had collected £241 4s. 6d., and had expended £224 14s. 3d. in expenses and salaries. Of what service that District Council had been to the district, he was at a loss to conceive, but if the £241 4s. 6d. which had been collected had gone into the Treasury, some good might have resulted. As it was the whole amount had been pocketed for salaries and expenses. By a late decision in the Supreme Court it appeared that the non-making of a rate invalidated a District Council. Such was the case in reference to Talunga and another. It was the duty of Government to inquire, and if it were found that any had become extinct, they should take steps to resuscitate them, so that the residents might know in what position they were placed. It was very necessary that returns should be forwarded regularly to enable them to ascertain what was done by the District Councils. The Government should not advance any more money to District Councils till they gave full information.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in common with previous speakers, felt that he could not vote with the hon. member for the Burra, but he thought he could have supported the hon. member if his motion had read —"In the opinion of this House it is undesirable to multiply small District Councils." (Hear, hear.) It appeared to him that was the only way to meet the evil. He regretted that the table which had been laid before the House was not more comprehensive, but hon. members could not imagine the trouble which was imposed upon the office over which he presided in order to obtain it. A new District Council Act would, however, be laid before the House before the adjournment. It was in a forward state, and he hoped on an early day to give notice of his intention to introduce it. He hoped that the House would then be enabled to decide some means to remedy the evil which had been complained of by the hon. member for the Burra. He was a friend to District Councils; he had worked with them, and to some extent for them, and was willing to do so for the future. One evil of the District Councils appeared to him to be their fondness for law, but for this there was a very summary remedy. The great good that the District Councils had done, that they designed to do, and that they were willing to do, must, he thought, be apparent to every one who travelled through the length and breadth of South Australia. He hoped there would be an amendment upon the motion of the hon. member for Clare, to the effect that it was not desirable to perpetuate small District Councils.

Mr. WARK thought the question was assuming a magnitude which it was not entitled to. Previous speakers had wandered from the point, which had been put clearly and specifically in the first instance, but subsequent speakers had ripped up and talked about everything connected with District Councils. They had heard from a member of the Government that it was intended to introduce a Bill to amend the present District Councils Act, and he therefore hoped that hon. members would leave the discussion of the whole question till that time came. He was sorry that the hon. member for the Burra had brought forward so ill-advised, ill-considered a motion, which he considered the House should at once negative. He should go with the hon. member, Mr. Scammell, and vote for the previous question. If this motion were carried into effect, it would have a most debasing, repressing effect upon the District Councils; it would render them a nullity, and they were little enough already. (Laughter.) Every one appeared to feel at liberty to come forward and bully them. (Renewed laughter.) He had borne the brunt of the battle and could assure the House that people were prepared to come forward and give the District Councils quite trouble enough without this motion. He believed that a late vote of the Assembly, limiting the expenditure of funds to the work actually done, would have the effect in many instances of inducing the Councils to superintend their own works, which were generally of such a character that they could be so superintended.

Mr. MILDRED should vote for the previous question. The more opposition which was manifested to the management of the local affairs of a district being entrusted to the residents of that district or their representatives, the more offensive it would be. There was a great deal of trouble connected with District Councils, and he wished those who complained of the manner in which those bodies had managed their affairs had, like him, had experience of their management, when they would be enabled to speak of their practical working. There could be no doubt that District Councils in South Australia had done a great deal of good; it was evident that they had, and he believed they would continue to do good, and ultimately, perhaps, they would supersede Boards which were under no control, and whose expenditure was lavish. He believed that the items which had been alluded to were exceptions to the general rule. The only objection which he had was, that in some instances there had been an expenditure of money for a particular purpose instead of the improvement of the district. The remedy after all was in the hands of the ratepayers, as the Council might be removed from office if they did not apply the money which came into their hands to the best purpose. In some instances large districts had been found unmanageable, and applications had been made to the Government to divide them into smaller, and these smaller ones had been worked more advantageously and cheaply. The district in which he resided was formerly one, but was now subdivided into three or four and it had been found that the cost of management had gradually decreased.

Mr. PEAKE said it was his intention to withdraw the motion, but he wished to explain in few words a misapprehension which appeared to exist in reference to the course which he had taken. He could not have imagined that the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Scammell) would have proved so sensitive upon the point. It appeared that the hon. member thought that instead of assisting him in his deliberations, he (Mr. Peake) had contemplated an attack upon him. If the hon. member were Chairman of a District Council, he could assure him that so far from wishing to embarrass him in connection with the body over which he presided, his only object was to assist him. He thought it would be seen that he had not been so unreasonable after all in bringing forward this motion, for admitting, as had been stated that the ten districts to which he had alluded as each having a District Council, did contain 600 square miles, he had seen as large a district at home, with excellent roads and bridges, which was looked after by one officer, at a salary of £300 or £400 a year, but here, to expend £7,000, it appeared it was necessary to incur officers' salaries to the extent of £900. Under these circumstances, his proposition was not so unreasonable, and he begged to assure the sensitive gentleman from Hindmarsh, that he perfectly misunderstood him, and he trusted that the hon gentleman at the next meeting at Hindmarsh would not convey the impression which he had taken up so suddenly. He was glad to find that an amended District Council Act was to be introduced, as he apprehended it would be admitted it was undesirable to perpetuate the present system. The Commissioner of Public Works had alluded to the amount of money expended in law, and in some cases this amounted to one-third, and in others to the whole of the rate collected. It was not merely the money obtained from the ratepayers, which was injudiciously expended, but the Councils came to that House for grants in aid. He had, however, attained the object which he had in view by calling attention to the subject, and was glad to find they were to have an amended District Councils Act.

The previous question was carried.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR RIDLEY

Mr HAY moved that the Speaker leave the Chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole to consider the motion of which he had given notice.

Seconded by Mr HART, and agreed to.

In Committee.

Mr HAY submitted the following motion:—

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that the sum of £500 may be placed on the Supplementary Estimates of 1858, to provide a suitable testimonial to be presented to Mr John Ridley, as a recognition of the great benefit this colony has derived from the use of the reaping and thrashing machine invented by him, and which is now so generally in use here."

He (Mr Hay) scarcely thought it necessary to state the benefits this colony had derived from the use of that invention. Any colonist of half a dozen years' standing would acknowledge that to the agriculturists and consumers of agricultural produce, the machine had been of such use that farming operations could not have been carried on without it. As far as he recollected, when the idea first struck Mr Ridley it was in the year 1841, when, as compared with the population, the extent of ground under cultivation was so large that there were not reapers sufficient to take down the crops, and as a last resource the Colonial Chaplain and a large number of gentlemen volunteered to go out harvesting. That arrangement was looked upon by the farmer as utterly worthless. Mr Ridley and some gentlemen, of whom some were then present in the House, met, and having consulted together, offered a premium for the invention of such a machine as would enable the colonists at less cost to secure their crops. They met many times, but Mr Ridley had got an idea somewhere respecting his present invention. He employed a number of workmen—machinists, blacksmiths, and carpenters, at his own expense found both labour and materials, and after repeated trials, repeated alterations, and great expense, produced a machine which was found to serve the purpose. Mr Ridley had stated to him when he (Mr Hay) asked him why he had not tried to reap some benefit from his invention, that his great object was to benefit the colony, and therefore he would present the colonists with his invention, and he did so. When the machine first came into operation a few farmers appreciated it, but on the part of many there was a great prejudice against it, but those who appreciated its worth thought that some testimonial should be if possible given to him. He (Mr Hay) believed that between sixty and seventy pounds were collected for that purpose, but Mr Ridley stated that whatever sum was received by him on those grounds he would present to the Mechanics' Institute, and accordingly it was given by him to that institution either in money or books. In 1851, most persons would know that, notwithstanding the greater portion of the male population was withdrawn from the colony, very little land was thrown out of cultivation. In fact many farmers, in full confidence of getting in their crops, went, after seed time, to the goldfields for a few months, and came back, knowing that, although there were no laborers they could fall back on the machine, one workman by its aid being able to reap the produce of 50, 60, or 100 acres during the season. In the years 1852 and 1853, many persons whose crops were early took them off by the aid of the machines, and then sold them to those whose crops were late. As a proof of the way in which the machines were now appreciated, the number made during the last three years was from three to four hundred, and he (Mr Hay) believed that it was owing to its introduction that the great extent of country was purchased north of Adelaide. By the use of that invention the colonists of South Australia could compete in any market in the world. We had in the colony two acres under crop for every inhabitant in the colony, and it was utterly impossible that that crop could have been reaped by human toil. In the year 1857, by a return of Council, Paper No 16, it appeared that £800,000 value of agricultural produce was exported, which facts proved the large amount of saving to colonists effected by that machine, and considering the great advantage the colony had derived from the invention, it was only due that some mark of respect should be given to the inventor. He (Mr Hay) would not press that the sum voted should be £500. In fact he did not wish that it should be presented in money at all. Perhaps a smaller sum would do to obtain something to signify the respect in which Mr Ridley was held in the colony. Let it be a present such as would be grateful to his feelings and to those of his family. It might be objected to as a precedent, but there was one instance already on record in the testimonial voted to Captain Cradell, and he wished there were many such precedents with as good cause as there was for presenting a testimonial to Mr Ridley. Premiums were offered for the discovery of gold and coal. Mr Ridley's invention had been of as great benefit to the colony as the discovery of either one or the other, because it enabled them to export produce. He hoped the House would look upon the matter favorably, and allow the sum of £500 to be passed. He did not know that it would be necessary to spend it all if a suitable article could be had at a less cost, but he trusted that the motion would be agreed to.

Mr MILDRED bore testimony to all that had been said by the hon member who had just spoken. He had been mixed up with Mr Ridley in attempting to obtain drawings and models of machines, and it was thought fair and just that all such meetings as were then held should contribute to the first introduction of machinery to agricultural purposes. For that end a small subscription was entered into at one of the meetings convened, and it was at one of them that Mr Ridley conceived the idea of adapting a machine which had been used in the time of Julius Cæsar, and a drawing of which could be seen in "Loudon's Encyclopædia of Agriculture," to reaping purposes. He should be glad if a testimonial were presented showing the estimation in which Mr Ridley was held but he (Mr Mildred) doubted if it were right to notice a thing that had taken place so long ago as 14 or 15 years. He was willing to subscribe to such testimonial, and thought that plan preferable to a vote of the House. He should be pleased to acknowledge the gratitude of the colonists to Mr Ridley, yet he could not conscientiously support £500 being expended in that way.

Mr DUNN wished Mr Ridley well, but hoped that the hon member for Gumeracha (Mr Hay) would not succeed in his motion. He believed that in 1843, Dr Browne first suggested taking the crop by machinery, with some little modification of the model lying on the table. He (Mr Ridley) and others laid their heads together to devise such a plan, but while that was going forward the harvest came on, and the invention was not carried out. In 1844, the idea struck Mr Ridley, and that machine, invented by him, was the first one made, and all praise was due to him for his untiring efforts to carry out the invention. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that the invention was the foundation of his fortune, for he made his own, and bought fields of corn, and he reaped great benefit from it. He (Mr Dunn) had always thought that Mr Ridley would have reaped great advantage from taking out a patent, and if a small model were made, and presented to him, he would be glad to subscribe, but he thought for a gentleman deriving such advantages as he had from the invention, 500*l* was too much.

Mr HART was rather astonished at what had fallen from the last speaker. He (Mr Hart) had believed that no part of Mr Ridley's fortune was gained by the use of that machine. Had he desired to make a fortune by it, he would have taken out a patent. He did not do it, but threw it open to the colony, and even supposing he had made a large fortune, the benefit to the colony was not lessened. It would be as just to say that no credit was due to Dr Jenner for the discovery of the advantages of vaccination because during the time he was carrying out the discovery he was reaping benefit from his practice. No question the agricultural pre-eminence of South Australia was almost entirely owing to Mr Ridley's invention. It was one that suited the wants of the colony, and had enabled it to produce corn cheaper than any of the neighboring colonies. He was astonished at the member for Mount Barker, and the only excuse he could find for his observations was that he was living in a district where the machine was not used, and thus did not know how it had benefited the colony. (Oh, oh.) However, he thought £200 or £250 would attain the object, for Mr Ridley did not require money from that House at all. (Hear, hear.) He thought, however, that gentleman would like to possess something that he might hand to his children—showing the benefit he had conferred on the colony. It had been said that Mr Ridley, not being known in England, was not considered eligible as a member of Agricultural Societies, and a vote of that House would evince the estimation in which he was held by his fellow-colonists. He with others turned out to harvest with Mr Giles, and he (Mr Hart) thought that had it not been for the invention by Mr Ridley, agriculture could not have been pursued in the colony. It was all very well for the hon member to say Mr Brown first conceived the notion, but did he bring it into practice? No, he felt there was something wanting. He found agriculture a loss and gave it up and took to pasturing. The fair conclusion was that Dr Brown did not bring his views to a practical result. It was suggested that it should be a smaller sum than £500. He (Mr Hart) thought £500 too much, and hoped the hon member for Gumeracha would reduce it, and that the House would then vote for it.

Mr BURFORD hoped for a different result. He looked upon it as another attempt to foist upon the country a system of pensions £500 in the colonial value of money was £50 per annum That was the shape in which to look at it He gave hon members great credit for being under the influence of benevolent feelings He admired, but thought that to indulge them in that way would be an injury to themselves and the public out of doors From what he knew of Mr Ridley he believed his feelings would be totally against such a step He was too sensitive and would shrink from that sort of thing He (Mr Burford) thought it was not a legitimate question for that Assembly to entertain If reward was needed it should come from those who were benefitted by the invention, and those were the farmers and millers Let them club together and show their esteem for the man He had no doubt Mr Ridley did well by the invention He had a large workshop and men were employed, and full prices for his work, and if he did not do well by it, it was strange, He had had his reward times without number in the expression of grateful feeling at public dinners and other colonial meetings, and he thought there was no need to add to expresssions of that kind any material guarantee Since the introduction of responsible government, they had invariably lifted up their voices against anything of the kind Only that day he had heard another very similar proposal If these things were submitted to, there was no knowing how far they would go As to the suggestion that Mr Ridley might be above taking money, and might like a testimonial in another form, that House could only vote money, and could not decree a candelabra to be made, or anything of the kind He considered the reward was in the act, and the good man had his reward in his own conscience He should oppose the motion

Mr SHANNON rose amidst loud cries of "divide" He cordially supported the motion, because he believed that Mr Ridley had never received sufficient acknowledgment for his services to the colony. In his (Mr Shannon's) opinion had it not been for that invention, this colony could never have occupied its present position in reference to agriculture He could state that now, without other assistance than that machine, one man could reap 200 or 250 acres per annum Two men were not required. (Divide.) He thought Mr Ridley had been one of the greatest benefactors the colony had had Had it not been for his invention the exports of agricultural produce would not have reached £100,000 annually Objections had been raised to granting that testimonial at the expense of the country, but farmers alone had not been benefitted All the community had shared in the blessing either directly or indirectly For these reasons he should support the motion

The House divided, when there appeared for the motion—

AYES, 8—The Commissioner of Public Works Messrs Hart, Hawker, Hughes, Lindsay, Milne, Shannon, Hay (Teller)

NOES, 19—The Treasurer, The Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Barrow, Burford, Cole, Duffield, Dunn, Glyde, Harvey, Lindsay, MacDermott, McEllister, Neales, Peake, Scammell, Strangways, Townsend, Wark, Mildred (Teller)

The motion was accordingly lost.

The House resumed

The SPEAKER reported progress

Mr Reynolds was called but did not appear

SUPERANNUATION

Mr HUGHES moved that there be laid on the table of this House a return showing the names of those officers who have, and those who have not taken advantage of a resolution of this House passed during the last session, authorizing the Government to repay to subscribers to the Superannuation Fund the amount of their subscriptions with 10 per cent interest added In moving for that return he might say his reason was that hon members were aware that an alteration was made in the Superannuation Fund, and the Government had given notice of their intentions to bring in a Bill to establish retiring allowances It was, therefore, a point of great importance

Mr REYNOLDS (who came in while Mr Hughes was speaking) seconded the motion He wished to state that the reason why he had not answered the call of the House was, that he had been locked out

The SPEAKER said under those circumstances he did not doubt that the House would allow him to proceed with his motion

Agreed to

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr REYNOLDS asked permission to amend the motion of which he had given notice, by inserting the words "commencement of" after the words "from the," in the latter clause of it It would then read, "from the commencement of the year 1856"

Leave given

Mr REYNOLDS then moved the consideration of paper No 20, with a view of a Select Committee of the House being appointed to enquire into the entire management of the South Australian Railways, from the commencement of the year 1856 to the present date His object was that the House should express an opinion on the matters referred to He wished at an earlier part of the session to have taken in some action the matter, and had not the Government presented the House with the correspondence now referred to, he should have moved for the production of that correspondence The Government had saved him the trouble In bringing forward the motion, notice of which he had given some time since, about the anomaly of a Commissioner of Railways being also the Engineer, he could have wished to have given some information respecting the matters between his late colleagues and himself, but, as he had been anticipated, he was saved the trouble of addressing the House on that point Again he had endeavoured to introduce a responsible Board in connection with a responsible Ministry, and next morning the Government introduced a Bill, which he had the honor to submit to them in December last, and as they were so ready to adopt his policy, there was very little for him to do He did not blame the Government for anticipating him —far otherwise—they had paid a great compliment to him There was no intention on his part to act discourteously towards the House He was sure that the House excused him for being on that side instead of the other, and he was quite sure the House would as readily excuse the Government as himself The Government by laying the correspondence that had taken place between them before the House had shown that the Ministerial explanation was his own explanation In making use of that correspondence, he would not take a vote of want of confidence in the present Ministry far otherwise, and he did not intend to ask the House for a vote of censure on the Government No, he wished to give the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the transactions between his late colleagues and himself From what he knew the House might be satisfied with the proceedings of the present Government He knew nothing to the contrary, excepting what had been said in that House The question amounted to this—Are we living under responsible Government or are we not? They might shirk it if they pleased, but it came to this Was the Commissioner of Public Works responsible to that House for the action of the Railway Boards, or was he not? He forgot himself Under responsible Government He understood, in joining his late colleagues, he was joining them under a system of responsible Government, and considered himself to be held responsible to the House for the duties that devolved upon him, and for the action of those Boards, said to be under his control and management And in taking office under a responsible Government, he supposed he might have been seriously mistaken However, he determined as far as he could to make those Boards placed under him, responsible He took office with that intention, and with the intention of overhauling those establishments as far as was in his power He believed he had at the time the sympathy of his colleagues, and of that House in that determination He believed that the House held him responsible for what was done by those Boards, and that being the case the House must deem his position a difficult one In the first place he had a Board to deal with that was elected He had another that the Attorney General said was as responsible to the Government as the Commissioner of Public Works was to that House He had to do with a Board called the Harbor Trust, that was not responsible to the Government They could not remove a member of it without reference to that House Then there were two other Boards appointed by, and said to be responsible to, the Government, but so constituted by Acts of Council, and become so irresponsible that unless the Commissioner of Public Works took a decided step, they would become irresponsible These were some of the difficulties attached to the office of Commissioner of Public Works, but he had wished to do his duty in working out responsible Government while he held office His predecessor had been but a short time in office He did not mean the gentleman who was only three days in office—he referred to Mr Davenport He failed to bring those Boards under responsible Government, but he (Mr Reynolds) did not hesitate to undertake the task, and his late colleagues if they did him justice, would have said he had not neglected his departments There was no want of vigour in him. If he had committed an error at all it was that having been so much accustomed to work, he had attended too much to details, and by that means got himself into a broil Had he been satisfied with taking things for granted, he might have gone on as smoothly and comfortably as any man, and might at that time he believed have been by the side of the Attorney-General. He would advert to the correspondence itself There were three matters to which he wished to draw the attention of the House, and to which he presumed there would be some reference made by those who thought differently from him There was the question of his not having consulted with his colleagues That was in the correspondence, and he presumed some charges would be made against him for not consulting them before he took action in that matter As to that, his reply was on record He was anxious to consult his late colleagues whenever they gave him the opportunity. But there were no regulations binding him to consult them on matters of any kind connected with the department under his charge There was no understood obligation for him to consult them In the month of April, it appeared that the Government agreed to some regulations that should bind its members in case of dispute with heads of departments under them. These were to the effect that if a dispute arose between a responsible Minister and the head of a department under his control, the Minister should consult the Chief Secretary, and if they agreed in opinion the Minister should take action, but if not, it was for the Government to consider it He was glad that hon members remembered those words Suppose the Commissioner of Public Works had a dispute with the head of a department under his control, and he consulted the Chief Secretary Should there not be an arrangement to the effect that if the Chief Secretary had any dispute with a subordinate, he should consult the combined members of the Executive? Oh! there was no objection to that But when the document reached him (Mr Reynolds), he found that the Chief Secretary was not bound to consult any one Now, if those regulations were binding, they were only binding as a whole, and he was not bound by those regulations unless the whole of those conditions were inserted There was one other point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House, namely that up to the time when those regulations were adopted, the Chief Secretary was not the Premier—not the recognised Premier of the Government The Attorney-General had been considered the Premier up to that time, but from the very day that those regulations were agreed to, the Attorney-General ceased to be the leading minister, and became a mere tool to another man, whom he (Mr Reynolds) as he had said before, would never acknowledge as a leader When they agreed to certain regulations, it was understood clearly that if they were to consult the Chief Secretary, the Chief Secretary should be somewhere to be consulted, but if during one whole month, when he (Mr Reynolds) wished to see him, he was enjoying himself in the sea breezes at Goolwa, and if when he actually went a dozen times to consult the Commissioners of Crown Lands on questions that had arisen between the Railway Commissioners and himself, that gentleman was so busy in looking after emigration ships and land, that he could not find time, and the only member he could find was the Treasurer, with whom he consulted on all matters except the last what could he do? He was called upon to decide on matters requiring immediate action On the 5th May, he found Commissioner Colley waiting at the Public Works Office, to speak with him on matters of account The question of trucking then occurred to him He (Mr Reynolds) found the contract was up on the 1st of June He asked what they intended to do Oh, they were intending to renew the contract for 12 months He said he hoped they had not committed themselves to that and was told they were not committed That very day a Railway Commissioner told him the contract was not closed and that they could retrace their steps, they went and renewed the contract He must advert to one matter referring to the Attorney-General, for it might be said when he could not find the Chief Secretary he knew where the Attorney-General lived, but that gentleman must remember also that about that time he was also enjoying the sea breezes about Lake Goolwa, and very properly so too He himself would have gone, could he have spared time He would like to have enjoyed the hospitality of its excellent chief, but he did not No doubt he (Mr Reynolds) might have written to him, but he would tell the House why he did not He could not forget that the question between the Railway Commissioners and himself was a legal question, and that if the Commissioners acted legally, they would have consulted their legal adviser But who was he? The Attorney-General Was it fair to him that he should go and consult their adviser, who was advising against the Government? That was precisely the position in which he was placed Did any one dispute that the Attorney-General was the legal adviser of the Commissioners? He would refer to Council Paper 59, 18th December, 1857, in which the Secretary of the Board referred the Commissioner of Public Works "to our counsel's opinion as to the power of dismissing them," and that was signed "R D Hanson, Attorney-General" He did not consider it fair to consult him under those circumstances Besides, if the regulations had any force, although the letter in question did not reach him until after action had been taken, he was not bound to consult the Attorney-General, but only the Chief Secretary, and had he agreed with him, he (Mr Reynolds) could have taken action, and therefore there was no point in that remark It might be objected to the correspondence that the tone of the letters was not such as it ought to have been Now from the time of taking office to that of leaving it, he had great practical difficulties to deal with in the Railway Department The Attorney-General the other day spoke of there being no practical difficulties arising out of the fact of the Engineer being at the same time a Commissioner He (Mr Reynolds) was the best judge of that Who could state these difficulties so well as a man who had charge of those departments for eight months? But from the time of his taking office to that of his leaving it, it was one continued opposition to his opinions He had the Engineer, William Hanson, Commissioner William Hanson—William Hanson—everything, William Hanson while in office, William Hanson when out of office It was William Hanson from the beginning to the end of the chapter, and that involved very many practical difficulties He was one of the Board—he was consulted on the correspondence on the rolling stock, and if the Commissioner of Public Works found it necessary to remonstrate with the Commissioner, William Hanson, the Commissioner William Hanson referred that document to William Hanson, Engineer and William Hanson, Chief Commissioner, sent a reply to the Commissioner of Public Works William Hanson, Engineer, was not remonstrated with by William Hanson, Chief Commissioner, and told "you have not done your duty" He (William Hanson) would not lecture himself Some hon members might think that had he consulted the Chief Secretary, the tone of that correspondence would have been different, that it would have been more placid, more softened, more everything that was amiable, but he thought they made a great mistake For once in his life he had consulted with the Chief Secretary in regard to that correspondence, and he would state what that hon gentleman said in regard to the Waterworks He said it was such an impudent production from the Waterworks Commissioner, that "he would not stand it" He (Mr Reynolds) did not stand it He said "it will not do for you to argue with subordinates" He (Mr Reynolds) did not argue with subordinates He said "tell them so and so" He (Mr Reynolds) did tell them so and so, and merely acted according to the directions of the Chief Secretary But the Waterworks Commissioners did not behave like the Railway Commissioners They behaved like gentlemen. He hoped when the Attorney-General referred to his remarks again, as he had done in that letter, he would also lecture the Chief Secretary himself, because what was objectionable in one case was objectionable in the other Now he would ask, was it right of him to recommend the dismissal of the Railway Commissioners? He would beg attention to two points in relation to that In the first place there was gross neglect of duty, and he thought that sufficient ground for dismissal He trusted the House would refer to a few facts in matters that arose in the sitting of the Railway Committee in June and July last He wished them to refer to Mr Hanson's evidence. He said, in answer to a question, on 17th June, 1857, as to what rolling-stock was required, he wanted two more engines and eighty more trucks, which were required for 'present work,' and that they would require from £18,000 to £20,000 for the trucks, and £9,000 for the engines In answer to question 229, he said they were wanted for the Gawler Town Line, and in Mr Fuller's evidence (question 1,029), he stated that there were 300 tons of goods on the platform that could not be taken down for want of sufficient trucks In answer to 1,118 and 1,120, to the effect of how they would carry the traffic arising between the Port and the north, it was replied that new trucks would be provided if they got the money He would now refer to the Council Paper dated 18th July, 1857, where it was stated "a great increase of goods traffic on the Port Line, to the amount of £40,000 per annum more than was expected, rendered an increase of stock necessary to the extent of 80 waggons and two engines" That was signed "W Hanson" It was stated that they had already paid £400 or £500 for damage to wheat which would not have arisen had they had proper trucks Those facts were before them, and the House would see from the correspondence laid on the table that day that they, the Railway Commissioners, dallied to the last moment He had an immense deal of trouble with the Commissioners to get them to advertise for tenders for those waggon bodies They were anxious to construct them on their own establishment The correspondence showed they wanted eighty trucks He (Mr Reynolds) said "construct as many as you can in the Railway Sheds and advertise for bodies" So that they had instructions to begin at once. He need not dwell further on it, there had been miserable delay It was perfectly inexcusable If eighteen years' experience in the management of railways had not resulted better than that, save him (Mr Reynolds) from eighteen years' experience Then they were making models—why did they not make 40 models Models after eighteen years' experience, and two years' here! Then they found tarpaulins would not do and they must have covered waggons The model was made—why did they not make 40 models? He believed that ever since June, 1857, 50 trucks had not been finished That was the celebrated management of the Railway Department The Attorney-General said something was due to the excellent management of the Railway Department He gave honor to whom honor was due, but the management of that railway was a disgrace to those who pretended to know anything about the matter Was he justified then, when these gentlemen did nothing after getting the money in the month of November, when they did nothing beyond making two models up to the 12th of February, when they advertised for tenders Was he not justified, and would not the House consider him so in recommending that these gentlemen should be dismissed? (Hear, hear) The next point he would refer to was not merely the neglect of duty, though that one he considered sufficient ground for his resignation He meant an anomaly which had since been removed by the pressure from without, but which his late colleagues were not prepared to remove whilst he was acting with them He (Mr Reynolds) merely recommended that the Commissioners of Railways should be dismissed, and that the Engineer should confine himself to his proper duties, and be responsible to the Government as the members of the Ministry were responsible to that House, whereas under the present system he was neither responsible to the House nor to the Government He objected to having a servant of the Commissioners the master of the Commissioners For who was to exercise a control over the Engineer if he was wrong—not that he would say that that gentleman did wrong—there was no inuendo there, but if he did wrong, who would presume to make a complaint? To whom should he present it? Why, to the man against whom the complaint was laid Was not that an abuse? (Hear, hear) But he need not urge it further, it carried conviction with itself, and did it not show the disorder which existed? There might be many complaints against the Engineer, but people would be afraid to prefer them, for the reply would be, "Send him about his business" Another point was, who was to check the Engineer, since he was the Chief Commissioner? There was no check to control over the Engineer Thus there was anomaly, abuse, and neglect of duty, and likewise resistance to proper control Under such circumstances, he would ask was he not right in calling upon the Commissioners to make their business public by calling for tenders for their working models, and the carriage of goods (Hear, hear) And if so what right had the Commissioners to resist his requisition? They resisted the Commissioner of Public Works, though the contract they had taken was not binding and could therefore be recalled But they said "no one else can carry out the contract" Why, was not that the reason they should advertise, in order to show the public that they were prepared for competition? If they were tied up to Mr Fuller, the sooner the public knew that Mr Fuller was the governor of the line, and the only party who could carry out the contract the better The sooner they knew of the evil arising out of such a circumstance, the sooner would they have competition But so long as the public knew that the Commissioners gave Mr Fuller the contract, and that there was no disposition to give others a chance of asking "will you give me the opportunity of tendering?" so long there would be no competition There was another point—it related to a question of law Was it right to lease the tolls without the consent of the Government? Upon this point his (Mr Reynolds's) mind was made up His colleagues had enlightened him on the matter They affirmed that the Commissioners were in error, and, therefore, there had been, in point of law, a neglect of duty, which, in addition to the abuses and the anomalous position he held, justified him in asking his colleagues to dismiss these gentlemen He pictured himself coming into that House at the commencement of the session, after yielding to the hon gentlemen opposite, seeing that he could not help his position, and that it must be so under the Act, and then hearing an hon gentleman in the House asking from that (the Opposition) side, "Did Mr Fuller get the contract, and did the Commissioners neglect so and so?" "Yes" And what action do the Government mean to take?" "Nothing" Would not hon members say, if he made such replies, that he deserved the censure of the House (Yes, and hear, hear) Yes, he should, and if he (Mr Reynolds) were to hear such replies, he should say to the hon member making them, that he would do his best to oust him from office Hon members would say they could not help it, that the Board had rights and privileges, but who appointed them? The Government—and who were the Government, but the responsible Ministers? Yet these gentlemen refused to remove the Commissioners, and why? Because they did not like it What would the House say to him if he made such a reply? Would hon members say, because you did not like to remove them, therefore they have the confidence of the House He should not consider himself worthy the confidence of the House if he had not recommended the removal of these gentlemen Well the resistance of these gentlemen brought on a crisis Either the Commissioners must go to the wall, or he (Mr Reynolds) must There was no other alternative When he recommended action in the matter, and his colleagues would not endorse his recommendation, the only alternative left him was to resign his position His colleagues said they would not carry out his suggestion, but they concurred in the abuse of having the Engineer likewise holding the office of Chief Commissioner What more did they say? That they did not wish needlessly to lower the position of the Commissioner of Public Works They did not mind lowering him, but not needlessly But would it really lower him? Undoubtedly it would, and he (Mr Reynolds) would say it was unwise on the part of his colleagues to place him in such a position, and they could have no respect for him personally when they spoke in this manner It was what he might say to his servant But this reply had one use It caused him to make up his mind He could not act in such a way, having any regard for his office as Commissioner of Public Works, as to ask the Railway Commissioners to reconsider their determination He valued his position too much to do that and if he had acted otherwise he should have left his hon friend opposite (the Commissioner of Public Works) a dishonoured office as a legacy, so he resigned his position, and left his hon friend to pursue that course which he (Mr Reynolds) could not follow It was a matter of opinion whether he should have resigned, but in his own opinion he was not precipitate He had never performed any act in his life with more deliberation, and there was none to which he could now look back with greater satisfaction There was another point Ought he to have sent a copy of his letter to the Executive to the Railway Commissioners? Perhaps he was to blame there They might blame him for the act but not for the motive, for he thought he was bound to send a copy of the charges to the gentlemen against whom he made them (Hear, hear) And now having done with what was personal between his colleagues and himself, he would come to the matter before the House, and ask for a Committee to examine into the whole railway department from 1856 to the present time He would give a few of the reasons which induced him to ask the House to sanction this motion He believed that the acts of the Commissioners had shown either great neglect or incompetence, he did not care which, and so long as the correspondence now lying on the table was there, he thought the House would not be satisfied until an enquiry into the whole management of our railway was made It seemed the practice to do everything six months after date When he first came into office, he asked for the half-yearly return to the end of 1857, but up to the commencement of June it did not come, and there was very little in it after all Then three days after the passing of the Bill for the railway extension to the 112th section, he asked the Chief Commissioner to call on him, and he (Mr Reynolds) then asked that gentleman whether he could go on with the works, and he said "yes, immediately," and that the skilled laborers whom we had trained would be available, but in the middle of February his (Mr Reynolds's) attention was called to the fact that nothing had been done, and it was necessary to write to the Chief Commissioner to go on with the work The hon the Commissioner of Public Works said in reply to his (Mr Reynolds's) letter, that since he (Mr Reynolds) left the Ministry, reasons had been assigned by the Chief Commissioner for his conduct which were very satisfactory, but he did not think so, and he believed other hon members would not think so There was another important item, one of the most serious in a Government department, the accounts It was true that the questions he had asked referred to the accounts of 1856, but these were not satisfactory, and though the present Commissioner would not be answerable for them, they involved large amounts, and were admitted to be open to great risk and uncertainty, and this showed that they were not proper accounts It was true the Commissioner was not responsible for them, but the Engineer had something to do with them, and should have kept better accounts than those which were admitted to be subject to risk and great uncertainty When the amount involved was £30,000, he would on that ground alone, if there were no other, ask for an enquiry For a very considerable time after 1856 this system had remained in operation The report on the rolling stock did not make matters much better, for it showed that there was no management or enquiry into the state of things He wanted an enquiry into this, for he thought it might show much more than risk or uncertainty There were many rumours abroad of a damaging character, and to allay these a Committee was necessary As to persons having interests in contracts, or having contracts themselves these were points which required looking into It was only the other day a matter came before him as Commissioner of Public Works, which he had left as a legacy to his hon friend (the Commissioner of Public Works) to enquire into It was a statement that the Assistant Engineer had an interest in a contract He believed an inquiry had been made into this, the result of which would be laid on the table, but he thought they might have had some other parties than the Commissioners to inquire into it The rumours were common, and he thought the Commissioners themselves should, long before the Government called upon them to do so, have instituted an inquiry instead of waiting until they were forced into it Another case had also come under his notice There were now 100 or 150 bags of flour and bran unaccounted for belonging to a firm in Gawler Town, and the Commissioners had a claim against the owner, in reference to which they did not appear in a very honorable position, for having got the parties to pay over some money in order to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the Local Court, they then shirked the matter completely As there was a question of upwards of £100 between the Commissioners and the firm, this was a matter of some moment, and as the difference between the claim of the firm and that of the Government was some £30 or £40, he would ask, was that nothing? If this were the case of a man of business, would he not inquire into it? Let hon members look at the copy of the contract, lying on the table, and they could not understand it The hon the Treasurer himself had admitted that he could not, and that if he was called on to arbitrate between the parties, he could not do it He did not know whether the accounts were in the same state still Many things he supposed were understood, but it did not show great skill or management in drawing up a contract There was another matter in the correspondence which he thought showed that the Railway Commissioners were not very particular in selecting the men employed in the railway service Hon members would perceive a reference to a Superintendent of the carriage department, named Snell, who was dismissed without any reason being assigned The reason privately assigned to Snell himself, or the reason which Snell gave to him, was one which he would not like to repeat in the House, but he was sure of this, that the qualifications required in a servant of the railway were such that he (Mr Reynolds) would rather not have them Another person was taken on in Snell's place, who had been dismissed some time before for insolence and drunkenness, and this person had the control of money to pay the men This man, when he came back, it was found had committed bigamy, and then he bolted, though under what circumstances he (Mr Reynolds) did not know Snell had assured him that during the time he was superintendent in the carriage department he never on a Saturday could get correct accounts from the accountant, and that he had got from £1 to £6 over and above what he should receive, and that he had to walk after the clerk to return the money That would show that there was no proper management But when the Commissioners themselves were said to be dealing with matters of an improper kind what could be expected? He would not deal in innuendoes, but would come out with a plain statement, and challenge the hon the Attorney-General to deny it One tradesman in Adelaide had been told by one of the Commissioners in Adelaide after the tenders for tarpaulins were called for, to send in a tender, not in the Commissioner's name, but in his own, and the tradesman sent one in, and got his commission This would tell its own tale He should now ask in the terms of his motion, that a Select Committee be appointed The hon member concluded by reading the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion without remark

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL most cordially supported the motion He confessed he could wish that a great many matters in the speech of the hon member had not found a place there He confessed for himself he had been pained by what appeared to him an exhibition of feeling and a violation of confidence on the part of the hon gentleman It appeared to him almost a matter of impossibility that that hon gentleman could expect any person whatever to act with him in a public capacity and rely with confidence upon his discretion and secrecy (Oh, oh) He merely spoke of the impression made upon his mind when the hon member spoke of conversations between himself and members of the Government with whom he had conversations of moment on matters not before that House When the hon member repeated these conversations it was a violation of confidence, and he (the Attorney-General) thought it impossible that he could expect any person to act with him, relying upon his discretion or secrecy He only spoke of the impression made upon himself, but if hon members thought that conduct such as that was to be approved of, they might hold the hon member justified in all he had said on the matter He did not intend to refer further to that part of the subject and he should pass over very briefly the greater number of the topics touched upon by the hon member, because if that hon gentleman intended that the House should act in this matter, he did not bring it forward in a way in which it could be fairly tested The hon member had brought forward a motion which he must know well the Government would accede to (Laughter, and hear, hear) He said so because the Government never refused a Committee of enquiry in a matter of this sort—(hear, hear)—and ever since he had been connected with the Government, neither himself nor his colleagues had ever opposed a motion for the production of papers or for an enquiry into any matter of public interest (Hear, hear) The hon member had brought forward something which would give him the opportunity of making a speech, but leading to no result, but upon which he (the Attorney-General) would hold himself excused from touching at any length until there was some substantial motion before the House If the honorable member was desirous of having the conduct of the Government inquired into, or his own conduct as Commissioner of Public Works, and all he had done in that capacity, or anything in relation to the members of Government, they were quite prepared to meet him and fearless of the result He said this because he saw no advantage in referring to matters not affecting the question before the House The hon member asked in the early part of his speech if the Commissioner of Public Works was responsible for certain things, and he (the Attorney-General) answered emphatically—"No" No individual member of the Administration as such was responsible The Government, as a Government, was responsible, and as a Government it must act, but no individual member could act for himself, and if he acted without consulting his colleagues, they were not responsible for his acts The Government, as a whole, was responsible for what every member in his public character might do or sanction, but the individual member had no such responsibility for the acts of his colleagues It was in this respect that the idea of responsible Government was not like that of the system of chefs de bureau, each of whom were concerned with his own department, but a responsible Ministry was, or was supposed to be, connected and acting in concert and was not responsible individually, but collectively Finding that this was so, he was opposed to the opinion which the hon gentleman had expressed, and, therefore, he did not wonder that they had got into a position which made their acting together impracticable, and if the hon member thought himself individually responsible he did not wonder at his taking the course which he had followed The hon member had referred to his being unable to see the members of the Government As to the hon the Chief Secretary, he could not see that hon gentleman inasmuch as he was at the Goolwa He (the Attorney-General) believed that he was away on one occasion from Thursday to Thursday, but with that exception there was no week during which he was not three or four days at his office, and at his residence in town But as it happened the time during which he was away was not the time at which the hon gentleman wanted to see him The first letter was dated the 5th of May, and it was on the 15th or 16th April that he returned from the Goolwa There was another matter in the hon gentleman's speech at which he felt more regret than anger The hon member joined the Administration which he (the Attorney-General) helped to form, knowing that he (the Attorney-General) was the legal adviser of the Railway Board, and from the time the learned gentleman took office until he left the Ministry, or until the present moment, he (the Attorney-General) had never heard the hon member make any complaint or objection arising out of that circumstance Nothing was said or written, as far as he was aware of, which could lead to the idea that the hon member felt himself fettered in his communications with him (the Attorney-General) by the position which he held He thought he had a right to expect that if the hon member felt that he could not consult with him as Attorney-General, because he was consulting counsel to the Railway Board, that some reference would be made to the fact, so that he might have the opportunity of deciding whether it would be more convenient to him to remain the standing counsel of the Board or have the opportunity of communicating with the hon member He would go further and say that no person had a right to believe that his giving an opinion on a mere matter of law should prevent him from giving an opinion not as a matter of law but on a matter of policy He must express his surprise that if the hon gentleman held such an opinion of him (the Attorney-General) as was implied that he should act with, or under him, as a member of the Ministry, or under him as the head of the Cabinet He had asked the hon member to join the Administration, and he did so from October for eight or nine months, and all the while he appeared to have had such an opinion of him (the Attorney-General) that he could not consult with him on the most important matters affecting his department, because he (the Attorney-General) was counsel to the Railway Board He could only say that he did not feel himself incompetent as a member of the Government to decide on any question connected with that Board, and if the hon member thought there was anything incompatible in the double relation, he was not acting fairly to him (the Attorney-General) or the Government in not calling attention to the fact The hon gentleman had referred to a statement made to him by one of the Commissioners of the Railway, and with regard to that he could only say, it would be inquired into and he had no doubt the inquiry would be ample, but he (the Attorney-General) would hesitate to pronounce a condemnation on any person resting merely on the recollection of the hon gentleman as to conversations between himself and somebody else The Commissioners would be furnished with all requisite powers for such an investigation The hon member had also spoken of a Commissioner receiving commission on a contract If so that Commissioner should not retain his office He did not know whether the knowledge came to the hon member while he was in office He never communicated it to the Government, but if he had obtained the information since he could not be surprised that the Government did not act upon a matter which the hon member himself was not acquainted with It was the same with regard to the anomaly of the Engineer-in-Chief being the President of the Commission, for until recently there had never been any complaints on that subject, either from the hon member or anybody else The hon member was Commissioner of Public Works from October to June, and during all that time the Government had not heard a word either as to the great practical inconvenience, or the gross anomalies of which he now complained On the 21st May, the hon member called attention to this, but not as a recommendation which he called on Government to consider, but as the result of something else which he wanted to coerce the Government to do He did not bring it under the notice of the Government and say, "I find from experience the inconvenience of this," but as part of what they were to do after removing all the Commissioners Perhaps the Engineer should not be the Chief Commissioner but merely Engineer, but up to that period there had been no complaint It had already been stated that a letter had been laid on the table from the Chief Commissioner, in which he expressed what he (the Attorney-General) considered a very natural wish, that as the duties of the office were heavy, and there was no additional remuneration, he would be happy to resign If the hon member as a part of the Government responsible to that House for the conduct of his department had made a recommendation respecting anything in his department, there was nothing in the conduct of his colleagues which could lead him to think that it would not be discussed in a spirit of conciliation As to all the amusing pictures which the hon member had drawn of the Chief Commissioner engaged in superintending his own acts, except in the letter of the 21st May, there was no mention whatever of them With regard to the other matters affecting the position of the late Commissioner of Public Works, the Government had no intimation of the hon gentleman's views It the Government had acted in any way so as to deserve in the estimation of the hon member the censure of the House, let him bring forward a motion which would enable the House to pronounce its decision one way or the other, and he (the Attorney-General) was not afraid of the result, but until this was done it was needless and premature to discuss the present question

Mr HUGHES was glad the hon gentleman did not oppose the motion He was not surprised at it however, as he should be surprised when the Government opposed anything likely to be carried by a majority against them (A laugh) He did not think the hon member for the Sturt had derogated from his position, he should hold by the course he had taken in this matter We were in the inauguration of responsible Government here, and as long as we had not a class of men who could devote their time to legislation without caring for the emoluments of office, we could not watch too closely any changes which took place in the Government The hon

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16

The SPEAKER took the chair at one o'clock

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE

Mr BAGOT presented a petition from a number of the friends and members of the Committee of the Unley Institute, praying that the sum of £4,000 which had been placed upon the Supplementary Estimates for the erection of a suitable building in Adelaide for the South Australian Institute, might be assented to by the House.

The SPEAKER remarked that there were several petitions to the same effect lying upon the table of the House, and it would be unnecessary to read each petition

Mr GLYDE presented a petition from 1,023 persons, friends and members of the South Australian Institute, praying that the sum of £4 000 referred to might be assented to Mr Glyde presented a similar petition from the members of the Salisbury Institute

Mr DUFFIELD presented a petition signed by 98 persons, members and friends of the Gawler Institute, the prayer being similar to that of the preceding

MAGILL INSTITUTE

Mr WARK presented a petition from the office-bearers of the Magill Mechanics' Institute, which was received and read by the Clerk of the House. It was to the effect that £225 had been collected by the Committee of Management, and that a grant in aid to the extent of £50 had been received from the Government The amount expended had been £300 The Committee were most anxious to finish the reading-room in order that classes for evening instruction might be formed, but they had not sufficient funds for the purpose, and prayed that a sum might be placed on the Estimates to aid them in this emergency

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE

Mr BARROW presented a petition signed by 42 persons, members and friends of the Norwood and Stepney Institute, praying that the sum of 4,000*l* placed on the Supplementary Estimates for the erection of a suitable building for the South Australian Institute might be assented to by the House

CENTRAL ROAD BOARD

Mr MILNE gave notice that on the following day he should move an address be presented to his Excellency, praying that an additional sum of 10,000*l* might be placed on the Estimates for expenditure by the Central Road Board

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Mr NEALES wished to place upon the Notice Paper the notice which had stood in his name on the previous day, but which lapsed in consequence of his absence He was not desirous however, of unnecessarily burdening the Notice Papers Seeing the Commissioner of Crown Lands and the Commissioner of Public Works present and with whose departments he apprehended the matter was connected, if they would give him a public assurance that the information which he required should be forthcoming, he should be perfectly satisfied Mr Neales's motion was as follows —

"That there be laid on the table of this House the following returns, viz —

"A return of the whole cost of the Government House, and the offices attached thereto within the Government Domain, from the first erection (1839 40) to the present date, distinguishing the amount expended each year

"2 A similar return respecting the Government cottage at Glenelg

"3 A similar return respecting the cottage at Government Farm

"4 A return of the cost of furniture, decorations, and other incidental expenses of Government House, within the domain, for the last 19 years, distinguishing the cost of each year Also, to produce the invoices, bills of parcels, and other necessary vouchers of the amounts referred to in the Estimates and Supplementary Estimates of 1857-1858, to enable the House to judge as to the absolute value received for such expenditure "

The TREASURER thought he had given an implied assurance that these returns should be prepared, and that was the reason that the hon member had not pressed his motion on the previous day Instructions had been given to prepare the returns alluded to

The SPEAKER (as Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee) brought up the report of that Committee, which was read by the Clerk The Committee, after referring to the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Dr Hampden of Van Diemen s Land, recommended that an Act be passed giving to the House of Assembly similar powers to those enjoyed by the House of Commons

Upon the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works the report was ordered to be printed

POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid on the table of the House copy of despatch from His Excellency the Governor in-Chief to the Secretary of State for the colonies on the subject of Postal Communication, which was ordered to be printed

DR HAMPTON S CASE

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid on the table copy of the report and decision of the Privy Council in the case of Fenton ats Dr Hampton, and moved that the same be printed

Carried

MR BABBAGE

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS said that he had just received some despatches from Mr Babbage which he was desirous should be read by the Clerk of the House, as, no doubt, hon members were desirous of obtaining as early information as possible in reference to the exploration with which Mr Babbage was connected

The SPEAKER remarked that the despatches could be read if the House desired it after the preliminary business had been disposed of

THE RAILWAY DEBATE

The COMMISSIONER of CROWN LANDS claimed the indulgence of the House whilst he made a short statement which he had been desirous of making at the close of the debate on the previous day upon the Railway Question, but in reference to the House he did not then insist upon his right He now asked permission because he thought it most desirable that there should be a distinct understanding in reference to ministerial actions

The SPEAKER said that the hon gentleman was not at liberty to allude to the debate of the previous day, except for the purpose of personal explanation

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the statement which he was desirous of making, partook of the character alluded to by the hon the Speaker

Mr REYNOLDS wished to know whether the statement was in reference to anything in which the hon gentleman had been misunderstood

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was surprised that the hon member for the Sturt should cast any impediments in the way, as he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) might have insisted upon his right to address the House on the previous day, but refrained from doing so in deference to the House.

The SPEAKER said the hon gentleman would be quite in order in making a personal explanation, no matter whether the necessity arose from remarks which had fallen from the hon gentleman himself or from any one else

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the explanation which he was desirous of making, was personal to himself as one of the Ministry It would be remembered that a portion of the debate related to the Council Paper, No 20, and he would draw the attention of the House to a letter written by the hon member for the Sturt, dated 8th June, in which he stated that he had been especially desirous of consulting his colleagues, but their continued absence rendered it impossible, and that he ultimately gave up the chase after his colleagues, and acted upon his own responsibility The hon gentleman (Mr Reynolds) also stated that he called upon the Commissioner of Crown Lands at least a dozen times, but never found him at home He confessed he was taken by surprise by that statement, and he begged to state that he had since made enquiries of the secretary and clerk in his office as to whether it was within their recollection that the hon member for the Sturt had, during the whole year, called at his (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) twelve times Both of those gentlemen stated that they had no recollection of the hon gentleman having called more than once or twice and upon asking them if the hon gentleman when he called left any message to the effect that he wanted to see the Commissioner of Crown Lands, they stated distinctly that the hon gentleman left no message of the kind, but merely looked in, and upon ascertaining that the Commissioner of Crown Lands was not within left immediately Since he had held the office of Commissioner of Crown Lands, which was nearly twelve months, he begged to state that he had been absent from town only on two occasions, the first occasion being in the early part of January (when, for his own recreation, he was absent for a week, and the second, from the 28th April to the 4th May, when he was absent upon business connected with his department With the exception of those two periods he had not been absent for a single day, but day after day had attended to the current business of his department With respect to the hon the Chief Secretary he was enabled to state that gentleman was in town, and at his office

The SPEAKER thought the hon gentleman was not at liberty to refer to other members of the Ministry His observations must be confined to himself

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS presumed he would be allowed to state that he attended a Cabinet meeting on the 18th May Hon members would be kind enough to remember that a Cabinet meeting was held on 18th May, and——

The SPEAKER did not think this arose from the statement of the previous day He must request the hon gentleman to resume his seat [The Commissioner of Crown Lands did so] He understood that the hon gentleman wished to explain away the statement of the hon member for the Sturt, that he called twelve times at the office of the Commissioner of Crown Lands and could not find him The hon gentleman must confine himself to that

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would defer to that opinion He merely wished to shew that the hon member for the Sturt had an opportunity of consulting his colleagues

Mr Reynolds remarked that notwithstanding what had fallen from the Commissioner of Crown Lands, he adhered to the statement which he had previously made Nothing the hon gentleman had said had altered his opinion

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS

Mr Hawker, on behalf of the hon member for Light, wished to know if the regulations in reference to papers of the Legislative Council would be the same as last session

The Speaker said yes, that hon members would receive such papers upon application to the Clerk of the Council

RAILWAY STATIONS

Mr Milne begged to put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) the reasons which have induced the Railway Commissioners to accept the offer made by the owner of Section 70, of a part of that section for the purpose of a railway station If the reasons are of an engineering character, what amount of outlay would have been necessary to make part of the adjoining Government land equally suitable for a station?"

He might state as a reason for asking the question, that although he was not acquainted with the locality, he had been informed that the Railway at the point referred to took a considerable curve to the eastward, and that where it was most eastward was upon Government land, consequently it was more suitable for a station, being calculated to secure the traffic from Sheaoak Log But at Section 70 the sweep of the curve was more westward, and if the station were made there the traffic from Sheaoak Log would probably go into Gawler Town It had been stated that the owner of Section 70 had given the land gratuitously which was required for a station, and, of course, this was very generous, but it must be perfectly well-known that the owner calculated upon laying out the remainder of the section as a township, and in consequence of the station being erected there would receive a greatly enhanced value for the remainder of the property That was his reason for putting the latter part of the question as to whether there were any engineering difficulties which had induced the acceptance of a portion of Section 70

The Commissioner of Public Works said that the reasons which had induced the Railway Commissioners to accept the offer made by the owner of Section 70 were of an engineering character The levels at the spot where they proposed to put the station were 1 in 1273, whilst at the other spot they were 1 in 101 The expense to bring the Government land upon an equally eligible footing would be £1,200 or £1 500, the earthwork would cost more, the station would cost more, and the crossing of the north road would cost more

LANDS TITLE OFFICE

Mr Strangways begged to call the attention of hon members and the Government to a communication which had been addressed to him relative to the new Lands Titles Office. It had been represented to him that that office had been converted into an office for the transaction of business by private solicitors The hon member read the letter, which was signed Alfred Atkinson, and detailed circumstances within his own knowledge which induced the conclusion that public employes connected with the department were engaged in conducting business for private individuals in a way not warranted by law He would hand the letter to the hon the Attorney-General, who would probably enquire into the matter, and communicate the result of his enquiries to the House upon an early day

The Attorney-General said, if the hon member would hand him the letter, he would take care that such enquiries should be made as would prepare him to answer any questions upon the subject which the hon member might place upon the notice paper He would communicate with the Registrar-General who would no doubt be enabled to explain the matter satisfactorily

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that although he was desirous that the despatches to which he had previously alluded as being received from Mr Babbage should be read by the Clerk of the House, he did not wish to lay them on the table, as they would then become the property of the House He wished to hand them to the newspapers that day for publication

The Clerk of the House read the despatches

Mr Strangways asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands what action he had taken upon these despatches, since it appeared quite clear that Mr Gregory and Mr Babbage could do nothing but quarrel

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that these despatches had reached him so short a time before coming to the House that he had not had any time to consult his colleagues or take action in the matter

UNCLAIMED GOLD

The Treasurer stated he was prepared to give information which he had promised the previous day in reference to the unclaimed gold which had been sold under an Act of Council The gold had been sold under an Act of Council, and the amount deposited in the Treasury He found the amount which it had realized was £482 1s 4d

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

The Attorney General on rising to move the second reading of the "Bill to Facilitate the Recovery of Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes and prevent frivolous and vexatious defences thereto," said, that he did not know it was necessary on that occasion to state anything in addition to what he had addressed to the House, when he obtained leave to introduce this Bill He had then fully explained the objects and scope of the Bill, and since that period hon members had had the Bill before them, and would be enabled to form their opinions upon the manner in which it was proposed to effect the object in view Hon members would perhaps be able to suggest objections which he might be enabled to meet in reply, but perhaps it would be more advantageous that the discussion should take place in committee In deference to the opinion of some hon members, he proposed, when in committee, to suggest an amendment to the effect that the existing law should be repealed, it being more convenient that there should be one law only applicable to the subject. He should have no objection whatever to propose that amendment The hon member for Light had suggested another amendment, to which he (the Attorney-General) had as he had promised when he first obtained leave to introduce this Bill, and when the suggestion was made by the hon member for Light, given very careful consideration, the result of which had been not only a determination not to introduce it in the present measure, but as at present advised he should feel bound to oppose such a proposition The effect would be to place every person who bought goods in the same position as though he had given a warrant of attorney for them Goods might be purchased under so many circumstances which might render it desirable that the purchaser should be allowed to plead It was not similar to a case in which a person gave a bill of exchange, as by so doing he fixed the time of payment himself If such a suggestion as that of the hon member for Light were acted on, a person who bought a coat to-day would to-morrow be liable to be sued for it, in fact, parties who purchased goods would be placed precisely in the same position as though they had given a warrant of attorney for them, payable immediately, and execution might issue at once He mentioned that, as one of the consequences which would result from the suggestion of the hon member for Light, and which induced him not to introduce such a provision in the present measure It was possible, however, that he might support some modification of the suggestion, but in the sweeping way in which it was proposed, making the principle of this measure applicable to all cases, he must oppose it He had promised to give the suggestion of the hon member careful consideration, and had done so He had partially given the reasons which induced him to come to the conclusion which he had

Mr Strangways, before the question was put, wished to call the attention of the House to an answer which the Attorney General gave him when he asked the hon gentleman if this Act were similar to the English Act He (Mr Strangways) then stated, that under the English Act, plaintiffs could not in all cases obtain their costs, and the Attorney-General said the Act was similar to the English Act, but it was an error to suppose that under that Act plaintiffs were unable to obtain their costs Seeing several members present he begged to call their attention to the latter part of the first clause That clause related only to cases in which the plaintiff signed judgment in case of default by the defendant, and if they referred to Schedule A, applicable to this clause, it would be seen that, by the endorsement, if the principal and interest were paid to the plaintiff, proceedings would be stayed That was a copy of the English Act, and he was aware that under that endorsement the decision of the English Judges had been that, if the defendant paid the principal and interest to the plaintiff or his attorney, in terms of the endorsement, he could get no costs At first this might appear a hardship but it had been argued that the defendant should have some slight advantage in return for those which were taken from him The Judges in England had decided that the plaintiff in such cases was not entitled to costs, and he presumed the Attorney-General would now see that such was the case under the present Act.

Mr Neales said as to the observations made by the hon member for Light, there was one great advantage he had passed over The effect of the Bill would be that the term of credit would be absolutely known at the time it was given, and not when the writ was served Parties would buy at three months' credit, and the writ would be served on not paying for the goods at the term specified A small tradesman sells goods to be paid for at Christmas and he might be utterly ruined by not being paid until the following June. He thought it would do away with those disgraceful practices of not keeping to the terms of credit He hoped the Attorney-General would think better of it, with regard to limiting or terminating the credit

Mr Bakewell thought the Bill would be exceedingly beneficial It lessened legal expenses and came with the great recommendation of having been in successful operation for three years The question was, could it be extended so as to place cheques as well as bills of exchange and promissory notes on the same footing He did not see why a personal cheque should not be under the same law as a bill of exchange, and in all cases the defendant should not be allowed a fictitious defence to an action He bowed with great submission to the Attorney-General, but agreed with the hon member for Light He thought it might be beneficial to extend the time within which an action might be brought to a longer period than six months and all those cases in which a man could not swear he had a good defence to action, prompt judgment should follow The law as it then stood enabled the holder of a promissory note to sue, but parties not suing within six months, would be deprived of that advantage, their remedy being lessened instead of being promoted by that Bill He thought it would be desirable to strike out the words "six months" altogether, when the Bill went into Committee

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would only say a few words With regard to the suggestions made by the member for Encounter Bay, English experience would not tend to the conclusion that the Bill would have the effect he supposed, but it would be very easy to alter that by altering the endorsement so as to include the costs as well as the debt With regard to what had been said by the member for Barossa, his impression was that no actions should lie against endorsers A summary remedy should not be applied unless the party formally took action upon it He would rather leave that to a new law applicable to endorsers only, With regard to persons being bound to pay a sum of money at a specified time, the same reasons which would induce the Legislature to pass that Act, would induce them to pass an Act applicable to the cases mentioned With regard to claims for goods, if any person chose to raise the defence that the goods were charged at more than he conceived they were worth, no Court would shut him out from defence In all cases where the amount was fixed, he would be prepared to support a motion for preventing frivolous defences to bills of exchange and promissory notes He would move that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the purpose of taking the Bill into consideration

The preamble was postponed

Clauses 1 and 2 were carried

On Clause 3 being put, several amendments were proposed with a view to limiting the amount of debts to which the provisions of the Bill would extend

It was ultimately carried as printed

The remaining clauses were carried, with one or two verbal alterations

The schedules were adopted

The House resumed

The SPEAKER reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again that day week

CUSTOMS AMENDMENT BILL

The TREASURER rose to propose the second reading of the Customs Amendment Bill It was only a very short one, and had been introduced chiefly to remedy certain defects in the present laws, which were attended with inconvenience and loss to the revenue The 11th and 15th clauses had reference to the powers the Customs had at certain distances from the coast The Bill pointed out that the line above high-water mark was to be considered the boundary of the coast The 20th clause gave a certain time for the perfecting the entry of goods That time was 14 days, except in some cases, and seven days in others The amendment proposed was to limit that time with respect to coasting vessels and colonial steamers to 24 hours, and in regard to other vessels to four days after arrival He thought no argument could be sustained against those amendments being adopted The 20th clause of the Customs Act especially required amendment At present, an allowance was made on goods damaged on the voyage which had not paid duty, of a certain amount of duty in proportion to the damage sustained, but the time during which the goods might have received damage was at present limited to the arrival of the vessel and not to the landing of the goods It was proposed to extend the time to the landing of the goods on the wharf, so that the damage sustained at the ship's side after the landing of the goods might be allowed for in the reduction of the Customs duties The last clause gave facilities for parties to bring fresh meat, fresh fish, fresh fruit or vegetables from the neighbouring colonies, and to land them free from the interruptions from the Customs which applied to other goods, the only restrictions being that they should be landed under certain regulations to prevent landing dutiable articles

Mr HUGHES wished to call attention to an important omission The Act proposed generally to alter the Customs' Laws In the instructions from from His Excellency, which had been laid on the table, the 10th paragraph expressed that the Governor was not to sanction any provisions which should be foreign to the title of the Act, and no Act could be repealed by general words It was important to call attention to that, as he thought it desirable that some regular system should be adopted in altering laws There were only two Customs Laws in force, and two clauses of those laws were to be altered, but they were not stated in the proposed Act He thought that omission ought not to exist He therefore called attention to it

Mr HAY intended to support the Bill He thought in the second clause the penalty attached for not entering goods was out of place He had spoken to several parties connected with shipping and landing goods and that was their opinion The present system was a great inconvenience But some parties, when they wanted to tranship did not enter their goods until the last day allowed, while others who had sold their goods wanted them landed immediately The provisions of the Act were required, but he wished to strike out the penalty named in the second clause

Mr TOWNSEND said persons were compelled by the intercolonial steamers to enter goods within 24 hours, and from other vessels within four days, and he thought some clause should be inserted to compel captains and owners of vessels to discharge within that time When goods were scarce, buyers desired to have them delivered in 10 or 12 or 14 days, but now they frequently could not get them for four or five weeks

Mr HART feared the time would have to be extended for the discharge of goods beyond that mentioned in the Act That clause was merely to compel owners of goods to enter them, but it was hardly possible that they could be landed in four days He would ask whether the clauses were in accordance with the views of the Chamber of Commerce He could not from memory say what the desire of that body was, but he thought it would be well, before taking the Bill into Committee, to ascertain the views of the Chamber of Commerce respecting it

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS supported the second reading of the Bill He distinctly remembered when he was Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce the matter being brought before them by some parties who had on board a vessel a quantity of coals and who were grieved because so long a time had elapsed before they were delivered He also had felt annoyed when he was an importer of goods at such delays, and he hoped the Chamber of Commerce would suggest a clause to meet the difficulty There ought to be some limit to the time during which a ship should retain goods on board, probably a notice of 7 or 14 days, compelling the agents to deliver the goods within that period, would meet the case

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the instructions were very distinct, that a Bill should not be altered in general words He considered the Attorney General ought shortly meet the difficulty in the preamble by stating the contents and titles of the Acts that would be affected He saw by Clause 5 that the coast line would be high-water mark, and he expected the Customs authorities would have no jurisdiction beyond it He thought therefore the Bill would facilitate smuggling A Customs officer could not interfere with goods beyond that mark, and a smuggler placing himself and goods beyond that imaginary line would be safe, although almost within reach of the officer The term, too, was indefinite, for highwater mark was constantly changing

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the picture drawn so graphically by the hon gentleman of a smuggler defying a Custom-House officer, was purely imaginary, because the jurisdiction of the Government extended one league beyond the coast-line There had been a difficulty in determining what the coast-line should be—whether it should be high-water mark, or low water mark, and it was decided by the Harbor Master, the late Collector of Customs, and the Chamber of Commerce that high-water mark should be taken as the coast line The power of the Customs extended a league beyond that With regard to the other point he had known so many instances in which Acts of that sort had been sanctioned by the Legislature and confirmed by Her Majesty, that he did not think it necessary to do what had been proposed but had no objection to insert what particular sections of the Act would be affected by it

The question was then put and carried

In Committee

The preamble was postponed

The first clause passed without debate

The penalty was struck out of the second clause

An amendment was introduced into the third clause, to the effect that if any damage were received by goods on the voyage, and before their removal from the wharf, an abatement of duty should be made on such goods proportionate to the damage sustained, provided the goods had not lain an unreasonable time on the wharf, and that such claim was made within seven days of their removal

Amendment carried

The fourth clause to include was passed with a verbal amendment

The House resumed

The SPEAKER reported progress and obtained leave to sit on Tuesday 21st

WASTE LANDS ACT

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Waste Lands Act The Bill provided that the waste lands should not be alienated except by way of sale introduced some clauses respecting annual leases and leases for 14 years

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS seconded

Leave having been given, the Bill was laid on the table and read a first time

The second reading was appointed for Tuesday 21st

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The TREASURER moved that the Speaker leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Supplementary Estimates

INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Mr REYNOLDS, before the Speaker left the chair, begged to move the contingent motion standing in his name, and asked leave to insert after the word "buildings" "or public works"

Leave was granted

Mr REYNOLDS then moved that it be an instruction to the Committee not to agree to vote for the erection of new buildings or public works, the plans and estimates for which have not been laid on the table for the information of the House It appeared to him very desirable that the House should have plans and estimates before them in order to know the style of the buildings and public works that were sanctioned It would give the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion respecting them before they were executed It would also tend to facilitate the erection of such buildings and the construction of such works, for it was well-known that sums of money had been voted for such purposes, and months had elapsed before the works had been commenced If the House sanctioned the erection of such buildings as the Registry Office and Mechanics' Institute, they ought to know the kind of building they were sanctioning He considered the staircase of the Registry Office an eyesore, and whoever designed it was not a good designer He thought also that the carrying that motion would keep public officers up to the mark, as members would have an opportunity of passing their opinions upon the plans before they sanctioned a vote

Mr PEAKE seconded the motion, because he coincided with it to a certain extent, and thought it would have the effect stated by the mover, of obtaining some espionage over the works for which money was voted He thought the scrutiny to which those plans would be subjected would have good effect on the officers of the Government But he hoped the House would not resolve itself into an Architectural Committee, for he never knew any good result from Building Committees He thought also it would effect some good for the House to have before them detailed plans and sections of their railways, and then, instead of going from Gawler Town to some bit of a place, there would be a great railway scheme of main line It would have a tendency to do away with one part of the country being opposed to another, and would show that the country had been thoroughly examined and surveyed for the purpose

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the motion, because he thought that the present system was to put down large sums of money on the Estimates for buildings and public works, and then contract the plans in order to spend the money By the plan proposed they would compel the Commissioner of Public Works to lay on the table of the House plans and estimates before they were asked to vote

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS hoped the House would consider before they passed a resolution of that kind, particularly in its amended form, for all new buildings and public works would be then included The erection of a wall round a gaol, the Electric Telegraph, plans o bridges, gates, waterworks, would have to come before the House He considered that it would militate much against the progress of those works The Government were willing to lay on the table of the House any tables or estimates asked for, but to resolve that no building should be proceeded with unless plans were laid on the table, would militate against public business With regard to what had been stated by the member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), he could assure the House that in the Department of the Colonial Architect very laborious calculations were made to arrive at the cost of large works, but to pass such a resolution would cause great waste of labor, and time, and public money

Mr HUGHES, though agreeing to a certain extent with the Commissioner of Public Works, thought that when the House was asked for a vote for a building they should be informed whether that sum would finish the building It was not likely that the House would be asked to vote for a wall round a gaol, but when asked to vote £1,000 for a Registry Office, and £1500 for a Colonial Store, he thought they ought to know how the money was to be expended He thought there was a great deal of ornament, which was not required in that store The Commissioner of Public Works might have given the information, but did not, and therefore the only plan was to initiate the principle, that when large works were undertaken, some better information than had hitherto been afforded, should be given

Mr LINDSAY said the remarks made by the Commissioner of Public Works induced him to support the motion (Laughter) In all cases when large sums of money were required for roads, plans, and sections should be given before the money was voted As a proof some lines of road on which large sums had been expended had better have been abandoned Resolutions to enquire into the working of the Central Road Board deserved the support of every member of the House He did not blame the Road Board They had done their best under the circumstances, but it was impossible to make some of the bad lines of road into good ones The House required information in order that attempts of an unpracticable nature might be avoided

Mr BARROW thought the motion included much more than the hon member for the Sturt intended when he submitted it to the House He (Mr Barrow) should therefore move an amendment He moved that all the words after the word "been" be struck out, with a view to inserting the words "previously prepared" That would dispense with the plans and estimates being laid on the table With regard to the Mechanics' Institute, when a sum of £4,000 was put upon the Estimates, the House should know whether it was to be a first, second, third, or fourth instalment, or whether it was merely a lump sum put down at random, and whether the plans were prepared, and in the office of the Commissioner of Public Works If the House was satisfied that the plans were so prepared, it would be sufficient, but it was not intended in the case of all small works that plans and estimates should be laid on the table

Mr COLE said if the hon mover would confine his resolution to the department of the Colonial Architect and the railway department, he would support it, but at present it included too much

Dr WARK would support the motion, though he hardly thought it was intended to include the Central Road Board The hon the Commissioner of Public Works spoke of every operation of the Board being first passed through the House, but the Board acted under an Act of Parliament, and, therefore, a resolution of the House would not affect it If they wanted a warning let them look at the Glenelg Jetty and see how, from a small beginning, when it was a place which the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands used to call "a fishing village," it had come to swallow up an immense amount of money They had now before them a lot of blind estimates and nothing to guide them Plans and estimates would save them from much reckless expenditure and great discontent He saw nothing against the motion, and everything in its favor

Mr GLYDE agreed in the motion, but could not go the entire length of it There was considerable weight in the objection of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works He would propose after the word "vote" to insert the words "involving an expenditure of not more than £500" He objected to confining the motion to the Colonial Architect's department, as it would be invidious

Mr COLE would support the motion if it was confined to the Colonial Architect's department, the Railway department, and the Waterworks

Mr NEALES seconded the motion of the hon member for East Torrens All the difficulties arose from the House voting sums which they were led to believe sufficient, and then finding them not nearly so The motion confining the resolution to £500 would have another effect, for instead of hurrying on buildings without the concurrence of the House, and then asking for the money, they would have the plans and estimates produced It was not necessary that every item of £500 should be the subject of a fight, for the money would be more freely voted if the plans and estimates were furnished

Mr REYNOLDS, if no hon gentleman was about to speak, would make one or two remarks

The TREASURER enquired whether the hon member was replying, as he wished to say a few words He agreed in the expediency of the House possessing information before a sum was voted, but not in the instruction to the Committee now before the House The discussion would be taken by the Government as an indication of the wish of the House that no vote should be taken unless Government were prepared with plans and estimates, so that when any building vote was under discussion, the Government would be prepared to afford the fullest information respecting it, or, at the request of one or more members, to lay the plans and estimates on the table If he supported either motion it would be that of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked whether an instruction to a Committee limited the power of the Committee

The SPEAKER ruled that would be the effect of the form in which the instruction was worded

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL felt bound to oppose the motion, as it would have the effect of causing the House to fetter itself The vote for the Registration Offices, for instance, might come on for consideration just before the conclusion of the labours of the Committee, and it might then be impossible to get plans and estimates prepared, though the Committee was satisfied to vote the money provided plans and estimates were laid before them previous to the passing of the Appropriation Act He agreed in the object of the hon member for the Sturt, but he was not aware of any instance in which plans and estimates had been asked for and not produced He also objected to the House limiting its own action, which it would do by limiting that of a Committee of the whole He would suggest in place of the words "that it be an instruction to the Committee" the insertion of the words "that in the opinion of this House it is not expedient"

Mr REYNOLDS would agree to this but the proposal of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) would not meet the case, as the House would want the plans before them to form an opinion from He thought it sufficient to limit the motion to the Colonial Architect's Department He did not touch the Railway Department, as that would come under the Bill which authorised the construction of a Board of Works

Mr HART enquired whether the hon member was speaking in reply

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative

Mr REYNOLDS, if the House would allow him, would modify his motion in the words suggested by the Attorney-General

Mr HART rose to order The House had been taken by surprise, for when the Attorney-General asked the hon member for Sturt a question, and that that hon member commenced making some remarks in reply the House did not understand that he was replying except to the question of the hon the Attorney-General

The SPEAKER thought the hon member was speaking in reply as previously, when the hon the Treasurer asked whether the hon gentleman was doing so, the hon gentleman resumed his seat

Mr REYNOLDS had risen to reply in consequence of not seeing any other member about to address the House He regretted that the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) had lost his opportunity of addressing the House

The SPEAKER said he would put the motion of Mr Glyde first, as, in the event of its being negatived, that of Mr Barrow could be put subsequently

The amendment of Mr Glyde was then put and negatived without a division

The House divided upon the amendment of Mr Barrow, which was carried by a majority of 2

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to move as an amendment on the contingent motion,

"That in the opinion of the House it is inexpedient that the Committee should agree to any vote for the erection of new buildings the plans and estimates for which were not previously prepared "

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member could not bring forward this amendment, as it proposed to omit all the former part of the original motion which had been already carried on Mr Barrow s amendment

The ATTORNEY GENERAL was quite prepared to act in accordance with the spirit of the resolution but he objected to the House in one form having its hands tied—that when the Speaker sat in one chair they should not have the same liberty as when he sat in another He would therefore, be compelled to vote against the resolution, as it sought to limit the power of the House.

The SPEAKER suggested a way of escaping the difficulty If the House negatived the resolution, that of the hon the Attorney-General could be moved as a fresh instruction to the Committee

The motion was then put and negatived without a division

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL again rose to propose his amendment as a substantive motion

Mr MILNE rose to order He understood there was nothing before the House

The SPEAKER said the question before the House was the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Supplementary Estimates, and he believed an hon member was preparing an instruction which he intended to move

The ATTORNEY GENERAL read his resolution as follows —

"That in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient that the Committee should agree to any vote for the erection of new buildings involving an expenditure of more than 1,000*l*, for which plans and estimates were not prepared and ready for inspection if required "

Mr MILNE remarked that this was not an instruction to a Committee

The SPEAKER said it was put into his hands as such, and he would now put it to the House

Mr REYNOLDS would move an amendment

Mr HART rose to order He agreed with the hon member for Gumeracha He thought it out of order, without having given notice, to move an instruction to a Committee The hon the Speaker would of course decide, but that was his (Mr Hart's) opinion

Mr BURFORD said it had been accepted as an amendment on what had gone before it (No no) He understood the hon the Speaker to say that if Mr Reynolds's motion was negatived, this could be put to the House

Mr STRANGWAYS read Standing Order No 40, and contended that under that the hon the Attorney General was clearly out out of order

Mr REYNOLDS said that the motion could have been entertained if the question previously put had been "that all the words after the word 'that' be omitted " He thought the House had been taken by surprise, and he had been taken by surprise, in consequence of the hon the Speaker having omitted to put the question in this way He bowed with all respect to the hon the Speaker, but he thought that hon gentleman had made an oversight

The SPEAKER said he had no power to put the motion in the shape suggested He could not find anything in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to prevent an instruction to a Committee being put without notice, there was, however, one rule to which he would call the attention of the House It was that no instructions should be given to a Committee to do what it had already the power of doing The motion was therefore unnecessary

The House went into Committee on the Supplementary Estimates for the year 1858

The following items were agreed to without discussion — New wall round Adelaide gaol, £38 5s Drain pipes and water-closets for public buildings, £300

On the item, Military Barracks, Robe Town £150

Mr MILNE enquired whether the money had been expended He thought the military were withdrawn from that quarter

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said a portion of the money had been spent, but the building was not to be used as a Military Barrack, but as a Custom House

Mr REYNOLDS was sorry to see more money spent on the miserable building He did not see what the £150 was wanted for He should like some more information

The TREASURER said the building was no longer required for a barrack, but for a Custom House, and as it was necessary to lodge the Custom's officer, and have an office for him, it was proposed to convert the building into a suitable residence by adding a room and executing some repairs If they built a new Custom House they would require a larger sum

Mr REYNOLDS said there was a cottage called the officers' quarters He presumed that would be at the service of the officer, as the military were withdrawn

The TREASURER said that was the building intended as a residence for the officer, and that it would be necessary to add a room to it

Mr HAWKER admired the patriotism of the hon member for the Sturt, for the moment a sum of money for a country district was proposed that hon member jumped up to oppose it If there was a vote proposed for a large building in Adelaide, it was agreed to, but the smallest sum for a country district was opposed He conceived this to be a legitimate work, and would support it

The vote was then agreed to

On the next item, residence and office for Sub-Collector of Customs Rivoli Bay, 500*l*

Mr REYNOLDS asked for an explanation of this vote.

The TREASURER said the object of the Government was to establish a Custom-House at Rivoli Bay, as a very numerously signed memorial had been received from the residents of that district seeking to have Rivoli Bay proclaimed a port, a request which the Government were inclined to accede to, but they could not do so without establishing a Custom, House By giving facilities to the settlers in that district for obtaining supplies from Adelaide, they would save the Customs duties on goods which were now brought from Portland The reason there was nothing on the Estimates for the officer s salary was, that as the Custom-House at Wakefield was abandoned, the money voted for that could be transferred when the general Estimates came under consideration

Mr HART thought a Custom-House would be of little value, except to pick up the stray mariners who might be knocking about there It would be well to have plans of Rivoli Bay, in order to see whether it was a place where there were facilities for vessels to anchor A Government vessel, the Yatala, had gone on shore there the other day , and no doubt there would shortly be a sum of money to pay for her repairs, and if a Government vessel with all her anchors and cables could not ride out a breeze of wind in Rivoli Bay, it was not a place where a Custom House could be established with advantage There should be evidence before the House, showing where goods were likely to be landed , as to the officer from Wakefield, he might be sent to the Murray, or somewhere else

Mr REYNOLDS could not agree with the hon member though he had a high respect for his opinion He differed from the hon member in consequence of the statements made to him by persons who had been resident at Rivoli Bay for years The Yatala's going ashore was no proof that the place was not fit for a Custom House, for vessels were lost in Guichen Bay, and were we not to have a Custom House or a jetty there on that account ? The settlers were anxious to have a port established at Rivoli, for there was a good road to it in summer and winter The place should have been properly surveyed before, and the Government were right in bringing forward the vote though it was premature It would be seen that he defended the vote to some extent, and did that show that the strictures which the hon member for Victoria had passed upon him were justifiable ? On the last occasion that the Estimates were before the House, did he not object to the proposed large expenditure in and around Adelaide, and urged that more money should be spent in the interior It was very unjust for the hon member for Victoria to cast such reflections upon him

Mr BARROW was not opposed to the item, but thought that when they opened new ports they should not appear for the first time on the Estimates, but the House should first consider whether the proposed places were suitable It was as important to select the situation of a port, before voting money for a Custom-house, as to select the route of a railway before buying rolling stock With regard to the running ashore of the Yatala at Rivoli Bay, he would ask the hon the Treasurer whether the Yatala had not been got off

The TREASURER replied that the Government had learned by telegraph that the Yatala had been got off without damage, and that all the goods were safely landed He agreed with the hon member for Sturt, that the fact of the Yatala's going ashore was no reason that Rivoli should not be proclaimed a port Whilst they were building the jetty at Guichen Bay, a large vessel was lost there , and in all harbors, not being rivers vessels would go ashore It was something in favor of Rivoli that the Yatala, though she went on shore, was not broken to pieces It showed there was some safety there even in the most extreme circumstances In reply to the hon member he would say that the only way of opening the subject of a new port for discussion, was putting a sum upon the Estimates, and that was the object in the present instance The late Harbor-Master had surveyed Rivoli Bay, and though not a good harbor, it was sufficiently convenient to be opened for the accommodation of the settlers The present Harbor-Master had also visited the place

Mr Hawker begged to assure the hon member for the Sturt that he had no desire to make any personal reflections His remarks had been made in consequence of what he had seen in the papers, by which it certainly appeared that even small votes were objected to for country districts, though much larger ones were sanctioned for Adelaide and the Port With respect to the proposed vote of 500*l* for Rivoli Bay, he admitted there was a difficulty in getting as much information as they wished, but if they looked along the coast and saw the large number of jetties which had been erected for the convenience of Adelaide, and what little accommodation had been provided for the settlers in the interior, it would be even better that they should give them an indifferent port, than that there should be no port at all Guichen Bay was a long distance from Mount Gambier, and it was the wish of the settlers at Mount Gambier that this port, Rivoli Bay, should be opened They had not asked for a road, being perfectly satisfied with the natural road, if they could only get the port He was aware that a large quantity of goods were sent from the Port Phillip district in consequence of the absence of the accommodation they now asked for These goods amounted to probably 20,000*l* a year, and the whole of them would, in all probability, be purchased in Adelaide if there were the means of landing them, and better means of internal communication Independently of the goods he had named, there were others to the extent of £4,000 a-year in the shape of dutiable goods These amounts were totally lost to the colony, and went into the pockets of Victoria They could not expect all ports to be as safe as Port Adelaide, in which the hon member for the Port took such interest, but they must be content to take what they could get It was his intention shortly to move for a sum for the survey of the line between Mount Gambier and Guichen Bay, but as the amount now asked for was so small he trusted the House would vote it

Captain Hart said, the hon gentleman who had just sat down appeared to forget that he had given Guichen Bay his warm support for many years, he looked upon it as the proper port The very fact of people from Mount Gambier being satisfied with the natural road to go to Guichen Bay rather than to Rivoli Bay, when the road between Rivoli Bay and Mount Gambier was much better, was sufficient proof that there was something the matter with Rivoli Bay Several vessels had been lost at Rivoli Bay, and when one hon gentleman said a large vessel at anchor went ashore at Guichen Bay,he was misinformed, the fact being that the cause of her going ashore was that she missed stays in going into harbor There was not a port south of Port Adelaide which was equal to Guichen Bay, therefore it was an absurdity to compare the one with the other Before the vote was assented to there should be proof that Rivoli Bay was a port where vessels could anchor He might not object to the vote if it were shown that it was a proper place, but he objected in the first instance to vote £500, as if it were afterwards found that Rivoli Bay was not a fit place for a port, the people would think themselves ill-used, because the money was not expended The first thing to ascertain was, what anchorage there was there No doubt the pilot who was in charge of the Yatala would be able to afford the information People landed goods at Guichen Bay years before it was a port, and they were also in the habit of going to Rivoli Bay, till they found it was not a place fit for vessels to go to It was clear that the Treasurer could not give them the necessary information, namely, whether it was a safe place or not, and in the absence of that information he felt bound to oppose the the vote He had several allotments at Rivoli Bay, and those who had land there would, no doubt, like to see a township springing up, but the mere fact of voting £500 would not cause a township to spring up, and, under the circumstances, he trusted the Treasurer would withdraw the vote

Mr Strangways said that, until the hon member for the Port rose the last time, he had some idea of opposing the vote, but as the hon member had stated that ships had been in the habit of going to Rivoli Bay for a considerable time, he should support the vote He believed the Yatala did not go ashore at Rivoli Bay, but somewhere near it, but the fact of her going ashore was no argument against Rivoli Bay He congratulated the hon member for the Port upon having discovered that there was a second port fit for ships to anchor at, as till latterly he believed that there was no fitting place but Port Adelaide (Laughter)

Mr Neales should support the vote as it appeared upon the Estimates, as he could not imagine such an acute man as the hon member for the Port buying allotments in a place not likely to prove a thriving township (Laughter) He should certainly act upon the judgment of the hon member for the Port and vote for the erection of a Custom House where the land had been sold At the last sale allotments in Grey Town were put up and successfully sold There was a general wish that facilities should be afforded for landing goods at Rivoli Bay Guichen Bay did not protect us from Portland supplying that neighborhood and he thought they should see if they could not get some of that trade If they looked down the coast, it would be found that no facilities had yet been afforded to the neighborhood, and if there were any anchorage they were bound to encourage trade there It was called for by the neighborhood, and there was no defence for resisting such a vote He agreed with the hon member for Victoria, and he cared not how widely it was made known, although he was aware that it had rendered him rather unpopular in the City, that there was a tendency to expend money round the town, and not for useful purposes in the districts His view was that a fair proportion of the funds at their command should be given to the country The country was the mainstay to the town, and should be first looked to, otherwise it would be like making a shop when they had no goods to put in it

Mr Milne should vote against the motion, not because he objected to such expenditure being made for the benefit of the settlers of the district—indeed he should be prepared to vote a much higher sum when the Government made out a good case, but no sufficient case had been made out The preliminary step should be a survey of the harbour They could not induce vessels to go there merely by building a Custom-House or erecting a wharf, they must show that the anchorage was safe

Mr Hay would also be compelled to vote against the motion It was true that £500 might build a Custom House, but if this were voted, the next they would be asked for would be £5 000 for a jetty Before such a sum was voted, the House should be in possession of plans and surveys They had that day heard a good deal about plans and specifications of buildings before voting the necessary funds, and the same remarks would apply to jetties Any one going to Yankalilla would see the folly of indiscriminately laying out money for shipping goods from the coast Hardly any one used the jetty he had alluded to, and it would have been much better if the money had been laid out in making roads Instead of having two inferior ports, it would be better in the first instance to ascertain which was likely to prove the best and then to expend money in making good approaches as well as a port

Mr Scammell said the hon member for Onkaparinga had stated that the plans and surveys of the harbor should be laid before the House but he was informed that surveys of the coast had been made in the early part of the present year, and that a chart which would be a guide to mariners was in course of preparation If so it would probably be in the power of the Chief Secretary to state whether Rivoli Bay was amongst the harbors which had been surveyed, and a chart of which he had heard it was intended to lay before the House

The Attorney-General, in reply to the remarks of the hon member, was not aware whether the plans were in course of preparation, but he was authorized to state that the late Harbor-Master had reported that Rivoli Bay was suitable for the purpose, a place at which it was desirable, so far as the capabilities of a harbor were concerned, that a Custom House should be erected He would briefly allude to the reasons which had influenced the Government in proposing this vote One of the main objects for which Governments existed was that they should propose such expenditure as would lead to the development of the trade of a country, and facilitate the proceedings of settlers in various parts The Government were guided not by their independent judgment, but by those who would be directly affected by the expenditure which the Government proposed, and when a large number of respectable and wealthy settlers of Mount Gambier, who had contributed a very large sum to the public revenue by the purchase of land, asked for this vote—when they stated that they would be very much benefitted by being enabled to ship goods from Rivoli Bay—and when they stated, moreover, that they were supplied from a foreign port, and that the amount which they now contributed to the revenue of a neighboring colony would, if the proposed work were undertaken, go to swell the revenue of the colony, the plain duty of the Government was to take the course which they were now taking, and to initiate a vote so as to enable the House to express an opinion upon the subject He had no doubt, notwithstanding the opinion of particular members, that the House would sanction this expenditure, for it was not merely a question whether one place was a little better or a little worse than another, it was not a question whether in a few years there would be a tramway from Mount Gambier to Guichen Bay, but the question was whether the settlers in the neighborhood of Rivoli Bay, who had contributed so largely to the revenue, should have the advantage contemplated by this vote

Mr Lindsay should support the vote for the reasons which had been urged by the hon member for Victoria Rivoli Bay might be a dangerous place, but if there were no safe place they must make use of a dangerous one He believed that the distance between Guichen Bay and Rivoli Bay was 100 miles, at all events, it was something very considerable, and he apprehended that Rivoli Bay was not more dangerous than many other of the landing-places round the coast It had been stated by one hon member that the jetty at Yankalilla was useless, but the fact was in the first instance it was placed too near the mouth of the river, and was no sooner erected than it was washed down but he believed it had been erected on a different spot Rivoli Bay geographically belonged to Victoria, and he should be happy to make it over to that colony (Oh! oh) He did not mean to say without some consideration, but the boundaries fixed by the British Parliament were most absurd Geographically some portion of Victoria belonged to this colony

The CHAIRMAN reminded the hon member that he was travelling out of the question before the House

Mr WARK would support the motion and thought the Government were entitled to the thanks of the House and the country for bringing it forward If Rivoli Bay were not so good as Guichen Bay, it was a good deal nearer for the settlers, and that was a consideration He believed the harbour at Rivoli Bay would prove as safe as the other The road to Guichen Bay was, during some seasons, a perfect swamp, whilst the road to Rivoli Bay was one of the best natural roads in the colony

The CHAIRMAN put the question, and the vote was agreed to

The TREASURER said that in asking for the next vote he did not know whether the House would consider it necessary to have plans and specifications before them It was "For the erection of Police Barracks and Court-House at Goolwa, £1,000"

Mr REYNOLDS thought it certainly desirable that plans and estimates of the proposed buildings should be before the House There was no necessity for such a building at Goolwa The residents there did not ask for it, and on that score alone he should oppose the vote

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the vote Goolwa was a rapidly improving place, the population was rapidly increasing, and there was no police protection nearer than Port Elliot, which was seven miles off He wished, however, to ask the Treasurer whether he deemed it necessary to expend more on the erection of such buildings than was expended at Port Elliot, where, he believed, such buildings had been erected for a much smaller sum He wished to know whether the proposed amount included the purchase of land, or whether it was proposed that the buildings should be erected upon a Government reserve

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the plans and estimates of the proposed buildings, if not absolutely completed, were in a very forward state He believed he should be enabled to lay plans upon the table in a very few hours The Government felt that a Local Court being held at Goolwa in the large room of a public-house, was not a proper place at which to hold it Where a Local Court was held, the Government felt they were bound to provide a proper place It was not respectable to hold the sittings in the long room of a public-house It was not a proper place in which to administer justice No land would be required, as it was proposed to erect the buildings upon a Government reserve A sum of money had already been voted for a Custom-House at Goolwa, but the erection of that building had been stayed pending this vote

Mr PEAKE asked if the police barracks were intended for the accommodation of the horses connected with the tramway, which were at present deplorably lodged As they were providing accommodation for policemen he thought they might at the same time look to these poor horses (Laughter)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was intended to erect the customary buildings Lock-ups would be attached to the buildings and some other little accommodations for the troopers, (Laughter)

Mr DUNN would oppose the motion principally from having read in the papers of that morning that there was a considerable falling off in the traffic upon the tramway He should have no objection to expend the amount proposed upon the Murray Mouth

Captain HART reminded the hon member that Goolwa was the port of the Murray Mouth

Mr HUGHES must oppose the vote One of the best Court-Houses in the country was at Port Elliot, and there was a tramway which was a great convenience to parties travelling There was a Court-House also on the other side of Strathalbyn, so that the neighbourhood possessed much greater facilities than were possessed by many others It had been stated by the hon the Commissioner of Public Works that a Local Court was now held at Goolwa, but he would like to know how many cases were tried there It was admitted that the traffic was falling off at Goolwa He did not agree with the hon member who said that Goolwa was the port of the Murray Mouth It was impossible to say where would ultimately be the port of the Murray Mouth It would be altogether premature to vote 1,000*l* for the purpose for which it was now asked, and he hoped the item would be postponed

Mr STRANGWAYS repeated that there was no police protection at Goolwa, and hoped, at all events, that the vote for the construction of Police-Barracks would be assented to

Mr REYNOLDS visited the district a short time ago, and had looked at the public buildings He came to the conclusion that the buildings now asked for were not required, but there was one building which he thought was much wanted The horses engaged on the tramway were miserably housed, in fact, it was disgraceful to the Government that they should be the owners of such a miserable place If the Government had brought forward a proposition to erect a proper stable, they would have done something for Goolwa A Court-House at Port Elliot was ample for Goolwa and Port Elliot too

The CHAIRMAN put the question, and the vote was negatived

On the motion of the TREASURER, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following day

STANDING ORDERS

The consideration of the report of the Committee upon the Standing Orders was made an order of the day for the following day, and the House adjourned at fifteen minutes past five o clock

---

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 17

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE

Mr GLYDE and Mr REYNOLDS presented petitions praying the House to assent to the proposed grant of £4,000 for the South Australian Institute

Mr REYNOLDS intimated that although he presented the petition, he held himself at perfect liberty to deal with the proposed vote of £4,000 when it came under discussion

KANGAROO ISLAND

Mr MILDRED moved—

"That there be laid upon the table of this House the information asked for on the 19th May, 1857, relating to Kangaroo Island"

It would be remembered that a considerable time since he asked for information relative to Kangaroo Island, and at the time he asked a subject of great interest to the country, relative to postal communication, was being discussed It was desirable that hon members should be thoroughly acquainted with the capabilities of the place as a rendezvous for ocean steamers Since then a subject of a still more interesting character in connection with our defences had been brought by the English Government under the notice of His Excellency the Governor and it was most desirable that attention should be directed to it It must be apparent to every one acquainted with the coast that the best defence would be to place upon Kangaroo Island means to prevent any foreign power from entering our gulfs He regretted that so much time had elapsed between the question being asked and the time when it was probable that the information would be obtained He was under the impression that 10 or 12 days would have been sufficient time to obtain the information which he required, but a period of more than 12 months had elapsed, and still the information had not been given He begged to ask the Commissioner of Public Works when it was probable that he would be able to give the information The hon member looked at the ministerial benches, which were empty, and remarked that none of the Ministry appeared to be in their places

Mr PEAKE asked if it was usual to proceed with business when none of the Ministry were present

At this moment the Commissioner of Public Works, who had left the House only a few moments, re-entered, and was immediately followed by the Treasurer

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the information asked for should be laid on the table of the House

The TREASURER could not allow this question to pass silently An address had been forwarded to the proper officer, the naval officer of the colony, directing him to prepare the necessary charts, and to complete a full survey of the points indicated, also a report as to the other points, such as the nature of the interior of Kangaroo Island He was in possession of the reports, but not of the charts, which were being lithographed, and he had delayed the presentation of the reports in order that he might present the charts with them He hoped in the course of a few weeks he should be enabled to do so

TRAMWAY FROM WILLUNGA

Mr MILDRED moved—"That there be laid upon the table of this House the report of the Surveyors on the line for a proposed tramway from the township of Willunga to the sea" It would be remembered that he had the honor of submitting a motion for the proposed tramway to the consideration of the House, and as he believed that surveys had been taken he was desirous that the report should be laid before the House

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it would perhaps meet the views of the hon member if he at once laid the report upon the table In doing so he would take the opportunity of remarking that his absence a short time previously arose from having been suddenly called from the House upon urgent business He was only absent for a few minutes, and it was not often that he was from his seat during the sittings of the House He begged to lay upon the table estimate of the receipts and expenditure of tramway from Willunga to Port Willunga, with plans and Surveyor s report

THE PORT ROAD

Captain HART in making the motion standing in his name, would call the attention of the House to the fact that the Central Road Board itself had on several occasions, stated that it was absolutely essential something should be done to the Port-road On the Supplementary Estimates he observed that the sum of £1000 had been put down for this work, but the amount was altogether so inadequate to the requirements of the road, that he begged to move the House go into Committee for the purpose of considering the motion standing in his name —

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief requesting him to place on the Supplementary Estimates for 1858, the further sum of £2,000, in addition to the £1,000 already placed thereon, for the repair of the Port Road."

The House having resolved itself into Committee, Captain HART said that the Central Road Board came to a resolution some time since, and laid down the principle that where a line of road was parallel to a line of railway they could not expend any public money upon it, but he would call the attention of the House to the fact that the Port road was in very many respects different from any other road in the colony, as three or four main lines of road came into it at various points There was the North-road, for instance between Alberton and the Port, and although the Central Road Board had made good the road so far as the North-road, it was impassable from there to the Port itself, and thus the portion which they had actually repaired was rendered valueless upon the principle that the strength of a cable was only equal to the weakest part He need not argue the matter in any long address to that House, as he was quite sure that throughout the length and breadth of the colony there had been more complaints relative to the Port-road than any other work which had been neglected, he was going to say, by the Central Road Board He would not go further into the question than to state that even now there was more traffic upon the road than upon nine-tenths of the main lines of road in the colony At the first shower the road was rendered literally impassable, and under such circumstances he begged to move that the sum of £1,000 placed on the Estimates for its repair be increased to £3,000

Mr COLE, in seconding the motion, hoped that the House would consider the merits of this question If the sum asked for this road during a previous session had been granted, there would have been no necessity for the present application The amount then asked for would have been found ample but since that period the road had become in a deplorable condition As it appeared from the correspondence relative to the railway, which had been laid on the table of the House, that the whole of the traffic upon the line had been granted to Fuller and Co, it would be fuller justice (a laugh) to other parties that the Port-road should be made available in order that the public might not be subjected to a monopoly by Fuller and Co (Laughter)

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS thought the House would bear him out in the statement that the act complained of in reference to the Port-road was not the act of the Central Road Board, but the deliberate act of that House He hoped the House would consider the question in connection with the other roads of the colony, and the numerous demands there were for public works of this nature Admitting the great importance of communication between the Port and Adelaide, he had yet to learn there was any necessity for keeping up this means of communication The one mode, he alluded to the railway, was the most perfect the colony could afford, and the main road, he would remark, was the widest in the colony If it were right in principle to vote the sum asked for, he contended that the hon mover had committed an error in not asking enough, for he had ascertained that it would take £10,000 to place the Port-road in repair (No, no) He repeated the statement He had ascertained from Mr Macaulay, one of the best engineers and most careful surveyors in connection with the Central Road Board, that it would cost the sum he had named Mr Macaulay had on several occasions been asked in reference to this matter and had invariably stated that the cost would be from £9,000 to £10,000 Another objection to the motion appeared to him to be that this would not be a final settlement of the question If the House were to vote a certain sum and hear no more of the Port-road, it would be a different thing, and he for one should feel disposed to consider the proposition but he hoped the House in considering this question would consider the whole question of roads The House had been asked to make a railway and maintain it, and having done so, they were now asked to make a metal-road running parallel with that railway and maintain it also It was obvious to him that if the present motion were carried, the sum voted would prove only a portion of a very much larger amount

Mr WARK should vote against the motion He considered that the Central Road Board had acted most wisely in coming to the resolution not to maintain any main lines of road running parallel with railways It was all very well for the Port people who had got the very best communication that could be made between the Port and Adelaide, to come forward and speak of the difficulties to which they were subjected in consequence of the state of the Port road, but as the Commissioner of Public Works had said, the whole question must be considered, and in what position were many of the residents of the interior placed with quagmires to go through, and every difficulty to overcome before they could get on a metalled road at all One reason which prompted him to vote against the motion was that if the sum were granted it would not be a final settlement of the matter, but it would merely be an instalment of a very much larger sum He quite agreed with the Commissioner of Public Works that a sum of £10,000 would be required to place the road in an efficient state of repair It appeared to him monstrous that after constructing a line of railway at enormous expense parties should come forward and ask the Government and that House to maintain a main line of road alongside the railway The resolution arrived at by the Central Road Board not to maintain such lines was he contended wise and just, and he wished the House would uphold them in it

Mr HUGHES differed altogether with the line of argument which had been pursued both by the last speaker and the Commissioner of Public Works The hon the Commissioner of Public Works had stated that a sum of £10,000 would be required to complete the work, and that the amount now asked for was merely an instalment of that sum, but he (Mr Hughes) did not believe that anything like the sum named would be required He was aware that Mr Macaulay had made some such statement as that which the hon gentleman had attributed to him, but it should be remembered that statement was made before the facilities which at present existed of delivering stone by railway at the various places at which it was required, and at a very low rate, existed (No, no) The hon gentleman laid great stress upon the argument that because a railway had been constructed, a main line of road should not be maintained, but so long as the Government professed to provide from the revenue for the wants of the colony, they were as much bound to attend to that road as to any other It would be unjust to ask the residents upon the line of road to pay the cost of its maintenance, when a considerable portion of the traffic belonged to the south of Adelaide It had been ascertained that such serious injury resulted from loading and unloading goods despatched by the railway that notwithstanding the construction of that railway a considerable portion of the traffic, indeed he might say, the traffic to a very great extent still went along the road It would actually depopulate the district if the inhabitants were compelled to keep the road in repair It was very well to say that the line of railway was parallel with the road, but that railway was not constructed so much for the purpose of connecting the Port with Adelaide as of connecting the Port with the distant interior It was not because the road happened to run parallel with the railway that the House should come to a resolution they would not maintain the road It was quite obvious that the road was required Any one could convince himself of this who would take the trouble to go down it, and not merely form his opinion from riding down in a first-class carriage, as probably the Commissioner of Public Works had done There had been no regular proposition made that roads parallel with railways should be utterly neglected by the Government simply because they were parallel He believed that the Central Road Board had determined, only on the previous day, to complete the main line, the Grand Junction-road, and he would ask was not that parallel with a railway, If that very road were made a great deal of additional traffic would come upon the Port-road He admitted that the question might be a difficult one, but it was a most unfair thing to leave the Port-road in the state in which it had been for several weeks past, and refuse it a fair share of justice Hon members had probably not had an opportunity lately of seeing the fearful state which the road was in, especially from the causeway to the Port It was an absolute mockery to call it a road He did not advocate the claims of any particular district, but the interests of the colony The traffic of the colony demanded that it should be put in repair If the maintenance of the road were to be thrown upon the district, let the Government metal it first, and, after placing it in a tolerable state of repair, allow the inhabitants to put such a toll upon it as would be sufficient to enable them to keep it in repair

Mr MACDERMOTT said, if the vote now asked for would be a final settlement of the question, he would be disposed to give it his favorable consideration, but it was clear to him that it would not be, and he considered it unwise that the Government should recognise the principle of maintaining main lines running parallel with railways To recognise such a principle would be almost equivalent to sanctioning two parallel lines of railway Already there was a vote upon the Estimates of £1,000 for this road, a sum which he should not oppose, thinking the Port-road was perhaps entitled to this sum in consequence of some branch roads coming into it. In its present form he must oppose the motion

Mr BAGOT begged to move an amendment, inserting after "Port-road," the words, "and then the road to be handed over by the Central Road Board to the District Councils through which it runs" That amendment, he thought, would carry out the views of the previous speaker If the hon mover of the motion would adopt this amendment he should be happy to give it his support, but if not he should feel bound to oppose the motion He thought it would be a wise principle to adopt, that where main lines of road ran parallel with railways they should be first put into something like repair, and then handed over to the District Councils of the districts in which they were situated

Mr REYNOLDS said that the course which he intended to take was that which he took when he was on the other side of the House His views had not at all altered with regard to the principle which he considered it the duty of the House to affirm He was opposed to the motion before the House, because, having gone to great expense in constructing a railway, he thought they were bound to do everything in their power to make it pay He did not see how the House could make any distinction between the Port road and the road to Gawler Town if they once recognised the principle of maintaining main lines which ran parallel with railways If the motion before the House were carried, in order to act fairly to all parts of the country, they would not only have to construct and maintain railways, but main lines of road also It was quite clear, however, that the country could not afford both He was quite sure that they would have to husband their resources, in order to do all in their power for the outlying districts He was sorry the hon member for Victoria was not in his place, to hear his views upon this point, and to advance his own Whether this were regarded as a financial question or not, he should feel bound to oppose the vote on principle A very large sum of money had been expended upon the construction of a railway, and now to maintain a line of road running parallel with it, appeared to him to be monstrous The hon member, Mr Hughes, had said that the railway had been constructed for the purpose of connecting the Port with the distant interior and not for the purpose of connecting the Port with Adelaide, but if it were so, what did they want with stations and station-men at Woodville, Alberton, Bowden, &c? Why not abolish them? (Hear, hear) It the hon member thought they could be dispensed with, no doubt a great saving could be effected, and the amount so saved might be devoted to the repair of the Port road He was glad that the argument had not been revived about the materials for the Gawler railway breaking up the Port-road, as he felt assured that argument would not hold water On the grounds he had stated, he felt bound to oppose the motion

Mr LINDSAY, though opposed to the hon member who had last spoken, was still actuated entirely by principle Whilst the present system was in force, he could not see why the Port-road should not have its share, but he admitted his belief that the system was bad, and that the sooner they had a new Road Act the better So long as the system lasted, he certainly considered that the Port-road should have a fair share expended upon it There were two roads to Port Adelaide, and he could not help thinking the one to the North Arm, which was the best part of the harbour would have been sufficient, but there was a large population at the South Australian Company's Port, and their interests should be considered With regard to the proposition to hand the roads over to the District Councils, that might be all very well and it might be expedient to hand over many other roads besides the Port but there was a peculiarity about the Port-road as its direction could not be altered, whilst it might be found very desirable to alter the direction of other roads The Port road was as well where it was as though it were more direct He should support the motion, and had made the explanation which he had because he thought his vote on this occasion might be considered inconsistent with votes which he had previously given

Mr SCAMMELL said with regard to the vexed question of the Port-road, it would be in the recollection of hon members that during the discussion upon the question last year, or at the commencement of the present one, he had in his possession a communication which he exhibited, from Mr Macaulay, the Surveyor of the Central Road Board, to the effect that £3,600 would be an ample amount to repair the Port-road He called the attention of the House to the statement which had been made by the Commissioner of Public Works, a statement which had been made, he did not hesitate to say, to prevent the vote of the House that day, and a statement which had no foundation in fact

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS asked if this language was quite Parliamentary?

The SPEAKER said the hon member was not in order in stating that another hon member had made a statement knowing it to have no foundation in fact

Mr SCAMMELL had no wish to make use of any language offensive to any member of that House, still less to the Commissioner of Public Works, but he believed the statement which had been made by the hon gentleman had been made for the purpose of preventing the vote now asked for It was monstrous to say that £10 000 would be required for the purpose of completing the road, when the Central Road Board, notwithstanding their monstrously extravagant system of expenditure, made £2,900 do half the road If £2,900 were sufficient to do half the road, why should the Commissioner of Public Works come forward and say, that £10,000 would be required to do the other half? He believed this was so monstrous a fallacy, that hon members would see through it, and that it had been made for no other purpose than to prevent the vote being carried He hoped, however, that it would have no such effect He published a letter in the Register, which he had received from Mr Macaulay, stating that £3,600 would be sufficient He presumed that this calculation was based upon the scale of charges for cartage and stone that had been paid by the Central Road Board for the first half of the work The stone which had been laid on by the Central Road Board cost 15s a yard, if not more, but there was nearly half a mile of the road which was within the boundary of the Port Corporation and under the control of that body That portion had got into a state nearly as bad, or quite, as the other portions, but under the management of the Corporation the metal was laid upon the road at a cost of only 6s 9d per yard That was a statement which parties belonging to the Corporation were prepared to vouch for The portion repaired or made by the Corporation cost 6s 9d per yard, that undertaken by the Central Road Board cost 15s per yard, and in both cases the stone was laid down broken What difference would that make in the sum total which would be required? He unfortunately, was occasionally under the necessity of using the Port-road and could conscientiously state that he never passed along it on horseback or in a wheeled vehicle without trembling for the insurance office in which his life was insured (Laughter) Having got down to the Port, fortunately without breaking a spring or his horse's knees, he went on to a road recently made by the Central Road Board at great expense, upon which there was no traffic, and when he got to the end he could go no further He was merely out for fresh air and resolved to follow the road up to see where it led to He did follow it up, driving along a beautiful road as smooth as the floor of that House, with an embankment made with shells He began to think that His Excellency had been getting a marine residence built of which he had heard nothing, the whole line was so like a gentleman's drive He drove on a long distance and at last found that it led nowhere (Laughter) There was no traffic, no population at the extremity The tracks indicated that the only carts which had ever passed over it had been those engaged in carting shells from the beach to ornament the embankment Upon consulting the Estimates he found an explanation of this, as it appeared that upwards of 8,000*l* had been expended upon the North Arm-road, and a further sum was asked for With reference to those items they suggested the question, what rule governed the House in the expenditure of money upon roads The revenue was derived from the people, and if main roads were not to be kept up where an abundant population existed and where the exigencies of commerce and traffic required they should be kept up, where should main roads be made at all? If where there was a considerable population and a township the main line of road was to be obliterated, where were main lines to be maintained? The principle was clearly not good which formed a main line where there was no population and no traffic, and sought to obliterate one which had been formed at great expense, where there was great traffic, and a moderate expenditure only was required to keep it in repair To recur to that portion which had been repaired by the Port Corporation, he was informed that up to the time the Central Road Board knocked off two men, who were employed at the cost of about £4 a week in filling up the holes in the causeway, it remained in a good state of repair, but it was now dangerous to life and limb to pass over it Some time ago an engineer in the employment of the Central Road Board stated that £14,000 would be required to place the road in a good state of repair, but this statement and the statement which had been made that day, that £10,000 would be required, he believed had been made merely for the purpose of preventing the vote of the House that day As regarded the principle which was involved, if the Central Road Board had affirmed the principle that main lines running parallel with railways should not be maintained, the Commissioner of Public Works, as a member of that Board, should have objected to the expenditure of a single farthing Yet £1 000 had actually been placed upon the Estimates Why should £1,000 be asked for, but that the Central Road Board found that they had passed an impracticable resolution Although that resolution had been tacitly assented to by the House, it had received no support by action and until it had, no resolution of the kind could be carried out Some hon members had said that if this were a final settlement of the question, they might be disposed to support it, but how could the question be finally settled until the Government introduced an amended Road Act It was for the Government to take the initiative, and by passing such a bill remove all difficulty He particularly wished to impress upon the House that the portion of the road which had been formed by the Port Corporation had cost less than half the amount which that portion had had cost which had been undertaken by the Central Road Board He believed that a road could be supported in several ways The public feeling, perhaps, was generally in favor of tolls, but it would be unfair to charge a toll upon a road in such a state as the Port-road was at present He should like to have been the mover of the resolution, as he should then have had an opportunity of replying to remarks which would no doubt be made by various speakers, but he begged the House to remember what he had stated in reference to Mr Macaulay's estimate for the road which he had had in his possession, and which was only £3,600

The TREASURER thought the remark of the last speaker in reference to being more concerned for the interests of an insurance company than for his own life, afforded an instance of the weight which should be attached to the majority of his statements In reference to the alleged statement of Mr Macaulay, which differed so widely from that of the Commissioner of Public Works it was clear to him that some facts or conditions must have been withheld In the absence of those facts he should assume that the statement of the Commissioner of Public Works was entitled to at least as much reliance as that of the hon gentleman who had just sat down He could not see any distinction in principle between maintaining the Port-road and the Gawler-road If they maintained the one they must maintain the other It had been said that the traffic on the Port-road was not that of the district, and consequently that it was most unfair the district should suffer, but the same remark would apply to many, and indeed almost all other roads Did not the District Councils make roads for the traffic of other districts to pass through? The Government, in this instance, had introduced a special vote upon what he held was a great and true principle, namely, that they would contribute £1,000 towards the Port-road if the inhabitants could contribute an equal amount, and till an Act passed the Legislature enabling them to transfer the management of the road, they would take charge of it. It was only the inhabitants of the frontages who had occasion to use the road. Occasionally a medical gentleman might have occasion to travel the road after nightfall. (Oh, oh.) With the facilities which the District Council of Hindmarsh appeared to possess, and the economical manner in which it had been stated they were enabled to complete works, they would probably be enabled to complete the road with the amount which the Government proposed to place at their disposal.

Mr HAWKER felt bound to oppose the motion though admitting that the hon. member for West Torrens had put a very fair case before the House. He should have been happy to support the motion if there had been no railway to the Port; but £200,000 having been expended upon that work, it was too much to ask the House for this additional sum for the old Port-road. An enormous number of roads were required for the country districts. Agriculture was the mainstay of the colony, and it was absolutely essential that roads in the country districts should be formed to enable the agriculturists to bring their produce to market. He opposed the vote upon the same principle that he should feel bound to oppose many others—not because the works contemplated were not desirable, but because the money was more urgently required for the construction of works in the country districts.

Mr BURFORD had gathered from the remarks of some of the previous speakers that this was to be regarded as an annual vote. ("No, no.") He could not agree with spending money upon main lines running parallel with railways. During last session the House tacitly adopted that principle. With respect to tolls, there again a principle was involved, and he felt assured that the greater portion of the public were opposed to such a system, therefore it was not likely that the House would sanction it. If there were any exception to the general rule it certainly was in the case of the Port-road. He did not consider that the Gawler Town road, or any other road was a parallel case. If an exception were to be made he should be in favor of the amendment which had been proposed in reference to the Port-road, but certainly not in any other instance in which roads ran parallel to railways.

Mr DUNN said it was perfectly understood that when the railway was in working order there was no more money to be spent on the roads. An hon. member mentioned that life and limb were in danger on the Port-road. He was reading the paper that morning, and saw that on a road on which the Central Road Board had spent a large sum of money a cart had capsized in the middle of it, and a poor woman consequently killed. Money had been diverted from the interior of the country and had been spent somewhere else. He considered it objectionable to apply so much money in the neighbourhood of the town, while country districts were suffering from want of roads. Within a trifle it required nearly all the rates collected in two roads districts to maintain one line of road—not to make the road, but purely to keep it in repair for other districts to pass over. He should oppose the motion.

Mr STRANGWAYS must oppose the motion, for if that was passed applications of a similar kind would be made from all parts of the colony. The question of roads ought to be considered as a whole, and not merely as a part. A good deal had been said by those who intended to vote against the motion on the ground that it was unnecessary to have a road parallel with a railroad. He could not go with that idea, for the experience of all countries proved that macadamised roads could not be dispensed with. He should oppose the motion, for he thought public works, repairs, and every thing connected with the roads, ought to be considered as a whole, and not in detached parts.

Mr BARROW questioned the assertion that we ought not to construct lines of road parallel to lines of railway. He thought, however, assuming it as a rule that the Port was an exception to that rule, that it would not be difficult to shew that it was an exception. The Treasurer had shewn that the traffic of other districts passed on the Port-road. The same might be said of other districts. But to what extent was that argument to be carried? The outside district had not, of course, to make a road for any other district to pass over, as there was no district beyond it. The district next to the outside would be traversed by the outside district only. The next but one to the outside would have the traffic of the two outside districts in addition to its own, and so on until you arrive at the central one, which would have the concentrated traffic of all the districts in the colony passing over its roads. With regard to handing over that road to the District Councils, he (Mr Barrow) could not forget that the Commissioner of Public Works had just told the House that the road would cost 10,000*l* to repair it. Now to make a present of that road to the District Councils would be similar to the present of the white elephant, of which they had heard so much out of doors—it would be a ruinous gift. The District Council of Hindmarsh collected £900 a-year in rates and in the year 1857 about £976. How was it possible with that amount of rates to maintain that road in repair? And with regard to a voluntary rate, he doubted whether a voluntary rate would result in raising half as much. Suppose the amendment carried, and the road were handed over to the District Councils to whom would they hand over the Port-road? It was a mistake to suppose that the Port-road, in its entire length, ran within the boundaries of District Councils. A great portion of it would neither come within the limits of Corporation or Council, it was, in fact, in no man's land, and therefore, unless special provision was made for maintaining it in repair, it could not be kept in order, because it belonged to the Central Road Board, or to no one. He thought, however, that it was most unreasonable that the Central Road Board should be expected, as a rule, to keep roads in repair, as well as make them. He must also differ from hon. members who thought that the construction of a railway superseded, in all cases, the necessity of a common road. The Port-road was the first road that a stranger saw as he entered the colony, and it would be a disgrace to them all if that road were to be left to be a bog-hole in winter, and a dust-hole in summer. A stranger would form but a poor idea of the colony. He would say, let the railway stand on its merits or fall by its demerits as the case might be (hear, hear), but do not shut up the Port-road in order to force the traffic upon the railway. The House had been told when Government announced that they intended to carry a line of railway in a certain direction, that they ought to keep faith with the public. Ought not the Government to keep faith with the public in regard to the Port-road, and take care that that road should not become impassable? The member for West Torrens had graphically told the House of the perils of travelling on that road, and during that description, he (Mr Barrow) could not help thinking that if that hon. member felt fear on such occasions, how much more reason had other persons, for if such an accident did unfortunately happen, medical assistance would not be so near to most of them as to him. (Laughter.) He certainly thought the road ought to be once more repaired by the Government and that special provision ought to be made for its subsequent maintenance out of other funds. He must also express a hope that in voting for public works, those distinctions between town and country would be avoided, and that the best might be done for both. He was sure that when country items were brought forward he should support them, but he thought while we ought not to overlook the claims of the country, we must not neglect the roads nearest the centre. He would vote for the motion with the distinct understanding that no further sum of money should be asked for to repair the Port-road.

Mr MCELLISTER would oppose the motion, as he thought that it would be unfair to outlying districts to spend so much near town.

Mr PEAKE said that the outer districts must of necessity travel over roads made by the more central districts, and on whom would the expense fall but on the poor District Councils. The hon. gentleman (Mr Barrow) said he would vote a sum of money because it was necessary that the Port-road should be kept in repair having now been declared a main road. But that line was made at a large outlay, alongside of one of the most perfect roads that could be made. He thought it would be most improvident to vote any money for the purpose until the Executive and the House had come to some sort of conclusion as to what course ought to be pursued. In regard to the observation that, permitting the Port-road to go out of repair, for want of a vote of that House, would be a breach of faith, he would say, that the public had no right to grumble in that case, because they had a perfect road on the railway, and keeping that in repair, they were not bound to maintain the less perfect one. Suppose by the vote of that House the road was put in repair, what then? What were they to do then? If the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) with his clear perception, could not point out a course, what were they to do? A beautiful description had been given of a branch from the Port-road leading Heaven knew where. The inhabitants of Hindmarsh were thus doubly blessed, for they had the means both of traffic and pleasure; but he would not neglect the country for the sake of the Port. He would vote against the motion.

Mr NEALES said the last speaker wondered when their wants would cease; for his part he hoped that while the port remained a port they would never cease, as the commerce of the colony increased, so would the necessity increase to keep up the Port-road. They had a printed document from the Surveyor General as to what money was necessary to complete the road. Three thousand pounds was all that was necessary to repair the road. They were not about to ask £10,000 for peculiar purposes. He was sorry to say the returns of the Railway were decreasing, but they had it and must make the best of it. He would not, however, like to see such an expensive establishment kept up merely because we had a railroad, if the traffic would not pay; and he would not agree to shut up the Port-road in order to make the railway profitable. He thought the Port-road a special case, and that it should be regarded by the Government, but he would not go for keeping it in repair in perpetuity. He thought if the Government were inclined to put that road into the hands of trustees, a company could be formed in London who would engage to carry it on at one quarter the present cost. Faith had not been kept with the Port-road people, for the railway was not a parallel line. He considered that the beautiful road which had been spoken of was a most unnecessary one. 20,000*l* had been spent on it, and it would not return 2d. in 50 years. It was impossible for the railway to do the work of the Port road.

He was astonished to find the member for Victoria (Mr Hawker) voting against the motion, for it was quite a country question, and as a country question, he (Mr Neales) looked at it If the Government found the railway would not pay, the best way was to make the Port-road a tramway and see if the traffic could not be carried on at one-third of the present cost Other roads might as had been said, make similar demands but no other road had such just claims

Mr Hart asked whether, if the railway had been constructed by a private company, the Port-road would have been repaired? When first it was projected, it was projected by a private company Would the House have neglected that road then? (No) He thought if not then it was not fair that the district should suffer because a powerful Government had done that which individuals were otherwise prepared to have done It was neither a Port question nor a district question Several lines of road from the south ran into the Port-road, and bridges had been erected at considerable expense to facilitate the traffic, which could not all be carried by rail There were not stations nor facilities afforded for that There was no goods traffic from Woodville and Alberton, and from Bowden only at stated times Several agricultural districts in the south were injured by having to go round, in consequence of the bad state of the roads, in order to get their goods upon the line And the north was equally interested Three or four lines from the north came into the Port-road If the Port road passed into the hands of Commissioners appointed by those districts, they would put on a tramway which would completely shut up the Port-road The traffic could now be done by bullock drays and carters, who could compete with the railway, and with nominal power on a tramway, it would be done at half the cost He would be willing to adopt the amendment of the hon member, that the district would not require to call upon the House again, but this was an exceptional case, and he thought the road ought to be put in perfect repair before handing it over to the District Councils

The Commissioner of Public Works stated that he had sent up to the Road Board Office, and had received information that Mr Macaulay had mentioned at a Board meeting, that a sum of 10,000*l* was necessary for repairing the Port-road He had not made a written statement

Mr Andrews could nearly endorse the opinions of the last two members who had spoken Railways, he thought, might be useful for transporting troops to the place where they were wanted in case of an attack by an enemy, but since it was possible an enemy might have possession of them before resistance could be made, roads were necessary for our defence, as by them only could cannon and material be, under such circumstances, conveyed

Mr Glyde, before the question was put, asked the Commissioner of Public Works if means were provided for goods traffic, to be taken on the railway at Woodville Station

The Commissioner of Public Works—There are

Captain Hart could say most expressly there were not

On the amendment being put, the House divided, when there appeared —

Ayes, 13—Messrs Andrews, Barrow Bagot Burford, Cole, Glyde, Hallett, Harvey, Hughes, Lindsay, Neales, Scammel, and Hart, (teller)

Noes 17 —Dutton, Finniss Duffield, Dunn, Hawker, Hay, McDermott, McEllister, Mildred, Milne, Peake, Reynolds, Strangways, Townsend, Waterhouse, Young, and Blyth (teller)

The amendment was therefore lost

The motion was then put and negatived without a division

The House resumed

The Speaker reported progress

MR SOLOMON'S RETURN

The Speaker announced that he had received a return of the writ announcing the election of Mr Solomon as member for the City of Adelaide

IMPOUNDING ACT

The Commissioner of Crown Lands stated that he had received from various parties who had had experience in the working of the Impounding Acts, valuable suggestions which had induced him to ask leave to withdraw the Bill then before the House, and to substitute another which he would then lay upon the table for the consideration of hon members He would ask another week before they took it into consideration He moved the Bill be read a first time and printed

MR BABBAGE

Mr Peake moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the exigencies of the public service do not require a second head of the Survey Department of this province, and that it be an instruction of this House to recall Mr Babbage from his northern explorations, since it appears that gentleman is virtually drawing his salary as chief of a surveying party, for which he was not equipped or employed "

He felt some embarrassment in going further into that motion, lest he should be thought to reflect on Mr Babbage, and because it appeared to attach some little blame to the Commissioner of Crown Lands A great sum of money had been expended, and it did not appear to him that the exploring party had proceeded above 70 or 80 miles from Port Augusta towards the north He gathered his ideas from the despatches The country paid £800 a year to the Surveyor-General, and he (Mr Peake) thought it sufficient It appeared to him that if that gentleman's staff was not sufficient it could be increased as the surveys to be undertaken required, and therefore another Surveyor-General was not wanted at £1,000 a year He regretted to bring the charges forward that he was making, but the credit of the colony required it It appeared from papers laid on the table that Mr Gregory, who had just returned, had been despatched to assist Mr Babbage, to retrieve the fortune of the day, but the survey was in a regular mess There was something very unsatisfactory in the whole thing, and he did not see any other way to act than to bring the whole party back again

Mr Strangways moved as an amendment—

"That in the opinion of this House the despatch addressed by the Hon Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration to Mr Babbage is highly unsatisfactory, inasmuch as the said despatch, whilst recognizing the proof of incapacity exhibited by that gentleman as leader of the exploring party, omits to recall him from that responsible position "

He would refer to the correspondence before the House which had been laid on the table, particularly to Council Paper 25 The paper referred to was Mr Babbage's offer to the Government to conduct the exploring party He (Mr Strangways) thought it, in plain English, an offer on the part of Mr Babbage, while a member of that House, to sell himself to the Government He would also refer to the acceptance of Mr Babbage's services as contained in the reply of the Commissioner of Crown Lands He (Mr Strangways), considered that, in plain English, an admission of the willingness of the Commissioner of Crown Lands to purchase Mr Babbage, if he could obtain money to do so The circumstances fully considered were creditable neither to Mr Babbage nor to the Government In reference to the instructions given to Mr Babbage, he could not say that he had deviated from them, but he thought there was no reason to suppose even now that there would not be a repetition of the same conduct in Mr Babbage which the Government had condemned, and the fact of sending Mr Gregory, who had been a successful explorer in another district, must result in a quarrel between them He thought the best course would be to recall Mr Babbage, and perhaps Major Warburton, who had long experience, might be entrusted with the necessary dispatches and with such instructions as the Government might deem necessary for further proceedings

Mr Neales could not but remark how very brave people generally were when the objects of attack were distant from them He thought neither the motion nor the amendment would have been introduced into the House had Mr Babbage been present (Cries of "Oh, oh") He thought it an unfair proceeding to condemn a person who had not opportunity of reply, and though they condemned Mr Babbage as leader of the party, he had yet to learn where they could find a better As for Mr Gregory, they did not know him yet He had never been entrusted with a party, and there was a difference between being a leader and the second in command Mr Babbage ought to have dared public censure at the beginning He should not have left Port Augusta till the proper season had arrived It was not fair to come to that House with an ex parte statement, and try to get Mr Babbage suspended He (Mr Neales) had never lauded him as some had done, but he was not going to kick him because he had not, at present, succeeded It was ungenerous to indulge in such attacks, Babbage had been where poor Coulthard perished, and now that he had found permanent water —(No no) Well, Mr Burt and Mr Swinden said it was ("No, no," from Commissioner of Crown Lands) He hoped the House would not pass such a censure on an absentee If he did not succeed in a month or two he ought to be recalled, and then they might hear his explanation

Mr Hughes had listened with much attention to the remarks which had been made, and he agreed it was not right to attack an absent man, although he thought there was no occasion for some of the observations that had been offered He did not think the member for Encounter Bay altogether wrong, but considered the discussion justifiable, because the first communication from Mr Babbage was on the 17th October Sums were placed on the Estimates on the 3rd December and Mr Babbage went off on the 17th December He (Mr Hughes) considered the Government were not altogether free from blame He thought Mr Babbage had a fair case from the tenor of his instructions As for the expenses of the expedition, it was impossible to ascertain what that was from the papers before the House Paper 36 offered no explanations, neither stating the number of men employed, nor their salaries He thought Mr Babbage gave indications of unfitness for the conduct of the expedition before starting, and he (Mr Hughes) concluded, therefore, that there must have been some motive, which had not been expressed on the part of the Government, when they entrusted him with it Ten fitter men could have been found, and if the Government had asked for tenders for transporting him (Mr Babbage) a reasonable distance for a given sum 500*l* would have transported him 20 times the distance yet gone He had never been 80 miles from Thompson's station

There was no hitherto unknown interior into which he had penetrated He had shown industry in one respect—in that of writing despatches It really was dreadful to go through them, when there was so little wheat after sifting away the chaff There could be no doubt that either from want of experience, or from want of previous training, Mr Babbage was not adapted for the office of leader and it was, therefore, an error to continue him in command Let the Government place it in the hands of a better man A person of the name of Parry laid before the Government an account of discoveries he had made, and at an expense which was a mere bagatelle compared with the costs of Mr Babbage's expedition—he meant compared with what was known to have been spent—for they were in the dark concerning the actual cost He must say he (Mr Hughes) looked over the last despatches with regret There could be but one feeling with regard to the miserable results of that expedition, to which not only the inhabitants of this colony, but those of the neighboring colonies and of England looked forward to with such interest He thought the House had shown great forbearance with the Government in the matter and he considered it their duty to stop any further waste of public money He thought there were good grounds for that The Commissioner of Crown Lands sent certain instructions to Mr Babbage with reference to Mr Gregory, and Mr Babbage had the coolness to say he disapproved of those instructions, and it was probable that Mr Gregory might soon be sent back to town if Mr Babbage continued in command of the expedition Mr Babbage could not complain of the comments made on his conduct, for he was a public man and they were not attacks on his private character His public conduct was public property, and hon members were justified in passing unbiassed opinions on that conduct He (Mr Hughes) thought the Government deserved censure in the matter, and that Mr Babbage would come out fully with regard to those instructions He (Mr Hughes) must say that had the Government laid their hands on the first man they met with for conducting the expedition, they might have done far better, but they could not have done worse than they had done

Mr Hawker, as a member who had some little experience of the bush, might not be considered presumptuous in speaking on this subject He agreed with much that had been said by the hon member for the Port, but not with all Neither could he support the motion of the hon member Mr Peake, for in such a form it would hardly meet the case Neither could he support the motion of the hon member for Moreton Bay (Mr Strangways), because he did not hold that any blame attached to the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands (Mr Dutton), such as was sought to be cast upon him by the contingent motion The fault was that, when the House moved an amount for a north-west exploration, it was the wish, not only of the House, but of the citizens of Adelaide, that Mr Babbage should take charge of that expedition He (Mr Hawker) from his own knowledge of the country and of Mr Babbage did not think that gentleman the best person for the post, but the general opinion was such ("No, no") He (Mr Hawker) said it was the opinion, and if Mr Babbage had been successful no blame would be attached to the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands for appointing that gentleman, and it was not fair now to censure him for having yielded to the opinion of the public as to the instructions given to Mr Babbage, although there was a little vagueness in one of them, still a person going to explore the north-west interior of the continent should never think of going to the south-west into a country which had been already explored and actually south of the parallel of Port Augusta No practical bushman would make such a mistake, and it was useless to say that in this he was misled by his instructions He (Mr Hawker) only judged Mr Babbage from his own writings, and would be the last to attack an absent man, but when certain events were recorded in Mr Babbage's own handwriting, he (Mr Hawker) like the rest of the public, could not but form his own opinion If he said he was disappointed at the results of the expedition, it would not be true, though he did not think it would have been quite so unsatisfactory As far as personal courage and perseverance went he believed that Mr Babbage was as well qualified as any man in the colony, but he was deficient in judgment In this respect we could not have a better man than Mr Gregory He (Mr Hawker) had spent some time with that gentleman, and there was a calm courage and deliberation about him which constituted the most valuable qualities of an explorer Mr Babbage might have mistaken his own powers and thought that he was competent to take charge of an exploring party, but there could be no doubt now that he was not qualified for that purpose Even the speech he made previous to starting was sufficient to show that, although able to go into matters of detail, he was not capable of undertaking anything on a great scale, and he (Mr Hawker) believed he had expended his energies upon details, and mistaken the object for which he was sent out by the House As regarded the expenditure, when an expedition was voted, hon members and the public generally expressed a wish to explore the colony, and for this purpose it was impossible to put down a fixed sum as would be done for other objects, but there was one matter on which the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands consulted him (Mr Hawker), namely, as to the sending out of the packhorses with the view of giving Mr Babbage an opportunity of regaining any credit he might have lost by being unable to penetrate the interior with his drays He (Mr Hawker) said he would give Mr Babbage every chance of recovering his reputation, and that he would vote in the House for the money required for the additional party Had Mr Babbage carried out the spirit of his instructions Mr Gregory and his packhorses would have been of the greatest assistance, for they might have enabled the party to penetrate a hundred miles further, even though it were a flying visit into the interior But when Mr Gregory got up he found that Mr Babbage had been a long time away from the camp and the party were getting alarmed about him, having probably found out what all bushmen know before, that Mr Babbage could not travel even a short distance in the bush without losing himself In consequence of this everything seemed to be now at cross purposes, and no doubt Mr Gregory had since been pursuing Mr Babbage's tracks to see if he could find him The House and the public would be wasting money if they kept the party out any longer The best of the season was already lost, and he was not arrogating too much to himself in asserting that in October the northern country would be drier than the country around Adelaide in January He did not think Mr Babbage a fit person to send out on a chance of discovering anything, but if the geography of the country allowed Mr Gregory to make a flying run, with strict instructions to come back before the water failed he might accomplish something He (Mr Hawker) could not blame the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands or the Government, because as they had done what they were called upon by the public to do, the public must bear the blame, as well as the Ministry

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the House could easily understand that no one could regret more than he did the unfortunate results hitherto shown for the large outlay of money on this expedition He regretted it on many grounds, first, for Mr Babbage's sake, because he would much rather see that gentleman come back crowned with laurels after making important discoveries, and then he could not forget himself, because he had incurred a very considerable amount of responsibility in carrying out the details of the expedition, and he now saw that he was to be included in a sort of vote of censure arising from the expedition, the arrangements of which had been entrusted to him He hoped the House would take a just view of the case and not pass a vote of censure upon him which he had not merited He hoped hon members would consider that he had taken every imaginable pains for the purpose of affording Mr Babbage the means of making his exploration successful, and that if the exploration was not successful there was no reason why the censure of the House should fall upon him He would remind hon members that during last year a good deal of interest had been excited in the colony by the valuable discoveries made near Lake Torrens, and that previously to that Mr Babbage had been out and had displayed considerable energy and perseverance in following up the Blanchewater River, and in making discoveries in a country not previously known The choice of Mr Babbage as a leader was made on account of the energy he had shown in these explorations in the same neighborhood, coupled with the fact of his being a scientific man He maintained that these circumstances fully justified the Government in recommending that gentleman for the appointment, The appointment met with the approval not only of the House, but with, he might almost say the unanimous approval of the public If there was censure expressed on any one at that time, it was on him (the Commissioner of Crown Lands), because it was thought the party was not large enough A few weeks before Mr Babbage left complaints were made that he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) was allowing that gentleman to go into the interior with a party not sufficiently large enough to attain his object, but experience proved satisfactorily to his mind that the party was sufficiently large A successful party arrived here from Moreton Bay, through a most arid and impracticable country, which party was not larger than that of Mr Babbage, and that was a fact which not alone justified him, but which must likewise prevail with the House and the country at large He would not seriously answer the remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay about Mr Babbage having sold himself to the Government, and the Government having bought Mr Babbage (Laughter) This could not have been meant seriously but as the hon member had a good deal of fun in his disposition, he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had no objection to the hon member enlivening the debates with a little of it He would therefore not take these remarks seriously, nor he was sure would the House do so As to the instructions, he submitted that they would not bear the construction that Mr Babbage was to waste time by following the course which he had pursued, and which had led to such unfortunate results It was thought that as the expedition could not travel with any great quickness that it would be well, whilst going into the interior, that a portion of the party might be well employed in surveying and mapping out the country The despatches did not for a moment contemplate that Mr Babbage was to carry his surveys to the south, but pursue them as far as circumstances would permit northwards But would any hon gentleman dream of his following Lake Gairdner to the south and into a country which we knew all about before, and then proceeding to Lake Gillies, the object of which, he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) could never understand, and next going to Port Augusta. As to his going down to Lake Gairdner he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) should have tried to put the best construction upon that movement, but as to his going to Lake Gillies and Port Augusta and spending a week there, he was still without any explanation of that proceeding, though he had had despatches of later date than Mr Babbage's arrival at Port Augusta. He thought these circumstances sufficiently warranted him in writing the despatch which he had sent, censuring Mr Babbage for the manner in which he was performing his duty. The instructions could not have been laid before the House last session, as they were not ready prior to the prorogation, but they were published immediately after being sent to Mr Babbage and he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had never heard any objections raised against them until that day. He had never heard it said that they did not embody the object of the expedition, as it had been agreed upon last session. The very fact of his having taken upon himself the responsibility of incurring the additional outlay of sending up Mr Gregory and his horses showed how anxious he was that Mr Babbage should have every fair play. He did so thinking that they would not only enable Mr Babbage to accomplish something useful and beneficial to the country, but that for himself he might gain laurels and make a name for his expedition. He had shown in every possible way friendly feelings towards Mr Babbage, and he sincerely regretted that his efforts had been rendered nugatory by conduct which under the most favorable construction he must call injudicious. It might be said that Mr Gregory was not justified in breaking up the party, but he trusted hon members would recollect how Mr Gregory was circumstanced. In the first place he had great experience, for it was a great mistake to think he was a "new chum" explorer. He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had made himself acquainted with all Mr Gregory's qualifications and had ascertained that he had not done the experience of his last journey from Moreton Bay but he had also large experience in West Australia where the country was similar to that described in the despatches of Mr Babbage, a country of salt lake and sand and scrub of the identical nature of the country in which he now was. He was also convinced that Mr Gregory was a man upon whose judgment he could rely in proceeding through a difficult country, because he and his brother nearly lost their lives amongst the salt lakes of Western Australia, and that circumstance had made him cautious, so that whilst he would do all in his power to advance the expedition, he would not allow the party entrusted to him to rush into too great dangers. When Mr Gregory arrived at the camp on the Elizabeth he found Mr Babbage absent. What should he do? His first idea was to find a permanent waterhole, for which he proposed to examine Lake Campbell, but he ascertained from the other members of the party that considerable anxiety and alarm was felt on account of Mr Babbage's absence. There was at present in Adelaide a person who was formerly the second in command, a man named Harris, and he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) spent all that morning examining him on all points connected with this question. From the information thus obtained he could see nothing to blame in the course which Mr Gregory adopted. If Mr Babbage had been at the camp he would not have been justified in acting so, but as he was not all the responsibility fell on Mr Gregory. He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had asked Harris for information as to the sending back the 12 horses, about which subject Mr Gregory's letter did not contain clear information. Mr Gregory was not a man given to writing long despatches, he (Mr Gregory) had told him before starting, that he must not expect long letters from him, so he did not wonder at his letter being less explicit than might have been desired. Harris's answer to that question, which was taken down in writing was, that Mr Gregory thought the season was too far advanced for slow travelling by means of drays, and that as the water in the Elizabeth was not considered permanent by Mr Gregory, (which opinion was confirmed by Harris), he thought that all that could be done at this season was to make a rapid examination of the country by means of packhorses. That, as Mr Gregory considered the party would have to retreat to the settled districts before the full heat of the summer set in, he thought it best to send back the superfluous drays, and the most valuable of the draught horses, (which were not suited for rapid movements carrying packs), and so place them in safety. He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) considered therefore that Mr Gregory was justified in taking that step in the absence of the leader of the party, who had then been gone 27 days, having taken provisions for only 14 days. Mr Gregory on the day after writing his official despatch, wrote him a private note, stating that he had given up his intention of proceeding to Lake Campbell, and was going to search for Mr Babbage, if he did not return by the 3rd September, fearing that some accident had happened to him and Warriner. It was, therefore, a great pity that Mr Babbage was not within reach of his camp when Mr Gregory arrived, as through his long absence the whole exploration had been disorganised.

Mr HUGHES asked whether Harris had informed Mr Babbage at Mount Remarkable, of that reason for sending back the horses.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he had given the exact answer. He took down in Harris's own words the answers and they were signed by Harris himself. The first question now was as to the permanency of the fresh water for, if it was not permanent, it would be madness to allow the party to remain out in the summer, and the weight of evidence was that the water could not be relied on. True, Mr Babbage spoke of having heard from the blacks of water to the north, but the Government had no evidence of such being the case. Instead of coming southwards, Mr Babbage would have been more usefully employed if he had gone farther north and visited Lake Campbell, which he did not do, or proceeded in search of the waters respecting which he got information from the blacks, and this also he neglected to do. On such a rigmarole statement as was to be derived from a blackfellow, which neither Mr Babbage or any one else could understand, were they to risk the safety of the party in a country where they were not sure of having even one permanent waterhole to fall back upon. Between the Elizabeth and Thompson's there was not one drop of water—nothing but 100 miles of sand and scrub. Even now, at the very best time of the year, Mr Gregory did not find a drop of permanent water going up, nor did Mr Harris in coming down, so that even if the party got back to the Elizabeth in the full summer heat in crossing this 100 miles the whole of them might be lost. As to the permanence of the water, by measurement and by calculating the evaporation, it might be judged whether it would last for a particular time. He thought Mr Gregory was as well, if not better, capable of judging as Mr Babbage on the subject, and Mr Gregory said the water was not permanent. As to the statement of Messrs Burtt and Swindon taking up cattle, that was not the case. Harris said that at one time Mr Swindon said he would take up cattle, but on meeting Harris a few days since, and ascertaining the state of the water, he came to the conclusion that he would not do so. The hon gentleman concluded by announcing that it was the intention of the Government to recall Mr Babbage at once.

Mr HART was rather disappointed that the Government did not stand up for Mr Babbage. As a Government servant, the Government should give that gentleman fair play, and an opportunity of stating the reasons for the course he adopted. He was sorry they did not stand up to defend their absent servant, whom they had chosen as the best man for his position. Even the hon members who spoke against Mr Babbage said he might yet justify himself by his instructions, and if so, they should wait until he had the opportunity of doing so. If Mr Babbage was to be recalled, it would meet with general approbation, but looking at the lateness of the season, and the difficulties he had met with it was a great pity to pass a censure upon him, and turn every point against him, when there was not one to stand up in his defence, and say he might have reasons for what he had done. It was all very well to say Mr Gregory had better judgment than Mr Babbage, but who could say he had? There was no reason Mr Babbage, as the leader of the party, should give way to the second in command, and Mr Gregory showed to his mind, that he did not possess the great essential of a second in command, in not knowing how to obey. Mr Gregory acted in opposition to the orders of Mr Babbage, and what right had he to do so? Was it because his opinion was different from that of the leader of the party? It would be seen that in this Mr Gregory acted with precipitation. Before sending the horses back he should have waited until Mr Babbage came up. It was said he was fearful that Mr Babbage might lose himself, but there was not a better bushman in all the colonies than the man Mr Babbage had with him. Mr Gregory himself had not so fully the confidence of the country as Warriner had. They feared Mr Babbage was lost because he was away thirty days, as if he had not been away longer before. That was no reason why his orders should be countermanded by his second in command, who knew nothing of his views. Until there was a very strong expression of opinion out of doors, and after the motion before the House was placed on the notice paper there was nothing in the correspondence showing that the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands found fault with Mr Babbage, it was only done in the last letter. On the 9th of this month the letter was sent in which the disappointment and censure of the Commissioner of Crown Lands were expressed, and that letter was put on the table of the House before it could reach the man it was written to. He did not consider that fair or just, and if he was the leader of the expedition, and received that letter, he would not wait to be recalled, but would come back at once. He would ask, if that letter which was published in the newspapers should come into the hands of the cook, would the man obey him afterwards? There was a great want of judgment in laying that letter on the table of the House unasked. He trusted the hon member would withdraw his motion, and allow the Government to act as they thought best either by recalling Mr Babbage, and so give him an opportunity of defending himself, or enable him to carry out the work for which he was appointed.

Mr BARROW hoped the hon members would withdraw the motion and also the amendment. He had thought of moving the previous question, and unless both the motion and amendment were withdrawn, he would do so. It was premature to censure Mr Babbage, whilst it was impossible to say what explanation he might be able to give, but at the same time he felt much disappointed for in common with many others he had expected great things from the expedition For although, as the hon member for Victoria had said, Mr Babbage was not a first-rate bushman, he had persons with him who could make up the deficiency, and with Mr Babbage at their head every requisite seemed combined He believed with the hon member for Victoria, that now that the winter rains were nearly over, the attempt to carry forward the expedition in summer should be abandoned, though if Mr Gregory could make the flying run spoken of, or even if Mr Babbage could stay four or five weeks longer in the interior it might compensate in some degree for the large expenditure incurred He must remark that when the expedition was voted, the House besought the Ministry not to be stingy, and if the Ministry had been penurious and that Mr Babbage complained that he could not prosecute his exploration in consequence, the Government would have been severely censured He must also excuse the Government on another score It was said they were slow in expressing dissatisfaction, as they were, but the service in which the expedition was engaged was such that it would be rash in the Government to interpose. It was easy to say the Government should keep in order every department under their control, but the exploration of the interior was entirely different from the Customs or Registrar-General's departments The Government did not know what was to be done, and it was therefore impossible to stimulate the tardy, which might be necessary under the circumstances He made this hypothesis on the same ground as he asked the House not to censure Mr Babbage when they had not heard that gentleman He thought the discussion would do good, for the public were dissatisfied with the expedition, and it was impossible the present state of things could be allowed to go on If Mr Babbage was surrounded with difficulties which he could not get through northwards, let him break through then south, and come home He could not see the way to condemn a man in the bush, because he did not know how he should act there If these rash censures were to be passed on men engaged in perilous enterprises we would not get men to engage in them Rejoicing in that discussion, regretting its necessity, and hoping that no more expenditure whatever would be incurred, he would suggest that the motion and amendment be withdrawn

Mr BAGOT, if he did not think it right to say a few words in defence of an absent man, would not have spoken Every Government officer was open to criticism, but he should not be attacked when he had not the means of defending himself The motion would also be a vote of censure on the Government, and as he did not wish to censure them he could not support it One of the most unfortunate things for Mr Babbage was the arrival of Gregory's party, for if it had not been proved by that expedition that pack-horses could be used instead of drays, the question would not have been opened up, but people now naturally enough said of Mr Babbage's equipment—"This is not the equipment with which he should have set out" But it should be remembered that there never had been an expedition fitted out like Mr Gregory's before, and, therefore, Mr Babbage could not be blamed on this point He did not defend Mr Babbage for going to Port Augusta, but his instructions justified him in going very far south

Mr TOWNSEND did not censure the Government either for sending out the expedition, or for sending Mr Babbage in charge of it, as this was done in accordance with the public wish, but since Mr Babbage had shown his incompetency as an explorer, the Government did well to recall him He regarded the sending up of Mr Gregory as unwise, for when a successful man joined one apparently unsuccessful, they were certain to quarrel The present expedition had cost £4321 6s 3d, and if the Government recalled Mr Babbage, the wisest thing they could do was to pause before sending out another expedition The better plan would be to offer a sum of say £5,000 to any person who would survey and map the country around Lake Torrens, and then they would get men of talent and perseverance to perform the work satisfactorily

The TREASURER thought the censure sought to be passed upon the Government would be unjust, and he was unbiassed upon the matter, not having been in the Government when Mr Babbage was despatched The hon member briefly recapitulated the circumstances under which Mr Babbage was despatched The surveying and mapping of the country was subsidiary to the exploration of the country, as Mr Babbage could not fail to see by his instructions He sincerely trusted and hoped Mr Babbage would justify himself He considered Mr Gregory quite justified in the manner in which he had acted

Mr REYNOLDS rose amidst loud cries of "Divide, divide" He was very glad that the hon movers of the motion and amendments had agreed to withdraw them He thought the remarks which had fallen from the opposite side of the House clearly shewed that Mr Babbage was not entitled to the large amount of blame which had been bestowed upon him, that there were in fact more grounds for censuring the Commissioner of Crown Lands than Mr Babbage The pitiful cries for mercy from the opposite side shewed that those hon gentlemen were entitled to more censure than Mr Babbage, they admitted in fact they deserved more censure than Mr Babbage He had hoped that the Government would have treated Mr Babbage with far more leniency, seeing the leniency with which they had treated other heads of departments, and that Mr Babbage was far away and could not defend himself, and seeing that by their antecedents they had so much consideration for other parties He had hoped that the Government would at least have taken an independent step in this matter, but what did they do? What had the Commissioner of Crown Lands done? No sooner was a notice of motion tabled in reference to Mr Babbage, than all at once the hon gentleman found that Mr Babbage was not carrying out his instructions Up to the period at which the hon member for Burra and Clare tabled his motion no such discovery was made, but the moment the notice of the hon member for Burra and Clare was tabled the hon gentleman opened his eyes, and in his seat—that seat which he had occupied nearly twelve months—when the hon member for the Burra had thrown some light upon the subject, and not till then, the hon gentleman discovered that Mr Babbage had not carried out his instructions Having ascertained the public feeling, and finding so many were disposed to censure the manner in which the expedition had been conducted, they recalled Mr Babbage for the purpose of relieving themselves from odium Such conduct was really contemptible, and he sincerely trusted that those hon gentlemen for the future would shew a little more determination to entitle them to hold and retain their seats and obtain the confidence of the country by manly and straightforward conduct But that confidence could never be secured by the shilly-shally course which they had pursued in this instance

Mr STRANGWAYS asked and obtained leave to withdraw his amendment

Mr PEAKE, in deference to the oft-repeated expressions of the wishes of the House, asked leave to withdraw the motion, but he would ask hon members to carefully look at it and say whether it contained anything personally offensive to Mr Babbage The hon member for the City had charged him with not having pluck to tackle Mr Babbage if he had been in that House, and had insinuated that the motion would not have been brought forward had Mr Babbage, once the member for Encounter Bay, still held a seat in that House He hoped he should never be afraid to do his duty in that House, or that when he was he should walk out of it Nothing had been further from his wishes than to wound the feelings or reputation of Mr Babbage. He merely wished to affirm the principle that they did not require two Surveyors-General If an explorer was wanted let him go and explore, but not as a Surveyor-General He had so worded his motion that it could not be construed into a personal attack upon the gentleman who had had the misfortune to mislead the expedition He wished to put his sentiments on record for he disdained to attack an absent man Allusions had been made by the hon and gallant Capt Hart——

The SPEAKER said the hon member was out of order in thus personally addressing members It was customary to speak of hon members as the members for the places which they represented

Mr PEAKE said the hon member for the Port had said that Mr Gregory was to blame, but the despatch of August 29 showed that this was not the case Mr Gregory found that in the course of a short time he would be compelled to abandon the whole of his equipments, the chief of the party was gone sailing elsewhere and how could the hon member for the Port say, under such circumstances, that Mr Gregory acted wrongly? If Nelson had not disobeyed orders Copenhagen would never have been taken, and he admired men who had sufficient discrimination to know when to disobey orders No doubt the patience of the House was exhausted, but before he sat down he could not help alluding to a suspicion which had previously existed on his mind, but which, since the debate, had become positive conviction The Government found a pea was in the gun, and he might have been instrumental in putting it there himself, the Government found since they came into the House that there was some powder behind the pea, and then it was that they pulled the trigger themselves His object was gained, and he begged to withdraw his amendment His object had merely been to stop this expedition before greater misfortune arose in connection with it

Leave was granted, and the amendment was withdrawn

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table papers in connection with the extension of the Goolwa Railway

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES —STANDING ORDERS

The further consideration in Committee of the Supplementary Estimates and Standing Orders was postponed till Tuesday following

The remaining business upon the paper was also postponed

House adjourned at 20 minutes past 5 o'clock

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

THE STEAM DREDGE

The Hon Mr BAKER asked the Hon the Chief Secretary, with leave of the House, where the steam dredge, which was procured for the purpose of deepening the bars, was at present employed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said in reply, that the steam dredge was imported for the purpose of deepening the bar and the harbor It was engaged, he believed, during the last summer in deepening the outer bar, which had been accomplished to the extent of from 3 to 4 feet Where it was employed at that moment he could not tell

THE LATE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS

The Hon Mr FORSTER asked the Chief Secretary whether the statement made by the late Commissioner of Public Works, as to his having desired to consult with his colleagues, and his not being able to accomplish it from the fact of their being absent from their office, was in accordance with truth

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY would prefer that the hon gentleman should give notice of motion on the subject

The Hon Mr FORSTER accordingly gave notice of motion to repeat the question this day

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY rose, pursuant to notice, and moved for permission to introduce a Bill to regulate Public Executions in South Australia The objects of the Bill were simply these —To provide for the carrying out of capital punishment within the walls of the gaol, instead of as at present as a spectacle for the multitude The effect of public executions tended to demoralize and had no beneficial result as an example The Bill provided for the identity of the executed criminal and the prisoner being amply established, the Sheriff, Gaoler, and other officers would be present, certificates would be given by the witnesses, and an inquest would be ultimately held A similar law was in force in all the other Australian colonies He asked permission of the House to introduce the Bill

Leave was granted, and the Bill was read a first time, and the second reading made an Order of the Day for Tuesday the 28th September

NATURALIZATION OF FOREIGNERS

The Hon Mr FORSTER asked the Chief Secretary, pursuant to notice—

"Is a foreigner, naturalized in South Australia, such naturalization having received the assent of Her Majesty, a subject of the British Crown in all parts of Her Majesty's dominions? And, should such foreigner (being, say—of German origin), revisit the country of his birth, could he there be divested, against his will, of his rights as a British subject? Or, supposing him to have been guilty of some political offence which had not been atoned for, could a State prosecution be instituted or revived against him, seeing he had renounced his former allegiance, and become the subject of a new power?"

He asked the question because it had been represented to him by several Germans of respectability, that the idea was prevalent, that when once a foreigner had been naturalized in this colony, letters of naturalization were not required to be again taken out in another British province Cases had occurred in which the taking out of letters of naturalization had to be repeated What he wished to know, however, was that in the case of persons who had left German States, say from political disputes, and had taken the oath of allegiance in this colony—what would be the state of the law in their own country with respect to them in case of their return He would put the question in this way —First, was a foreigner having taken out letters of naturalization in one part of the British dependencies, franked to any other portions of the British dependencies, and secondly on his having declared his allegiance to this country would he be looked upon in his own country as a British subject

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said, that this was a matter affecting the prerogative of the Crown, and not merely the Government of Australia, that it was quite clear that a person once having taken the oath of allegiance was a British subject in the whole of the British empire, though his rights would be modified for the time by the law of the country in which he lived He could give no opinion, however, as to the effect of the laws of a foreign State, involved in the latter part of the question

The Hon Mr FOSTER was extremely obliged for the information, although he did not express himself as altogether satisfied with it It merely occurred to him that the law officers of the Crown might be in a position to answer such a question

DEFENCE OF THE COLONY

In Committee

The Hon Captain BAGOT moved the House into Committee for the consideration of the motion standing in his name, viz, —

"That a respectful address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, praying him to direct that some measure be submitted to Parliament to provide for the enrolment, organization, and arming of the male population of the province, as a salutary and necessary means of providing for the defence of the country from predatory attacks, such as may be expected from any maritime power at war with England"

The hon gentleman would ask hon members to consider the position in which the colony would be placed in the case of any hostile invasion Conjecture their position in the event of a war between England and France, and the case of a French frigate landing 300 or 400 men for the purpose of appropriating the small amount of gold which they had in their Banks Could hon members say they were in any position to defend themselves True, they had a few soldiers and police, and the latter would no doubt gallop about and display a great deal of energy It was also true that they had two Acts in their Statute-Books—one providing for the arming of any portion of the people who volunteered their services, while the payment which was made for such services was such as completely to establish the title of volunteerism as a misnomer They were just as much volunteers as the tailor who made their coats and the gardener who tilled their ground, and were paid for it The payment to privates under that Act was 6s per day, and eight or ten shillings to officers The other Act provided for the formation of a militia He deemed that unsuitable The volunteers to be raised under the Act he had referred to, numbered 850, and would cost a large sum of money, how could they meet the exigencies of a militia? They would have to take one man in twenty-eight out of the province, to form a force of 2,000 men, but in what proportion would that be to that of England There, in 1853, he found that the proportion was one in one hundred and seven, in the French army it was one in seventy-four in Russia it was one in fifty, and here it was proposed to take one in twenty eight He maintained that a proper army for this colony was the arming of the whole population The principle which he would wish to introduce, was adopted in America, and there they were ready to defend themselves from aggression The hon gentleman spoke of Switzerland as an example of the way in which an armed force could be maintained There, every male after the age of 17, was enrolled, and the population was far from wealthy There was no hesitation there in providing themselves with arms in a moment In the villages of Switzerland he had been a witness to the young men practising their arms, contending for prizes, and endeavouring to show which were the best marksmen The same principle here, without the system of a militia, would produce the same results The advantage which would result from their being prepared, would be that it would deter the enemy from approaching The burglar never attacked the house of a man whom he knew kept loaded pistols by his bedside He had submitted the motion now before them to elicit the views of the Government

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN approved very highly of the sentiments just expressed, and hoped the vote of that House would be so unanimous as to induce the Government to take immediate steps It would enable him to withdraw the motion which stood in his name The hon gentleman referred to the despatch of His Excellency on the subject, as having hit the "right nail upon the right head" With respect to the substitution in the report before the House of the military for infantry, he disagreed He thought some of each would be better The three last paragraphs of the report he confessed were to the purpose One thing he regretted, that in the formation of that report competent witnesses had not been examined, for instance, such as Captain Lipson and others Much information might have been elicited from these gentlemen For instance, he should have liked very much to have put this question, "Whether two steamers filled with volunteers could not run alongside and board a frigate, and take her, on her approach to our harbour?" With respect to the evidence given by the commandant, he would say it was chary He (the commandant) was an old soldier, and his remarks amounted to nothing He had touched merely upon matters of detail And yet he was a man of experience, and he should very much like to have his opinion For this and other reasons the report did not carry that weight with it which it otherwise would have done He differed in many points from it One of those was, it was too full of details What he wanted was a small compact force With respect to the proposed charge of £5 for the Minie rifles, he dissented from it He would distribute the rifles free, and then leave the recipients to their own resources for any further expense A company of artillerymen, a company of infantry, and a reserve of 200 militia, would, he thought, be an efficient protection Certainly a squadron might appear, but then it was very probable a British squadron would follow after He would mention in the report that the police had been omitted, who amounted in all to 175 There was another thing from which great good might be derived, that was, that Captain Brewer, the Surveyor-General, and two or three other experienced nautical men, should form themselves into a Board for the purpose of examining the coast and harbor According to the Estimates for 1857, the cost of 625 volunteers was 5,100*l*, while the estimate for 100 militiamen was only 2,000*l*, or 200 men of the line could be sustained at the same cost

The Hon the SURVEYOR-GENERAL had some knowledge of defences, and he would say that notwithstanding the last speaker had found fault with the report, yet that more or less it had met with the approbation of that hon gentleman As to the omission of any mention being made of the police in that report, he would say it was purely a mistake He concurred in thinking they would be of great use against the enemy He would mention that the report was divided into four heads The first was "The organization of a volunteer force," secondly, "The substitution of artillery for infantry," thirdly, "The erection of defences" and fourthly, "The employment of steam gunboats" The attention of the Committee had been particularly directed to a volunteer force, and it was manifest that a militia would be more effectual, though there would be considerable difficulty in the case of an invasion in moving them about The view of the Committee was, that the population bordering upon the seacoast would be the readiest defenders of the coast For this and other reasons they had thought that volunteer or regular troops would be desirable The small amount of remuneration was not considered as pay, but as a return for the wear and tear of clothes Some comparison had been made of the expense of supporting the volunteers and Her Majesty's troops He would say, however, that that was an unfair comparison, as in addition to other expenses Her Majesty's troops required housing, which the volunteers did not With respect to the recommendation of artillery in preference to infantry which fact had been commented upon, he would say that the infantry never acquired that knowledge of guns which was requisite, whereas the artillery needed the same drill as the infantry The Committee had, therefore, made this choice because the artillery could be employed in both services If they had only one choice he thought the Government would be better served by employing artillery

The Hon MAJOR O'HALLORAN asked the Chief Secretary what sum was likely to be placed on the Estimates to carry out the proposed defences of the colony

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said if the hon member referred to the report he would find that the amount which it was proposed to expend was £7,421

The Hon the SURVEYOR-GENERAL said he would add another remark to what he had previously said, and that was as to the Committee not having taken evidence from men of experience in the matters under debate He wished to inform the Council that such evidence had been previously taken on similar reports and the Committee had not deemed it necessary on this occasion to go through the same evidence again

The Hon Mr BAKER agreed as to the advisability of doing something He thought the chief source of danger was from privateers He could conceive that the landing of a small privateer force would be the occasion of great danger in our present defenceless state A short time ago he recollected a number of gentlemen had equipped themselves and formed themselves into a body of horse at their own expense, but he regretted to say that cold water had been thrown upon their undertaking, and that their efforts had been discouraged It was to such efforts as these, however, that the hon gentleman would look in an emergency The Surveyor General had said they should look to the inhabitants of the coast to defend themselves, but he would remind them that with the exception of the Port and Holdfast Bay, the population was not sufficient for that purpose But a few horsemen properly armed might be readily brought to the coast in case of an emergency There was a class of persons, too, to which he belonged, who though they were not prepared to go and shoulder the musket, would, if properly mounted and armed, prove a most effectual means of defence If they were not in a position to fight, they could run away—(a laugh)—and even in the last extremity if they became invisible to the enemy, it would clearly show them that they had not been exterminated He would be bound that with fifty men such as he had described, they would be able to stop a force of 200 invaders But everything was done by discretion He certainly could not see what good would be derived from standing in the neighborhood of the sand hills, and firing upon the frigates (A laugh) They had already had one review on the race-course, and he believed that out of the whole of the corps to which he belonged, every gentleman but one was able to maintain his seat in the saddle with credit to himself That was more, however, than could be said of another gallant company (A laugh)

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN would the hon gentleman state the name of the horseman who was thrown (Laughter)

The Hon Mr BAKER referred to no one in particular He was speaking of the corps to which he belonged, as a specimen of good training (A laugh) If the remnant of that corps at present existed it would be prudent to encourage it He hoped that that branch of the service would not be neglected On a former occasion all that was asked was that Mr Tolmer should train them, he being then the only practical gentleman in the colony

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN quite concurred as to the usefulness of calvalry He asked the hon the Surveyor-General what quantity of shot and shell (if any) they had in their possession Cannons without ammunition were useless He thought that the sum proposed was very inefficient, as restricting them to a certain quantity of gunpowder, he on the contrary would rather give it them to waste in practice, and that was the way in which they might become good marksmen

The Hon Mr BAKER mentioned the circumstance of there being Minie rifles amongst the police They had been placed in their custody for practice, but that arrangement it appeared had been recently countermanded

The Hon Capt BAGOT was not in this colony in 1854, but it was quite clear that the attempt then made was to make soldiers That was a mistake They could not expect persons to leave their occupations to play at soldiers, What they wanted was an armed population They all knew very well the value of the Guerilla in Spain They had caused more support to the British arms than was thought Then, again, as an evidence of what untrained men could do, there was Bunker's Hill where pitchforks were the principal weapons in use They must not attempt to drill the people They would not submit It must be their own act to use the arms as they pleased If there was an alarm every man would seize his pitchfork or matchlock, as he thought fit, and do good service They could from behind houses or any other shelter oppose a most formidable, even though irregular, resistance If there was to be any interference with them, it would only be in the appointment of officers As to enrolling 625 men at 6s per day, it would cost nearly £100,000 a year With respect to their defence from armed vessels, that must rest with Great Britain He fully agreed with the Surveyor-General in artillery being the best brand of the service to be employed, inasmuch as a man with two trades was better than one with one only The artilleryman was a foot soldier as well With regard to our defences with great guns, he admitted something ought be done to prevent a bombardment of the Port He would only place arms in the hands of residents He would not, of course, trust them to persons who were here to-day and gone to-morrow

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN explained with respect to a former statement of his

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought it was not then object to make soldiers, but to place the farmer in a position to turn out and defend himself He was an old soldier, and had a proper respect for discipline, but an army was not necessary in this case

The Hon Captain HALL thought the hon member wanted to arm men with weapons which they did not know how to use He should not like to stand in front of such a regiment He thought it was wise in the Government to take steps, but he did not conceive the danger to be great It was principally interruption to our commerce which was to be feared He thought the House should recommend that South Australia be made a naval station

The Hon Captain BAGOT reiterated again, in answer to the Hon Captain Hall, his belief that they did not want soldiers, or the drill of "ready—present—fire" And as to giving weapons to inexperienced men, he would say that no man who could bring down a snipe would be in fear of shooting his front rank man

The Hon CHIEF SECRETARY said that Switzerland met no counterpart here There, they were soldiers by profession The inhabitants of Australia were of the industrious classes rather It was the plain duty of the Government however to devise such defences as were necessary, and to enable them to meet the attacks of a privateer He believed that the sum stated in the report would be required, viz, 6,000*l*. to 7,000*l*, and that it would be well laid out

The motion was then put and carried The House resumed The Chairman reported, and the report was adopted

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

This Bill was read a second time, on the motion of the Hon Captain BAGOT and committed

The first eight clauses were passed with merely verbal alterations

In the ninth clause, providing for affidavits to be made before a Justice of the Peace, the words "Justice of the Peace" were substituted by those of "Special Magistrate"

The three last clauses were passed with verbal alteration

The Schedules from A to F were passed with slight amendments

In the preamble, the words "Legislative Council and House of Assembly" were substituted for the words "Parliament" It was passed with another slight amendment

The House resumed, the Bill was reported with the amendments The report was adopted and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday (this day)

CONFIRMATION OF REGISTRATION BILL

This Bill was read a second time and committed The only clause in the Bill and the preamble were agreed to with one or two verbal amendments

The House resumed The Bill was reported with the amendments The report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

In the 9th Clause "Court may direct payment of alimony to wife or her trustee An amendment was made in this clause compelling the husband to give security for alimony

In the 10th Clause "Judicial Separation"—

The Hon CAPTAIN HALL asked whether judicial separation would enable the parties to marry again He was not satisfied as to whether a judicial separation was equal to a divorce

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that a decree of judicial separation was equal to a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro by the Ecclesiastical Court of England The parties therefore were not in a position to marry again

The Hon Capt BAGOT said that from provisions of the Bill it appeared that the power of carrying it into effect would be conveyed to the Supreme Court It was not clear but that one Judge could exercise powers which it would be better should be restrained to the full Court

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY explained that in the English Court one judge had the power of determining, although there was an appeal afterwards allowed Here the appeal would be to the Governor in Council

After considerable discussion the clause in question was postponed for further consideration

The 12th clause was recommitted

The Hon Captain HALL thought it was a one-sided clause He thought there should be no partialities What was wrong in one sex must be so also in the other They should not make one law for the man and one for the woman The commandment made no such difference Certainly the enlightened Legislature of another country had passed a law similar to that before the Council, but they might strike out a course for themselves, and by maintaining the "rights of women," they would not be retrograding in the scale of civilization

The Hon Captain SCOTT proposed to insert the word "adultery" before "incestuous adultery"

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY read a passage from a recent despatch, to prove that if there were any material alteration made in the Bill, as not being in harmony with the English Act, it would have the effect of invalidating it

The Hon Mr FORSTER, on moral grounds, approved of the suggested alteration But rather than the Bill should be jeopardized, he would like the clause to be postponed The social effect of adultery in a wife was also greater than it would be in a husband

The Hon Captain HALL said that he understood the Bill only provided for judicial separation, but not for divorce (No, no)

The Hon Mr MORPHETT hoped the Council would take the same view as he did, and oppose the alteration of the clause It was precisely the same as that passed by the English Parliament The only fear was that they might be making Divorce too easy if they agreed to the amendment proposed The object of the Bill was to bring the matter out of the Ecclesiastical Court into the Civil Court

The Hon Mr FORSTER would vote for the clause remaining as it was If it were postponed, however, he would give the matter further consideration

The Hon A SCOTT said the clause as it stood was an instance of the stronger party against the weaker It intimated that the wife should do no wrong, but that the husband should be allowed greater indulgence (A laugh) A slight laxity of morals would be all The hon gentleman concluded with the hope that the clause would be remodelled

The Hon Mr AYERS said that morally, the duties of husband and wife were the same, but the present question was whether they should pass an Act similar to the English Act or not There was so much jealousy maintained at home with regard to any alteration in our Marriage Act, that he thought it would be only putting the Bill in jeopardy to amend the clause under discussion

The Hon Dr DAVIES would support the clause as it stood

The Hon Capt HALL said some of the speakers seemed to think that half a loaf was better than no bread Rather than lose the benefit of the Bill he should withdraw his opposition

After some further discussion the clause was passed as printed

The House resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again next day, Wednesday

The House then adjourned

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Tuesday, September 21

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after one o clock

MOUNT BARKER

The SPEAKER announced that he had received a return to the writ issued for the election of a member to represent the district of Mount Barker, and that Wm Rogers, Esq., had been duly elected

NEW MEMBERS

NURIOOTPA

Mr BAGOT presented a petition from a number of the inhabitants of Nuriootpa and the adjacent districts, praying that a station might be constructed between Gawler Town and Section 112, on a block of land adjoining the crossing-place at the North-road and upon Crown land The petition was read and stated that the petitioners had heard it was intended to place a station near the Gawler end of the railway, but that this would prevent the settlers at Shea oak Log and other places availing themselves of the railway

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE

Mr DUFFIELD presented a petition from 44 members and friends of the Angaston Institute, praying the House to assent to the proposed vote of £4000 for the South Australian Institute.

SOUTH-EASTERN DISTRICT

Mr HAWKER presented a petition from a number of landholders, settlers, farmers, and householders in the township of Mount Gambier, and others in the South-Eastern District, in all upwards of 200 persons, requesting the House to take immediate steps to cause the necessary surveys to be made, and a tramway to be constructed between Mount Gambier and Guichen Bay The bush road was represented as being bad in summer, and perfectly impassable in winter The country through which it was desirable the tramway should pass was represented as being unsold and well stocked with timber, requisite in the construction of the work The petitioners pointed out the great increase in the value of land which would arise from the construction of this work, and referred to the tramway which had been constructed between Port Adelaide and Goolwa

TANUNDA

Mr BAKEWELL presented a petition from upwards of 150 inhabitants of Tanunda and the neighborhood, praying that a road from Lyndoch Valley to Nuriootpa via Tanunda might be declared a main road, and that a sufficient sum might be placed on the Estimates for its maintenance

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN RAILWAY

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a letter from the South Australian Railway Commissioners, containing reports and evidence taken in two enquiries which had been instituted at the request of the Commissioner of Public Works

The documents were referred to the Committee upon Railways

Mr STRANGWAYS was desirous that they should be printed

The SPEAKER remarked that if they were it would be impossible they could be placed before the Committee during the current week

WELLINGTON FERRY

Mr WARK, with the permission of the House, put the question in his name out of its turn—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) if any resolution has been come to by Government regarding Wellington Ferry, with a view to relieve the inhabitants and others of the ferry dues, and also if Government has obtained estimates of the cost of a pontoon bridge there"

He was induced to put the question, because last session a petition was presented from a number of the inhabitants of Wellington and other places, complaining of the ferry dues, and during the discussion which ensued, the then Commissioner of Public Works, Mr Reynolds, stated that he believed that the Government ferry dues were a grievance and that they would take the subject into consideration if a motion in reference thereto were withdrawn In consequence of that assurance, a motion which he (Mr Wark) had brought forward was withdrawn He was aware that the late Commissioner of Public Works had paid great attention to the subject and had devised a plan which he had intended to bring forward during the present session, but he had retired from office He was aware that gentlemen had drawn the attention of the Government to the possibility and cost of erecting a pontoon bridge, and he should like to elicit the views of the Government upon the point.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS stated that the Government had carefully considered the subject and a report had been obtained from the Colonial Architect, who estimated the cost of a pontoon bridge at 12 000*l* (A loud whistle in the gallery) The Colonial Architect thought that at a more shallow point a fixed bridge might be erected for the same amount

The SPEAKER here interrupted the hon gentleman, and stated that some one in the Stranger s Gallery had whistled Such conduct was most irregular, and if it were repeated, he should certainly direct the gallery to be cleared

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS concluded by stating that the Government considered they should get some further information upon the subject before taking any steps, particularly as there was a pontoon bridge at Echuca A further report upon the subject had been directed to be obtained The question of tolls had been carefully considered and would be determined in connection with the road question

The TREASURER, before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, wished to lay upon the table of the House some information which he had promised in reference to the cost of Government buildings The return which had been moved for by the hon member for the City (Mr Neales) commenced at the year 1850 as he had not yet been able to obtain the requisite information anterior to that period, but it was in course of preparation. It would, however, take some time to prepare, as the records of that time were not easily accessible. In support of a part of this return, and also of the vote on the Supplementary Estimates for Government House, he begged to place in the hands of the Clerk of the House for inspection by hon. members, accounts and vouchers relating to the various items. The returns were ordered to be printed.

BOARD OF WORKS.

The Commissioner of Public Works, pursuant to notice, moved:—

"That he have leave to introduce 'A Bill intituled an Act to vest the powers, functions, immunities, duties, obligations, and rights of the Central Board of Main Roads, of the South Australian Railway Commissioners, and of the Waterworks and Drainage Commissioners, respectively, in a Board of Works, and also to include therein the management of Electric and Magnetic Telegraphs in South Australia.'"

The provisions of the Bill would be found extremely simple and productive of considerable economy. The Bill would produce direct responsibility on the part of those who were at present Managers of Roads, Railways, Waterworks, and Telegraphs. The Bill was not of very great length, but had been anxiously looked for, and would be perused with interest. He believed it would be found fully adapted to the wants of the country and the wishes of hon. members. It provided for the appointment of a Manager of Roads, a Manager of Railways, a Manager of Waterworks, and a Manager of Telegraphs. These four combined would constitute a Board of Works, the Commissioner of Public Works acting as Chairman of the Board. Thus direct responsibility would be obtained in reference to the four parties connected with these four great undertakings. He moved that he have leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. Strangways wished, before the question was put, to call the attention of the House to a pledge given the other day by the hon. the Attorney-General in reference to a motion which was brought forward, or rather to prevent the hon. member for the Sturt from bringing forward a motion. The pledge given by the hon. the Attorney-General was to the effect that the Government intended to introduce a Public Works Bill, and to bring under it all the great public works in the colony. Some public works were it was true brought under the Bill which the Commissioner of Public Works now asked leave to introduce; for instance Boards connected with Roads, Railways, Water Supply, and Telegraphs, were brought under its provisions; but there was another Board which was not, although it was a Board in which was vested the expenditure of large sums of money; and if the reports which had been laid upon the table of the House, and rumours which were current were to be believed, it was the most mismanaged in the colony. Yet that Board had been excluded from the operations of the Bill, which it was now sought to introduce. That Board was the Harbor Trust. Why was that left out? He found by the Act of 1854, that W. Younghusband, Esq. was appointed trustee; and he was sure that any one who would take the trouble to go down to Port Adelaide, or to examine the papers which had been laid before the House in connection with the Harbor Trust, would find that there had been most prodigal expenditure. A very large sum had been expended upon Princes' Wharf, and he would ask, were the public benefited by such expenditure? No; but the Chief Secretary, and those who were interested with him, were the parties who were benefited. He would not refer to any further mismanagemet on the part of this Board, but he would draw the attention of the House to the Act which defined the duties of the gentlemen constituting that Trust. It would be seen that their duty was to deepen the inner and outer bar, and to deepen the harbour to Princes' Wharf. If they had confined themselves to that, they would no doubt have acted to the satisfaction of the public, but they had not done so. They had not expended the public money for the public benefit, but merely for the purpose of benefiting their own private properties. If inquiries were instituted, he believed it would be found that a large portion of the 100,000*l*. which they were authorized to expend, at least three-fourths of it had been spent by the Harbor Trustees in the improvement of their own property. The Commissioner of Public Works, in asking leave to introduce the Bill, had been very careful indeed to omit all mention of the Harbor Trust, thinking probably as four other Boards were mentioned that the Harbor Trust might escape notice. He was utterly at a loss to imagine why the hon. gentleman had made such omission. After the express declaration of the Attorney-General that the Government intended to bring in a Bill, bringing all great public works under a Board of Works, he was at a loss to conceive why the Harbor Trust had been omitted. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thought that a Board which was only entrusted with the expenditure of 100,000*l*. was too unimportant to be included in the Board of Works; but he was of opinion that 100,000*l*. was a sufficiently large sum to this colony to warrant the operations of the Board being carefully looked into. He believed that the object of establishing the new Board was only to give the Government additional patronage. Charges of jobbery and corruption had been preferred against various Boards, and he believed there would be a probability under the new Board of jobbery and corruption existing to a far greater extent than hitherto. Under the circumstances which he had stated, he felt that he had no alternative but to move the previous question. He did so upon the ground that the time had come when the House should express its opinion of the shuffling, time-serving, cringing policy of the present Ministry, and upon the ground that the Government had not carried out the pledge made through the Attorney-General, that all public works should be included in the Bill.

Mr. Wark felt bound to second the motion, because the Government had not redeemed the pledge which it had made through the Attorney-General. There could be no doubt that a good deal of corruption had taken place in connection with various Boards, and therefore there was the greater necessity for bringing them all under one head, so that they might all be rendered responsible. He believed that a large proportion of the money which had been expended at the Port had been for private purposes. The object in passing the Act under which the Harbor Trustees were appointed was to enable vessels to enter and leave the Port in safety. Why, after the pledge which had been given by the Attorney-General, that all public works should be included in the Bill, was the Harbor Trust excluded? The House, as had been stated by the previous speaker, had distinctly been given to understand that all would be included. It was high time that there was responsibility in connection with the Harbor Trust as well as with other Boards, and he could not but consider it a gross breach of faith that this Trust had been omitted. It was very well for the Harbor Trust to exist so long as the public paid the money; but still he contended it was the duty of that House, as the representatives of the country, to see that in the expenditure of the money entrusted to the Harbor Trust the public interests were studied, and not merely those of private individuals. They were bound to see that the money was fairly and honorably expended, and that there was no jobbery or corruption in its appropriation. The fact of leaving out this Harbor Trust from the Bill was sufficient proof to him that they must look to themselves and not to the Ministry to effect an improvement.

Mr. Burford should support the previous question. He was sorry there should be any feeling of antagonism, but that antagonism attached to what he considered a dereliction of duty. There were two or three important points which the House had been led to believe would be taken up during the recess and vigorously acted upon. For instance, there was Distillation, also the Constitution Act. (Question, Question.)

The Speaker said the hon. member must confine his observations to the Bill which the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works had asked leave to introduce.

Mr. Burford must then considerably shorten the observations which he had intended to make. In addition to the Harbour Trust there was another Board which he considered should have been included in the Bill, and that was the Trinity Board. It might be pleaded that as that Board was altogether of a maritime character, it should not be under the supervision of the Commissioner of Public Works, but the same argument might be brought forward in reference to the management of roads, railways, water supply, or telegraphs, the Boards in connection with which were included in the Bill. He would suggest the appointment of a Manager, or, as was the case at home, a Master of the Trinity Board, who would be under the Commissioner of Public Works. Finding that he was compelled to confine his observations to this Bill, he would not prolong his remarks, but merely conclude by stating that he was wofully disappointed, not at what the Government had done, but what they had failed to do.

Mr. Solomon felt bound to support the previous question upon the principle that while it was necessary to exercise supervision over one Board, it was quite necessary that there should be equal supervision over the remainder. There should be no exception to the general rule. (Hear, hear.) A principle had been enunciated, and had met with general approval, that all Boards should be subject to a power, which power should itself be subject to the control of that House. For that reason, without going into the question of what had been done previously by the Trinity Board, or whether they had acted rightly or wrongly, he should support the previous question, considering it absolutely necessary that every Board should be subject to the Commissioner of Public Works, and through him to the control of that House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Reynolds could not allow this matter to pass without some remarks regarding the omission in this Bill of that important Board known as the Harbor Trust. On previous occasions he had drawn the attention of the House to a Bill introduced last session, and in that Bill the Harbor Trust was included, and that he believed was the reason which induced certain members of the other House to throw it out. He would also draw attention to the fact that of the six hon. gentlemen who voted against that Bill, three were members of the Harbor Trust. That, to his mind, was a most injudicious vote on the part of those gentlemen. He was extremely sorry to find that the Government on this occasion had allowed their judgment and conduct to be guided by such an Act. There could really be no solid substantial reason for excluding the Harbor Trust any more than there could be for excluding the Central Road Board, the Railway or Waterworks Commissioners, or the Manager of the Electric Telegraphs. He would direct the attention of the House to a document which was lying he believed in the office of the Commissioner of Public Works. The Commissioner of Public Works at the commencement of the present year obtained a report from the Harbor Trustees of the quantity of silt raised in the harbor and where it was raised By this return it appeared that from the commencement of the Harbor Trust to the end of 1857, they had raised 220,000 tons of silt and upwards, and it became very interesting to know from what portion of the harbor this was raised He found that of the 220,000 tons of silt raised in the harbor of Port Adelaide, nearly one half had been raised round a little nook known as Princes' Wharf A chart was forwarded to the Commissioner of Public Works indicating the spots by letters from which the silt had been raised, and he repeated that of 220,000 tons of silt raised, nearly one-half had been raised from around Princes' Wharf He could not forget that two or three gentlemen who were members of the Harbor Trust, were deeply interested in Princes' Wharf When remonstrated with for spending so much money upon this particular spot—for there certainly appeared a little favoritism in the matter—the reason that they assigned was that there was deep water there Now there was not such deep water in other parts of the harbor, and it certainly occurred to him that to have done their duty the Harbor Trustees should have deepened the water in the fair way of the channel, that they should have deepened the inner and outer bar The Ordinance itself, under which they were constituted, stated they should have done this [The hon member quoted at some length from the Ordinance] Instead of doing what they ought to, it appeared that they had done nothing to the inner bar, but shortly after the commencement of their duties proceeded to deepen the waters around the Princes Wharf That was a clear violation of their trust They commenced, in fact, at the tail, instead of at the head He would ask the Government upon what principle they excluded the Harbor Trust when they placed Railways, Roads, Waterworks, and Telegraphs under the provisions of this Bill Was it because members of this Trust were appointed by the Legislature? Did it follow that they therefore became more responsible to the Legislature or to that House? It could not be said so Were they more responsible than the Commissioners of Waterworks, or the Railway Commissioners, or the members of the Central Road Board? Not a member of the Harbor Trust could be removed except by a vote of that House, and although they might be called upon to lay plans and specification before that House before they could expend the money, still the Central Road Board was subject to precisely the same provisions That Board could not obtain the money unless it first produced a plan showing the proposed appropriation of the money As this provision then equally affected the Central Road Board, what reason could be assigned for the omission of the Harbour Trust? It might, perhaps, be said, that it was necessary to have maritime men in the Board, but if so, how was it that they found the Government recently appointing a gentleman a member of the Board who was not a maritime man (No, no) Be that as it might, the time had arrived when they should place all Boards under proper control, and he was pleased to find the sense of the House was in favour of placing the Harbor Trust in the same category as other Boards

Mr HUGHES thought that he should vote for the previous question, not because he considered that those Boards should not be placed under the management of the Commissioner of Public Works, but because he thought there had been a dereliction of duty on the part of the Government in introducing a Bill without giving explanations of their intentions With regard to the Harbor Trust, he thought the Bill should not have been laid before the House in the manner in which they introduced it He could not go altogether with the remarks made in reference to the course pursued by the Harbor Trust in their operations He thought first the outer harbor should have been deepened, then the inner harbor, and then the port He thought those works should all be sanctioned by the Government before they were undertaken He did not think the Harbor Trust open to the imputations that had been thrown upon them If there were any fault, it was that of the Government of the day in authorising the expenditure The Harbor Trust found that they had no machinery in the colony with which they could deepen the bar, but that the dredge they had was sufficiently powerful to deepen the outer harbor It was found that a limestone stratum existed, and Sir Henry Young, who went down and superintended the experiments, found that with the machinery then at their command the stratum cou'd not be acted upon without very great expense, and it was necessary to wait for the new dredge before it could be removed But still, the revenue of the country was pledged for the £100,000, to be expended by that Trust, and therefore he could not see why the Government should have omitted to include it in the Bill There was also another Board, and that was the Trinity Board It consisted of two Wardens, appointed by the Government, and the other three were named by the Legislative Council He thought the Government might have taken some step in regard to them He thought probably that if the Executive found, in dealing with this Bill, that it did not give satisfaction, they might probably bring in a better, and that then it would not be so long delayed as to render it too late in the session to pass it when it was introduced He would wish also that the Minister of Public Works should explain what he meant by providing for the management of the Electric Telegraphs—was Mr Todd inefficient? He (Mr Hughes) thought if the House were to agree to a Bill brought in by the Government, it ought to have full explanation on all those points, but as the explanation had not been as satisfactory as it ought to have been, he would vote for the previous question

The TREASURER said that the mover of the previous question based his argument for that amendment, in the alleged mismanagement of the Harbor Trust Board, and stated that they had not done their duty in a proper manner Now the Board, before they commenced operations, submitted estimates and specifications to the Government, and stated how they considered their operations should be carried on before they were furnished with money The hon member for Sturt found in the exports laid before the Commissioner of Public Works, that a large quantity of silt had been removed from a point which he called a nook in the neighbourhood of Princes' Wharf It was found on examination that that part of the harbor required to be deepened The subject was long under discussion in the Parliament which passed that Bill, and the Act stated very clearly where the money was to be spent It said the Trust shall expend the moneys received by them in deepening the inner bar and also the fair way channel to an equal depth, and deepen the water opposite Princes' Wharf, so that their operations were expressly directed by the Act They were to work in the neighbourhood of Princes' Wharf In that part of the harbor there was the greatest quantity of mud, and it required the use of the dredge There were 19 feet of water opposite Princes' Wharf, in the inner channel, and it seemed to have been the object of Parliament in passing that Bill to widen that channel for it could not require deepening, and as the channel would be widened there more than elsewhere, a greater quantity of silt was removed At all events the member for the Port had exonerated the Board from mismanagement as to the places where they expended their funds The Board had had inefficient machinery, but it was unfair to charge them on that account, and to infer, consequently, that they had been guilty of mismanagement There was everything in the Act to justify them in the course they had taken, and nothing in the circumstances which did not justify them The hon member for Sturt had said, was there anything whatever in that Act which placed them further from the control of the Government than any other Trust He (the Treasurer) had referred to a clause which showed that they were more more completely under the control of the Government than any other Board, for it referred very specially and particularly to the expenditure of money It required that the Government should not sanction the payment of money until the Trust had informed them how they intended to appropriate it, by laying before them the plans and specifications He considered that much more stringent than the Road Act, which only required a statement of the portion of the roads of the country they intended to repair

Captain HART remarked, in reference to what had been said with regard to the mismanagement of the Harbor Trust, he thought a considerable want of knowledge on the subject had been displayed, yet, notwithstanding, it had been pretty generally admitted that the Harbor Trust had been well conducted He thought that if the names of the members of that Board were examined, it would be found that the preponderance of interest would be found in the lower part of the Port, and not the higher The operations which had been carried out, had been found necessary, in order to accommodate the largest ships coming into the Port of Adelaide, and to keep them afloat at all times of the tide in 18 or 19 feet water That was now the case, and it would be seen that great advantages had thus been gained That accommodation could not have been given lower down, for the limestone crust did not admit of so great a depth The General Hewitt, drawing 17½ feet of water was kept afloat at all times On reference to the names of the Harbour Trust Board, they would find Mr Collinson, Captain Douglas, Mr Tapley, Capt Hall, and Mr Malcolm, and the only one of those gentlemen interested at Princes Wharf was Mr Collinson In reference to the inner port there had been difficulties in clearing the impediments away, but there was a sufficient sum set on one side for the purpose of deepening the inner port, and it was only at certain times and by certain machinery, that that work could be done He believed the inner bar was to be immediately cleared away But notwithstanding all that labor, he saw no reason why the Harbor Trust should not be placed under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works

Mr LINDSAY said that the arguments which had been used were beside the question The question was not whether the Harbor Trust had done their work ill or well, but simply whether they should be responsible to the Public Works Office or not The Bill appeared to contemplate some improvement, inasmuch as it proposed to amalgamate five Boards into one, but he could see no reason why the Bill should not reduce all Boards of Trust under one control It seemed to him that all the various Boards ought to be included, and for that reason he must vote for the previous question, with a view to the Government bringing in another Bill more likely to be satisfactory

Mr GLYDE would vote against the previous question, and thought the opposition manifested was particularly ill-timed He could not see why the hon member for Sturt should wish to pass that amendment If the Commissioner of Public Works was allowed to bring in that Bill, he (Mr Glyde) supposed reasons would be given for the course taken, and then, if better reasons were not given for not including the Harbor Trust than he had yet known, he would vote for an amendment including them in the Bill. He thought it not then the proper time to oppose bringing in that Bill, for it was usually understood that it was merely a matter of form, and it was therefore hardly correct to oppose it.

Mr. Neales considered that there was a wide difference in the views of those gentlemen who attacked the Harbor Trust, and those who defended it. The difference was that those who attacked them knew nothing about the matter, while those who had supported them were well informed on the subject. The question, however, was not whether 22,000 tons of silt was removed or 220,000 from any particular spot, and less from another, but whether it was necessary to raise it in any particular spot and not in another. It was better to raise it from the ground opposite Princes' Wharf, even had 10 times the money been expended than was actually spent. Mr. Geo. Green had shown that it was necessary to deepen the water there to afford facilities for shipping, and that the higher up operations were carried on the more economical it would be. It had been proved that at first the machinery was not sufficiently powerful to effect the purpose, and they had had to wait until the large dredge came out. He thought, therefore, that those hon. members who had condemned the Harbor Trust were ignorant on the subject. He (Mr. Neales) did not like to hear those remarks regarding personal interest which were so frequently made. He believed the members of the Trust had faithfully fulfilled their duties, and considered such implications discreditable to members making them, and so offensive that they would eventually drive all "gentlemen" out of the House, which some seemed to wish.

The Attorney-General would vote against the previous question. He could not, however, agree with those hon. gentlemen who said that there was no argument used by hon. members opposite in bringing in that amendment, because it had been said that the Government were cringing, time-serving, and truckling. Now, the weight of such arguments differed according to the different constructions of the individuals using them, and according to the different views they took of the conduct of the Government. Therefore, to say there were no arguments at all was not fair. He agreed with the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Lindsay) that hon. members had mistaken the question. They objected to the Bill on the ground, whether the Harbor Trust had been well or ill conducted. The question was whether the House would refuse the Government leave to bring in the Bill proposed by the Commissioner of Public Works or not—whether the House should refuse the Government that power because a certain Trust was not included in it. But the opposition had supported their argument by charges on the members of that Trust, involving imputations of malversation, and of fraudulently spending public money and of truckling to private interests. He felt it impossible therefore not to say a few words in defence of that body. He would observe, that those members when that body was first constituted never said one word against the manner in which that Trust was imposed, and he (the Attorney-General) could not allow those charges to be made without a word of reply, even although it was to a certain extent departing from the question. He thought it perhaps sufficient to say that he would not include among those who made those remarks the hon. member for the City, Mr. Solomon, because he did not say anything against the Harbor Trust; but still, some gentlemen spoke in very strong terms of blame as to the manner in which the proceedings of the Harbor Trust were carried out. The people at the Port, the merchants, the wharf owners—in fact, the whole population were interested in the manner in which that expenditure was carried out, yet nothing had been said by the hon. members for Sturt or the member for Encounter Bay, but an approval of the manner in which that Trust had been executed. The late Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Reynolds) had expressed his disapproval of the appropriation of the funds of that Trust. He (the Attorney-General) did not attach so much importance to his negative opinion as to the affirmation of those who had so much better opportunity of understanding the subject. He (the Attorney-General) did not think it necessary to do more than refer to the sanction which the proceedings of the Harbor Trust had received from all parties affected by that expenditure. He would now say a word or two in regard to other portions of the question. The hon. member who introduced the amendment had stated that his opinion of the conduct of the Government and he thought it quite right that every member of that House should have an opportunity of stating his opinion, but he might say that while he (the Attorney-General) would not be influenced by any fur expression of his approval of that House if principle was involved, and he felt that he was right in the course he had adopted. He had always felt that it was the part of the Executive to carry out those measures which were for the good of the country, and which the representatives of the people might adopt. It might refer to his conduct while a member of an administration not responsible to the House. There were questions in that day on which the Government differed from the elective members. He had always thought those members on questions of general policy had a right to express opinions, and he did not consider that that House had called him to occupy the position he then held as the head of the Administration, to oppose himself directly to anything in which the House differed from him, when it was not a question of principle but merely of detail. Every person forming a member of an administration, if he would carry on responsible government, must know that to oppose every proposition not emanating from the Government dogmatically, would be detrimental to an extent of which those persons who had not been in office could form little idea. He was therefore surprised to hear the hon. member for Sturt and another hon. member speak as they did, for they had been in office, and therefore knew its difficulties. If he (the Attorney-General) was satisfied that the opinion of the House was in favor of a particular line of policy, and that the House was content to trust him with carrying out its views, unless some distinct principle were involved in it, he should consider it his duty to retain his place in the House, and to carry out the wishes of the majority of that House. It might be called truckling and time serving, or anything else, but he did not arrogate to himself the part of a dictator, and never desired to exert any influence in the House, except by those arguments which he intended to be convincing to hon. members; but so long as he had reason to believe that the majority of the House was willing to instruct him, as one of the members of the Government, he was contented to carry out the wishes of the House, and to act upon the principles on which he had hitherto acted, and on which he should continue to act. With regard to a strong Government, it was possible they might have been in the unfortunate position of some other of the unfortunate Australian colonies; they might have had to discuss the question of State Grants, and have been in such a position that members would have to forget all their opinions except that principal one, on which it was considered expedient to unite. In that case, they should have a Government that was a strong Government, and there would also be a strong and united opposition; but so long as there were no questions at issue, except questions of detail, every member of the House must feel that it was impossible for a Government to stand unless it was prepared to sacrifice points of detail to the majority of its supporters. It was a condition necessary to be acted upon in order to carry out the measures adopted by hon. members. He should not ask hon. members for their votes when their opinions were opposed to his, but he had a right to expect them to speak and discuss the questions that came before them in the same candid spirit.

Mr. Burford rose to order. He had been stopped for not keeping to the subject, and he thought the Attorney-General was travelling out of it.

The Speaker ruled that the Attorney-General was in order.

The Attorney-General said, had he been permitted, he would have finished in less time than was required by the hon. member to interrupt him. The remarks he had offered were consequent upon the line of argument adopted by those who moved the previous question. He (the Attorney-General) had said enough to show the principle on which he had always acted, and while, on the one hand, he would not be induced to abandon a matter of principle in deference to any opinion of the House, he was not disposed to assert his opinion in matters of detail in opposition to a majority of its members.

Mr. Peake would oppose the previous question on that occasion, and in doing so would suggest an amendment to the Commissioner of Public Works, in the title.

The Speaker stated it was not competent for the hon. member to introduce an amendment, when the previous question was moved.

Mr. Peake merely intended it as a suggestion, and believed he was in order in offering it. The suggestion was, that after the word "works," there should be added "the Port Adelaide Harbor Trust and Trinity Board." He believed that suggestion was more in order than the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Strangways). On referring to "May's Parliamentary Practice," he found it necessary that any member introducing a Bill into the House should explain the object of the Bill, and that the proper time for any lengthened debate was not on the first reading. As he found that provision had not been made in that Bill for including that Trust, he would give notice of his intention to move the insertion of those words. When the House of Commons found it necessary to alter the title of a Bill, if the Government refused, that Bill had to be brought forward by another Ministry. He was not going to say whether the Harbor Trust and Trinity Board had well or ill conducted their affairs—neither would he enter into recriminations of that Board or the Government—but would simply take the course he had adopted, because he believed all Trusts should be placed under officers responsible to the House, and he would refuse to take action in respect to those Boards, without including the Harbor Trust. The Attorney-General said he did not wish to be a dictator. He (Mr. Peake) did not believe the Attorney-General wished to be a dictator for his policy since he had been at the head of the Government and he had called himself the Head—had been anything rather than that of a dictator. His policy had been so mild that it could hardly be said to be any policy at all. The Government could be hardly got to define their ideas, and therefore he (Mr. Peake) agreed that the hon. and learned member was not a dictator by any means. He had said another thing, namely, that the duty of the Government was to carry out the will of the House, excepting on some tremendous question. Such a one was not likely to arise unless the House brought the Government to a point so as to make them declare their policy, and possibly that would be one of those occasions

Mr DUFFIELD said that until the Attorney-General rose he had intended to support the amendment, and was not sure that he should be justified in departing from that resolution He had hoped that the Treasurer would have given some reason why the Government had omitted to include the Harbor Trust in that Bill, but was disappointed He (Mr Duffield) would not blame the Harbour Trust for what they had done, but he thought that as strong a case might be made out against them as against some Boards included in that Bill He did not refer to the conduct of the Boards therefore, but to the principle The hon the Treasurer said that the Board had to place plans and estimates before the Government before money was granted to them, but if the money was refused, what was the consequence? The public works would be standing still He did not understand the Treasurer to say in such case the members of the Board were to go about their business, and that some other persons would be put in their places, indeed the Government had no power to do this, consequently the public works would stand still The inference he drew from the speech of the Attorney-General was, that if the House wished to include those trusts, the Government would not object, and consequently the previous question would not be carried, and the matter would be allowed to slip quietly by The course he should take would depend on the explanation of the Commissioner of Public Works

Mr TOWNSEND would not say one word against the Harbor Trust, for he considered its members had performed their duty The simple question was, that the Government had asked leave to bring in a Bill to amalgamate certain Boards, they had omitted one, and that, in consequence, they ought to have given the House a distinctive and positive reason for it They might have stated, when including all other Boards, why they omitted that one He had heard no arguments in favor of that omission from the Government. His opinion was that the Government should have a policy of his own, and should carefully consider the measures it introduced The Government ought not to sit and watch what was done in that House and after finding the temper of the House, do something so calm as to elude a proper expression of the feeling of the House. That course might arise because the Government did not like work, or because they have at their head a gentleman whose intellect is so clear as to enable them to meet every temporary difficulty When he (Mr Townsend) entered that House his desire was to give his full support to the Government, but that Government had watched and had always gone according to the feeling of the House Was it necessary to include the Harbor Trust in the Bill, why not included? The Attorney-General had intimated he would not retort, but he thought the Attorney General would not assume that hon gentlemen were biassed in making passing remarks when they simply stated facts One hon gentleman in saying that 22,000 tons of silt had been removed, merely stated a fact, and did not intend to charge the gentlemen who were on the Harbor Trust He should support the "previous question," and hoped it would teach the Government what he thought ought to be their policy He thought it necessary that the Government in bringing in all Bills should state pretty distinctly their motives to the House, and not wait when they had their Bill on the table for the opinion of the House, because they were not dictators

Mr DUNN hoped the hon member who moved the previous question would ask leave to withdraw his amendment He (Mr Dunn) thought the Harbor Trust had done its duty, but thought it strange that while other Boards were proposed to be united under one head, that Trust should be left out It took seven years to get the Central Road Board into working order, and he believed the country at large was perfectly satisfied with its proceedings, yet it was brought under the Bill The Attorney-General distinctly said all other Boards except the Harbour Trust ought to be under responsible officers and he (Mr Dunn) thought it strange one having the control of so much money should have been left out

Mr BARROW also hoped the amendment would be withdrawn with the understanding that the Harbor Trust should be included in the Bill If that was promised there would be no necessity for the carrying of the previous question He regretted that discussions should arise censuring the general policy of the Government, when no resolution was on the table involving that policy He would be prepared to take part in a vote of want of confidence or "no confidence" in the Government but would not be a party to censuring them indirectly, because public business by such a course would be greatly retarded, and the House would be placed in a false position by supporting in office those whom it denounced as unfit to hold it With respect to such expressions as "clinging" and "time-serving," if the Government deserved those appellations the House ought to bring the question to issue at once by a vote of want of confidence (Loud cheers from the Government.) If the Harbor Trust were included in the Bill he should support the Commissioner of Public Works, if not he should support the previous question

Mr BAGOT wished the previous question to be withdrawn and the Bill allowed to be read There would be an opportunity to offer any remarks on the second reading of the Bill, as to whether it was advisable to include the Harbor Trust or not in that particular Bill He thought there was something to be said in favour of not including it in that Bill and in bringing it forward in some measure with the Trinity Board With regard to the observations made by the Attorney-General on Responsible Government, every member of the old Council, before that measure was introduced, looked upon him as anxious for any change that would give to the country complete responsible Government He (Mr Bagot) believed the country was indebted to the Attorney-General for so large a share as they possessed, and regretted to hear what had fallen from him that day He could not understand the Attorney-General when he said that because there was no great question before the House, it was not necessary that the Government should do more than yield to its wishes He (Mr Bagot) could not see how that was consonant with the idea of responsible Government It appeared to him that it was the duty of Ministers to take care that their measures should be such as to render them willing to stake their existence on their success, that they ought to look out of doors and see what was wanted and although in minor details they might sometimes give way, still, if necessary, the Ministers of the country should say, "we have well considered the matter, and do not look to any support in that House arising from popular favor" They ought not to say they had no policy, because there was no great question before them A Minister under responsible Government ought always to have a policy If they had not one it would be well to go back to the consideration of a proposition in a former House, that in their opinion it would be better for hon members in a Government not responsible, should be allowed always to remain in office, and never retire in any case, and that that should be the form of Government, and not that of responsible Government But he knew the Attorney-General too well not to think he was still as much in favor of responsible Government as before

Mr MCELLISTER would oppose the previous question He thought it sufficient to say he would support that which he considered for the public benefit He believed the present Government as likely as any other to carry on the business of the country

Mr HAY rose to support the introduction of the Bill, although he believed to include the Harbor Trust would be a decided improvement, and could not see why it had not been done, except on the grounds that it might endanger the passing of that Bill through the other House It had that effect last session and if that were again to be the effect, he would like it introduced as a separate Bill It was high time they had a Board of Works instead of Water Commissioners and Railway Commissioners, and that Board ought to be responsible He could not agree with the hon member for Light, that the Government ought to stake its existence in any such question as that It was a strange doctrine to come from that quarter, that a minister should introduce a Bill, and unless the House passed it as introduced, the Government should leave those benches He could not endorse such a doctrine In England, if Her Majesty's Ministers failed to carry their measures, the Government gave up office, and the seats they occupied would be taken by their opponents, but, he should be sorry to see the Government here act on that principle He would support the motion to include the Harbor Trust, and hoped the Government would not throw any impediment in the way

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to explain The hon member for Light omitted one condition which he (the Attorney-General) had stated as necessary to his continuance in office, which was so long as he retained the confidence of that House he would not resign—as soon as that confidence was withdrawn he would resign

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that, as long as he had had the honor to occupy a seat in the Legislature, he had never heard a motion of such a simple character met in such a spirit as the present one He had heard some hon members speak of it as if it was a motion for the second reading of a Bill, and other hon members spoke of it as a motion for a first reading, whereas it was nothing of the kind, but merely a motion for leave to introduce a Bill It was not customary, although he regretted that he had not entered more fully into the nature of this measure, but it was not customary to do so at that early stage He should have entered into a much fuller explanation if he had been moving a second reading, a position which he hoped to occupy yet, but in the meantime he would remind the House that this was no new measure, but one which had been under the consideration of the Government for a good while past, and he could appeal to one hon member at least who knew that it was not a new measure It was considered better that the Harbor Board and that both should be rendered responsible to should be amalgamated with the Trinity Board, the House It was never his wish to perpetuate the Harbor Board, but, on the contrary, to make all the Boards responsible to that House This, he understood, was also the view of the hon member, Mr Burford, who had said in his speech on the address, in reply to His Excellency's Speech, that there was a distinction between the Harbor Trust and the other Boards The affairs of the Railway Board or the Water Commission, or the Electric Telegraph, might be managed in the city of Adelaide, but it was not so easy to manage the affairs of the Harbor Trust away from the Port He had never said that he would prop up the irresponsibility of the Harbor Trust, and it mattered little to him, as he was not trimming or shuffling, or seeking to secure his position in the Elysian fields of office but his only wish was to introduce the responsibility of the Harbor Trust in connection with the Trinity Board There was no matter of principle involved, but merely differences on points of detail, as to the Telegraph Department, there was no intention to interfere with the gentleman now at the head of that department, but merely to alter the title of an officer who had conducted that department with the highest credit to himself and advantage to the country It appeared to him that the whole question was, whether the House would allow the Government to make a move in what was acknowledged to be the right direction or not The House said and the Government said that the course proposed was one which was called for throughout the length and breadth of the land, that, in fact, these irresponsible Boards should no longer be permitted to exist and if after that they affirmed the previous question, there could be but one solution to it

Mr STRANGWAYS withdrew his amendment

In reply to an enquiry by Mr PEAKE—

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was the intention of the Government to proceeed with the Bill, leaving hon members the power to alter the preamble or any other part in Committee

The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The TREASURER moved that the House go into Committee upon the Bill, and the Speaker left the Chair accordingly

Mr BAGOT wished to move the insertion of a clause repealing the clause in the Customs Act of 1854, imposing a duty on corn sacks Sacks for wool and ore were admitted free, and certainly the agricultural population of the country required as much fostering care as those connected with mining or wool growing

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL pointed out that the Bill before the House would not be the proper one in which to insert such a clause, as it was not a Bill imposing duties but merely providing for the collection of duties previously imposed If the hon member would give notice of his intention to introduce a Bill for the purpose he had mentioned, he (the Attorney-General would be prepared to receive it favorably

Mr HART thought, as this was a Bill to amend the Customs Act, it would come properly within its scope to remove what was generally felt as a grievance.

Mr WARK was also of opinion that the proposed amendment should come under this Bill

Mr NEALES would support a Bill for this purpose if the hon member (Mr Bagot) introduced one, but did not think that the proper place to introduce such a clause

The TREASURER said the Government were not at all unfavorable to the object proposed by the hon member for the Light, but the Bill before the House would be a most inconvenient place to introduce such an amendment, inasmuch as it had reference to the Customs department generally, and had nothing to do with the tariff

Mr BURFORD would go with the Government, believing that if they admitted a charge in that one item, they might have to bring in the whole tariff, which would have a very curious effect

Mr BAGOT under the circumstances would withdraw his notice, but would on the following day give notice that he would move that an address be presented, praying that His Excellency would cause a Bill to be laid upon the table, repealing the duty on cornsacks

The preamble and title of the Bill were then passed without amendment

The House having resumed, the Bill was reported, the report adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for Thursday

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved the second reading of this Bill When he asked for leave to introduce it he explained that its primary object was to remove some difficulties which had arisen under two clauses of the Waste Lands Act of last session It was found that an injustice would be committed against the leaseholders under the Crown, holding for one year, if these runs were put up to auction, inasmuch as the lands comprised in the annual lease were taken from the land comprised in the fourteen years' leases, and it was only just that some conditions should be imposed as to the mode of alienating them There were 1,400 leases issued for the year, and they yielded a revenue of 700*l* per annum The Government took the opportunity of introducing a Bill to amend the Waste Lands Act of last session, in order to remedy the inconveniences of which he had spoken He did not propose to take the Bill through Committee that day, as he understood one hon member proposed to introduce a clause which was not yet quite prepared In the event of the Bill being read a second time he should go into Committee pro forma, and postpone its further consideration to a future day

Mr HAY said it occurred to him that if they passed that Bill it would be a retrograde step, for he found that the first clause conferred an advantage upon the holders of leases or rather upon the graziers, whilst it took an advantage away from the bona fide purchaser of land, the man who was pushing his farming into the interior of the country, and whose advantages should be rather extended than curtailed The first clause provided that when hundreds were proclaimed, the holders of leases should still retain possession of the commonage of the land held under their former lease Now, he maintained that when explorers pushed out into the country so as to justify the Government in proclaiming hundreds, and when the land began to be settled, it was full time that the commonage should be the property of the settlers who purchased land, and not of those who occupied it merely as a sheep-walk The land in many proclaimed hundreds was still occupied only as sheep runs, and a great many settlers where he was a few days previously in the Hundred of Light, complained to him that there were flocks of sheep running right up to their boundaries, so that they had some trouble in keeping them out of their land If the Government were to adopt some such plan as that when a hundred was proclaimed after there were 20, 30, or 50 sections sold, they would allow the holder of, say 50 or 100 acres, the right of commonage for 16 or 20 head of cattle, it would be a good arrangement Instead of allowing the leaseholders unlimited commonage, an estimate should be made of what quantity of stock the commonage of the hundred could carry after appropriating a sufficient amount for the purchaser and if after that there were sufficient pasturage for, say 500 head, let that be put up to auction, and let the highest bidder have it This system might be very easily so arranged that the last purchaser would lose the right of commonage, as the land was brought under settlement, but he must oppose any attempt to tie up the lands to the old lessees There were many hundreds which, if this system were carried out, instead of being let at 20s a square mile, would let at £40 and £50, and therefore to pass this Bill would be throwing away many thousands of pounds which might be brought into the Treasury He thought the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands must have overlooked the great duty which the Government owed the country in making the most of the public lands He had no desire to interfere with the rights of the graziers or squatters, whichever they might be called, but when the bona fide settlers came upon the land, it was high time for the squatters to give way, He had heard many complaints lately that South Australia was importing dairy produce, such as cheese and butter, and he contended that if the principle of that Bill were carried out, it would do away almost altogether with the dairy farming of the colony He found that in the last clause power was reserved to the Government to apportion the number of cattle to be kept on the various hundreds, but that should be settled by the clause in the Bill estimating the proportion of stock at an uniform rate, and pasturage for a given number of cattle should be given to the holder of 100 acres or so, in order that the bona fide occupier of the public lands might not be swallowed up by the leaseholders The Government should give every encouragement to the dairy farmers for this colony was far behind, and Victoria very far indeed, in this respect, when they looked at the immense amount of money being sent to England and America for dairy produce He thought the object ought to be to declare a much larger quantity of land than at present in hundreds, and to give the bona fide settlers the right to run their cattle on the unpurchased land

Mr STRANGWAYS though the hon member for Gumeracha mistook the effect of the Bill At present, the squatter having a 14 years' lease, on the land being proclaimed a Hundred, would forfeit his lease The effect of the present Bill would only be to put the lessees of the land in the same position as they held prior to the passing of the Waste Lands Act of last Session There appeared to be some slight conflict between the fourth clause and the first, but this he presumed would be removed in Committee

Mr LINDSAY was not present when the hon member for Gumeracha made his opening remarks, but he read the clause in the same way as that hon member There would be no advantage in a person buying a section of land if he only got the use of the 80 acres which he purchased Unless the clause could be modified, he should go with the member for Gumeracha

Mr HAWKER thought the hon members who had last spoken were under a mistake, as under the present regulations when a hundred was taken from a squatter, the first proceeding was to set apart commonage at the ordinary rate for the cattle of the hundred, of one head of large or five of small cattle for five acres He would give every purchaser a right of commonage for a fair proportion of small cattle

Dr WARK said the Bill was merely intended to restore the order of things which had worked so well for a long time He would not take away the right of commonage, but it would be a hard case if a man discovered a run at a distance which was not required for cultivation, that it should be proclaimed a hundred, and that he should be compelled to compete for it at public auction

Mr NEALES thought they should allow the Bill to be read a second time, but when the proper time came it would not be right to allow the squatter unlimited power as to the quantity of stock he should put on the land He should only be allowed to run his cattle in a fair proportion to the amount of sold land, but if the leases were left open the squatter might put on such a quantity of stock that the right of pasturage would be worth nothing

Mr McELLISTER expressed his intention of supporting the views of the hon member for Gumeracha (Mr Hay)

Mr DUFFIELD supported the second reading Some hon gentlemen were, he thought, not quite clear as to what the former practice was, but he thought it very fair and reasonable, and he believed hon members would agree with him in thinking so When runs were wanted for public purposes, six months notice was given to give up possession, and then the land was surveyed, and at a fixed time the Government allowed for every five acres of purchased land a right to depasture on the waste lands within the hundred one large or five small cattle Then supposing that at the expiration of the year, which was reckoned at the end of June, there was a large extent of the run upon which there were no cattle grazing, the Government were accustomed to grant annual leases to the individuals who previously held the runs He thought the system had worked well

The House then divided on the motion, that the Bill be read a second time, when there appeared —

AYES, 21—The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands (teller), the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Bakewell, Barrow, Duffield, Dunn, Glyde, Hallett, Hart, Hawker Hughes, Macdermott, Mildred, Neales, Peake, Reynolds, Strangways, Solomon, and Dr Wark

NOES, 6 —Messrs Hay (teller), Lindsay, McEllister, Milne, Rogers, and Townsend,

Majority for the second reading, 15

The House then went into Committee on the Bill

The preamble was postponed

On clause 1—

Mr LINDSAY hoped the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would postpone the further consideration of the Bill for a few days, in order to allow the measure to be more closely looked into If the clause were passed he believed it would do more to raise a cry against the squatters—and with justice—than was ever raised before The clause stated that settlers were to run no more stock than they had purchased land for, unless they went to the original leaseholder and made terms with him, It did not seem to him that the object for which the hundreds were declared could be carried out at all, if the clause were passed The object of the hundreds was to have the land settled by farmers and not by squatters It would be better that no hundreds should be proclaimed at all, than that this clause should pass

Mr BARROW hoped the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would give some information to the House on this point, as he did not understand the clause as preventing the purchaser of a section from having any right of commonage whatever But to some hon members it did not seem clear whether the purchaser of a section had a right of pasturage outside his own boundary or not He (Mr Barrow) was of opinion that, whilst we should not proclaim hundreds in order to drive squatters out of them, still we should give all facility to purchasers of land and bona fide settlers It was not, however the question of the squatter against the agriculturist which they were now called upon to discuss, as there would be a much better opportunity of going into that subject when the Assessment Bill was before the House

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the hon member for Encounter Bay was quite right in supposing that the hundreds were proclaimed for the benefit of the agriculturists, and it was for that purpose he desired to see them proclaimed As Commissioner of Crown Lands, he had taken a large slice out of his brother s run in order to proclaim it, thinking it would be a desirable place for agricultural settlement One head of great cattle and six of small (which were considered equivalent to six large) to every five acres of Crown land was the proportion allowed, but if this was not considered sufficient, it would be very easy to alter the proportion This was the proportion which had been allowed for years, and he had never heard any great complaints on the subject He hoped hon members would not oppose the clause, as it was not intended to confer any new privileges but only to keep faith with the leaseholders

Mr MILNE agreed most cordially with the proposition of the hon member for Gumeracha, believing that if they renewed annually to squatters the tenure of their leases within hundreds, they would neutralise the right of pasturage altogether, as the squatter had no limit set to the amount of stock he might keep The squatters had already caused much bad feeling against themselves amongst the agriculturists because they would not retreat in proper time, but if they studied the interests of the agriculturists a little more, they would not incur the odium they had provoked

Mr HART said the hon member for Onkaparinga had not made a very strong case, for it was not likely that a squatter with an annual lease would put more cattle on his run than it could carry, including those of the persons who had a right of commonage. In many hundreds there was not a section sold, as for instance on the Murray, where there were hundreds of miles of country, without a single section sold Yet, if they were to take the proposition of the hon member for Onkaparinga, any person purchasing an 80 acre section in one of these runs, would have the same right of pasturage as the man who took up the country originally The right of pasturage was declared by the regulations to be confined to a certain number of cattle to each 80 acres, and he thought this a fair and wise arrangement, which did not require alteration in the Bill before the House To say that because in certain portions of the country, hundreds were proclaimed, the whole country should be thrown open, was unjust In a few years the leases of the first occupiers of the land would have expired, and there would be no time to make alterations The effect of the alteration proposed by the hon member for Gumeracha would be a strong opposition to the proclaiming of hundreds at all, and thus a system, which had proved valuable in opening up the country, and in affording facilities for the obtaining of land, would be in all probability discontinued The proposed change would not prove a benefit to the agriculturist, and it would ruin at one fell swoop, those who in the absence of any better right had a right to the land

Mr STRANGWAYS agreed with the hon member for the Port, that one effect of the proposed alteration would be to cause a grand scramble, in which the first in the field would get the whole hundred It would not benefit the agriculturist, but would end in the transfer of the large runs from one to another of the wealthy squatters

The TREASURER thought the clause as it stood would carry out the objects of hon members The only objection to it seemed to be, that the squatter who held portions of a hundred on an annual lease, would put on it a greater proportion of cattle than it could carry, and thereby damage the purchasers of the neighboring land, but he thought that was not likely to occur at all, as the squatter would not put cattle there to starve, and as to their trespassing on purchased land, there was the impounding law It would be unfair that the squatter should be subject to the competition of the landholder, after having been subjected to competition before, as the first competition was supposed to settle the value of the pasturage

Mr NEALES would suggest to the hon member for Gumeracha another point That hon member struggled for the rights of the agriculturists, contending that when they went out into the country, they should receive some greater advantages than when they were in the settled districts But the struggle would not be between the landholder coming in and the squatter going out, but between squatter and squatter, and the advantage would be with whoever had the longest purse. If he were a squatter himself, he would not respect the rights of the people more than the law compelled him, and neither would the squatters do so As to the regulation that there should be one head of large and six of small cattle he wished to know whether that was in the the wording of the Act

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that it was fixed by proclamation

Mr NEALES—Then the Governor could increase it to 2 and 12, as being merely an order of the Governor, it was elastic The proposal of the hon member for Gumeracha would not benefit the agriculturist in the way in which the hon member wished, for the wealthy squatter would not allow the small farmer to outbid him Another result would be, that there would be an indisposition on the part of the Government to interfere with the squatters

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said these rights of the leaseholders had now been in existence since March, 1853 They had worked well, and he was not aware that the amount of cattle allowed in proportion to the purchased land had ever been complained of

Mr HUGHES said there was a vagueness in the clause, which compelled him to vote against it

Mr MILNE did not consider that the present state of the law imposed any hardship That portion which was proclaimed a hundred was put up to auction He should like, however, to see the law so modified that when a place was proclaimed a hundred, it should be subdivided into smaller runs, and thus prevent the squatter from exercising that power which the hon member for the City seemed to dread He was aware that squatters had been in the habit of annoying their agricultural neighbors, by eating them out, as it was termed (Laughter) He should like to see the Government adopt such measures as would remedy this evil

Mr HAY pointed out that under the proposed regulations a man who purchased 100 acres of land and had got 50 head of cattle must sell 30 of them before he could go away How any member of that House could say that this would be an improvement upon the present system, he was at a loss to conceive Many persons bought land for the express purpose of obtaining the runs, but now they would derive no advantage whatever, and it would be placing a power in the hands of the squatter, which he had certainly never expected to see introduced This would in fact be altering the whole system of dealing with Crown Lands

Mr LINDSAY said the hon member, Mr Hughes, had referred to the regulations of 1853, but the Act under which the lands were now leased was only passed last session, and it seemed to him doubtful whether the rights under the old Act were not virtually defeated by the Act of last session With regard to the rights of the squatters he should be sorry to infringe upon their rights unjustly, but they were supposed to possess a great many which they really did not An immense amount of pasturage had been promised to purchasers of preliminary sections, but this had never been granted though he believed those parties could enforce it if they liked

CAPTAIN HART said the debate had taken altogether a different turn, and it was not now what would be the advantage of purchasers of 80 acre sections, but whether by one stroke of the pen they should say that there shall be no squatting licenses within the hundreds It was quite clear than if the clause objected to were to be done away with every man's run must be put up yearly to auction The question after all was this—did the hon member for Gumeracha desire that the law should be altered or not As the law at present stood the squatter within the hundreds had certain rights which he understood the hon member for Gumeracha wished to do away with Instead of the clause under discussion altering the law, it merely confirmed it as it was at present They certainly should not alter a law to the detriment of the squatters without affording them opportunities of being heard at the bar of the House, or by petition to shew what their rights were The hon member evidently wished to change the law to the disadvantage of the squatter, but as the Bill did not affect the question as it existed at that moment, he did not see how he could make out a valid objection unless he brought in a bill to alter the present law

Mr PEAKE had every wish to consider the just rights of the squatters, and to protect the onward march of the agriculturists but he should like to take action gradually The policy hitherto was that as the squatters receded the agriculturists advanced When a hundred was declared, or a portion of a hundred, and only a little was sold or alienated, it would be impolitic and unwise virtually to confiscate the squatter's run by breaking his lease and declaring that portion of his run a hundred He did not see what advantage the community would derive from such a course, but it might perhaps meet the views of hon members if all the words after "assessments" in the sixth line were struck out down to the word "without" Very many he knew had suffered severe inconvenience and loss from sheep and cattle belonging to adjoining runs depasturing upon these lands, and it would be well to adopt such a plan as would enable the Executive to put a stop to this

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose merely for the purpose of explanation, and not to take part in the discussion of the main question The reason that the words which had been objected to had been introduced was to limit the power of the Government, so that they could not grant these lands for a longer term than the original lease No person had a right, moral or equitable, to a longer term than the original lease specified, and it was to prevent this term being extended that the words had been introduced

Mr NEALES thought the hon member for Onkaparinga had not seen one predicament which his system would place them in The hon member proposed that the land should be put up in various lots, but if this were to be the case agriculturists could by combination take the finest run in the colony The hon member was going to overturn the whole squatting interest of the country He did not wish to quote the extreme case of the Murray, which Sir Henry Young declared a hundred, and wanted to sell ten acre blocks to parties who would go and disturb the squatters The hon member proposed to divide the run into small lots to enable the dairy farmers to come and purchase, but he did not think that the House were prepared to break faith with the squatters in that way If they treated the squatters with such indignities, they would find when the main question came on as to the fair proportion of the public burdens which the squatter should bear, sympathy would be turned in a directly contrary way to that which it had been If they acted with injustice in reserving more rights to the agriculturists than they were entitled to, when they came to the large claim upon the squatter, they would not obtain it

Mr MILNE remarked that the Hundred of the Murray was an exceptional case No other hundred was laid out in so ridiculous a manner

Mr MACDERMOTT considered that so long as the purchasers of land enjoyed the right of depasturing stock within the Hundred they had nothing to complain of, as they enjoyed all they purchased but it would be acting unjustly to deprive the squatter of the commonage for which he held a lease, and he hoped the House would not listen to such a proposition The Bill did not alter the law, but merely retained it as it was at present, there was no reason to alter it

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was about to propose an addition to the clause which had been sketched out by the Attorney General, and would, he thought, meet all reasonable views If the propositions of the hon member for Gumeracha were carried out to the full extent, it appeared to him the squatters might at once tear their leases into shreds, as they would not be worth the paper on which they were written The addition which he wished to propose was, "provided that any such leases shall be subject to the rights of commonage to purchased land within the hundred, subject to such regulations as may be issued from time to time"

Mr HAY thought at that late hour it would be much better that the clause should be postponed, as if the clause were passed as it stood, even with the addition which was proposed, it would place the holder of a lease in direct antagonism to the owner of purchased land It was ridiculous to say that the leases of the squatters were endangered, as no attempt was made to meddle with land beyond the Hundreds He could not conceive how hon members could adopt a policy which could confirm leases at 1l a square mile, and then say that they would sell so many lots in the vicinity There were large quantities of land in the neighborhood of Gawler and elsewhere, which were worth £20 a square mile, and would fetch it if put up to-morrow It would pay a party holding the lease to run up the section which he was holding He had never read the Bill till that day, and the moment he read the clause in question it struck him as absurd It would place the holder of a lease in direct antagonism to the purchaser, but if there were common age for a hundred head of cattle beyond what was wanted for the purchased land, he had no objection to such commonage being put up to auction, as this would not be any injustice to the squatter, with whom he would be the last to interfere beyond the hundreds Before this clause was passed they should give every farmer in the colony a right to be heard at the bar of the House, or by petition in support of his rights

Mr MILNE moved that the debate be adjourned

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that the Government had no wish whatever to press the Bill or any particular clause, through the House hurriedly, and he would therefore ask the Chairman to report progress He hoped hon members would look at this question in its true light, for it was a very important one, and from the manner in which the hon member for Gumeracha had put it, he now saw it in a more important light than he had ever viewed it before He had never had any doubt as to the course which the Legislature should pursue in dealing with this question, and certainly could not agree with the hon member for Gumeracha, whose proposition, if carried into effect during the currency of the leases, would be a breach of faith to the leaseholders of the Crown The Government had the power to declare hundreds in different parts under a clause in the leases as necessities required If the proposition of the hon member for Gumeracha were carried out to the full extent, any Government which might succeed the present one might, by a simple proclamation, cut up all the waste lands of the colony, and the leases of the squatters would not be worth the paper on which they were written He could not look upon such a proposition, if carried out, in any other light than a breach of faith The Government now deprived the squatters of large portions of land as necessities arose, large portions were sold to meet the public requirements, and it would, he thought, be unjust to do more

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress and obtained leave to sit again on Tuesday

CITY AND PORT RAILWAY

The COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a return showing the number of rails which had been renewed upon the City and Port Railway

Ordered to be printed

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Upon the motion of the Treasurer, the further consideration of the Supplementary Estimates was postponed till Thursday

STANDING ORDERS

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER of PUBLIC WORKS the consideration of the report of the Committee upon Standing Orders was postponed till Tuesday next

The House adjourned at five minutes past 5 o clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

The PRESIDENT informed the House that in pursuance of a motion by Captain Bagot, and adopted by that House, Sept 21, he had forwarded an address to His Excellency the Governor, praying him to take the necessary steps towards arming the male population of the colony, for the purpose of defence against foreign invasion

NEWSPAPER REPORTS

The Hon Captain BAGOT said that before they proceeded with the regular business of the House he would, with permission, call attention to some mistakes which had been made in the report of his speech in the Advertiser of this day In the first place he was made to say, that in the case of "a French frigate landing 3,000 or 4,000 men," &c, when the number stated by him was from 300 to 400 And further down in the debate he was made to say that "a man with two heads was better than one with one only" (Laughter) Hon members would at once perceive that he had made use of no such expression If the reports simply ended were they began he should not have cared about it, but when the members of that House had it from common report that these reports would be lodged in the archives of the colony, he thought it was only becoming in them that they should be correctly printed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the hon member had the opportunity given to him of correcting the report for the Hansard if he wished

THE STEAM DREDGE

The Hon Mr AYERS wished for a reply from the Chief Secretary in reference to the question about the steam-dredge, which had been mooted the previous day, and to which the Chief Secretary had promised to reply

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY replied that the steam-dredge was at present employed in deepening the Harbour of Port Adelaide, commencing at the lower part, which it would deepen to 200 feet, increasing to 300 feet where the ships were moored in the stream

The Hon Mr AYERS moved, pursuant to notice—

"That an Address be presented to his Excellency the Governor in-Chief, accompanied by a copy of the congratulatory Address of this Council to Her Majesty the Queen on the Marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal of England with his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia and by a copy of the Resolution of this Council deputing to the Honourable John Baker, the presentation of such Address to Her Majesty on behalf of this Council, and praying that His Excellency will be pleased to forward such copies to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, with an intimation that the Address to Her Majesty has been placed in the hands of the Honorable John Baker for presentation, pursuant to the aforesaid resolution"

The object of this motion was to give effect to a previously expressed resolution of that House His wish now was that His Excellency the Governor should be requested to co-operate

The Hon Mr FORSTER seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously

THE LATE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS

The Hon Mr FORSTER, pursuant to notice, asked the Chief Secretary whether the following statement made by the late Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Reynolds), in his communication to him, under date of the 8th June, 1858, be correct —'That he was specially desirous of consulting his colleagues on the subject of his dispute with the Railway Commissioners, but that, unfortunately, their continued absence from Adelaide prevented him In fact, after visiting office after office, and finding no one, he gave up the chase after his colleagues, and acted upon his own responsibility The hon gentleman deemed it due to the Hon the Chief Secretary, and to the country, that the question should be put, so that an explanation might be made as to whether the charges made by the late Commissioner of Public Works had any foundation in fact, or otherwise

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said, in reply, that on referring to the records in his office, he found that during the month of May he had been in town from the 4th to the 7th, and from the 12th to the 31st inclusive, during which time he was attending to the duties of his department The hon Mr Forster would see on adverting to the correspondence to which he alluded, that those letters in which Mr Reynolds was specially desirous of consulting his colleagues, were dated the 5th, 10th, 11th, 14th, 17th, 21st May During the time this correspondence was pending, he had had at least one interview with Mr Reynolds on matters of Government business, but no allusion was ever made by that gentleman to the circumstance that grave differences existed between himself and the Railway Commissioners A Cabinet Council was held on the 18th May, at which, although Mr Reynolds was present, no mention was made relative to the matter in dispute Therefore Mr Reynolds, in making the statement in the letter quoted by the Hon Mr Forster, "that he had had no opportunity of consulting the Chief Secretary on the subject of his despatch with the Railway Commissioners, in consequence of his continued absence from home,' made a statement which was not merely at variance with fact, but the opposite of truth Having answered the question of the hon Mr Forster, he would, with the permission of the House, only further observe that whenever he was succeeded in the arduous and responsible office which he then held, and he cared not personally how soon that ceased, his successor would find that the business of the country had been carefully attended to, that no arrears existed, but that every matter had been at once looked into, and disposed of without delay, and he would say fearlessly that he had discharged to the best of his ability, faithfully and diligently his duty to the public of this colony

On the motion of the Hon Mr BAGOT, seconded by the Hon Mr AYERS, this Bill was read a third time and passed with instructions that it should be forwarded to the House of Assembly, desiring the concurrence of that House in the measure

CONFIRMATION OF REGISTRATION BILL

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, this Bill was read a third time, and passed, with instructions that it should be forwarded to the House of Assembly, desiring the concurrence of that House in the measure

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

In Committee

The CHIEF SECRETARY said that to meet the previously expressed views of the House, he would consent, in the 12th line of the 5th clause, to the words "or any Judge" being struck out

The words in question were consequently omitted and the clause was passed as amended

Clause 36 "Appeal"

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, the last six words of this clause, viz, "of the province of South Australia," were struck out, and the following substituted for them —"Which court may affirm, alter, or reverse such decision, in whole or in part, or dismiss the appeal, as may be just"

Clause passed as amended

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY submitted an additional clause (41) to be placed at the end of the Bill, viz —'That this Act be cited as a Matrimonial Causes Act'

Clause passed

In the 6th line of the preamble the words "by and with" were struck out The preamble was passed as amended

The House resumed

The PRESIDENT reported the Bill with the amendments, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

NEWSPAPER REPORTS

The Hon Mr BAKER would, before the House adjourned, call attention to the inaccurate way in which the reports of that House were being prepared He especially alluded to the report of his speech in the House the day previously The hon gentleman did not describe wherein the inaccuracy occurred, but proceeded to criticize the arrangement made for reporting the debates in Parliament, to which said that hon gentleman "I have not assented" He questioned the right of members to take from, add to, or otherwise alter their speeches, without some competent authority to say what was correct

The Council then adjourned

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

RAILWAY EXTENSION

Mr PEAKE presented a petition from nearly 200 landholders of the Hundred of Upper Wakefield, praying for consideration in reference to railway extension by the Valley of the Gilbert The petitioners were stated to represent the owners of between 30,000 and 40,000 acres of land in the locality referred to

THE UNEMPLOYED

Mr SOLOMON presented a petition from 326 working men out of employment, praying the House to commence reproductive works without delay for the purpose of affording them employment

THE TELEGRAPH

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a return which had been moved for by the hon member, Mr Barrow, shewing the number of messages transmitted by the telegraph, together with a letter from the Inspector explanatory of the return

The return was ordered to be printed

POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table the report of the naval officer of the province upon the subject of the expense and delay consequent upon the Ocean Mail Steamers calling at Port Adelaide upon their outward route As it was intended that this communication should be forwarded to the Governments of the various Australian colonies, it was desirable that it should be put upon the table of the House

It was ordered to be printed

Mr BAGOT asked the Attorney-General if the return was in reply to a question which he had placed upon the notice paper for that day, as follows —

"That he will ask the Hon the Treasurer (Mr Finniss) whether any steps have been taken with respect to the contract for the conveyance of the mails between England and this country, and will move—'That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to lay any papers and despatches relating thereto on the table of the House'"

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that last Friday he laid upon the table of the House a despatch from His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, upon the subject The paper which he had just laid upon the table completed the information which the Government were in a position to give at present If they had any more in their possession they would be happy to afford it

SWAN RIVER

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL remarked that he observed the following notice of motion upon the paper, and seeing that the hon member who had given it (Mr Duffield) was present, he would at once reply to it It was as follows —

"That it appearing from the police reports of the 11th and 12th August last, that John Smith alias Phil Dixon a convicted felon, had been sent to this colony free by the Western Australian Government, he will ask the Hon the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) if the Government have taken or intend to take any steps to inquire into the circumstances which led to this step on the the part of that Government, and will move that all papers or despatches on this subject be laid upon the table of this House."

A letter had been written calling the attention of the Government of Swan River to the subject, and requesting such information as would enable the members of the Government to satisfy the Legislature. It was a subject which could not fail to attract the attention of the Legislature. The hon. gentleman laid the despatch to the Government of Swan River, with the enclosure, upon the table, and the despatch was ordered to be printed.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION

Mr. BARROW asked the Attorney-General if he could give an answer to the question which stood in his name upon the paper on the previous day:—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Attorney-General (Mr. Hanson) whether any correspondence has passed between this Government and the Government of the Mauritius, relative to steam postal communication, in accordance with an Address of the House to that effect agreed to on the 14th May last, and whether any reply has been received."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said a despatch had been written to the Government of Mauritius, to which replies had been received, and that further action had been deferred till it had been ascertained what steps would be taken in reference to ocean steamers calling at Kangaroo Island. In the meantime information which would form the basis of an arrangement had been obtained from the Government of the Mauritius.

CUSTOMS RETURNS

The TREASURER laid upon the table Customs returns showing the imports and exports, immigration, ships inwards and outwards, &c., to the 30th June last.

SUPERANNUATION FUND

The TREASURER laid upon the table returns in compliance with a resolution of the House respecting repayments in connection with the Superannuation Fund.

LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. COLE wished to ask the Attorney-General a question in reference to a Bill which the hon. gentleman had promised to bring forward in reference to level crossings. At the close of last session he (Mr. Cole) as the Chairman of a Select Committee, brought up a report, which was not adopted, upon the understanding that the Attorney-General would bring in a Bill upon the subject, of a general nature, and not merely applicable to Bowden.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government intended to bring in a Bill to carry out that object.

FREE DISTILLATION

Mr. TOWNSEND rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, all restrictions on the free exercise of distillation should be abolished."

In bringing forward that motion, he begged to assure the Government that he was not actuated by any feeling of hostility to them, and, indeed, he and other hon. members wished it to be understood that they did not represent an opposition merely because they sat on that side of the House. It was well known that free distillation had long been a growing question in the colony. The great body of the agricultural population had year after year demanded a release from all restriction upon distillation, and they were led to believe from what transpired during last session, that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject during the present session. From the character of individual members of the Government, and the tone of the debates that session, they were fully justified in entertaining the hope that a Bill removing all restrictions would have been introduced during the early part of the present session. The Bill introduced by Dr. Wark was regarded only as a temporary measure. It would not, he thought, be denied that the public were led to expect a Bill, and when the Address to His Excellency came on for discussion he regretted to find the question of distillation passed over in a way which he had certainly not expected at the hands of the present Government. He had not moved any amendment on that occasion, but rather preferred to place a notice upon the paper as it now appeared, because he wished to ascertain the feelings of the members of the Government upon this question. He did not wish to embarrass them, but from their individual character, the pledges they had given, and the speeches they had made, he had a right to expect the Government would have been prepared to deal with this question and to settle it. The opponents of the measure said that persons who were in favour of free distillation must go for free trade entirely. He for one did go for free trade entirely, and should be quite prepared to take part in providing for the revenue. He would remind the Government of the course they pursued last session, when Mr. Waterhouse, the member for East Torrens, brought forward his motion. Mr. Blyth was so strongly in favor of free distillation that he passed severe strictures upon the Committee who brought up their report upon the subject, and stated that their report would have been different if it had been brought up as originally proposed, but that the report which recommended the repeal of all restrictions had been withdrawn. The hon. gentleman denied at that time that drunkenness would be increased by a removal of all restrictions upon distillation, drunkenness depending upon the natural disposition. The hon. gentleman urged that the vine took more kindly to this soil than any other, as some gentlemen do to the Government benches, and that the falling off in the vine in other countries showed that this colony was favorable. In conclusion the hon. gentleman declared that he believed a removal of all restrictions would benefit the social and moral condition of the colony. After that he (Mr. Townsend) believed he should have the support of the Commissioner of Public Works. It was evident from what took place last session that if Mr. Waterhouse's motion had been proceeded with as originally intended, there would have been a large majority in its favor. The Government of the day consented, through Mr. Torrens, the then Treasurer, to it, but it was suggested to the hon. member for East Torrens that he should withdraw his motion, and substitute one from the Treasury benches. He was aware that the gentlemen forming the present Ministry were not bound by the acts of a former Government, only so far as they were individually responsible, but he had yet to learn that gentlemen, upon accepting office, were bound to forget their past opinions and take to entirely new notions. The amendment of the Government was to the effect that it was expedient to pass an Act removing all restrictions upon distillation, and to raise a revenue by a duty on other imported articles instead of spirits. He would now appeal to the Attorney-General, and to the Treasurer of the day, Mr. Finniss, and ask them if they were sincere when they asked the House to affirm that resolution. They distinctly stated that the time had arrived when there should be free distillation, they distinctly stated that the revenue should be made up by imposing a duty upon other articles than spirits, and he would ask them whether the existing Act was not regarded merely as a step in the right direction, and which was accepted because it was nearly the end of the session. He fully expected that when the Government came forward with their policy it would have been found to include free distillation. Even afterwards he thought that the Government might not have thought of it—that their views were unchanged, and they would bring it forward at a future period. He did not like when the Address was proposed to move an amendment, considering that Address as merely of a formal character, a mere echo of the speech. He asked the Government of the day to affirm the resolution which he now brought forward, and as individuals to affirm the resolutions which as part of a former Government they asked the House to assent to. He watched with great anxiety the course which the Attorney-General and the Treasurer would pursue in reference to this question, for he had yet to learn that the morality of statesmen was so low that they would affirm a principle in one Government which they would shrink from the responsibility of doing in another. It had been said by some of the opponents of free distillation that it would disappoint those who sought to bring it into operation, and that it would not do the good which was anticipated. What he wished was that they should leave trade alone and unfettered. If free distillation were found not to pay, persons would not take advantage of the law. Some again said that free distillation might pay, but that the revenue would suffer. He was in favor of lowering the duty upon spirits 1s. per gallon per year, so that there would merely be a gradual diminution of the revenue, whilst free distillation would allow the resources of the colony to be developed. But he contended it was not their duty to suggest a remedy to meet the grievance consequent upon a falling off in the revenue. The doctor had not been called in, he had not got his fee, and it was time to ask what was to be done when those who were favourable to this measure had the honor and responsibility of office. (Laughter.) He did not think that it would be difficult to point out the course which should be pursued to raise the deficiency which would be caused. He did not believe that the revenue would suffer, but if it did, there were ways of raising it. He believed that £12,000 might be raised from sheep, and that an extra amount might be obtained from tobacco and tea. There might be a property or income tax, but that was no part of his province that day. He had only to ask the Commissioner of Public Works, the Attorney-General, and the Treasurer to be true to their past sentiments, and to deal with the present motion which the colony demanded and which the people sooner or later would have. Every election which took place showed the deep interest which the colonists took in this question, and the views which they entertained upon it. The question was asked of every gentleman who had lately appeared before a constituency, "Will you support free distillation?" and in every instance a distinct or implied pledge to do so had been given. In all parts of the colony meetings had been held, lecturers were going forth agitating the subject, and the people were unanimously in favor of leaving trade free to work out a proper and natural result. He was prepared to go the whole length for free trade. He had only one other remark, and that was in reference to the subject of drunkenness. It had on a former occasion been urged by the hon. member (Mr. Cole), that free distillation would increase drunkenness, but he did not think that such a result was to be anticipated, for there was not more drunkenness in France than in England. He believed that drunkenness was the result of the habits of the individual, and would not be at all affected by the price of the liquor He repeated that he had merely put this motion on the paper for the purpose of ascertaining the feelings of the House He had not even asked for a seconder, but simply placed it before the House, leaving the House to deal with it as it might prefer When the subject had been ventilated, he should probably have occasion to make a few remarks

Mr BURFORD, in seconding the motion, stated that his doing so was not a matter of arrangement, although it was well known that his mind had long been exercised upon the subject The subject was so vast in character, that nothing less than an entire revolution in the Governmental policy was involved He was perfectly satisfied that if this question were carried in the affirmative, the Government would be placed in an awful fix (Laughter) It was clear that a revenue must be provided in the place of that which would be lost, and the amount was so large as to justify the Ministry in regarding the question with feelings of dread, not to say hatred But they must risk those difficulties which naturally occurred in onward progress in political economy The Ministry were chosen to a highly honorable position, and just in proportion to the difficulties which they had to contend with, and as they overcame them, was their honor increased It had been said by some that it was not for the Ministry, by virtue of their appointment, to work out a system in detail in a case of this kind but for the Legislature. He did not stick upon that point, but let them all go at it, one and all, and endeavor to overcome the difficulty He had said that the question involved the whole Government policy It had been said that they should seek to confer the greatest good upon the greatest number So long as there was a vast disproportion between the possessions of one man and the possessions of another—and this could be traced to the mode in which the revenue was raised—they were bound to look at the question as it effected the population at large, that is, the population at large should become equal participators in the benefits of a Government It was undoubted that in every country upon the face of the earth, there were many possessed of a great amount of unnecessary wealth, and many in a state of abject poverty

The SPEAKER reminded the hon member that the question under discussion was not one of the general policy of a Government. The hon member must confine himself to the question before the House

Mr GLYDE asked whether under the 10th Standing Order the House were not bound to go into Committee before discussing this question.

The SPEAKER did not think it necessary, as the question did not directly affect the revenue

Mr BURFORD thought it necessary he should show that if the revenue failed it would be necessary to supply the deficiency, and if it were necessary in order to support his arguments that he should refer to the ends of a Government he thought he would not be out of order, but he submitted to the Speaker's ruling He could not but think it particularly unfortunate, however, that by adhering to rules of this kind members were prevented from uttering their views, as this question affected not only our own but other communities Anything which the Legislature did stood forth as an example, but if hon members were to be so confined in their remarks, he for one should feel utterly crippled and be compelled to sit down without saying a great deal that he had intended Whatever tended to injure the produce of the soil was injurious Whatever prevented those who raised that produce from doing the best they could with it was injurious The question arose, if they did away with all restrictions, how was the revenue which would probably be lost to be supplied He had given the question some attention, and had come to the conclusion that the proper course would be to allow trade to go entirely free, and to raise a revenue by an income and a property tax combined These questions naturally arose out of the discussion of the subject of distillation

The SPEAKER again reminded the hon member that he was out of order

Mr BURFORD would then turn to the Ministry and ask them to undertake the task and see how a revenue could be raised leaving trade free

The SPEAKER told the hon member it was customary to address the Speaker

Mr BURFORD thanked the hon the Speaker He would appeal to the Government to devise a scheme to raise a revenue in such a way that the colony would not be impeded in raising any of its products Under such a system there would soon be a yeomanry, small proprietors it was true, but who would contribute to the wealth of the land, and although large property holders and monied men might have their incomes lessened in consequence, the colony would be greatly benefitted The land would be thrown open and every man would have a fair path before him to travel It was very desirable that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the whole question and take into consideration the whole system of taxation The evidence which would be elicited by such a Committee would be of great value

Mr GLYDE had listened with great attention to the remarks which had fallen from the previous speakers, and had heard nothing which had altered the opinions with which he came to the House He should vote against the motion in its present shape for various reasons He must protest against the course pursued by the hon member for Onkaparinga in asking the House to affirm a bare proposition involving such grave loss to the revenue, particularly as the hon member stood up and stated that he was not prepared to state how the gap was to be filled up The hon member appeared to take the course which had been pursued by Mr Waterhouse last session, and said "I know how but I won't tell you" He (Mr Glyde) had on that occasion remonstrated with Mr Waterhouse upon such a course, and now that he was a member of that House he remonstrated still more strongly No member he contended had a right to bring forward such a proposition involving such a large loss of revenue, unless he were prepared to shew how the gap was to be filled up The hon mover had thrown out some loose hints that it could be done by a duty upon tobacco or tea, which he (Mr Glyde) should certainly oppose The seconder of the motion thought that the deficiency could be supplied by a mixture of a property and income tax, but they all knew that this had been found objectionable in England He should certainly feel bound to oppose such a tax without further investigation Another reason for opposing the motion was that he very much doubted whether the mover could point out a less objectionable system of taxation than that which at present prevailed The Treasurer stated last year, when the question was under discussion, that free distillation would involve a loss to the country of 50,000*l*, and he very much doubted if it could be pointed out how to raise this sum in a less objectionable way Another objection which he had to the motion was, that if it were carried it would unquestionably complicate the question of intercolonial tariffs No doubt if the resolution were passed the duty of the Government would be to bring in a Bill to do away with all restrictions on distillation, or to resign their office. If such a Bill were brought in and passed the neighboring colonies would alter their tariff It would be a simple thing to smuggle by the way of the Murray, and if this colony were to admit spirits duty free, Victoria in self-defence, would most probably put an import duty upon flour, which would seriously affect the interests of this colony He believed that if the price of spirits were reduced there would be an increase of drunkenness (No, no) No doubt many would dispute that point, and refer to France, where drunkenness was not more common than in England He did not believe that in 30 years hence drunkenness would be more common in this colony than it was before the restrictions upon distillation were repealed, but when the nobbler was first reduced to half-price he had no doubt there would be a great increase of drunkenness amongst those recently arrived from England, and who had been accustomed to look upon a nobbler as a luxury Another objection which he had to the motion was, that he joined issue with the hon mover when he stated that the people of the colony, as a whole, were anxious for free distillation He disputed the assertion, and had taken some pains to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the opinion of the great mass of the people. He had been told that if he opposed this motion he would never again have an opportunity of standing for East Torrens, but he took the same ground which he did at the time of his election, and opposed free distillation He had made many enquiries amongst his constituents as to how they would like him to vote upon this question irrespectively of his own opinions, and only one had told him that they would like him to support the motion He referred particularly to the district of East Torrens, because it was well known that it was a district particularly interested in vine growing One gentleman who formerly opposed him, stated that he was perfectly satisfied with Mr Waik's Bill and wanted no more On the previous day he had obtained some information from a gentleman well known (Dr Kelly) who had informed him that he was perfectly satisfied with Dr Waik's Bill He mentioned these circumstances to shew that he had some grounds for denying that the country at large cared about the matter at all He did not say that Dr Waik's Bill was not capable of amendment, but he did not believe that the country generally would endorse the proposition, that all restriction should be abolished He did not know who would take part in the discussion, but he could not understand how gentlemen who voted for the address could support this motion The Governor very cleverly passed over the question, and the gentlemen who prepared the address had passed over it very cleverly also Now, as the address was unanimously passed, it appeared to him that those gentlemen who voted for this motion would place themselves in a very curious position They should at the time the address was moved have proposed an amendment if they objected to the ministerial policy Although one gentleman grumbled at the time the address was moved he had not the moral courage to move an amendment He had no objection to the appointment of a Select Committee, and he might remark that theoretically he went as far in favor of direct taxation as any hon member, in fact, if possible, he would do away with fiscal taxation He saw financial difficulties in the way, and for the other reasons which he had assigned he felt bound to oppose the motion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose partly because he wished to correct what he thought a misapprehension on the part of the hon member who spoke last, and partly because he wished to state something with regard to personal matters He had always understood that the object of a reply to the opening speech of His Excellency, as the representative of Her Majesty, was that the House should treat respectfully the topics touched upon in it, without hon members committing themselves or the House to disputed points (Hear, hear) It had been his object, and that of the other members of the Committee who formed that answer to the address, to glide—(a laugh)—over those matters, so as to enable the members of that House to vote in favour of that address without compromising themselves in regard to the opinions expressed With regard to the personal matter, the hon member who brought forward the motion admitted that if a member of the Government acquiesced in the measures of that Government in regard to any particular question, he was not bound, as a Minister, in his course of action when not a member of that Government When he (the Attorney-General) addressed his constituents prior to his election, he stated his views on the subject before them It appeared to him that viewing the mode of taxation for the purpose of ascertaining the best source of revenue, there was nothing from which a revenue could be more advantageously derived than from a duty on imported spirits, and if there were no other considerations than the incidence of taxation, and the way in which a tax should be so laid as to be the least burdensome to the people, he should be of that opinion still He said that, for the purpose of clearing himself from the imputation of departing from his expressed intentions, which had been thrown upon him by one hon member during the debate During the last session it was intended to have introduced a measure for the purpose of enabling the vinegrowers to make the most of their vineyards, but the matter was taken up by Dr Wark, who prepared a Bill which he (the Attorney General) believed had given considerable satisfaction With regard to any other practical injurious operation of the present law—with regard to gardeners who were compelled to throw peaches and other fruit away—he thought they ought to be included under the same principle, and the Government would be prepared to sanction any proposition, by whomsoever introduced, to give the same advantage as was conferred upon owners of vineyards So far as that was concerned, that was the position taken by the Government, and therefore there was in that nothing inconsistent with his opinion as an individual, and the course taken by the Government during the present session He was quite willing to admit that the question involved wider consideration than at first appeared It was not merely the question of the incidence of taxation but there was a wider view necessary to be taken with regard to that mode of taxation—which was the best, and also with regard to the possible operation of those laws in preventing the development of the resources of the colony But the Government would be unwilling to agree to such a motion as that now proposed It was a mere naked abstract proposition to say that a certain regulation which produces a large amount of revenue should be done away with, when nothing else was proposed to be substituted in its stead It would not do for that House to affirm an abstract proposition of that sort, though it would be wise to inquire what would be the effect of removing the impediments to free distillation, what effect it would have on the revenue, and also what improvements might be made in the mode of collecting the revenue, and how to replace the loss that the doing away of such a source of revenue would involve He would himself have moved an amendment on the motion of the hon member, to the effect that a Select Committee should be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the whole question involved, were it not that he would in that case be compelled to sit upon the Committee That, however, was the course which the Government would recommend, and the amendment would be moved by his hon friend the Treasurer on the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga The Government had to look at the way in which any change in our fiscal system would operate upon the people, when it was considered that large sums were involved in the change Instead of persons paying their quota to the revenue by driblets so small that they were hardly conscious they were paying at all, when it was considered that the duty on spirits was levied on a mere luxury, and that to lay it on tea and sugar instead would be taxing the necessaries of every family in the colony, he thought the result of the inquiry by a Committee might differ from that anticipated by the hon member for Onkaparinga If that Committee were appointed he was anxious that persons independent of office, and persons of all shades of opinion, should have their place there If they should be prepared to recommend the abolition of the restrictions on distillation, and if they presented a reasonable scheme for raising a revenue to meet the consequent loss, the Government would be prepared to carry it out, but the Government were not prepared to support an abstract proposition of the nature of the resolution before the House The Government must oppose such a resolution, as it gave no information as to the financial effects of such an arrangement He believed that the more enquiry was made, the more clearly would any advantages likely to result from the abolition of restriction in distillation appear, and the more clearly would doubts be removed, and, therefore, he hardly anticipated any opposition to a proposal so reasonable as that of referring the scheme to a Committee, who would report not only with regard to the abstract question, but also with regard to the changes necessary to meet the diminished income, so that our credit might be sustained The Government would, in that Committee, be prepared to suggest various alternative propositions by which that object might be accomplished They had no desire to shrink from that duty The Government were prepared to lay alternative schemes before that Committee as to whether the revenue should be raised by direct taxation or by a duty on articles of consumption, but the Government were desirous to ascertain the feelings of the House on a matter of that sort, and those could be best ascertained by an expression of opinion when the report of that Committee should be laid before them The Government were therefore prepared to support an amendment such as he had suggested, with the promise that if passed by the House, they (the Government) were not prepared to act on any motion opposed to the spirit of free trade. (Hear, hear)

The TREASURER rose to propose the resolution that the hon the Attorney-General had suggested, and with him to oppose the motion before the House The amendment that he would propose was, "To strike out all the words after 'that,' and insert the following —'the whole question of the taxation of the colony be referred to a Select Committee with a view of determining the best means of maintaining unimpaired the revenue of the colony if it be decided to remove all restrictions on distillation'" He believed that the course which had been pointed out by the Attorney-General was one which would meet with the support of the House, for he did not think that any of its members desired to force their opinions upon the House or the Government, but to give effect to what they believed to be for the welfare of the country on the subject. The question had assumed great importance, it had been taken up in almost every session of late years, and perhaps there was no fitter time for bringing it to a conclusion than the present session Last year much time was lost through changes in the Administration and other matters connected with the question of Responsible Government Those were passed away, and during the present session hon members could address themselves to business He considered that although the question before them was proper to be discussed by the House, it was scarcely incumbent upon the Government to take it up, unless they were pressed to do so by the House It had been asked why he, as an individual, member of the Government, did not bring forward the views adopted last year by the member for East Torrens (Mr Waterhouse) His answer was clear and satisfactory as to the course he (the Treasurer) adopted It would be remembered that when he addressed his constituents he made no statement to them which he did not carry out last year He told them he could not advocate free distillation nor change the mode of collecting the revenue from imported spirits to any other source, because he believed that there was no other source of revenue from which 60,000*l* could be so readily and equitably drawn He believed there were no very great disadvantages attending the producing interests in taxes so levied which were not counterbalanced by the advantages of that mode of collecting a revenue If wrong he should be glad to be benefitted by the opinions of others who might be advanced in their knowledge of that question, and he thought that benefit would be gained by the appointment of a Select Committee. Should it be shown that the duty now levied on spirits ought to be transferred elsewhere he should be glad to be convinced that he was wrong, and to give his assistance to remove all difficulties in the way of a complete revision of our existing system He went into the House last year to carry out the views of the Government of which he was the head at that time They opposed a motion similar to that then before the House, but they found there was a strong party in the House (hear, hear), and the Government assented to an amendment by the hon member for East Torrens, namely, that a Bill should be introduced to remove all restrictions on produce, and that the revenue should be made up by duties on other articles of Customs He acquiesced in that It was not his own proposition, but had he remained in the Government he should have felt himself bound by that resolution, and should undoubtedly have brought forward a Bill founded upon it The circumstances were different now, and he was no longer bound by the conditions of that resolution The Government of the present day are only responsible for their own course of conduct, and the Attorney-General had stated his reasons for adopting the course he had taken He (the Treasurer) should not discuss the question so fully as he should have done had there been no Committee to follow, but would merely point out certain courses of action, one of which it appeared to him the Committee would have to agree to He thought it clear that if spirits were allowed to be freely made in South Australia, and sold free of duty, the loss would be nine-tenths of the revenue on imports If, however, the duty on imported spirits were maintained—a principle which he thought the Government could not consider—it would keep the prices of spirits the same as at present, and it would enable the colonial producer to produce spirits so as to compete with imported spirits, but under both systems the same price would be paid by the consumer, and in both cases there would be equal loss to the revenue It would not be necessary to take off all duty It would only be necessary to put the distiller on an equality with the importer A duty of 3s a gallon would place the colonial producer on a par with the importer, because the producer had to contend with high prices of grain and labor in the colony, and with a superior imported article So that it would be many years before he could produce an article equal to that imported He thought the loss would probably be £50,000 under either system One way of making up the loss would be by increasing the duty on several or all articles on the tariff, and the other that which was recommended by the Council last year Otherwise it might be made up by direct taxation, by an income tax, or partly in one way and partly in another But the safest course to take was to make such enquiries as would satisfy hon members which was best Were the Government to come provided with any scheme, it would have to be referred to a Select Committee, and therefore it was better at once to make the enquiry He believed a small duty was necessary to equalize the position of the colonial producer and the importer He believed spirits manufactured from grain cost 4s 8d a gallon, from sugar 4s 6d a gallon, and imported spirits only 3s a gallon If, therefore, a small duty were not imposed on imported spirits, the colonial produce could not compete with the importer It had been suggested by some hon members that distillation from sugar should be prohibited by severe penal enactments He thought that would be unwise, because an excise supervision would then be necessary, and he thought that, to a certain extent, grain distillation would have to be placed on a level with distillation from sugar Those, however were matters for enquiry If, on the suggestion of the mover, the duty were reduced 1s a year, it would merely throw the diminished duty into the pockets of the dealer It would not reduce the cost to the consumer, for 1s a gallon would amount to considerably less than one farthing on a glass of spirits He thought therefore it would be necessary to decide upon some permanent system and reduce it to such a scale as would produce equality between the producer and the importer

Mr Bagot would make a few observations on the motion In the abstract proposition he agreed, but he thought much more must be added to it before the House could be called to vote for it He went with the Attorney-General in his ideas on Free Trade, and had rather have restricted distillation as at present than protective duties He could not go with the hon member for East Torrens in his anticipations of difficulties arising were the proposition carried The idea of complications with other colonies ought not to be entertained, We ought to look to our interests in trade in the same way as we did in shipping Phil Dixon back to Swan River, not caring whether the Government there was offended or not There was no fear of complicating our relations with other colonies The Attorney-General seemed to think that the revenue on spirits was the best source of revenue He (Mr Bagot) considered that too an abstract proposition Suppose circumstances should occur rendering that revenue injurious to the colony, it would not then be the best source of revenue He did not think the House should deal with those abstract propositions, neither did he think the member anticipated such difficulty in carrying the House with him as he had experienced He (Mr Bagot) thought that the collateral questions could not be separated from the motion He did not think much loss to the revenue would arise from free distillation He imagined that the loss, if any, would be very gradual indeed for very few people would drink colonial-made spirits when they could get spirits from home He thought the appointment of a Select Committee the best course the House could take He also thought in addition to the vine-growers and gardeners, there was one large class whose interests ought to be considered, and if free distillation could be shown to be an advantage to them, it was the duty of the House to look to their interests That great class was the farmers That was the class from whom the greatest amount of revenue was raised, and they were therefore entitled to every consideration He was not surprised that the House was not larger on that occasion, for the subject had not been fully brought out in the form of the resolution, which left out the the great questions connected with it He thought the hon member must see that he could not carry out a motion of that nature without the assistance of the Government, and he believed that the hon gentleman was not quite prepared to take his own seat on the Treasury benches (Laughter) The hon gentleman should take care that he does not resemble the man who made himself wings, but going too near the sun the wax of which they were composed melted, and they fell from his shoulders (Laughter) If the House approved the proposition, it would be the duty of the Government to retire, and that hon member must then take their place He apprehended he was not prepared to do that, and therefore would not object to a Select Committee

Mr Mildred would like to have ascertained the opinions of the House, as to the propriety of removing the restrictions on distillation, before voting for the amendment, for it that opinion were given the duties of the Committee would be circumscribed Although on all occasions in which the independence of the people was concerned he had opposed the Government, he had no desire to place them in an "awful fix" He looked upon them as the expression of the views of that House, and that House as representing the opinions of the people He thought constant change of Ministers an evil, and so long as Ministers were desirous to carry out the views of that House, it was better that they should remain than to be constantly changing He did not think that any imputations ought to be thrown upon members of that House in regard to their votes on the address He would now say a few words on the proposition before them He believed that a majority both in the House and in the country were in favor of the removal of the restrictions on distillation As one practically engaged in wine growing, he was prepared to say that the present Bill was useless, and would strongly urge upon the Government that a Bill should be introduced to relieve the vine-growers from present restrictions As the present regulations stood, the refuse, which would have been distilled, was either thrown away or introduced into the wine, which should only be made from the pure juice of the grape He had some wine five years old, without any acid whatever in it If new taxes were imposed on one part of the community, it ought to be with the intention of removing some tax preventing our onward progress Now it was proposed either directly or indirectly to tax the flock-masters, the amount so gained would enable the Government to relieve other classes But no portion of the population of South Australia were suffering so much depression as the agriculturists, and that tax might be applied to relieving them He was of opinion that free-trade principles would soon determine whether free distillation was successful or not If an individual found distillation was not remunerative, he would not repeat it often, but on the other hand if an article could be produced that would give satisfaction, it would be far better to make our own wine and spirits than to pay for their introduction, for, if 60,000*l* in duty were annually received, it was clear that a large sum must be annually sent out of the colony which might have been turned to profitable account in it It was admitted that we had the material to give as good wine as any in the world and he did not see why the brandy should be inferior As to a sliding scale of duties, and the best plan of meeting any temporary difficulties let them come before the House and let them reason calmly and quietly on the subject of direct and indirect taxation He believed that for the laboring classes, indirect taxation was the least felt, but if the way could be seen to direct taxation, let them adopt it, and where any source of industry was likely to be developed, if relief could be extended to them, let it be given He should support the amendment for a Select Committee

Mr Barrow considered the question before the House of the very greatest importance, and when he recollected how much time had been occupied in discussing questions of far less moment, he thought that it required long and careful consideration in order to give a conscientious and judicious vote Various opinions had been expressed on the subject and his hon colleague, the member for East Torrens, had made it an election question But he (Mr Barrow) must join issue with him respecting his statement of the opinions of the electors of East Torrens on the subject He (Mr Barrow) believed that he knew those opinions as well as that hon member, who was elected by a constituency almost disfranchised (Laughter) Though having a majority, that hon member polled less than 70 votes He (Mr Barrow) had also made it an election question and had been returned in the same district as a free distillation candidate He referred to those elections in order to obviate the supposition that the electors of East Torrens were opposed to free distilling An hon member had asked for an expression of opinion by that House But was it desired to elicit that opinion by resolution or by the general tenor of the speeches delivered? If the former, he thought it the better course to affirm the resolution of the hon member for Onkaparinga, for it simply declared the expediency of free distillation, but he (Mr Barrow) was unable to separate that question from the collateral questions surrounding it (Hear, hear) If it were desirable to have free distillation, it was desirable to know the cost of it (Hear, hear) He would act on the principle of the Yorkshireman, who, at a Peace Society's meeting, said he would like peace with Russia but would not like to pay threehalfpence for one pennyworth of it (Hear, hear, and laughter) The question could not be considered by itself—it must include many highly important collateral ones, and therefore he was in favor of a Select Committee, whose enquiries should embrace the whole theory of taxation

The Speaker called the attention of the hon member to the hour—3 o'clock

Mr Barrow moved the suspension of the Standing Orders Carried

Mr Barrow resumed—The colony was not only expending its own revenue, but was borrowing money of English capitalists, and therefore the greatest possible care should be taken to place on a sound basis our financial arrangements, for if loss to the revenue occurred on the one hand, it must be replaced by other measures He would abide by Free Trade principles—(hear, hear) and was not satisfied with the sliding scales of the hon mover At least 50 per cent of the import duty should be struck off the first year, and the rest by quicker stages than proposed by that gentleman He admitted that it was the duty of Government to prepare measures, but it was also the privilege of members of the House to introduce them when the opening speech of His Excellency came before them He (Mr Barrow) was disappointed that so slight reference had been made to the subject of Free Distillation, and when he moved the adoption of the reply he singled out that paragraph as one to which he took exception He believed that "the liberal construction" of that Act, spoken of in the Address of His Excellency, would make every distiller his own bonded storekeeper without giving free distillation to the community. It neither satisfied the distiller nor protected the revenue. He would not be drawn away from the real question before the House in order to embarrass the Government. He might be allowed to say that some hon. gentlemen seemed never so happy as when they discovered the Government were likely to be placed in a "fix"—(laughter)—and when they could manage to interweave remarks about a "cringing, truckling, time-serving Government." But those gentlemen should reflect that it might be their happy or unhappy fate to sit on the Government benches, and what had they then to expect from those whom they now almost daily attacked? The House had heard of the probable effect of free distillation on the people of Victoria, and of the probable adoption of a duty on flour in consequence. The Government of Victoria might indeed place Custom-Houses on the Murray for the prevention of smuggling, but no Ministry would be tolerated in Victoria who placed a tax on the people's bread. (Hear.) But whatever changes were made in fiscal arrangements, he hoped no extra duties would be imposed on tea and sugar. He trusted that the question would be enquired into by a Select Committee as a whole, and with that view he should support its appointment, but not with a view of shelving the question, for he believed if the people of South Australia were polled the next day the majority of their votes would be in favour of free distillation.

Mr. Neales would support the amendment for referring the matter to a Select Committee; but if he did not, he would not go with the mover of the resolution in saying that all restrictions should be removed. He would rather say that the present restrictions should be modified, as he could not come round to the view that all these restrictions should be abolished until he ascertained how their abolition would affect other interests. The action of the House in the matter should be consistent with good legislation. They must either gradually diminish the Customs duties to nothing, as was done in the the case of Corn Laws, or they must remove gradually all restrictions upon distillation. But he was not in favor of either taking off the whole of the duty or of allowing every man with a tin pot to make whisky. This was the French mode of legislation, either nothing or a revolution; but he would advocate a more moderate way of settling the question. He would not even pledge himself to it as a principle, for the question was, whether it was a principle at all? In his opinion it was nothing but a matter of detail relating to the revenue of the country. He hoped, as the last speaker had said, that the Committee would be a bona fide one, to go into the whole question, and come up with such a report as would satisfy all moderate men that they were not going to remove a large and paying portion of the revenue until they could show some fair way of supplying the deficiency. He believed the results of free distillation would disappoint those who were in favor of it; and with respect to the Bill of the hon. member for the Murray (Dr. Wark), he considered it a miserable measure. It might be a move in the right direction; but like some kinds of vegetation, it must be watched for a long time before one could see it coming up. In fact, it was a snail's move. (Laughter.) He would say to the hon. members who would be on the Committee, as he might not be there himself, that they would find one great difficulty to deal with which was not touched upon. If they were to admit sugar at low duties, they would have all the spirits made from sugar. If Mauritius sugar could be had at £14 a ton, distillers here could manufacture spirits from it at 10d. a gallon; so that if they consulted the interests of the tea drinker they would find that he would have to pay a higher price for the sugar he consumed; and if they wanted to have spirits made from wheat, oats, and barley, they must put a high duty upon sugar.

Mr. Strangways thought the Committee should have definite instruction, which it had not at present. Otherwise it it would have a general enquiry, a general report, and nothing done. He could not support the motion of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, though he was in favor of free distillation. Free distillation should be the consequence and not the cause of free trade. If the restrictions on free distillation were abolished he felt confident the results would not equal the anticipations of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, for to distil spirits was a very difficult matter, and in this colony the distillers would have to produce a superior article at a less price than it could be imported for from foreign countries. The hon. member for the City had pointed out that the farmer would derive no benefit from free distillation in consequence of the facility of distillation from sugar, but in the course of a little time the cultivation of the vine would be a most important productive interest in the colony, as the vine plants were nearly destroyed in many of the European countries, and the annual experience of our farmers had shown that we could produce good and wholesome wines at low prices. He confidently believed that the export of wine would in a few years be a most important item in our trade. With respect to one matter which had been alluded to, he thought it the duty of the Government to devise measures of the sort now proposed, and if not he could not see the use of a Government at all. If the House was to devise measures, pass them into laws, and carry them into effect, a Government would be of no use. When a Government had devised a scheme to the purpose, it was quite time to apply to a Select Committee. He should therefore move the previous question.

Mr. Milne said, if the motion was, that all restrictions on free trade should be removed, he would support it. It was said that if the whole colony were polled, the result would be an unanimous decision in favor of free distillation, but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that those farmers who were most clamorous for free distillation wish for it in regard to the products of this colony, at the same time that they wished the present import duties kept up. That he considered going backwards in legislation. Another way of meeting the question was to give free distillation and put a tax upon tea and sugar; but he was against that also, and if the farmer who were most clamorous for free distillation, found that it was only in this way they could obtain it, they too would be dead against free distillation. He would say "Sweep away our present tariff, and then let us have free distillation," and with this view he would support the amendment. He could not help alluding to a remark of the hon. member for East Torrens, in reference to the duty of the Government. That hon. member said the independent members of the House ought to consider it a great privilege that they could introduce measures themselves. He must say it was rather a hardship that hon. members were not provided with means to enable them to do so; for at present, if a member felt it necessary to legislate upon any subject which the Government did not think proper to introduce, he was obliged to go to a lawyer, and have a bill drawn at his own expense.

Mr. Barrow rose to explain. What he said was, that he did not wish hon. members to denude themselves of the privilege of introducing Bills; but he had also alluded with regret to the fact that, in the speech of His Excellency, there was no promise made to deal with the question of distillation. He meant to intimate that it was the duty of Government to introduce a measure, but it was the privilege of members to introduce them also.

Mr. Cole was surprised that the hon. member for Onkaparinga should seek by a mere resolution to destroy a revenue of £50,000 a year. He had heard that hon. gentleman denouncing the folly of legislating by resolution, and now he was doing so himself. He believed that by the adoption of this resolution a great evil would be inflicted upon the colony, for, notwithstanding the observations of hon. members that the cheapening of spirits would not bring about such a result, he believed that it would increase drunkenness. ("No, no.") He believed such would be the case, and he would give one instance of it in the case of Sweden. That country at one time stood high in the scale of Christianity and morality, and that was when distillation was prevented or nearly so. But such was the liberal spirit introduced into the country that distillation was made general; and what was the result? In a few years Sweden became debased. Crimes previously almost unknown made their appearance, and sickness increased. He firmly believed that by allowing distillation we would increase vice and immorality. He also opposed the resolution on the ground that it would inflict a gross injustice on a large portion of the community—the thousands who drank little or no spirits. Should these persons be taxed for the class who indulged in spirits? A few days since hon. members exclaimed against class legislation, and what would this be but legislating for the wine-growers, farmers, and gardeners? The hon. member for East Torrens said, that if South Australia were polled man for man the majority would be found in favor of free distillation, but he begged to differ from that hon. member. It was his province to attend public meetings, and he recollected at one in the district which he represented the question of distillation came up, and the people almost to a man said they wished for free distillation. But he (Mr. Cole) said he had another question to put, and he asked them, "Are you for free distillation if your tobacco and tea and sugar are to be taxed for it?" and the cry was "No." He believed if that question was put the majority of South Australia would be found against free distillation; though it had been made a stalking-horse for hon. members to trot upon. But were the constituencies to be deluded by such a sham, when a Select Committee proved that free distillation would not produce the benefits expected from it? He believed the Committee (which he would vote for) would show that the revenue raised from spirits could not be supplied in any other way without the imposition of taxes which the people would not submit to. One hon. member had spoken of Phil. Dixon, and said that the better way would be to drive out such men, and he quite concurred in this observation. But "Alcohol" was quite as dangerous a character, and as deserving of banishment. He cordially supported the amendment, and as cordially opposed the original motion.

Mr. Dunn said the House had been occupied during the last session upon this question, and the object was then said to be to enable the farmers to convert their grain and produce into beer and spirits; but from his practical knowledge he asserted that if the farmers could bring their grain into the distilleries, it would not pay at the present prices of labor. We could get spirit made from sugar, according to the hon. member for the city, or even doubling the price stated by that hon. member, for less than one half the price we could produce it from grain in the ordinary way. To a great extent also this motion would affect the other colonies, and would therefore require serious consideration, and on this account he would support the amendment.

Mr. Solomon would also support the amendment though he would make bold to say that he did not disapprove of the resolution before the House but he considered the matter of such importance that he agreed with hon members who had spoken before him, that it required the gravest consideration in Committee It was not a subject which should be viewed as an isolated question, for there were other matters of a similar character connected with it which required consideration at the same time The whole tariff should be considered, and then they would see where to put on duties and where to take them off He concurred in a remark of the hon member, Mr Neales, that the Bill of last session for the relief of the vine-growers did not give them relief and that it was in point of fact a sham He would bear the hon member out in this by calling attention to the only clause of the Bill which appeared to give relief to the vine growers but which did the very contrary [The hon member here read the fifth clause of the Bill] This was merely shutting out the grower from exporting his goods from the colony unless he paid duty (No, no) He contended it was, for there was no drawback allowed As for putting the amount of duty which they took off colonial exports, or the deficiency caused by remitting these duties as a duty on tea and sugar, he trusted the Legislature would never commit so great an injustice against those who did not drink spirits The proper source to go to for taxes was the origin of all wealth, property They should not tax what a man eat or drank, or the clothing he required He trusted the Committee would be prepared to recommend that the whole of the taxes and revenue should be taken from the true source of wealth, the landed property of the colony

Mr Hay had been taken by surprise at finding the hon member (Mr Solomon) propose that all the revenue should be raised from one source alone from the original source of wealth—the landed property of the colony

Mr Solomon explained He had said property, not landed property

Mr Hay would appeal to any member of the House as to whether he had repeated the words as the hon member spoke them (Hear, hear) He was surprised to hear any hon member take such a one-sided view of the mode of raising the revenue of the colony, but he was prepared to give the hon member (Mr Solomon) the benefit of the mistake, and to suppose that he had said from property generally But the hon member and other hon members had put forward a proposition that the Custom House should be done away with and that all the revenue should be derived from internal sources That would be placing a direct tax on our own productions, and allowing foreigners to introduce theirs free of all taxation If we did away with the Custom-House the revenue must be raised from those engaged in producing articles, either for home consumption or for exportation from the colony The vine-growers, who were benefiting the colony by raising articles of export, were to be taxed to raise revenue for the general purposes of the colony, but the vine growers of New South Wales or of France were to be allowed to make as much wine as they liked to bring it into the colony, and sell it at a profit of 50 or 100 per cent , whilst our own growers were prohibited from these advantages There was no more legitimate source of taxation than imports, and if we did away with duties on them we must raise our revenue from the producers of the colony Who else was there to tax except the owners of large properties, and an income-tax in England was found a most objectionable mode of raising revenue The hon member (Mr Cole) had said that those who did not consume spirits ought not to be taxed for those who did, but if they looked at the case as it stood at present it was the consumers of spirits who were taxed for those who did not consume them

Mr Cole explained What he said was, that it would be unjust that the large portion of the community who did not consume spirits or wine should be made to pay in the shape of the duties proposed to be raised upon tea and sugar

Mr Hay said the hon member had repeated the words just as he (Mr Hay) understood them, but those who asked that the restrictions on distillation should be abolished did not ask that the duties should be imposed on other articles They were willing to pay their share of the public burthens with the rest of the community, but they asked that whilst they were growing grain or produce they might be allowed to do so like those engaged in growing wool or raising copper from the bowels of the earth, without restriction It was not a question of raising revenue from spirits or other articles, but of raising it from colonial productions or imports It would be better that the distillation law should be repealed altogether, and that the revenue be raised from such articles as were generally used in the colony It was not fair that the revenue should be raised from articles consumed only by one class If they could find an article of luxury they might tax it, but even if a duty were to be put on sugar or tea, it would be better than on articles which could be raised in the colony It was said they should not put a tax on the poor man's tea or sugar , but they were doing so by restricting the demand for labor, so that hundreds who might now be employed in vine-growing and in various occupations connected with distilling, were at present out of employment He was still more in favor of the Select Committee when he found from the Customs returns that between 4,000*l* and 5,000*l* was raised from the duty on corn sacks, whilst wool bags and ore bags came in free

At this stage of the proceedings a message was announced from His Excellency the Governor, and the messenger was introduced

The Speaker announced that His Excellency had sent down a Bill entitled "A Bill to provide for Assessment on Stock "

The Attorney-General moved that the Bill be read a first time but following out the suggestion of the hon member, Mr Barrow, he thought that as this Bill, although a public measure, affected private interests, it would be only fair to allow the class whom it affected an opportunity of being heard in reference to it before a Select Committee He should therefore, on the day for which the second reading should be made an Order of the Day, move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee He now moved that the Bill be read a first time and that the second reading be an Order of the Day for that day week

The motion was agreed to

DEBATE ON DISTILLATION (Resumed)

Mr Rogers supported the amendment, feeling certain the Committee would find means of raising any deficiency in the revenue A great deal had been said about this deficiency, but they should devise means for extending our trade and commerce, not merely for home consumption, but in order that we might become sellers instead of buyers He quite agreed with the hon member for Onkaparinga that the restrictions on distillation should be removed

Mr Hart would rather have something definite to lay before a Committee, when they appointed one The amendment was not such as he liked to see It said "if it be decided,' but it was not decided, and so he could not see how they were to refer it to the Committee He would approve of the course taken by the mover of the resolution if that hon gentleman had made a statement that the measure was to be passed upon free trade principles Then he could go with the resolution, but the hon member had not said anything of the kind He believed that many hon members knew that it would be only losing time to appoint the Committee if it was proposed to act upon free trade principles, as the agriculturist would take no advantage of the measure, for it would be impossible for them without protection to distil spirits from the produce of their farms, and therefore they would not attempt it Hon members spoke of distilling for exportation, but what protection would be required for that purpose Practical men knew that without protection, free distillation was a humbug and a delusion The hon member for Gumeracha said that imports were the proper sources of taxation, and he agreed with that hon gentleman If we were to have free distillation on free trade principles, he would support it He would be quite willing to tax French brandy at 10 per cent , but not higher nor would he tax that or any other article to give protection to our agriculturists Although our brewers paid no duty, they brewed from imported malt and sugar, paying duty upon them There was not one bushel of home-grown malt used in a dozen barrels of our beer , and there were three bags of sugar used for every bushel of malt That showed that we were not in a position to compete with countries which had articles which were of no use except for distillation for from the refuse of sugar beer could be made for 10d to 1s per gallon Could the agriculturist distil from the produce of his farm in South Australia on such terms as these? We had a very small protective duty on wine—only 10 per cent —and yet the people here could compete with foreigners in wine, because it was an article which our peculiar soil and climate produced better than almost any country in the world He believed that we would shortly produce not only as much wine as we could consume but also a large quantity for other markets, and these facts proved that the position of the agriculturist was not such as the hon mover of the resolution would make it appear If we had free distillation on free trade principles, we need not provide for the tariff for more than a year or two, for there would be no distillation, and so we could go back to the old system If we had free distillation, we should put duties on the articles consumed by the poor man, with seven or eight children, and who could not afford to drink grog He should either put a duty on tea or sugar, for it was £60,000 we had to raise , and we could not do with less revenue than we had at present, taking into account what we owe and what we require to borrow He believed the majority of the House, if in favor of free distillation at all, were in favor of it on free trade principles

Mr Young supported the original motion, though he would not consider himself warranted in doing so, but that the matter had been so fully discussed on previous occasions He thought the Government should lay a measure on the table, or offer some excuse for not doing so

Mr Reynolds (having just entered the House, and having heard the amendment read aloud by the Clerk) said this was a most important question and one upon which, if the Government ever had a policy, they should have one As to free distillation, his views had not undergone the least change His own opinions on the matter would probably be more in accordance with those of the hon member for West Torrens (Mr Cole) than with those of any other hon gentleman , but he should not give expression to his private views, as he felt that he should look upon this question more as a political economist than as a temperance advocate or a temperance man (Laughter) The subject had been warmly debated during the last session, the discussion lasting through three days All the pros and cons had been advanced, and the House solemnly came to a decision upon the subject Yet they did not find the Government dealing with the matter in accordance with the decision of the House No, they came down there hoping the House would assist them in their difficulty, because they were not capable of dealing with it themselves (Laughter from the Ministerial benches) The hon the Attorney-General moved—(Cries of "The Treasurer," and laughter)—Well, the hon the Treasurer moved, and the hon the Attorney-General endorsed it, that the Government were unfit to deal with this question The hon the Treasurer moved this amendment, and perhaps there was no fitter person, as that hon member had asked him (Mr Reynolds) to assist him in a plan of taxation, as he was not competent himself to prepare it But after the House had come to a solemn conclusion as to what they should do in this matter, they found the Government setting at defiance the resolution of the House, and after the long recess of seven months asking for a Select Committee to assist them What would be thought of a Chancellor of the Exchequer in England acting in this manner? Would the Ministry to which he belonged last three days? He could not imagine why, but they were it seemed to tolerate everything the present Ministry did Either the House had done wrong last session, or the Government had not gone far enough on this occasion When Dr Wark's Bill was brought in, it was understood to be a temporary measure, and it was also understood that the Government would do something more, but it appeared now that the Government were too idle or too indifferent to do what they were paid for Yet nothing was to disturb these hon gentlemen in their seats (Loud laughter from the Attorney-General) The hon the Attorney-General might laugh and he (Mr Reynolds) could not but admire the hon gentleman's tactics, as he had always done When the question of the Select Committee became a substantive motion, he hoped some hon member would move the previous question

Mr HARVEY thought we should have free distillation as far as possible, but the time was not come when we could have it to the extent the hon member for Onkaparinga desired He also thought it the duty of the Government to take up a question of this kind The principle of the Act of last session was much better than such a sweeping measure as that now proposed He was not willing to risk £60,000 by voting for the motion but the Select Committee would shelve the question He would rather vote for the previous question

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would be very happy to assist in the amendment of Dr Wark's Bill, when the evils of that measure were clearly known but he was not one of those who either in Dr Wark's Bill, or in the Constitution Act, or any other measure, was desirous of making amendments until he knew where they were required A reference had been made by the hon member for Onkaparinga to certain statements of his as reported in the Register and Observer He might take exception to that report, as the reports were very much condensed at the time (and he thought that hon members should have a faithful record of their speeches), but he did not take exception to the report referred to On looking over it, he believed it represented fairly what he said, but there was nothing inconsistent with that speech in his supporting the motion for a Select Committee He believed that nothing could be more easy than to reform the tariff It should be referred to a Select Committee, and if it was, such an absurdity as that of the cornsacks and wool bags would not be allowed to exist, a matter which he thought every hon member would agree with him should be abolished He hoped the enquiry would be a searching one, and he believed every member of the Committee, the House, and the country, would benefit by its labors

Mr SHANNON had no objection to the appointment of a Select Committee, thinking it advisable that the House should have all the information which it was in their power to obtain upon a question of such magnitude, before they finally decided upon it At the same time if he had any idea that referring the matter to a Select Committee would have the effect of shelving it, he should certainly oppose such a course He was of opinion that the distillation laws required great modification He did not say abolish all the restriction, but he was of opinion that some modification would materially benefit the colony at large He believed it would be most injurious to allow every person who wished to distil, the privilege of so doing, but the restrictions which he would propose upon distillers would be that they should be licensed, though not too heavily Under the present system, large sums were taken from the colony to its detriment for supplies which might readily be raised here It would be decidedly impolitic to cast any obstacles in the way of turning to the best account anything which the colony could produce By doing so, they would injure the producers of grain, and compel the colonists to obtain their supplies from a foreign market Vast sums of money were sent away annually for the importation of spirits, and he believed this amount could be very materially reduced He did not believe that the course which he suggested would lead to intemperance At the present time almost every person who wished to indulge in strong drinks could do so, but if they were rendered cheaper, it would be considered disgraceful for any person to be seen in a state of intoxication It might now be said by some that it was a mark of respect to be seen drunk, in consequence of the amount which it was requisite to expend to reduce a man to a state of inebriety (Laughter) He had a better opinion of the community than to suppose that by cheapening the price of spirits intoxication would be rendered more prevalent Brewers were allowed to carry on their operations without any material restrictions, and the colony had never suffered by this indulgence being allowed He thought that distillers should be placed on the same footing as brewers except that he would not allow them to distil from sugar unless it were grown in the colony The principal objection to the motion appeared to be the loss of revenue which would arise, but if the present import duties on spirits were continued the loss would not be very severely felt This might be called protection, but it was protection from without, and not merely the protection of one class at the expense of another The more producers there were the better for the colony, and the more each man produced the better it was for the colony He believed the loss to the revenue would not be material for years to come, but supposing that the revenue should fall something short, a very equitable mode might be devised of meeting the difficulty, namely, from the fund devoted to the purposes of immigration, without in any way interfering with the best interests of the colony

Mr TOWNSEND briefly replied in justification of having brought forward the motion He wished the hon member for the Light had been in his place, that hon gentleman having taunted him with having travelled too near the sun—too near the Government benches, but he begged to state that was not the case He once saw the hon member for the Light on the Government benches looking so truly miserable, that if he (Mr Townsend) had ever had any wish to occupy such a position, the sight of the hon member would certainly have done away with it (Laughter) The hon member said something about the sweets of office, but that he had never tasted them, and he certainly looked as if he never had (Laughter) Last session they had three days' discussion upon the question of distillation, and the Attorney-General and the Treasurer brought forward a resolution in which they embodied the resolution of Mr Waterhouse, with the addition that it should take effect after it had been proclaimed in the Government Gazette The hon gentlemen now said that they did that because they saw that a majority of the House were in favour of such a proposition Did he understand (addressing the Ministerial benches) that the morality of statesmen was so low

The SPEAKER—The hon member will address the members of the Government through the Speaker

Mr TOWNSEND would then address the hon gentlemen through the Speaker He would address the Commissioner of Public Works and ask if the morality of statesmen was so low that the Commissioner of Public Works, the Attorney-General, and the Treasurer would do one thing one session and not another? (Laughter from the Government benches) When they solemnly assented to the resolution of the previous session did they believe it? If they did, why not give effect to it last session, and if they did not it was clear they had assented to what they did not believe simply to keep their places He would leave the hon member (Mr Glyde) with one remark That hon member had stated that Dr Kelly thought Dr Wark's Bill would meet all requirements Now, he believed that Dr Wark's Bill would meet the requirements of the large vinegrowers, but not of the bulk of the agriculturists He was at a loss to imagine how hon members would vote for referring the matter to a Select Committee, without first affirming the resolution in favor of free distillation He should divide the House upon the free distillation point, and of course the Select Committee could then determine how the revenue should be made up In reference to the address to His Excellency, in reply to His Excellency's speech, he certainly understood the Attorney-General to state, when the address was before the House, that it would be a graceful act to His Excellency to pass it without comment, as it was a mere echo of the speech, He did not understand that the address committed those who voted for it to any principle

The SPEAKER was about to put the amendment, when

Mr PEAKE rose for the purpose of proposing an addition to the amendment, in the following words —"But that, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Ministry to prepare a scheme of finance calculated to maintain unimpaired the revenue of this colony in case of free distillation being allowed, and that such scheme be submitted by the Government to the above-named Committee. He wished to place on record his ideas of the responsibility of the Executive of every responsible Government He did not believe that any question involving such serious consequence was ever submitted to a Select Committee When Sir Robert Peel proposed the abolition of the corn laws or the abrogation of the navigation laws, which so vitally affected the question of finance, did he propose to refer the questions to a Select Committee of the House of Commons? Did he propose to bundle a lot of papers and statistics over to a Committee and say, make the best of them The sooner the House declared its opinion of such a course of action the better The whole question of taxation would have to be considered by the Committee, and the result he had no hesitation in saying would be that the Chairman after making numerous ineffectual attempts to get the Committee together would have to come to that House and say that he could get them to do nothing He could not allow the Committee to be appointed without requiring the Government, so far as he was personally concerned to take action, and lay a scheme before the Committee, who would then have some definite course indicated, but he did not think the Committee should be appointed without instructions from that House to the Executive, such as he had indicated in the addition to the amendment which he had proposed He had been taunted with indulging in abstract principles and propositions, but in the course of the debate even the Attorney-General had been driven to the use of the term "abstract proposition" in reference to the motion It was an abstract proposition, a truism from which there would be no dissentient, if all the circumstances of the colony were favorable to free distillation The hon mover, in introducing the motion, stated that he thought there should be free trade throughout, yet, at the very commencement, he invoked the demon protection in the shape of an eight shilling duty It was to be a graduated protection, and he supposed would be swept away some time or other He hoped the colony of South Australia would never shelter itself behind the rotten old wall of protection The day unquestionably must come when free distillation must be granted They would so surely be obliged to adopt that system for the purpose of saving the agriculturists, as they had been to adopt boiling down for the purpose of saving sheepfarmers and stockholders It would be absolutely essential to adopt it for the purpose of finding a vent for the surplus produce of their vineyards and cornfields, and a prudent Parliament would endeavor to anticipate this by making all proper fiscal arrangements before the evil day came He did not care whether free distillation would pay or not but he contended it was the duty of the Government to prepare for the future Let the Government prepare some financial scheme, so that the minds of the Committee might be directed to some particular policy upon which they could improve, and report to that House upon a question which was second in importance to none

Mr HUGHES seconded the amendment amidst cries of "Divide, divide"

Mr Peake's amendment, or addition to the amendment of the Treasurer, was carried, and a Committee was appointed consisting of Messrs Barrow, Burford, Blyth, Townsend, Milne, and the Treasurer, to report that day three weeks

The Attorney-General had made enquiries and had been informed that no private law business had been conducted in the Lands Titles Office at the public expense He was not aware whether the solicitors connected with the department had yet retired from their private practice, but they would be compelled to do so as soon as the House had agreed to their salaries

Mr Reynolds wished before the business of the day was called on, to ask the hon the Speaker a question upon a matter of privilege He wished to know whether the privileges of that House would permit him to refer to what had taken place in the other, or Upper House—a statement having been made by the Chief Secretary in the other branch of the Legislature reflecting upon his (Mr Reynolds's) veracity He wished to know if he was at liberty to enter into an explanation upon the subject

The Speaker said the hon member was not at liberty to enter into an explanation, the only occasions upon which hon members were at liberty to refer to what had taken place in the other House, being when reports of Committees had been published Reference might then be made to them, although the reports of such Committees had not been communicated to the Lower House

Mr Reynolds asked if the hon the Speaker could direct him how he should meet the allegations?

The Speaker could not, and the matter dropped

They were ordered to be printed

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Treasurer, this Bill was read a third time and passed

Mr Strangways was desirous of moving an amendment upon this Bill, but was informed that he was too late

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The Treasurer reminded the House that they had proceeded through the public works items so far as that of 4,000*l* for the South Australian Institute, reserving several items in reference to the Government House and furniture. He proposed in the first instance to discuss the item of 4,000*l* for the South Australian Institute, and then to ask the House to complete the public works department by recurring to those items which had been postponed He begged to move the item "South Australian Institute (first instalment), 4,000*l*

Mr Milne would like to ask the Government whether they had taken into consideration the propriety of devoting the building in which they were then assembled to the purposes of an Institute, and erecting new Houses of Parliament

The Commissioner of Public Works stated in reply to the hon member that the Government had taken the question into consideration but found that the building had cost a good deal more than one which would accommodate the South Australian Institute, and the erection of new Houses of Parliament would, of course, involve a very large expenditure It would be well for the information of some hon members that he should give the history of this vote The Governors of the South Australian Institute applied to the Government to introduce a Bill to enable them to borrow 4,000*l* for the purpose of erecting an Institute The Government felt that to introduce such a Bill would be pledging their credit for a small amount, and thought that they might effect the object in view by placing a sum upon the Estimates for the amount or nearly the amount required He might mention that the whole sum which would be required would, he believed be 5000*l*, certainly not more This would explain the remark which appeared against the item "first instalment" The Government had no objection to those words being struck out The building would be subject to the approval of the Governors of the Institute, and he need hardly remind the House of the great number of petitions which had been presented on behalf of this vote, which involved not merely a city or a county question, but a national one, and he, therefore, hoped the House would assent to the vote

Mr Reynolds hoped the Government would postpone this item, as it appeared that no plans or estimates had been prepared, and nothing would be gained by passing it at the present time In fact a great deal might be lost He should feel bound to oppose the vote unless the Government would consent to postpone it until the plans and estimates were on the table of the House The House really did not know what they would be voting, what kind of building would be erected, or in fact anything about the matter It would be much better, under such circumstances, that it should remain in abeyance until the House had something before them to guide them, in addition to which it had been determined that no money for public buildings should be voted until plans and specifications had been prepared, and had been laid before the House If the item were postponed, it would probably cause the Colonial Architect to be a little more alive, they would very quickly have the plans and estimates prepared, and then the Government would be enabled to go to work at once If the money were voted at that moment without any plans or estimates, it was quite possible that it might be 12 months before the work was commenced ("No, no," from the Commissioner of Public Works) He was quite sure that if the hon gentleman really wished the Institute to have a building, he could not do better than support the proposition that they should have plans and specifications before the money was voted, and know what sort of a building they were going to have It was very unwise of the Government to bring forward this vote without plans and estimates, after the time which they had had to prepare them

Dr Wark should vote against this item even though he stood alone He did not want to discourage such institutions, but on the contrary he would encourage every institution which was for the advancement of education either for the young or old, but he must oppose giving away £4,000 in so blind a manner as that which was now proposed He thought the discussion which took place the other day would effectually have prevented the Government from bringing forward such items without plans and estimates He never dreamt that the Government would dare to pursue such a course, after the sense of the House had been so fully taken, as to bring forward this or any other item for a public building without plans and estimates When once the Government got in the edge of the wedge, they took care to drive it home tight It was time the House paused, and if the Ministry would not receive the hints which had been given them in reference to the expenditure of the public funds, the members of that House should oblige them to receive them As for this particular item of £4,000 for the erection of an Institute in this city, he should have no objection to support the item if the citizens would do as they had always done in similar cases, and act in a corresponding spirit of liberality It was said that this Institute was for adults, but for the youth, whose education was of paramount importance, the people had to help themselves And why not in this case also? It was monstrous that here, in the centre of the colony, where people could best afford to maintain such an Institute, the House should be asked to vote a blind £4,000 as an instalment, although it had not been shown that the people had done anything towards the work themselves. Could they do nothing? Were they always to be in leading-strings? Why not subscribe a certain sum, and then ask the House to contribute a similar amount? When they had done that it would be high time to consider the question A few days ago it would be remembered that he presented a petition from the Magill Mechanics' Institute, praying that the amount granted to them might be supplemented, but in that case he shewed that the people had subscribed £225, and that the only sum they had received from Government had been £50 In such cases there were good grounds for coming to that House for relief, but there were none where the people had subscribed nothing Let the people of Adelaide take a manly stand, and only ask for a similar amount to that which they subscribed The people of Adelaide were in a position to help themselves, and let them do so The country people were widely scattered, and could not have the benefit of these noble institutions, yet they were compelled to subscribe towards them before they could get assistance from the Government The principle which he had advocated was introduced in the District Councils Act, and he could not see why it should not be made applicable to such cases as the present Let the amount voted to that House be in accordance with the sum subscribed by the people That principle should be extended to the centre as well as to the circumference, and he believed it to be a libel upon the citizens of Adelaide to say that they would not contribute

Mr Peake wished to ask the Government where the building was to be erected. He thought it most desirable that the House should have the plans and estimates before them, before they voted the money With respect to these institutions, and the formation of public libraries and museums, he thought they were the best landmarks of modern civilisation, and he should support them But it had been stated that the building in which they were assembled was to be given over to the South Australian Institute That had been distinctly understood under a former Ministry, and he consequently felt some hesitation in reference to this vote, because if that building were to be handed over to the Institute it would be folly to expend £4,000 upon a new building He heard that White's room was not sufficiently large for the Institute, and if so, what earthly use would there be in voting £4,000 for such a room as could be erected for that sum, as he was informed that White's room cost £10,000 (No, no) If it were intended that there should merely be the four walls, without museum or any appurtenances, they would certainly have a building which would be a credit to South Australia, as square as a brick, and not quite so upright (Laughter) As the House had already intimated that the building in which they were assembled, would be handed over to the Institute, he really thought that the Institute mighht wait, or that rooms might be rented for it until the new Houses of Parliament had been erected He believed that action would have to be taken in reference to the new Houses of Parliament, for he felt that the dignity of the other branch of the Legislature must be hurt by being closeted in such a miserable little place as it was at present. The present building would prove a most valuable and useful place for an Institute, but was scarcely adequate for the Houses of Parliament The public would, he was assured, be served by a postponement of the vote, and he did not think that science would suffer by the delay

Mr Lindsay did not like to see the thin end of the wedge got in, and would prefer, before voting this amount, to see plans and specifications of the building which it was proposed to erect If they voted the first instalment, it was impossible to say what further sums they might be called upon to vote He would suggest that the item should either be postponed or struck out altogether

The Treasurer perceived that many members hesitated about passing this vote, and was sorry that it was so, because the desire of the Government was to proceed as early as possible with the building He was quite sure that those hon members who were at present opposed to the vote would ultimately be in favor of it The opposition at present appeared to arise from the absence of plans and specifications rather than to the principle of the vote He had no desire that the House should press the vote on the present occasion seeing that there would be an opportunity when the other Estimates were brought forward of placing it on them He would ask the House to be allowed to withdraw the vote and in the interim would see that plans and specifications were prepared

The Chairman stated that the vote should be struck out of the Supplementary Estimates and be introduced in those for the current year

This course was pursued, the motion that the vote be struck out being carried

Mr Neales believed the House was quite determined that there should be an Institute, and that the building should contain the necessary accommodation It would be much more advisable that the vote should be struck out of the Supplementary Estimates, and that it should be placed on the Estimates for the current year This would not at all impede the building, as the necessary plans and specifications could be proceeded with There was an objection to vote even a sum of £100 in a blind way, that is without plans and specifications

Mr Mildred was not aware that the wish of the Treasurer had been to strike out the item He (Mr Mildred) had wished to add the words "pending plans and specifications being prepared" He would rather see that course adopted, as it was desirable it should be recorded that when sufficient information had been given the House would vote a sum sufficient to carry out this national undertaking He did not look upon this question in the light of the hon member for the Murray They were not going to appropriate money specially for the benefit of the people of Adelaide, but for the whole colony, by collecting literature, models of machinery, philosophical apparatus, &c It was a national institution, and not merely one for the city He need hardly refer to the feeling manifested by the people, as out of the fifteen institutions in the country fourteen had petitioned the House to carry out this measure, which had been so long in abeyance, but in favor of which the feeling of the country had been so strongly shown He hoped if there could be that there would be some arrangement by which the item would be allowed to stand upon the Estimates, and subject to the approval of the House when plans and specifications had been prepared Allusions had been made to the want of support on the part of the public, but he need merely refer to the number of subscribers and to the number of books of which the Institute could boast, which were not merely for the use of the residents of the city, but were disseminated far and wide As the representatives of the people he was deeply anxious that they should pursue such a course as would meet the wishes of the public

Mr Milne would be sorry if the Government were to understand that the opposition was merely in consequence of the absence of plans and specifications He wished the Government would reconsider the question feeling quite sure that the sum of £5,000 which had been alluded to would be found only adequate for the Institution alone, that is for the reading-room and library, but to provide a museum, a much larger and more expensive building would be required. Although that House cost more than £5,000 he thought they ought to look forward to the time when the new Houses of Parliament would be erected The most prudent course would he believed be to postpone the item and allow the Institution to wait for a time

Mr Glyde, as one of the Governors of the South Australian Institute, would offer a few remarks He hoped the Treasurer would not withdraw the item, but merely postpone it for the production of plans The Governors of the South Australian Institute, finding the accommodations which they possessed entirely inadequate, although £500 a year had been voted by the Legislature for a suitable building, but they found it quite impossible to find any building which had the accommodations they required They made temporary arrangements with the landlord of the building in which the Institute was at present held, and secured three small rooms, but still they had no room for the books, and were obliged to decline many offers of specimens, &c, in connection with natural history, which would have gone far to establish a National Museum The Governors of the Institute in such circumstances felt that they would be failing in their duty if they did not apply to the Government to assist them in obtaining better accommodation It was suggested at first that a Bill should be introduced to enable the Governors to raise £4,000 on bonds, but it was thought unadvisable to introduce a Bill for so small an amount and the Government consented to put the sum under discussion upon the Estimates That item now came before him as one of the representatives of the people, and he saw no reason that he should not support it He thought the city was entitled to such a building as it was posed to erect. There were 16 country institutes, or rather one had died a natural death, and 14 out of 15 had petitioned the House to assent to the vote Each petition was accompanied by a memorial from the Secretary of the Institution, stating that a very much larger number of signatures could have been obtained had there been more time These memorials were signed by all classes and conditions of men With regard to the proposition that the buildings in which they were then assembled should be handed over to the South Australian Institute, he was afraid that hon members had not calculated the time during which the South Australian Institute must suffer, independently of which he doubted if the buildings were at all eligible for the South Australian Institute The largest room in the building was that in which they were assembled, but it was certainly not large enough for the requirements of the Institution He questioned if it would hold more than 200 persons, but the Institute required a building which would hold at least 1,000 The soirees and lectures in connection with the Institution were remarkably well attended On the previous night there were between 800 and 900 persons present, and that was not more than an average attendance The Governors of the Institution had had under consideration whether they should ask a sufficient sum for the erection of a large room, or whether they should be content to hire White's rooms for their entertainment It was absolutely essential that they should have a library for the preservation of books and a reading-room, because the library in connection with the Institution was a circulating library, consequently it would not do to have the library and reading-room in one, and they required a large room for a museum, with three or four smaller rooms for class-rooms and committees It was their intention when they had got a suitable building to establish classes for the improvement and further education of children of a larger growth The hon member for the Murray had said that the people of Adelaide had not supported this Institution, and that, therefore, the Government should not but there were upwards of 600 subscribers who contributed £1 per annum each, and the number of volumes approached 9,000 The number of readers averaged 40 or 50 and even at present there were not sufficient accommodations for them, so that he hoped the House would not hesitate in passing the vote of £4 000 He believed with the Commissioner of Public Works that £5 000 would be sufficient

Mr Strangways was glad that the vote had been withdrawn or struck out or he should have opposed it The hon member for East Torrens had stated that the country institutions would derive great benefit from the passing of this vote, and if the hon member as a Governor of the South Australian Institute, could have pointed out how the country institutions would have benefited there would have been a much larger claim on the country members to support the present vote But nothing of the kind had been shown A sum of £4,000 had been voted for a Registry-Office which it had been stated would be utterly useless for several years

Mr Hughes rose to ask if there was any question before the House

The Chairman said there was not, the item had been struck out

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

The Treasurer reminded the House that some items relating to Government-House and furniture for that building had been postponed but since that time returns had been prepared to enable hon members to understand the expenditure which had been incurred over a series of years. Vouchers had also been placed before the House—in fact every information had been offered which it was in the power of the Government to give. He would ask the House to enable him to close the votes for public works by proceeding with the items which had been postponed, the first of which was "Painting, papering and decorating Government House, £1000."

The TREASURER explained that this item had been already expended, and the work paid for.

Mr PEAKE wished to know whether the returns to 2nd September, 1858, embraced this item. Was the money expended?

The TREASURER said the returns before the House shewed the amount actually expended, but not the amount of liabilities incurred. The amount incurred was included in this vote. In reference to another item, he might also remark that an order had been sent for furniture, the plan of the rooms had been sent home, and the plans and descriptions of the furniture required. Nearly all the furniture had arrived, but it had not been paid for. Some portion of the furniture had not arrived, and the Government could not estimate the cost of it because they had not yet got the invoice; they had merely made a rough estimate.

Mr HUGHES wished the hon. gentleman to explain whether the sum asked for had been actually expended, or whether the amount asked for was a reserve fund to meet invoices which might arrive. He really did not understand what was included in the paper No. 55, which had been laid before the House. He regretted that no returns had been laid upon the table of the House showing the expenditure upon Government House previous to 1850, because as hon. members were aware Government House was built long anterior to 1850, and he regretted that the information which had been asked for in reference to its cost had not been placed before hon. members. It was true that some vouchers had been placed before the House, but how could hon. members examine them and hit upon the precise document they required? A great principle was involved in the present vote, and as there was really no information before the House, for no information had been given, in reference to the plans of furniture, or as to whether the quantity ordered had been limited to the vote of the House. He thought the whole question should be referred to a Select Committee to report upon. The House was really in no better position, so far as information was concerned, than when the question was last before it. The House should assert its functions, and rigidly examine the various items.

Mr REYNOLDS was sorry to trouble the House, but he understood the item under discussion to be for painting and decorating Government House. In June last he was aware that 600*l.* out of the 1,000*l.* had been expended. He wished to know how it was that the Government now asked for 400*l.* more.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the amount expended through the Colonial Architect's department was 716*l.*, but that did not include the cost of paper-hangings and other small items.

Mr REYNOLDS wished to know if he was to understand that the cost of the paper from England was to be deducted from the amount for decorations.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that independent of paper-hangings, cornices, and a number of smaller items which the hon. member would have been aware of if he had been recently engaged in the building line, were included in this vote.

Mr REYNOLDS thought the House should be in possession of the full particulars.

The TREASURER said the hon. member might be whenever he thought proper, as the particulars were upon the table of the House.

Mr SHANNON condemned the practice of the Government expending money and then asking the House to pay it. He believed that during the last four years Government House and Cottage cost £17,000. The House should interfere to prevent unauthorised expenditure. Without opposing the motion he should certainly on any future occasion oppose votes for money which had been expended without authority.

The item was then agreed to.

The next item was £1,900, for furniture for Government House.

Mr NEALES said the cost of Government House and furniture was £17,000, and that £15,000 of that had been spent during the last four years. He considered that rate of expenditure must be stopped. The previous expenditure from 1850 had been very light, but if such extravagance were continued it would be no use asking money for Institutes. Next somebody would want to cover Adelaide and turn it into a sanitorium for Indian invalids.

Mr PEAKE observed that £2,000 had already been voted for furniture, and that to ask for double the amount was too much to expend on furniture for any department. But much as he condemned the extravagance he would have willingly voted that amount to render comfortable the abode of Her Majesty's representative had the money been spent in the colony. He thought there was neither wisdom, policy, nor prudence in giving those contracts to strangers.

Mr LINDSAY had no doubt the item would be voted, but he still did not see that the House was bound to vote that amount. If it was voted it would be more an act of liberality than otherwise, for although a former Legislature had obtained a vote to be expended in a certain way, it appeared that nearly double the amount had been expended. The House was not, therefore, bound to carry out unauthorised expenditure.

The TREASURER wished to say a few words as to the conduct of the Government. The hon. member for Burra and Clare had said he would have voted more money had the furniture been all obtained in the colony. Now, considerably more than half the amount was actually spent in the colony. The cost of moving the furniture, and fixing the decorations, and of papering, had been actually spent in the colony. But many of the articles of furniture were such as could not have been obtained here, such as mirrors and curtains. But he (the Treasurer) could not altogether subscribe to the doctrine that money should be spent in the colony when the articles could be got elsewhere at a cheaper rate. He thought even that the hon. member would not purchase stores, nor clothes, nor even a house in the colony, if he could import those things cheaper. Goods ought to be bought in the cheapest market. In regard to the great increase in the expenditure above the vote of the House, he would state that £15,000 were voted by a former Assembly. A Committee sat to decide on the expenditure, and they decided on the sum of £9,000 as the lowest sum that could be estimated for the enlargement of Government House. Having built the house, they were bound to furnish it, and the Legislature voted £3,000 for that purpose, but did not specify the articles on which that money was to be spent, and when the orders were sent home the exact cost could not be ascertained. Hence the amount of the vote had been exceeded. He would further inform the House that the firm who supplied the goods had charged no commission on the transaction. (Hear, and laughter.) Hon. members said "hear, hear." He could only say he had looked over the accounts, and he could discover no charge for commission.

Mr PEAKE thought that the Government had not gone to the cheapest market for the furniture, or the cost could not have so far exceeded the amount of the vote. Had they consulted a colonial cabinetmaker, he could have told them within a few shillings what it would have cost. As all the invoices were not to hand after the £1,900 was voted, the House could not know whether that would be the end of the expenditure or not.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could assure hon. members that, after these votes were passed, they would hear no more of the matter, for neither that Government nor any future one would be unmindful of the debate that had occurred in regard to that item. Perhaps some hon. members who had families might have ordered furniture from England, and have found that the cost was not precisely what had been estimated. A difference of freight would cause a considerable difference on the cost, for freight was no inconsiderable item on furniture. Packages, too, amounted to a heavy sum. The Government had given every information on the matter before the House, and could assure hon. members that every care had been taken.

Mr BURFORD could not understand how there could have been an estimate in the case. How was it possible that they could expend £2,000 and require £1,900 more if an estimate had first been obtained? It was a contradiction in terms. He apprehended, if the truth were known, a carte blanche had been sent to some illustrious house in the cabinet line, and general instructions given to suit the furniture to the room considering it was to be occupied by Her Majesty's representative.

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Commissioner of Public Works had said that every care had been taken by the Government. Now he thought if the item before the House was a specimen of their care the sooner they became careless the better. He could not understand whether the total £3,900 had been actually spent or whether it was to include invoices received and invoices expected. He wished the Treasurer to state distinctly how the matter stood.

Mr HUGHES considered the question before the House was whether they should sanction unauthorized expenditure. £2,000 had been expended on Government House, but no statement had been made of the nature of the order sent home—whether it was a carte blanche nor if the amount of expenditure was limited. He thought that the House should act on principle, and if the House authorised that expense, in the absence of further information, they must go back and pay £50 for that verandah at Port Adelaide. That verandah was necessary to keep out the sun from the windows. The Government assured the gentleman who put it up they would put the sum on the Estimates, and they ought to have defended it. He (Mr Hughes) maintained that the House ought to act on principle, and as they refused to vote that £50 they should refuse every claim for unauthorised expenditure.

Mr DUFFIELD would oppose that vote on the same ground that he opposed the vote for the verandah. He opposed it simply because the expenditure was not authorized. If 2,000*l.* were voted, and the following session it had to be supplemented by 1,900*l.*, the expenditure of the country would not be governed by the votes in Parliament, and eventually the whole revenue might be absorbed by Supplementary Estimates.

Mr SOLOMON felt much disposed to find fault with the Government for ordering goods and applying afterward for payment for them. There was one question in reference to the matter which had not been touched upon. It did not appear that the Government applied to colonial manufacturers for an estimate of cost, and therefore they might easily have forgotten many items, such as freight and charges, necessary to be taken into consideration on furniture imported from England. Those items amounted to a considerable per centage on first cost. With regard to what had fallen from the Treasurer respecting there being no commission charged, there were more ways of obtaining a profit on orders entrusted to English houses than a direct charge of commission, and it might have been, therefore, more advantageous had a fair commission been paid. If the Treasurer would answer the question as to whether the amount asked for would cover the whole expenditure, he should feel disposed to vote for the item, but until then he (Mr Solomon) should withhold his vote.

The TREASURER had no difficulty in answering the question. The amount now asked would not only cover the payments made, but the expenditure incurred. He had taken care to estimate for a sufficient sum in that instance, so that the Government would not have occasion to come before the House again on the subject. He would take that opportunity—because the Government had been rather roughly handled by hon. members in their remarks, and treated as though they (the Government) were personally responsible—of saying that not one single member of the existing Government had been consulted in ordering the expenditure on Government furniture. It had been entirely the act of a former Government, and they (the present Government) were obliged to ask for that vote to sustain the credit of the colony.

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if the whole amount had been expended. He thought there might be a balance unexpended.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would say in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for the Port (Mr Hughes) that the Government did defend the vote for 50*l* for the verandah, both by their speeches and their votes. He would be glad if an opportunity were given to the House to reconsider their vote. (Hear, hear, from Mr Hughes.)

The TREASURER said nearly £800 had been expended out of that £1,900 asked for. The invoices were expected to make up the remainder.

The item was put and agreed to.

Additions to Military Barracks, £320.

Agreed to.

Painting Government House, £450.

Agreed to.

On the item cellar, ashpit, and general repairs to Government Cottage, Glenelg, £250 being proposed,

Mr HUGHES said it was clearly understood by the House and the country that there should only be two residences provided for His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief—Government House and the Farm. But they (the House) were now called upon to vote money for further additions. If the House went on preparing places of residence for the Governor, they would be next asked to increase his salary on account of his increased expenses.

On the question being put, the House divided, when there appeared for the vote—

Ayes, 22—Messrs Dutton, Blyth, Bagot, Barrow, Hallett, Hart, Harvey, Hawker, Hay, Lindsay, MacDermott, McEllister, Mildred, Milne, Neales, Peake, Reynolds, Rogers, Shannon, Solomon, Strangways, and Finniss (Teller).

Noes, 5—Messrs Burford, Duffield, Dunn, Hughes, and Glyde (Teller).

Majority in favor of the vote, 17.

Mr HUGHES begged to ask the Chairman if he would be in order in moving that the £50 refused by the House for a verandah to the Custom House, Port Adelaide, should be considered.

The CHAIRMAN decided it would not be in order.

ROADS, STREETS, BRIDGES, &c.

The next item was North Arm road, £136 16s 1d.

Agreed to.

On the item, £8,000, including £1,000 conditionally for Port-road, being put,

Mr HART enquired what the condition was?

The TREASURER stated that it was proposed to appropriate that sum to the Port-road on condition that an equal amount was contributed by the District Councils.

Mr HART asked under whose guidance and superintendence the money would be laid out?

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed that the word "conditionally" be struck out.

Mr SOLOMON seconded the proposition.

The TREASURER had no objection to its being struck out, as many members appeared to think something ought to be done to the Port road.

Mr MILNE thought the House had sufficiently expressed its opinion on that subject a few days ago.

Mr MILDRED thought it would be better that the road should remain.

Mr HART could not understand what could be effected with £1,000 when the Government said the other day that £3,000 was of no use. However, as the smallest sum would be thankfully received for repairs of that road, he should vote for it.

Mr MILDRED thought if 70 feet of the road were sold it would be a good thing. A road 60 feet wide would meet all the purposes and claims of those persons who reside on the Port-road.

Mr HUGHES thought Mr Mildred proposed to sell the most useful part of the Port-road. That thousand pounds would go a long way towards putting the causeway in a sufficient state of repair, and if that were done it would do away, in a great degree, with the complaints that were made. He hoped it would be accepted.

Mr LINDSAY wished the item struck out altogether. He thought the expenditure of the Central Road Board was unsatisfactory, but of £8000 proposed to be spent £1000 was for the Southern Districts. He opposed the vote with good reason. It was proposed to spend £1000 on Willunga Hill, and rather than spend it there he would vote for the money being thrown into St Vincent's Gulf, for the gradients were so miserable that a good road could not be made, and unless a new line were laid out. He would move that the Estimate for £8,000 be withdrawn until the Road Act was passed.

Mr STRANGWAYS would oppose the item being struck out, as the whole staff would have to be discharged, and everything brought to a stand still. He would support the vote for the item if the word "conditionally" were struck out.

Mr NEALES would support the vote as amended by striking out the word "conditionally," because it would give a small portion of what was required for the Port road. When the vote for the Central Road Board came on he should say more.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would simply state that the expenditure had been carefully considered, and that the cutting at Willunga was exceedingly necessary. The necessity of making that road had been long urged on the Board, and it would materially improve the South road.

Mr BAGOT would move that the sum to be voted should be £10,000 instead of £8000, in order that the north might derive some advantage from the expenditure.

The amendment was put and negatived.

The vote then passed.

The next item, repairs to road through Flinders Range, £500, was passed as printed.

On the item, Onkaparinga tunnel extension, £450, being proposed,

Mr PEAKE asked for some explanation. He understood the tunnel was a kind of dust-hole, and when it was opened it was certain to be filled up again with dust.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was happy to state that that sum was required for preventing the draught that had hitherto taken place in the tunnel. The plans proposed to be carried out would keep open the tunnel and enable passengers to use the road.

Mr NEALES would sooner take the personal guarantee of the hon. member who spoke last than the guarantee of the Government. He (Mr Neales) was perfectly satisfied that the plans proposed would not keep sand out of the tunnel.

Mr HALLETT called attention to the manner in which the work had been carried out. They had made a jetty, then a tunnel, and then a little piece required to be added. During last session he called on a friend of his—a merchant, down there, and was told it was no use going to see the tunnel, for he could not find it. He thought it probable the tunnel might remain open two or three hours, and then block up again. Unless the Commissioner of Public Works could guarantee that the vote would be final, he would oppose the item.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could not give his own guarantee. The Colonial Architect had been sent down, and he stated that the sum would be sufficient to keep the tunnel in repair.

Mr MILDRED hoped that, after spending £7,000 or £8,000 in giving facilities to trade, the vote of the House would not render that outlay useless. He hoped and trusted, after having laid out so much, the House would vote enough to extend the bridge across the Onkaparinga.

Mr HUGHES asked how far the £450 would extend the tunnel; for, if the jetty were to be made available, the tunnel should be extended. He hoped the amount would be voted, in order to make the jetty available.

Mr MILNE having visited the place considered that if the tunnel were opened, it would be impossible to make it available extensively unless a road were made across the swamp, and a bridge were thrown across the Onkaparinga. It would only be available for traffic on the north side; but the Port should be made available as a place of shipment by completing those large and extensive works.

Mr PEAKE thought the present another expedient to get a little vote, in order to get a little more afterwards. He thought it was so unsatisfactory a way of voting public money, that he should refuse to vote it until he saw a report from an engineer with regard to the desirability of completing the work. He would not consent to go on step by step until a large outlay had taken place, and then found to be useless. From all he had heard he thought it plain enough the tunnel was nothing but a dust hole, and he thought it was never likely to be anything more.

Mr LINDSAY had visited the place as well as some of the hon. members who had spoken previously, although he could not give any credit to the Government Engineers for the manner in which they had performed their part of the work. But there was no other way of making the jetty available but by extending the tunnel; without this the jetty would be all but useless. The question was, were they to allow the 7,000*l* which had been already expended to be thrown away, or by this small additional expenditure to be rendered available The tunnel could not, of course, be carried further than the river, and if it were carried so far it must remain open, as the sand would then blow through into the water But he did not think it would be necessary to carry the tunnel as far as the river, as all the dust came from the inland side

Mr HUGHES trusted the House would assent to the item To hear the discussion one might think that it was some amateur who had been cutting a tunnel in the sand without any definite design He (Mr Hughes) had seen the port of Onkaparinga, and he confidently believed that it was likely to be one of the best ports in the colony between this and Cape Jervis The great fault seemed to be in the not having a proper design for the approach to the jetty, but in his opinion it would be impossible to take a load of wheat over the sand hills without making a tunnel He quite agreed that if that port was to be developed to the full extent it was capable of, a bridge must cross the river thus saving the long cartage of goods by Noarlunga He trusted the House would not refuse to vote this small sum

Mr MILDRED held in his hand a document signed by the owners of 23,000 acres of land in the neighborhood, all of whom would ship their produce from the port in question, if they had only reasonable facilities for doing so The mill at Onkaparinga was now in full working order

The next item was Willunga jetty extension, of £204 1s 2d

Mr REYNOLDS enquired whether it was the intention of the Government to improve the roadway

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said he had heard no complaints on the subject

Mr MILDRED said that the roadway was nearly impassable He had seen drays within the last two months up to the axles in it The road was requisite to meet the immediate wants of those persons shipping from Willunga He also wished for some information respecting the tramway

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the plans of the tramway were lying on the table, but they were not yet printed

The item was agreed to

On the next item, Port Adelaide Bridge £1 850,

Mr REYNOLDS wished for some information on this point He believed a sum of £3,000 had already been voted, and that £1,500 had been subscribed by the inhabitants He also understood that tenders had been taken for the construction of the bridge for £1,500 He wished to know whether the £1,500 subscribed had been paid over to the Government

The TREASURER said the Government had already received £1,000 out of the £1,500 which had been subscribed This £1,000 had been paid into the Treasury The Government in reality asked for only £850

Mr REYNOLDS observed that the £1,000 did not appear on the other side of the account

The TREASURER said if the hon member referred to the Supplementary Estimates of last year he would find this sum under the head of "Reimbursements in Aid"

Mr REYNOLDS begged the hon member's pardon for having overlooked this His object was to enquire whether the Government intended to spend the £850 without reference to the previous vote and subscription

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that £350 was required for extra works, and £500 had been promised by the subscribers, and he trusted this sum would at a future time appear under the heading of reimbursements in aid

Mr STRANGWAYS asked what was proposed to be done in reference to the wharf frontage The bridge was below the wharf, and would cut off all communication with the river above It was said to be a drawbridge, but he believed it was about as creditable a construction as the Waterworks weir, that it was of such a description that when open it could not be shut, and when shut it could not be opened (Laughter) He believed also that the Government, in constructing the bridge, had violated the law, as they had no power to interfere with navigable waters except by authority from the Legislature

Captain HART said that the sum of 1,000*l* referred to had been subscribed two years ago He would call attention to the fact that 45,000*l* worth of land had been sold in this neighbourhood within the past five years The vote had been taken as long since as June, 1855, when an address was voted by that House for a sum of 3,000*l*, provided 1,000*l* were lodged with the Government by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood The answer was favourable, and the 1,000*l* was sent in in the early part of November, but the Government did nothing in the matter, and the next year an address was voted in which the House requested the Government to take means for having the former address complied with He thought the action of the Government in respect to this bridge would prevent private individuals, in future from subscribing for such purposes, as it had prevented the work from being carried out The bridge was now a standing joke to the people of the Port, and it would never be of any use. In an engineering point of view it was the greatest piece of humbug ever perpetrated by any Government He need only point out to the House that the piles were placed only two abreast, and that there was a space of twenty four feet from each two to the next two He need not ask whether a bridge so constructed, would be capable of bearing a traffic consisting for the most part of heavy building materials He thought the House would agree that in this respect a great mistake had been committed But even in this style there was no chance of the bridge being completed as up to the present moment nothing had been done beyond driving the piles At the same time a vote was taken for the North Arm-road, for which nothing was subscribed, and that was completed, and not merely completed, but a wharf built at the end of it, with two approaches which fenced in a great portion of the land in section G With respect to the bridge, the matter was thought of such little consequence that instead of taking it to a public road it was taken to private land, which he believed belonged to the Registrar-General—(a laugh)—or at least that officer had it in trust for some one, and the Government would probably have to take this land out of the owner's hands, and come to the House to ask for compensation though what amount of compensation he could not say He firmly believed there never was so great a grievance as this brought before the House There was a traffic where the bridge was placed There were some 400 to 500 people daily passed across there in boats at 6d each He had already said that the people paid up £1,000, but it should be remembered that this was two years ago, and as the interest on this sum would be £200, he might say they had contributed £1,200 already towards this undertaking Yet there was no more chance of the work being completed now than when they paid the money

Mr MILDRED said that of all the ill-contrived and badly-constructed undertakings in South Australia he did not know another like the one under discussion, but the question now was whether the people higher up than this bridge were to be deprived of the right of traffic It was originally understood that it was a drawbridge which was to be placed there which could be passed by vessels It was the general opinion of persons acquainted with the spot that the bridge was put in the wrong place, and he believed that hon members would be convinced after what they had heard that it was in the wrong style His own opinion was that the less additional money they spent on such an undertaking the better

Mr NEALES hoped this would be a lesson to people that if they did not put their hands in their own pockets their wants would be sooner attended to The people a little further down, who did not put their hands in their pockets, got £28,000 for the North Arm road, while the money was quite thrown away, yet there would be thousands upon thousands wanted for the Port as the business would go on increasing and the wants of the place would be also increasing He quite agreed with hon members in thinking the bridge a miserable affair, and he heard the best plan would be to convert it into a foot-bridge, for if a loaded dray were put upon it there would be a spill in the middle of the stream

Mr PEAKE thought the people of the Port had been very shamefully and disgracefully treated He was sorry the hon member (Mr Neales) had found it necessary to make such strong remarks as he had used, but they were called for by the conduct of the Government in this matter It was really monstrous, and the manner in which it was said that the work was being carried out was more monstrous still He hoped such occurrences as this, constantly arising where works were imperfectly performed, would cause the hon the Commissioner of Public Works to introduce radical reforms into his department

Mr HAY, after the remarks of the hon member Mr Hart, was inclined to oppose the vote, as it appeared that, as far as the bridge was constructed, the money was completely thrown away The hon member Mr Neales said the better plan would be to convert the bridge into a foot-bridge, and he agreed in this opinion There should be plans and estimates prepared and a sufficient sum voted for the completion of a bridge in continuation of the Port-road It would be far better if the House had voted £8,000 or £10 000 at once for a swing bridge in continuation of that road

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, before the vote was put would make a brief explanation in reply to statements made by various hon members The address of the House had pointed out the most suitable site for the bridge, and perhaps there was nobody better acquainted with the feelings and wants of the people of the Port than the hon member Mr Hart, yet he (the Commissioner of Public Works) did not understand that hon member to say that he considered the site objectionable He thought he had explained that it was to be a drawbridge, and that it would admit of ships passing through The vote for this work appeared on the Supplementary Estimates of last year, and the plans were prepared by one of his predecessors The sum of 1,000*l* was paid in, as stated by the hon member for the Port, previously Tenders were called for and some of them accepted and bonds were taken to a sufficient amount for the due performance of the works The contractors sent to Van Diemen's Land for timber, as some was wanted of very large size, and they could not get a vessel with a porthole sufficiently large to take it in This had caused a delay in the works With regard to going upon private property whoever was responsible for that error would be held responsible The contracts had been taken and the Government now came to the House for a sufficient sum to carry on the works, and he hoped the House would grant it

Mr SOLOMON would support the vote in consequence of the explanation of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works of the Government having entered into contracts to carry out the works With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Gumeracha (Mr. Hay) that the bridge should be turned into a foot-bridge, he could not concur in it, for if they were to do so it would be an evident breach of faith with the persons who subscribed the 1,000*l.* for a bridge adapted to the traffic of vehicles. If only a foot-bridge were made these persons could come with a good case and ask the House to give them back the 1,000*l.*, and, therefore, he should support the motion.

The item was then agreed to.

The next two items were agreed to without discussion, as follows:—Cape Borda Lighthouse, 1,000*l.*; completion of main line of intercolonial telegraph, 2,300*l.*

On the next item, telegraph from Adelaide to Goolwa, through Mount Barker, Macclesfield, and Strathalbyn, 5,000*l.*

In reply to Mr. REYNOLDS,

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the average cost of the telegraph lines was 60*l.* per mile, but this would probably not come to so much; it would certainly not exceed the amount asked for.

Mr. MILNE would move as an amendment the insertion before the words "Mount Barker" of the words "Woodside, Nairne." By running the line through these places they would afford facilities of communication to a much larger population, and as the cost was so moderate he thought these facilities ought to be given. The result of not adopting his suggestion would be, that the House would be asked before long for branches to the localities he had mentioned; and it would be cheaper to include them in the main line.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the Government could have no possible objection to any line which would not defeat the object of the vote. The object of going to the Government was twofold—first, because on account of the Goolwa tramway, and next because of the great traffic through to the Murray. The intercolonial line could also be worked better when there was less demand upon it within the colony.

Mr. DUNN proposed that Port Milang be also inserted, and read the substance of a petition from a number of the inhabitants of that locality setting forth the claims of the district.

Dr. WARK also thought that the claims of Milang should not be ignored. He would wish to see a line defined, along which the telegraph should pass; but as the expense was so small, perhaps it would be better to go on at once.

Mr. NEALES thought that if Nairne was to be considered in going to Mount Barker they should go to Carrington, which was only about 14 miles out of the way. There was a considerable population in and about Carrington now, and it was quite as much entitled to communication as the other places which had been mentioned.

Mr. HUGHES did not rise to take part in the game of "grab" which hon. members were playing, but to urge upon the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works whether it was desirable to extend the telegraph from Strathalbyn to the Goolwa at present, as parties at these points could easily communicate, and it was not proposed to have intermediate stations. The question of water communication would be shortly brought before the House, and he was by no means certain that the tramway would be assented to.

Mr. STRANGWAYS agreed with the hon. member for the Port, that this question could not be decided until the question of the tramway was decided. He thought when that question came before the House he would be able to point out the best line, and that the telegraph should go along that line.

Mr. LINDSAY thought we were putting the cart before the horse in constructing telegraphs until we knew where our main lines of railway were to be. He suggested that the item should be withdrawn.

Mr. ROGERS supported the proposition for including Milang in the line of telegraph.

Mr. SCAMMELL thought it was not desirable to have several lines of telegraph from the metropolis in the same direction, nor should the revenue be called upon to connect every hamlet adjacent to it by lines of telegraph, whilst postal communication was kept up at a great cost. With this view he would propose to strike out the words from "Goolwa down to "Strathalbyn."

Mr. MILNE's amendment was then put and carried by a majority of seven, the members being as follows:—

AYES, 17—The Commissioner of Public Works, the Treasurer, Messrs. Hart, Glyde, Wark, MacDermott, Neales, Hawker, Rogers, Strangways, M'Ellister, Shannon, Bagot, Milne, Hallet, Peake, and Duffield.

NOES, 10—Messrs. Hughes, Solomon, Bakewell, Reynolds, Mildred, Dunn, Hay, Cole, Scammell, and Lindsay.

The line through Nairne and Woodside was therefore adopted.

"Telegraph Extension to Kooringa, 6,000*l.*"

Mr. REYNOLDS was opposed to the vote, as they had no decided information at present as to the probable route of the railway.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS made some remarks in favor of the proposed vote for the extension to Kooringa.

Mr. HAY said that after the last vote which had been made for the extension of the telegraph to Woodside and other places, it would certainly be impolitic and unjust of that House to ignore the extension to Kooringa. He would suggest however, that the extension of the telegraph to Glenelg should also be considered. The posts for such a line were already at their service, through the intercolonial telegraph. There was the Jetty at Glenelg, and the probability of vessels touching there, and by telegraphic communication, they would be able to have instant communication with the Bay. He felt assured that the number of messages to Glenelg would be triple the number of those from any other station. There were always a large number of persons at Glenelg during the summer season, and telegraphic communication with Adelaide would be looked upon as a benefit, and would be productive as he felt assured, of profit to the country. He begged to suggest the adoption of the road to Glenelg as a place where telegraphic communication should be extended.

Mr. STRANGWAYS should not have objected to the extension to Glenelg if it had been placed as a separate vote, but he could not see what it had to do with the extension to Kooringa. (A laugh.)

Mr. BAKEWELL thought that the inhabitants of Tanunda had a perfect right to have telegraphic communication established with that township as well as any other of the districts which had been favored. It was a rising place, and there was a large population in the district which would conduce to the line being a paying one. He moved as an amendment that Tanunda be added to the other places for telegraphic extension.

The CHAIRMAN said the hon. member could not make an amendment of that nature. A separate sum would be required to be placed on the Estimates.

Mr. HAWKER suggested that the item on the Supplementary Estimates for the Telegraph to Kooringa should be altered to "a Telegraph Extension to Kooringa via Riverton." By adopting that course the telegraph would be carried by the probable line of railway to the north.

Mr. BAGOT thought as they had voted for the extension of telegraphs to the east, the towns in the north should also be considered; especially as railway extension in that direction would be carried on at the rate of 20 to 25 miles per year. He advocated the extension of telegraphs wherever they would pay.

Mr. DUFFIELD would support the extension of the telegraph to Kooringa by way of Riverton. The Commissioner of Public Works had stated that the expense of constructing telegraph lines was 60*l.* per mile. That would make the cost of the extension 3,000*l.* He saw however that the sum on the Estimates was no less than 6,000*l.*—(a Voice—"Stations!")—and as to stations, he thought the expense already gone to in this respect was extravagant. He found upon enquiry that as to the persons who were required to work the telegraph instruments that a lad had only to have a week or two's practice and he became able to take complete charge of the instrument. He thought expenses might be reduced in the country by the telegraph wires being connected with the Post-Office of the particular neighbourhood where it was required, or with a shop or store.

The TREASURER thought the views of the hon. member for Victoria might be met in another way—that was, by substituting for "Riverton" "Telegraph by way of the probable line of railway to Kooringa."

Mr. HAWKER could not see that this suggestion would accomplish his object. Who was to define which was the probable line to Kooringa? It would only tend to keep the question in abeyance altogether. He mentioned Riverton because it was on the direct line from Kapunda to Clare. He declined to assent to the amendment of the Treasurer.

The TREASURER said the hon. member had misunderstood him. He could not see any prospect of delay, as had been anticipated. As a principle, they must not leave the formation of telegraphs until lines of railway had been commenced.

Mr. BARROW thought that, whilst they were contending for schemes of roads, schemes of railway, and other "schemes," they might as well contend for schemes of telegraph, or they would otherwise be placed in some embarrassment. There had been propositions for telegraph extension to various places, Glenelg included, and no doubt the next request would be for an extension to Brighton, and then to O'Halloran Hill. (A laugh.) In fact, it was difficult to tell what small township or village would not consider itself entitled to the extension. However much telegraphic extension, bit by bit, might be the hobby of some hon. members, he should like to see some general scheme propounded. Telegraph extension was no doubt very beneficial, but they should remember they had roads to make. He did not wish to discourage telegraphic extension to central points, but they should recollect that with the amount voted year by year for telegraphs they might have constructed some miles of road. If the extension of telegraphs was carried to excess, they might, indeed, have lines of wire from all kinds of remote places, and might be informed by this means that somewhere far away a load of wheat was bogged. But of what use would be that information? (Hear.) Would it not be much better to make good roads, and so get the wheat instead of the telegraphic announcement that the dray was bogged? (Hear, hear.) But he would not oppose central lines. As they had one to the south and were to have another to the east, the inhabitants of the north ought to be placed in a similar position.

Mr. NEALES disputed the assertion that many miles of road could be made at the present cost of telegraphic communication, and suggested that inches would have more appropriately expressed the number. He was favorable to telegraphic extension generally.

The Chairman put the amendment of Mr. Hawker, which was agreed to, and he was about to put the item as amended, when

Mr. Hay complained of the amendment which he had made in favor of Glenelg not being also put to the House.

The Chairman ruled that to do so would have been irregular.

The item was passed as amended.

The House resumed.

The Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Thursday next.

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The further consideration of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next.

COLONIAL DEFENCES.

Captain Hart, in order to meet the wish of the House, proposed that the notice of motion standing in his name, viz., "That a Select Committee be appointed to take evidence and report on the question of Colonial Defences, and that the papers now on the table upon that important subject be referred to such Committee," should be postponed, and made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next, which was accordingly agreed to.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

Mr. Solomon rose to ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Blyth) the following question:—"Do the Government intend to take any steps to give immediate employment to the large number of laborers at present seeking employment in the City and at the Port; and, if so, the nature of such employment, and the wages they intend to offer?" He did not know whether he should be in order to give his reasons for putting the question standing in his name. (The Speaker, "Yes, but briefly.") He would be brief. His reasons were, that he was satisfied that a large number of persons were out of employment; and although he was as adverse as any one to the interference of the Government in the employment of labour to the disadvantage of the private capitalist, yet he thought that this was a case in which it was bound to step in, and assist the starving poor. He was fully convinced of the poverty which existed, as he had made personal visits of inspection to respectable working men, and had found them without chairs to sit on, or beds to lie on, and these cases were not few. It might possibly be pointed out that there was a Destitute Board to assist the poor, but respectable men did not come to that colony to be dependent upon charity. They had workhouses enough at home, nor did they wish to have their names proclaimed in the light of Government paupers because they happened to apply for a loaf of bread. He hoped some means would be taken to give employment to the poor in the cases which he had mentioned.

The Commissioner of Public Works replied that when able-bodied men applied to the Destitute Board for relief they were sent to work at the Botanical Gardens, at wages of 3s. 6d. per day, which sum was equivalent to the purchase of three days' rations for one adult, and it was considered better that an opportunity should be afforded such applicants of earning subsistence by their own labor rather than that they should become the mere recipients of Government relief. That the number of applications for such employment, from the 21st August, amounted to 46. That, so soon as the Government were made aware of the circumstance that employment could not be obtained by able-bodied labourers from private individuals they immediately made arrangements with the Railway Commissioners to employ men at wages something below the current rates, and that up to this moment all who had made application for work had obtained it, numbering 36 altogether. That the Government would hasten forward all public works—(hear, hear)—immediately on the votes for such being agreed to on the Supplementary Estimates. The hon. gentlemen stated in addition to his reply that it had been ascertained that several of the parties applying for relief were not in destitute circumstances but were possessed of property. The total number at the present moment employed were—Botanical Gardens, 20; Railway, 36; making in all, 56.

PRIMOGENITURE AND STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. Peake rose to ask the hon. the Attorney-General (Mr. Hanson) if it was his intention to proceed this session with his Bill for the abolition of the Law of Primogeniture and shortening the duration of the Statute of Limitations.

The Attorney-General answered that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill in which would be contained a clause abolishing the law of primogeniture, and the shortening of the duration of the Statute of Limitations.

The House then adjourned.

Friday, September 24.

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

RAILWAY TO PORT ELLIOT.

Mr. Rogers presented a petition numerously signed from the inhabitants of Strathalbyn and the adjoining districts praying for the construction of a railway from Strathalbyn to Port Elliot and Goolwa.

NORTHERN EXTENSION OF RAILWAY.

Mr. Peake presented a memorial from a deputation from the north, signed by 12 gentlemen, representing 625 petitioners, whose memorial was presented a few days back, praying the House to take into consideration the northern extension of railways.

MRS. ELIZABETH SMILLIE.

Mr. Milne presented a petition from Elizabeth Smillie and others, praying the House to allow the introduction of a Bill to remove all doubts in reference to the title of certain lands.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE.

Mr. Lindsay presented a petition, which he had just received by post, in favour of the grant of £4,000 for the South Australian Institute.

THE ADELAIDE RAILWAY.

The Commissioner of Public Works laid upon the table two tracings shewing the arrangements in reference to the rails at the Adelaide Station; also, for the woolsheds, allusion to which appeared upon the Estimates.

RAILWAY NORTHWARDS.

Mr. Peake, in bringing forward the motion in his name—"That the report of Mr. Hargraves on the country for a proposed line of railway northwards, through the Valley of the Gilbert, as laid on the table by the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Blyth) on the 27th August, is not in accordance with the Address of this House to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, of the 16th December last, requesting that surveys should be made for a line of railway from Section 112 to the Burra, by the respective lines of the Gilbert and Light, accompanied by estimates of the probable cost per mile and length of each such lines of railway; and that it is expedient that such surveys be immediately undertaken and the estimates laid before this House, in accordance with the promise contained in His Excellency's reply of the 6th January last to the address of this House on the subject"—slightly amended it so as to include such surveys as would place the House in possession of the fullest information in reference to the comparative cost and merits of lines by the Gilbert and the Valley of the Light. He brought forward this motion not with the idea of attaching blame to any particular person, but to call attention to a mistake in reference to surveys of lines of roads and railways. The surveys did not look far enough in advance, and were pulled by the people of Kapunda in one direction, until they were pulled by some one else in another. Since he had placed the motion upon the paper, he had been a member of the Committee sitting upon the Northern Extension Railway, and had been struck still more forcibly with the mistaken policy which had been pursued. If he had not placed this notice on the paper, he should certainly have placed on record a minute of his dissent from the Committee. He should have expressed his regret that neither the Chief Engineer nor Mr. Hargraves were enabled to afford more information with respect to a railway by the Valley of the Gilbert. It appeared to the Committee that after reaching Kapunda, the sold lands ran most decidedly to the westward. Both Mr. Hargraves and Mr. Hanson had been called upon by the Committee to state the feasibility of having a railway from Kapunda via Taylor's Flagstaff, to the Valley of the Gilbert, and both of those gentlemen stated that they could not give any positive information upon the subject. If the country had been properly examined, the Chief Engineer would have been enabled to state whether there was an available route via Taylor's Flagstaff. When in Committee the engineers were questioned generally, and all agreed that too much care could not be taken in surveys before laying down a railway. Last year he sat on a Committee relative to a railway to Kapunda, and it was then considered that if there were railway extension from the North to the Murray it must probably go by Kapunda, and that was his reason for saying that extension should be from Gawler Town to Kapunda. Since then, however, there had been several schemes to extend communication to the Murray direct and indirect, and these had taken them by surprise, shewing the imperfect examination of the country. He believed that a careful survey would shew northern extension would be by the Valley of the Gilbert. That survey had not yet been made. He asked the Chief Engineer, who admitted that he could not lay the survey before the Committee as it had been so imperfectly made, in fact the line, instead of having been chained, had merely been stepped. He believed that the line to Kapunda would pay for making, whether it were the main line or merely a branch, and the line by the Valley of the Gilbert would be far more economical when constructed. Any one inspecting the plan must be struck with the heavy working gradients to Kapunda; there was a gradient up of 700 feet and down of 400. He would remind the House that the parties resident at the Valley of the Gilbert, and Wakefield who had petitioned for the survey of that line, were the proprietors of 100,000 acres of land.

Mr. Lindsay seconded.

Mr. McEllister supported the motion, thinking it only just to the Valley of the Gilbert that the line should be properly surveyed before any conclusion was arrived at.

Mr. Mildred moved an addition to the motion to the effect that a similar survey and estimate be made from Gawler Town to a line by the way of the Valley of the Gilbert, so far as Forrester's The hon member read the report which had been laid before the House upon this question, and remarked that although there might be considerable apparent loss sustained in the first instance, perhaps 12,000*l* or 13,000*l*, double that amount would be saved if they retraced their steps and started from the railway at Gawler Town, where they would not have gradients 700 feet up and 400 feet down to encounter, racking the rolling stock to pieces

Mr PEAKE approved the addit on proposed

Mr DUFFIELD supported the motion before the House the more readily since the addition had been made to it From a full knowledge of the country north of Gawler Town he was firmly convinced that the best line was by the Valley of the Gilbert He was desirous of obtaining more information, as he found that the map which had been laid upon the table of the House was not correct He did not know who was to blame, but any one having the slightest knowledge of the country must know that Ayliffe's public-house, which by the map appeared to be on the south side of the Light River, was in fact on the north side And then again, on the map Forrester's public-house was placed on the east side of the main road, though in fact it was on the west No doubt there were many errors of the same kind

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought it was hardly fair to those hon. members who had not had an opportunity of reading the Minutes of Evidence which had been given before the Committee of which he had the honor of being the Chairman, to make such constant allusions to the evidence. The evidence was very nearly printed and would shortly be laid before the house, when hon members would know a good deal more about the matter than at present. This much he might say, that if gradients were the only question, they must start not from Gawler Town merely, but from a point nearer Adelaide. The question of railways did not, however, merely involve gradients, and he would ask hon members carefully to read the evidence and on Tuesday next they would have an opportunity of going into the question He had no objection to surveys, but he would remind the House that surveys were not cheap things He did not wish, however, because his own mind was perfectly clear upon the point, to withhold any information which could be afforded

Mr NEALES wished to ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands one question —Was there any estimate as to the cost of the survey? He should like to know whether the cost would be £4,000 or £10,000?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the two surveys to the Murray, which had been ordered last session, cost £2,300

Mr LINDSAY supported the motion, thinking that generally money expended upon surveys was well expended The cost of surveying was infinitesimal compared with the cost of the line The Port and Gawler line cost £15,000 or £16,000 per mile, and if, in the construction of a long line, they could reduce the cost only to the extent of £200 or £300, the saving would considerably more than pay the cost of the survey The question of gradients was a most important point in the construction of railways, and careful surveys should be undertaken before lines were determined upon

Dr WARK considered that the greater portion of the information which was asked for should have been laid upon the table of the House when the Railway Bill was introduced It was essential the House should have the fullest information before it to enable it to determine the relative merits of the two lines

The motion as amended was carried

TRAMWAY TO PORT ELLIOT

Mr STRANGWAYS, in reference to the motion in his name—"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that His Excellency will take such steps as may be necessary to authorize the construction of, and to construct a tramway to connect Strathalbyn with the Port Elliot and Goolwa Tramway"—expressed a desire to amend it so that it should convey a request to His Excellency to cause a Bill to be introduced during the present session.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL pointed out there would be some difficulty in this course, as, before a Bill was introduced, the proper preliminary steps would have to be taken—proper surveys must be undertaken, and the necessary notice served upon parties on the line

Mr STRANGWAYS would amend his motion

The SPEAKER suggested that the hon member should amend the motion to the affect that a sum of money be placed on the Estimates for the construction of the work

Mr BAGOT thought it would be better to adopt the suggestion of the Attorney-General The House could not be bound to construct a railway till they knew the expense

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL imagined that the Government would hardly be disposed to place a sum on the Estimates for the purpose, although they might be prepared to place some portion He presumed it would be deemed expedient to raise some portion by loan He suggested that the motion should read, that an address be presented to His Excellency, requesting His Excellency forthwith to take such steps as would authorise the introduction of a Bill

Mr STRANGWAYS was not aware that it was necessary to authorise His Excellency to introduce a Bill He had just been reminded that two surveys—one public and one private—had been undertaken

After some conversation as to the precise form which the motion should assume, the following was stated by the Attorney-General to be unobjectionable, and such as would enable the Government to take action —"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that His Excellency will take such steps as may be necessary to authorise the construction of a tramway to connect Strathalbyn with the Port Elliot and Goolwa tramway"

Mr STRANGWAYS said that the declaration made by the Attorney-General would obviate the necessity of his making many observations Various points for the terminus of the tramway or railway had been advocated, but he thought that though by making the terminus at Milang would shorten the distance to twelve miles in length, and the line was free from engineering difficulties, yet when the produce of the South got there it would still have to be shipped either at the Murray mouth, or at Port Elliot, or at the Goolwa The mouth of the Murray could hardly be said to have been rendered perfectly navigable, for during the last year a vessel was lost there, and during the present season a vessel had been nearly lost, and was only saved by the sacrifice of anchors and chains Another proposition was to make a line by Rankine's ferry That was almost as favorable with regard to engineering advantages, as Milang and the shoals near the crossing of the Finniss would be avoided But it was open to the same objections regarding the mouth of the Murray as the other As for the line from Strathalbyn to Goolwa, there were certainly three places which presented engineering difficulties Persons in private life had gone to the expense of surveys and estimates of the cost of construction The person who made the survey found that by far the largest portion of the line was level, with the exception of three places alluded to, and the gradients were hardly worth mentioning At the crossing of the Finniss there were two inclines of 1 in 40, which would cause an extra cutting The plans were placed in the Library for examination Two surveys had been made by the Government surveyors, one of the surveyors found that a better line could be taken than the one he was instructed to survey That was surveyed, and it was an open question which of the two Government lines was the best As to the comparative cost of railways and tramways, a line of railway to be worked by locomotive power would cost 17 000*l* to 18,000*l* a mile, while a tramway of iron could be laid down suitable for animal power at 3,000*l* a mile He thought if a line were constructed to take off a macadamized road the heavy traffic, very little money would be required for the repair of the road He would not then allude to the probable traffic Mr Abernethy made a survey of the mouth of the Murray, and reported that it would cost £29,000 to deepen the channel of the river He (Mr Strangways) thought such works should not be constructed haphazard He did not believe £29 000 would be sufficient. He did not believe that in the world there was so large a river as the Murray with so small an outlet It was nothing but the rush of the waters of the Murray that kept the mouth clear With regard to the method of raising the money, the Attorney-General had stated that the Government proposed appropriating one-third of the necessary amount out of the revenue, and to obtain the rest on loan If they waited for rails from England 13 months would be required to obtain them, but as there was then a great amount of unemployed labour, he wished the works to be commenced immediately With regard to the cost, he would submit a report prepared by the Surveyor of the line, who offered to construct one with wooden rails at an expense of £26,654 5s, and to lay down iron rails for £42,029 5s, they would also undertake for that sum to keep the line in repair for twelve months, but those rails being only estimated at 35 lbs weight to the yard stronger would be required, and the probable cost would be £55,000 He thought that amount would be more than sufficient That sum would include rolling stock and the necessary stations He thought another advantage would be, that the same Superintendent would overlook both lines, and thus save a portion of the cost of two establishments He would therefore move "That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting His Excellency forthwith to take such steps as may be necessary to authorize the construction of, and to construct a tramway to connect Strathalbyn with the Port Elliot and Goolwa tramway"

Mr DUNN would say very little It was well known aht the outlay either by Rankine's Ferry or the crossing of the Finniss must be heavy—that however should be left to the engineers He hoped the money would be laid out on the best line, as his object would be to give the greatest amount of good to the district at large, and not to benefit merely individuals He would second the motion

Mr HUGHES hoped the House would not too quickly assent to the proposition before it He did not think a line of tramway from Strathalbyn to Goolwa the best line The only reason given by the mover was that it would only require one traffic Superintendent He thought that unworthy of consideration The line ought to lead to the best shipping place in the district, and from his knowledge of the country he believed a line from Strathalbyn to Goolwa would not be the best, not even in an engineering point of view The line had to cross three rivers The first was the Finniss, which the hon member passed over quicker than an engineer would take a line across as the banks were excessively steep A few miles further on was the Black Swamp, and then Currency Creek, which last was very little easier to cross than the Finniss Now, the object of crossing them was merely to get into the Goolwa channel But there was a better line from Strathalbyn to the mouth of the Finniss That line ran through Government land all the way, which he believed had been reserved with the view of constructing a rail or tramway By that route the shoals on the lake were also avoided There were other objections to taking it to Port Elliot, for people ought to be able to avail themselves of the sea mouth of the Murray as well as the river traffic If they took it to Milang the waters of the lake might be so low as not to permit passing Rankine's Ferry whereas if the communication was made to the mouth of the Finniss it would obviate the difficulty He simply spoke from personal knowledge of the country, as no engineer had been appointed to survey it He was convinced that in every point of view, shortness, utility, economy, prospective and immediate substantial benefits combined to render the line to the mouth of the Finniss the best The hon member had expressed doubts of the sea mouth of the Murray being navigable, and said he had ridden across the reputed mouths of two rivers, that hon member could not ride across the mouth of the Murray The navigation of that river was a settled fact In a report of the Goolwa tramway, it was stated that traffic was deficient on account of the facility with which shipping went in and out of the Murray He thought, therefore, the hon member was biassed by some circumstance not before the House The Attorney-General had stated that that line should be the next undertaken by the Government but he (Mr Hughes) hoped the House would look at it on its broad merits, as he did, and that the question would be so altered that the House would have on the table proper engineering information before they approached it He wished the House not to pledge itself before more reliable information was before it

The TREASURER had no objection to the House pledging itself to the line of tramway asked for by the mover of the resolution, because he believed it to be the best line. He would support any proposition of the kind so long as it did not go beyond the revenue of the country With regard to the best terminus, in deciding that the object of railways should be considered It was not merely to convey the produce of one town to the nearest port, but to open up the country, and to give access to the greatest amount of available land The hon member for Port Adelaide had said the object of the line was to enable the inhabitants of the district to avail themselves of navigation by sea, but taking their produce to the Finniss would not give that advantage It would not give all the advantages stated by the hon member, and, as far as regarded the accommodation of Strathalbyn only, he thought short lines should never be formed without the ulterior object of connecting them at some future time The proposed line from Strathalbyn to Goolwa would form a line not only connecting that place with the sea, but with the capital, and hereafter it would form part of a line to the southern districts and become the southern main line at some future time by a passsge made through the range The passage of the range might be made near the gorges of the Sturt, and be connected with the main south line. Eventually it would open up the Mount Barker district, and would give to all that country the advantage not only of shipping at the mouth of the Finniss, but in sea-going vessels at a southern port He should support the motion before the House

Mr PEAKE agreed with the hon member for Encounter Bay as to the desirability of giving the South-Eastern District a roadway to take their produce to market, but would propose to amend it by striking out the words after "connect" in the third line, and substitute "to connect the South-Eastern Districts with any line to the Murray or any main trunk line which the Engineer and that House approved" If that line were made, it would form a part of a line connecting the City of Adelaide But the motion was too indefinite, and he hoped the House would put a stop to such projects He thought the Treasurer would agree with him that it would be very desirable to have the opinion of the Chief Engineer as to how far that tramway could be made workable to connect the North with the South There was no doubt the South-Eastern Districts required a road like that He was not going to enter into the comparative merits of Milang with Goolwa, but should be satisfied by the Government having a survey made

Mr MILNE could not allow the resolution to pass without remark He regretted to hear that Ministers had determined in favor of the Goolwa, for he had been over the country in that direction from Strathalbyn to Milang, thence to the mouth of the Finniss, and thence to Goolwa He thought it desirable to carry the line to the Finniss Before Government took any steps in the matter the country should be thoroughly investigated Two lines of railway had been surveyed, and lithographed copies lay on the table of the House last session Was that all that could be known about the line from Strathalbyn to Goolwa? He thought that the motion should be for an address to His Excellency, requesting him to cause the country between Strathalbyn and the mouth of the Finniss to be surveyed with a view of testing the practicability of constructing a railway or tramway between those places

Mr REYNOLDS was surprised that the motion before the House should have been introduced by the hon member for Encounter Bay, as the plans and estimates were not before them (Hear) Until further information reached him, he (Mr Reynolds) was in favor of the Government scheme, but now he was inclined to think the mouth of the Finniss or Milang was preferable to extending it to Goolwa That line was surveyed some year or two ago — What was it to cost?—180,000*l* —and that not for a main line, but for 19¼ or 20 miles He did not think a line that length worth the money The line to the mouth of the Finniss or to Milang from Strathalbyn would be preferable to the line proposed On the route to Goolwa three-fourths of the soil was barren and sandy, but there was scarcely a section from Strathalbyn to Milang but what could be made available for agriculture The line to the Goolwa, however, might be the best, but in the absence of information he could not say He thought, taking the line across the rivers and the Black Swamp, would cost as much as carrying the line from Strathalbyn to Milang He knew that Captain Cadell rather preferred Milang to Goolwa, and others interested in the steamers were in favor of a tramay, to Milang Three considerations weighed with him in preferring that route it was 8 miles shorter, less expensive and more easy to construct The gradients were better, there were no engineering difficulties, and there was already a traffic existing on the line to Goolwa He should oppose the motion unless evidence were given that it was the best line

Mr NEALES would be better satisfied were the mover to alter his motion and substitute the terms "from Strathalbyn to the sea-board," that would leave it an open question as to route If he would alter it to that effect it would do away with all opposition He thought it might be referred to a Select Committee The advantages of a tramway would then be understood, and by adopting those terms it would leave the Government free to take the line to Rosetta Head, Port Elliot, Victor Harbor, or elsewhere With the evidence at present before him he was rather in favor of the proposed line, but he wanted more evidence If the hon mover would add those words it would remove all opposition, if not, he would not vote for the motion

Mr BARROW trusted the advice of the last speaker would be followed He (Mr Barrow) had received a letter, strongly advocating the Milang route It contained nine paragraphs, each of which comprised on an average four or five arguments in favor of the line by Milang Those arguments were so weighty and demonstrative, that his only doubt of their conclusiveness arose from the fact that the letter was from a landowner at Milang (Great laughter) But the hon member for Sturt had so completely corroborated the arguments of that letter that he (Mr Barrow) would almost have been compelled to believe them if it had not been possible that that hon member might have had a duplicate of his (Mr Barrow's) letter (Laughter) He was informed that Captain Cadell had entered into a contract to carry 1,200 tons of freight at 15s a ton up from Milang With regard to the three difficult crossings, he (Mr Barrow) was informed that estimates had been made showing that to cross those difficult places would cost £9,000 Whenever the question of tramway extension from Strathalbyn to the sea-board was fairly considered, it would be, in common with all questions of the same nature, referred to a Select Committee (Hear, from Commissioner of Public Works) If the hon member for Encounter Bay would consent to alter his motion as suggested, he would in all probability carry the House with him

Mr ROGERS hoped the member for Encounter Bay would refer his resolution as desired He would wish to remind hon members that three memorials had been presented that morning in reference to the question before the House, and he thought it strange if the inhabitants of those districts did not know the places that best suited their wants As to expense it was not the only question The question was what would be the advantage of the tramway when it was constructed The inhabitants of those districts wished to ship their produce by the sea-board He was glad that the Government at last were enlisted in favor of the south-eastern districts, as for many years their wants had not been attended to, and they had to drag their produce to Adelaide by an expensive process when they wished to realize upon it He hoped the House would take their wants into consideration Farmers in the north could forward their produce to Adelaide at 4d a bushel 60 miles south of the city, favored with water-carriage, the cost was 5d per bushel, but the farmers of Strathalbyn had to pay 15d per bushel (Question, and hear) 50,000*l* would construct the line between Strathalbyn and the Goolwa, which, at 5¼ per cent would cost in interest 2,750*l* 200,000 bushels of wheat, and about 3,000 tons of ore, would be carried on it He thought that the traffic in a very few years would fully pay for the cost of the work

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to correct a mistake of the hon member for the Port as to certain language that hon member had attributed to him What he had said was, that when the Government had fulfilled their promises to the northern settlers by making the railway to Kapunda, they would feel that the next work which would claim their consideration was that necessary for connecting the south-eastern districts with the sea, and affording the settlers in those districts the most advantageous means for conveying their produce to market He did not pretend to offer any opinion as to the claims of the lines now before the House, as he did not possess sufficient engineering knowledge, but in all matters affecting local interests, he thought that the opinions of those immediately interested afforded a good guide—though they should not preclude a more strict enquiry—but they were a good guide for foreseeing and providing for the results of such an enquiry With regard to the substantial motion before the House, undoubtedly all the south-eastern district asked for would be met by the amendment of the hon member, Mr Neales, namely, the most efficient and economical mode of bringing their produce to the sea From all that he had heard he concurred with the hon member who introduced the motion, and he believed the enquiry would show that the line proposed by that hon gentleman was the best, but he had no desire to prejudge the question If the hon member would amend his motion he would support it

Mr STRANGWAYS would adopt the amendment of the hon member Mr Neales, (hear, hear), and would reply to some observations which had been made The hon member (Mr Hughes) had said he was well acquainted with the country in the neighbourhood, and that he considered the line to the mouth of the Finniss was the best He had some doubt as to whether the hon member had any idea of the country to be traversed by the lines The hon member also said that the navigation of the Murray mouth was settled, and he (Mr Strangways) agreed that it was a settled thing It had settled many things, and would probably settle many more He would be glad to see it navigable, but a mere statement would not make it so Another hon member said that all the country from Strathalbyn to Milang was good, but if that statement were reversed, it would be nearer the fact The hon member for the Burra and Clare, as usual, had moved an amendment He said, "as usual," for there was scarcely a question during the session on which that hon member did not move an amendment (Laughter) The hon member, Mr Reynolds, said he had changed his views on this question Perhaps in changing his seat he had changed his views (A laugh) That hon member accused him (Mr Strangways) with changing his mind in bringing forward this motion without plans and estimates But there were plans in the Library for any hon member who chose to look at them, and he had read a statement of the cost of the line, so that he considered this charge neither fair nor in any way called for It was true the Chief Inspector, Mr Hamilton, had two years since calculated that the line would cost £180,000, but the House had had experience enough of that gentleman to know that whether his calculations were above or below the mark, was a matter of accident He did not know who the landowner was who had been alluded to by the hon member (Mr Barrow), but he knew of one gentleman who, when he had a steamer built at Port Adelaide, was so satisfied of the navigability of the Murray mouth that he carted her overland to Milang (A laugh)

The amendment of Mr Peake was then (in the absence of the hon gentleman) put and lost, the original motion, amended according to the suggestion of Mr Neales, being agreed to

PORT ADELAIDE

Mr HUGHES moved—

"That the petition of the Town Council of Port Adelaide be taken into consideration, and that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will take the steps necessary for vesting the North-parade, at Port Adelaide, in the Corporation of that place, in trust as and for a parade or open place of recreation for the inhabitants of the said municipality"

The petition having been read by the Clerk,

Mr HUGHES asked the House to assent to the prayer of the petitioners He should state that when the Corporation of Port Adelaide communicated with him, and asked whether he would support a petition to the Government, he advised them to present it, and offered to accompany them to the Chief Secretary to explain their views, and aid in carrying them out It was in that way his name had been placed in the petition Attention was first called to this matter at the time of the fire in Port Adelaide, when the Corporation found they had no right to interfere with the part used for storing building materials, as it was outside their boundary It was a place quite covered with heaps of rubbish The Corporation thought they should have power to regulate it, as the land had been set apart for the people at the Port, as the squares of the city had been set apart for the people of Adelaide There was a line of railway running along it, but that the Corporation would not interfere with It was also urged that the Government had gone to an expense in forming it by depositing silt there, but that was done as much for the advantage of the Harbor Trust as for the people of Port Adelaide The inhabitants were never consulted as to the expenditure incurred in this way, and he hoped as the Government had spent large sums on the city they would not object on such a ground to handing over this piece of land to the Port Corporation The cost of the work done by the Government was, he believed £9,000, and that was nothing as compared with the sums spent in North and South Adelaide alone

Mr MILDRED seconded the motion He did so upon strong grounds as it was well known that in the early days of the settlement of the Port, this land was set aside, not as a Government reserve, but as a reserve for the use of the people of the Port If there was one thing to be complained of more than another in the matter, it was, that the Government should allow the temporary sheds which had been up on the ground to remain there, as it was always understood that when private enterprise supplied sufficient storage accommodation, they would be removed Neither the Government nor the people would experience any inconvenience from this land being handed over to the Corporation of the Port The Government had no claim upon the place beyond the money which they had expended on it

Mr BURFORD was rather taken aback by the motion, as when the locality was under the notice of the House before he understood that it was intended that an income was to be derived from it

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there was very great force in the remarks of the hon member respecting the sheds They were found to be very dangerous, as the risk of fire was greatly increased by them He had directed the attention of the Chamber of Commerce to the matter, and a representation was made by that body to the Government, to which they would give every attention, so that he hoped the danger would soon be removed He must oppose the motion of the hon member for the Port, as the subject should have been introduced in the shape of a Bill

Mr LINDSAY was surprised that such a motion should be considered necessary He could not understand how the North-parade, originally a public reserve, could be under any pretence put to any other purpose He himself had laid it out from the design of Governor Gawler, who was the Resident Commissioner, with full power to deal with the land Col Gawler's sketch had marked on it the letters, he believed, "P R," which he understood to be "public reserve" The Government had no right to encroach upon it It was quite different from a Government reserve, such as that on which the Custom-House was built How it could become anything else than a public reserve he could not understand, and why an Act of Parliament should be necessary to convey it was still more beyond his comprehension

Mr STRANGWAYS thought after what had been said by the last speaker, that the motion was superfluous, for under the Act by which the Municipality was formed, this public reserve would like the public streets be vested in the Corporation If the place was not within the Municipality, it should be ascertained whether any other persons had claims upon it, for he thought it quite possible such might be the case

Mr NEALES hoped the hon member would withdraw his motion, as the observations of the hon member who spoke last would bring forward fresh claimants The original sketch of Governor Gawler went for very little, as the question was not what Governor Gawler put in his sketch, but what the authorities afterwards put on their maps He was informed the land was a Government, not a public reserve, and that the present North-parade was not the North-parade of Governor Gawler, but consisted of land made at the expense of the public There had been a discussion on the point, and it was then decided that the land should be made for the purpose of being let The land was, in the meantime, better in the hands of the Government than in those of the Corporation He thought it was to be used as a wharf, or he should never have voted such a sum of money for making one of the most beautiful wharves in the colony in order that it might be converted into a public promenade To talk of it as the parade of Governor Gawler was ridiculous, as it had been made within the memory of the youngest member of the House As to the excrescences upon it--the sheds--he was satisfied with the assurance of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works, and he hoped that hon gentleman would lose no time in having them removed

Mr MILDRED, in explanation, said what he had stated was that the land known as the public reserve was a public reserve, and that all the land fronting it was sold, subject to the condition of its being so

Mr PEAKE was very much inclined to leave the land to the Government, as he was rather afraid of corporations It was only the other day the Adelaide Corporation evinced a desire to cut up the City squares (Oh! oh!) The hon member for Encounter Bay had told them of the sketch marked P R, but whether that meant Prize Ring, or not, he could not say It reminded him of the mark on the post mentioned in the "Pickwick Papers," which the Pickwick Club found out meant 'Bill Stump, his mark" (Laughter)

Mr SCAMMELL was surprised to hear the hon member for Encounter Bay say that there was no evidence that this was a public reserve No evidence in the absence of maps could be so conclusive as that of the Surveyor engaged in marking the place out, and there was also the evidence of one of the original purchasers of land in the locality He believed the maps showed this to be a public reserve, and as to the cost of making the parade, it was made with silt from the harbor, which, if not laid there, would entail a very considerable outlay to carry it elsewhere It was said by an hon member that the Port Corporation had done nothing, but they had a very small amount of funds They had not, like the Adelaide Corporation, a large income from other sources, but they had expended the money judiciously It was necessary that some authority should be exercised over the North Parade

Mr HUGHES, in reply, said, with regard to what had been said by the hon member, Mr Neales that that hon member would ascertain by the maps at the Surveyor-General s office that the North Parade was very similar to that originally laid out It was true the silt was put there, but was that any reason why the inhabitants should be deprived of their reserve The total cost of making the parade was 9,180*l*, and he considered it quite unworthy of hon members representing the City, on which such large sums had been spent, to propose that, on this account, the only public land in the Municipality should be withheld from the people He only regretted that the inhabitants of the Port were not represented better in the House (hear, hear, and laughter), and that he had not received the support he was entitled to in this matter As to a Bill being required, was it because he was the representative of Port Adelaide that he was to draw up all the Bills required for that locality? The Government said that a Bill was necessary, and he maintained that the Government should draw one up It was in order to elicit the opinion of the House that he moved in the matter, in order that the Government might then act upon that opinion

On a division the motion was lost, by a majority of 10

ONKAPARINGA BRIDGE.

MR MILDRED asked "if it is the intention of the Government to appropriate out of the unexpended balance in hand a sufficient sum for extending the bridge across the Onkaparinga?"

From recent returns it appeared that about 360,000 bushels of wheat could be shipped from the Jetty at Onkaparinga It had been decided that Onkaparinga was second to no other port except Adelaide He was familiar with all the ports from Streaky Bay to Cape Northumberland Those 360,000 bushels of wheat, worth 90,000*l*, were the produce of 24,000 acres of land, in the hands of an agricultural population, who were prepared to subscribe in aid if the Government executed this work It was very hard that they should pay 4,000*l* a year for bringing their wheat to Adelaide when they could ship it for 1000*l* from Onkaparinga In 1857, notwithstanding all difficulties, ten vessels laden with produce sailed from Onkaparinga, and there was never an instance known of a vessel which visited the port having sustained an injury The sum now asked for was only 1,600*l* or 2,000*l*

The TREASURER replied that the Government had taken this matter into consideration, and had resolved before the question was asked to place on the Estimates a sum which with subscriptions promised from the neighbourhood, would construct a bridge, the cost of which would be 1,600*l*

JOHN HINDMARSH.

Mr NEALES moved that the petition of John Hindmarsh be printed

Agreed to

MESSRS O HALLORAN AND BREWER'S PETITION

Mr HUGHES moved pursuant to notice—

"That the petition of Messrs O Halloran and Brewer be taken into consideration, and that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will take the steps necessary for complying with the prayer of the petitioners"

The hon gentleman said the petitioners were amongst the earliest settlers in this colony, and as military officers in Her Majesty s forces, were entitled, under certain regulations which then existed, to grants of land The colony, however, having subsequently become a Crown colony, these grants were nullified through the petitioners not having made their claim in sufficient time The object of the petition now was redress, and it involved a payment of 550*l* in liquidation of an equitable claim The land which the petitioners had then a just claim upon was now invested in the revenue of the colony

Mr MACDERMOTT seconded the motion

The TREASURER would not argue the question, but would explain the nature of the claim made by the petitioners At the time South Australia was founded, all officers in the army who relinquished the service, had a grant of land made to them in proportion to their position and length of service, but when South Australia was established under a special Act, it dispossessed the Home Government of the power to make these grants, or the recipients of them from exercising them Persons holding them, however, could have made them available in other colonies In 1841 the Waste Lands Act was passed, and the power was restored to make any such grants available in South Australia as well as in other colonies The petitioners, however, did not come under this regulation having left the service during the period of about three years when the Crown was dispossessed of the power of conferring these grants, and were consequently now appealing for redress

Mr HAWKER said if it were a general principle or precedent which was going to be affirmed, he should certainly oppose the motion The case before them was an exceptional one however The gentlemen in question had done much good for the colony, and should not be exempted from the benefits which had been awarded to others in the same position The petitioners had borne the "burden and heat of the day," and were entitled to reward (Laughter) He was not stating what he did not understand He was a colonist of 20 years' standing, and knew from experience the difficulties and burdens which had to be encountered in the early history of the colony He thought the House might stretch a little in this case, and bear out the spirit with which the grants were made.

Mr PEAKE remarked that the fate of the gentlemen in question, who were spoken of as having borne the burden and heat of the day, had not set in night but in affluence He thought they should not come to that House and make such a claim, when they had no definite assurance when they started for this colony, that their claim would be satisfied. The Queen of England had made over the lands of this colony to the colonists, and—— (Divide, divide)

The SPEAKER said it was not in order for any one to cry "divide" when a member was speaking

The SPEAKER put the motion, which was negatived without a division

COST OF RAILWAY SURVEYS

Mr PEAKE, pursuant to notice, moved—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return, showing the amount paid to the Surveyors of the several lines of railway ordered by this House during its last session, specifying the cost of each separately and in detail, with the plans, sections, and reports of such Surveyors."

He asked the question in consequence of having heard of the costly nature of these surveys He had had an interview with the Commissioner of Public Works, however, since, and he was satisfied that the necessary information would be given

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that there would be some difficulty in producing the plans, as they were lodged in the office of the Railway, but that hon members would there have an opportunity of inspecting them

Mr COLE asked whether the details of the cost, if not the plans, could be laid on the table?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied in the affirmative.

The motion was carried, with the omission of the words, "plans and sections"

VOTE TO THE CENTRAL ROAD BOARD

Mr MILNE, preparatory to moving the House into Committee for consideration of the motion standing in his name viz —"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that an additional sum of £10,000 be placed on the Supplementary Estimates for expenditure by the Central Road Board," would state that at the last meeting of the Central Road Board, the urgent applications for works to be proceeded with were so numerous as to compel the Board to seek a further vote from the Government. He was so satisfied that he would carry the feelings of the House with him, that he would not enter at any length into the subject, but would state that the urgent claims from all parts of the colony, north, south and east, would render it impossible for the Board to grapple with the necessities of the case without further aid The voting of the sum asked would give increased employment to the labouring men at a time when it was most wanted

The House then went into Committee

Mr MILNE would be very glad if the Government would give him encouragement to make the amount 20,000*l* instead of 10,000*l*, or he would be glad to see some hon member move an amendment to that effect He would like, however, to retain his motion to fall back upon in case of the amendment being unsuccessful

Mr McELLISTER moved as an amendment that the sum 10,000*l* be struck out and 20,000*l* be substituted in its place

The CHAIRMAN then put the original motion, which was negatived The amendment for 20,000*l* was next put and carried

The item in the amended form was about to be put by the Chairman, when

The TREASURER rose and said he should be as pleased as any one to see the wishes of the House carried out, though if an amount were voted he would be inclined to support the smaller sum He would remind them that on the Estimates for the ensuing year there was a sum of 70,000*l* to the Central Road Board, which was as much as could be spared If the vote of 20,000*l* was made now it would reduce the amount they were to receive next year to 50,000*l* If it were deemed advisable to spend the 20,000*l* now they must not be disappointed next year in finding the sum on the Estimates reduced so much

Mr LINDSAY warned the House to weigh the matter well before they pledged themselves to a vote involving such an amount

Mr SOLOMON supported the amendment, for he felt to support this would put him in a position to withdraw a succeeding motion standing in his name They had been told by the Treasurer that he objected to the vote of £20,000, as it would reduce the sum available for next year's works, but he thought that the present moment was the best time to spend the money, instead of delaying it till the winter months He gave his vote under the impression that he was doing his duty to his constituency

Mr HAWKER supported the amendment, because out of the £8,000 voted to the Central Board on the last occasion not one penny of it had been spent in the north The north had been entirely ignored in proportion to the amount of land which had been purchased there In agreeing to the amendment they were meeting a just demand upon the House, and it would be far better than any other chimerical ideas of the employment of labour which had been mooted, not only would it confer a benefit on the country, but it would do so also on the town It was unskilled labour that could not find employment, and that was just the description of labour they could employ upon the roads

Mr SCAMMELL was not induced to oppose the motion upon broad grounds but he would suggest that it should be understood that a certain portion of the money should be spent on the Port road, which would give employment to numbers of persons, who required it, at the Port and intermediate places If this were not agreed to he certainly should refuse his support to the vote

Mr TOWNSEND cordially supported the amendment The Central Road Board, he was assured, gave general satisfaction which he attributed to its members being elective He would leave the matter, consequently, entirely in their own hands and would not stipulate in what direction the money should be spent He would however, mention a bad piece of road—(a laugh)—which existed on the way to Nairne which might require the attention of the Board It was a happy coincidence in the want of roads simultaneously with the want of employment

Mr STRANGWAYS opposed the motion, because they had been told by the Commissioner of Public Works that the Central Road Board had still a considerable sum of money to spend before January next, and he would not consent to the policy of thus anticipating next year s revenue

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the usual plan adopted by the Central Road Board was to put a statement before the House, showing how they intended to spend any vote of money, and when this was done the House would be in a position to judge of the expediency of their plans or not He thought the smaller sum would have been ample for their wants for the reason that the Central Road Board could not set men to work at a moment s notice Plans had to be prepared and tenders to be called for therefore the sum of £10,000 would probably be all that would be required before the next vote was made He would however, confer with the Board as to the best plan to spending whatever amount was placed at their disposal

Mr HAY supported the amendment, as they could not have a more suitable time for spending their money It would draw the labor out of the city by giving employment on the roads With respect to what had fallen from hon members as to bad roads he could multiply instances were it any use, but he wished the Board would set to in earnest and they then would perhaps hear very few of such complaints in future

Mr DUNN supported the amendment as he believed there was a great deal of labor out of employment and the Central Road Board were now in such good working order that it would be a pity to lose the opportunity

Mr DUFFIELD said there was a time when he had to defend the Central Road Board in that House from attack, but so unanimously had the feeling been in favor of the Board that day, that there was no necessity for him to say a word in their defence The hon member for Encounter Bay had referred to a sum of 8000*l* which had lately been placed at the disposal of the Board If that hon member referred to Council Paper 37, he would find that a great portion of that if not expended had been anticipated In anticipation of receiving that amount, the Board had called for tenders for very urgent works, which he believed had very nearly absorbed it

Mr STRANGWAYS explained that he did not state the Board had the money but that such an amount had been voted

Mr DUFFIELD would refer to a remark made by the member for Victoria, who said that nothing had been expended in the improvement of the north As the representative of a portion of the northern district, he could not allow that remark to pass That gentleman would find that a greater number of miles of road had been made to the north than in any other direction From public records he found there had been 38 miles of road made to the north, 35 to the south, and 36 to the south east, showing the north had not been completely ignored, as that hon gentleman had stated It was only within the last seven years that the north had become an agricultural district, but still it had a full share of the money entrusted to the Central Road Board He confessed he did not feel that entire satisfaction which he would have felt if the smaller sum had been voted They might be taking too quick a step (No, no) He hoped when the Treasurer came to look into the Estimates he would find sufficient to provide for the full vote next year perhaps £100 000, instead of £70,000 He thought the Board would be fully justified in taking immediate steps to supply the demand for labor

Mr HAWKER explained that he never said there had been no improvements in the north, but that nothing had been done to improve the roads north of the Light

Mr DUFFIELD said the words used by that hon member as he had understood them, were that the north had been entirely ignored

Mr PEAKE thought that they were playing at "ducks and drakes" with the public money and they were going on by such jumps and starts that, when the amendment of £20,000 was made on the £10 000, he was just preparing to make another amendment for £50,000 ("Divide")

Mr REYNOLDS suggested that in this vote they might introduce a sum—say £1 000—to be disposed of in repairing the Port-road He did not know whether any hon gentleman had proposed it, therefore it was only a suggestion on his part

The item as amended for £20 000 was then put and carried

The House resumed, and the report was brought up and adopted

RESIGNATION OF MR HUGHES

The SPEAKER announced that he had received a communication from J B Hughes Esq, resigning his seat as representative in the House of Assembly for the Port

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, it was resolved that a writ be issued for the election of a member for Port Adelaide, in the room of Mr Hughes

MAGILL INSTITUTE

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the motion standing in the name of Mr WARK, "That the petition of the office-bearers of Magill Institute be printed," was carried

HOSPITAL AT THE PORT

Upon the motion of Mr SCAMMELL the House went into Committee for the consideration of the following notice of motion standing in his name —

"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to place on the Supplementary Estimates for 1858 the sum of £500, for the purpose of establishing and defraying the expenses of a Casualty Hospital at Port Adelaide, for one year"

The hon gentleman remarked that the necessity which existed for such an institution must be apparent to everyone It was suggested that £100 per annum might suffice for rent, another £100 for male and female attendants, and that the remaining £300 would suffice for other purposes in connection with the institution

Mr COLE seconded the motion which was carried, and the House resumed

Several notices of motion were postponed, and the House adjourned at a quarter-past 5 o'clock

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY

The petition was received, read, and ordered to be printed

EXECUTIONS REGULATION BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, seconded by the Hon A FORSTER the Executions Regulations Bill was postponed till after the consideration of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill in order that the last-mentioned Bill might be transmitted to the House of Assembly

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The Hon the PRESIDENT certified that the Bill was a true copy of that which had been passed by the House, and upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY seconded by the hon Mr MORPHETT, the Bill was read a third time and passed, the Clerk of the House being directed to convey the Bill to the House of Assembly with an intimation that the Council had passed it, and desired the concurrence of the House of Assembly

EXECUTIONS REGULATION BILL

The CHIEF SECRETARY said that, after the explanation which he gave to the House at the time he obtained leave to introduce this Bill, it was not his intention to take up the time of the House with any further observations in moving its second reading The Council had, no doubt, well considered the measure and, he believed, would agree with him, that such a measure was necessary He therefore begged to move that the Bill be read a second time

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN seconded the motion, which was carried, and the House went into Committee upon it

Upon the first clause being read,

The Hon J MORPHETT wished to suggest an alteration He thought there was a little surplusage in the clause It stated that after the passing of this Act, so and so should be done Now of course the Bill could not come into operation till after it had passed His principal object, however, in rising was to call the attention of the Chief Secretary to the fact, that during the last session the Council passed an Act, which was in accordance with an Act of the Imperial Parliament, fixing a specific time at which all Acts should come into operation unless there were some special reason for their coming into operation at some other time It was a short Act, and one which he had the honor of introducing, and merely provided that where there was no special provision as to the time at which Acts should come into operation they should come into operation from the day of passing thereof At present there was a doubt and uncertainty as to when an Act came into operation unless some specific time were mentioned The old Parliamentary rule was that Acts should come into operation from the first day of the session on which they were passed, but this was found so very inconvenient that a short Act was passed, the object being to provide that all Acts should come into operation from the day of passing No day was mentioned in the present Act as that upon which it should come into operation, and he thought the Chief Secretary would find it much more convenient that a short Act should be introduced into Parliament, defining the time at which all Acts should come into operation, and thus prevent the necessity of inserting a clause in each Act to determine at what time it should come into operation He hoped the hon gentleman would assure the Council that it was his intention to introduce such a Bill during the present session

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thought the utility of such a measure must be undoubted It was his intention to add a clause to the Bill giving it effect from the 1st January, 1859

The first two clauses were then passed

Upon the third clause being read,

The Hon A FORSTER said that he did not know what the operation of this clause would be in reference to persons witnessing executions By the clause as it at present stood it appeared to him that persons within the walls of the gaol must remain there till the sentence upon the criminal had been carried out Supposing a reprieve to arrive would these persons be liberated?

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that if a reprieve arrived the previous sentence would of course be done away with, and there would be no necessity for persons to remain

Clauses 4 and 5 were passed

The Hon A FORSTER suggested an amendment in the 6th clause with regard to the publicity to be given to capital punishments There was a provision in the Bill to the effect that the certificate and declaration should be published three times in the South Australian Government Gazette, but he questioned whether that was sufficient It was of the utmost importance that the greatest publicity should be given, and he would therefore move the insertion after Government Gazette, of the words "or in any one or more of the newspapers of the province"

An hon member suggested that the publication should take place in the whole of the newspapers of the province

The Hon A FORSTER said his object was not to incur larger expense than was necessary in giving the requisite publicity, but he would certainly suggest that due publicity should be secured

The Hon J MORPHETT did not see the force of the hon gentleman's argument, unless, indeed, he was prepared to go so far as to say that all the notices in the South Australian Government Gazette should be inserted also in the Register and Advertiser Did the hon gentleman mean to say that the Gazette was nothing, and that all the impoundings, insolvency, and other notices should also be inserted in the public journals? So long as it was not necessary that a certain class of notices should be inserted in any other paper than the Gazette, he could not see the necessity of making an exception with respect to the notices under this Bill He could not see why this particular class of notices should be taken out of the category The proposition of the hon gentleman involved further expense to the country, and expenses accumulated fast enough He did not think the hon gentleman had made out a case There had been nothing shown to convince him that it was necessary to provide for the publication of these notices in a daily paper Every guarantee was taken for the requisite publicity by the attendance of certain officers at the executions—men of standing and character and there was a further guarantee in the admission of a certain number of independent persons, all of whom were required to sign a certificate to the effect that the law had been carried into operation in a proper way, until the hon gentleman could show some particular reason that exception should be made in reference to this class of notices, he should oppose the insertion of the words suggested

The Hon Captain HALL was in favor of the insertion of the words which had been suggested by the Hon Mr Forster because the general public would really be left in ignorance of the fate of criminals if the publication were confined to the Government Gazette, so few being in the habit of seeing or reading the notices in that publication He recollected that in the Chamber of Commerce, when the Insolvent Law was under consideration, one of the suggestions made was, that the notices should be published in the daily papers Of course, there was no desire to prevent the notices from appearing in the Government Gazette, but the general public seldom saw that publication, and the consequence was that advantage was taken by parties declaring immediately after the publication of the Gazette, and the public were not aware of the circumstance The expenses consequent upon adopting the suggestion of the Hon Mr Forster would not be great, and the public would, he believed, be much better satisfied if the notices were published in the daily papers as well as in the Government Gazette

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought the Government would go far enough in securing the publication of the notices in the Government Gazette, because a publication in the Gazette would be a sufficient record, and would be at all times accessible He thought that the Government, having completed the punishment, ought not to go further, or to push the matter beyond that, because it would, in fact, be punishing the persons connected with the individual who had suffered If the notices were published in the daily journals, the notification that such and such unfortunate men had suffered would be spread throughout the world, and how grievous would this be to the parties connected with the criminal How painful would it be for them to take up a newspaper and find it announced that a relative had been hanged on such and such a day He thought the publication ought not to extend further than the Gazette

The Hon A FORSTER said that the Hon Mr Morphett had said that no case had been made out to shew that the notices should be inserted in the daily papers as well as in the Government Gazette He (Mr Forster) did not attempt to make out a case, nor did he expect to be called upon to do so, but believing the matter of considerable public importance, he had suggested that the notices should be published through a channel which would best secure their publicity The Hon Mr Morphett had said that the impounding notices and insolvency notices, &c, were merely published in the Government Gazette, and that there was no reason that exception should be taken in reference to notices under this Bill, but the hon gentleman had not stated that the impounding, insolvency, and other notices were published gratuitously in the columns of the newspapers published in the colony, and that they thus obtained publicity If it were not so the Government would lose immense sums every year through publishing land sales, &c, in so obscure a periodical as the Government Gazette He would suggest that there should be an alteration in the whole of these cases A new Impounding Act was before the Parliament, and no doubt it would be thought desirable that the notices, instead of being passed through the Gazette, should be passed through the public journals There was no reason why the newspapers should publish these notices gratuitously when they were paid for in the Government Gazette. The hon Captain Bagot had suggested that it would be sufficient punishment to the relatives of the sufferers that official notification of the catastrophe should be published in the Government Gazette, and had urged that if the notifications were published in the newspapers they would be circulated through the world, and that innocent parties would thereby be injured, but merely sanctioning their publication in the Gazette would not prevent them from getting into the public newspapers The notices would as certainly be published in the newspapers as though their publication were sanctioned by the Government He considered it due to the community, quite irrespectively of any advantage to the proprietors of the newspapers that the widest possible publicity should be given to these matters With regard to land sales and other matters, he was quite sure that not only would the Government not lose but they would gain largely by adopting this suggestion If the newspapers were to come to the resolution of suppressing the notices which appeared in the Government Gazette, he was satisfied that the colony would suffer very largely In order to test the feeling of the House, he would move that after the words Government Gazette, the following words be added, and "in one or more newspapers of the province"

The Hon Captain BAGOT said he had never expected that the newspapers would be prevented from publishing the notices, so far from that, he had throughout felt quite sure that they would find their way into the newspapers, but the Government ought not, he thought, to be called upon to pay for what it was not necessary should be published through that channel

The motion of Mr Forster was lost

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved the insertion of a clause giving effect to the Act from 1st January, 1859

The clause was agreed to

The Hon A FORSTER thought there was a practical difficulty in the third clause, and he should be glad if the hon the Chief Secretary would consider it before he took the Bill out of Committee It appeared to him that as the clause was at present worded, all the persons assembled to witness the execution must sign the certificate before they left the walls of the gaol

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY considered there was no difficulty in the way, as if a reprieve arrived, which the Hon

Mr Forster had previously suggested, of course they would not be called upon to state that the sentence had been carried into effect according to law

The Hon A. FORSTER considered it very undesirable that the clause should be so worded as to admit of a variety of interpretations

The Hon Mr MORPHETT drew the attention of the Chief Secretary to the wording of the schedule B which contained the expression "convicted before the Supreme Court held in Adelaide." Other portions of the Act contemplated the execution of criminals at other places than at Adelaide, and it might also be assumed their trial elsewhere was contemplated. There was no special provision that the trial should take place in Adelaide, and when there were Circuit Courts, the trial might take place at Mount Remarkable or Guichen Bay, or a long way from Adelaide. In that case the schedule as at present worded would not be applicable

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thought it possible that criminals might be sent to Guichen Bay, or Mount Remarkable, or Port Lincoln, to be hung as examples to others, and he consequently had no objection to the alteration suggested by the Hon Mr Morphett

The Hon Captain BAGOT pointed out that the first clause contained the expression "Supreme Court of said province." The Supreme Court might sit anywhere.

Some verbal amendments having been made, the CHAIRMAN reported the Bill to the House, the House resumed, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an order of the day for Tuesday next

THE CUSTOMS LAW AMENDMENT BILL

The PRESIDENT announced that he had received "the Customs Law Amendment Bill," as recently passed by the House of Assembly, and that the Assembly desired the concurrence of the Council therein. The Bill was, upon the motion of the Chief Secretary read a first time, and the second reading made an order of the day for Tuesday next, till which day the House adjourned

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

TUESDAY SEPTEMBER 28

The SPEAKER took the chair at ten minutes past one o clock

CITY WATERWORKS

Mr NEALES presented a petition from the Mayor and Corporation of the City of Adelaide, praying the House to make provision for the additional expense of laying the mains along each side of the street, instead of, as at present, excepting three streets only, in the centre

PETITIONS

Mr BAKEWELL presented a petition from John Finley Duff, with respect to certain grievances in connection with his ownership of the Anna Dixon, in which vessel a loss of £639 11s had been incurred by the petitioner, in consequence of the interference of this Government in depriving him of a Lascar crew, and compelling him to supply their place with a European one, at an increased expense

The petition was received and read

THE RIVER WEIR

Mr MILDRED asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether he would have any objection to lay the papers on the table relating to the Board of Enquiry on the River Weir

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in anticipation of the question being put, had brought down all the papers referring to the enquiry up to the present hour. Amongst them would be found answers to certain queries which had been put by the Commissioners to the Board. The papers were laid upon the table and were subsequently ordered to be printed

Mr REYNOLDS thought that as the documents were important they should be read to the House

The Report was accordingly read

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a Bill to amend and consolidate the Act relating to the Water Supply and Drainage of the City of Adelaide. The Bill was, on the motion of the Commissioner of Public Works, read a first time, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for Thursday, the 14th October

PAPERS LAID ON THE TABLE

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid several papers on the table, amongst which was a return of the expenditure of the Port Adelaide Harbor Trust

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE

Mr REYNOLDS moved that as there was a vacancy in the Railway Committee, it should be filled up

A ballot was accordingly taken, and Mr Hawker was declared elected

KAPUNDA RAILWAY BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS asked the Speaker why the evidence which had been taken on the Kapunda Railway Bill was not on the files of hon members

The SPEAKER said that some of the professional evidence had not been returned by the witnesses to whom it was sent for correction, and that the report had not therefore been received from the Government Printing-office

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the Commissioners of the Railway had been authorised by the Government to provide the plant for the northern extension, and, if so, under what authority they (the Government) had done so?

THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would prefer that the hon member should give regular notice on the subject

BOARD OF WORKS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, expressed himself willing that the Harbor Trust should be included amongst the Boards to be incorporated under the control of the Board of Public Works. He moved the second reading of the Bill simply on the broad principle of bringing all the Boards under the immediate control of the Commissioner of Public Works, and therefore, directly, under the control of the people of South Australia. In speaking for himself he assured the House that he did not shrink from performing the greatly increased duties which would devolve upon him. The second point he would urge in connection with this memorial, was the greatly increased economy which would result from it. He had carefully gone into calculations, and the saving, at the least, would amount, he believed, to 3,000*l* per annum if the Bill became law. It would ill become him to say anything against any of the Boards at present existing, against one of which certain charges had been made, but he would say that those charges were, in his opinion unfounded in fact perfectly uncalled for, and not susceptible of proof. The principle now sought to be adopted was a part of the Responsible Government under which they lived, and it was a step in the right direction. With respect to the action of the House on the Bill, he would not contend against details so long as the broad principles of the Bill were carried out. The third point which recommended it was, that the salaries of the various officers of the Board would be placed on the Estimates, and come under the review of the House. He would recapitulate the three heads of the Bill. First, there was the broad principle of bringing all the Boards under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works, secondly, the great saving of 3,000*l* per annum that would be effected, and thirdly, the salaries paid under the various Boards would then be brought under the control of that House. He moved the second reading of the Bill,

Mr STRANGWAYS hardly knew what course to take with respect to this Bill, whether to support it or otherwise, as the Commissioner of Public Works had said he was ready to withdraw it, or alter and modify it. He had great objection to the proposed Board as suggested by the Bill, as they would have to abolish Boards partially responsible, and substitute one totally irresponsible. Or if the Board were to be responsible a fresh Board would have to be appointed with every change of Ministry. The Board would be irresponsible because the Commissioner of Public Works could always be outvoted, and jobbing transactions could be carried on to the same extent as under the present system. He disapproved of the entire abolition of the Central Road Board, and suggested that a Council, composed of persons elected by District Councils, should be constituted as a Board of advice to the Commissioner, who would find their local knowledge of great service. This Board or Council would not have either responsibility or power, theoretically speaking, but in practice it was probable the Commissioners would, as a rule, always act upon their advice. He objected to the Bill as the principle of it—which, however, the Commissioner of Public Works had described as a Bill without a principle—appeared to place more patronage in the hands of the Government. The hon Commissioner of Public Works had stated that he felt almost inclined to follow the course he had adopted in the Impounding Act, and to withdraw the Bill. He (Mr Stringways) hoped he would do so, for he was quite confident that by the time the Bill had passed through Committee there would be so little of it left that the Hon Commissioner of Public Works would fail to recognise it. He (Mr Stringways) could not see how the present Bill could operate to prevent jobbery. He thought charges of that description would be as likely to be made as before. He considered it only another attempt to increase the patronage of the Government. He would not advocate the entire abolition of the Road Board. He thought the scheme not an economical scheme, and that the Commissioner when appointed would have great power but little if any responsibility, and therefore he would move as an amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months

Mr HAWKER rose to second the amendment, not because he did not entirely approve of the principle of Responsible Government, but he did not like to see it carried out in the way proposed by that Bill. He thought there could be no satisfaction in abolishing a number of Boards and then appointing another instead. He thought all officers of departments should be responsible to their respective heads, but that complete responsibility could not be obtained by the appointment of four Commissioners. He could not see the object of it. How could those gentlemen gain information as to the works to be carried out in each other's departments? He thought the public interests, with the exception of carrying out roads, would be far better consulted by making each of those gentlemen directly responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works or the Commissioner of Crown Lands, without any intervening Board. If there were less expense under the proposed measure, there would be great loss of time to the community. If the Engineer of Railways were not competent, he did not see how they were to make him competent by placing a Board between him and the Commissioner of Public Works. He (Mr. Hawker) thought, with a slight modification of the Central Road Board, our roads would be carried out in an excellent manner, and that it would be difficult to appoint a Board to carry them out better than the present one. There were certainly some isolated cases in which it was asserted that they had not carried out their trusts for the benefit of the colony, but he thought—looking north, south, and east (as there was no west)—it would be difficult to carry out in a better manner the improvements that had been effected. With that single exception, he considered it would be better for the interests of the colony that the heads of departments should be made directly responsible to a responsible Ministry without the intervention of a Board of all, for he wished that every difficulty should be removed, so that if a department were responsible it should be rendered completely so.

Mr. REYNOLDS would not be able to go with the hon. member for Encounter Bay, because he thought the Government were moving in a right direction, and although he could not go entirely with them, he could go a great way with them. He felt gratified to find that the Government were disposed to carry out the line of policy dictated by that side of the House. ("No, no," from the Commissioner of Public Works.) The Commissioner of Public Works said "no." How then was it that the intention to place those Boards under Responsible Government was not included in the Governor's address and made a part of the Ministerial programme? The fact was they got additional light from some part of that House. They saw it would not do to blink the question of responsible Boards, and all at once they appeared to find a Bill somewhere, and they brought it forward intimating that the matter had been under the consideration of the Government many months. He thought it was the Bill he had the honor to submit to the Government in December last, modified but not very much improved. He had submitted it to his late colleagues, because they were not in favor of the Bill of last session, which, however, he (Mr. Reynolds) thought was a better system. He had tried to consult his colleagues on the 18th of May last on that very question and several others, but was unable to do so. On that date, according to the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Cabinet met. He (Mr. Reynolds) was present on that day. He wished to consult his colleagues on railway and Waterworks matters, but in consequence of their meetings being so few and far between the Commissioner of Public Works could scarcely get a word in edgeways. He must make one or two statements in explanation of the course he took on the question of asking leave to introduce the Bill. He had made certain statements with reference to the Harbor Trust. Had the Commissioner of Public Works intimated his intentions with regard to that Trust, those observations would never have been made; still the facts remain that nearly half the silt raised in Port Adelaide was raised in one locality. In the early part of May he (Mr. Reynolds) wanted to consult his colleagues in the matter then before the House. On the 4th May he could not find the Chief Secretary, and on the 6th May he could not find him, nor could he meet with him from the 7th to the 12th May. On the 11th, he (Mr. Reynolds) wanted particularly to meet with him, but could not, and between the 14th and 17th he was also unable to find him. Having said thus much, he must, in the next place, congratulate the Government on their bringing forward the Bill, and hoped they would not allow it to be shelved, and that the hon. member for Encounter Bay would not meet with support in that House. It was a move in the right direction. They had better have three Commissioners than 12, but he thought they might do without Commissioners. The Colonial Architect's was an important department, and it came in direct contact with the Commissioner of Public Works, and he did not see why the other departments should not do the same. He thought it necessary to have a manager of railways, in order to carry the system out, but he did not see why the Engineer of Waterworks should not be the Executive Officer of the Waterworks, and the same with respect to the Harbor Trusts and Roads. He would not agree with the hon. member for Encounter Bay with regard to the roads. He knew the Central Road Board was now popular, but it had not always been so. It might be that popular men were now on that Board who were determined to act openly, and consequently they received public approbation, but suppose they were changed at some future time, the Board might not be so popular then as now. Therefore the argument of the hon. member could not be allowed to tell on the House. That hon. member said that he could not see how one man could manage the roads because he might not have local knowledge; but the Road Surveyors would have local knowledge, and he (Mr. Reynolds) supposed the Road Board took advice from the Surveyors, who reported to the head of the department as to the nature of the plans and estimates laid before them. He quite agreed with the Commissioner of Public Works that the plan would save 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a-year. Had he said 5,000*l.* it would have been nearer the truth. (Hear, from the Commissioner of Public Works.) He (Mr. Reynolds) could see no reason why the Telegraph should be under the control of a Commissioner. He thought it a pity to change the title of the present Superintendent. He had rather keep him under that title, as they would know him as an excellent officer under it, while under the title of Commissioner they might lose sight of him. He (Mr. Reynolds) should leave himself at liberty to move, when that amendment was disposed of, that the Bill introduced last session should be substituted for the one then before the House.

Mr. BURFORD hoped the House would not, with respect to that Bill, think of negativing the principle of direct responsibility. He should be sorry if the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay met with any considerable support in the House, for he was willing to think that they were all impressed with the necessity of supporting the principle of direct responsibility in all Public Works. He thought the hon. member rather contradicted himself when speaking of the principle of placing all management under one head. He spoke in favor of the Bill of last Session, the tendency of that Bill was quite in the direction of management under one head, and then afterwards he objected to the first efforts now being made to render that responsibility a matter of fact. As to the question of salaries there was no force in the observation of the hon. member that there would be no saving on that head, for the number of individuals now engaged must be greater than would be likely to occur under one Commissioner of each Board. With regard to the observations by the hon. member for Victoria, he remarked that there was nothing to be gained under that Bill, but he (Mr. Burford) could see nothing likely to be lost, and he fancied that all the various officers would continue the same, and he thought that there might be a mutual consultation of the various individuals, though they might not be of any particular department; and that in all probability would be quite sufficient to justify the House in embracing the project of the Government. He thought it possible that the disinclination hitherto manifested on the part of the Boards to render their accounts to the Government would be done away with. With regard to the Central Road Board, it was justly remarked by the hon. member for Sturt, there is at present no guarantee for the future, that there should not be persons appointed who might be obnoxious to the public. For his part he wished direct responsibility to be introduced, and therefore he would support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILNE wished before a vote was taken on the amendment, or for the second reading of the Bill, that some information should be given in relation to it. He wished to know what the manner of voting would be at the Board, and whether a vote of the Board was binding on the Commissioner of Public Works, or whether it was merely a Board of Advice. He also wished to know if the press would be admitted to its deliberations, for he looked upon that as a matter of the highest importance. If the answers of the Government were, that the press should be excluded, he should vote against the second reading, for he considered there was no better safe-guard for integrity than the publicity given to proceedings through the press. If the Board was, as it were, the workshop in which measures were prepared for public benefit, then, if the press were admitted, the matters would be influenced to a certain extent by public opinion, for if sufficient time were given for the consideration of the projects contemplated, they would be well ventilated, and all necessary information would be obtained. That system would have a tendency to prevent a repetition of errors into which they had at times fallen from imperfect information. If publicity had been given, or public deputations received, those errors would not have been committed. He considered it of the utmost importance that the Board should be open to the press. ("Hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works.)

The TREASURER considered that there was very little dissent from the principle of the Bill. True, some seemed inclined to set it aside altogether, because it did not exactly meet their expectations. Others considered it a move in the right direction, and would gain all they could on a point of so much importance. The great principle of that Bill was, that the various Boards in the colony, some of which were independent of the Government, and others only partially dependent, should be brought under direct responsibility. He was one who maintained that it was desirable that the House should have complete control over the various public undertakings through responsible Ministers, and not as now, that indirect control obtained by letting members of Boards hold office until removed by a vote of that House. And when it was considered that no member could be removed except by a vote of that House, it amounted to absolute permanency of office, for there must be a resolution agreed to by both Houses before he could be removed; and therefore there were some officers absolutely irresponsible to that House. It would therefore be a great gain to bring all Boards under the direct control of the House. It had been said that the power of the Commissioner of Public Works was not brought to bear so directly on the Commissioners as on the heads of departments. After full consideration, the Government did not altogether approve of the system introduced last year. They thought the officers would be less liable to political influences under the proposed system, than if they were under the direct control of the Commissioner of Public Works. Under the present Bill, in any change of administration, public works would go pretty much as under the former administration. They would not be affected by the change. He thought that was one advantage of working by Boards. The hon. member for Encounter Bay had said he was not satisfied with the improvement proposed, and he wanted some Board of his own—in fact, he wanted to throw that Bill overboard altogether. If the hon. member wished to have the Bill of last session, throwing that Bill out altogether, was not the way to obtain it. There was nothing in the Bill before the House to prevent hon. members shaping it so as to secure the influence of a majority of that House. If the control proposed was not direct enough, it was in the power of that House to make it so. The hon. member for Encounter Bay said there must be some sinister object sought to be gained by creating those offices, whereas the patronage of the Government would be limited. The hon. member had quite mistaken the scope and tendency of the Bill. Then, as to salaries, the House would fix them. The Bill merely provides that they shall be paid, it does not fix the amount. The remark of the hon. member could not be justified by any provision of that Bill. The control of the Government over the Boards would be complete, because the Regulations would have to be framed in the Executive Council on the report and recommendation of the Commissioner of Public Works. There would also be regulations in reference to the audit of accounts, and thus one of the faults of the existing system would be done away with. At present the several Boards felt annoyed at the interference of the Auditor General, sometimes they carried out the Acts which constituted them in defiance of the Government. He considered it a good plan to allow the press to be present on most occasions, but there were certain times when for the public benefit publicity ought to be avoided. Therefore it was not advisable to introduce any clause making such publicity a part of that Bill. In reference to what had been said by the hon. member for Sturt, respecting the Council meeting of the 18th of May, he thought there was some unfairness in the way of putting it. Had the Attorney-General been in the House, he would have been able to reply to the remark better than he (the Treasurer) could, but one thing struck him in reference to that complaint. The hon. member on that day attended a Cabinet meeting with a bundle of papers, containing reference to various matters that he wished to bring before his colleagues. Now, the usual plan of working at those meetings was to give some intimation when such matters were about to be brought forward. If a question was about to be put it was put in writing, and the Chief Secretary was requested to name an early day on which the matters might be taken into consideration. If such a course were not followed, it would be impossible to carry on a Government, supposing that every member was anxious that his own particular questions should have the precedence.

Mr. LINDSAY had listened to the arguments of the various hon. members who had addressed the House, and felt some doubt as to how he should vote. He was not quite satisfied with the Bill, and was not prepared to go the whole hog against it. He considered that that Bill would not bring all the various Boards under the direct control of the Government. Under the first clause, the Board constituted would be irresponsible. With regard to saving £3,000, he thought that very well, but the object of the Bill should be to fix responsibility somewhere, but as the Board was constituted, it was fixed nowhere. The Central Road Board had expended £59,702 16s. on a road, the permanent plan of which was not decided on, for he thought it probable there would be a deviation of three or four miles. (The Speaker intimated that the hon. gentleman was out of order.) He agreed with the hon. Treasurer that the Bill was a move in the right direction, but it required considerable alteration, and some addition might be made to it with great advantage. The 6th clause empowered the Government to make certain regulations—but they ought not to legislate in that roundabout way. The Government in such a Bill as that should have given power to carry out whatever was wanted. He should hold himself open to vote as he thought proper. He was not prepared to reject the Bill, but he considered that it might be made more generally palatable.

Mr. PEAKE endorsed most emphatically the principle of reducing all Boards under the complete control of the Commissioner of Public Works. He regarded it as an essential part of the system of the Government under which they were living and legislating. He believed it impossible to uphold the present system. Irresponsible Boards could not be allowed to co-exist with their present institutions. The system of carrying out public works, and the management of public works, must be made to square with the system of responsible Government. The Commissioner of Public Works proposed to abolish existing Boards, and he was sorry to find, to construct another Board. Having knocked down one lot, he had hoped no other would be built up. There was laid on the table of the House last session a small Bill of only one clause, and though its provisions did not comprise the Central Road Board, it might have comprised every Board in the colony. Were it carried out a great public saving would be effected. It also had simplicity to recommend it. The Commissioner of Public Works was under a mistake in the constitution of the present Bill, and he was tampering with his own authority. In the first clause in all meetings three members were to form a quorum. Now, if the Commissioner of Public Works should be outvoted or absent from that meeting he (Mr. Peake) could not see how he could take the responsibility of those acts. He believed that a person who possessed a good, firm, strong will was worth a good many wills drawn here and there by private interests and personal considerations. The House could always take the Commissioner to task if he did not do his duty, and he (Mr. Peake) had no objection to give that full power to which he (the Commissioner) was entitled, and therefore he did not like the form in which the change in the public service was to be carried out. He could not agree with the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways). He had suggested that there should be a Council of main roads, but he (Mr. Peake) had too much respect for the Central Road Board to fall into that notion. Such a Council would be very like a building committee, of which he had an instinctive horror. He would endorse the principle of making all Public Works Boards in the colony responsible to the Commissioner of Public Works.

Mr. COLE did not rise to support the bill or to oppose it. He was willing to give the Ministry, and especially the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works, every credit for aiming at the public good, but he feared the mode proposed in the Bill would not attain that object. A celebrated writer, he believed Sidney Smith, had said that Boards were frequently used as blinds for covering up many unsightly things; and now it appeared that the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works had endeavoured to make a convenient box by dovetailing a number of them together for that purpose. He feared that this box would prove like Pandora's, and that the result of the attempt would be evil. He considered the best plan to be that of abolishing all the Boards, and that as hon. members placed confidence in the present Hon. Commissioner of Public Works, they should leave in his hands the whole management of the department. It would be better to have one such officer in charge of the entire management than that he should come in second hand with the possible disadvantage of being outvoted, and thereby rendered responsible for what he did not really approve of. He preferred the Bill of the last session.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL.

A message was at this period brought in from the Legislative Council transmitting a copy of the Matrimonial Causes and Divorce Bill.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the Bill be read a first time, and in order that hon. members might have full time for consideration of the measure, moved that the second reading be made an order of the day for Thursday.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. NEALES was anxious to make some observations on the construction of the new Board, as he was certain it would never work well. It appeared to him that the Commissioners were to be the heads of the present departments, and if that were to be the case, it would resolve itself into this—That the Superintendent of Telegraphs would vote with the Superintendent of the Harbor Trust, and vice versa. There would be a combination amongst the departments, in order that each might be put in possession of as much money as possible. If they were to have Boards which would be at all independent, the fewer they were in number the better. Three Commissioners and a Chairman would be a reasonable number for the Board now proposed. As to the Chairman in such a Board, he could not be outvoted if he attended to his duty, as he would have a double vote, and the old Boards with all their faults would be better than the plan now proposed. As to the saving of 3,000*l.* a-year, one act done by the Board might sweep away three times 3,000*l.* He was inclined to entrust the whole responsibility to the Commissioner of Public Works but he felt that no one Commissioner could undertake the work. It was admitted in another colony, where even with the Board they were obliged to nominate a Deputy-Chairman for the Board of Public Works. But he was satisfied the composition of the Board must not be confined to the heads of departments. No Board would ever work so and in the event of a new Commissioner of Public Works coming into office, all these gentlemen would combine against him until he found himself in a regular hornet's nest. If they represented in the new Board every Board which they were going to destroy, there would be six members, and in that case the Chairman might as well stop away. He was still wedded to the notion that the Harbor Trust was improperly brought under this Bill. It should go with the Trinity Board. He did not say it should be under the Commissioner of Public Works, but it should be dealt with differently from other Boards. He believed it was at present under the Treasurer, and whoever was placed at the head of it should be assisted by a Board such as was now proposed.

Mr. MILDRED would support the second reading, but thought he should reserve his opinion on some clauses. He believed the Bill to be a move in the right direction, and that it would lead to the removal of some incubuses now existing in the State. It was better to put the axe at once to the root of the tree. He did not pay much attention to what had been said as to the Commissioner of Public Works being overworked. It was the interest of that hon. gentleman to have control over all the public works, and he (Mr. Mildred) had never heard the hon. member complain of having too much work. The general complaint was that he had not latitude enough, and that in consequence he could not get all the information which he would require to present to the House respecting the works under his control. With regard to what had been said of the appointment of a deputy chairman in Victoria, the hon. member (Mr. Neales) had fallen into a mistake as the Commissioner of Public Works there was Commissioner of Land also, and therefore a great deal more work fell upon him than on our Commissioner of Works and Commissioner of Land and Immigration. He believed the Trinity Board had hitherto carried out everything done by the Harbor Board. The Harbor Trust had large sums of money at its disposal, but the outlay was or should be managed by the Trinity Board.

Dr. Wark would vote for the second reading and had much pleasure in having the opportunity of supporting the Government. He considered this a movement in the right direction, but the Boards, if the House was about to meddle with them at all, should be swept away, in order that the public business should be properly conducted under the Commissioner of Public Works. That hon. gentleman had not complained of his work, but, on the contrary, was anxious that this very onerous duty should also be imposed upon him, and by all means let it so devolve on him. He did not think the proposed Board of Works would answer. In the first place, though each of the members might be adapted to his position, it did not follow that each would be adapted to the position of every other member. It might so happen that a Commissioner of one department, who understood clearly what he was about, would be swamped by gentlemen who, though up to their own work, were not conversant with the department of the gentleman of whom he had first spoken. The Commissioner of Public Works, himself, was only one individual, and might be outvoted on every occasion. He must therefore bring every member of the Board under his control. He must mould them to his own views or he must discharge them. The Commissioner might then be called to account by the House, but there were always some differences of opinion in cases of the kind. There were some points upon which men would conscientiously differ, and if on a point of that kind the Commissioner should be outvoted he could not in that House support the proposition on which he had been beaten. The thing was absurd, ridiculous, and unworkable.

Mr. Duffield could hardly understand how gentlemen who were ready to knock down the existing Boards could consent to build up one more objectionable still. He agreed with every hon. member who said that all the public works should be placed, under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works, and that he alone should be responsible for them, and if a Bill embodying that principle were introduced, he would support it, provided it were not coupled with the objectionable provisions of the present measure. Had the Government reintroduced the Bill of last session with the addition of one or two points omitted in that Bill, he would support it. He did not wish to vote with the hon. member for Encounter Bay. If they affirmed the principle of the Bill they must appoint a Board of some description, and he presumed they should appoint the heads of departments under the Commissioner of Public Works as such a Board. They would then have several servants—he used the word with all possible respect—who held offices at the will of the Administration, or as he might say at the will of the Commissioner of Public Works sitting with that hon. gentleman to decide what works were to be carried on. That plan was not better than the old system. He could not support the second reading unless there were some modification of the Bill. The Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works had said that there would be a saving of £2,000 or £3,000 a-year, but as had been remarked by the hon. member for the Murray, he did not see where the saving was to be made. He had no doubt the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works was satisfied as to the possibility of this saving, but there was no evidence to his (Mr. Duffield's) mind of the fact. They knew that the salaries were to be decided by the House, but he imagined that the salaries would be something more than those now paid to the different Boards and Trusts abolished by this Bill. He hoped some course would be adopted by the House which would set this question at rest and which would have the effect of abolishing the Boards which existed at present, and which were incompatible with our present form of Government. He would even go so far as to say that the position of the Road Board, of which he himself was a member, was incompatible with representative Government. The position of the Railway Board was the same, as it was appointed under an Act of Parliament and was not, therefore, as responsible to the Government as it should be.

The Attorney-General agreed to a great extent in the views of the hon. member who had last addressed the House, that a further continuation of the present system was inconsistent with the full development of Constitutional Government, and he had arrived at this conclusion with some degree of regret. For it was well known that some degree of distinction between South Australia and the surrounding colonies was that the public works of the province were carried out by Boards, and they had been constructed most economically, and, as was universally acknowledged even by our neighbors, most efficiently. The works surpassed those in the other colonies, and, therefore it was not without regret that he came to the conclusion that the continuance of a system which had worked so well was incompatible with that system of Constitutional Government, which we regarded as of still more importance. The handing over to the Commissioner of Public Works of the entire responsibility of the public works of the colony, was the essential principle of this Bill, but whether this principle was to be carried out by means of a Board, or by conferring the power directly on the Commissioner, by the appointment of persons directly responsible to him, as had been suggested by the hon. member for the Murray, was a matter not affecting the essential principle of the Bill nor a point on which the Government would feel bound to take a stand. The principle involved in reading the Bill a second time, was the transferring the power and responsibility of constructing the public works to the Commissioner of Public Works, leaving open the question as to how the works were to be carried on or in what way that power was to be exercised. The Government approved of a Board, believing it possessed many advantages, and this amongst others. The Board being a permanent body, would be enabled to carry on a permanent policy, unaffected by change of office amongst the Ministry. Hon. members would remember that they had many changes in the Department of Public Works last year (laughter), and no one could say how soon the present hon. the Commissioner of Public Works might give place to some one as well, or possibly better qualified for his position. But gentlemen coming newly into the position, and without experience, had much to learn from others, and in this way he thought hon. members would perceive that great inconvenience might arise, and that it was important to have persons conversant with the duties of the departments, who would be able to impart the necessary information. He believed there would be very little change in the way in which the public works would be constructed, as the person at the head of the Board could have no object but to carry on the works in the cheapest and most efficient manner, and there could be little difference in the works sanctioned by persons who were alike seeking to advance the public interests. The manner in which the responsibility was to be conferred was not a point on which the Government felt bound to the Bill, but it was one of importance, and to which he trusted the House would give full consideration, when the details of the measure were under discussion.

Mr. Glyde agreed with the hon. member for Barossa, but he could not understand how the hon. the Attorney-General could support the second reading, if we were not to have a Board of Works at all. If he (Mr. Glyde) could see that, he should vote for the second reading. The objections to a Board of Works were strong, and the more he considered them the more they appeared. He saw many difficulties in the way of its working. Suppose, for instance, there was the Commissioner of Public Works as President, and six members of the Board, and that five of these agree upon one point adverse to the opinion of the President. He would like to know how the Commissioner of Public Works would act in such a case. Or suppose there were a quorum of three present, and that the Commissioner of Public Works was absent, and suppose the three members to agree upon a line of action directly opposed to the opinion of the Commissioner, how would that gentleman act then? Or suppose a new Commissioner of Public Works coming to the Board. With five gentlemen well up in the business of the Board, he (Mr. Glyde) was afraid these gentlemen would not always act on the new Commissioner's counsel and advice. The advantages of consultation would be counterbalanced by cabals against the Commissioner of Public Works. He considered the Bill which was thrown out last year much simpler, shorter, and more to the point than this one, and he should be glad to see that measure in operation. If the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works in his reply promised that in the event of the House allowing the Bill to be read, he would allow the Bill of last year to be substituted, he would not oppose the motion, but unless he received a satisfactory answer on this point, he could not support the second reading.

The Commissioner of Public Works had never listened to a debate which was so unanimous as the present on the broad principle which he had stated to be that of the Bill. That principle was to bring every Board under the direct control of the Commissioner of Public Works. This principle had met the approval of every hon. member, except one, who had spoken. They had all approved of the broad principle of a Bill which had been represented by one, and only by one hon. member, as having no principle at all. He should now say that in deference to the feeling of the House, he was perfectly ready to withdraw this Bill and to introduce another, which should merely ask what he sought in this Bill. The Board he sought to have constituted was simply a Board of advice. They had heard a great deal about the voting and the quorums, but he merely sought to have a consulting Board, and he had asked the present Superintendent of Telegraphs whether he had any objection to sit on such a Board. That gentleman said he had not, and that he thought great advantage might arise from such a Board. Speed was of some consequence in reference to this Bill, as the Waterworks and Kapunda Railway Bills were to some extent involved in it, and he should therefore best meet the wishes of the House by asking leave on an early day (perhaps the following day) to introduce another Bill on this subject

Mr Strangways having withdrawn his amendment, the Bill was also withdrawn

MATRIMONIAL CLAUSES BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL introduced this Bill, which was read a first time, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for Thursday week

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The House then went into Committee on this Bill

On Clause 1, providing for the granting of certain annual leases,

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the addition of the words "in the same manner as he might have done previous to the passing of the said Waste Lands Act"

Mr HAY enquired of the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands the date of the regulations now in force respecting cattle depasturing in hundreds

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS having proceeded to consult some documentary records,

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the House resume

The TREASURER considered the motion of the hon member most unreasonable The regulations were in force for some years, and the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands could not carry the date always in his memory Some notice ought to have been given of the question

Mr REYNOLDS said he had waited five minutes, and seeing that the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands was unable to go on, he had moved that the House resume

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—Divide

The motion that the House resume was then put, and negatived without a division

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, in reply to the question of Mr Hay, that the regulations were dated March 24th, 1853 They appeared in the Gazette of that date

Mr HAY thought it necessary that the House should know what regulations were in force, and that in the event of their not being suitable to the colony, others should be framed in their place One of the gravest questions which had arisen out of this subject was what the regulations for pasturage in hundreds should be, and now was the House, without knowing what these regulations were, was asked to vote upon the subject He thought it better the House should resume until they had further information

In reply to Mr PEAKE,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said this Act would not affect anything done under the Act of last session There was no alteration intended as regarded that Act He would now propose the amendment of which he had given notice, as that provided not merely for existing regulations, but also for any alterations which might be made in these

Mr STRANGWAYS withdrew his amendment in favor of that of the hon the Attorney-General

The ATTORNEY GENERAL then moved the addition to the clause of the words —"Provided such leases shall be liable to the rights of commonage in hundreds as the same now exist, or may from time to time be declared by any regulations issued under this Act, or the said recited Act"

Mr HAY said that formerly the purchaser had a right of claiming whatever pasturage he required, and no lease could be granted except for pasturage over and above what was claimed by the holder of land The old system would be better than the proposed one for instead of continuing leases at 1*l* per square mile, it would amount to this, that whosoever grazed upon the hundred should be subject to the same regulations, and we would not have one person at the rate of 1*l* a square mile, and the holder of land paying so much a head He was sorry the Government introduced this system When there was no responsible Government the commonage of the hundreds was the property of those who held the land, and if they did not choose to take it up, it was open to persons paying the same assessment as they did But we were going back to a system which would give the old lessees the power to hold leases He could not see that the lessees had any right in the hundreds ("Oh! oh!" from Mr Hawker) But he (Mr Hay) said they had not, for they took their leases on the understanding that when the land, either by the advance of settlers, or from the land being in such close contiguity to an agricultural settlement, that it was declared a hundred, their rights as lessees expired He should oppose any attempt which would continue the lease after the land was declared a hundred, as he maintained that all parties should be under the same regulations, and should pay the same assessment This Bill went on the principle of giving the squatters advantages which they never possessed before (No, no) He would prove this from a paper on the table, namely, Council Paper 176 of last session, page 12 (The hon, member read an extract from the paper in question and proceeded to say) This distinctly pointed out that the first holders of land and settlers should be supplied first, and that if any pasturage remained it should be given to those who first applied for it Under the old system, the farmer with his hundred acres of land could claim as much pasturage as he required, and could go with his 60 or 100 head of cattle, and by attending to them, find the means to fence his land and get it into cultivation But now the farmer was restricted in his pasturage, and could not do this, though thousands of the old farmers had commenced so The land within the hundreds should be that of the farmer, not of the squatter He would move the contingent notice of motion standing in his name

The CHAIRMAN remarked that the hon member could not move his amendment at the present stage, He could do so on the motion for the bringing up of the report

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would, before the first clause was put, remind the hon member who had just sat down, that there was really nothing new in the clause The Government had not the least intention of suggesting any special privileges for the squatters in the amended Bill All the Government proposed to do in introducing the amended Bill was, to remove ambiguities which existed in consequence of provisions contained in the Waste Lands Act of last year, and in consequence of there being no power to issue certain leases, known as annual leases, without putting them up to public auction The Bill had been introduced in order to enable the Government to proceed according to law The hon member for Gumeracha had, in reality, argued upon regulations which had no existence The regulations of 1850 were repealed by those of 1853, and the only wish of the Government was to make their action legal in accordance with the regulations which had issued since 1853, and in which the right of commonage had from that day been given Orders in Council with regard to the management of Waste Lands, had been published in the colony in 1850, and by the second chapter the Government had power to grant leases, not exceeding one year, for any land not required for commonage within the hundred It was then laid down as a principle that whatever lands were not required for the rights of commonage for those parties who bought land within the hundred should belong to the leaseholder of the run from which the hundred was taken, and that principle had been acted upon ever since For whatever lands were purchased within the hundred during the year the parties sent in their applications to his (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) office, and commonage was then apportioned according to the quantity of land sold That having been done, whatever remained was apportioned to the individual who held the 14 years lease of the land from which the land contained in the hundred was taken This was so clear that he was surprised hon members should not understand it He hoped the hon member for Gumeracha would understand the position in which the Government were placed, that there was nothing at all new in the Waste Lands Regulation Bill, and that they merely sought to make strictly legal what at present was not quite so, in consequence of the Waste Lands Act passed last session, which provided that no land should be alienated either in fee simple or otherwise except by public auction In reference to the strong appeal which the hon member for Gumeracha had made with regard to the rights of the farmers, if the hon member thought that the farmers had rights, he (the Crown Lands Commissioner) must maintain that the leaseholders had their rights also The farmers received their rights according to regulations which had never, that he was aware of, been found fault with, and the leaseholders had their rights by virtue of the leases which they had been in possession of for some years If the House thought proper to alter that state of things, the leaseholders must submit, but that would not prevent him from saying that such a course would be unjust If those who held annual leases trespassed beyond the bounds allotted them, they would subject themselves to prosecution Rangers were regularly appointed, whose duty it was to be constantly on the alert, and when complaints of trespass were made to them they immediately gathered evidence, and prosecuted the parties for an infraction of the regulations The law would always protect the farmer against the squatters, if the latter trespassed on the lands of the former

Mr HAWKER could not in justice to his constituents allow the remarks of the hon member for Gumeracha to pass unnoticed, because if the principle were to be adopted which the hon member proposed, it would be a gross breach of faith to the holders of leases

The hon member was proceeding, but was reminded by the CHAIRMAN that the subject alluded to was not before the House

The clause as amended was adopted

The second clause conferred power upon Justices to dispossess parties unlawfully occupying waste lands

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that it be passed as printed

Mr STRANGWAYS asked the Attorney-General a question in reference to the machinery by which it was proposed to give effect to this clause. It appeared to him that the machinery might be much more simple It appeared to him that by the wording of the clause the Justices were called upon to perform duties which were usually performed by constables or subordinate officers

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Justices had power to carry the clause into effect by issuing a warrant addressed to a constable That, he apprehended, would be the way, and indeed he believed that the Summary Procedure Act was quite clear upon that point, but he would look into the point, and if it were not quite clear he would make it so before the Bill was taken out of Committee

The clause was then agreed to

The third clause provided penalties for the unauthorized occupation and use of Crown lands For the first offence a sum not exceeding £10, for the second offence a sum not exceeding £20, nor less than £10, and for the third, not exceeding £50, nor less than £20

Mr SHANNON opposed this clause as being too severe upon the owners of cattle The penalties were far too high, and he should move either that the clause be struck out, or that the penalties be greatly modified It appeared to him that the clause as it at present stood actually conferred greater power upon the party who held a lease of land than if he were the actual owner

Mr HAWKER should support the clause as it stood, and perhaps had reasons for doing so which the hon member for the Light had not, for he was one of the victims to which the clause applied Hon members were not aware what detriment runs were subjected to by unlawful depasturage Some time last year his manager rode over a portion of his run, about three or four miles from the head station, and counted 400 or 500 head of cattle and 70 head of horses belonging to other parties, all within a radius of two miles and a-half In various other portions there were mobs of 50 or 60, and he believed that on his run, unassessed by the Government, and on a large portion of purchased land, there were on an average 800 or 1000 head of cattle, and from 100 to 150 horses The system adopted was for a party to buy half an acre of land at say a village called Clare, and he then thought he was entitled to run a herd of 50 or 60 cattle He could not do so in Clare, as it was all fenced in and the cattle were consequently driven to the centre of his (Mr Hawker's) run, and there turned out It was disagreeable to impound cattle, and he had never done so, particularly as he did not wish to interfere with the owners of sections who only grazed one or two cows, for although they certainly eat the grass for which he had to pay, he should be sorry to oppress any one He never meant to do so, but he denounced the systematic manner in which parties purchased cattle to turn out upon the run for which the squatter had to pay rent In the north so great had the annoyance become that many had been forced to impound, and although he had not yet done so, he felt that he should be driven to it. Some of the runs near the Burra had actually been taken out of the squatters hands No Bench of Magistrates would fine for a mere accidental trespass, but where men systematically turned out large herds of cattle upon runs for which the squatters had to pay he thought it right that the Magistrates should have considerable latitude allowed them, in such a case for instance as that which occurred, and which he could prove, when a stockman brought down 150 head of cattle upon his run, and dared him to impound them, stating that if he did he would oppose him in the purchase of land, and burn his run

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said this law had been in force ever since 1848, but it was omitted in the Waste Lands Act No new principle nor any new application of a principle had been introduced The clause was the same and the penalties were the same

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS thought the clause had not been introduced without strong warrant Complaints were constantly forwarded to his office, of the manner in which runs were encroached upon, and parties who had to pay rent for their leases were in consequence subjected to great loss and hardship A great many of the teamsters from a long way south went to the north runs and without permission turned their bullocks out for two or three months, to give them what they termed a "spell" About Mount Bryant and Mount Remarkable, a number of drays might be seen attended by people who were living very comfortably, whilst their cattle were depasturing upon other people's runs In many instances there were hundreds of head of cattle illegally depasturing upon lands for which the squatter had to pay rent That very day he had received a communication from the South-Eastern District in reference to the Impounding Act and the writer stated that there were upon his run 700 or 800 head of large cattle, belonging to people at Penola, for which no assessment was paid It would be observed that the penalties were not to exceed a certain sum, and it would be in very few cases that the maximum penalty would be inflicted, but there were some hardened offenders upon whom no act of kindness would make deviate from the system of trespassing upon their neighbours' runs (Divide, divide)

The clause was then agreed to

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the fourth clause stand as printed It gave the Governor power to make regulations affecting and defining the issue of depasturing, gold, timber, and mineral licences

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that it was necessary to introduce this clause, for although the Governor had power to issue licences, he had no power to alter the regulations

Mr HAY suggested before the Bill was taken out of Committee, that the Government should consider whether there were not some clauses which it would have been better to introduce in the Impounding Act, instead of the present Bill He particularly alluded to the clause relative to penalties upon stray cattle

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated that the Impounding Act dealt more with the charges which cattle were to pay when found trespassing, whilst the present Act had reference more to the manner in which the Waste Lands of the Crown should be managed He might also inform the hon member for Gumeracha, that the Government had no wish or desire to prevent him from having an opportunity of eliciting the fullest discussion upon the contingent notice of motion which he had placed upon the paper He regretted that the forms of the House would not permit it at once to be entertained but he would point out that the hon member would still have an opportunity of bringing it forward, as it was not intended to take the Bill out of Committee It would be necessary to add one clause to the Bill, the necessity for so doing having been pointed out by the Surveyor-General The seventh clause of the Lands Act passed last session merely divided the lands into town and country lots Suburban lots had been left out, but it was proposed to remedy this in the present Bill

The clause was agreed to and upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday next

NEW STANDING ORDERS

The ATTORNEY GENERAL moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the New Standing Orders be adopted

The TREASURER seconded the motion which was carried, and upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL it was resolved that the New Standing Orders adopted by the House be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief for confirmation

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the proposed joint Standing Orders for the two branches of the Legislature were directed to be transmitted to the Legislative Council, and the concurrence therein of that body requested

REGISTRATION BILL

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the amendment made in this Bill by the Legislative Council was agreed to, the hon gentleman expressing his obligations to the President of the Legislative Council for having pointed out to him the necessity which existed for the amendment A message was directed to be sent to the Legislative Council intimating the concurrence of the Assembly with the amendment

GAWLER TOWN RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved the second reading of the above Bill, remarking that there had been a long debate upon it, and that it had been referred to a Select Committee, who had unanimously adopted the report which had been placed before the House, The Committee had been very fairly chosen, representing all views upon the subject He hoped the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill, as any delay might stop the progress, the rapid progress, of this great public work

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS seconded the motion

Mr HAWKER supported the second reading of the Bill, remarking that he had moved the amendment referring it to a Select Committee, and, after hearing evidence, was decidedly of opinion that the House had compromised itself in going on, and that this line was the best that could have been chosen As representing the interests of the Gilbert line, he was of opinion that it would be a breach of faith not to proceed with this line It was was a judicious time to proceed with the work, for there was a large amount of labor available The Committee had taken evidence very carefully, and were unanimously of opinion that the House were bound to carry a railway to Kapunda, no matter which line were adopted

The Bill was then read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

Mr REYNOLDS asked if it were true that the Government had authorised the Commissioners to procure rails from England for the extension of the line?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was perfectly true The money had been provided by the Act of last session, and the rails had been ordered

The various clauses having been agreed to, the House resumed, and the report of the Committee was ordered to be taken into consideration on the following day

The House adjourned at 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after one o'clock

SELECT COMMITTEES

Mr BAGOT, addressing the Speaker, stated that there was a strong feeling on the part of many hon members in reference to the Standing Order which prevented Select Committees from sitting after the Speaker had taken the chair He wished to know how to bring the matter before the House, whether by an address to His Excellency or by motion

The SPEAKER said that the Standing Order which had been referred to was in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons, but when it was desirable that a Committee should sit, leave was applied for and granted to that particular Committee

CESSATION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr MILNE moved—

"That in consequence of the present surplus labor, which is being further supplemented by an overland immigration from Victoria, it is the opinion of this House that Government should immediately instruct the Emigration Agent, in London to discontinue sending any free emigrants from Britain for six months."

In bringing forward the motion he trusted that he should not lay himself open to the imputation of attempting to pander to a popular cry. He had two reasons for bringing this subject forward. One was because it undeniable that there was a large amount of redundant labor in the market, and the other was that he wished to give hon. members an opportunity of expressing their opinions with regard to the discontinuance of free immigration altogether. In looking back to the previous history of the colony he found that the system of immigration which had been adopted from its commencement was what was known as Wakefield's system; and up to the period at which the gold-fields were discovered, that system was eminently successful. So long as the neighbouring colonies were engaged in the same pursuits as ourselves, such as pastoral and agricultural pursuits, the system was all very well. There was until then, nothing to attract to neighbouring colonies the labour which we had imported. The money which had been expended up to that period in importing immigrants had been judiciously laid out, as it had the effect of developing the resources of the colony and adding to its permanent prosperity. But the discovery of the gold-fields changed the face of everything, and attracted from all parts of the colony the labour which we had imported from England. Up to that period Australia had attracted comparatively little attention, but now the whole civilised world, and a great deal of the uncivilised were attracted to the shores of this continent. Such being the case, it was found that in Victoria there was a great redundancy of labour. He had received information that there was a vast number out of employment there, and wages in the interior, in the farming districts, were lower even than they were in this colony. Victoria spent no money for immigration, and it consequently appeared to him to be throwing money away, for a small colony like this to attempt, by importing immigrants, to keep down the price of labor lower than that which prevailed in the neighbouring colonies. Taking the Australian colonies as a whole, he looked upon them as one market for labor. No inequality in the rate of wages could long exist, for as water would find its own level, so would labor gravitate to that part where it was best paid. The policy which they should pursue appeared to him to be to pay such a price for labor as would attract it to their shores, without endeavoring to keep labor low by importing it when it was redundant. He would not, however express his feelings upon that subject at present, although he should be happy if those who spoke upon the motion would express their opinions upon free imported labor. The motion did not pledge the House to any course in reference to the general question of immigration, but he had brought it forward for the purpose of meeting an acknowledged fact, that there was more labor than could be profitably employed. He objected to importing immigrants, because he had found, and his experience was no doubt consistent with that of other hon. members that free immigration engendered a strong feeling of pauperism. Men brought out at the expense of the Government looked to the Government for food and employment, as a matter of right. Upon any little difficulty arising they flew to the Government. He would not however enter into the general question, but would content himself by asking the House to assent to the motion.

Mr. McEllister seconded the motion with some degree of pain, as no man in the colony had assisted more men to come to the colony than he had. He felt however, now, that there were too many in the colony to get profitable employment, and he consequently thought it would be judicious to stop immigration for six months and perhaps for a longer period, in order that those who were here might find profitable employment. He was aware that there were plenty of sober, steady, able-bodied men who were unable to obtain employment, and under such circumstances he felt that it would be an act of injustice to bring men 16,000 miles to a country where they had neither a friend nor a home, and where there was not adequate employment for them.

Mr. Burford's feelings did not run counter to the resolution, but he thought that after the regulations which the House had passed last session the matter might be safely left to the Ministry. Those regulations were of such a character as gave the Ministry full power to withhold applications for a supply of labor, or increase it as circumstances arose. It would be betraying a want of confidence in the Ministry if the House were to endeavor from time to time to direct their movements by a specific resolution. Having done what they did last session, he thought it would be better to take it for granted that the Ministry would not under the circumstances at present send for more immigrants, but interdict them. If they were not to leave the question to the Ministry, he was at a loss to conceive what was the use of the regulations, which were so admirably contrived as to operate as a valve. The resolution was tantamount to expressing a fear that the Ministry were not alive to the emergency which existed. It was true, that at the present moment, and it was a circumstance to be deplored, that there was a surplus of labor, but circumstances in the colony were so changing that it was impossible to say how soon this state of things might alter, and this again shewed the wisdom of these regulations. In these colonies, he defied any one to calculate for a period of six months as to the probable state of the labor market. He believed that even since the motion had been tabled circumstances had arisen which considerably altered the aspect of affairs, and that vessels could not be got fast enough in Sydney and Victoria to take persons to Port Curtis. Everything tended to show that a strong current was setting in in that direction, and if so he apprehended that the overland immigration from Victoria, alluded to in the motion, would be done away with. He should be disposed to meet the motion with a negative, leaving the matter to the Ministry.

Mr. Solomon rose with the view of supporting the motion, and in doing so believed that those who supported the resolution would best consult the interests of the colony. It did not require men of very great foresight to see the necessity for this motion. Anyone who would take the trouble of walking down Hindley or any other of the principal streets of the city, would have an illustration sufficiently strong of the necessity for this resolution. Large numbers of men were walking about the city and various districts throughout the colony, who could not succeed in finding work. They were told in the public press that although there were large numbers walking about unable to obtain employment, yet the demand for a certain description of labor was actually greater than the supply. It was stated that a large number of agriculturists and agricultural laborers were required but could not be obtained. They had, however, within the last two or three days seen sufficient to show the fallacy of this opinion. They had seen advertisements in which a large number of persons offered themselves as agricultural laborers for little more than their bread, but could not obtain employment. The subject was not a new one to him. In fact he went further than the mover of the resolution, and contended that it would have been far better, infinitely better, for the colony if immigration at the expense of the colony had been discontinued six years ago. Had the money expended in immigration been kept in the colony for the purpose of carrying out public works, he believed that it would have attracted such a number of immigrants that the population would have been greater than at the present time. The hon. member (Mr. Burford) had stated that he had been compelled to discharge some of his own men, and he feared that was only one of the cases whose name was legion throughout the colony. What were men to do who were suddenly thrown on their own resources, and who were dependent upon their labor from day to day, and hour to hour, for the living of themselves and families. What was to be done to relieve this depression? The hon. member (Mr. Burford) had suggested that the matter should be left entirely in the hands of the Ministry, but although he had sufficient confidence in the Ministry to believe that in this instance they would act with judgment, and to the satisfaction of the country, that ought not to prohibit that House from giving those gentlemen a hint from time to time as to the proper course to be pursued. The attention of the House had been called by the hon. member, Mr. Burford, to the changeful state of things in the colonies, and it had been urged that there had even been a change since notice of the resolution had been given. He admitted it, and that a large number of men had proceeded from Victoria and Sydney to Moreton Bay, but that he thought was one of the strongest reasons which could be urged for withholding the public money for the purpose of assisting in bringing out immigrants who would most likely be induced to proceed to Port Curtis. It was not necessary to say more in support of the motion as hon. members had only to look to the state of the labor market in Adelaide and the various districts throughout the colony, to find convincing proofs of the distress which existed. A very large number of laborers were out of employment, and would it not be folly to send money out of the colony to add to that distress. It would be an insult to the common sense of the House to attempt to shew that sending money out of the colony for the purpose of importing immigrants could be of any advantage to the colony. He regretted that the time had come when he should be found putting his veto upon money being sent out of the colony for the purpose of immigration, but so long as the gold-fields of Victoria lasted, and the neighbouring colonies did not devote any of their revenue to the purposes of immigration, South Australia would only be acting upon the defensive by refusing money for the purpose of immigration. Let them trust to public works and a fair rate of wages for the purpose of attracting the necessary amount of labor from the neighboring colonies.

Mr. Strangways must oppose the resolution. The hon. member for the city had said that he considered it would be insulting the House to attempt to shew that it would be to the advantage of the colony to resist the motion but notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. member, he should insult the House by opposing the motion. The hon. member for Onkaparinga said, "in consequence of the present surplus labor," and if he understood that expression rightly, it meant that the labor which was offered was of the quality which was required, and that there was a superfluity, that the quantity offering was in fact greater than the demand. He denied that such was the case. Only a short time since an hon. member of that House, Mr. Dunn, stated that he employed several laborers principally for the purpose of affording them work, and the hon. member stated that although he occasionally met with a man worth more than he was receiving, he frequently met with five or six who were not worth one day's pay together. He believed if hon. members would enquire they would find that was the true state of the case. He believed that any good laborer willing to work could obtain a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. (No, no.) The simple cry of "no" did not affect the question. He believed, from what he had seen and heard, and what he had gathered from the employers of labor, that there was no superfluity of labor in the colony. Of the quality which was required, there was not more than sufficient for the demand. He admitted there might be some who were unable to obtain employment, but their labor was of a description which was not required, and they never ought to have come here. It had been said that there was no foresight required in considering this resolution, but he believed there was a very great amount of foresight required, because hon. members should remember that the resolution if adopted could not take effect for eight or nine months. Copies of the resolution would have to be transmitted to the home authorities, and they could not stop those emigrants whom the Emigration Agent had engaged to send out. Then again the Emigration Agent was in the habit of accepting emigrants for two or three months in advance, and he was sure that no hon. member would advocate a resolution which would make the Emigration Agent commit a gross breach of faith with the emigrants who had been selected. He had thus shown that if they passed the resolution it could not take effect for nine months, yet they were now called upon, merely upon the statement of an hon. member that there was a superfluity of labour—without the slightest evidence beyond that before them—to pass a resolution, to take effect in nine months, and which the hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon) had said required no foresight. With regard to the observations of the hon. member in reference to retaining the money in the colony for public works instead of devoting it to the purposes of immigration, he would remark that if the money had been kept here it would have been here now, for no public works could have been carried out except by the immigrants who had been sent out by the Emigration Commissioners by funds voted for that purpose. Not always, no public works, no improvements could have been effected, none of those which had in many matters placed the colony ahead of the neighboring colonies. But for immigration instead of the colony being able to keep pace with her wealthier neighbors, she would be found greatly behind hand. On the ground then that there was no evidence that there was a superfluity of labor and that it would be unwise that the Legislature should deal with the question without the fullest consideration, he should oppose the motion.

Mr. MILDRED felt it his duty to oppose the motion, but, before proceeding, he would refer to the observations of the hon. member, Mr. Burford, in reference to the regulations and the powers of the Government as regarded immigration. He believed that the House had decided that there should be one shipload of immigrants per month, so that the Government had not the powers which had been referred to by the hon. member. He believed, so far as the city was concerned, that there was a severe depression but it did not extend to the country districts. Carpenters, stonemasons, stonebreakers, timber cutters, and farm servants, still received the same rate of wages which they had been receiving for the last two years. He had many men whom he had employed for a considerable time, and the wages they had received had been stationary at 7s. a day. No doubt those residing in the country districts were in possession of many facts which did not come under the observation of residents in the city. There had been no reduction in the price of sheep shearing, nor had there been any reduction in the wages of those engaged in mining operations. These facts shewed that there was sufficient employment for the particular description of labor required by the colony. From unfortunate circumstances there was a large amount of labor in the colony not adapted to its wants, and the consequence was that some little inconvenience was felt. The inconvenience which was felt might in some measure be attributed to the partial failure in the wool and wheat crops, and consequently persons had not quite so much money to spend; but he believed the depression was temporary, and that the croaking, which was confined to the city, would soon subside. He believed the difficulty would be met by the additional sums which had been devoted to public works. It was exhibiting actual cowardice to say that there was pauperism. So far from this being the case he believed that South Australia was in as good a state as ever, and that the solvency of the colony stood as high as ever. It was merely a momentary depression which had caused this difficulty, and he believed the sun of prosperity would soon shine over them again, and that they would rather require an increase than a decrease of labor.

Mr. BAGOT said, with regard to the redundancy of labor in the colony, and of the number who might be usefully employed in public works and country works, he could not perhaps do better than refer to the evidence of the Chief Engineer, given before a Select Committee, upon the Gawler Town Extension Railway Bill. Mr. Hanson, in his evidence, stated that he found no difficulty in obtaining men, and that he believed he could get 500 at 5s. a day. Mr. Hanson was so well acquainted with the labor market that it appeared to him more force should attach to his statement than to that of the hon. member for Noarlunga. He had heard that in the country men were wandering about unable to obtain employment, and he considered there was sufficient before the House to show that there was a redundancy of labour here. He was not prepared to say that such a resolution as that proposed would have a great effect at the present moment, but he thought the strongest argument against free immigration would be that they would probably be importing immigrants to be drained away to another gold-field. Until it was absolutely known whether Port Curtis was such a gold-field as there was every probability of it proving it would be the height of folly to bring out immigrants who would leave the sides of the ships in which they were brought and proceed to another colony. If during the gold fever in Victoria, instead of devoting half a million of money to the purposes of emigration they had kept it in the Treasury, the colony would, he believed, have been in a better condition than at present. On these grounds he should vote for the motion, but he thought there might be some modifications, such as fixing, perhaps, the months during which ships should be sent out, because so far from regretting, he was rather glad at being able to state that he believed the time was fast coming when it would be no longer necessary to introduce free immigration. It would be a proud position when they could say that free immigration was no longer necessary, but that the colony was sufficiently attractive to induce a better class of immigrants than could ever be procured by a system of free immigration. The man who paid his own passage was most likely to stick to the colony. He did not wish to lower the rate of wages; on the contrary, he thought it desirable that they should adopt as high a rate as possible compared with the neighboring colonies. Every shilling which was given to the working man was expended in the colony, and if the working man had anything to spare, he probably expended it on land, which, when cultivated increased the resources of the colony, and made him a fixture to the soil. He was the last, he hoped, to be led away by any ad captandum arguments, but when he found Mr. Hanson stating that he could employ 500 men at 5s. a day, he could not but support a motion of this kind, and he hoped the time would soon come when he should support a more extended motion than the present, and they should discontinue free immigration altogether.

Captain HART said that if the argument last brought forward by the previous speaker were brought before the House in a proper manner he should probably be found supporting it. If a resolution to that effect were before the House he thought it very probable, after having given it due consideration, that he should support it, but let those parties who would be affected by such a resolution be afforded an opportunity of coming before the House, by petition, to show how far their vested interests had suffered, and whether in selling the land the Government had in fact not entered into certain contracts connected with immigration. He repeated that if such a proposition were before the House, he should most likely support it. He need not tell many hon. members that he had been always opposed to the expenditure of large sums of money upon immigration. He had always considered the money voted for that purpose injudiciously expended. He opposed the proposition of Sir Henry Young to borrow 500,000*l.*, and expend one-half that amount upon immigration. He had consistently opposed the views of Sir Henry Young and others who were in favor of bringing a large number of immigrants to our shores. But he objected to the present motion for this reason, that it proposed to meet an emergency of the present moment, by doing that which could not have effect for eight or nine months. The motion at the present time would be of no value. If they were to take particular times and seasons, when labor was abundant, and argue upon the whole question, from what appeared upon the surface, they would would probably arrive at a very erroneous conclusion. Independently of the monetary crisis, this was a particular period when labor was most abundant, and there was less employment than at other periods of the year. It could not be said that labor was reduced to a lower rate than it ought to be, for at that moment he was paying laborers in his mill 8s. per day, and it was not skilled labor. He believed, although there were a great many unemployed at the Port, the rate of remuneration had not been reduced, but there was not that amount of employment which there usually was. What was the proper course to pursue under such circumstances? Was it to pass a resolution which could not take effect for eight or nine months? No, let them vote sums of money for public works, and instruct the Ministry to employ it in affording employment to this particular class. He should like to see the case met in that way. He should be very glad to have the whole question of immigration brought before the House, but he believed the House should affirm that it was not expedient, when the other Australian colonies were not employing any portion of their funds in the introduction of immigrants, for South Australia to spend money for such a purpose. He objected to the question being brought forward in the present shape; he objected to that description of legislation which seized particular times and seasons, and said that a system should be altered, because at that particular moment it did not answer. He hoped the hon. mover would withdraw his motion, and he should be quite prepared when the Estimates came on to enter upon the whole question of immigration. He believed that after due consideration they might sweep off a considerable sum for the Estimates for 1859 proposed to be devoted to immigration.

but he objected to the motion in its present shape, as by carrying a resolution of this kind they would be doing injustice to those who should be heard upon the subject, for, there were others besides laborers who were interested in the question. The matter was not put fairly, but there was no doubt much force in the argument, that if immigrants were brought out most of them would go to Port Curtis. Those who were brought out at the public expense, were generally those who could not get employment at home, the worst class were sent here. There were no doubt a great many out of employment, but most of them were of a class who should never have been sent to the colony. He trusted the hon. mover would withdraw the motion, with the view of again bringing it forward when the Estimates were brought forward, in such a shape as would prevent them from sending home any sums for the purposes of immigration for 1859. When he (Captain Hart) sat upon the Treasury benches, he reduced the sum proposed to be devoted to immigration by the sum of 20,000*l.*, and no doubt a still further reduction would be made in the Estimates of 1859.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would, with the last speaker, join in the hope that the hon. member for Onkaparinga would withdraw his motion. The passing of such a resolution would have a bad effect in giving rise to a degree of uneasiness in England with respect to the state of this colony which was quite unjustifiable. The uselessness of the motion had been very forcibly put by the hon. member for Encounter Bay, Mr Strangways, and by the hon. member for the Port, Mr Hart. No instructions that could be sent home at once to countermand emigration could possibly make any alteration in the state of the labor market for seven months to come. It must be recollected that under the former system of nomination large numbers of orders had been sent home, a great proportion of which were, by last advices, unexecuted, and however undesirable that system of introducing labor had been, still they were bound to keep faith with the holders of such orders. The hon. member for the Burra, Mr McEllister, advocated the stoppage of immigration entirely, but he would ask them who it was that on a former occasion carried out by his advocacy the system which was now complained of. He did not mean to say that those nominated immigrants did not include a useful class of persons, but as a whole they had not been suitable. Since the 1st January a new and better system had commenced, and just at its introduction the hon. member came forward and said "stop immigration." Certainly the argument would have come with more force from any other hon. member than from the hon. member for Burra and Clare. If the proposed restriction were placed upon immigration, it could not in any way affect the state of labor for seven months to come. That being the case he hoped the hon. member would see fit to withdraw his motion, and leave the House to take such action upon the question as was necessary, when the amount for immigration came before them on the Estimates. It must be remembered in respect to labor that the circumstances of a country might greatly change. It was so in this colony. There was such an elasticity in the state of the labor market that what might be superabundant this month might be changed into a dearth the next. With respect to assisted immigration, it was of use if it could be carried on under proper regulations, and if that House voted money under such regulations and restrictions, he had no doubt of the money being well spent. He hoped they would not allow their minds to be prejudiced by any cry of the dearth of employment, and the distress which it was asserted existed in the colony, nor warped either by any long list of names published in the papers of parties out of employment, but view the subject calmly and considerately. As he did not see any good effect to be derived from the motion before the House, he hoped the hon. mover would withdraw it.

Mr HAWKER agreed with the remarks made by the Hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands. He thought it was not a fair test to judge only of the present state of the labor market. As a large employer of labor, he would give his opinion, and he found it highly necessary to have a surplus of labor in the months of July, August, and September, to meet the requirements of the succeeding three months in the hay-harvesting, sheep-shearing, and other avocations. He would ask them how they were to meet their demands for labor then without some reserve to fall back upon. He confessed he was sorry to hear of the dearth of employment which existed in the town, but, notwithstanding what had been said to the contrary he could assure them it was also the case in the country. (Hear, hear.) In fact, such a number of persons were out of employment in the country districts that it was quite a tax upon the sheepfarmer on account of the free and liberal manner in which they treated them. He would mention a case in point. The expenses of his station had been so increased latterly by persons calling and asking for a night's lodging that his overseer had deemed it prudent to ask what he should do in the matter. His overseer had told him the last time he was in the north that he had housed and fed no less than 80 men in one week. (Laughter.) He would ask them if this was not a tax upon the sheepfarmer. (Great laughter.) The distress was as prevalent in the country as in the town, but at the same time he could not agree with the motion of the hon. member for Onkaparinga. There were many demands which would shortly arise to absorb this surplus labor. There was the vote which had just been passed by that House for the construction of the roads, and there were the demands for labor which would shortly occur in the country districts for agricultural purposes; in fact he was of opinion that they would shortly have greater difficulty in obtaining labor than was at present imagined. He agreed with the intent of the motion of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, but he did not agree in its efficiency. One way in which they might meet the question would be, he thought, in a recommendation being sent home to the Immigration Agent to give the preference to single instead of married people. There was a great dearth at present of this description of labor, and if he wished to employ a domestic servant, he did not want to have seven children into the bargain. (Laughter.) Instead of sending out large numbers of married couples, favorable consideration should be given to single men and single women. At the present time the difficulty with him was, that if he wanted a man to do some work on his station, he had to employ one man, one woman, and seven or eight children. (Great laughter.) He admitted they could get abundance of labor if they could put up with the children. (Laughter.) But that was not the description of labor that was required, and therefore he thought the recommendation he had spoken of would act beneficially. He should be sorry to see Immigration stopped, and would therefore oppose the motion in its present form.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that so much had been said already—so much that might have been urged by himself—that his remarks would be brief. Previous speakers had referred to the present state of the labor market as a town question, but he viewed it as a South Australian question. And as a question involving the whole interests of the colony he thought it would be proper that both branches of the Legislature should have a voice in the matter. Emigration had done great good for the colony. What would have been the state of the colony during the exodus which succeeded the discovery of the gold-fields if emigration had not been carried on during previous years? The Burra Mine, which found employment now for 1,000 men, would have stopped work, and out of the stoppage of a concern furnishing such a large addition to our exports, nothing but disaster could have succeeded to the colony. As an importer of goods he would ask any hon. gentleman whether, because there was a superabundance of cornsacks in the market, they would refrain from sending orders for any more. And so with respect to immigration, he thought they should hesitate before they stopped it completely. They must weigh well the vote when it came before them for consideration on the Estimates of 1859, and treat the matter calmly. Nothing had been more clearly shown by the previous speakers than that if the resolution which was now brought forward were passed it would only take effect some eight months hence. There was always a dull period in the year in South Australia, but the alteration of the financial year, and the vote of the House in furtherance of public works, would have the effect of relieving the labor market. He still thought statements as to the number of the unemployed were liable to be exaggerated. He was inclined to dispute the assertion made by the Engineer of the railway, that 500 men could be employed at once, at 5s. per day. But, admitting that this might be the case, and that the circumstances of the labor market were such that 500 men could be employed at 5s. per day, he would not vote for the present motion. The hay harvest was coming on, the sheep shearing time was approaching, and that, together with the vote to the Central Road Board, would give immediate employment to those in search of it. He hoped the House would support the Government in their view of the case. Nothing, he admitted, could be more ill advised than a rash system of immigration unless it were stopping immigration altogether. (Hear, hear.) The new regulations with respect to immigration would enable them to expend the money more judiciously, but if they stopped immigration they would be striking at the vital interests of South Australia. For his own part, he would be quite prepared, when the vote came on for consideration, to explain his views upon it, but he would not pledge himself at that moment to any direct course of action. He could not say whether it would be one ship or two ships per month.

Mr PEAKE opposed the motion, because it was a highly spasmodic course of legislation. If the House were to jump from one conclusion to another, if a vote was to be passed to the Central Road Board one day especially for the employment of labor, and the next day it was to be counteracted, if this was the way in which they were to oscillate from one point to another, nothing but catastrophe and ruin to the colony could ensue. The result of stopping immigration would be, he was afraid, that of throwing the distress off one class on to another. The distress would first fall upon the employer of labor, and if they embarrassed the employer by such unsteady action as this, by such a mode of tampering with their interests the result would be as he had predicted. He was hoping that some one of the hon. gentlemen who had supported the motion, would have said something to explain to the House the probable result of the stoppage of immigration. Nothing however had been said. In his opinion the difficulty would be increased tenfold. At the present moment they could not get good men under 7s. per day. What would be the effect upon their agricultural pursuits in the event of the stoppage of immigration? Why, that the corn would drop from the ears (No, no) It had happened, and would happen again This was a question for the most serious investigation It was a ticklish matter and one which the greatest politicians treated with deliberation He would call their attention to what he thought was a grave mistake, that the farmer should at the present moment be compelled to give more than the price of a bushel of wheat for a day s labor, and for 20 days' labor an acre of wheat With respect to the female immigration, of which there was an excess, some time ago, he might ask what had become of it? Why the Executive had taken action, and the girls had been drafted away into the country, and by this time, no doubt, had become happy mothers (Laughter) Domestic servants were, even at the present moment, scarce He hoped the House would not pledge itself to such an ill-advised step It was well known that the sheepfarmers had latterly suffered extreme loss, to the amount of perhaps, £150,000 It was well known too that agricultural produce had fallen in a greater proportion than had labor and yet they were told of the surplus of labor He denied that there was any surplus of labor when their fields were not half cultivated He must oppose the motion

Mr DUNN having employed labor to a considerable extent, had some knowledge of the subject, while many hon gentlemen who had spoken did so only perhaps from hearsay He knew there were a great many families with scarcely bread to eat, but skilled laborers were not so plentiful He had spoken previously of men whom he employed not being worth 3s per day, while he was giving to others as much as 14s per day To relate a circumstance from his own experience Some time ago he divided a job which he had to do in the country into sixteen lots, and, to give employment to a number of men present, he made a Dutch auction of it Some of the men spurned the job, but he could assure them that the men who took it earned 17s 9d per day In another case, when he had some earth-work to do out of town—amounting to about £70 worth—the work was set down at something like 3s per cubic yard, and the men who took the job made something like 9s per day When he paid them off he said to one of them—a coal miner—that he supposed he would not get so good a job again for some time to come The answer the man made was that he did expect to get employment very soon, that the last year was not a thriving one, but that he had managed nevertheless, to save £40, and he hoped to do better this year Really industrious labouring men were not superabundant

Mr TOWNSEND was satisfied that if they advertised for laborers, whether carpenters, bricklayers, or any other tradesmen, they would get them, that with just one solitary advertisement they would have them before they got into their place of business in the morning With respect to what had been said by the hon member for Noarlunga, as to there being no superabundance of labour in the country, he knew twenty men at that moment out of the town who could not get employment In fact, he believed labour in the country was far more superabundant than in the town It had been said there was no evidence as to the distress, but he asked them was there not sufficient evidence before the House? It had been said that the stoppage of immigration would produce no effect for nine months to come, but he believed that in nine months time they would find the people going away as fast as they did now He thought if the vast sums which had been sunk on immigration had been devoted to public works it would have had a far more beneficial effect The hon member for Noarlunga had said if the money were kept here they could not have used it, but he disputed this They had spoken of 7s per day as rather high wages, but he did not think it at all a large sum The effect of immigration at the present moment would be that of bringing down the poor man's capital He believed if the money spent during the last six years had been devoted to public works they would have had a sufficient voluntary immigration, and it would have been composed of a better class He would ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether a great percentage of the labor which was daily arriving did not go away to the other colonies almost immediately after, and he considered that all attempts to meet this state of things by legislative enactment would be inoperative The hon member for Encounter Bay had stated that every man could get a fair day s work, but the string of names of persons out of employment contradicted this He would not attempt to legislate because there happened to be a cry here or there, or because a meeting of the unemployed happened to be held on the Park Lands He supported the motion on a stronger basis

The House then divided, and the following is the result of the division –

AYES, 9—Messrs Solomon (teller), Milne, Townsend, Harvey, McEllister, Bagot, Shannon, Hay, and Rogers

NOES, 20—The Hon Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Hon Commissioner of Public Works, the Hon the Attorney-General, the Hon the Treasurer, Messrs Burford, Bakewell, Duffield, Reynolds, Strangways, MacDermott, Dunn Mildred Hallet, Peake, Glyde, Barrow, Wark, Cole, Lindsay, and Young

There was a majority accordingly of 11 in favor of the noes

THE POSTAL SERVICE

Mr PEAKE moved, pursuant to notice, "That, in the opinion of this House, it would be to the advantage of this colony were overtures made by the Government to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company with a view to induce that Company to reopen the steam postal service between the Australian colonies and Europe" It would be in the recollection of hon members the troubles and anxieties which they suffered during the last session in getting their letters from home The present postal arrangements arose out of a contract which was entered into on the 5th July last It was ultimately agreed to give the company performing the service a subsidy of 12,000*l* They were now not in any better position than they were formerly He remembered some four or five years ago, the pleasure he derived from seeing the efficient manner in which the Peninsular and Oriental Company performed the service elsewhere That Company was a well organized one and he doubted not but that it would take very little to induce them to open up a mail communication with this colony It had the power and the means, and no doubt would have the will also If this colony did not move in the matter, they would certainly be left in the background Sydney had voted already 50,000*l* They could not expect to participate in that, neither could they expect any favor from Victoria All they wanted at present was that the Attorney-General should place—and he was well able to do it—the matter in as favorable a light as possible (Hear, hear)

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion He understood the object of the mover was to induce the Government to make enquiries as to the expediency or probable cost The motion, however, authorised the Government to make overtures He supposed, of course, it was only a preliminary thing, and with that view of the case he supported it He (Mr Strangways) had travelled from Adelaide to Southampton by overland route, and he had no hesitation in saying that the route via Point de Galle homewards, and Singapore outwards were the most expeditious In a renewal of the mail service the colony would have to act entirely alone The neighbouring colonies had manifested a total indifference to their interests He thought the Peninsular and Oriental Company would be able to give a monthly mail to them in less time than at present, and at a less cost than hon members might imagine The following were the distances on the overland route —From Suez to Aden 1,308 miles, from Aden to Galle, 2,137, from Galle to Melbourne, 4,714 miles making a total of 8,159 He seconded the motion on the understanding that the Government were only to apply to the Company for the information required, without entering into anything definite

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL cordially supported the object of the motion He need not say that the Government had not failed to avail themselves of every opportunity in urging upon the Home Government the necessity of the steamers calling at Kangaroo Island on their outward and homeward trips As to the present motion, he would say that in whatever way the Government might be able to induce a Company to enter into a contract that would be beneficial to the colony, they would do so, so long as the financial state of the colony rendered it advisable

The motion was carried, with an amendment of the Attorney-General's, empowering the Government to ascertain on what terms the Company would perform the service

RETURNS

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid on the table of the House a return, moved for on the 3rd of September, of the unsold lands within 15 miles of the proposed lines of railway

KAPUNDA RAILWAY

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved the report of the Committee of the whole House on the Kapunda Railway Bill be adopted, and that the third reading be an Order of the Day for to-morrow

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the Bill intituled "a Bill for the Assessment of Stock" be read a second time He would state that, although his opinion was decided as to the justice and expediency of such a measure, and although he would be prepared as a member of the Government to take the responsibility of voting for the second reading of the Bill at once, should the feeling of the House be that they had not sufficient information on the subject, he should not object to its being referred to a Select Committee The object of the Bill was to compel the class of stockowners or squatters, who occupied all but an insignificant fraction of the land in the colony, and derived a large proportion of income from the waste lands, to contribute equitably in proportion to the advantages they derived to the revenue of the colony It had been felt and expressed not only in that House but out of doors that at the present time and under present arrangements, they did not contribute a fair and equitable proportion towards the expenses of the colony, and that would be evident when it was stated that the occupiers of many millions of acres only paid at the rate of little more than 10s a square mile rent for land so occupied He might give that area at 24,000 square miles, or about 15,000,000 acres The manner in which it was proposed to carry out the provisions of the Act, would be by an assessment on sheep and cattle, moderate in amount, and under such exceptions as it was expedient to adopt There were exceptions made in the Bill on purchased land held by individuals within the run, exceptions in respect to depasturing within the runs, and in favor of leases not granted for more than a limited time, because on the first taking up of a run there were certain expenses connected with it that rendered it fair that those who occupied it should occupy it for a certain time without assessment of stock Subject to those exceptions, it was proposed to impose a tax on sheep of two-pence per head, and on cattle of one shilling per head, and on horses of 2s 6d. per head He need not have said more had he not understood that some exception would be taken to that motion, on the ground either of the want of power on the part of the Legislature to pass the Act then proposed, or that it would be an act of bad faith on the part of the Government to do it. He would say one or two words on the subject With regard to the first he must say that the assumption of the illegality of a measure of that kind, founded as it was on the hypothesis that an Order in Council might have the power of limiting the authority of the Legislature of the colony, that it was equally binding as an Act of the Imperial Parliament, was too monstrous to be entertained for a moment. He believed no person who had looked into the question would venture on the grounds of illegality to think that that Legislature had no legal right to pass such an Act Whether it was morally right or not was a different question He only referred to the legal question as being a necessary power of that House to take proceedings in the matter It had been stated that were the House to pass that Act, parties interested would be prepared to test the power of that House in the Supreme Court He would not wish that any one should be so ill advised as take a step of that nature On the other matter he would say that if there was any person occupying the waste lands of the Crown who could come forward and say, "I took the lease of the land, agreeing to pay 10s per square mile for the liberty of depasturing my cattle, and on the faith that the Legislature of the country were never to impose an assessment on me except for local purposes" that individual would have a claim for consideration But he (the Attorney-General) would say to hon members that from the first moment those leases were conferred upon those persons to the present time, the obtaining of those leases was a great pecuniary advantage to them He would, therefore, reply that if any person could say that he would not have taken the lease of his run except on the faith of that condition, that individual should be taken into special consideration, but he thought they would have to wait a long time before such a one appeared He would then only refer to the ground of justice to the country On that he thought no two opinions existed He would have an opportunity in the course of the debate of saying more if it were necessary, and he would therefore simply move the second reading of the Bill, repeating at the same time that if the feeling of the House were in favor of its being referred to a Select Committee, the Government would not object to it

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS rose to second the motion of the Attorney-General The measure he considered was moderate in the demands which it was proposed to make on the squatters, it was liberal in its provisions with regard to that class who were affected by it, and simple in its machinery He thought it a very proper time to introduce the measure, as the pastoral interests were not quite so flourishing as they were a year or two ago The House could therefore consider calmly the benefits which the occupiers of the waste lands had derived from their leases and how far they were fairly entitled to be called upon to contribute to the burdens and requirements of the country Neither would the House be led away, as it was possible they might have been, had the measure been introduced at a time when the pastoral interests were in a more affluent state The provisions of the Bill, were so moderate and reasonable in character, that he did not apprehend that the House would do otherwise than sanction the introduction and confirm the measure introduced by the Attorney-General If the leases of the waste lands of the Crown had terminated by efflux of time, as they will do in five or six years, there might have been some argument for imposing no assessment, because then the Government would have an opportunity of deriving that revenue from them to which the country was fairly entitled and which it did not receive He considered that the Attorney-General had fully stated to the House the perfect legality of the measure proposed, and he, being assured of that legality, had no hesitation in giving that measure his support, because he considered that the occupiers of the waste lands had never contributed to the revenue of the country in proportion to the benefits they derived from them Nothing he was now asserting contradicted what he had on previous occasions stated with reference to the pastoral interests He had always considered that interest one of the most important in the colony, and the course he now took was in accordance with his formerly expressed opinions The country was entitled to the additional value which would be given to the waste lands by an assessment The Bill was simple in its machinery In other colonies similar measures had been introduced but they had failed in consequence of their details rendering them unworkable From that Bill the House would find those clumsy details had been excluded He would now refer to the tax proposed to be imposed It was usual in Bills of that nature to leave the amounts blank, in order that they might be filled up by the House But in that case the Government gave a proof that they had fairly considered the point as to how much should be contributed by stating those amounts in the first clause He trusted the House would not attempt to make any alteration, because the rates fixed gave a fair income from the waste lands and would not be found oppressive on the stockholders As the House might, perhaps, like to be made acquainted with some of the details of the amounts likely to be derived from the assessment, he would say it would probably produce a net revenue of £20 000 a year They had not any reliable statistics of the stock depasturing on the waste lands, for the stockholders had never been required to furnish returns of that nature, and consequently those calculations could only be based on uncertain data The Chief Inspector of Sheep being considered most likely to give correct information, had supplied particulars which would be found in his last annual report The number of sheep he estimated at 2,075 800, which, at 2d per head, would give £17,298 Cattle, 310,400, at 1s per head, £15,500, and 26,000 horses, at 2s 6d per head, £3,250 The gross amount of assessment in round numbers would be £36,000 From that amount would have to be deducted certain sums as specified in subsequent clauses It was proposed not to assess any stock within the limits of District Councils and Hundreds, paying the depasturing fee, but stock depastured within Hundreds under annual leases will be taxed (Hear, from Mr Hawker) The stock within the limits of the District Councils was estimated at 16,800 horses, at 2s 6d , 2 100*l* , 90,000 cattle, at 1s , 4,500*l* , and 85,000 sheep, at 2d , 708*l* , amounting to 7,300*l* , and of stock within hundreds, 31,823 cattle, at 1s , would amount in round numbers to 1,500*l* The exemption from assessment by way of remission for land purchased, would probably amount to 600*l* To this must be added the deduction for runs not of three years date, amounting to 10,300 square miles, and the stock on which would produce about £6,000 a year assessment, and he thought that it was not over estimated, and the total figures would amount to 15,000*l* , which would have to be deducted from 36,000*l* , and would give a net income of 20 000*l* to 21,000*l* The way in which it was proposed to arrive at the quantity of stock for assessment, was by means stated in a schedule to the Bill The Government had to rely in a great measure on the good faith of the settlers in filling up that schedule, for it was not only impossible to classify the grazing capabilities of different runs, but it would cause an excessive expenditure of money, and require a numerous staff of officials It was therefore required that the squatters should fill up a form prescribed by the schedule under a penalty, and certified by a magistrate He had no doubt, were the Bill passed by the House, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the revenue he had indicated Hon members would see plainly that the Bill contained very few clauses In fact, the machinery of the Bill was so simple and easily worked, that he had no doubt it would meet the approval of the House Having shewn the probable amount which the assessment would produce, and indicated the liberal provision by which the Government met the cases of the squatters themselves, he would second the motion that the Bill be now read a second time

Mr HAWKER said it was not his intention to go into the subject so quickly had it not been for what the Attorney-General and the Commissioner of Crown Lands had said in introducing the Bill, but in justice to his constituents he could not sit down and hear such a proposition brought before the House, for he considered it a great injustice to the class whom he represented He meant to meet the Bill ad limine, and hoped the House would bear him out in the assertion that the Ministry had no right to introduce that Bill He would base his argument on the Orders in Council, the correspondence on which they were based, and the leases themselves (laughter), and if he could shew that those leases were granted with a certain intention, he trusted the House would bear out the spirit of that intention, whether for or against the Bill He would not believe that 36 members would go in favor of an unjust principle, and that after a lapse of seven to eight years He asked the forbearance and patience of the House, because out of 36 members he was the only squatter—the only member dependent upon squatting, he had been elected by a squatting community, and therefore trusted he might trespass on the time of the House He would first call attention to the despatch of Sir Henry Young, dated 23rd February, 1845 Had the assessment of stock been now mooted for the first time, he quite agreed with the Government it would be a fair and moderate assessment, but the squatters were originally assessed, and that assessment had been changed into a rent Now, the point for consideration was had the House a right, after changing the assessment to a rent, to repudiate the agreement made with the squatters, and to put on a new rent He believed that the House would bear him out that the squatters ought not to succumb to that If the assessment were only one farthing per head, he would object to it on principle Personally he would not have taken the trouble, but he represented a district stretching from the Murray to the Glenelg, and he must stand forward and resist to the last gasp that attempt to put on an assessment He must do his duty to his constituents Hon members were no doubt aware that originally there was an assessment on stock of one penny per head One of our most intelligent Governors (Sir George Grey) considered the opening up of the country of such importance to the colony that it would be beneficial to it had the squatters occupied their runs without any rent whatever He (Mr Hawker) did not ask that, but having put a value on the land before the discovering of the gold, the Government having leased those lands at their own valuation, he did not see that it was right now to put an extra rent upon them He did not sue in forma pauperis nor ask concessions or favor, all he wanted was justice In 1851 a valuation was made of the runs by the Government There were three classes The first was 10s a square mile, the second 15s a square mile, and the third 20s per square mile Some appeals were made against the valuations, and the runs were then put according to the value. He was one who appealed against the value put on his brother's run He found the run charged 15s a square mile, and knowing that a large portion of it was not available for feeding stock, he appealed and the Government sent Mr Bonney, who, with his (Mr Hawker's) valuer, Mr Charles Campbell, agreed that there was a fair claim for reduction, and the rent was reduced to 10s a square mile He gave that instance to shew that there was a full intention on the part of the Government to grant leases at those rates The hon member for Sturt (Mr Hallett) also appealed, but he was not successful, for it was decided that he was not over assessed He would now refer to Sir Henry Young's despatch dated 23rd February, 1849, in which he says, "when the Imperial Act comes into operation, the waste lands will be held on lease, and as runs will be superseded there will be no assessment except for purposes of local revenue" No doubt he took a very correct view For if the local Legislature imposed an assessment it would be a double payment on the part of the occupants He believed no local Legislature would attempt to do that, and the House were bound to answer the purposes for which those leases were given, and to carry out their spirit He would pass on to No 9 In that Sir Henry took a broad view of the nature of the change, which contrasted widely with the narrow view of the present Ministry (The hon member read some long extracts in proof of his statement) He believed Ministers had been actuated by what they believed a popular cry out of doors in bringing forward the measure He (Mr Hawker) did not consider there was any pressure out of doors on the subject. He would now refer to Lord Grey's despatch founded on Sir Henry Young's, and though leases were taken under Orders in Council, no Order in Council meant one thing and expressed another Lord Grey wrote, "I readily adopt the opinion arrived at on the subject by yourself and the various high authorities whom you have consulted An Order in Council has given effect to their recommendations" Now whose recommendation was it? It was Mr Charles Bonney's, in proof of which he begged permission to read an extract from his speech (The extract was read at considerable length) These were the sentiments of a gentleman on whose suggestions the whole regulations were framed by the Government at Home If the House believed what Mr Bonney said, it was bound to carry it out, and if they passed the Bill, it would give to Mr Bonney the lie direct He would now go back to Sir Henry Young's despatch No 9 (A long extract was read) That having been drawn out by Mr Bonney at the request of the Government, it was a gross injustice and a legal quibble on the part of the Attorney-General to introduce that Bill contrary to the spirit and letter of those instructions It was said that there was no Bill brought into the Parliament at home through which a coach and six horses could not be driven He believed it was the same here, but he hoped the House would not be deluded by the legal quibbles of the Attorney-General, but despise them, for he was convinced that he did not approve of the principles of the Bill, but felt himself bound to carry out and support the Ministerial views (Great laughter) With regard to the 5th clause of the Orders in Council—the legal one—which was, "Nothing in that Order should be construed in any way to interfere with the right of the Colonial Legislature to impose such assessments as might be deemed advisable for local purposes"—Sir Henry Young thought it impracticable for any Legislature to legalize the power to put on an assessment for local revenue He begged consideration to the fact that the clause was not for local revenue, but for "local purposes" He (Mr Hawker) denied the assertion that squatters were not paying their fair share of taxation, for so long as taxation was indirect, they paid their share Sir Henry Young's dispatch, combined with the Order in Council, was quite sufficient to prove the intention of the Legislature of that time, and the present Legislature were bound to carry out that intention Clause 5 of chapter 3 would not prevent assessment for local purposes. Take any district in which there were squatters and where there might be a Road Board It was perfectly fair to assess them for local purposes, and it was evident that that was the spirit of the regulations, that the Government leased to the squatters a certain amount of land at a certain rent, and had no intention to alter that rent for 14 years and the only way they could put an addition to it was for local purposes He now came to another point, though in going against the hon the Attorney-General he felt that he was like a mole against a mountain (Laughter) He asked why was the lease for 14 years different from the lease for one year Why was the land in the hundreds to be excepted if the tax was for general revenue, and general revenue only The leases were different, although the stock ran in both cases on the Crown lands The land held under the annual leases must in a short time come under the District Councils. He did not think he could bring forward a stronger argument than be car for the intention of the Legislature in 1851 should be carried out by the Legislature in 1858 (Hear, hear) He did think hon members would perpetrate an act of injustice, and he would therefore lay the matter confidently before the House, and even before the hon member for the city, whose opinions were known to be strong on the subject The last attempt at Imperial taxation in the colonies for Imperial purposes lost England one of her finest colonies, the United States of America (No, no) When the tax was put upon the tea in Boston Harbor, he believed it lost the American colonies to England He believed that was the last specimen of colonial taxation for Imperial purposes The hon the Attorney-General spoke of the income to be derived from this source, but that was begging the question What right had the Government to say now that the land was leased for less than its present value The fact was, the Government leased the land to the squatters when many hon members present would not take the land as a gift, and it was unfair now to put on an assessment for the purpose, as hon members called it out of doors, of equalising taxation He could not understand what was meant by this equalising of taxation, as long as we had our revenue raised by indirect taxation on consumable articles, the squatter must pay his share of it The House had no right to go into the question of whether the runs paid their value or less than their value, but the question for them was "do the squatters pay in indirect taxation their share or not?" and he thought it would be very difficult to prove that they did not He (Mr Hawker) ought to be a judge, employing as he did from 60 to 100 individuals every year, and he found that he was paying for the taxable articles such as tea and sugar, which these people consumed, for the burthen fell not upon the consumers but upon their employers Upon this point he joined issue with the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands There was no wish on the part of the squatters to evade taxation If the revenue was not sufficient, they were prepared to pay further taxation provided it were of an equitable kind Look at the gentlemen who had made their fortunes in Hindley-street and Rundle-street, and who spent their money in riotous living at home (Loud laughter) These were men who should be taxed—the absentees, and if the hon the Attorney-General brought in a Bill imposing a fair tax, he (Mr Hawker) would be the first to support it What the squatters said was—"you have no right to single us out for the purpose of class legislation" He would support the Government when they brought in a fair and enlightened Bill, but not a Bill for the class legislation which these hon gentleman had repudiated so strongly in their speeches to their constituencies He defied the hon the Attorney-General to say that he went thoroughly with this Bill, for he had always admired the liberal and enlightened tone of the speeches of that hon gentleman The hon gentleman was obliged to bring in this Bill, but in his heart he disapproved of it (Laughter) He (Mr Hawker) was well aware that every member of a Ministry could not always carry out his own views The hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands had gone into what he called statistics, but it only amounted to this, that the hon member was trying to prove how he could "do" the squatters out of a certain amount of money which they had no right to pay The Government had made an agreement with the squatters for a certain amount of rent, and for eight years there had never been any attempt to alter it He supposed the reason was that it was considered necessary here, as in Victoria and New South Wales, although the circumstances were quite different, in order to carry favor with the populace, that an unjust assessment should be put upon the squatters But that House had always held itself far above the Legislatures of the other colonies, and he endorsed that sentiment, for he believed that hon members were too independent to truckle to any opinion out of doors which was not just in itself He did not see why the House should be dragged at the chariot wheels of Victoria Upon what principle did the Ministry introduce this Bill? He understood that it was because the profits of the squatters were so large and that they paid so little to the revenue of the country Hon members did not understand what squatting was Their idea of squatting was like a child's idea of a king—

"The king was in his counting-house,
Counting out his money,
The queen was in the parlor,
Eating bread and honey" (Loud laughter)

The idea was that a squatter could drive his carriage in town, and that his squatting went on without any trouble. But it was not fair to take one or two gentlemen who had made money in squatting as examples Let them draw a line from Mount Bryan to Mount Remarkable, and another from Mount Remarkable to Port Lincoln, and if hon gentlemen would go and see the country beyond these lines they would learn the hardships to be endured This would be fairer than taking the case of men who had been 20 years in the colony, and who had expended large capitals here If hon members saw these things they would form different opinions from those put forward that day, He had seen the districts he referred to last year, and if hon members would take a ride up there for 400 miles (laughter), it would give them new views, and do their constitution good They would find that the profits of the squatters were very small indeed, not nearly so large as those of the hon member, Mr Neales He had been assured by Mr Morris, the Inspector of Scab, and by Mr Watson, the Special Magistrate, that in one day 500*l* was imposed as fines for scab, and this not from any want of care, but because it was one of the liabilities to which the squatter was exposed There was one settler in that district with which he was connected, who had taken every care, another did not do so, and the sheep of the latter travelled and infected those of the former One year of scab would take away the profits of three years In the South-Eastern District there was no profit during the present year owing to the carelessness of one individual But he would like to know what profits there were in the North, in one instance, for example, Mr John Taylor told him he had lost £10,000 This gentleman had 14,000 ewes in lamb, and he lost all the lambs and 3,000 of the ewes The hon member for Barossa was another victim If any inhabitant of Hindley-street or Rundle street lost this amount it would be told all over the country, but the squatters bore their losses quietly until an attempt was made, such as the present, to treat them with injustice. (Laughter) He might also allude to the loss of life amongst the squatters, and he would ask the hon member (Mr Neales) or any other hon member whether there was any other occupation in the country which entailed an equal loss in this way Where were Brown and Beddome, and Dutton, and Dirk, and Beaver, who had gone through a hundred fights and bore upon him the honorable scars which recorded his courage? Where was Crowley, the scion of an ancient race, and where did he find his grave, but in the dark and turbid waters of that fatal creek? Where was that other well-known traveller—a man who understood well the dangers of exploration—when his brothers were looking for him, until at length they found his bones, whitening as they lay, picked by the native dogs? Did the canteen of Coulthard tell no tale of the risks of the bushman? The termination of those lines, "God help me"—let any hon member read it and say there were no risks to be encountered by the squatters He claimed no privilege for the squatters, but he claimed justice for a great interest He had never been connected with any other interests, and he never, please God, should The hon member for Mount Barker (Mr Dunn) was a fellow-passenger of his 18 years ago, and another gentleman, Mr Waterhouse, was in the same ship The interests with which these gentlemen were connected had flourished as much as that of the squatters and he was delighted to see the hon member for Mount Barker in the position he now occupied, for he was pleased to see any hon member's industry and energy prove successful But why was one interest, because its members had flourished in common with others, to be made the subject of class legislation by the liberal gentlemen on the ministerial benches? This was unjust and unfair, and he believed the House would not demean itself by an act of injustice He had the greatest respect for these hon members, but he thought in introducing this Bill they had made a political blunder

Mr MACDERMOTT observed that an assessment on stock, as had been stated by the hon member who had last spoken, was imposed in the early days of the colony, but the Government had altered that arrangement when the leases were granted into a rental That was a compromise between the squatter and the Government The Government had fixed the rent according to the value of the land, and he thought that during the term of the leases there should be no alteration in the conditions of the agreement Hon members would recollect that at one period the question now before the House was made a legal question An hon gentleman, Mr Baker, brought the question before the Supreme Court to be decided and the decision was in favor of that gentleman That ought to settle the question He concurred entirely with the hon member for Victoria that the word "local" meant for district purposes and not for general purposes Another consideration appeared to him of great weight in relation to this question The term of the leases from the Crown would expire in five or six years, and when that time arrived within two or three years the position of the leaseholders would be a most uneasy one They would have accumulated a vast amount of stock and property upon their runs, and a great uncertainty would exist as to retaining them or as to what competition they might be exposed to at the end of their term He thought the present would be a favorable opportunity for adjusting that important question In his opinion, if a better tenure were offered to the squatters, that is, if the Government proposed to grant annual leases until the land was required for sale, that then it would be equitable for the squatters to surrender their leases and allow a valuation for the rental That would attain the object of laying on an assessment, but in a just and equitable manner When the leases expired the Government would have the choice of getting new tenants, but would the new tenants be as valuable as the present occupiers? The present tenants, in the state of uncertainty in which they were placed, would naturally diminish their stock by allowing it to fatten and sending it to the market, and when the new tenants occupied the land they would have but a small amount of stock, so that some of the country would be diminished in value, and a great injury would be thereby inflicted on the country He thought this suggestion was worthy of attention, and he had reason to believe if the Government made the offer the leases would be willingly surrendered, and the squatters would accept new leases until the land was required for sale, which was all the Government could reasonably require At that late hour he would not trespass further upon the House, but he hoped the justice of the case would be met by the decision arrived at that day, and that the suggestion which he had thrown out would meet with the consideration of the House

Mr STRANGWAYS said if the Bill was a specimen of the hon the Attorney-General's idea of justice, that idea must be a very strange one A solemn engagement was entered into in 1851 with the squatters, and now the hon gentleman came down and asked the House to break that solemn engagement The hon member said that it was expedient to pass the Bill, and that the present was a good time for introducing it As to the expediency he would refer to that presently But as to the legality, as had been observed by the hon member who had last spoken a question of the same kind had already been tried and decided against the Government, and if the Government were to go to the Supreme Court again, attempting to rely upon this Act, the squatters would get a verdict By the Constitution Act the power of the House was limited to the passing of Acts which were not repugnant to the law of England But was not this Act repugnant to the law of England, or of any country, or to common sense and justice, when it proposed to repudiate a solemn engagement? But it was only last session that the Government brought in a Bill to repudiate another similar engagement, and so he was not surprised at their bringing in this measure The Commissioner of Crown Lands advocated the Bill because it would be easy to collect the revenue, no doubt thinking that hon members would leave all considerations of justice and equity aside, and pass the Bill simply because it was an easy way of raising the wind But there was another point as to the effect which the Bill, if passed, would have upon the consumers of meat It should be borne in mind that as the squatters had not the power of raising the price of wool, and had the power of raising the price of sheep, if the price of the article was to be raised the whole burthen would fall upon the labouring man, the very person who was the least able to pay a tax If this tax of 2d per head were put upon sheep the squatters would charge it not only on those sent to market but upon the sheep which they held Thus, supposing the squatter to have 10,000 sheep, he believed that he could not bring more than 2,000 to market in the year and thus the tax would amount to 10d per head on these sheep Hon members knew also that when retailers could get an excuse for putting on an additional farthing they were very glad to put on a penny, and if the price of meat to the retailer were raised a halfpenny, to the consumer it would be a penny at least In dealing with the squatting question also hon members should remember that the squatters have always been not only in this, but in all the Australasian colonies the pioneers of civilization, and that if we taxed them we taxed one of the most important interests of the country Hon members knew that there were many parts of the country now converted to the purposes of agriculture, which a very few years since were thought only fit for squatting, and hardly even for that The squatters had driven their flocks into these localities, and through them and the laws of chemical action and reaction the land had been brought into a fit state for cultivation The squatters were a very important section of our population It was their part to prepare the interior for the habitation of civilized man, and if we did anything to restrain them we would check the progress of the colony This was another specimen of class legislation It was only a few days since the House was called upon to permit free distillation, in order to favor the produce of one class He could now easily see why the Government did not oppose that motion more warmly If a Bill were introduced to tax all the property of the colony he would support it, but he was at a loss to understand why one class of property only was to be subjected to taxation He believed that the Ministry had selected the squatters only, because some cry was raised against them out of doors, and hon gentlemen thought to gain some popularity by taking it up He was satisfied, however, that no such feeling existed out of doors, that the cry was for a tax upon all property, and that if the Government attempted to tax one class only, they would not succeed He would be no party to any monopoly on the part of the squatters, but there was room enough for all As agriculture advanced, the squatters must recede, for it was their part to open up the country There was an unlimited amount of country yet unoccupied, and if they threw impediments in the way of the squatters, they would put a very material check upon the progress of the country He believed many hon members thought that every squatter was a rich man, and that many hon members would give their votes under that impression but he had heard that there were as many poor squatters, or lessees of waste lands, for they were all squatters, whether they had 100,000 sheep or 100—that there were as many poor men amongst them as amongst any other class in the colony The way in which many squatters commenced was this The overseer of an out station saved a few pounds, and having bought a few sheep, got permission from his employer to run them upon the run Perhaps after commencing in this way with half a dozen or a dozen sheep, in a a few years he would find that he was able to run sheep for himself. If this tax of 2d. were put on, we should soon get to the, Victorian rate of 9d., and a tax of 9d. was said to amount to confiscation. But it required no knowledge of Cocker to perceive that if a 9d. tax was confiscation, a 2d. tax was partial confiscation. He agreed with the hon. member for Victoria that the assessment could only be raised for local purposes. On previous occasions when opposition was offered to the measures of Government, the hon. gentlemen were very accommodating and generally withdrew the measures, but it appeared that upon this they were prepared to stand or fall. He hoped they would soon fall—(laughter)—if they were only to stand by a vote like the present, which would impose an unjust tax on any other class. He hoped the House would not be influenced by the threat of the hon. the Attorney-General, and he would now move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. BURFORD did not expect that he would have to second the amendment. He did so on different grounds from those urged by the hon. mover, and he could not go with the hon. member in all he said. He quite concurred in the propriety of equalising the public burthens, but he did not think that was accomplished by the Bill. It was well known that he was opposed to the imposition of taxes on articles of home production. If it was wrong to tax our minerals it was wrong to tax stock, and if it was right to tax stock it was right to tax wines. It was because he saw that by this shilly-shallying system, we would make such a muddle in our legislation that he seconded the amendment. He granted that there was great credit due to the stockholders and he sympathised in their great risks and enterprises, but he could not lose sight of the fact that men had an object in the line of life they adopted, and therefore he was not affected by the pathetic appeal of the hon. member for Victoria, and such were not the means by which the House was to be influenced in a matter of public policy. But, although he took this course now, he considered the Government justified in introducing this Bill according to their view of the case. They were told that because at one time in colonial history the squatters were reduced to great straits, the imposition they were to pay was removed, and now the Government were justified in reimposing it, as the squatting interest had not only recovered, but had risen to a position of great prosperity. If the House assented to the Bill, it would show a retrograde tendency. The manifest feeling of the House on an occasion previously alluded to was in favor of a different mode of taxation, so that if they passed this Bill they would be voting against themselves. They should also keep in view the invidious distinction which it was sought to introduce. One class was to be singled out and taxed, another was to go free, and another to have a bonus placed upon its produce. Again, if cattle or sheep upon runs were to be taxed, were the horses and cattle on farms to be taxed also? The House was told that all the cattle in District Councils or hundreds were not to be taxed. They had had a lesson from the next colony on this point, where the difficulties which had arisen seemed inextricable. The last intimation from New South Wales was that they had classified the lands into four classes, but he could not see how they could do this in such a manner as to make the burthen of taxation fall equally. If we were to follow a rigid rule in all cases the effect would be extremely unequal, as the runs in the vicinity were necessarily better adapted for agriculture than others. He disagreed with the hon. member for Victoria where that hon. member denied the right of the House to act in this matter, but as he was opposed to taxing the products of the country in any form, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. BARROW moved that the debate be adjourned to the following day.

The House adjourned at five o'clock.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

PORT ELLIOT.

Mr. STRANGWAYS presented a petition from the District Council of Port Elliot and Goolwa, praying that a sum might be placed on the Supplementary Estimates for the construction of a ferry to connect Hindmarsh Island with Port Elliot.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked leave, as Chairman of the Committee of Railway Management, to bring up a progress report on Tuesday next, upon the subject of the site of a station upon Section 70.

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL.

This Bill appeared upon the paper for its second reading, but the Treasurer said that there were a great many notices on the paper, and it was consequently necessary to make some arrangement as to the business. He proposed that the Associations Incorporation Bill should be postponed till Wednesday next, and that the Bills of Exchange Bill should be postponed till a later period in the day. He was prepared to proceed with the Supplementary Estimates for an hour or two, unless the House were desirous of proceeding with the debate upon the Assessment Bill, which had been adjourned from the previous day. He was desirous that the Estimates should be proceeded with, and if the House would determine to devote a whole day to them they might perhaps be finally disposed of. Upon the motion of the hon. gentleman the Assessment and Incorporation Bill was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday next, and the consideration in Committee of the Bills of Exchange Bill was postponed till a later period of the day.

DISTRICT COUNCILS.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to District Councils. It was not, he thought, requisite that he should enter into any lengthened statement to induce the House to assent to the introduction of this Bill. There were at present several Acts relating to District Councils, and the object of the Bill which he wished to introduce was to consolidate them. It provided for all matters in which District Councils were interested—in fact, the principal portion of the Bill had been suggested by the experience of the District Councils of the province. He was convinced hon. members would, upon a perusal of the Bill, consider it a most useful and carefully prepared measure.

The TREASURER seconded the motion.

Leave having been granted, the Bill was read a first time, and ordered to be printed, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for that day fortnight, the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS remarking that he selected this rather remote period in consequence of the Bill being rather a lengthy one.

Mr. MILNE asked the Commissioner of Public Works if the Government intended to forward a copy of the Bill to each of the District Councils.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would certainly take that course if it were desired, but the Bill had been principally prepared by the Association of District Chairmen, and had been drawn by the solicitor of that body, having been subsequently revised by the law officers of the Crown. There had been no alteration whatever made in the principle of the Bill, but still he would take care that copies were sent to the various District Councils.

KAPUNDA RAILWAY BILL.

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the above Bill was read a third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for more efficiently conducting public works. The question had recently been so fully debated that it was unnecessary to reopen it. The Bill was simply a copy of a measure introduced last session.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked if the Central Road Board was included in this Bill?

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that it was.

The Bill was read a first time and ordered to be printed, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for the following day.

THE ESTIMATES.

The TREASURER said that the Estimates stood next upon the paper. He desired to go on with them unless the House particularly desired to proceed with the debate upon the Assessment Bill adjourned from the previous day. To test the feeling of the House he would move that the House go into Committee upon the Supplementary Estimates.

The motion was negatived.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK.

Adjourned debate.

Mr. BARROW said that having moved the adjournment of the debate on the previous evening, it now devolved upon him to address the House. Whilst availing himself of that privilege, he should endeavor to confine his remarks within as limited a space as possible. As the matter at present stood, the House was called upon either to affirm the second reading of the Bill, or to agree to the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) that the Bill be read again that day six months. He confessed that he should not feel satisfied were he to adopt either of these courses. (Hear, hear.) As the matter now stood before them there appeared no course open to him by which he could record his vote with satisfaction to himself, and under such circumstances it had occurred to him that he had better abstain from voting altogether, but then again thought that was scarcely a worthy course to pursue. When there was a great question before the House he felt that it was the duty of every member to vote one way or the other. But if a third course could be struck out which would enable him and others to obtain further information upon this important question before being called upon to record his vote, it was most desirable that such course should be indicated. (Hear, hear.) He must confess himself disappointed, very much disappointed, that the Attorney-General had not, when introducing the subject upon the previous day, gone more fully into the question. He regretted that the hon. gentleman had not made out a better case. He did not wish to impute to the hon. gentleman that he was unable to make out a better case, although such might be the fact. It was possible that the hon. gentleman had said all that he could say upon the subject, but he (Mr. Barrow) thought that the hon. gentleman had refrained from advancing all that he could have advanced in support of this important measure. It appeared to him that the hon. gentleman rather reserved himself for the reply, in order that he might demolish the arguments of previous speakers without fear of a retort. The hon. the Attorney-General had not, to his mind, made out any cause whatever. The hon. gentleman had stated that if any person who held a lease of Crown lands, would come forward and say that he took that lease supposing that there would be no assessment on stock depastured on the runs that a case would be made out for further enquiry before legislative enactment. Whatever weight should be attached to the arguments of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) or other hon. members who opposed the measure, it was undeniable that the contingency anticipated by the hon. the Attorney-General had taken place. The hon. the Attorney-General had stated that if any one would come forward and say that he took his lease upon the supposition that there would be no assessment he would establish a claim for further enquiry on the part of the House. That contingency had occurred. (Hear.) The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) had endeavoured on the previous day, with what success he would not say, to prove that the assessment proposed would be a breach of faith on the part of Parliament, and a violation of the conditions upon which the squatters supposed they held their leases. Without committing himself to an approval or disapproval of the Bill introduced by the Government it was undeniable that the contingency alluded to by the hon. the Attorney-General had taken place, and what the Attorney-General had stated the Government were ready to grant should be conceded. He was not prepared to throw out the Bill, but he would like to see the most satisfactory grounds for passing it. He required to see more evidence bearing upon the question before he could give an honest and conscientious vote in favour of the Bill. It had been stated that if the Bill were thrown out there would be a dissolution of that House, and that an appeal would be made to the country. He was not aware that anything had fallen from the Government to justify such a statement. (Hear.) He approved of appeals made to the country at proper times, but that was not the proper time. (Hear, hear.) And whilst there were such general complaints of commercial depression and scarcity of money, it would be a great pity to throw away thousands of pounds in making a special appeal to the country upon this particular question at that particular time. They would gain nothing by an appeal to the country, as the country could only return a new Parliament who would have to reopen the question, and he believed the country would say "investigate the matter, take evidence, and summon witnesses, and when the whole case is fully before you, vote accordingly." They could deal thus with the question without an appeal to the country; it would be a wanton waste of the public money if there were a dissolution of Parliament. Before a dissolution took place, he hoped there would be many questions in which it would be necessary to take the sense of the country, and upon which the country would be called upon to decide when the general elections took place. He could not help alluding to the possibility of a general election following the discussion of this question. It would be the most injudicious, unwise, and prejudicial course that the House could at the present time assent to. If throwing overboard this Bill and carrying the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) would cause a dissolution, that alone would cause him to vote against the amendment, convinced that at the present time no good object would be obtained by an appeal to the country, but that it would have most undesirable effects. If, therefore, the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay would lead to a dissolution, he should vote against it. There was, however, no sufficient evidence before him to convince him that it would, if carried, lead to a dissolution. The hon. gentleman who introduced the amendment had supposed that it would have that effect, but he had not heard from the Ministerial benches that the Government would recommend His Excellency to dissolve Parliament if that amendment were carried. He objected to the amendment, not merely upon the ground that a dissolution could confer no advantage, but because he objected to a postponement of the question for six months. Now that they had grappled with the question, he would like to come to a decision upon it. Now that the squatters and the people had met, as it were, face to face, he would like to see the question tried and disposed of, and not delayed for six months. But they might adopt some course which would obviate the necessity of enacting a measure, the merits of which they did not understand, and the effects of which they were unable to anticipate, and, on the other hand, of throwing overboard a measure which might be a beneficial one. He demanded more information upon the subject that he might be in a position to record an honest and conscientious vote. He did not see how, as the matter stood at present, he could vote for the Bill, as that would imply a belief in its excellence; nor did he see how he could vote against it, as that would imply a belief in its injurious qualities. He was not prepared to affirm either that it was excellent or that it was mischievous, but what he wished was to investigate the question thoroughly before being called upon to affirm either the one or other proposition. The House had been told if the Bill were passed, it would bring that House into collision with the Courts of Law, and that the decision of that House would be inconsistent with that of the Supreme Court. That had been denied; it had been affirmed on the one hand, and denied on the other that the Bill was unconstitutional. Until they had examined the question minutely for themselves the very fact of gentlemen competent to give an opinion differing so widely was a strong argument for suspending action till they had taken further evidence, till they had searched most deeply and thoroughly before passing the Bill or throwing it out as an unworthy enactment. The question of good faith with the squatters was one which the House were bound to go into very much more minutely than by merely listening to the speeches for and against it. He had not gone very minutely into the question either with regard to the covenants in the leases, or to the despatches which were written at the time those leases were granted. He had not done so because he considered the Attorney-General would have brought forward arguments as well as the Bill. (Hear, hear.) The Government had brought forward a Bill, but they had not brought forward any arguments to support it. (Hear, hear.) The hon. the Attorney-General seemed to consider it sufficient to state that there were many millions of acres held by squatters at 10s. a square mile, to satisfy the House of the necessity of passing this Bill. He joined issue however upon that point with the hon. the Attorney-General. It might be correct or it might be a fallacy. The land might be worth £10 per square mile, or not worth ten pence. He denied that the statement that the squatters held so much land at the price stated was conclusive evidence that they ought to be assessed. In the financial aspect of the question, there was much room for profitable investigation. A Committee was sitting upon the whole question of taxation, and they had to consider whether, whilst that Committee was sitting, it was expedient hastily to dispose of a measure materially affecting the fiscal policy of the colony, nor could they say until that Committee had brought up its report, that the particular question before the House was not also under the consideration of the Committee. They ought not without the clearest evidence of the necessity of such a step, to commence class legislation and this Bill was unquestionably an attempt at class legislation. The feeling of the House and of the country was directly opposed to class legislation. It might be quite true that squatters did not pay a fair proportion to the revenue. He was quite prepared to believe that they did not, for he did not go with all that had been advanced by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker). That hon. member had said that he employed 50 or 100 persons, whom he found in rations, and that he consequently contributed to the revenue by the amount paid by him for such rations; that this contribution was made by him as employer, and not by the consumers of the rations. But he would ask the hon. member whether he would give his men the same wages with rations as without, for if not the hon. member's argument was a fallacy, the contribution to the revenue not being by the hon. member, but by the parties who were employed. The persons who were employed paid the duty upon the tea and sugar which they consumed. But even though the hon. member had perpetrated a fallacy it did not affect his case, for the question was not whether the contribution was paid by master or man, but whether it came from that particular interest. The hon. member for Victoria contended that the contribution came from the master, he (Mr. Barrow) considered it came from the man; but in either case it was paid by that particular interest, and went to the revenue. He was desirous of obtaining more information upon this question before being called upon to exercise his vote. He would like to know for instance whether there were more or fewer men employed in raising £1,000 worth of wool than in raising £1,000 worth of wheat. He should like to go into various other questions bearing upon this particular one, and although the rules of the House would not permit him then to move an amendment upon either proposition before the House, if the House would agree to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question, he should heartily go with such a proposition. In making this suggestion he not only gave weight to his own honest convictions, but he was pursuing a course consonant with the pledges which he gave before his election. He was distinctly asked by his constituents prior to his election what course he would adopt in the event of an assessment being proposed upon sheep and cattle and he had then stated that he was friendly to enquiry, and would support a motion for the appointment of a Select Committee, to whom the question should be submitted. He had also stated that he would not be a party to impose a tax upon the pastoral or any other interest without the fullest enquiry. Some time ago he had a conversation with a gentleman extensively interested in squatting, and that gentleman had stated that all the squatters wanted was an opportunity of stating their case. He (Mr. Barrow) told him that he for one was not only willing but most anxious that such an opportunity should be afforded the squatters, and that when fully in possession of the case he should be prepared to vote for or against an assessment according to the evidence. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hawker) had also said that that was all he wanted, but believed that that hon. member did not approve of a Select Committee, but rather wished the House to decide upon the question at once. That hon member, though perfectly satisfied of the goodness of his own case, should remember that he might not have satisfied every other hon member Although he went a great way with the hon member for Victoria, that hon member had failed to satisfy him that it was his duty to throw out the Bill, and he must say equally that he was not satisfied he should help to pass it As he would sooner forbear from legislating than legislate in a wrong direction, if driven to the alternative of voting for or against the Bill, without further enquiry, he should vote against it He hoped, however, he should not be compelled to such a course, he would prefer an opportunity of going into the whole subject, so that he might be enabled to vote in a manner which would bear more satisfactory reflection afterwards Under all the circumstances he believed that they could not do better than refer the subject to a Select Committee, particularly as matters which had not so strong a claim to be so treated had been dealt with in that manner A Committee upon Distillation had been recently appointed, although but a short time previously a Committee had been appointed and had taken evidence If upon that question two Committees had been appointed within a short period of one another, this was surely a question upon which a Select Committee might well be called upon to exercise its judgment They must not judge of a whole class merely by a poor squatter or a rich squatter, but should take evidence to show whether the majority had been prosperous, or had had to struggle against difficulties It was irrational to judge of a whole class, from a poor or a rich member, as well might they form their opinions of the whole of the doctors, lawyers, or tradesmen, merely from having before them one instance of prosperity or misfortune in connection with each class They must look at the class as a whole, and see whether as a whole they had been prosperous or not They would have to consider whether, if an assessment were considered advisable, a graduating one might not be most desirable If an assessment were determined upon it did not follow that it would operate justly if levied at the same rate upon all He considered it most important that they should have evidence before them to determine whether a graduating scale of assessment would not be better than a fixed or arbitrary one These and other points which he would not detain the House by discussing, rendered it exceedingly desirable that they should procure all the evidence they could before arriving at a conclusion upon this most important question One word with regard to this question being a popular cry He cared not whether it was popular or unpopular, or whether the course which he pursued gained for him the approval or the disapproval of the public, he should simply adopt the course which he considered right. He had been addressed by parties on both sides, and had expressed his determination, after fully acquainting himself with the merits of the case, to give an honest vote, whether he drew down upon himself public censure or reaped public approval But to give a vote without taking evidence, and collating various despatches and documents, would be trifling with an important question, instead of approaching it in that calm and deliberate spirit which should be the characteristic of legislation As there was an amendment before the House he could not move the proposition which he had suggested, but he trusted they would not legislate upon this important question till evidence had been taken, and they were in a position to legislate in a manner which would defy censure and vindicate accusations to which they would obviously lay themselves open if they passed measures in the dark, without taking that evidence which they ought to take to guide them to a proper conclusion He would resume his seat in the hope that hon members would not be restricted to passing or throwing out the Bill before being fully acquainted with the subject to which it referred

Captain HART said that when the opportunity arrived he should vote for the Select Committee (Hear, hear) He did so, not because he required any information upon the subject himself, but it was quite possible that some hon members might require before they exercised their vote some information upon the subject, and that information would be obtained by the evidence which would be taken before a Select Committee He was quite clear that when they had had that evidence the probability would be that perhaps not the present Bill but something approaching it would be the result of that enquiry He was sure that he should be the last who would desire to impose upon the squatters what was either illegal or unjust He believed it would be found that an assessment was not only legal but also most just, and if it were not imposed great injustice would be done to others He believed it would be beneficial to the stockholders themselves to have a matter which had been threatening for a very long time settled in the final manner proposed by this Bill He believed that if the assessment as proposed were endorsed upon each fourteen years' license the sheep farmers would look upon the Bill rather as a boon than otherwise, as settling the matter and preventing what had occurred in other colonies, where an oppressive tax had been imposed in consequence of a strong party cry With regard to the legality of the assessment, he would call the attention of hon members to the wording of the leases themselves, and would then ask if there could be any doubt of its legality The hon member for Victoria had alluded to the wording of the leases, and had drawn a very different argument from it from that which he (Capt Hart) should The hon member for Victoria had stated that there was a difference between the wording of the yearly leases and those for fourteen years, and had argued that the clause which was put in the fourteen years had no weight whatever, the proviso being to an effect which did not appear in the yearly leases (The hon member read the proviso) How that proviso could be put on he might fairly leave to the good sense of the House, perfectly satisfied that he could not be answered in the negative That that proviso anticipated an assessment was perfectly clear, and the only question was, how the Orders in Council bore upon that proviso The hon member for Victoria argued that because that proviso was left out of the yearly lease, his case was made out that there could be no assessment Why was it not in the yearly lease? Simply because there was an arrangement every year, but further than that the District Councils themselves in districts or hundreds had opportunity of taxing the people, so that there was no necessity for the Government to do it, and that was the reason that the proviso was left out of one lease, but retained in the other So far as the legality of assessment then was concerned, not only was it perfectly legal, but it was so upon the face of the document upon which the squatters held their leases But supposing there were no such provision in the leases, would any one say that the man who held the fee simple could be taxed, but not the man who held a lease It appeared absurd to argue so for a moment With regard to the question whether this was an equitable assessment, the House would remember that a paper was placed upon the table last session, shewing that specially for the protection of the stockholders in the outlying districts large sums of money were annually disbursed Large sums were expended for the protection of the sheep farmer, and for postal arrangements and other matters entirely for the sheep farmers He would ask if these expenses were not specially incurred on account of the squatters? If they were not he thought the House would not say that it was wise to vote money for such purposes If, however, these expenses were specially incurred for this particular interest, whilst the advantages of other expenditure by the Government were communicated to the whole community, he contended there should be a special tax to cover the local amount of disbursements which the Government were put to on account of this particular interest In reference to the disbursements for the administration of justice, for ports, for main lines of road, &c, the squatters had equal advantages with the rest of the community, using the ports and roads for their produce, and as all were benefitted by such expenditure, the disbursements were made from the general revenue, but there were some items of disbursement which were specially for the advantage of the squatters, and therefore it was that these might justly be provided for by a tax having this special object in view What was the general revenue of this province? It consisted first of the Customs dues and rates which might be derived from the general revenue, and then there was the land revenue The general revenue would barely pay the expenses of the establishments which were provided All was absorbed by that which was common to all—sheepfarmers as well as the residents of the city—but the people of Adelaide were independently taxed specially for particular works and improvements in their own locality No portion of the land revenue could by any possibility be claimed by the sheepfarmers to be spent specially for their use He had had opportunity of speaking to a great number of squatters upon this subject, and he could safely say that if the proposed assessment were decided by the House to be a final measure, if this moderate assessment were looked upon as a settlement of the question, they would look upon it as the greatest boon they had received since their leases The hon member for Victoria appeared to dissent from this, but he put it forward as a fact that this measure would be looked upon as a boon to the sheepfarmers, if it were considered by the House and placed upon record that this was a final measure during the term of their leases He would next refer to an argument which had been used by the hon member for Victoria, who he thought would be a little surprised when he saw the length which it went The hon member said that if a tax were imposed it would fall not upon the squatter but upon the consumer of mutton, but if the consumer of mutton would have to pay it, why did the hon member for Victoria grumble? and how was it that the consumer of mutton said this was a very proper tax? What possible objection could the hon member have to a tax which those whom he delighted to state he represented would have to pay? But what was the fact? Why we, having no assessment, sent mutton to Victoria, and this would account for the price in Adelaide The price in Adelaide, where there was no assessment, was higher than it was in Melbourne where there was an assessment of ninepence per head on sheep The price in Melbourne was less than it was in Adelaide, clearly shewing that no assessment in this colony had not been productive of that which the hon members on the opposite side would imply Till he made made enquiries he had been at a loss to conceive how it was that mutton here had reached such an exorbitant price, and he then found that this, being a small market, might be kept as it was at present by sending a large portion of the wethers to the neighbouring colonies, where there was a good market, and small blame to those who sent them there The argument that the consumer of mutton would have to pay the assessment was clearly set aside by these facts. Hon. members had spoken about the prosperity of the squatters, but he contended that was not a question which should in any way guide them. Whether they had made good bargains or not by taking their leases at the time they did was not the question. He should be as willing to make the man in Hindley-street who bought his land at twelve shillings an acre, pay the difference in value at the present day into the Treasury, as to lay claim to anything from the squatters in consequence of their having taken their leases at the time they did. He should support the proposition to refer the matter to a Select Committee, because the facts which had been put forward were important, and he was convinced that the result would be such a Bill as that now proposed, with possibly some modifications.

The TREASURER rose thus early in the debate to state the reasons for the vote which he was about to give, because he was desirous of filling the void in the information supplied by the Government, of which hon. members complained. He should vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay, and if the question came to a division, he should vote in favor of the second reading. But in stating this he should add that if an amendment were put forward by the hon. member for East Torrens, of the nature which that hon. member had spoken of, he would be happy to second it. He would do so for the reason urged by the hon. member who had last spoken, namely, that whilst he was himself satisfied with the information which he possessed, other hon. members might not be so, and might desire further inquiry. This matter had been very fully, and very ably he must say, so far as words went, argued by the hon. member (Mr. Hawker) who said he represented the squatting interest, but he (the Treasurer) could only compare that speech, long as it was, and brilliant as it was, to a bottle of champagne. (Laughter.) It sparkled and frothed; but when the sparkle and froth subsided, what remained? (Laughter.) The greater part of it appealed to the feelings of the House. The hon. member drew dramatic pictures of the sufferings and dangers of the squatters, as if no other men perished in this country except the squatters; as if none perished on Kangaroo Island in search of business or amusement; as if, in fact, there were no other colonists in South Australia whose occupations were dangerous; as if they did not hear of accidents amongst miners or bricklayers or others. Then as to the losses which might be entailed upon squatters, was not every interest represented in that House exposed to losses? Had not the farmer sustained losses by the failure of his crops and by the scarcity of labor until men of genius came forward and invented machines by which he was enabled to save his crops? All these questions had nothing to do with the matter before the House; but he would now refer to the argument of the matter. First as to the necessity of imposing a heavy tax upon any class for the purpose of increasing the revenue. He thought it was incumbent upon the Government to show, before asking the House to add to the ways and means, that such a course was necessary. This Bill was intended to make an addition to the revenue and not to supply any gap in it. Their expenditure was increasing and they must look for the means of meeting it. The Government counted as part of the ways and means on deriving £20,000 from this tax, as without such an increase in the revenue there would be a deficiency to that amount, provided we were to carry out the extension of the railway to Kapunda, which the House had already sanctioned, and besides that we should have no money for immigration. The proposed expenditure, exclusive of the fund for immigration, which would appear when the Estimates were laid on the table, amounted to £450 495, and that included £363,585 for the cost of Government. That was for establishments, retired balances, public works and buildings, and Her Majesty's Civil List under the new Constitution. £86,910 was the amount which we would have to pay for annual liabilities on account of the loans secured by Acts of Parliament. This was a branch of expenditure which they could not avoid. In that sum was included the £20,000 for the Kapunda Railway, which had already been authorised by the House. The total expenditure for the next year, according to the Estimates, would therefore be £450,495. Now their revenue, exclusive of that tax, would amount to but £428,440, which would show a deficiency of upwards of £22,000 if they were to carry on the Government as at present, and the intentions of the House in reference to the Railway Bill. The deficiency pointed out arose in a great measure from the falling off in the land sales, which were not as productive as they were three or four years ago. They could not expect them to continue as productive as they had been, and they would not have the benefit of large balances from the immigration fund, and must therefore square their ways and means. To meet the annual charges for which they were liable, without making a reduction in their public works, which would seriously retard the progress of the colony, they must have an increased revenue, and the question then arose where was the tax to fall? Were they to increase the Customs taxation generally, or to select a particular class or interest in the community which did not bear its fair burthen of the public taxation? The Government considered that the squatting interest did not bear its fair proportion of those burthens. They considered that the income of the stockholders, so far as their personal expenditure was concerned, did bear its fair proportion of the public burthens, but as regarded that portion of their income spent on their runs, and in producing wool, they were not subject to the burthens to which other producers were subject who paid in districts a rate of one shilling in the pound on all property in the districts, or in municipalities where they were subject to taxes, though they also paid in the same way as the squatters did. To look at the matter more in detail, he would consult the statistical tables. He would first take the census from which he arrived at the number of persons employed by the squatters and engaged in raising their produce. There were 1,118 shepherds and 220 stockmen, making in all 1,338 persons employed in raising produce, and to these he would add 25 per cent for increase since the date of the census. This would give 1,672 males as all the labor employed by all the squatters in South Australia for the vast extent of territory which they occupied, and from which they produced such an amount of stock. A period would soon arrive when they would employ a greater number, namely, when the shearing season came on. He had inquired from many practical men on this point, and he found that the number of shearers employed, reckoning by the year, supposing the men to obtain permanent employment instead of being only engaged for about six weeks, but dividing the entire number by 8, which would give the number for the year, he found the number would be 188 for the year. He would now see what amount those persons contributed to the revenue, which he arrived at by estimating the amount of excisable articles which came in for each of them. He would first take the 1,672 shepherds and stockmen, who at 4s. 7d. each would contribute £612. That represented the contribution of the squatting interest to the Customs revenue. The 188 shearers consumed tea, sugar, and say a gill of spirits each per day, which he estimated at £5 7s. 4d. each per year, or in all £968. So that the total contribution of the squatters on account of their shepherds, stockmen, and shearers amounted to £1,580 towards the Customs revenue, the total Customs revenue was £154,000, so that the squatters' contribution bore no fair proportion to the entire. He thought it very evident that the Government had in calling on the squatting interest to raise a sum which was absolutely required, selected the interest which contributed least to the public burthens. He would not go into the means of the squatters to pay this sum—(hear, hear, from Mr. Hawker,)—as the assessment was not intended as a property tax, but he had no doubt they were perfectly well able to bear the burthen. If they wanted money for a public purpose they could not look to a better or more equitable source. It was objected on the part of the squatters that the House had not power to impose this tax, and also that it would not be equitable to do so. But he concurred in the proposition laid down by the hon. the Attorney-General that no mere Order in Council could restrict the House in this matter, and the House was not restricted by the Waste Lands Act, nor was it by the Orders in Council. He now came to the equitable part of the question, which the hon. the Attorney-General had also touched upon. That part of the question had been very ably explained, to his mind, by the hon. member for the Port (Mr. Hart). He adopted the views of that hon. member, and had intended to put them forward, but it was now unnecessary. The hon. member for the Port had shown that the squatters had a large share of the public expenditure for purposes local to themselves. ("No, no," from Mr. Hawker.) They had nearly £20,000 for police and other matters for their own convenience, in which the colony had no share. ("No, no," from Mr. Hawker.) These items would amount to nearly £20,000, in the Estimates for 1858. The cost of police in the squatting districts amounted to £7,182, the Post-Office to £2,511, medical £100, Special Magistrates, created for the squatters, £1,515, Custom-Houses and collection of revenue, in ports for the accommodation of the squatters, £400, harbour expenses, £600, aborigines, £2 200, expenses of Scab Inspector, £1,282, surveys and explorations £4,000, making a total of £19,790. The hon. gentleman next proceeded to argue briefly that the interpretation sought to be put upon the despatches of Sir H. Young was not justifiable. He thought he had now disposed of every part of the question, and answered all the arguments used on the other side. ("No, no," from Mr. Hawker and some other hon. members.) He would merely state that he would be quite happy to second any amendment of the nature proposed by the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr. Barrow), for whenever he found in that House a strong party entertaining opinions hostile to those of the Government, even when that party was a minority, when the question was one which required extensive information, he was ready to assume that hon. members had not access to the information in the hands of the Government, and that the best way of putting them right and showing the propriety of the course pursued by the Government was to supply that information by means of a Select Committee.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

A message was here received from His Excellency announcing that His Excellency had caused certain sums to be placed on the Supplementary Estimates in compliance with addresses of the House.

DEBATE RESUMED

MR. NEALES thought it would be hardly fair to refuse a Committee, but for his part he required no further information on this subject. It was one which had occupied his mind for a long time, and the more he thought on it the more satisfied he was of the justice of the claims upon the interest which they were now discussing. He was satisfied from the despatches and Orders in Council that an assessment was always contemplated. But some persons said the assessment should be for local purposes. He believed that could be met by a declaration of the squatting country into districts and hundreds, or in any other way in which the squatters wished to be taxed. He could very soon make out an invoice against the squatters which the £20,000 mentioned by the hon. the Treasurer would not fully meet. He had divided the population by a different process from that hon. gentleman, and the result he would now give in round numbers. The mining interest, which employed many skilled laborers, numbered 1,000. There were altogether 26,000 adults in the colony, and of these the pastoral numbered 1,400 and the agricultural 11,000, so that we had still a very large number to make up to the 26,000. He had again divided this number, and he found that the mining interest employed collaterally 3,000, the pastoral only about 1,600, and, serving the agriculturists very badly, he should give them a balance of 8,000. Thus the mining interest supported 4,000, the pastoral 3,000, and the agricultural 19,000. He now came to the consumption of colonial produce, and he found the mining interest consumed £106,000 worth, the pastoral £71,000, and agricultural nearly half a million—eating their own flour to half that amount. He would now compare what each interest produced with what it consumed. The mining interest produced £416,000, the pastoral £715,000, and the agricultural touched a million. When they looked at the taxation of the three interests, it appeared so ridiculous that even if the other questions were settled the squatters would have a right to pay the tax proposed by this Bill, which was one of the most moderate ever proposed by a Government. Again, the mining interest employed a vast deal of skilled labor, and imported useful machinery, and they were large and liberal consumers. The pastoral interest, on the contrary, employed the lowest class of labor, and the least paid (no, no, from Mr Hawker), and they did not import machinery, but used the Queen's lands freely, and at a low figure, the whole rental amounting to a fraction less than a farthing per acre. The agriculturists, though they did not employ such a stream of skilled labor as the mining interest, employed some, and even the common labor they employed was superior to that used by the pastoral interest. Their wages were higher, and they required more skill. He (Mr Neales) had been told by squatters themselves that any man who could walk after the sheep would answer for squatting purposes, but it was not every man who could plough the land. The Asiatics who came here were considered good enough for pastoral purposes. (No, no, from Mr Hawker.) He believed a very low class of labor would serve the purposes of the squatters. (No, no, from Mr Hawker.) Well, perhaps, to play the piano was necessary, but he did not know that before. (Laughter.) The squatters should pay some proportion of the expenditure of the Government. At present they had land, whether good, bad, or indifferent, at a farthing an acre, whereas if he (Mr Neales) wanted land for mineral purposes, where the surface would be of no use, and where he could only make a small hole and work underneath, he should pay the heavy rent of 10s per acre. The agriculturist could not rent Crown lands at all, but should make a purchase, the interest on which would form a rental of 4s an acre. When these discrepancies existed under the various holdings it was high time that this question should be thoroughly examined. All he was afraid of, as a friend of the squatters, for he looked on them as men who had persevered and gone into the country to prepare it for the agriculturists, was that they did not conclude this moderate bargain without going to a Committee; if they did go before one he believed they would not come out with such a Bill. If they went before a Committee they would come off like the squatters of New South Wales, who were paying 40s to 60s per square mile, and their leases selling, as he had sold them in this colony, at high prices. A suggestion had been made by a speaker that day, that there should be a graduated scale of assessment, but the moment that was proposed in New South Wales, they compromised the matter for 2d a-head. Let hon. members compare the proposed assessment with the 9d per head in Victoria. It was asked if a tax were wanted, why not tax everybody? but this could not be done until the squatters were first taxed equally with the people of Hindley-street, or Barossa, or Mount Barker, and until that was done, it was sheer insolence to make such a proposal. They must first submit to be all taxed equally with their neighbors, but the public should never ask for a new tax until the squatters were brought to a water level. It was now low water taxes with them, and spring tide with all the rest. When an hon. gentleman told him that he represented a district 270 miles long, and 160 miles broad, he could not but refer to District Councils, which did not cover as many inches as this embraced acres, and he was certain there was no district so barren as to make a difference of 1 to 36 in its value as compared with other localities, not even excepting the country which Gregory passed through on his way here. ("Oh, oh," from Mr Hawker.) The hon. member concluded by expressing his conviction that if Sir G. Grey were here in 1858, he would have expressed very different views from those which he put forward in 1841, and that a man whose mind could stagnate for 15 years was unfit for that House.

Mr BAGOT said that as so many hon. members wished to speak, he should say but a few words. He would not consider the question from a squatting or anti-squatting point of view. The great point to discuss was whether or not there would be any breach of faith in passing the Bill. From what he had heard and he had listened attentively to the very able speech of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), and although no doubt that hon. member had wandered from his subject, still he had made some good points, but when he (Mr Bagot) looked to that speech, and to the opening speech of the hon. and learned the Attorney-General, and saw the case which that hon. gentleman had made out, he found himself in the position of not having sufficient information. He should, therefore, go with the hon. member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) in asking for a Select Committee. And now with regard to the various arguments used in respect of this Bill. The hon. member for Victoria called it class legislation. He for one did not think it could be called so, if they should find on reference to a Select Committee that the squatters did not pay sufficient taxes to the revenue in proportion with other interests. If they found that to be the case, it would be for the House to say what the squatters were to pay to put them on an equality with other interests. He was much pleased and a good deal struck with the peroration of the hon. member for Victoria, when that hon. member spoke of the various squatters who had lost their lives in the bush. He thought the hon. gentleman's pathos was very good, but it was the argumentum ad hominem, which might have been retorted on by saying that the gentlemen lost their lives in attempting to promote their own interests. If the squatters were not to pay a fair and equal share of taxation on that account, he (Mr Bagot) should ask a remission of taxes for the farmers north of the Light, for he remembered many of them having lost their lives in crossing the river before the bridge was built, or the people of North Adelaide might claim a remission because some of them having lost their lives in crossing the Torrens. Such an argument would not hold good. He now came to the facts which had been put forward in support of the Bill, and if these could be proved before a Select Committee, no doubt it would be the duty of the House to put an assessment on the stock of the colony. He could not, with his present light on the subject, go with the Hon. the Attorney-General with regard to the difference between local and imperial taxation. In examining the different Orders in Council, and the despatches of Sir Henry Young, he came to the conclusion that the word "local" must apply to colonial in opposition to imperial taxation, but when the phrase "colonial purposes" was made use of there was a strong distinction. Local purposes must mean purposes connected with the squatting interests, not with any special district in which a squatter might reside, but with the squatting interests in general. Then if the phrase meant that it was only local purposes for which squatters were to submit to taxation, the question arose what these local purposes were. It appeared to him, indeed there was no doubt on his mind, that the statistics of the hon. the Treasurer were correct with regard to the local purposes for which large sums were expended on behalf of the squatters, such as police protection and explorations into the interior. ("No, no," from Mr Hawker.) He repeated for explorations, for in every case in which the Government discovered good land, the squatters took advantage of it, and was not this in favor of their interest, that land fit for squatting should be discovered in the interior? Postal communication was another local purpose, for they all knew that the communication with the out-laying districts did not pay the post-office. It was an exceedingly important consideration whether the making of roads, and the bridges over rivers leading from squatting districts, should be considered a local purpose. He could not say he had made up his mind on the point, but strong arguments might be urged in favor of looking on them in that light. He had listened to the remarks of the hon. member for the Port (Mr Hart) with great pleasure, for that hon. member had put his case in a manner which showed that, considering the statements he had made on the one side, and those made by the hon. member for Victoria on the other, the House had not sufficient information on which to decide whether the squatters paid a sufficient sum to the revenue or not.

Mr REYNOLDS had listened with great interest to what had been said on the Government side, and also to what had been said by the hon. member for Victoria. That hon. member had delivered a very pathetic, feeling, and warm speech. He had assured the House that there were many hon. members whose minds were not made up, but he was certain he would convince those hon. members he was right. He (Mr Reynolds) had listened attentively to the hon. member, but whilst he was much amused at the speech, he was not much enlightened, for, in fact, he found himself in just the same position as when the debate commenced. Never since the session commenced had he felt greater pleasure than he promised himself in supporting the Government on this occasion. He did not often vote with them (laughter), but on this occasion he had decided to do so, but he was disappointed within the last hour, for he found that the Government were going to give way when they had a policy—the only time they had a policy. (Laughter.) But all at once they gave way and said "take a Select Committee."

That was their safety-valve (Laughter) The only way the Government could retain their seats was by shelving the question and giving a Select Committee (Laughter) He said, when he found the Government acting in this "shilly shally" way "why not stick to your policy? If it is right, stick to it, if it is wrong, give it up That was what he liked to see, but the House seeemed to sympathise with the Government, and to think that no other men could carry on the Government (Laughter) But how did the Ministry carry on the Government but by taking instructions from the rest of the House ("Hear, hear," from the Treasurer) The hon the Treasurer cried "hear, hear," endorsing what he (Mr Reynolds) said about the "shilly-shallying" of the Government. (Laughter) Until he saw the hon member for Victoria come into the House he imagined, after that hon member s speech on the previous day, when he thought that the hon member was about to die on the floor,—from the absence of the hon member, and not seeing the hon the Attorney-General in his place, he (Mr Reynolds) feared that something very serious had occurred—(much laughter)—until he saw the hon. member (Mr Hawker) in his place The hon member informed them that he was the only squatter in the House—the only squatter who earned his bread by squatting (Great laughter) If that hon member was to be taken as a type of his class, he was certainly a very good one—(renewed laughter)—and if he lived on the bread he earned from his squatting it must be very good bread too (Renewed laughter) It seemed to him that the hon member lived on very sumptuous fare, and if they were to tax a class he thought the hon gentleman's class could afford to pay more taxes than they did at present The hon gentleman's address was fair and effective in a certain sense, and he (Mr Reynolds) did not want to depreciate it considering that the hon member stood alone and was defending his class But let hon members look at the squatters and say did they contribute their fair proportion to the revenue He (Mr Reynolds) said unhesitatingly "No," for this had been clearly shown to his mind by the hon the Treasurer, in addition to what had been said by the hon member (Mr Neales) What did they find? They found that, in order to obtain cheap labor, the squatters, as a class, were more anxious than any other class for free immigration They wanted cheap labor and cheap land Only think of 10s a square mile as an annual rent! It was nonsense to cry out about an increase of 100 per cent, for what would it amount to on a square mile? Take the distance from Adelaide to Gawler Town—26 miles, of one mile in width, for £26 a year! It was monstrous to cry out about taxation of that sort What else did they find? They found that woolpacks were imported free of duty Then, as a class, the squatters had cheap land, cheap labour and cheap woolpacks They paid precious little towards the Government or the taxation of the colony It was time there was a change and he hoped the Government would stick to the Bill If a Select Committee were a representation of public opinion they would report that two-pence a head was not enough, and they would increase it very greatly There was no question about the liability of squatters to be taxed for local purposes, the Government could meet them there, could they not be taxed and the money spent in those localities? Was it not possible to agree to put the Bill into such a shape as would meet both purposes? For instance, the south-eastern district represented by Mr Hawker Victoria was a splendid country In that district they wanted a tramway Could not that district be assessed for a tramway? That would be for local purposes, and would it not be serving the Mosquito Plains, Mount Gambier, and all those neighbouring districts? But while they were looking to the future what were they to say in regard to the sums of money expended in the past years? The colonists had been taxed for bridges, roads, magistrates, and other purposes and the squatters had not paid much towards those expenses He therefore thought they should pay the 2d a head, because they had received great advantages from the public revenue If the squatters were entitled to take up runs at 10s a square mile, why should not the farmers do the same? Why should they not have a 14 years' lease as well as the squatter? And if he could grow wheat why should he not? The squatters were a privileged class in the community, but it was time a little change took place He was very much affected by the pathetic appeal of the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), when he spoke of the lives lost in looking for runs, but it struck him (Mr Reynolds) that those lands were so valuable to the squatters that it was worth while running great risks to occupy them, and that, he believed was the reason why those unfortunate gentlemen undertook those risks The House would believe that it was not his intention to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay, that the Bill be read that day six months, but it was his intention to go with the Government if they would go If they would not he did not know what to do If a Select Committee were proposed he should vote against it, for he thought it likely by such an expedient the question would be shelved altogether Was not that the argument of the Government when he wished the question of salaries to be referred to a Select Committee? And if it was likely to have that effect then, it would most probably shelve the question of assessment of stock now He had not heard the Government say that if the House would not support that Bill a dissolution would take place He did not suppose the Attorney-General would recommend that course, neither did he think the Government would resign their places, far otherwise—for he thought they would stick to their seats He should vote for the second reading of the Bill

Mr GLYDE said the consideration of that important question appeared to resolve itself into two points First, had the Parliament the legal or moral right to impose those taxes on the squatters, and, secondly, would it be prudent or expedient to do so? He considered himself in the position of a juror elected by the people to give a verdict on that disputed question between the squatters and the Government, and he had, therefore, taken some pains to master the facts under consideration He was not able to judge of the feeling of interested parties here ten or fifteen years ago He had therefore gone into the documentary evidence, and was obliged to arrive at a different conclusion from the hon member for Victoria That hon member had marked some passages in Council Paper 176, as illustrative of his own views which he (Mr Glyde) had also read, and from which he drew different conclusions His first reference was to the despatch of Sir Henry Young, dated April, 1849, in which he says—"When the Imperial Act comes into operation, the waste lands would be held on lease, and as licenses would be abolished, there would be no assessment except for purposes of local revenue." He thought those words against rather than in favor of the squatters for had Sir Henry Young not referred to the possibility of such assessment, it would have been a strong presumption that he never contemplated it But he evidently expected such an assessment being imposed on sheep and cattle, for in the same despatch he referred to such a contingency He (Mr Glyde) thought that any impartial arbitrator going into that matter, when reference was made to the word "local," would conclude that Sir Henry Young meant colonial or South Australian legislation He could not mean district legislation That word therefore means "South Australian." The third point that struck one was that the word, "local" was used in London in that sense In letters and powers of attorney from home the word "local" was continually used, and it meant "colonial" It seemed clear then that the expression "local purposes" was used to distinguish between an assessment for colonial and for Imperial purposes He believed he was right in saying that at that time half the land revenue went to the Imperial Government It was therefore meant that the squatters should not be assessed for that purpose but for South Australian purposes He would observe also that section 5 of that Order in Council was merely an explanatory clause, evidently a second thought on the part of the Council It said that nothing in that order should be allowed to interfere with the right of the Colonial Legislature to impose from time to time such assessment as might be deemed necessary for local purposes upon the lands or upon the cattle grazing thereon Take out that clause in imagination, and what was there to prevent the Legislature from imposing any tax whatever As an arbitrator, therefore, seeing the many difficulties in the way, would naturally suppose the squatters would be careful in signing their leases They were not ignorant men, they were generally gentlemen of education, and he found in those leases a clause binding them to pay all taxes and assessments imposed either on their lands, or cattle, or sheep Taking those things, therefore, into consideration, he (Mr Glyde) believed that Parliament had a right to impose the tax He confessed he could not see his way very clearly as to the prudence or expediency of an assessment on sheep and cattle, and had not a motion been made for a Select Committee by his hon colleague (Mr Barrow), he (Mr Glyde) had intended to have proposed the postponement of the second reading of the Bill, and to have referred the question to the Select Committee on Taxation With respect to that measure, as on the distillation question, he doubted the expediency of taxing large portions of the community, for particular interests, so he had doubts as to taxing one particular interest for the benefit of the mass of the population He thought, therefore, this question naturally fell on the Committee on Taxation, and he hoped the Government would postpone the second reading of the Bill until that Committee had reported He generally supported the Government, but could not then go with them It was possible the report of that Committee might be of such a character that all fiscal regulation might be done away with, and direct taxation on income and property be adopted The second reading was therefore premature, and therefore he could not vote in favour of it

Mr PEAKE said had he consulted popularity he would have voted for the Bill, but he would not be influenced by such a motive. He would only be influenced by right reason and justice He would therefore take time to consider and adopt the expedient of a Select Committee He had listened to, and afterwards read the address of the Attorney-General, and regretted that he had introduced a measure of that importance without assigning a reason founded on sound political economy for doing so He had alluded instead to the supposed feeling out of doors and in that House, and had made sweeping assertions that certain members of the community held certain acres of land at certain stipulated prices, in order to ask the House to adopt a novel system of policy opposed to the one hitherto followed, and to inaugurate a new fiscal system, without giving any reason for its doing so That course had not satisfied a great many persons either in the House or out of it He had heard nothing to shake his opinion that the House had power to impose a tax upon the people whenever the exigencies of the country required it He therefore could not go with the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), but the Attorney-General had not shown that exigency to exist, and had not given any reason why one class should be singled out for a special tax, and held up to the public view and made the front of attack It was said that the squatters did not pay their fair share of taxation, and the Treasurer went into several calculations to prove the number of hands employed by them and the amount of indirect taxes paid by each but it only amounted to the fact that the hands employed were consumers and taxpayers, and was an argument of one class against another class? It was no reason why a tax should be imposed on the squatter, and the grocer should be exempted, that the grocer made half a million by the labor of 10 men and the squatter £100,000 with the help of three. The waste land system here was not the same as the waste land system of other colonies (No, no) Hon members said "no," he would shew them it was so In Victoria and New South Wales the squatters hold the land against the people for 14 years They could not be dispossessed, for they held pre-emptive rights The squatters did not hold waste lands in this colony They could be driven back at six months notice True, after they had expended capital their land could not be taken from them for any stranger, but when wanted for purposes of agriculture they were obliged to go The circumstances of this and the other Australian colonies were essentially different When, therefore, it was stated that in Victoria the tax was 9½ per head, it only proved that the tenure on which they held their runs enabled them to pay that amount It appeared to him that there was a great mistake in the Bill, especially in the mode of levying the assessment, which was very objectionable, for if the runs were only half stocked they were not to be taxed, for the assessment was to be paid on the sheep and cattle, and not on the land It was said as a reason that it was impossible to assess the runs, but as inspectors were always moving about the country he thought it would be easily done He believed the present system proposed to be adopted opposed to the system on which the colony was founded. He should be prepared to tax the sheep and cattle of the squatters, when other classes of the community were included in the taxation, and those who purchased land in the city were told that now it was worth one thousand times what they gave for it, and consequently they ought to pay more to the State If a Bill of that sort included all interests he would endorse it He would not single out one class against another, for if that were done there would be good ground for that class claiming protection when a day of distress came He therefore hoped the House would not hesitate to allow the measure to be fully ventilated by a Select Committee, and that they would adopt a fiscal system adapted to the difference of their position as compared with other colonies

Mr TOWNSEND had listened very attentively to the speech of the hon member for Victoria, when he asked justice at the hands of the House on behalf of those whom he represented He (Mr Townsend) should be sorry to do injustice to any class He would not be a party to break any contracts with the squatters If he thought that by their leases they had no right to be taxed as a class, he would not advocate that course He thought, however, the question resolved itself into, first, whether the House had a legal right to tax the squatters, and secondly, whether they bore their fair share of taxation He had on his memoranda the term that had been alluded to by the hon member (Mr Glyde), and thought that that regulation would not bear the construction the hon member for Victoria put upon it He believed the word "local" was used to distinguish the power of South Australia from the Imperial Parliament He would, however, appeal to the hon members for Victoria and Encounter Bay, and say if they believed that was not the correct construction, let them go to a Select Committee and show that it was not With respect to the other point, whether the squatters paid their fair share of taxation, he had not heard one single reference made to figures by even a solitary member to prove that they did, neither had a solitary argument been adduced to prove it The hon member appealed for justice to the squatters, that hon member should be one of the Select Committee himself and anxious as he (Mr Townsend) was not to do injustice to the squatters, should it be proved in Committee that they did pay their fair share of taxation when that Committee brought up their report he would vote against the Bill He would say however that every road made out of the general revenue and by District Councils, improved the value of the grants of land contiguous to them Improved communication, cheap postages, and other advantages, showed that there was favoritism evinced towards the squatter If it were not so let them go to a Select Committee and shew it The hon member for the Burra and Clare said it was class legislation His (Mr Townsend's) opinion was, class legislation implied sympathy for one class which was not evinced towards other classes, and if the squatters could shew that they paid a fair share of taxation he would vote against the Bill, if not, he would vote for a Select Committee As to the reference that had been made to the feeling out of doors, he did not believe that any member of that House wanted to do otherwise than justly to all classes and he believed that no injustice would be done to the squatters, and that he did not contribute his fair share of taxation He considered that it would be better for them to accept the present Bill as a settlement than risk another election If the Committee sat, let the hon member for Victoria show that any class did not contribute their fair proportion to the burden of the colony, and he (Mr Townsend) would say that they ought to do so He was not influenced by the fact that they were wealthy and able to pay—he wished their wealth was ten times as great—but seeing that there was no legal difficulty in the way of taxing them, he should vote for the second reading, or a Select Committee should that amendment be proposed

Mr SOLOMON said after what he had heard before entering the House, he was induced to suppose that a case had been made out by the hon member for Victoria, showing that injustice would be done to the squatters by legislating on the motion before them But since he entered the House that day, he had seen the only document by which they claimed to have a right to disclaim against the interference of that House with reference to assessment on sheep and cattle The particular clause in that lease struck him, and he believed others also, that so far from there having been no intention to exclude the squatters from assessment, such intention was considered years ago, when the leases were first granted, and the contingency was provided for by the form of lease and the Council papers read to the House that day In the form of lease the intention of the Legislature was before them That intention was that, were it wished to levy an assessment on sheep and cattle, they should have the power to do so He was convinced of the legality of that assessment, and therefore should vote for it He considered that, as a class, the squatters paid less towards the revenue of the country than any others, and they enjoyed much that no other class enjoyed It was argued by the hon member for Victoria that because an individual employed some 50 or 100 persons on his station he contributed in a greater ratio to the revenue in consequence He (Mr Solomon) need hardly ask hon members to repudiate such a lame line of argument as that, for all knew that when that hon member engaged those persons he got them on the cheapest terms he could, and took care of the quantity of rations he gave out, and although, in the first instance, he advanced the money to the revenue, it was ultimately paid by the employed not by the employer By Return 121 he found that the squatters occupied 24,489 square miles of land, for which they paid the enormous rent of 13,400*l* per annum, or about an average of 11s per square mile Assuming that each acre throughout the tract of country carried one sheep at 2d per head, the squatters would be taxed at the rate of 5*l* 6s 8d per square mile, or something like on an average 2½d per head per sheep, or assuming the land at 5s an acre, and sheep at 20s per head, the tax would then be about 3½ per cent per annum He had to learn on what ground the squatters claimed to be better treated than any other interest in the colony They well knew that if an agriculturist came out with 5,000*l* and wished to purchase 10,000*l* worth of land, he would have to pay first by borrowing money at a heavy rate of interest How was it that the agriculturist could not take a lease of land as well as a squatter? ("He can," from Mr Duffield) The hon member for Barossa says he can He (Mr Solomon) admitted it, but he could not under the same advantages as the squatter, and therefore the squatter had a considerable advantage over him The squatters were determined to resist any encroachment on that advantage (Hear, from Mr Hawker) The hon member for Victoria said "hear " He (Mr Solomon) was glad he endorsed the opinions which he expressed, but the time had arrived when the squatters must contribute a fair share towards the taxation of the colony They did not do so now He would allude to a statement made by the hon member for Burra and Clare (Mr Peake), that the House might not be misled That hon gentleman had stated that the squatters in Victoria possessed leases But he (Mr Solomon) contradicted this, they held no leases, but held their runs on sufferance, and were liable to be driven back from them at any moment And these squatters were subject to an assessment of 9½d per head, and they did not complain, for they found that even then it paid them well Notwithstanding this the South Australian squatters came forward and made a stand against an assessment of 2d per head He would allude to another argument put by the same hon member—the absurd notion which he attempted to enunciate, that they had as little right to tax the grocer or any other tradesman in Hindley or Rundle-street as the squatter But there was no similarity in the cases The shopkeeper of Hindley or Rundle-street held his property by purchase, whereas the squatter was merely the tenant of the Crown He would mention a circumstance which occurred a few days before the election for the city of Adelaide He (Mr Solomon) was met in North Adelaide by a gentleman holding one of the most extensive runs in the colony That gentleman asked him whether he was going to support the proposed assessment on stock, and followed it up by saying that if he (Mr Solomon) did so he would bring such a crusade against him as would entirely destroy his chance of election He (Mr Solomon) replied that he might do his best, that not all his wealth, nor all the interest he could bring to bear upon the matter would injure him One argument used by the gentleman he referred to was that if he (Mr Solomon) as a member of that House put 2d per head on sheep, the squatter would be compelled in self-defence to put 2d per lb on mutton (Laughter) Not that he should object to the extra charge if it were necessary to secure the squatter from loss He would not disguise his feelings as to the amendment which had been made by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), viz, that the Bill be read that day six months He viewed it as merely an artifice more to try the strength of the Government than the real justice of the case—an artifice by which to transfer themselves from the opposition to the Treasury benches But he thought they would be disappointed in their expectations The attempt was made in very bad grace He admitted that the squatters were a useful class, that they had done a great deal of good in exploring the country, and in adding most considerably to our exports, and he would be the last to deprive them of their just dues But he was satisfied they did not bear an equal proportion of taxation with other classes of society If it were deemed necessary to refer the matter to a Select Committee he should have no objection to it in deference to the wishes of the House

Mr HAY supported the second reading of the Bill, but if further information were required he should not oppose it being referred to a Select Committee One thing which had been urged in the course of the debate was the question of profit or non-profit as attached to the occupation of the squatters But he did not view it in that light, and would set aside all such arguments If seven or eight years ago a settler purchased a run and it turned out well so much the better for him and so much the better for South Australia But when they came to the question of legality or non-legality, that was another thing He had listened to the speech of the member for Victoria, but he could not come to the same conclusions he had come to From the despatch of Sir Henry Young, dated 23rd February, 1849, he clearly understood that the power was reserved in the hands of the Government to make an assessment on stock The member for Victoria had put forth a very glowing picture of the loss of life which attended the explorations of the squatter That hon gentleman had shown that under the present system all this misfortune took place, and for that reason, if for no other purpose, there should be an assessment upon stock to pay the expense of exploration, so that the flockowner might be enabled to change his position, and proceed into the back country without risking his life It might be argued that the farmer should also be compelled to contribute to the expense of exploration But he denied this The farmer purchased the fee-simple of his land, and did not require to change about it, while the squatter held his land on a short tenure only, and must retire before the advance of the agriculturist For no more legitimate purposes, therefore, could this assessment be applied than to save the squatter from the peril and risk which had been complained of It might be very well for those wealthy squatters, who enjoyed a town life, and who, when they required to explore a run, had the means to do so, but he would remind them that there were other squatters not in such a favorable position as regarded wealth and whose interests they should legislate for as well as for the more wealthy Exploration should be kept up with vigor, and they would then have no more of those harrowing scenes which had been related to that House If this plan had been followed out the fate of poor Coulthard might have been averted Even at present a large sum was expended in exploration, and he thought the paper which was read by the Treasurer showed pretty plainly the expense to which the revenue was put in providing runs for the squatters, and that the revenue received from them did not bear a proper proportion to the outlay It was for the interest of the squatters that this assessment should be made, that they might not have the opportunity of saying when their runs were intruded upon by the advance of agriculture—Where shall we go? It was not all of them that had the energy which Swinden had exhibited, in pushing his explorations further and further into the interior If any of the class he had referred to were too idle to find runs for themselves, the assessment would enable the Government to do so for them, and under certain regulations they would be compelled to retire before the farmer, faster than they had manifested any disposition to do so at present A gentleman connected with this colony, Mr Jacob Hagen, once said that no squatter should be allowed to have more than a fourteen years lease, nor hold a run within thirty miles south, thirty miles east, and one hundred miles north of Adelaide, but how slightly was his principle adhered to As to the revenue which would arise from this assessment, he did not believe it would be so great as had been anticipated by the Treasurer The assessment on stock would induce the squatters, in his opinion, to purchase more land, and the additional purchase of land would reduce the amount receivable from assessment The 7th clause provided that no assessment should be levied on any run which had not been held for a certain time This, he thought, was a most wise provision If the squatter went further into the interior, let him go free of assessment altogether Let there be no assessment unless there had been an occupation for five or seven years This provision was a redeemable feature in the Bill, as it would place the squatter in the most favorable position to take up new country at the lowest possible amount of assessment He had no desire to put any undue taxation on the squatters, further than to prevent them from becoming a burden to the colony He should support the second reading of the Bill, but if any desire was manifested that it should be referred to a Select Committee of this House he would agree to it

Mr BAKEWELL said the question was too important to be shirked by the absence of any expression of opinion, although he felt that the views he would have urged had been in some measure anticipated by previous speakers The speech of the hon member for Victoria was such an able one, that it did him infinite credit He would be compelled to vote against the Bill because he considered the Government, in introducing it, had not advanced sufficient argument to induce him to support it, in fact, the only reason that was adduced for the course which was being taken was this—the squatters were wealthy, their occupation was a lucrative one, they had lands at a low rental, considering the present state of the colony, and we should be glad to get them back He denied the justice of such a method of reasoning as that It was an attempt to increase the rent of the runs during the currency of the leases, in fact a breach of faith—(no, no)—finding that they had made a bad bargain What would be said of a gentleman who let an acre of land in the city at a very low rate, say some years ago, when property was merely at a nominal rate, and who attempted during the currency of that lease to screw out a higher rent? Such was the case with the squatters and the Government He would oppose the Bill as being a breach of faith As to the squatters being rich that had nothing to do with it He remembered the time when the squatters were poor enough It was a hazardous occupation, and if such another revolution occurred as had taken place before they might still be in a less wealthy position If they taxed sheep it would be tantamount to taxing meat Politicians said, "when you tax production you also tax the consumer" They might rest assured that if they imposed this assessment upon sheep mutton would be much higher His opinion was that the despatch of Sir Henry Young could not be interpreted in that wide sense which had been attributed to it, and the form of lease which was held by the squatter, also confuted the interpretation which was attempted to be put upon it Mr Bonney, the late Commissioner of Crown Lands had given it as his opinion that what was meant by "local purposes" was money absolutely spent in the locality It was never contemplated, he was sure that the squatters would have to pay double the rate which now existed He was not opposed to their being taxed for local purposes, even the friends of the squatters did not dispute their right to do this As the question appeared to be a trial of strength between parties, he should vote for the amendment

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had thought that after the candid manner in which the subject had been handled, especially by the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) there would be little left for him to say They had been told yesterday by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) that if this assessment on stock were imposed it would raise the price of meat, and notwithstanding the conclusive argument which had been advanced during the debate against that assumption, still it had been brought forward by the hon member who had just sat down He would point to a few facts In New South Wales the squatter paid 3*l* per square mile for his runs, in addition to an assessment, and nevertheless joints of mutton were to be had there for 3d per lb He believed that this assessment would, instead of increasing, reduce the price of beef and mutton He was satisfied that candid enquiries, careful consideration of the despatch of Sir Henry Young, and the Orders in Council, would lead to no other conclusion than that the right of assessing it any future period was reserved The word "local" was used only as opposed to the word "imperial" The hon member for the Sturt had repeated a remark as to the "shilly-shallying" policy of the Government, and had implied to the House that he did not know how to vote His speech, however, clearly conveyed his intentions in this respect With respect to the appointment of a Select Committee, he should take the same course as the Government had previously taken on all similar occasions where information was required, and that was, support it by all means And he considered the Government were acting quite right in consenting to this course, as on the Kapunda Railway Bill In fact it would be absolutely wrong on the part of the Government if they refused to concede when information was required But he was nevertheless, fully convinced of the result He was satisfied the squatters did not contribute fairly to the revenue, and that Bill was intended to meet the defect But it did not press too hardly upon the squatter, it did not insist upon the twenty shillings in the pound It did not insist upon the 'pound of flesh,' but it only provided that they should pay something approximating to what they were entitled to pay If they only looked into the Supplementary Estimates for this year, 1858, they would find votes there especially for the benefit of the squatter, and when they added these sums together and considered the amount which was annually expended for their service, no candid mind could resist the conclusion which he himself had come to

Mr MILDRED would vote for the second reading of the Bill, but would at the same time agree to its being referred to a Select Committee if thought desirable The question was one which should be calmly considered They should not draw a line between the squatter and any other class of the community, but should view them all through one medium. He trusted the hon. member for Encounter Bay would withdraw his amendment, as by so doing he would not fetter the free action of the House. He was not inclined to enter into the labyrinth of the hon. member for Victoria, it had been so fully commented on already. He objected to class legislation. It might be said that the present assessment would only hold good during the existence of the present Parliament, and that the squatters would have no guarantee that the settlement of the question would be a final one. He had no doubt, however, that what this House pledged itself to, would be recognised by any succeeding Parliament. He considered the title of squatter a misnomer. The squatting interest had long ceased to exist. There was a time when this term would have applied with some force, but in the course of events the squatter became the flockmaster. No doubt the squatting interest at one time was very low, but he never knew the time but that when it was low the agricultural interest was not much lower. He was glad to say that the flockmaster had triumphed in his position, and in most cases it was not accomplished by means of wealth but by the determination to bear the inconveniences and hardships of the occupation without murmur. The squatters as a body deserved all they got, they had changed their bullock dray for the dashing trap with silver mounted harness, their shepherd's crook for a golden headed cane, they had seized upon the golden fleece, and nuggets of gold were dropping out of it into their pockets.

Mr. YOUNG supported the second reading of the Bill, and although he did not object to the fullest investigation in all cases where it was required, he thought there was a great waste of time sometimes in withholding information which it might be useful for them to discuss in the whole House. The Commissioner of Public Works had referred to figures in his possession, which would be conclusive. He would ask why these were withheld. He did not consider it a breach of faith in placing the assessment upon stock. But even admitting it to be so, did not the circumstances of the case warrant it. (No, no.) The first sections that were sold in the colony were sold with the right of one square mile of pasturage. They therefore had a precedent for such a course of action.

The debate was then adjourned, and made an Order of the Day for Friday.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

On the motion of the TREASURER, the consideration of the Supplementary Estimates was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

The further consideration of this Bill was, upon the motion of the TREASURER, made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next.

COLONIAL DEFENCES.

Captain HART moved—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to take evidence and report on the question of Colonial Defences, and that the papers now on the table upon that important subject be referred to such Committee."

If the reports and papers in connection with this subject had been as clear and full and explanatory as they might have been, the House would have had all that was necessary without appointing a Select Committee, but he had put this motion on the paper, believing it was absolutely necessary that they should have further information before proceeding to vote the very large sum which was proposed for colonial defences. In speaking upon this important question, he would call attention to the fact that before the question of defences should in reality be considered, they should first consider who was likely to assail them. That was a question which had not been fully considered, nor had the difficulties which would have to be encountered in assailing the colony been considered. Those difficulties arose in consequence of the great distance of the port at which a sufficient force must be fitted out, and the probability that the only place at which this could be effectively done was Europe itself. In consequence of the distance, they would, in all probability, not only have notice of such an expedition being fitted out, but if it were projected in Europe, it would be defeated by the British Government with the immense power which they had in their hands. It would be scarcely possible that an expedition could be fitted out to land a thousand men and take the town and put the residents under contribution unless the enemy had the complete mastery of the seas. A thousand men had not been landed in any British colony during the late war, and in no instance, he believed, had a British colony been taken at all by the enemy. In no instance, he believed, had so many as 500 men been landed. Unquestionably in some cases attacks had been made on small British colonies by combinations of privateers, but it was impossible for a privateer to live in these seas—first because to be useful she must be a steamer, and it was impossible for steamers to come here without depots for coals which could not be obtained in these seas. It appeared to him, therefore, that no enemy of that kind was likely to assail them; no enemy would attempt to land a body of troops, as the expedition could not be fitted out without the knowledge of the Home Government, and with the facilities which the British Government possessed she would crush such an expedition long before it could arrive in these seas. There was a force, however, by which they might be assailed. A ship of war or two might arrive in these seas and lay us under contribution by shelling Glenelg or the Port, he believed that was the only contingency. Vessels might arrive, and in a few hours shell the Port if their demands were not complied with. They would probably first send a flag of truce on shore, and say that, unless a certain sum of money were put on board, they would destroy all the shipping in the harbor. That was the only contingency which had to be guarded against. It would be perfectly impossible from such a squadron as could be fitted out, to land a force sufficient to put the town under contribution. Hon. members might think that a large body of men could be landed from two or three frigates, but such was not the case, as the landing of a 100 men from a frigate of 44 guns was an exceptional case. He had known instances of 50 men and 50 seamen being landed out of a frigate, but he did not believe there was ever a greater number landed than 100 men. No naval force which could come into these seas could land a 1000 men. His Excellency in his despatch had recommended a gunboat, but this appeared to him to be a great mistake. He did not know how His Excellency had arrived at the conclusion that such a vessel would be efficient for the defence of this colony, or, indeed, any defence at all; for a gunboat was not for the purpose of defence but offence, and was intended to go into shallow water to bombard towns. Besides a gunboat only carried two or three guns, and of what use would they be against a frigate's broadside? The very best thing that a gunboat could do would be to take advantage of her shallow draft of water and get away. The Home Government were likely to be led astray completely by the statement that a gunboat would be of any value here. There were some things which it was important the Home Government should know, and these had not been touched upon at all. In considering the defences of the colony, it was most important that they should consider the intercolonial telegraph. If a hostile force appeared in this gulph and remained there for two or three days, they would be caught in a trap and could never escape, because a communication could be sent to Melbourne, where the force for the protection of the goldfields was stationed, and in forty-eight hours there might be inside Kangaroo Island a force greater than the enemy. The Home Government had not yet been informed that there was telegraphic communication between the two colonies, and he hoped the Select Committee would direct attention to that point, as it would be of essential service to the Home Government. It might be said that the Home Government knew these things, but he happened to know that they did not, because when questions of this kind came before the Ministry, they did not look up information and important points were overlooked, unless attention was specially drawn to them. Fourteen or fifteen years ago, a great question arose between England and America in reference to the boundary question, and the danger of war between the two countries was quite as imminent as it was at the present moment. He spoke to a gentleman to whom he had been introduced and informed him where, in the event of a war between the two countries, a very severe blow might be struck by England and on a day or two afterwards he received intimation that if he called on a certain nobleman in Portland-place, he should be glad to introduce him to the Colonial Secretary, for the purpose of making a statement in reference to the matter. He was taken by this nobleman in his carriage to Downing street, and had an interview with the present Premier, Lord Stanley, from whom he received thanks for the information which he afforded. He found His Lordship as ignorant of colonial questions as a man well could be, and the suggestions which he gave His Lordship, if acted upon, in the event of a war, would he was satisfied, have caused a blow to be struck which would have crippled the United States most completely. They had the power to give the Home Government information as to how this colony could be defended, but it was ridiculous to suppose they could of themselves raise a sufficient naval force. With respect to the report of Captain Freeling, stating that it would be well to have a battery on Torrens Island, he thought if a vessel once got over the bar, they would not want a battery to take her. He was of opinion that a battery there would not be of the slightest service, in fact the enemy would take the battery before the men could get there. The Port and the Semaphore were the only places at which shelling could take place, and if a platform were erected inside the sandhills, with a bale of bags, a battery could be made which would defy six ships' companies to take. A battery being established at Glenelg and guns placed in position at the Semaphore would be sufficient, as they would find sufficient volunteer artillerymen, who by firing at a mark in the water would become in a short time more expert than artillerymen generally were. He believed that 50 artillerymen at Port Adelaide and 50 at Glenelg would be all that would be necessary. He did not wish, however, to establish such a volunteer force as they had before, as they were not the right class of men; but there were a number of spirited young men who would willingly submit to a certain amount of drill, and quickly become expert in the use of the splendid rifles which the Government had in store.

Mr. STRANGWAYS, in seconding the motion, remarked that the hon. mover's remedy for shelling the Port was to "shell out." (Oh.)

The TREASURER agreed with a good deal that had fallen from the hon. mover, but remarked that the guns which were in the colony were only fit for land forces. They were only six and nine-pounders, and would be mere popguns brought against a naval force. The Home Government had in consequence been asked to send out guns of proper calibre. He thought the hon. member (Mr. Hart) had very unjustly decried the volunteers, who were as fine a body of men as any in the colony, and were as complete in the Company drill as many regiments of the line. It was not their fault that they had not proper arms, but if they could be reorganised he was satified they would in a very few days become expert in the use of the rifles which the Government had in store.

The motion was carried, and the Committee appointed were the hon. the Treasurer, Messrs. Bagot, Hawker, Macdermott, Mildred, Peake, and Captain Hart. The report to be brought up October 6th.

GAWLER TOWN.

Upon the motion of Mr. DUFFIELD, the petition recently presented by him from the Mayor and Corporation of Gawler Town was ordered to be printed.

The House adjourned shortly before 6 o'clock.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 1 o'clock.

CAMEL TROOP COMPANY.

Mr. SOLOMON presented a petition from the Camel Troop Company, praying the House to agree to an address to His Excellency soliciting him to place upon the Estimates the sum of £1,200 to aid the Company in carrying into effect their purposes.

The petition was received, but was so voluminous that the hon. member did not move that it be read, merely giving notice that on Wednesday next he should move that it be printed.

MESSRS. O'HALLORAN AND BREWER.

Upon the motion of Mr. PEAKE the notice of motion in his name was postponed for the purpose of affording Mr. Reynolds an opportunity of putting the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Attorney-General (Mr. Hanson) whether the Ministry were not pledged by a written promise to support the prayer of the memorial of Messrs. O'Halloran and Brewer when brought under the consideration of the House; and, if such promise was given, why it was not redeemed on Friday last?"

Mr. REYNOLDS regretted that the Attorney-General was not in his place, but suggested that the hon. the Treasurer might be in a position to answer the question. He understood that Ministers were bound to support the petition of the gentlemen referred to in his motion, but it appeared to him that they did not do so, and he had put the notice upon the paper for the purpose of ascertaining whether the information which he had received was correct.

The TREASURER, in reply to the hon. member, stated that when the question was under consideration in the House the Ministry did support it by voting for it, except himself, who being personally interested in the question, withdrew from the House.

THE RIVER MURRAY.

Mr. REYNOLDS brought forward the notice in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Blyth) whether the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria have replied to the communication from this Government, with reference to the clearing operations on the River Murray, forwarded in the early part of the year; if so, the nature of those replies? Also, whether the snag-boat is still engaged in clearing operations, at what part of the river, under whose charge, and what checks are kept on the expenditure? And, further, whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the work of removing snags should the other Governments not join in the operations?"

He was induced to put the question knowing that when the snag-boat was furnished the Government placed themselves in communication with the Governments of Victoria and New South Wales in reference to clearing operations in the River Murray, and he wished to know whether there had been any reply to those communications, and if so what was the nature of it.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS believed that in New South Wales a Select Committee was at that moment sitting upon the subject, but at present the Government had not received any reply from the two Governments referred to. The snag-boat was now placed under the direction and immediate control of the Commissioner of Public Works. At the present time, in consequence of the state of the river, the boat was not engaged in clearing operations, and the commander had received instructions to dismiss all hands but the Engineer, the boat being in fact laid up till the river became lower; when the river was low being the most favorable for the operations of the snag-boat, though the least favorable for the purposes of traffic. The snag-boat was under the command of a gentleman named Hutchinson, a Commander in the Royal Navy. The usual check was kept upon the disbursements, the accounts passing under the strict and severe ordeal of the Audit Office. The Government intended removing snags so far as the votes of that House would permit them, and would take action in accordance with the Estimates of 1859. Some correspondence had taken place upon the subject which he should be happy to lay upon the table if desired.

Mr. REYNOLDS remarked that he did not think the hon. gentleman had answered the last question, as to whether the Government intended to continue the work of removing snags, should the other Governments not join in the operations.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the Government would only go to the extent of the votes of the House. If sums were voted for the purpose of clearing the River Murray, the Government were bound to expend the money for that purpose.

Mr. REYNOLDS was sorry to trouble the hon. gentleman, but would like to know how long the money which had been voted for the purpose was likely to last.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, certainly for the remainder of the present year.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. PEAKE moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is most desirable that imprisonment for debt should be abolished in this province."

He had tabled the motion in the hope of eliciting discussion upon the subject which was a most important one, and he believed he should be enabled to convince the House that the system of imprisonment for debt was an unwise one, and should be abolished in this province. He should have hesitated to assert a general principle like this, had it involved a fiscal or financial question, as in such cases there should always be some solution of the difficulty which the motion was intended to meet. But he thought the House might fairly express an opinion upon the subject, because after they had expressed an opinion the law officers of the Crown might be induced to set about bringing about a remedy. The late Lord Eldon had expressed an opinion in reference to imprisonment for debt. He was a high authority, not giving an incautious opinion, but one which was always received with high respect. Lord Eldon's opinions were frequently alluded to as the axioms and maxims of a high legal functionary. His lordship expressed an opinion that the law of arrest conferred the power of committing greater tyranny than slavery itself. After such an opinion from such a man he thought the House would agree with him that they would not be far wrong in endorsing that opinion. He believed that arrest for debt was a remnant of the old system of legal tyranny which had come down from the dark ages, when incarceration was the remedy which the tyrant took to carry out his will. He believed that the remedy presented by the law of arrest was so incomplete, so unjust, and so prejudicial to the State, that no Legislature desirous of reforming and improving the condition of a country should hesitate to abolish so unjust and unwise a system. In the evidence upon the subject taken before the House of Commons, it appeared that five-sixths of the book debts of tradesmen were under 10*l.*, and it was found that by giving credit tradesmen obtained an excessive price for their goods, and could afford to lose a large amount from the increased prices which they obtained from an extended credit. The credit system had grown into a positive evil, and he should like the Legislature to take action to prevent an unlimited extension of credit, and to prevent those who gave credit from sheltering themselves at the public expense from the consequences of their indiscretion. He did not see why the State should be made to pay for the indiscretion of tradesmen and others who chose to give credit to an injudicious extent. Because these parties inveigled men into their books, and then put on the screw of imprisonment, he did not think the State should step in to uphold such a system. In February, 1827, it was elicited, before the House of Commons that in two years and a-half in London 70,000 people were arrested at a cost of nearly £200,000, and upwards of 12,000 persons of this number were incarcerated upon the mere charge that they were indebted certain sums of money; they were deprived of their liberty before even it was proved that the debts for which they were arrested were really due. That fact itself would be quite sufficient to open the eyes of hon. members. About the same period it was elicited that about 1,120 persons were detained in Horsemonger-lane Gaol for an aggregate amount of debt of £2,417, or an average of £2 3s. 2d. each. In all these cases the State was called upon to maintain the debtors for an indefinite and unlimited period. He believed that imprisonment was a positive premium on fraud, for a man who had committed a fraud, or had induced individuals by false representations to give him credit, might shelter himself in prison, and, being unwilling to have his affairs exposed in the Insolvent Court for fear of consequences or the punishment which he would receive upon an exposé of his fraud, might shelter himself there all his life, and who could call him out? Was it right, he would ask, in such cases that the State should maintain the debtor for the rest of his life? Was it right that the debtor should be enabled to go to gaol, and there shelter himself? Was it right that society should be deprived of the services of the debtor merely because his affairs would not bear investigation? There could be no doubt independently of the objections which he had stated, that the system of imprisonment for debt fostered a reckless spirit of trading. It was clear to him that such was the case, and he maintained it was the duty of that House to put a stop to this. He regretted that the hon. the Attorney General was not present to express his opinion upon this important subject, for, as a private member, he felt scarcely competent to grapple with it.

Mr. MACDERMOTT had listened with great pleasure to the statement of the hon. member for the Burra, and if no other member had undertaken to second the motion, he should do so with pleasure. It was a most irrational mode of proceeding, to place a man in prison in order to pay his debts. A man when deprived of his liberty could make no effort to that end. Besides it was great cruelty to imprison a man under such circumstances, for if the man happened to have a family they would be left destitute during the term of his imprisonment. He thought, however, that it would be necessary to make a provision by which fraudulent debtors should be subjected to imprisonment, and he also thought there should be a provision by which parties might be subjected to imprisonment if there were reasonable grounds for believing that they were about to leave the colony, leaving debts unliquidated. He had been very much pleased indeed to hear the arguments of the hon. mover, with which he heartily concurred, and he hoped the motion would meet the sanction of the House.

Mr. SOLOMON said he had listened with some attention to the hon. member for the Burra, and the arguments which the hon. member had brought forward were such as he should have expected from a philanthropist. The question before the House was one of great difficulty. He admitted with the hon. member that the way to punish men who could not pay their debts was not to put them in gaol, but there was another class who probably could pay if they pleased, but were unwilling, and there were others again to whom the hon. member had alluded, who, having committed fraud, were glad to shelter themselves within a gaol. But he maintained that the only class who would so shelter themselves were debtors who had committed fraud, and were in consequence afraid to expose their affairs in the Insolvent Court. In legislating they must take care not to legislate for the protection of men who, after committing frauds, were too glad to shelter themselves in a gaol. Such men did not deserve protection. Still, however, he, being deeply engaged in trade, wished to see imprisonment for debt to a great extent abolished. The present insolvent law was so liberal in its provisions, that it afforded every man who was not afraid to expose his affairs, an opportunity of avoiding the trouble and indignity of going for a moment inside a gaol. He could not, therefore, see the utility of enunciating such a principle as that involved in the motion to which they were asked to assent by the hon. member for the Burra. The hon. member for Flinders had alluded to a class who were about to leave the colony without liquidating the claims upon them, and he would ask how were such men to be held if not by imprisonment. It was absolutely necessary that creditors should be in a position to arrest such parties. If upon affidavit it could be shewn that a fraudulent debtor was about to leave the colony without submitting his affairs to the proper tribunal, it was right that such a person should be sent to gaol. They would be ceasing to act with humanity if they afforded the same protection to such a man as to the honest trader, and he should certainly oppose any motion which went to the extent of that of the hon. member for the Burra.

Mr. STRANGWAYS was also opposed to the motion, and was rather surprised to find such a notice in the name of the hon. member for the Burra, who had on numerous occasions, denounced the principle of enunciating by resolution any principle of this kind. He repeated that the hon. member for the Burra had frequently denounced such a course, and hence it was that he was rather surprised to find such a resolution in the name of the hon. member for the Burra. The hon. member had quoted the opinion of Lord Eldon, but there was another opinion by quite as good a lawyer, and as high an authority, to the effect that if a man could not pay with his purse he must pay with his person. If they were to go the whole length with the hon. member for the Burra and Clare, he believed it would be highly prejudicial. If the abolition of debt conferred any advantages he believed those benefits would be more than counterbalanced. Under the present law a man whose affairs were embarrassed need not remain in gaol more than 21 days, as at the expiration of that period he could obtain protection from the Insolvent Court. He admitted that it was undesirable that parties should be enabled to shelter themselves from the consequences of their fraudulent conduct by remaining in gaol and avoiding all enquiry. The hon. member who brought forward this resolution had stated that imprisonment for debt was a remnant of the dark ages, but it was not the only remnant of the dark ages which might with advantage be kept up in modern times. There were many customs in the dark ages which, though now abolished, might with great advantage be introduced in the present day, and he would leave the hon. member for the Burra (Mr. Peake) to ascertain what customs he alluded to. As to the cruelty of incarcerating a man, which had been alluded to by the hon. member for Flinders, no doubt the law of arrest did sometimes tell harshly, but so did every other law. The House in dealing with the question must, however, consider, not whether the law might operate, as had been stated, in some isolated cases, but whether on the whole the law as it at present stood was beneficial or otherwise. Hon. members would remember that six or seven years ago the Legislature was called upon to pass a special enactment regarding imprisonment for debt. That Act was passed specially for this colony in consequence of the large number of fraudulent debtors who, after becoming indebted to tradesmen, availed themselves of the first opportunity to go to Melbourne by sea. That Act was passed to enable any creditor making affidavit that a debtor was about to leave the colony to stop the debtor, but if this resolution were passed, the Attorney General would be compelled to introduce a Bill abolishing the previous Act so as to enable debtors to leave the colony when they pleased. On the ground that this was too sweeping a motion, and that if it were carried, all imprisonment for debt must be abolished, he should move the previous question.

Mr. LINDSAY supported the resolution as a general principle. He thought, however, that exceptional cases must be provided for in any legislation upon the subject. It was impossible to controvert the argument of the hon. member for Flinders, that to put a man in gaol instead of enabling him to pay his debts was the very mode to prevent him from doing so. No doubt, the passing of such a resolution as that proposed would affect credit to a very considerable extent, but it would place it upon a much sounder principle than at present. If imprisonment for debt were abolished, parties in giving credit would be guided more by the character of a person, and the argument that a man was good for a certain amount if sued for it would have far less weight. The hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon) had made some remarks in reference to fraudulent debtors, but in such cases the parties would be open to imprisonment, not because they were debtors, but because they had committed fraud. No doubt there were many who had much clearer views upon the question than he had, and consequently he would not detain the House further.

Mr. NEALES did not imagine till that moment that bolters from their engagements would find an advocate in that House. (Laughter.) Nothing but dealing in fallacies or fictions it appeared would do for the atmosphere of that House. How it was to be ascertained whether a debtor was fraudulent or not, until he had been caught, he was at a loss to ascertain. This spirit of humanitarianism came to this—that the humanity was all for the rogues and the cruelty for all the rest of the community. The hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) had stated that a man could obtain relief after remaining 21 days in gaol, but the hon. member had omitted to state there was a greater facility under the Bankruptcy Law, by which a man need not go to gaol at all, but had simply to walk down to the Court and state that he could not pay his debts. That was the honest man's course, but if a man did not like to take that course he must go to gaol. In the present state of commerce in that country, and the facilities which there were for debtors to leave the colony and proceed where creditors could not follow them, if they were to do away with imprisonment for debt, they would in fact be doing away with credit altogether. Instead, as the hon. member (Mr. Lindsay) had said, of regulating credit, it would regularly do away with it. He repeated that the protection afforded by the Insolvent Court was so great that there was no necessity for any honest man to go to gaol. Even the goods of such a man were protected by the Insolvent Court, against the Sheriff as they had had an instance of within the last few days. He contended that the abolition of imprisonment for debt would be one of the most undesirable things that could happen to the colony. When they had a state of society which could be termed, as one of the diggings, Elysium, it might answer, but so long as people were disposed to cheat each other, it would be most unwise to come to such a resolution. He was quite sure there were enough really commercial men the House—not those who merely dealt in fallacies and fictions—who would support the previous question for the purpose of getting rid of one of the purest fallacies ever introduced to that House.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, as one of the members engaged in commerce, opposed the motion, and believed that every member engaged in trade would oppose it. He felt upon this question as he felt upon the bankruptcy laws, and, even at the possibility of being imprisoned for debt, he should endeavor to get rid of the resolution before the House by voting for the previous question. He would, however, go with any hon. member who would introduce a motion rendering it compulsory, after a certain number of days or weeks, imprisonment, that parties should go through the Insolvent Court. He was content to leave that question open for discussion, satisfied that some day it must come under the consideration of the House. It was wrong that men should be permitted to remain in gaol smoking their pipes and playing at cards at the expense of himself and others. However small the sum might be, still it was quite clear that the amount was divided amongst the tax-payer, so that every tax-payer contributed something. He thought that such parties should be compelled after the expiration of twenty-one days to go through the Insolvent Court. If the debtor were an honest man he would come out of the Court with a certificate to that effect, but it he were shewn to have been fraudulent he would be put on the other side of the gaol and contribute to the revenue through the medium of the road-making capabilities of the colony He should oppose the resolution, for he should not like to be placed in the position of meeting a fraudulent debtor upon the Wharf, who coolly raised his hat and said "I'm off to Port Curtis," without having any power to detain him

Mr TOWNSEND said the hon the Commissioner of Public Works had expressed he believed the views of every commercial man He was unfortunately called upon weekly and sometimes daily to attend meetings of creditors, and he never saw in any part of the world so strong a disposition to assist the honest but unfortunate debtor as there was in South Australia. During the last four months he had attended twenty four meetings of this character, and at each of those, or at any at which there were the slightest indications of the debtor being an honest man, the creditors had held out to him facilities to pursue his business, and to lend him a helping hand In many instances, the creditors had taken the debtor by the hand, wished him success, and given him any time and assistance he required, satisfied with his honesty and straightforwardness He concurred in the observations which had been made in reference to debtors lying in gaol The fact was they got used to it (Laughter) They got up balls, and played whist Such practices should be put a stop to (No, no) He only meant amongst the debtors in gaol of course He felt that he must vote for the previous question, and he hoped that the attention of the Government having been drawn to the subject, steamers which traded between this and the neighbouring colonies would not be permitted to leave on Sunday unless the list of passengers had been posted up on the previous Saturday

Mr MCELLISTER opposed the motion, feeling that no honest man need be in poverty in South Australia (Oh!) If a man were honest he would not go beyond his means Instead of doing away with imprisonment for debt he would imprison fraudulent debtors for life (Laughter) It was too bad that such men should be supported at the public expense.

Mr BURFORD, under the circumstances, must vote for the previous question, though not with that good will which he could have desired to feel He felt there was a difficulty, but he did not see the way of overcoming it He agreed with the Commissioner of Public Works that fraudulent debtors should be compelled to abandon their pleasurable pursuits within the walls of the gaol, but he contended that imprisonment should never be enforced until the accused party had had a fair trial By the English law a man's person was sacred His feeling was that where it was thought fraud could be brought home to a debtor he should be subjected to a proper tribunal, but that until an adverse verdict had been pronounced he should be protected against imprisonment Occasionally great injuries might be inflicted by subjecting persons to imprisonment It was not every man who was so versed in the proceedings of the Insolvent Court as to be able to take the straight road and obtain immediate protection Some persons made a mistake and took the wrong road, and sometimes consulted those who knew as little about the matter as themselves He was satisfied that there were many instances in which persons were imprisoned unjustly, but still he could not see his way to support the motion He felt that the question must be left an open one, and in considering it he hoped the point would not be lost sight of that he had suggested, that persons should not be subjected to imprisonment for debt until they had a fair trial according to law

Dr WARK objected to two motion on two grounds first on account of its sweeping nature, and secondly, because he objected to legislating by resolution He did not think that the hon mover should persist in so sweeping a resolution after those hon members who were connected with business had so clearly shewn that it would not do No good purpose would be effected by the resolution, but it would afford facilities for fraud As the law at present stood there were great facilities for the protection of honest debtors It appeared to him that the resolution, was quite uncalled for at the present moment, and that even at present fraudulent debtors had too much liberty He would be the last to subject an honest man to imprisonment, but in reference to the remark of the previous speaker that no man should be subjected to imprisonment until he had a fair trial, he would remark that the trial must be of a very summary character, for if a man were going to bolt he might be at Port Curtis before a summons could be got (Laughter) To legislate by resolution was exceedingly objectionable, and if they passed such a Bill as was proposed, he was convinced that the good sense of the other House would induce them to send it back, or at least it ought

Mr COLE moved that the House divide

The motion was carried, and Mr Peake's motion was put and lost.

MR J F DUFF

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS (in the absence of Mr Bakewell) the petition of Mr J F Duff was ordered to be printed

WATER SUPPLY

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS (in the absence of Mr Neales), the petition of the Corporation of the City of Adelaide, respecting the Water Supply, was ordered to be printed

VALLEY OF THE STURT

Mr HAY brought forward the notice in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) if it is the intention of the Government to have a survey of the Valley of the Sturt made, as recommended by Mr William Hanson in his Report in Paper No 47"

He wished the practicability of a railroad to the Murray to be taken into consideration on an early day, so that they might not in the first instance make a portion of it, and then get into a dispute as to which was the best line It was desirable that the survey referred to should be carried out, and if necessary he would give notice of an address to His Excellency, praying that the necessary means might be provided

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was the intention of the Government to have the survey undertaken to which the hon member alluded The opinion of the Chief Engineer was so strong upon the point that the Government felt it was exceedingly desirable to have further information before proceeding with the route

Upon the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS the petition presented by him from the District Council of Port Elliot and Goolwa was ordered to be printed

PETITION OF JOHN HINDMARSH

Mr NEALES expressed a desire to amend the motion standing in his name by striking out the latter portion and adding the words "report the result to this House" The motion would then read—

"That the petition of John Hindmarsh be referred to a Select Committee, for the purpose of examining into his claims and report the result to this House"

The claims to which he referred had been well known to the Government for some time past He believed the petitioner had an acknowledged claim The petition was before the House last year, but no action was then taken upon it He now begged to refer the matter to a Select Committee, and he believed he might go so far as to say that whatever the amount of the claims acknowledged by the Committee might be that the Government would willingly meet them He need not go into details The evidence was ready, and the Committee need not be detained long It was intimated by the Government in a correspondence which took place last year, that if the claims could be established there would be no difficulty about the settlement of them

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS seconded the motion, and thought his doing so would prove that the Government were desirous of affording Mr Hindmarsh every facility for establishing his claim A very long correspondence had taken place on this matter, extending over a considerable time, and the shortest mode of settling a difficult matter would be to grant the Committee

The motion was agreed to without discussion

ENCOUNTER BAY

Mr LINDSAY moved—"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that the Honorable the Surveyor-General may be instructed to report upon the best line of road from Willunga to Port Elliot (Encounter Bay), with branch to the Goolwa, and branch or branches to Victor Harbor and Rosetta Cove, and that such report when furnished may be laid upon the table of this House" It would be in the recollection of hon members that on several occasions during the last session he had endeavored to bring the whole question of roads before the House, but every effort proved unsuccessful, the general feeling amongst hon members seeming to be, that though the evils of the existing system were acknowledged, the question was too gigantic to be grappled with, and that, therefore, no general resolution on the subject should be entertained He hoped on the present occasion, when he sought to grapple only with a portion of the subject, that hon members would go with him, and that the House would not refuse the very reasonable request contained in the notice before it In the time of Governor Gawler a line of road was marked out from Adelaide to Encounter Bay, His Excellency as Commissioner of Crown Lands, having ascertained approximately where the line should go, and he decided upon going through Hindmarsh Valley By Act No 13 of 1851, it was declared that a main line of road should go to Encounter Bay, but the Engineer was so satisfied of the impracticability of Colonel Gawler's track, that he reported that no outlay would render material service to it His object in the present motion was simply that the House should have such information from the Survey Department as would guide the Central Road Board in their future operations, and especially in the operation of forming a line to Encounter Bay He believed the information could be easily furnished by the Survey Department for he learned from documents in the department that information could be procured at the rate of one mile per diem for each survey party Only about 20 days would be required for the purpose he spoke of, and as the Central Road Board were now proposing to spend some money on one or two portions of the line it was desirable that the expenditure should be made on the best line which could be found He had not the least doubt that an excellent line would be found between Willunga and Port Elliot but it would not be that via the Cut Hill into Hindmarsh Valley He was satisfied that £10,000 judiciously expended on the best line would make a better line between Willunga and Encounter Bay than the present road between Adelaide and Willunga, on which no less than £59 000, and some odd hundreds had been expended, as was shown in the last report of the Commissioner of Public Works He would say no more, as what he asked was so reasonable that he did not anticipate any opposition

Mr HARVEY seconded the motion It was important that the main lines of road should be laid out in the first instance There were several instances, at present, where the main roads were constructed where the bullock drays used to travel as being the easiest way of crossing the rivers He would refer to the Gawler Town road as one showing the necessity of laying out the main roads at first The plain was as level as the floor of the House, and if the Central Road Board had taken the precaution which this motion suggested, the road would have been shortened two miles, besides saving the expense of making two roads, and keeping them in repair

Mr ROGERS opposed the address, as it was only a few days since an address was adopted by the House requesting His Excellency the Governor to cause steps to be taken for the construction of a tramway from Strathalbyn to the Goolwa, Port Elliot, and Encounter Bay It was only folly to expect the Road Board to expend money on this line under such circumstances If the Government took action for the laying down a tramway from Strathalbyn to the Goolwa, it would be the outlet for all that portion of the colony, as it would give the settlers on the sea coast a straight line to Adelaide The motion was therefore unnecessary, and he should oppose it

Dr WARK said after the address of the hon member for Mount Barker, he must express his views on the subject It would be cowardly in him not to do so, as he had lived many years in the district But the hon member for Mount Barker spoke of a road to the east of Port Elliot, and this road was to the west, and was the old acknowledged road Whether the tramway was made or not it would not affect this road In any case it must be made Besides, what the hon member for Encounter Bay asked was merely a survey Even if the road were not to be made it should be laid out, as there was still a considerable amount of land to be sold in the district, and, therefore, the sooner the line was laid out the better He knew of no place where a main line was more wanted

Mr BARROW said the hon member for Mount Barker (Mr Rogers) had advanced a most extraordinary reason for his opposition, namely, that the line terminated at the same place as another This he could not understand If the two roads ran parallel he could understand the hon member's opposition, but to oppose because the two lines terminated at one point seemed the height of folly Perhaps the hon member for Mount Barker looked through a medium which he (Mr Barrow) was not acquainted with—an intellectual mirage or something of the sort—(laughter)—but it certainly was the most unintelligible proposition he had ever heard But he should like to know what the Government thought on this matter They had heard a great deal about schemes of roads, for hon members seemed fond of abstract propositions, but he would rather have some general scheme than that they should go on dealing with a matter of this kind bit by bit

Mr MILDRED supported the original motion The matter had been already before the Central Road Board, and they had decided which was the proper road, with two branches There were two lines, but the people of the neighborhood requested that the main line should be pointed out, as there were differences of opinion on the matter, and on that account it was brought before the House

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that the hon member (Mr Lindsay) should strike out the word "Willunga" and insert "Noarlunga," as this would allow of the best road being selected If this were done he would support the motion

Mr LINDSAY assented

The motion was then agreed to

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that this Bill be read a second time He stated what he had said on a previous occasion, that there were several Bills hanging upon this one—the Waterworks Bill, the proposed Road Bill, and others—and it was, therefore, desirable that the Bill should have the assent of the House and the Parliament as soon as possible It seemed his fate in moving the second reading of Bills to have to repeat the arguments and statements which he had used on former occasions He had been obliged to do so in a previous instance, and should now do so again This was a Bill to bring various departments under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works—a system rendered necessary owing to the Constitution under which they now lived, and which was so different from that under which the Boards were formed The Bill would also effect a considerable saving in carrying out the public works of the colony It was a short measure and handed over to the Commissioner of Public Works all the Boards of the colony The Commissioner would have the power of appointing managers of Railways, Roads, Waterworks, and Harbors It would be necessary to submit to the House the salaries of these officials Those officials who were not hitherto directly responsible would be under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works, and he would be directly responsible to the people The principle of the Bill had previously received the almost unanimous support of the House, and, therefore, he need do little more than ask hon members to assent to it It would impose upon him a considerable amount of responsibility and considerable additional work, but he did not shrink from either the responsibility or the work He, or whoever might sit in that chair, would in future be able to afford the House every information respecting the departments which were to be placed under the Commissioner of Public Works by this Bill He knew of no Bill which would attain at once so many valuable objects, and with these remarks he moved that it be read a second time

The motion was agreed to

The House went into Committee on the Bill

The preamble was postponed, and the solitary clause of which the Bill consisted was amended by introducing the date, 1st January, 1859, as the day on which the functions of the Board should cease and determine

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress, and asked leave to sit again on Wednesday next

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

Adjourned debate

Mr DUFFIELD said he was well aware of the prominent position which he occupied on that occasion Having moved on the previous day that the debate should be adjourned, it devolved upon him now to resume the discussion of a subject which had already occupied the House for two days, namely, the Bill for an assessment on stock He did not wish to make any personal reference to himself on this or any other occasion, but he thought he would do well in entering on this subject, to state his own position, for he felt from the statements of hon members that they were laboring under a delusion, that this was a question which affected him in a pecuniary point of view To remove this delusion, he should state that the question did not affect him in a pecuniary sense He was well aware, not merely from the tenor of the speeches he had listened to, that hon members were, he was going to say, in the dark—but he would say that they required an immense amount of light on this subject It was true that in connection with another individual, he possessed a few flocks of sheep and some cattle, but they had been compelled to buy so much land, that they now owned in the hundreds enough to depasture more sheep by 5000 than they possessed He thought this fact was sufficient to show that the country could not carry the immense amount of stock which some hon members imagined He and the party he referred to, leased 50 or 60 square miles of Crown lands as the unpurchased lands in the hundreds of Burra and Stanley were not sufficient to depasture the stock they were entitled to possess by virtue of their purchased land in these hundreds It would be admitted that their country was as good as any in South Australia or at any rate, amongst the best, and from what he had stated it would be seen that the country could not carry such an amount of stock as hon members imagined He thought he had now freed himself from any imputation of having his vision clouded by interested motives, and he should not have referred to this part of this subject at all but for some remarks which dropped from the hon member for the Port (Captain Hart) That hon member, in alluding to the argument of the hon member for Victoria, that this tax would fall on the consumers of meat, and not on the stockholders, said he could not understand why the hon member (Mr Hawker) should object to the tax, because it would not fall upon the squatters but on the community After such an argument he (Mr Duffield) was justified in taking up this part of the subject He trusted there were many hon members who would vote for the public good, forgetting their own interests He was sorry to hear the hon member (Mr Hart) use the argument, and he was surprised that any hon members should advocate a case on such personal grounds He only made these remarks that he might stand clear of personal charges, and he hoped the hon member for the Port would, before the session was over, see many hon members vote for the public good regardless of their own interests

Mr STRANGWAYS rose to order He submitted that the Bill, as it related to the levying of taxation, should have been introduced by message from His Excellency, that therefore it was irregularly introduced and proceeded with, and that it should be withdrawn The hon member read extracts from the Standing Orders and the Constitution Act in support of his views

The SPEAKER ruled that the Governor had the power of sending down any Bill He was only limited as to the House in which he should introduce money Bills A Bill of this description could only be introduced in the Assembly

Mr DUFFIELD resumed by saying he should attempt to approach the question really before the House. He felt as an humble individual conscious of his inability to approach it as he could wish, though he felt that in approaching any question in which he would be opposed to the hon Attorney-General, it was something like a mole approaching a mountain (Laughter) But although that hon gentleman might crush him in argument, he could not destroy the facts which he should endeavour to place before the House He (Mr Duffield) regretted that the Ministry, aided by the Attorney-

General, should have brought forward a measure of that kind, supported by such weak arguments. The argument of the Attorney-General was unworthy of a gentleman occupying the Treasury benches, for nothing was advanced to justify the Government in bringing forward a measure for laying additional taxes on the people. He did not profess to be deeply versed in parliamentary usages, but he had occasionally in the mother-country been present when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward schemes of taxation, but whenever he did so he adduced some reason, such, for instance, as deficiency in the revenue of the country. But the Government in this case said nothing of the kind. Instead of that it was only a few days before that they laid on the table of the House papers showing that the revenue was so flourishing that it was desirable to undertake some public works, in order that the surplus revenue of the present year might be absorbed before bringing forward the Estimates for the next year. He thought, therefore, that the Attorney-General did himself injustice when he brought that question forward. The House would remember that, during the past session of Parliament, a resolution was carried by that House that it was desirable to remove all restrictions on distillation. Had the Government complied with that resolution, backed as it was by the feeling of the people, and said, in consequence of that measure being adopted, a deficit had occurred in the revenue of £50,000 or £60,000, there would have been a fair case with which to go before the House and the country. As the Government could not adduce the financial position of the country as a reason for introducing that measure, he expected it would have been shown to be beneficial in another point of view—that the motion would be recommended on the ground of a tendency to open up the interior of the colony, an object which the House should do all in their power to encourage, for he felt that vast riches were still unknown in South Australia. Had the Government connected that Bill with some such question, and shown the House the probability of that object being accomplished, they might have had his support; but they did not. The Bill commenced by reciting that it was expedient that an assessment should be raised by a levy on certain stock. He could not lose sight of the fact that the Government were the landlords of those gentlemen who occupied the waste lands of the Crown by virtue of their leases. If, then, the Government had come to the House and said they had made a bad bargain, and that they were getting their leases too cheaply, he could have understood it, but they did not—they tried to raise the rent by levying an assessment on stock. The Attorney-General alluded to two points in bringing the question before the House. They were two bare and simple propositions. First, that it was not an illegal act. He (Mr. Duffield) thought it was the first time in the history of that Parliament that a Bill for taxing the people was brought forward on such meagre grounds as that. On that question he would not touch, for he thought it no argument in favor of a Bill to tax any portion of the community, to say that it was not an illegal Act. The duty of that House was to pass Acts legal and binding upon the people. The other point was that he (the Attorney-General) did not think it a breach of good faith on the part of the Government to assess the stock of the squatters. That argument was equally weak, and equally unworthy of attention. It was evident from the speech of that hon. gentleman, that he was not fully convinced in his own mind that the morality of the case was so clear as he attempted to make it appear. And should the House think fit to pass that Bill many individuals would step forward and say that they took their leases with the full understanding that they were paying a rent for the land and that there should be no assessment on stock for the purposes of the general revenue. With regard to another statement, that those leases had been a great pecuniary advantage to those who took them, should a Committee of that House be established, the House, the Attorney-General, and the country, would be convinced to the contrary. There had been no great pecuniary advantage to those who possessed them from the time that they were taken out. Many persons recollected when on account of a large extent of territory being unoccupied, those leases were granted as a kind of boon to induce persons to occupy the country, and he could cite many cases in which those leases had not been such an advantage for the first few years to the holder as the Attorney-General wished to make out. He had seen the hon. member for the city knocking down sheep, the squatter having been previously knocked down, at 1s. 6d. per head. He was exaggerating a little, for if he recollected rightly, it was 1s. 3d. and 1s. 4d. at which the sheep were sold. What pecuniary advantage could there be in that? A good deal had been said regarding the intention of the Government when those leases were granted, and as to whether the assessment was to be merely local, or for the general purposes of the Government. All hon. members recollected that the late Commissioner of Crown Lands, Mr. Bonney, held that office at the time the leases were granted, and many years before that time, and he fully explained that the intention in granting those leases was that no taxes should be levied for local purposes. Had the Government declared it was necessary to tax all it might have been different, or had it been necessary for the defence of the country, he should have gone cordially with them. But it was only an attempt of the Government of the day to spread their sails to the breeze out of doors. (No, no, no, and hear, hear.) Some hon. gentlemen said "no," others said "hear," that was his opinion and he should freely express it. If he was wrong he should be glad to be undeceived. He would only allude to two or three other matters in reply to the other side of the House, if that expression could be used in a House which had not two sides. The hon. member for the Port (Mr. Hart) said the gentlemen who occupied the land would at once assent to that moderate assessment and allow it to be made permanent; that hon. member knew that if that motion passed that session—taxing sheep at 2d. per head—it was impossible to make it permanent. The next Parliament might make it 6d. or 9d. or 5s. It was an argument not brought forward by that hon. member with that consideration with which he was accustomed to speak, for the next sentence was a comparison between the prices of meat in Adelaide and Victoria at the present day. He (Mr. Duffield) had taken the trouble to refer to the Argus of the 20th Sept., 1858, in order to learn the prices in Melbourne, and he found beef quoted at from 8d. to 11d. per lb., and mutton 6d. to 8d., while sheep were fetching from 25s. to 27s. each. He had enquired the prices in Adelaide at the shops of Messrs. Bennett and Mirrabel, and they stated that they were selling beef from 4d. to 6d. per lb.—(Oh, oh, and laughter)—and the price of mutton was the same—(renewed dissent)—except on prime joints, such as sirloins or steaks for which they were charging 7d. a pound. If hon. members who laughed would change their butchers they would find it out. (Laughter.) He only alluded to it to show how easily incorrect statements crept in in the heat of argument. With regard to the taxes on stock in Victoria he wished to correct an error on the part of the hon. member for Burra and Clare, who had stated that the squatters there held land on permanent leases. That was a mistake: they only held them from year to year; and with regard to the assessment on stock every bullock before being delivered to the butcher was taxed something like 25s. He thought no hon. member would say therefore, that the tax would not fall on the consumer. The hon. member (Mr. Bagot) surprised him by saying the squatters should be taxed to pay for exploring the country. They did more exploring in the country than any Government had done; and twelvemonths ago the Government refused a sum of 5,000*l.*, and then expended 5,000*l.* in sending out Mr. Babbage to explore the northern districts. The exploration had therefore cost 10,000*l.*, while squatters were actually riding round their explorers. Mr. Reynolds, in his usual eloquent style, had said that the squatters wanted cheap labour, cheap land, and cheap woolpacks, and that a tax ought to be levied to provide a tramway for the South Eastern districts. If a tramway were required it was not for the squatters but the agriculturists, who had dispossessed them, and who wanted roads to a port of shipment. He asked also why the farmers should not have leases and cheap land as well as the squatters. He knew no reason why, except that they did not go out and discover it and thus tend to develop the resources of the country. There was a remark made by the hon. member for Onkaparinga to which he should advert, and that was in reference to his anticipation that he (Mr. Duffield) would bring figures before the House. He did not do so, for it was for those who brought forward a case to prove it. He should vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay.

Mr. Milne had great difficulty in agreeing with the principle of the Bill. He had waited patiently to hear the arguments of the Government in its favor, in order that he might have more light on the subject; but in spite of all he had heard, he objected to the principle on which it was founded. There had been a great deal of extraneous matter introduced into the discussion. Some hon. members had argued as if the squatters ought to be taxed because they were rich; others because they had their land too cheap. Those were not valid grounds for passing the Bill. The price of mutton was no argument whatever, and with regard to the assertion that squatters did not pay their fair proportion to the revenue, he denied it. If the squatters as a body did not pay according to the amount expended on their behalf, it was the fault of the system of taxation under which the country laboured. But they could not stop with the squatter on such an argument; they must go on, for there were a number of absentees, and bank proprietors and Burra shareholders and others who did not contribute anything to the revenue. But the machinery of the District Councils was the only legitimate way of meeting the case of the squatters. The principle of taxing stock, one of the productions of the colony, was totally wrong, for in that case the stock of the squatter nearest the market was taxed equally with that of the most distant. He considered that a mistake, and if the District Council system were carried out, the run would be taxed at its proportionate and fair value. As the squatters said they did pay a fair share to the revenue, and did not receive an undue share in the shape of expenditure, he would prefer referring the Bill to a Select Committee, to enable them to prove their case. The statistics and arguments adduced by the hon. member for the City (Mr. Neales) and the hon. member for the Port (Captain Hart) had left a strong impression on his (Mr. Milne's) mind that the squatters did receive a great deal more than their fair share of expenditure, but let them be taxed on a fair recognised principle of taxation, and not as a class. They would then know what was paid. At present the House would tax them to a certain amount, but that was no reason why at a future time they should not be taxed more heavily Whether it was a good or a bad bargain for the squatters, they ought not to have a disproportionate share of the expenditure. If the squatter had his fair share, it was gross injustice to him, if they received more than their share of the gross expenditure of the country, it was gross injustice to the country The expenditure ought to be in proportion to the amount of taxes paid The amendment before the House would probably be negatived, and he would then vote for a Select Committee, who would be able to place evidence before the House to guide them as to the ratio of revenue and expenditure, and as a means of doing justice to the squatters

Dr WARK considered the present one of those absurd attempts to tax a class which the people of the colony never had sanctioned, and never would It was to be regretted that one Government after another should come forward with measures so unjust and unholy, but the people would at least set them right He would not be diffuse, but would glance at the history of the case In all legal documents, if a legal quibble arose, it was the intention that was gone into in order to prove the truth At the time the detailed instructions for the report alluded to were drawn up, there were two Commissioners in the colony—Mr Bonney and Mr Macdonald Every one would give them credit for noble independence of mind Instructions were given to them to draw up the reports and they stated that great advantages would accrue from doing away with assessments on stock, and to put it on the acreage of the runs They considered that under the security of leases greater improvements would be made on the runs - houses would be built, fences and paddocks made, and so on It was impossible to find in those reports any reason for a double mode of payment, for the terms of the reports evidently intended there should not be double modes of payment With regard to the opinions of that day in the alteration from assessment on stock to a rental on runs, one gentleman, named Hagan, had said that the substitution of a superficial for a capital rent was a great improvement Major O'Halloran had said that he felt satisfaction on reading the report of the Commissioners Mr Bagot had objected to the inquisitorial and unnecessary prying into stock If the owner paid a stipulated rent, that was all he should do, and it should be the only charge. All agreed that a great improvement would result from substituting a superficial rent for an assessment on stock Sir Henry Young endorsed their opinions when writing home. He (Dr Wark) admitted that in the Orders in Council there was a clause speaking of assessment for local purposes, and how the Treasury Benches construed that to mean general revenue he could not understand Let the squatters be assessed for local purposes, but let not the House forget to fulfil solemn engagements, or he did not know what would occur next In Victoria, leases were offered to the squatters, but refused by them, and as they were subject to annual leases, there was no breach of faith with them A Melbourne gentleman had told him that South Australia had stood high in a legislative point of view, but if that assessment were levied he thought they would have to go to Victoria for copies of legislative enactments, and follow in their wake If that Bill passed both Houses, there was still a Supreme Court to appeal to, and probably such a course of action would be taken in that case The House knew that Governor Grey attempted to break leases in the colony, but he failed It was tried in the Supreme Court, and he lost the day, and the people were all highly pleased with the decision of the Court In the case of Mr Baker, too, a verdict was given against the Government It had been said that the squatters employed no skilled labor, but the salaries of the managers were ample and years were required before a manager acquired experience sufficient to conduct a large or even a small run The hon member for the Port (Mr Hart) had made a fine speech, but it was in favor of the squatters (Laughter) He reduced it to what the squatters admitted, namely, that taxes should be for local purposes He thought the Orders in Council should be carried out in a fair spirit, and there was not a squatter who would object to local taxation for bridges and roads He felt bound to support the amendment of the hon member for Encounter Bay, but at the same time he had desired to clear his own character He had been pointed at as one of the squatters He was not a squatter and so far as his constituency went, he believed he had more on a smaller scale than squatters He had risen to declare his opinion on a matter of right against a matter of wrong

Mr LINDSAY said every one would admit, he was sure that he had never been any strong advocate for the squatters, and therefore any observations he might make would not be considered as influenced by any undue partiality for that class of persons Ever since he had been in the colony he had regarded South Australia as peculiarly dissimilar from the other colonies in being more of an anti-squatting colony and more allied to agricultural than to pastoral pursuits With respect to the subject before the House, he should regard it according to its merits It had been argued by the Attorney-General that a tax analogous to the one now submitted to the House was contemplated when the leases were granted, and had been looked forward to as a contingency which it was probable might arise With all due deference to the Attorney-General he disputed this assertion He accounted for the expression made use of in the leases as so much surplusage, which was furthermore only accounted for by the assumption that the gentlemen of the legal profession got into such a habit of using more words than were necessary, that even when they were not paid for at so much a folio, they forgot themselves, and followed out the old habit (Laughter) In perusing the despatch of Sir H Young he could really see nothing that would lead him to suppose that it was contemplated to impose this assessment In his opinion Sir Henry Young alluded to some contingency in which the squatters might be involved with other classes of the community in some general system of taxation, but he did not believe that it was contemplated in that despatch to tax the squatters alone Such an assessment as would include the squatters with other classes of the community he believed could not be objected to He could say nothing against the legality of the proposed assessment, but admitting it was legal, was it expedient or politic? It would be equally legal to impose a tax upon pigs or upon tom cats (Laughter) But supposing it were necessary to adopt such a course, and that the tom-cats within the limits of some District Councils were taxed, and the tom-cats of the squatters were allowed to go scot free, would it not be a just ground of complaint from those who were put under the imposition? (Renewed laughter) As far as he had heard through the debate, the Treasurer had brought forward the strongest argument for the assessment which had yet been submitted to the House, and that was, that the money was wanted But he assumed that if the necessity arose to increase the revenue, the means by which it was attained, should press upon all classes of the community alike. The member for Noarlunga, Mr Young, had stated that we had a precedent for breaches of faith on the part of the Government of this colony But supposing they had, such a precedent for the cutting of covenants, which he admitted they had, still instead of precedents, they should rather regard them as examples to be shunned The leases had been granted, and faith should be kept with the holders of them The hon member for the Port had made some very powerful remarks, in which he attempted to show that this assessment would not have the effect of raising the price of meat He agreed with the hon member that the price of meat was in a great measure regulated by the Melbourne market, but the Commissioner of Public Works had broached a very extraordinary argument, which was that the effect of the assessment would be to make meat cheaper He would follow out this argument. If the price of meat were to be reduced by such a course, all they had to do if any other article of consumption was excessive in price, was to put a tax upon the producer Let them tax wheat and potatoes, and then, on that principle, they would have wheat and potatoes at a lower figure, but he was afraid that this would be adding to the prosperity of the consumer at the expense of the producer (A laugh) The Government had no doubt made a bad bargain, but it had been done and they should abide by it The proper course which he considered the Government should have taken when they granted these leases were this—they should have told the squatters "we pay so much for police protection, postal services, roads and bridges, &c, and the amount derivable from you is not proportionate to the outlay," and then, instead of imposing a rent of 13s per square mile, they should have made it 20s or even 40s, if the exigencies of the case required it But the Government did nothing of the kind They granted the leases, and it would be as equally unfair as to impose a tax upon every bushel of wheat or ton of potatoes raised from the aboriginal reserves which had been leased by the Government, simply on the ground that the rent was too low The Committee on taxation now sitting might, perhaps, recommend it as advisable to do away with the present system of indirect taxation, by abolishing the Custom Dues and substituting in their place a tax upon land, a poll-tax upon cattle, upon people, and upon their children if necessary (Laughter) Many hon members had asked why the agriculturalist should not be enabled to avail himself of the advantages which the squatters possessed And he repeated the question, why should they not? Why should the Government persevere in killing the goose for the sake of the golden eggs, by letting all the land in fee-simple He thought that if there was a deficiency in the revenue, as had been intimated, a very politic course would be this, for the Government to reserve a certain number of sections on each side of the lines of railway and lease them out, by which considerable revenue might be raised He was unconvinced by the arguments which had been used in favor of this tax It was unnecessary for him to say that he should vote against the measure, as the matter was quite certain to be referred to a Select Committee If the Government should, in concluding the debate, bring forward any good or substantial reasons in support of the Bill, which he must say was a very improbable contingency, then he would go with them, if not, he would reserve himself for the question when in Select Committee.

Mr DUNN thought the question had almost been worn threadbare, so that there was nothing remaining for him to say, except to explain which side he was on It had been said that the squatters did not pay an equal proportion of taxation with other classes, but he had no doubt that when the rent on their runs was levied, it was as much as they could afford to pay But their position had now changed materially Instead of having to sell their sheep at 18d per head, with the run given in, the value was ten times multiplied At the same time it must be recollected the agriculturalist was selling his wheat at half-a crown a bushel Since that time wheat had gone up to as much as 21s per bushel, but had dropped down to what had been the average for the last three or four years, 5s On the contrary fat sheep were still fetching 25s per head, so the old proverb was not verified, viz, "Down the corn, down the horn" There was no justice in allowing the squatters to go free under such prosperous circumstances They signed their leases with open eyes, well knowing there was the contingency of an assessment A circumstance had been related to him by a gentleman of a squatter having bought a run for £17,000. After he had occupied it for eight or nine months he found he had to purchase 10,000l worth of land about his run to prevent it from being taken up He argued that this was a parallel case He supposed in this case that the run was bought at less than its value, subject to this expense and inconvenience The case, however, was mentioned to him as one of hardship There was no disposition, he was sure, in any member of that House to put an undue proportion of taxation upon the squatters The only desire was that all parties should have an equal proportion of taxation He should not object to the subject being referred to a Select Committee

Mr Rogers had hesitated as to the legality of this assessment, but he admitted he was now convinced that it was perfectly legal It had been shown that an increase of revenue was required, and he thought no one was better able to bear the demand than the squatters They had been exempt now from taxation for many years He had very little difficulty in coming to a decision, and would vote for the second reading of the Bill, although he would have no objection to its being referred to a Select Committee. He could not see the justice of the squatters being allowed to hold the immense territory which they occupied at the nominal rental of £13,000 per annum, while within the limit of the various District Councils, including a total area of only 2,887 miles, property was taxed to the amount of £24,000 He would support the second reading of the Bill, or consent, if thought desirable, to its being referred to a Select Committee

Mr Harvey thought the squatter should be made to pay his fair shares towards the revenue, but if the matter were referred to a Select Committee, it might, perhaps, be more satisfactory to the squatters and their opponents He had paid great attention to the speech of the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), and he fully concurred in what the hon member had stated, that the squatters had done great good for this colony in the way of exploration, and he thought more good would have resulted still if the exploration of the country had been left entirely in their hands The 7th clause of the Bill which provided that there should be no assessment until the runs had been occupied for a certain time was a good one For his own part he would have two classes of squatters, those within a given circuit and those without a given circuit The squatter without a circuit of 100 miles should be exempt from taxation for a certain number of years He fully believed mutton would be raised in price, but it was not the producer but the consumer that would feel this No gentleman in that House who imported goods would forget to charge a proper amount on them for expenses The retailer in his turn acted in the same manner and the consumer had to pay This would be the case with the squatters He thought faith should be kept with the squatters as it would be with him when he purchased a section of land If the door were open to put on a tax now, it would open a little wider by and by It would be precisely as in the District Councils Act That was presented as a boon at first The rate was made a nominal one of one farthing if they pleased The small end of the wedge, however, was then inserted, and they were compelled to rate at one shilling at the least This would be the case with the squatter It was 2d per head this year, and probably it would be 1s per head next year If it were necessary in order to increase the revenue that this assessment should be made, it was a very bad policy to tax one portion of the community alone He should vote for its being referred to a Select Committee

Mr Cole said as this was a question involving great public interest every member was bound to state his views He must confess that after hearing the seriocomic address of the hon member for Victoria yesterday he went home instilled with the sentiment of "let justice be done though the heavens should fall," in fact, he thought at the time the squatters were the most ill-used men in the colony But after reading the Orders in Council, and perusing the leases themselves he had a thorough revulsion of feeling He would view the matter in a common sense light When hon members put their names to leases they surely expected that the covenants therein would be duly enforced against them And so with the squatters Was it right that they should evade a contingency which they were liable to? It was not as if sheep were now worth only 1s 6d each He viewed "local" in connection with the assessment as opposed to "imperial" or general purposes Seeing the legality of the assessment he thought the public of South Australia would demand that they should see the bond fulfilled in its entirety

The Attorney-General would not detain the House beyond saying the few words which the justice of the case demanded He would not go into details, but would refer to two or three matters which occurred to him In the first place, with respect to the position of the Government, he believed that there was not the slightest doubt entertained as to the legality of the measure now brought forward, nor of its perfect justness on all hands It had been said that the passing of this measure would be tantamount to breaking faith with the squatters, and an hon member (Mr Bakewell) had referred to a case of landlord and tenant as a parallel one But what was the position of the landlord with his tenant? Did he find police protection for him, or was he put to any other expense on his behalf? There was no analogy in the cases The Government did not bring forward this measure in an exclusive manner It was their duty to take care that taxation should be equitably placed The squatters were a class who did not, in his opinion, pay a fair contribution to the revenue He believed that referring the matter to a Select Committee would be useless The House were in possession of abundant information, and, as far as he himself was concerned, if circumstances should arise to call upon him to exercise his vote, he should be prepared to do so without hesitation But then the Government had a right to consider the feelings of other people, and when persons said they had not that information which was requisite to enable them to decide the question, then they, the Government, were prepared, as they had always been, to concede to that enquiry which should elicit information—not that they were not satisfied—not that they thought that anything the squatters or their representatives could bring forward would be likely to change their opinion, but that the whole matter might be placed before the House and the public in the same clear light in which it was presented to the Government He did not think it necessary to refer to the remark made as to the Government placing themselves in a derogatory position He thought it implied rather forgetfulness on the part of hon members, than any ground of complaint The course he should propose was that the amendment of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) should be withdrawn, and another amendment moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee

A difficulty arose upon a point of form, Mr Strangways not appearing disposed in the first instance to withdraw his amendment

The Attorney-General remarked that if the amendment were withdrawn the difficulty would be removed, as neither the member for West Torrens nor the member for Barossa had spoken, and the one could move and the other second the proposition that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee The hon gentleman added that if a Committee were appointed he would rather not be a member of it, as he had no special knowledge of the subject, and his avocations were such that he might not be able to give the subject the attention which it demanded

Mr Strangways understood the Attorney-General to say that he proposed to refer the Bill to a special Committee Would the hon gentleman state who he proposed should constitute the Committee

The Attorney-General said it was obvious that, in the ordinary course, the proper Committee to refer it to would be the Committee at present sitting upon the question of taxation, but as that Committee had an exceedingly wide range, it would he thought be better to appoint a special Committee in the ordinary way, that is, a Select Committee

Mr Strangways, after that explanation, asked leave to withdraw his amendment, and leave having been granted,

Mr Hallett moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee

Mr Scammell seconded the motion which was carried, and the Committee appointed were the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Barrow, Duffield, Glyde, Neales, Hallet, and Hawker, to report on 13th October

The House adjourned at half-past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on Tuesday

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

The President announced the receipt of messages from the House of Assembly, transmitting copy of resolution in reference to joint Standing Orders, in which the Assembly requested the concurrence of the Legislative Council Also intimating that the Assembly had agreed to amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Bill to establish the validity of certain registrations Also transmitting the Bill passed by the Assembly to authorize the extension of a railway from the terminus of the Adelaide and Gawler Town railway to Kapunda, and to confer certain powers upon the Railway Commissioners Also copy of a resolution agreed to by the Assembly, requesting that means might be given to the Hon John Baker to attend as a witness before a Committee of the House of Assembly upon the question of Taxation

KAPUNDA RAILWAY BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, the Kapunda Railway Bill was read a first time The hon gentleman observed that the Bill was of considerable importance to the unemployed, and as he believed that there was no novel principle involved in the Bill, but that it was, in fact, a mere transcript of a Bill passed during the previous session he was desirous of moving the second reading upon an early day If there were no objection, he would move that the second reading be made an Order of the Day for the following day

The Hon Dr EVERARD seconded

The Hon Mr MORPHETT asked when the Bill would be placed in the hands of hon members

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Bill having passed the House of Assembly, was no doubt in print, and would probably be placed in the hands of hon members in the course of the afternoon

DRAINAGE AND WATER SUPPLY

The Hon Mr AYERS presented a petition from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors of the city of Adelaide, praying that in any Bill which might be passed for the purpose of amending the existing Act relative to drainage and water supply provision might be made for laying down main pipes on both sides of the streets

The petition was received

EXECUTIONS REGULATION BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY this Bill was read and passed, and a message was directed to be conveyed to the House of Assembly requesting their concurrence, and transmitting the Bill

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of the Customs Act Amendment Bill, stated that the principal object of the Bill was to amend the existing Act in particulars which were objected to by the whole mercantile community The amendments which had been introduced in the Bill had been strongly urged upon the attention of the Government by the Chamber of Commerce, from whom he might observe the Government were at all times happy to receive suggestions The Government regarded the Chamber as representing the mercantile community of the province The former Act, or rather the existing one, provided that perfect entries for goods on board vessels over 200 tons burden should take place within 14 days of their arrival, and of goods in vessels under that tonnage, within one week of their arrival This regulation was found to operate very inconveniently, as a single consignee could take advantage of it to the detriment of the great bulk of the consignees, and prevent the landing of the articles which were consigned to them, as it was quite possible that the goods consigned to the single consignee who omitted to pass the requisite entries were on the top of the great bulk It was notorious, indeed, that parties sometimes took advantage of the regulation, to the detriment of the great bulk of consignees, and made a warehouse of the vessel for the number of days allowed by the existing regulations Thus it frequently occurred that in consequence of the delay in landing goods many profitable sales were lost The Bill at present before the House proposed a remedy for this, it being provided that all foreign vessels should perfect their entries within four days, and intercolonial vessels, coasting vessels, and steamers, within 24 hours Clause 3 provided that there should be a rebate of duty upon goods landed on the wharf, and which were damaged, under the same regulations as upon goods damaged on board ship The Bill also defined the coast-line, providing in connection with the Customs Act that it should be high water mark It also provided that fresh meat, vegetables, and articles liable to decay, might be landed at any time, either in the night or day, or on Sunday or week day The whole tendency of the Act was to relax to some extent some provisions of the existing Act, without impairing in any way its efficiency

The Hon H AYERS seconded the motion

The Hon Captain HALL did not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of the Bill, but felt bound to suggest some amendments He had no doubt that so far as the detention of vessels was concerned, the Bill was calculated to effect much good He approved of any provision which would prevent the detention of the goods of a large number of consignees on board ship, in consequence of one consignee having omitted to pass entries, but he was desirous of moving an addition to the third clause, because as it at present stood it did not carry out the suggestions of the Chamber of Commerce, and when in Committee he should feel bound to move a clause in substitution of that which had been introduced in the Bill The Hon the Chief Secretary had pointed out the hardships which frequently arose from consignees not passing their entries, and whilst they were engaged in amending the Customs Act, he thought it would be well that the Attorney-General should be consulted with the view of devising some clause by which consignees would legally enforce the landing of their goods by the shipmaster, it occasionally occurred that it was inconvenient to the master of a vessel to discharge the whole of his cargo, as he wished to keep his ship in trim It was true that the master might get a stiffening order and take in ballast, but it was much more convenient for him to keep goods on board for ballast whilst looking for a homeward freight He confessed he did not exactly see how the object which he had in view could be carried out, but he thought the attention of the Attorney-General should be called to the subject with the view of seeing if he could not introduce a clause to enforce delivery As the law at present stood, a very considerable time must elapse before the Customs authorities could enter on board a vessel, on the supposition that goods were being kept on board for the purpose of smuggling Before the clause under discussion was assented to, it was certainly desirable he considered that the Attorney-General should be consulted for the purpose of seeing if a clause to the effect which he had suggested could not be introduced

The Hon Captain SCOTT supported the second reading of the Bill, but stated that there were some points which he should object to when the Bill was in Committee He objected to provisions contained not only in the second, but in the third clause It was highly desirable that consignees should be compelled to enter their goods as early as possible after the arrival of the vessel If the entries were not passed he thought the Customs should be empowered to land the goods, for at present goods which arrived were frequently bought for shipment to Melbourne, and the purchasers under existing regulations were enabled to keep them on board, frequently much to the detriment of other consignees, until a vessel was ready to start for Melbourne, and then the goods were transhipped from one vessel to another Great loss consequently resulted to those persons whose goods happened to be under those for which no entry had been passed He should be glad to see a provision by which parties would be compelled to pass their entries, but he confessed that the amendments in this respect which had been introduced in the present Bill, as compared with the existing Act, appeared to him rather a hindrance than otherwise

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the Bill was read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

The first clause provided that the coast of the province for the purposes of all laws relating to the Customs should be taken to be the line of high-water mark

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved that the clause stand as printed

The Hon Mr MORPHETT asked the Chief Secretary what was the object of making the high-water mark the coast of the province for the Customs laws In many respects he thought the low-water mark would have been better He considered the high water mark might prove injurious to the revenue as affording facilities for smuggling

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the high-water mark was much easier to find than low-water mark, and that the Customs Act extended one league beyond

The Hon Mr MORPHETT remarked that the wording of the clause was somewhat ambiguous, but it was passed as printed

The second clause provided that the importer of any goods should, in the case of coasting vessels and intercolonial steamers, within twenty-four hours, and in the case of all other vessels, within four days after the arrival of the importing ship, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, make perfect entry of such goods

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved that it stand as printed

The Hon Captain SCOTT remarked that by the present Customs Act masters of coasting vessels had merely to produce a document containing a description of all goods on board No entries were passed by coasting vessels except for goods subject to duty It was not necessary that the importers of colonial produce by colonial vessels should enter such produce, as there was no duty to pay He thought the clause as it stood was ambiguous, and that if it were intended to operate as he read it, it would work a great hardship He proposed to amend it by inserting after the word "vessels" "having goods on board subject to duty" and to take out the word "intercolonial" As the clause at present stood it would be necessary that all sailing vessels from Melbourne should wait four days before their entries were passed Vessels frequently came here from that port with not more than a quarter cargo, and it would be a hard case to compel them to wait four days before their entries were completed Suppose two vessels for instance were to arrive at the same moment, the one with cargo and the other without any, why, the one which had not any might be almost back to Melbourne before the other could get discharged. Again, the clause applied to coasting vessels and intercolonial steamers, which could get discharged within 24 hours, but others might arrive from the Mauritius, or other ports to the westward, which would have to wait four days, and this provision amounted almost to a prohibition, as such vessels could not afford to waste the time Even if they got a collector's warrant to land the goods which were for this port, they could not get permission to clear until such goods were entered, and he would therefore take out the "intercolonial" before "steamers," as he considered it most desirable to give as much despatch as possible to all steamers The amendment which he suggested would be considered simplify the Act and give that expedition to colonial steamers and others which it was desirable to give them The clause as it stood would not give expedition to intercolonial vessels but not to others for which it was proposed that four days should be allowed to land their goods. He thought it most desirable that at the end of the clause under discussion or in some other clause, the master of the vessel should be compelled to land the goods as soon as possible, and he would therefore suggest the insertion of words to the effect that the master should proceed to discharge his cargo upon his arrival with all reasonable dispatch. Not long since a vessel came alongside a wharf, and was already to discharge, when it was represented that it was desirable she should go to another wharf. There was not water enough at the time to remove her, and the consequence was that consignees who wanted their goods were compelled to wait till a convenient time came to remove the vessel. He should like some provision introduced in the Bill by which ships or ship masters would be compelled to land their goods as soon as possible after the entries were passed, for whilst protecting the shipping interest they must take care to protect the commercial interest also.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

The Clerk to the Executive Council was introduced and presented a message from His Excellency the Governor, in reply to an address of the Legislative Council, No. 2. The message was to the effect that so soon as His Excellency was in possession of the views of both Houses of the Legislature, the Government would be prepared to recommend action being taken in the matter.

The Hon. Mr. Morphett asked to what subject the address referred to related.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary stated that if the hon. gentleman would refer to the address No. 2, he would find that it referred to the Colonial Defences.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Debate resumed.

The Hon. Captain Hall remarked that the amendments suggested by the Hon. Captain Scott relative to coasting vessels were surplusage, because coasting vessels might at present land without any entries at all. The clause under discussion would not at all interfere with that privilege, as it merely referred to goods which required to be entered as being liable to duty. Vessels laden with colonial produce were not subject to the same regulations as those with dutiable goods. Steamers required great dispatch with their cargoes, and his intention had been to suggest an amendment, or rather an addition, so that importers should make perfect their entries; but at present no provision was made in the event of an importer not making perfect his entry. The Customs were very chary in interfering in such cases. In fact, they would not do so except in extreme cases, and he therefore proposed to make an addition to the effect that, failing such entry being made, it should be lawful for the master or agent of the vessel to enter and bond such goods on the Customs Key. The Queen's Lock was the term usually adopted, but it did not apply to this colony. He thought such a clause as he suggested would be productive of great benefit. He thought there must be power to compel the captain to land goods. The last speaker had suggested the introduction of the words "a reasonable time," but the question would then arise, what was a reasonable time? for one captain might deal mercifully with his crew and work them lightly, whilst another might discharge or be deserted by his men, and merely have a few apprentices to assist him.

The President remarked that it was no portion of the proposed amendment to limit the time for landing goods.

The Hon. H. Ayers seconded the amendment of the Hon. Captain Scott, remarking, that although the last speaker had said that only duty payable goods would come under the operations of the clause, he thought it would apply to all imported goods. He thought, however, that coasting vessels not having dutiable goods on board, should be exempted from the operation of the clause.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary remarked that the Government were always desirous of recognising the Chamber of Commerce as representing the commercial interests of the colony, and in this instance had adopted the exact phraseology used by the Chamber of Commerce. No doubt the Chamber of Commerce fully discussed the question before submitting it to the Government, and he thought it would be safer to adopt the phraseology of the Chamber. If the amendment were passed it would be more prudent for many reasons to postpone the clause.

The Hon. Captain Scott having intimated that he should press his amendment, the Hon. the Chief Secretary, with the permission of the House, postponed the clause.

The Hon. Mr. Morphett suggested that the exact phraseology of the Chamber of Commerce should be adopted, by adopting the words "after the ship has been reported at the Customs," instead of "after her arrival."

The Hon. Mr. Ayers suggested that the Chief Secretary should also introduce in the Bill the name and number of the Acts which this Bill was intended to amend, as Her Majesty's instructions to the Governor-in-Chief directed that this should be done.

The Hon. Captain Hall stated that he was one of the Committee of the Chamber of Commerce who prepared the suggestions to the Government but the Committee did not think it came within their sphere to frame a clause. The amendments which he had proposed would, he believed, give satisfaction to the Customs and the members of the Chamber, with many of whom he had conversed upon the subject.

The third clause proposed that duty should be returned upon goods damaged before removal from the wharf.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary moved the clause stand as printed.

The Hon. Captain Scott believed there was a proviso in the clause which would give great latitude for embezzlement from the revenue. Goods left upon the wharf for a period of seven days open to a number of careless carters and others, might not be worth half what they were when they were landed, and he would therefore move that there be no abatement for damage occasioned after the day upon which such goods were landed.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary suggested that this clause also should be postponed.

The Hon. Mr. Morphett supported his proposition, intimating that he should certainly oppose the proposed amendment, as there were times when it would be impossible to clear goods from the wharf in one day.

The Hon. Captain Hall said that so far from this clause being in accordance with the suggestion of the Chamber of Commerce they strenuously objected to it, thinking that no allowance should be made for damage occasioned after landing. The object of the recommendation of the Chamber was the removal of a kind of paradox in the Customs laws, for if goods were damaged by salt water and the attention of the Customs Landing Waiter was called to the circumstance, an allowance was made, but if a cargo of fruits arrived and 90 per cent. were unfit for consumption, no allowance whatever was made. This the Chamber considered a great hardship. The regulation applied not only to fruits, fish, and hams, but to twenty other articles upon which no drawback was allowed for natural decay.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary stated that the clause was worded precisely in accordance with the suggestion of the Chamber of Commerce, but the Government had no desire to press the clause; on the contrary, so far as the revenue was concerned they would rather that the Act should stand as it was at present.

After a few remarks from the Hon. Capt. Hall the clause was postponed.

The fourth clause, providing that perishable articles might be landed at any time, was passed as printed, and upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, the Chairman reported progress and obtained leave to sit again on the following day.

THE IMPOUNDING ACT.

The Chief Secretary laid upon the table of the House suggestions from the District Councils in reference to the Impounding Act.

The House adjourned at half-past three o'clock till two o'clock on the following day.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 5.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter past 1 o'clock.

EXPENSE OF SURVEYS.

A return of the various amounts paid for public surveys was laid on the table of the House, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

The Treasurer moved that the Speaker and Messrs. Hanson, Dutton, Finniss, and Bagot be appointed as a Committee on the Standing Orders of the House. The hon. gentleman said such a Committee had previously been appointed, and no doubt hon. gentlemen would see the necessity of it on the present occasion.

The motion was agreed to.

TAXATION COMMITTEE.

The Treasurer as Chairman of the Taxation Committee, moved that a message be sent to the Legislative Council requesting leave to be given to one of its members—the Hon. John Baker—to attend to give evidence on a Select Committee of that House on the subject of taxation.

The motion was agreed to.

WATERWORKS WEIR.

Mr. Strangways, with the permission of the House, asked the hon. Commissioner of Public Works what course the Government or Waterworks Commissioners intended to take with reference to the Waterworks Weir. The hon. gentleman read a passage from the report in answer to certain questions which had been put from the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works. (Extract read.) From this statement it appeared that the Engineer's explanation went to shew that the Waterworks Weir would not answer the purpose for which it was intended. He would suggest to them the ruinous effect which an accident to the Weir would have, when the river was perhaps at its highest. Everything near the river must inevitably be destroyed—gardens, habitations, and orchards, must be carried away in addition to the damage which would result to the Works themselves by the overflow of water. The Commissioner of Public Works no doubt recollected a case of such a nature which occurred in Lancashire by the bursting of a dam As a precautionary measure he therefore asked the question standing in his name

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS supposed hon members had hardly had time to read the report on the Waterworks Weir The tenor of the statement towards the close of the report was to the effect that the Board of Enquiry wished another opportunity of examining the works before they gave any definite reply He had no doubt the Waterworks Commissioners would take such steps, when the proper time came, as would best tend to ensure the permanence of the structure in question

MR A ATKINSON AND THE LANDS TITLES OFFICE

Mr STRANGWAYS asked (on the intimation of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL that he was prepared to answer) with reference to a letter which he had read some ten days ago, from Mr A Atkinson, having reference to a complaint of certain deeds having been prepared in the Lands Titles Office, whether the Attorney-General was prepared to give any explanation of the matter

The ATTORNEY GENERAL had made the necessary enquiries, the result of which was that he had received two letters, one from the Registrar-General, and the other from one of the solicitors to the Commissioners (Mr Gawler) He would first read the letter of the Registrar-General —

"Sir—In compliance with your minute of the 18th instant, I have referred to the letter of Mr Atkinson to Mr Gawler, and beg to enclose his report

"The printed form of conveyance referred to by Mr Gawler is one that has been approved of by this Commission, advised by their solicitors to be used in certain cases with a view to facilitate transactions in bringing land under the operation of the Act, pending certain amendments

"The cases referred to are those in which parties require to bring land under the operation of the Act whilst a contract for sale is pending, yet owing to the intended departure of the vendor or other cause the completion of the transfer cannot be postponed until after the land has been brought under the Act

"In the case complained of by Mr Atkinson the use of the form of conveyance was authorized by me under the following circumstances —

"Mr McEllister had contracted to purchase the land referred to on condition that the vendors should join in an application to bring the same under the Real Property Act, and then combine the transfer and the bringing of the land under the Act in one transaction

"Mr Atkinson having a lien over the deeds refused to deposit them in furtherance of the above object, and thus it became necessary to have the land conveyed to Mr McEllister, as a preliminary step to bringing the same under the Act

"Mr Atkinson is very far in error in supposing that 'the form in question was framed for the purpose of transacting the business of an individual in a public office'

"The use of that form is rigidly restricted to the case of parties making applications to bring land under the Act whilst contract for sale is pending under circumstances such as are above described

"Messrs Belt and Gawler are incapable of using their official position to further their private business, the latter has since the date of his appointment relinquished altogether the practice of his profession, and Mr Belt confines his practice to cases which yet remain to be wound up in his office

"I have, &c,
"R R TORRENS, Registrar General

"Lands Title Office, September 21, 1858"

The other letter was from Mr Gawler, as follows —

"Copy of letter from Henry Gawler

"In consequence of the refusal of Mr Atkinson to advise his clients to execute the printed form, which in certain exceptional cases is used in this office, I drew up in my leisure time, after office hours, and without receiving any fee for the same, a short draft conveyance in the ordinary form, as a matter of friendship to Mr McEllister, in order to save him the trouble and expense which might have been occasioned by Mr Atkinson's obstructive conduct

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mr STRANGWAYS asked in reference to certain alleged irregularities in the Port Elliot Local Court, upon which a notice of motion had been previously founded whether the Government were in a position to explain He (Mr Strangways) knew nothing about the matter personally, but had received a letter from a person who, in connection with others, thought they had grounds of complaint Whether there was any foundation for the complaint or not he could not say He would ask the Attorney-General therefore, 'whether any complaints have been made to the Government with respect to certain alleged irregularities and injustices committed in the Local Court of Port Elliot, and, if so, the nature of such complaints"

He might say that he had heard that the Government had made the necessary enquiries, and were satisfied with the result

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government had received various complaints which had come under his notice as Attorney-General Proper enquiries had been made, but it appeared there was no ground whatever for impugning the magistrate There had been some cases in which a doubt might have arisen and in which it had been suggested that the opinion of the contemporary magistrate should be taken The result was that in every case he had found no cause to complain, at the same time he did not wish it to be inferred that he agreed with the decisions of the magistrates In fact in some of the cases he held opposite opinions, but in the matter of honesty he thought there were no grounds of complaint against the stipendiary magistrate

Mr STRANGWAYS said he supposed it amounted to a mere error of judgment

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL assented, and went into some short explanation

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

In Committee

The whole of the clauses of this Bill had been previously considered and passed in Committee The preamble only remained, which was passed as printed

The House resumed, the Bill was postponed, and the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

In Committee

Planting trees round Government reserves in the City £120

Item passed as printed

Railway, completion of new goods shed, £7,000

Mr STRANGWAYS presumed that this amount was asked for in connection with the Adelaide station It appeared to him that the policy which was adopted in connection with the Railway works was to pull down one year what had been built the previous year There seemed to him to be no comprehensive system, but one of patch-work He was inclined to vote against the item, unless made more conversant with the necessity of the work, and the mode in which it was to be executed

Mr BURFORD thought the proposed site of the goods shed was not a suitable one He thought it would be more advisable to have the site lower down, opposite Morphett-street, and they would then have more yard room

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said no resolution had been arrived at with respect to tracings or plans of this work, as had been implied by a previous speaker As the amount involved was a large one, he, however, had come prepared with some data He had become thoroughly convinced that the present goods shed was most inconvenient and much smaller than the requirements of the case demanded The present goods station was inadequate to carry on the Port traffic, much less that from the northern line The building that it was proposed to erect would project out to the extremity of the terrace, and the platform would give 7,000 square feet of room Not only would this provide for the present requirements, but it would provide for those contingent on the line being carried further to the north

Mr REYNOLDS would remind hon members that £2,000 had been voted last session for this department of the railway, which he believed was unexpended With the £7,000 now asked for £9,000 would be the total amount proposed to be spent on the goods shed It struck him that 7,000 feet of room, as the Commissioner of Public Works had said the goods shed would contain, was very small compared with the outlay He could not but remark upon the fashion of building up and pulling down, that it appeared a very injudicious and expensive one The next engineer of the line would, perhaps, consider the site now fixed upon unsuitable, and they would then have to go through the farce of pulling it down again He thought before they voted sums of money in cases such as the present they should have more explicit evidence than they had at present He would suggest that the item should be withdrawn until the House was in possession of further information It had been stated that there was not sufficient accommodation in the goods department but Mr Fuller stated that there were not sufficient trucks for the amount of traffic going on He hoped the item would be withdrawn as it was not of an urgent character

Mr LINDSAY thought there was a great want of system in providing accommodation in this department Next session it was quite possible they might be called upon to vote money to undo the present work

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government, in placing this item upon the Estimates had done so from a conviction that the work was required, and that the present time was the most favorable one for proceeding with it, because it would thereby give employment to those requiring work But after all the question was one for the House to decide The Government had no interest to further by this vote, and were only actuated by a desire to hasten on public works, give labor to the unemployed, and facilitate the increasing traffic of the railway If the House were of opinion that this was not the time to proceed with it or that the necessities of the case did not demand it, then the Government would be resigned, and satisfied with the knowledge of their having brought the matter forward, and supported it to the best of their ability The hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) said that Mr Fuller's evidence had been anticipated But he understood that evidence as having been already reported to the House The vote which was now asked for was to enable the Railway Commissioners to carry on a larger amount of business If that were not conceded the contractors would be cramped in their operations and the public would assuredly suffer It had been said they were pulling down and building up They might be, but would the hon member for the Sturt say that the present building was sufficient If it were not they must do something, and it were merely a question of convenience and expense, whether it was better to leave the present building standing add to it, or pull it down and build a new one It had been decided that the latter course was the best The present shed was not merely inconvenient but it encumbered the entire operations of the railway from its position It was, therefore, expedient to remove it If, in the course of years, the traffic increased so that it became necessary to have even more extended accommodation, and it was found necessary to pull down what they now purposed to erect, well and good All the Government had done in the matter was to act on the advice given, and place it before the House

Mr Peake wished to know from the Commissioner of Public Works if the 2,000*l*, which was voted last year, was included in the 7,000*l*., or was it a separate sum, making in all 9,000*l* It was due to the Government and the House that this should be explained He agreed with the policy of the vote The state of the present goods shed was disgraceful, it must be so apparent to every one that the sooner they had it blotted out, and a substantial building erected in its place, the better It did not require an architect or engineer to see the inadequacy of the present building He was quite sure, if they searched all the railway stations in Europe, they would not find such a disgraceful structure It was even inefficient in protecting goods from the weather, and the sooner it was done away with the better

Mr Glyde did not wish to oppose the vote, as he presumed the Government knew what was necessary to the requirements of the case He thought, however, a plan might have been submitted for connecting the Northern line with the Port line by direct communication At present they lost 10 miles by being forced to bring goods from the North into Adelaide, instead of taking them by a loop line direct to the Port

The Commissioner of Public Works said the proposed vote was not to enable them to provide for the Northern traffic only The present goods station was inadequate for even the Adelaide and Port traffic Any hon member who had seen the goods station as it was at present in, must be convinced of its unsuitability The Government had considered that this was the proper time to proceed with it, as they would be enabled, besides getting it done at a cheaper rate, to give labor to the unemployed As to the 7,000 feet which had been referred to, he would state that it was the platform alone which would contain that superficies—it was independent of the other parts of the building The Government, too, had fixed upon what they considered to be the best site With respect to the former vote of the Legislature, he would state that the 2,000*l* was spent in the alteration of the rails He was surprised at the opposition to this vote which had been manifested The goods station was in a most inconvenient position at present, and the very carriages passed so close to the wall that it became dangerous He trusted the House would consent to the vote

Mr Townsend thought the necessity of the shed must be apparent to every business man With regard to the contrast drawn by the hon member for Burra and Clare between the railway stations of this country and those at home, he understood that in some of the latter there were various goods sheds which were lettered, and the guard notes were lettered to correspond with the stores, and by this means parties sending goods possessed great facilities which they did not enjoy He trusted something of the same kind would be done here He considered the present the right time for this expenditure, and hoped that if the vote were carried, the Government would instruct the work to be commenced immediately

Mr Solomon supported the vote with pleasure, as he, in common with some of his city friends, had experienced the inconveniences complained of more than many hon members in the House It was only a few months since that he called the attention of the Chamber of Commerce to the manner in which the railway was conducted He believed if they had a few additional vessels coming to the Port it would be impossible that the business of the Port could be carried on He had had occasion himself to complain in his own business, and could lay his hands on the proofs, for he had had goods in course of transit over a space of eight miles for eight days He presumed the object of a railway was rather to improve than to deteriorate business He had known parties in Adelaide refuse to take sugars previously sold and which should have been delivered, because in the interval other ships had arrived He believed that the hon member (Mr Neales) had had similar complaints, and that the grounds of complaint lay with the arrangements of the railway at the station For these reasons, and believing that the time had arrived when they should spend money, not money for what was actually necessary but for what might become necessary, and nobody could say how soon He should support the vote.

Dr Wark was glad to have another opportunity of supporting the Government, and he considered the case fairly made out in favor of this vote He agreed with the hon the Commissioner of Public Works that the traffic from the north could only be provided for by the erection of proper sheds

Mr Reynolds said there was no difference of opinion as to the necessity of increased accommodation, but the question was whether they could wisely expend 7,000*l* upon the present station Some hon members had mooted a point as to whether there should be connection established between the two lines or a branch line from the Dry Creek or Grand Junction, and thence to the Port That proposal should be considered by the Committee now sitting, and that was his (Mr Reynolds's) object in wishing to have this vote held over until further evidence could be taken If all the goods were to be housed at the Adelaide Station he was aware there would not be sufficient accommodation, but if other arrangements were to be made the question was, whether they would not reduce the amount of goods requiring storage within such limits as they could accommodate He was not opposed to expenditure of the public money, as he believed with the Government that this was the best period for such outlay, but he would not on that acconnt pass every vote of the Government Their object should be to vote the money wisely

Mr Duffield understood that the vote was intended to relieve the traffic on the northern line, but he found on enquiry that a large proportion of that traffic did not remain at Adelaide at all, the train merely bringing it into the station and the next train carrying it on to the Port He thought with the hon member for East Torrens, that they should consider the propriety of carrying out the immense traffic from the north direct to the Port, instead of going seven or eight miles out of the way He was satisfied from the spirit of economy which pervaded the House, and he hoped the present Government, that if a few thousands remained unexpended they would be found on the Estimates next year (Hear, hear, from the Commissioner of Public Works) He hoped the Government might save a considerable portion of this sum He agreed with an idea expressed some time since by the hon member for the city that the goods should be sent in one train and the passengers in another Gentlemen engaged in business were at present frequently detained at the station whilst goods trucks were being attached to the trains, for as long a time as it would take to convey them to the Port

Capt Hart was opposed to bringing goods from the Dry Creek station to town, up an unfavourable gradient, and then to the Port, instead of taking them direct to the Port, where the distance was only three miles, and the land could be had for next to nothing The goods were now carried 25 to 30 miles an hour at a vast expense, as they had to be stopped at every station, thereby entailing immense wear and tear to the rails and carriages It was also desirable to separate the goods and the passenger traffic He believed the discussion would cause the matter to be considered more fully

The Commissioner of Public Works felt obliged for the suggestions of hon members He had taken a special note of the proposal for the construction of a branch line, and would consult with the Chief Engineer of Railways on the subject, and he hoped at no distant day to be able to lay the result of that consultation on the table of the House But he must explain more clearly what he had said, or what at all events he had intended to say respecting this vote It was that the present station was not sufficient for the traffic of the Port alone, exclusive of that of the Northern line, and that when the Northern line was extended to Kapunda the difficulty would be increased

Mr Strangways hoped the Government would postpone the item, as nearly all hon members who had spoken agreed that the question of the shed depended in a great measure on the question of the railway management, and there was a Committee at present sitting which could take the subject into consideration The Hon the Commissioner of Public Works said that for the Port line alone a shed would be required, but did the hon member mean to say that if the northern traffic were diverted, a station costing 7,000*l* would be necessary? The question of the shed depended on the general question of railway management, and some hon members had said that the present management was most disgraceful The railways were now under the management of a gentleman of 18 years' experience, but the colony might not always have the benefit of that gentleman's services They might get some one who had not the advantage of 18 years' experience, but who would devise schemes which would not require this constant additional expenditure If the matter were referred to the Committee it need not be deferred for a longer period than three or four, weeks, and even if it were deferred until after the next Estimates came on, it would probably be no great harm, as they knew, from previous experience of the Railway Commissioners, that if the vote were passed these gentlemen would not be likely to take any steps in the matter for some months

The Treasurer hoped the House would not be led away by the arguments of the hon member, but would vote the sum One effect of putting the item on the Estimates would be to postpone the work to December or even later Another reason in support of the vote, in addition to those given by the hon the Attorney-General and other hon members on that (the Government) side of the House, was the contract now existing between the Railway Commissioners and the Messrs Fuller, and it was desirable that the goods sheds should be finished as soon as possible in order that the Commissioners and the public should have all the benefit obtainable from that contract

Mr Reynolds again enquired what had been done with the £2,000 voted last session for the station? Had it been expended in laying down rails?

The Commissioner of Public Works replied in the negative

The vote was then agreed to

The next two votes—completion of Cape Northumberland Light, £800, and completion of Troubridge Light, £231—were also agreed to

On the next item, surveys of trial lines of railway in accordance with addresses of House of Assembly, £3,000

Mr Peake asked the hon the Commissioner of Public Works if the surveys for which the vote was now proposed to be taken were particularised in the returns laid on the table in the earlier part of the day?

The Commissioner of Public Works replied in the affirmative

Mr Peake said that he believed it was usual when railways were to be constructed in the mother-country to call in all available talent, and that the ablest engineers who could be found were employed in the surveys and the preliminary examinations of the country The results were obtained by calling for tenders and estimates for effecting the surveys and examinations of country He would like to know from the hon the Commissioner of Public Works if it was proposed that any action should be taken by the Government in this direction and if the examinations of country were to be made by one or two individuals only, or whether tenders for that purpose would be called for from the other engineers of the colony If only two or three gentlemen were to be employed, and these gentlemen were allowed to take their own time, and not exposed to any competition, the survey would, from the almost impossibility of one person examining it, be very incomplete He thought it would be a great improvement if the surveys were offered for competition, and that if this were done we would get good surveys and expeditious surveys also Another valuable result would also arise in the thorough checking and proving of the surveys and sections before they were paid for He believed this was always done in England and that surveys were never laid before the House of Commons without being first thoroughly checked and proved

Mr Duffield would not like to pass the vote without following the course suggested by the hon member for the Burra and Clare The House had called for these surveys, and they would absorb an immense amount of money He was informed something like £10,000 ("No, no") Hon members might say "No," but he had gone a little into the subject, and had taken the opinions of surveyors upon it, and amongst them of one gentleman who was considered eminent in his position in South Australia They should consider before expending such sums the best means of expending them He would not oppose the surveys, believing that one of the first things we required was information as to the best lines for our roads and railways

Mr Strangways called attention to the difference between the surveys made by Government, and those by individuals He saw by a return on the table that hundreds had been paid to Messrs Hargraves and Murray for their surveys, and it appeared from all he could ascertain that the generality of these were similar to one now on the table, and which had been referred to on a former occasion They were in fact mere sketches of the country A person living at the Goolwa had had levels taken for a tramway from the Goolwa to Strathalbyn He believed that £3000 had been paid to Messrs Hargraves and Murray for their surveys whilst that of the proposed Strathalbyn tramway came to but £70

The Commissioner of Public Works said the whole of the information respecting these surveys was laid on the table that morning The plans of the proposed railways were not in accordance with the plan which the hon member (Mr Strangways) had referred to as a mere sketch of the country, but were most carefully executed maps Engineers, as was well known, had a fixed professional scale of payment, and the amount given to these gentlemen was at less than the rate they claimed for giving professional evidence before a Committee The Government were always anxious to give the fullest information to the House, and always told hon members that surveys were very expensive, but the House having voted the surveys, the Government were resolved to carry them out in the most efficient manner, and this he assured hon members had been done

Mr Hay hoped that whether the Government advertised for tenders or not that the work would be entrusted to the most competent persons As to such a sum as £10,000 being required he thought there must be some error

The item was then agreed to

On the next item—boat-jetty at Semaphore, £5,000,

Mr Strangways said they had enough of jetties at Glenelg It was proposed to build this one in a strong tideway where, as the hon member for the Port was well aware of, the difficulty of getting a vessel to or from such a structure was great Besides, there were no nurserymaids near the Semaphore, though Glenelg was well adapted in that respect for a promenade Neither could ships get to the proposed jetty

The Commissioner of Public Works said it was not intended that ships should unload at the jetty The subject was brought under the notice of Government by a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce, who sent in a memorial founded on certain resolutions which he would read to the House (The hon member here read the resolutions) He would now state his opinion that there was no spot on the whole coast of South Australia where a boat-jetty was so much required There was no other spot where so many passengers were landed, nor where their were so many lives risked, nor so much valuable property in the shape of mails landed The whole of the mails from Melbourne were landed there, and it was found absolutely necessary to provide life-boats for the pilots He had some time ago landed there with the hon member (Mr Glyde), and there was on that occasion a very bad surf indeed running on the beach There were at present twelve large ships lying off the Lightship, and the persons belonging to these vessels, as well as those who landed the mails, required to land at the Semaphore The work could be done at lower wages now than at any other time, and there was a large quantity of the limestone crust from the dredge which could be rendered available for the work

Mr Solomon was astonished to hear the the hon member for Encounter Bay speak of what he evidently knew nothing about He (Mr Solomon) spoke from experience, having nearly lost his life in trying to land at the site of the proposed jetty Those who had tried to embark or disembark at the place in question would see the necessity for the work 80,000*l.* had been spent on the Glenelg Jetty, and he (Mr Solomon) could not see how it was ever to be rendered useful except for the recreation of nursemaids and children (Laughter) Had any of the gentlemen who opposed the vote ever had occasion to embark on board of ship in a gale of wind? No hon member who would for a moment attempt to oppose it could have been in such a position But he with six hands in the boat had been capsized there and had to swim for it If hon gentlemen asked the men who went on board vessels for the mails, they would find that not one of these men on leaving the land in a gale of wind knew whether he would ever get to land again These men were subject to greater risks than the country or the Government had a right to expect from them

Mr Reynolds enquired whether the plans were ready, for what the Chamber of Commerce had asked, was that a survey and estimate of the cost should be made, not that a sum should be put upon the Estimates for the construction of the work He would tell the House how it arose The thing was decided upon by some members of the Chamber of Commerce, and certain members of that body were written to to make sure of their votes He need not mention names, for hon members knew who was at the bottom of it, and after all, how was it carried? Why, by a glorious majority of one! — not that a large sum should be voted, but that the Government should make plans and estimates of the works, that was his impression Now a great deal of money had been spent in this quarter, and if the House voted this £5,000 for a boat jetty they would find next year that the jetty was not long enough So next year there would be £5,000 wanted to make it longer, and next year again £10,000 to make it suitable for shipping, and then probably some £20,000, £30,000, or £40,000 for a tramway, and in the meantime, what would be done for the interior of the province? It was all very well to say "let the money be spent here," but let the money be spent where it would do most good Did we want this place to land the mails when we had already spent £30,000, on a place where the mails could be landed and brought up hours before they could be brought up from this place (No, no) A gentleman had stated that he landed at Glenelg from the steamer, and when he arrived in town, or rather at his residence, four or five miles beyond Adelaide, the steamer was going past the Semaphore We should make use of the expensive structure at Glenelg, and then such was the enterprise of the gentlemen connected with Glenelg, that they had already proposed to construct a tramway to connect that locality with Adelaide It was not a question of landing the mails, for that want would be met better by landing them at Glenelg But at the Semaphore look at the sand they would have to go through Would they not have by and by hon members appealing to them on behalf of the poor horses and cattle employed in bringing the mails, pointing out the desert these animals had to go through, and appealing in their favor on the ground of humanity He could see far more grounds for spending £1 000 or £2,000, on the Port road, but he thought that more money should be spent in the interior

Capt Hart would correct the hon members who had spoken on two points, and first as regarded the nursemaids (Laughter) The nursemaids on the Peninsula were numerous, and as for children, he would guarrantee there was no part of South Australia which possessed a greater number of them in proportion to the inhabitants With reference to the tide-way which the hon member for Encounter Bay spoke of, he (Mr Hart) did not pretend to any great knowledge on the subject (A laugh, which drowned the latter portion of the sentence) But he had never seen any tide way there. There was a rise and fall on the beach of five or six feet, as there was all over the bay; but as to a tide-way where the proposed jetty was to be, the tide there had not the smallest influence in the world. This work was really wanted, because there was more traffic from this point than from any part of the coast. The hon. member for the Sturt said the distance for the mail would be shortened by going to Holdfast Bay; but the distance to Troubridge Shoal was common to both routes (No, no,) and the distance to the Lightship was not greater than that to Glenelg. The absolute distance by sea to the latter was less than by the mail route, but from where the landing of the mail now took place we had the advantage, and therefore it would be absurd to take a vessel where the anchorage was not so secure as at the Lightship (Oh, oh.) The anchorage in Holdfast Bay was not so good, as any man who had been at sea must know, for the Lightship was higher up the estuary. Perhaps, however, the hon. member for Encounter Bay knew more on this subject than he did. (A laugh.) It had been said that there were a great number of boat jetties on the coast, but he (Mr Hart) had never opposed a vote for one anywhere, as he knew the advantages of facilities being afforded for the landing and shipment of goods and passengers, and should, therefore, always vote for jetties on the coast. If such a jetty as that proposed to be put at the Semaphore had been put at Glenelg instead of the one now there, it would have been a wiser proceeding, as the jetty would have answered all the purposes. He contended that the mail steamers would prefer coming up to the Lightship than to Glenelg, from the advantages they would enjoy in the former in getting passengers and other ways. But what would be the advantage to the colony if the steamers came there in consequence of the advantages to which he had previously referred. They would supply the vessels with their quota of the stores and provisions required, and people would have the advantage of going safely and easily on board to take their passages by the overland route to Europe. He thought he had made out a case so far as the colony was concerned, for this jetty beyond any in the colony, and again he said that something was due to the locality. For the last five or six years the place had been without means of communication at all, as hon. members would find if they went there. Some few hon. members had done so, and he believed their opinions were changed in consequence of such visits. But if this jetty were erected it would enable the people to build at something like a reasonable cost as there were large quarries on Yorke's Peninsula, and if this jetty were constructed they would see buildings of a superior character put up at a much cheaper rate than those now being erected. He hoped the House would take into consideration that the place at present had no communication, for there was no prospect of the bridge being built, although 40,000*l* had been paid for land in the locality, besides the 1,000*l* subscribed for the bridge.

Mr PEAKE was sorry to vote against the motion, but as the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works relied on bringing limestone up from the bottom to build the jetty, upon that ground alone he (Mr Peake) should oppose the vote, for the stone would be so rotten that they would soon have such a condition of affairs at the Jetty as they had at the River Weir. The work was not urgently called for, and the money was required in the rural districts. If we had plenty of money to spare it would be very well to make jetties to please ourselves. He could not agree with the hon. member that the jetty would be useful in reference to the mails, for if we could coax the steamers to Adelaide they would give us our mails at Glenelg.

Mr GLYDE would support the vote, and had he previously had any doubt of its propriety, the facts adduced by the hon. member for the Port would have convinced him of its necessity. His reason for rising was to correct a mistake into which the hon. member for Sturt had fallen with regard to the proceedings of the Chamber of Commerce. He (Mr Glyde) had referred to those resolutions, and found they were to the effect that the Chief Secretary should be requested to place a sum on the Estimates for the construction of a jetty and tramway at the Semaphore, and that the work should be immediately commenced.

Mr HAWKER, before going to the House, had determined to oppose the item unless good reason could be given in support of it, and his views were strengthened by what had been stated in its favor. The Commissioner of Public Works wanted to construct the jetty as a means of employing labor, but he (Mr Hawker) believed unless it was formed of the limestone taken up by the dredge, the materials would come from without the colony from Van Diemen's Land and Swan River—and consequently little benefit to labor would accrue. He believed only twelve men were employed on the jetty at Glenelg, and therefore a jetty of that description would do little to give employment. The hon. member (Mr Hart) said the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) was wrong in condemning the jetty because ships could not go alongside, and he pointed out the advantage of putting barges laden with stone alongside it; but if it blew hard he (Mr Hawker) thought such vessels with such cargoes might put the jetty out of its equilibrium. But if stone or goods were landed there neither horse nor bullock-teams could draw them away, and therefore that consideration must be set on one side altogether. It was no reason that money should be expended at the Semaphore because money had been spent on the Glenelg jetty, but it was unfair to condemn a work before it was finished, for it was only by the result that its advantages or defects could be known. He knew the Semaphore was an unpleasant place to land at, but he had never heard of loss of life in consequence of the danger. Even if steamers brought the mails to Nepean Bay it would be a great point gained, but the point was to get the mails landed in the shortest time. He believed the Glenelg jetty would answer both purposes. He thought the labor might be employed more advantageously in the country districts, and therefore should vote against the sum.

Mr LINDSAY supported the item. The Government had allowed 21 years to pass without providing means for landing passenger traffic. In the finest weather the water was so shoal that it was impossible to get into a boat without getting wet. There were also other arguments for the expenditure. If 30,000*l* were a justifiable expenditure at Glenelg, 5,000*l* ought to be spent there. The Peninsula was not a desert, for it contained 2,000 people, many of whom had purchased land at high prices, and they had a right to a large share of the expenditure; money ought to be spent in the country districts, but not to the prevention of works of that sort. He should support the motion on condition of that sum being the whole amount needed.

Mr BURFORD felt ashamed to prolong the debate. He must vote for the motion, and was sorry to find such a disposition to pit one public work against another. Such works should be considered on their merits. Would hon. members presume to put the Port and Glenelg in comparison with each other? There could be no comparison, Glenelg was for purposes of pleasure, the Port was for purposes of business. Let them have business first and pleasure afterwards. He once reposed on the deck of a vessel without covering all night rather than land at the Semaphore, and on another occasion went to the water's edge with a gallant young friend who was going to meet his bride on board a vessel, but declined going further, for he was astonished at the heavy sea running on the coast. As to spending money in the country, there was there but little risk to life for want of roads and bridges compared with the risk in landing at the Semaphore. They should prefer protection to life where danger was concerned. A tramway would sooner or later be required, and they should set about it. He was glad the hon. member for East Torrens put the resolution of the Chamber of Commerce in its right light. Hon. members should be careful not to be too fast in their statements.

On the question being put the House divided, when there appeared for the vote, ayes, 12; Messrs Hanson, Finniss, Dutton, Barrow, Burford, Glyde, Hallett, Hart, Lindsay, McDermott, Solomon, and Blyth (teller).

Noes 13—Messrs Cole, Duffield, Harvey, Hawker, Hay, McEllister, Mildred, Peake, Reynolds, Townsend, Wark, Rogers, and Strangways (teller.)

The motion was therefore lost.

The next item was £20,000 for the main roads of the colony.

On the proposition to place £1300 on the Supplementary Estimates for the publication of the "Colonial Hansard,"

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to ask what arrangement had been made respecting the item of £1300. He had heard that some arrangement had been made, but he knew nothing about it. He had a circular from the Editor of the Advertiser stating, that such a contract had been entered into. Some hon. members had complained that reports were furnished them of their speeches but he made no objection to those sent him in the circular, nor to the propriety of a "Hansard" being published, but he thought a better arrangement might be made by subsidizing each paper, and getting both papers to publish reports, so that at the end of the session the House might decide which report should be taken. He considered that sum would be sufficient for the purpose, as it would only require an extra reporter for each paper.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that one of the arrangements made last session was, that the Government should adopt such measures as were necessary for the purpose of having a full, accurate, and permanent record of the debates in that House. The Government gave a pledge to the House that they would act upon that—not merely to ascertain the terms on which it should be done, but also to make arrangements to have it done in such a manner as to justify them in placing the cost of it on the Estimates of that House. They accordingly took proceedings for obtaining a record of the debates of last session and entered into a contract with a gentleman who was then editor of the Times, to complete a volume of the proceedings of the former year for 500*l*. He need not say that that gentleman unfortunately failed. After communicating with the two present daily papers, the Advertiser agreed to perform that work for a considerably smaller sum than the Register. The Advertiser agreed to do it for £1,300, which, being a smaller sum than the Government believed that the House was prepared to vote for the purpose, they felt fully justified in closing with the proprietors, subject to the opinion of the House, and on condition that the acts of the Government were sanctioned by the Legislature, the Government believed that the House would not object to endorse the action taken by them, particularly when the objects proposed were carried out at a less cost than was anticipated

Mr PEAKE asked if the volume alluded to by the Attorney-General was likely to be furnished, or what had become of it? And also if the £500 had been paid? With regard to the arrangement made by the Government, to have the proceedings of that House reported he was cordially disposed to support it

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had forgotten to state what had been done with regard to that volume A part of the £1,300 was intended to meet the possible expense agreed upon with the late proprietor of the Times for printing the Colonial "Hansard," but the Government did not feel fully justified in paying the sum until the volume had been placed before the Hon Chairman in his capacity of Speaker, in order that he might say whether the Government was justified in paying it or not For however well intentioned the work might have been it had not been carried out in such a manner as was contemplated by the contract, and therefore the Government would not pay it until the House stated they were justified in doing so

Mr GLYDE had not gathered how much the printing of the "Hansard" was to cost

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—Thirteen hundred pounds

Mr GLYDE would like to know the regulations laid down respecting reporting The public money was spent to pay gentlemen in the gallery for reporting the speeches of hon members, and he wished to know what arrangements were made for furnishing hon members with copies Cases continually arose when gentlemen who spoke much said things they were sorry to see next morning, and he thought it probable in such cases there might be difference of opinion between hon gentlemen and the reporters as to what was said He wished to know what regulations existed as to deciding the point, and as to what should appear as the speech of hon members If the "Hansard" were to be of any value it should be a work of reference for the future as to what hon members said on particular subjects, and unless some regulation were adopted it would be useless He would ask the Attorney-General what regulations had been adopted

Mr STRANGWAYS asked information as to the Hansard of last year Hon members must be aware that only one paper then professed to give reports of the speeches, and he had understood the editor of the Times was compelled to compile the "Colonial Hansard" from the reports of the Register He wished to know if it was so or not If those reports were not true they ought to be officially contradicted, if true, it should be admitted

The ATTORNEY GENERAL stated, in answer to Mr Glyde, that the reports were to be a fair abstract of the debate on matters of ordinary interest, and complete and full reports of matters of importance The terms of the contract were the following —"Full and accurate reports of the debates in both Houses of Parliament to be made and printed in brevier or nonpareil type in the daily and weekly papers published by the contractors The reports wanted to be a fair abstract of any speech in ordinary debates, and a complete and accurate report in matters of interest Proof slips of the debates to be furnished to every member on the morning after their occurrence, for correction, if necessary, to be returned the following day at noon No charge to be made for alterations or corrections, but if the alterations are extensive, or appear to the publisher at variance with the purport of the speech, the contractor to refer to such person as the Government shall appoint to decide finally on the insertion or rejection of the alterations 300 copies of the revised reports of the debates to be transferred and printed in brevier or nonpareil type, and bound in boards, in volumes, large octavo size, and supplied to the Government within one month from the end of each session of Parliament The contract to be for three years, to commence from the beginning of the ensuing session, but should the House be in session at the expiration of that period, not to determine before the close of that session Payments to be made monthly in equal instalments In case of a resolution proposed by the Government, and passed by the House of Assembly, that the reports are not according to contract, the contract at any date to be determined, and notified by the Government, not sooner than one month nor later than three months from the date of the resolution" It was provided that the Government should name some person who should be the referee in case a correction should be made which altered the meaning of a speech He considered the Speaker of the Assembly would be an impartial judge He did not understand exactly the enquiry made by the hon member for Encounter Bay

Mr STRANGWAYS thought if an arrangement had been made that the proprietor of the Times should compile a volume of reports of Parliamentary proceedings from the columns of the Register it should be admitted, if not, it should be contradicted

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was no part of the arrangement between the Government and Mr Allen The arrangement was that he should compile a complete abstract of the debates, but nothing more was said Mr Allen stated that the reports he had would enable him to complete the undertaking The impression was that he was in possession of sufficient reports to carry out the work, with occasional reference to other sources for the purpose of completing it

Mr HAY could not altogether agree with the arrangement made. He thought it was justifiable to have a Hansard, giving correct reports of the speeches of both Houses, but thought it was a mistake to publish reports of the speeches in a newspaper before hon members were prepared to say they were correct For one person looking at Hansard 500 would look at a newspaper, and he thought newspapers ought to publish speeches on their own responsibility He did not mean to say the reports of the Advertiser were incorrect, but if it was necessary to correct reports intended to be records of debates in that House, it was necessary to correct them before they were sent forth to the public He thought the Hansard should have no connection with the newspapers With respect to the £500, the House was not asked to sanction that, but he had heard hon members say that reports had been cut out of the Register and sent to them for correction He could not say himself, but if it was so, he supposed the Register was entitled to part of the £500

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could not say what was done with regard to other members, but when the epitomising first began, slips were sent to him and in every case they consisted of the matter that was to be published, and were not extracts from the Register They were taken from reports in the Times, and were abstracts from what had previously been taken

Mr NEALES could bear out the last speaker, when he said that the slips from the Times office were sent in the form in which they were to appear in the book Whether they were extracts from the Register or the Times, was no business of his It began well and was very nicely got up, and he thought it ought to be continued in that form in which it began His intention in bringing the motion forward last session was, that some reliable report should be furnished of the debates ever since an elective body sat in that House, and he hoped the failure of the Times would not cause a breach in the reports of that House, and could only say that if the present Hansard was continued he should be abundantly satisfied Some who were in the habit of speaking long-windedly, might suffer in the reports, for his part, he generally wished to be as short as possible

Mr STRANGWAYS had not received an answer to his question He wanted some satisfactory information as to the source of the reports of the Hansard of last session, otherwise how could any one say whether it was reliable or not

Mr BURFORD only felt annoyed with Hansard on one occasion, in which the report of what he had not said would be perpetuated in all time, and he should be truly ashamed of what he had been said to have uttered He had been in hopes that the report would have been altered at once, but as it would have to be reprinted, his request could not be complied with Under the circumstances he felt greatly annoyed, for the speech was in reference to a question of great importance —it was in reference to the question of the continuance of the Attorney-General in that House He would like to have had it altered

Mr REYNOLDS would have been very glad to have corrected slips for the old Hansard, had they been sent to him.

Mr COLE asked if the 1,300*l* included the 500*l*

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—Yes

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed that the amount, 1,300*l*, be reduced to 800*l*

Mr BARROW thought the fact of two Hansards having been mentioned had rather mystified the matter under discussion, and that consequently several observations intended to apply to one had been by mistake applied to the other With regard to the statement that £500 of the £1,300 on the Estimates was for the old Hansard, and £800 for the new, he could say nothing, not knowing what the Treasurer might have in view when inscribing that item, but whatever the £1,300 might stand for the new Hansard, as published in the papers, and subsequently in volumes, was to cost £1,300 per annum, according to the contract He would rather have said nothing on the subject, representing as he did the contractors on that occasion, but at the same time he was in a position to throw a little light on the subject, and felt it his duty to do so With regard to the opinion of the hon member for Gumeracha (Mr Hay) that the Government should pay for bringing out a Hansard as a permanent record of debates in the House, but not for special reports in the papers, he (Mr Barrow) considered that the chief value of the record was the publicity it acquired when appearing in the papers The ground that the hon member took was that where one person read Hansard 500 would read the newspapers He (Mr Barrow) could not, therefore, see the propriety of the Government paying for a work that only one out of 500 political readers would see The chief utility seemed to him to be that the reports appeared in the daily press before they were bound in volumes With reference to the cost of such a work it was impossible for parties unconnected with the newspaper press to form a right opinion on the matter The proprietors of the Advertiser did not expect to gain anything by their contract It was not their object On taking the contract, the first thing they did was to order 1,500 lbs of type expressly for the "Hansard" at 4s 6d per lb That was only the first step, as immediately afterwards they incurred fresh expenses in further purchases of expensive type and plant The mere work of reporting was only one item of the cost The expense of reading and correcting so much solid matter was much greater than that of reading off the light matter which was ordinarily contained in newspapers Then there would be 300 volumes of bound octavo volumes to furnish, which in a colony like this, where labor cost so much, would be a very considerable addition to the expense, and had not the contractors desired rather to be engaged in an honorable undertaking than to secure a profit, they would not have entered into such an engagement With regard to the speeches of hon members not being revised by themselves before they appeared in the morning papers, it would be easy to insert a paragraph to that effect, but it sometimes occurred that the more life-like a picture was the more disagreeable it appeared to be (Loud laughter) It would be uncharitable in the extreme to give literal reports of all the speeches that were made—(hear, hear)—and sometimes it would be impracticable too, taking into consideration the wretched accommodation afforded to the reporters for the press It would be remembered that in a former session, when special reports of the proceedings of the House on the privilege question were required the official reporter was accommodated on the floor of the House, whence he could see and hear accurately everything that was going on, but under present circumstances, whether in consequence of the want of attention to the principles of acoustics in the construction of the House, whether owing to a temporary dulness on the part of a reporter, or whether to the indistinct utterances of an hon member, the thread of the argument was lost to the reporter, and in that most uncomfortable gallery it was perhaps impossible to recover it Hence, notwithstanding every possible precaution, mistakes would occur Every opportunity, however, should be given to hon members for the correction of errors of that description, and he (Mr Barrow) would like to see some one appointed to act as arbitrator between hon members and the reporters, for although he had very little to complain of respecting the corrections made by hon members, it might happen that an hon member might like to have his speech reconstructed under the idea it might be embellished by the addition of a few fresh sentences, and by the striking out of that which, though spoken, did not look well in print (A laugh) On the same principle some persons objected to photographs as being too true to nature That would certainly be the fate of the Hansard, if every word were reported, and he should, therefore, be very glad if some impartial and judicious person were to be appointed to act as umpire on occasions of dispute It was only on such occasions that his mediation would be necessary In one or two instances that had come under his notice, he considered that the reporter was right, but most of the corrections made by hon members had been fair and legitimate With regard to the correction forms, in such cases as that mentioned by the hon member (Mr Burford), when he wished to have corrected his speech relative to the office of Attorney-General, the correction arrived too late The contractors could not afford to keep up a mass of type for an indefinite period It must be distributed, and it was necessary, therefore, that slips should be returned corrected as soon as possible after they were received For instance, the proof of a speech made on Tuesday, would be received by hon members on Wednesday morning, and it must be returned on Thursday, otherwise it was not the fault of the contractors if the corrections were not made He apologized for those observations, but was anxious to have the work satisfactorily performed, and thought it most likely to be done if the contractors had the confidence of the House He assured the House that every effort should be made to give satisfaction (Hear, hear)

The Treasurer, in reply to Mr Cole, said that the sum of £1,300 on the Estimates was intended to include the £500 incurred for the "Hansard" of last session, and £800 towards the present "Hansard" The remainder of the sum necessary would appear on the Estimates when brought forward

Mr Reynolds would have been glad to have corrected the slips of the old "Hansard" otherwise hon members might be said to have uttered strange things

The Commissioner of Crown Lands would remind the hon member for Sturt that a copy of "Hansard" would be laid on the table of the House for the information of hon members and it would be then for the House to express an opinion on it A great portion appeared satisfactory, but the remainder had been done in such a hurried way that the Government thought it better to take the opinion of the House with regard to it

Mr Reynolds thought all should have had copies of the reports for correction

The Commissioner of Public Works thought the slips must have miscarried, for he had had them regularly

The vote was put and carried

On Burra Burra Institute, £250, being put,

Mr Strangways wished to know if all institutions were to share the same advantage

Dr Wark thought those only should have help who helped themselves

The Treasurer said the Government added one-third on condition that the remaining two-thirds necessary were subscribed

Mr Hawker would vote for the sum if all institutions were treated alike

Mr Neales would not vote for it if all institutions were supplemented The Burra was quite an exceptional case There was a large population, and he thought, considering the expense of the Institute, £250 was a miscalculation

The Commissioner of Public Works would favorably consider all claims of any village, however small, if the inhabitants subscribed two-thirds the necessary amount

Mr Reynolds asked if the property was leasehold?

The Attorney-General said it was on a lease for 99 years

The vote was then carried

On the question being put that £3,000 should be voted for the Exploring Expedition to the norther interior

Mr Strangways asked what had been expended on that expedition, and what further amount would be required If the information were not satisfactory he would move the item be struck out

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that when the £2,000 was voted last year it was understood the expedition would cost a considerable sum, but the House purposed to incur the expense Paper No 36 gave particulars of expenditure already incurred, and would show that £5,000 would not do more than cover it He would have been glad to have given information to the House of what had recently been done, but some hon members objected to its being published

Mr Hay said when the £2,000 was asked for, it was the general opinion of the House that the sum was little enough, and it was understood that the Government should not be blamed for the expenditure They had done right in not giving the leader of the expedition any ground of complaint

The vote was carried

The remainder of the items were then carried

Mr Reynolds proposed the reconsideration of the item £50, for a verandah to the Custom House, Port Adelaide He thought the gentleman who had incurred the expense had been sufficiently punished by the prospect of having it to pay, and he therefore moved that the item be reconsidered with a view to its being placed on the Supplementary Estimates

Mr Strangways seconded it

Mr Duffield, although he had voted for its being struck out, must support the motion, as since that time the House had voted a larger sum incurred under similar circumstances

The vote was carried

The House resumed

The Speaker reported that the Committee had agreed to resolutions, and the report was ordered to be read and taken into consideration next day

IMPOUNDING ACT

The Commissioner of Crown Lands moved the second reading of the Bill intituled "an Act to consolidate and Amend the Laws relating to the Impounding of Cattle" It was more than 10 years ago since the Impounding Acts were passed, and the country had had great experience since that time There had hitherto been two Bills in existence, but it was intended to consolidate all Acts into one The present Bill had been examined by the Chairmen of District Councils, who had expressed their entire approval of it Honorable gentlemen had the opportunity of comparing the present Bill with that originally brought in, and of observing the alterations A few words had been added in one clause which would have a very important bearing on its working, and it was one which more than any other had given rise to dispute and dissatisfaction to those parties who were obliged to impound cattle, and to those who had them to release He alluded to the clause requiring them to be taken to the nearest Pound In a legal point of view it was difficult to say which was the nearest According to the proper interpretation the nearest would be as the crow flies, others said it would be going by the road, which might be a good many miles further than in a direct line It was therefore proposed to leave it to the impounder, and the House would say whether they approved of the measure or not It was also proposed to exclude some persons from purchasing impounded cattle, such as the servants of the Poundkeepers, in order that there may be no collusion Another alteration was that the cattle should not be sold by the Poundkeeper but by a licensed auctioneer He thought that an important point, and one that ought to be carefully considered There were no doubt many respectable men poundkeepers, but some were not just what could be wished, and it was best to remove temptation from them It was not intended to charge the auctioneers with the license, but every possible enquiry would be made into their characters, so that the interests of the public might be safely entrusted to them Wherever a charge of misconduct was proved against a Poundkeeper, it was thought a summary power should be given to remove him Another clause of great importance was that, in case of excessive damages, they should be paid under protest, and another clause required that damages must have been sustained one month prior to action being taken These were the most important alterations, others would appear as the clauses went through Committee He moved the second reading of the Bill

Mr LINDSAY would vote for the second reading of the Bill, if he thought it would be amended in Committee, but it was so objectionable that he could not He called attention to a few clauses, comparing the 21st with the 40th and 41st It was difficult to understand whether fences were necessary or not

The SPEAKER said it was not usual to go into the consideration of the clauses on the motion for the second reading of the Bill The principle should be discussed

Mr LINDSAY objected to that. Many of the clauses were contradictory Some were perfectly ridiculous, especially those making a distinction between fenced and unfenced land Some of the regulations would enable a person to annoy his neighbour and lead to endless litigation It gave power to destroy domestic animals, and there would be no knowing where it would stop It would probably end in shooting one's neighbour himself He hoped the Government would withdraw this Bill and introduce one similar to the regulations existing in France

Mr STRANGWAYS called the attention of the Attorney-General to the 6th Victoria He thought it would have to be considered with the Impounding Act. It related to the branding of cattle

The motion was then put and carried, and the consideration of the Bill in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS

The Bill for the execution of criminals was read a second time The consideration in Committee was made an Order of the Day for Thursday next

The SPEAKER reported progress, and the House adjourned to next day

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1858

The PRESIDENT took the chair at two o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon A Foster, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon the Surveyor-General, the Hon Mr Morphett, the Hon Mr Davenport

MESSAGE FROM ASSEMBLY

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, leave was given to the Hon John Baker to attend a Committee of the House of Assembly, for the purpose of giving evidence upon the subject of taxation

The PRESIDENT explained, in consequence of some remarks which fell from the Hon A Forster and the Hon Captain Bagot, that there was no novelty in the course which had been adopted by the Assembly, in soliciting that permission should be given to the Hon Mr Baker, the practice having existed for centuries in England The hon gentleman read an extract from "May" showing that such was the case The message from the House of Assembly merely requested that leave might be given to the Hon Mr Baker to attend if he thought fit

The Hon A FORSTER remarked that though this might be in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Imperial Parliament, a recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council shewed that a person could not be compelled to give evidence before a Committee of the House, therefore, so far as any practical results were concerned, the resolution at which the Council had arrived in acceding to the request of the Assembly was perfectly needless The decision of the Privy Council had been recognised by the other House in a report placed before it in connection with the Standing Orders, and that House had expressed an opinion that a person could not be summoned, and had thought it necessary that a Bill should be introduced to define the privileges of the House. The privileges of the Imperial Parliament did not apply to the Parliament of the colony, but he would not oppose anything which was merely carrying out courtesy to the other branch of the Legislature

The Hon Captain BAGOT moved—

"That it is the opinion of this Council that, in consequence of the failure of the contract entered into by the British Government with the European and Australian Mail Company for the conveyance of the Australian mails, it is desirable that the three colonies, namely—Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia—should unite in recommending to the Home Government that a proposition be made to the Directors of the Peninsular and Oriental Mail Company, for the conveyance of a monthly mail to and from Hobson's Bay, calling at Nepean Bay each way, and that a respectful address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to communicate with the Governments of the aforesaid colonies, with the view of ascertaining how far they may be disposed to join in such a measure, and, also, that he will take whatever other steps may be found advisable for perfecting this important matter"

His object in bringing the motion before the House was to afford hon members an opportunity of expressing their views or opinions on a matter which vitally affected all, both as individuals and in their public capacity—postal communication with the mother-country A resolution to the same effect had been submitted to the other House of Parliament and carried Hon members would observe that he went further into detail than the other resolution, and it was for hon members to say how far they would adopt the proposition which he put forward He did not wish to press any portion of it beyond what was thought necessary He had addressed himself particularly to a line which had already been satisfactorily in operation for a number of years The Company he referred to were engaged throughout the eastern seas in carrying several mails He thought as regarded economy and accommodation, arrangements could be better conducted via Mauritius than by any other line He had referred in his motion to three colonies, but had not mentioned New South Wales, because the Legislature of that colony had determined upon adopting the Panama route, and had placed a sufficient sum upon the Estimates to enable them to carry it out It was therefore idle to expect them to join in and other route after establishing one for themselves He had thought it best to refer in his motion to the three colonies which had been left without any mail whatever To gain the supply of their wants they must make known what they were He wished the colonies he had named to unite with our Government, and that the Government should be supported by the opinion of the Council in any arrangements which were effected He had mentioned Nepean Bay in his motion, but he was not at all wedded to that portion of it, and if arrangements could be made for the vessels to call at Port Adelaide he had not the least objection to it Victoria in point of wealth and population being at the head of the Australian colonies, had a right to take a leading position in this matter and to contribute the largest amount, and should expect that whatever proposition was made would be first made to that colony

The Hon A FORSTER seconded the motion

The Hon Captain HALL, whilst generally agreeing to the motion, thought that it would be very much improved by a slight alteration, to which he did not think the mover would object The hon mover had stated that it was considered a great boon when the steamers called at Nepean Bay, but at that time they were pledged to a contract for a certain number of years Now they were free and unfettered, for if ever a contract was broken it had been broken by the European and Australian Steam Company In entering upon new ground nothing would satisfy him unless the steamers subsidized by the colony called off Port Adelaide He suggested that the motion should be altered in a way that he was satisfied would meet the wants and wishes of the community by the steamers calling off Port Adelaide each way

The Hon Captain BAGOT was quite willing to adopt the amendment

The Hon Captain SCOTT suggested as a mere verbal amendment that Tasmania should be substituted for Van Diemen's Land He hoped that in the new arrangements the Home Government would not act so hastily as they had, but that they would consult the various colonies before entering into any final arrangements He believed that what was asked for by the amendment was fairly due to us, and he should support it

The Hon Dr EVERARD asked the Chief Secretary if Holdfast Bay was not within the jurisdiction of the Port as, if so, he thought the mails could be landed at the Jetty at Glenelg, by which means persons would be enabled to get their letters some hours earlier than if they were landed at the Port

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY could not speak positively as to whether Holdfast Bay was within the limits of Port Adelaide or not

The Hon Mr MORPHETT asked the Chief Secretary whether, in effect, the Government had not anticipated the motion of his hon friend (Captain Bagot), whether they had not already taken steps in the matter He was rather inclined to think that the Governor had for some time been in correspondence with the other Governors of other colonies, and the Home Government, in reference to steam communication He thought that the Chief Secretary would be enabled to state that a very satisfactory termination of that correspondence was anticipated

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that all the correspondence which had taken place upon the subject was before the House and would be found in Council Paper 53 The resolution of the Hon Captain Bagot had to some extent been anticipated, but the Government considered it very desirable to have the opinion of that House in the shape of an address Hon gentlemen would recollect that in Act 1 of last session, authority was given to the Home Government to enter into an arrangement in connection with postal communication, until 31st December next All the neighbouring colonies acquiesced in that arrangement, and if the Home Government entered into a contract embracing the arrangement determined upon, that the vessels should touch at Nepean Bay, he apprehended the Government of this colony would be bound by it, he thought it probable, however, that before any such arrangement was finally closed, it would be submitted to the various colonial Governments for approval No doubt postal arrangements in connection with Victoria and Van Diemen's Land, would be best for the interest of this community, if the steamers touched off Port Adelaide each way, and would be more economical, but if the other colonies ignored the geographical position of South Australia, and the steamers touched at Hobson's Bay, with branch lines to Adelaide, it would then be for the Government to consider whether it would not be better that South Australia should have a line of her own The Government had already entered into correspondence with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, for the purpose of ascertaining what subsidy they would require for carrying out the contract

The Hon A FORSTER thought that if any arrangement had been entered into with any new company by the Government, with the intention of carrying out the arrangement to which they were previously pledged, this colony would be, to some extent, bound by the arrangement, in consequence of the despatch which had been forwarded That despatch contemplated that, under the former arrangement, steamers would call, on their homeward voyage, at Kangaroo Island The despatch further suggested to Her Majesty's Government whether, from the geographical position of the spot which he had named, it should not be visited outward and homeward Were they to commence a contract again, he should certainly not feel disposed to vote money for any scheme by which the steamers would not call at Port Adelaide. He should not be satisfied with the vessels calling at Kangaroo Island even out and home. If the contract were to be recommenced, he should not sanction any other scheme than such as he had stated, but if the Home Government had renewed the contract with any other company, he should consider the colony bound by the arrangement He hoped, however, from the suggestions of His Excellency the Governor, that the steamers would call out and home to some port in this colony, he hoped Port Adelaide. If Victoria was satisfied with the route via Mauritius, which was as short as any other, no doubt the cost would be very much lessened by the adoption of the scheme by the Cape and Mauritius If Victoria was not satisfied with that route he hoped Van Diemen's Land and Victoria would join in some scheme with South Australia He considered the House should feel obliged to the hon Captain Bagot for bringing the motion forward, and was glad to hear that it met with the approval of the Chief Secretary

The Hon Mr AYERS cordially supported the motion, particularly since the amendment had been adopted by the hon mover

The Hon Mr MORPHETT hoped that the mover would include New South Wales, as he did not know why that colony should be left out of the arrangement They were in the habit of looking upon the Australian colonies as a united group The Hon Captain Bagot had stated that New South Wales had acted for herself in the matter by endeavouring to get a line via Panama, but in that arrangement the whole of the Australian colonies were embraced, as it was proposed that branch steamers should be in communication with the other colonies New South Wales did not exclude this colony from the advantages of that line and therefore why should New South Wales be excluded in the contemplated arrangements

The Hon Captain BAGOT said the reason that he had not included New South Wales was that she had already taken steps in the matter without reference to the wants or wishes of other colonies by providing a line of communication eastward about instead of westward about If the Council thought that New South Wales should be included he had no objection

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY stated that the Government had received a despatch from the Government of New South Wales, in which this colony was invited to join in the Panama route, the New South Wales Government also expressing their willingness to join in any other

The Hon Captain BAGOT stated the information conveyed by the Chief Secretary was perfectly new to him The hon gentleman adopted the suggestion of the Hon Mr Morphett, and the following amended motion was carried —

"That it is the opinion of this Council that, in consequence of the failure of the contract entered into by the British Government with the European and Australian Company, the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia should unite in recommending to the Home Government that an arrangement be entered into for the conveyance of a monthly mail to and from Hobson's Bay, calling off Port Adelaide each way, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to communicate with the Governments of the aforesaid colonies, with the view of ascertaining how far they may be disposed to join in such a measure, and, also, that he will take whatever other steps may be found advisable for perfecting this important matter"

MESSAGE FROM ASSEMBLY

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the Assembly requesting that leave be given to the Hon John Baker to give evidence before the Committee upon Assessment of Stock, and that the Hon Captain Bagot and Hon Captain Freeling have leave to give evidence before the Committee upon Colonial Defences

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY leave was given

THE ADELAIDE AND GAWLER TOWN RAILWAY FURTHER EXTENSION BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that it was a mere counterpart of a Bill passed last session for the extension of a railway from Gawler Town to Section 112 in the Hundred of Light The present Bill proposed to extend the railway from Section 112 to Section 1411 in the Hundred of Kapunda, and it would cost 180,000*l* The sum of £120,000 had been provided for the purpose last session, and the present Bill provided for a further sum of £60,000, £20,000 of which was to be provided from the general revenue and £40,000 by bonds The course of the line had been thoroughly investigated by a Committee of the House of Assembly, and it had been unanimously agreed that it was the best line which could be carried out Within a fortnight or three weeks of the Bill being passed the Government would be prepared to employ several hundred labourers upon the works

The Bill was then read a second time and passed through Committee, the third reading being made an Order of the Day for the following day

[Whilst the Bill was in Committee, the Hon A Forster asked if a Bill became law from the date of its passing, or from the date of the Governor's assent being given The President said that it took effect from the first day of the session, unless a special clause fixed a particular date The Hon Mr Morphett said that he had, last session, introduced a Bill to remedy this evil It had passed the Council but had lapsed in the Assembly]

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

This Bill passed through Committee, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day The following clauses being substituted for those which had been postponed from the previous day,—

"2 The importer of any goods shall, in the case of coasting vessels having on board goods liable to duty and in the case of steamers and intercolonial vessels within twenty-four hours, and in the case of all other vessels within four days after the arrival of the importing ship shall have been reported at the Custom House, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, make perfect entry of such goods, and in default of such entry it shall be lawful for the master or agent of the vessel to enter such goods and convey them to a bonded warehouse, and if the duties due upon such goods be not paid within three calendar months after such twenty-four hours and four days respectively shall have expired, or within such longer period as the Collector of Customs shall in any case permit, together with all charges of removal and warehouse rent, the same shall be sold and the proceeds thereof shall be applied first to the payment of duties, next of freight and charges, and the overplus (if any) shall be paid to the proprietor of the goods or other person duly authorized to receive the same —Provided, that in the case of goods subject to the performance of quarantine, the date on which the same shall be released from quarantine shall for the purposes of this clause be taken to be the date of the arrival of the ship

"If any goods liable to the payment of duty shall receive damage during the voyage, from natural decay, or from any other cause during the voyage an abatement of such duty shall be made on the same terms and conditions and to the same extent as if such goods had been sea-damaged Provided that no such abatement shall be made if is not claimed before the said goods are removed from the wharf

The Hon Captain HALL again urged the Hon the Chief Secretary, before taking the Bill out of Committee, to consult with the Attorney-General, to see if it would not be practicable to introduce a clause obliging shipmasters to discharge their cargoes within a certain period, instead of keeping goods on board, as they frequently did, for the purpose of ballast

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY stated that he had consulted the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject and that the Attorney-General deemed such a clause inexpedient

The House adjourned at a quarter to 4 o'clock, till 2 o'clock on the following day

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6

The SPEAKER took the chair at 10 minutes past 1 o'clock

ADMINISTRATION OF LAW AND JUSTICE

Mr STRANGWAYS in moving the resolution standing in his name—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into all matters connected with the administration of law and justice within this province,"

Said the majority of matters involved in this notice were within the cognizance of that House, so he would not detain them long One matter which he would refer to was the administration of law and justice in the Supreme Court of this province Hon members must be aware of the constant disputes and squabbles which had taken place between the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Counsel, and the Jury An hon member who was in the habit of visiting the Court of Assizes, or any other courts of justice in England, must feel surprised at the scenes presented in our colonial Courts With respect to the Insolvency Court, there was another matter for enquiry The expenses in that Court at present caused considerable dissatisfaction In collecting assets and in the payment of dividends some remedial measures might be attempted —not that he wished to infer that any officers connected with that Court were remiss in their duty. But what he wished for was some enquiry to be made to ascertain whether an improved system could not be devised. Another matter for enquiry would be the Local Court, in which there was at present great dissatisfaction expressed, which he attributed to the persons who were appointed magistrates not being independent. It was not right for a person practising any trade or profession to be placed in that position, for instance, a lawyer or doctor following out human nature, would be liable to give an opinion in favor of his client or patient. Another question for consideration would be the propriety of extending the jurisdiction of the Local Court, which might be extended from 30*l.* to 50*l.*, and as to which he would like to take the evidence of professional men.

Mr. Peake supported the motion, as there was some radical reform needed. One duty which devolved upon them was to keep on reforming the law. If they looked back some fifty or sixty years, and reflected upon what was the state of the law then, they would see what improvements had been made in it. They had done a great deal, but still there was something more to do. He thought much service would result to the country by the appointment of a Select Committee.

The Treasurer hoped the House would not allow the motion to pass without some discussion, as there was more implied in the motion than hon. members were aware of. The object of the motion was twofold. The first was to enquire into abuses. He supposed that if there were grievances they would affect the administration of justice and involve charges against high judicial functionaries. The other point involved in the motion was reform in the law in toto, but he would ask whether any Committee appointed by that House would undertake to reform the law. The Government were certainly always prepared to assist in enquiries, but to ask for a Select Committee, composed perhaps of unprofessional men to enquire into a subject involving such an immense amount of labour, was not judicious, and notwithstanding this the tables of the House were full of Committees already. He sat on two Committees on the same day, and no doubt, he was not singular in that. If they wanted reform, the power would be better placed in the hands of a Commission, but the course suggested was not feasible, even admitting it was expedient. With regard to any interference with the administration of justice, he thought the House should be careful. The impression that would be made on the dispensers of justice in the various Courts of this colony by a Committee of this kind, which would appear as sitting in judgment over them, would have a most prejudicial effect, and would be a drawback to the dispensation of justice. If there was any alleged breach of trust in dispensing justice the hon. mover should define it. He hoped the hon. member would see fit to withdraw his motion, especially as the the Law Officer of the Crown (the Attorney-General) was not present.

Mr. MacDermott would not support a motion of this vague and indefinite character, involving charges against the highest legal functionaries, without something more specific being laid before him. He thought also the House should not entertain the motion in its present form for one moment. The reform of the law was too intricate a subject for consideration by any Committee of that House, and he warned hon. members to pause before they agreed to it.

Mr. Reynolds thought no case had been made out by the hon. mover. As to the matter of convenience there were five Select Committees sitting at present, some of them on very important subjects. He opposed the motion.

Mr. Bakewell should vote against the motion. Before the House could take action in a case like this, there must be some definite grievance placed before them. If there were any mal-administration of justice let those parties come forward and do their duty by representing such grievances, and the House would do its duty to them by remedying the evil. But a general charge like the motion implied, against the highest judicial functionaries, magistrates and others, was too vague to even claim their attention. He doubted whether the House, too, had the power, and supposing that the reform of the land were necessary it must be done well and that was out of the power of a Committee of that House. Why, they would have to summons the Judges of the Supreme Court to give evidence. ("No, no.") But he contended they would have to do so, for they would otherwise lose the advantage of the most important witness. A large number of cases were decided by arbitrators, who possessed the functions of the Judge himself. These persons were also involved, and would require to be summoned. Then again, Jurors were involved in the administration of justice. He had seen a case that day only where the Jurors had most unwarrantably gone beyond their province, and had most grievously mistaken their position. With respect to the appointment of a Select Committee, he did not think there was ability in that House to form it. It would have to judge the Judges and would be constituted a Court of Appeal. They would be attempting what no man in that House—not even the Attorney-General—could perform. Nothing was more difficult to decide than what was justice, the sense of which was a faculty great and rare, and therefore not common to man in general, and it was a faculty the latest in coming to perfection. It was a great misfortune—he might say a calamity—to have the administration of justice called in question and the justice seat dragged in the mire.

Mr. Strangways was surprised at the remarks of the previous speaker, as that hon. gentleman had said that no case had been made out, though he (the hon. member for Barossa, Mr. Bakewell) was not present when the subject was introduced. That hon. member had said the scope of the motion was too great, and that some direct charges should be made, but he (Mr. Strangways) did not think it at all necessary, though he was in a position to prove any number of charges if called upon to do so. But his view was that the parties interested in such complaints should have a body framed out of the members of that House to refer to who would have the power of examining into facts on which the House could exercise their discretion as to the adopting of their reports or not. If there were any special cases involving complexity there would be a reference. They would remember the case of Gilbert v. Crombie, which was so repeatedly tried and in which the Judge decided on one side and the Jury on the other. Hon. members must admit that there was room for enquiry in such a case as this. As to the Insolvent Court he decidedly made no charge, as had been implied, but merely suggested an enquiry as to whether in the collection of assets and in the payment of dividends some improvement might not be made; of course it was to be expected that the Treasurer would oppose this motion in the absence of his chef de cuisine (the Attorney-General).

The Treasurer appealed to the Speaker as whether the hon. member was in order in calling the Attorney-General a head-cook.

The Speaker ruled that it was decidedly improper.

Mr. Strangways would withdraw the word. He thought if the Attorney-General had been present his knowledge of the difficulties complained of would have induced him to be favorable to the motion. It might be said that they could refer such matters in dispute to the Attorney-General, but the result would be that he would pursue the same course which was pursued by the Government on every occasion of dispute, viz., to refer it to a Select Committee. And could they not do so themselves, without such intervention. If they waited until the Law Officers of the Crown took the matter up, they would have to wait until doomsday. There was such delay in the investigation of such complaints by gentlemen in office, that a complaint made to-day would only reach that House, perhaps some 12 months hence. It would be quite enough for that House to consider whether the administration of law and justice was in the best possible state. It had been said that there were five Committees already sitting. He saw, however, from a paper before him, that one of those Committees was to report on Friday, one on Wednesday, one on Thursday, and one on Tuesday week, and he supposed that they would report in accordance with the intimation on the paper before him. If this were admitted as an objection, however, an extension of time might be obtained for the Committee. He should take the sense of the House on the motion.

The Speaker put the question, when a division was called for—the result being—

Noes, 15—The Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs. Shannon, Hay, Rogers, Solomon, Scammell, McDermott, Harvey, Hart, Barrow, Neales, Blyth, Reynolds, Treasurer, Bakewell (teller).

Ayes, 10—Messrs. McEllister, Hawker, Duffield, Lindsay, Townsend, Peake, Burford, Glyde, Mildred, Strangways (teller).

The motion was accordingly lost by a majority of 5.

MAP OF THE COLONY.

Mr. Barrow in rising to move the resolution standing in his name—

"That the Government cause to be prepared, for the use of this House, a new Map of the Colony, on a large scale, including also that portion of the territory of New South Wales lying to the west of South Australia, such map to show all surveyed Sections in this province, and all sold Sections, also all leased Crown lands; also, the direction of all surveyed lines of main roads, showing to what extent such roads have been formed; also, the direction of all railways and tramways, and of all surveys made for railways and tramways; also, the situation of all known mines; also, all municipal and electoral boundaries, and all tracks of explorers beyond the settled districts; also all the principal soundings, currents, and obstructions to navigation along the coast."—

would not detain the House long. It was well known to hon. members, especially to those who had any experience on Committees of that House, that the inconveniencies to which they were subjected from the want of a reliable map such as the one asked for were considerable. It was true they had a number of small maps, but these were too perplexing to be of any service. He had experienced the inconvenience of which he spoke, whilst sitting on the Kapunda Railway Committee. It was to obviate the necessity for these small maps that he proposed to have one on a more comprehensive scale, which might be referred to on all questions affecting the construction of railways, telegraphs, or lines of main roads, one which could be referred to on questions affecting local mail communication, and the construction of wharves or jettys. Committees then would be in a position to discharge their duties satisfactorily to themselves and to the public. He had heard of a plan which had been adopted in England for reducing the large Ordnance maps by means of photography to any required scale, without interfering in any way with the most perfect minuteness in detail, and he thought such a system would prove of advantage here. What they wanted was one large standard map. It might be said that the expense of such a work would be great, but he maintained they should consider the question irrespective of any moderate expense. He was not in a position to state what the expense of such a production would be, but, of course, if it were excessive, or the value of the work were not commensurate to the expense, he would ask leave to withdraw his motion. What was desired was that they should have some standard map which would obviate the necessity for the perpetual call for surveys. He had been informed that a series of maps were now in course of preparation which would embody the requirements of his motion. If they had any reasonable prospect of getting these maps soon, and also of their being of the nature required, it would be equally pleasing to him to withdraw his motion. The principle point was one of expense; if excessive, he should not press his motion.

Mr Peake seconded the motion, as a map such as was asked for would be of great value, and could be very economically done at the present time. All surveys when made could be immediately inserted in such a map. He had been told that it would require a map of 35 feet square to include all the information which was asked for; but if it were 1,000 feet square he should not object to it. Let them consider what had been done in Europe in compiling ordnance surveys, the millions the British Government had spent in it, and how much money might have been saved if not delayed so long. In the colony they now had the full command of information, and it would be an act of economy to commence it at once. He hoped the House would agree to the motion on the grounds of expediency and economy.

Mr Duffield asked what the expense would be.

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that if the House assented to the motion before it a map must be constructed about 35 feet square, because the colony was contained within 12 degrees of latitude and 12 degrees of longitude. As therefore the work would be a very extensive one, and as the staff now employed in the survey department was not more than sufficient to carry on the work of the department, it would be necessary to engage further professional assistance. It was impossible to form an accurate estimate of the expense, as it would have to run over a considerable length of time. He thought it would be premature at present to enter on a work of that kind—(no, no)—because every year they were obtaining more information in regard to the colony, and whenever it was constructed it should be of a permanent and useful character. The lithographic department had been engaged in lithographing sheet maps of surveys on a scale of quarter of an inch to the mile. They were surveys of sold and leased lands, and they would give an accurate idea of the surface of the colony. He thought it would be better to withdraw the motion, in order to allow those maps to be finished, and then it would be competent for the House to say whether they would have a map prepared on an extended scale. If the proposition were carried out it would be necessary to construct the map in sheets, for there was no room large enough in the colony to hold a map 35 feet square. With regard to the coast line various portions of the coast were already lithographed, and although it was inconvenient to consult the separate portions, they could be got at without any great trouble.

Mr Strangways would support the motion, although he was hardly inclined to agree with the hon mover in all he had said. If it were prepared according to the scale suggested of one-half inch to the mile it could not contain the various details suggested. An area 35 feet square would be merely a fraction of what was necessary to show those things. He confirmed what the hon member for East Torrens said respecting the use of the photographic process in the reduction of maps, and from what he knew of the process it might be used in the Crown Lands and Public Works Department with great advantage. The cost of the apparatus would be about £100, and in most instances a photographic copy of a survey could be given for 2d or 3d. He thought the Hon Commissioner of Crown Lands and the Commissioner of Public Works would both understand the advantage of the application of the photographic process to copying drawings and plans.

Mr Neales hoped the hon member for East Torrens would be induced to withdraw the motion. It had been sufficiently ventilated to produce good results, but the last speaker had shewn that a map 35 feet square could not comprise all that was asked for. He would remind the Government that the little scraps brought before the House in the shape of maps were not on one uniform scale, otherwise they might be made useful in completing such a map. He thought if the resolution passed it would not lead to the results anticipated by the mover; but at the same time it would not do to wait, for if Mr Wyld waited for information, he would never sell his maps. He thought such a map could be obtained by restricting all Government surveys to a given scale, and from what he could gather, the map before the House, when completed, would be both handsome and useful.

Mr Lindsay would support the motion as far as practicable. He was afraid of the cost, and believed the Survey Department had not the requisite data for constructing such a map. In regard to what his hon colleague had said respecting the scale of ¼-inch to the mile, he would observe that by a judicious selection of colours a great deal of information might be given. He would suggest that, in addition to the information proposed to be given in that map, there should be the "sections of artery lines of railways." He had seen maps of England with all the railways and sections of lines which although on a small scale gave every information necessary with regard to the gradients of those lines.

Mr Hay trusted that the hon mover would withdraw the motion, for he thought the expense would be much greater than the advantage derived from it would justify. The hon member for Encounter Bay stated that, to contain a map giving all the information asked for, it would be necessary to build a room. A map was constructed at great expense some time ago which was now put by in some Committee-room. It was stated by the Commissioner of Crown Lands that maps of the various runs were now being published. He thought that was all that was wanted. In a few years, such a map as was asked for might be of value, but to include the obstructions and soundings, with all the other information in the same map, would be trying to throw too much together, and it would probably not be worth the money when constructed.

Mr Barrow would offer a word or two in reply to what had been said. The objections made to the map asked for were on quite an opposite ground to what he had expected to be urged, for it was replied that such a work would be premature. He considered that in maps, as in history, the nearer a commencement was made to the fountain head the better. He could have understood its being too late, but to say that it was too soon, was illogical. An objection had been made that on a map on the scale of ½-an-inch to the mile, it was impossible to lay down lines of road. He believed those might be indicated on a very small scale. The map then before the House was actually smaller than that, and yet many of those things were done. The Ordnance Survey of one inch to the square mile in England gave lines of road every house, every garden and every mill, and was an evidence of what might be done on a scale of one inch to the mile. He considered, therefore, that half an inch to the mile might include all the information asked for. The Commissioner of Crown Lands stated it would take a long time to prepare a map on so extensive a scale, and that it would be expensive. He would put the two propositions together, and would say that the expense would be spread over a considerable period of time. He did not wish to press the motion if it was desired by the House that it should be withdrawn, but as he scarcely knew whether that was the desire or not he would press it to a division.

The motion was put and negatived.

PUBLIC MONIES

Mr Strangways moved—"That there be laid on the table of this House a return of the gross amounts of all moneys, the property of the South Australian Government, that were in possession of each of the three Banks on the 1st January last, and on the first of each following month to the present time." He believed the Government had retained a large amount of money in the hands of the Banks, while at the same time they had issued bonds under the authority of that House. It was possible such a course might be advantageous to the colony, but it might be injurious. The returns of the bonds sold were before the House, and in order that the House might form its own opinion as to the financial movements of the Government, he begged to propose the motion, and wished the return to include distinctly the amount held by each Bank at the present time.

The motion was carried.

DUTY ON CORNSACKS

Mr Hart begged to move the motion standing in the name of Mr Bagot, who had requested him to do so, as he (Mr Bagot) was ill and unable to attend in his place in the House.

The Speaker said as the motion affected the revenue of the colony, it could only be introduced in Committee.

Mr Hart moved that the Speaker leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the motion of the hon member for Light.

In Committee—

Mr Hart said that as a Committee was sitting on the question of taxation, he considered it a sufficient reason why the House should express an opinion in reference to the motion he was about to bring under its consideration. He would only call attention to the fact that as ore bags and wool-packs were allowed to pass duty-free it was not fair that corn-sacks and corn-bags should be articles of taxation. The amount levied on them was large and told against the agriculturists. The Governments of Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania were trying every possible means to encourage agriculture, and he thought it very unfair on the part of this Government to lay a tax on articles most of which were not consumed in this colony, and which amounted to £4,000 or £5,000 a year. It was 7½ per cent on the value of the article used and it was a hindrance to the export trade of the colony. He thought it was an oversight on the part of the Government, and he considered the House would see the necessity of taking all duty off those articles. ("No no," from the Commissioner of Crown Lands.) The Commissioner of Crown Lands said "No." He (Mr Hart) should have expected something else, for that gentleman was a large importer of bags, but unless those bags were sent out of the colony duty free he would have a poor sale for them in 12 months time. He begged to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House corn-sacks and manures of all kinds should be admitted free of duty, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause a Bill to be introduced in this House for the purpose of placing corn-sacks and manures on the free list in the Tariff."

Mr SOLOMON, while admitting the principle of the mover to be correct, must, in the existing state of affairs, vote against the motion. His reasons were twofold: 1st, because there was a Committee sitting to investigate the whole question of taxation, and that matter must necessarily go before them; and another reason he would presently state. The House was aware of the injustice of putting a duty on corn sacks, while while ore bags and woolpacks were free. But no notice was taken of the material of which they were made, which paid an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent making 5¼ per cent on cost. In England many persons obtained a livelihood by making bags, at 2s or 2s 6d per dozen; he thought it was possible to employ persons in such a manufacture, who now obtained relief from the Destitute Board. Had the resolution included the raw material of which those bags were made, he should have voted for the motion.

Mr STRANGWAYS would support the motion before the House. He was surprised at the hon member for the city being desirous to bring into this country the system of paupers and the workhouse (no, no) by introducing the manufacture of bags at 2s 6d or 2s per dozen.

Mr SOLOMON explained. He merely alluded to those employed at the Destitute Board.

Mr STRANGWAYS—It was not possible that the House should go on the principle of providing work for the starving poor, by making bags at 2s per dozen. If the raw material were imported free, bags could not be manufactured so cheaply as they could be imported. He could not understand the hon member's arithmetic when he said an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent was 5¼ per cent on cost. He should support the motion, for he considered no advantage should be given to one class over another.

Dr WARK supported the motion. It seemed strange that the corngrowing population should be taxed when woolgrowers had their packs duty free. (Hear, hear.) The sooner it was done away with the better. As for the idea of poorhouse labor, the poor were maintained in this colony better than in England, and he could see no reason why they should not work if they were able to do so. It was better than doing nothing, for they might thus be able to do something to help the Destitute Asylum. If the hon mover would allow an amendment including the raw material to be introduced into his motion, he thought it would pass without objection.

Mr NEALES said, if the hon member (Mr Strangways) had paid as many duties as himself at 5 per cent he would have known how the amount of it reached 5¼. There was 10 per cent added to the invoice, and 5 per cent on the total amount, was just 5¼ per cent on cost price. He was sorry to see the views taken by his hon colleague on the occasion, for he (Mr Neales) would gladly have included the raw material in the resolution, but as bags were made of so many materials it was possible the remission of that duty would tend to do away with all duties on soft goods. He felt the levying of duties on imports was a suicidal policy. In Melbourne a person could take a store and put his goods in immediately on landing, but in this colony he must pay 5¼ per cent before doing so. The consequence was that Melbourne had become the depot for the Australian colonies instead of Adelaide. Taking duty off bags was a move in the right direction, and he should vote for it.

Mr McELLISTER would vote for the motion, because he felt the House ought not to continue a duty on cornsacks and take it off wool-bags and ore-bags.

The TREASURER thought the discrepancy in the tariff of levying duty on corn-bags and not on wool-packs and ore-bags very objectionable, but would remind the House that a Committee was sitting on the subject of taxation, who would have to consider those matters in connection with the tariff. He thought there was every probability of those articles being included in the free list, and he thought it hardly right to ask the Executive to bring in a Bill for one particular item when the whole system was under consideration. It would be better to withdraw the motion. From his formerly expressed his opinion he felt obliged to support the present question but thought it desirable not to press it.

Mr HART believed the hon member for Light would act on that suggestion, and therefore felt justified in doing so; at the same time he thought that the Committee on Taxation then sitting ought to be informed of the opinion of the House that cornsacks and manures should be admitted duty free. Therefore, with the leave of the Committee, he would be content to withdraw all that portion of the motion after the word "duty."

Leave was given and the resolution passed.

The House resumed.

The SPEAKER reported the resolution of the Committee.

Mr HART believed he should be in order in moving that the resolution be forwarded to the Committee sitting on Taxation, with a request that they take the resolution into consideration. Carried.

GOLD LICENSES

Mr SOLOMON moved—

"That, with a view to test the gold-producing capabilities of this colony, it is desirable that licences should be granted to all applicants to dig and search for gold on any of the waste lands of the Crown within the colony of South Australia, free of charge for three months from this date."

The SPEAKER stated that as it was a question affecting the revenue the House must consider it in Committee.

On the motion of Mr SOLOMON the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole.

In Committee.

Mr SOLOMON, in moving the resolution, would not detain the House, for he considered the advantages of the discovery of gold apparent to every hon member. He considered it of the first importance that a gold-field should be discovered in South Australia, and that therefore the action of persons disposed to search for gold should not be clogged in any way. It was understood in the colony that the search for gold should be encouraged. All the neighbouring colonies had profited by their gold discoveries. If a field were discovered here the revenue would benefit, private and public lands would be affected, and trade would be encouraged. He therefore moved the resolution standing in his name. He had introduced three months into it because he thought the colony should derive a revenue from the discovery of gold, and not from the search for it.

Mr HAWKER thought the motion unnecessary, as there was no regulation preventing a search for gold in the colony. The difficulty was the expense attending the search, but as there was no licence required for searching he could not see how the licence fee could affect the searcher.

Mr NEALES considered if the motion was passed, certain reservations would be necessary in respect to excluding persons from searching where leases for mining already existed; also with regard to the Echunga diggings, as that was a declared gold-field. It might strictly be confined to waste lands not already leased for mineral purposes. He considered such motions did good by keeping alive in the public mind the gold question, and that fifty small discoveries would be equally beneficial with one extensive field.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS saw no great objection to that motion, nor any great benefit likely to arise from it. There was no regulation preventing any one prospecting excepting where leases already existed. The Commissioner of Crown lands ought to be authorised to exclude certain waste lands from search, and to adopt regulations for preventing accidents from prospecting parties leaving holes open.

Mr ROGERS would support the resolution.

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the resolution superfluous; for any person that was inclined could search for gold. It would also tend to persons searching in unfenced private lands.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that it would not do to remove the licences from the parties already at Echunga. They only paid 10s a month, and the amount received did not pay for the supervision and protection of 60 to 100 persons there.

Mr BURFORD asked the hon member to withdraw his motion.

The CHAIRMAN intimated it was 3 o'clock; the motion therefore lapsed.

The House resumed.

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

The Associations Corporations Bill was read a second time.

THE PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole.

The various clauses passed through Committee with some few amendments.

The House resumed.

The SPEAKER reported progress.

The consideration of the report of the Committee was made an Order of the Day for Thursday.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved, in the absence of the Attorney General, the adoption of the report on the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr REYNOLDS remarked that the absence of the Attorney-General had been commented on by several members of the House. One very important Bill had been introduced into that House when the Attorney-General was absent.

The SPEAKER put the question, that the report be received by the House, which was agreed to.

Mr HART, before the House adopted that report, would move that the report be recommitted for the purpose of inserting the sum of £5,000 for a boat jetty at the Semaphore. He believed yesterday many hon members voted under a misapprehension. ("No, no.") Many said they believed that it was only getting in the thin end of the wedge, and that a larger sum would be required. He had enquired of the Commissioner of Public Works, who, from the plans and estimates in his possession, stated that unless that amount would complete the jetty, he would not commence it. He thought one hon member mistaken as to the amount of labor that would be required, for it was found that timber from the neighborhood of Port Wakefield was the best adapted for making jetties to be found in the colonies Some poles driven in at Port Adelaide 15 or 16 years ago were in excellent preservation The labor, therefore, would be confined to the colony All strangers landing at the Semaphore (where almost every passenger lands) would now have an unfavorable impression respecting the colony That feeling had induced many persons to remove from it He had taken no part in the cry that had been raised respecting that jetty It was a cry from most of the mercantile people of South Australia (no no, hear hear), as well as from every person in that locality A jealous spirit had manifested itself on the subject, which he was sorry for He had never voted against the erection of jetties, and had never voted on any jetty so much required as that

Mr SOLOMON seconded the motion because he believed a large amount of misconception existed on the subject He was surprised at the opinions reported to have been expressed by the hon member for Sturt It was absolutely necessary a boat jetty should be erected on the spot indicated With regard to a jetty on the North Arm, in 50 years it would be useless Every one landing cried out for the accommodation of a boat jetty Some persons voted against it yesterday who had from better information altered their opinions

Mr STRANGWAYS was surprised at the course taken by the hon members for the Port and city The hon member for the Port placed every difficulty in the way of landing passengers at the Semaphore, for he was a member of the Committee on the defences of the colony He said it was his duty to construct batteries to prevent persons landing at the Semaphore—("oh, oh," and laughter)—and he would now construct that jetty to facilitate an enemy's landing

The SPEAKER called the hon gentleman to order

Mr STRANGWAYS said there would be some difficulty in boats getting to the jetty He had landed and embarked at Glenelg, perhaps more frequently than any other member, and if a boat upset there the consequence was only a ducking but if at the Semaphore an unknown quantity of water and mud He considered the jetty would be perfectly useless, and if £5,000 were voted it would have to be supplemented by another £5,000—("no, no")—and another He should oppose the motion

Mr REYNOLDS had one or two remarks to make, as he had been referred to by the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart), and the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) He had made a statement on the previous day from memory, and he now found that it was not correct, so he must make as good an apology as he could He had stated that the Chamber of Commerce did not recommend that a sum of money should be placed on the Estimates, but he was now informed by a letter, that the Chamber did make such a recommendation, and though he could not find the report of the meeting, he accepted the statement There was also a majority of more than one in favor of the motion It appeared that on a former occasion, there was a majority of two but it appeared from a letter which he had received that day, that there were eight against the motion and fifteen in its favor He thought these twenty-three merchants were not a fair representation of the commercial interest of South Australia, and that if only fifteen voted for a work which they were told was to save so much life and property, it could not be a very important matter The hon member for the city said it was to save life and property, and if he (Mr Reynolds) had heard of a single soul being drowned — (laughter) — it would no doubt alter his opinion, but he had never heard of such an occurrence. The water was too shallow unless a person was a mile or so from the shore, and then he might be lost The hon member for the Port said that the jetty could be built for £5,000, but the House was told that the Port Bridge could be constructed for £3,000—(no, no)—then for £4 500, and now after £4 850 had been asked for it was found that the bridge would not do at all So too it would be with this jetty But, in voting without plans or estimates, hon members would find that this £5,000 would swell to £10,000, and the £10,000 to £20 000, and then would come the vote for a tramway If the hon member (Captain Hart) would only come forward and say how much money would do for the Port which he represented, he (Mr Reynolds) would be content Would the £5,000 satisfy the hon member? No If there were no other ground he should oppose the vote, because there were no plans or estimates, and how hon members could support the vote after the late expression of opinion on that very point he could not understand Hon members must be very inconsistent ("No, no") Why even the Government themselves were prepared to carry out the spirit of the motion The hon the Commissioner of Public Works said "No," and he (Mr Reynolds) expected that hon member would say anything by-and-bye (Loud laughter in which the Commissioner of Public Works joined) If they voted this money, they would not be carrying out the spirit of the resolution, and if the House went into Committee, he should move that other items be recommitted Again, the House was taken by surprise, and he knew that certain parties had been beating up for support, as he saw many hon members present who were not in the House on the previous day Several country members were not in the House not expecting that the matter would be again brought on and he had no hesitation in saying that the vote would be thrown out, if they gave the country members the opportunity of expressing their opinions upon it

Mr BURFORD thought they could not have a better proof of the favorable progress of their side of the question, that was, in favor of the pier, than the remarkable exhibitions of the last two speakers, the hon member for Encounter Bay and the hon member for the Sturt He could not help being amused at the far-fetched idea of the hon member for Encounter Bay in reference to the batteries, that, because the Hon Commissioner of Public Works was opposed to the landing of his enemies, he should keep out his friends also If this did not show that the hon. member was at his wit's end he did not know what could, and, therefore, he took it as a proof of the propriety of the course which he (Mr Burford) advocated The hon member's statements were too rash and inconsiderate, and some of them erroneous He was astonished that hon members were not all influenced by the solemn assurance given through the hon member for the Port on the part of the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works, that this money should be an ultimatum, and that if there were any proof that the jetty would cost more than £5 000 he would not spend a shilling It was of no use to have public servants if we did not confide in them, although they sometimes deceived us (Laughter) But his system was always to trust a man until he proved himself to be a rogue As to the hon member for the Sturt—an old friend with whom he had worked for years—that hon member had made a very ungraceful withdrawal of a statement which he had made on the previous day

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon member was not in order in referring to a speech on a previous debate

Mr BURFORD resumed There was a certain character of wildness about the remarks of the hon member which he was sorry to see The hon member seemed to abandon himself to his feelings so that he (Mr Burford) was sure the hon member could not be under the dominion of reason (Loud laughter)

Mr REYNOLDS called the attention of the Speaker to the words "He cannot be under the dominion of reason "

Mr BURFORD had no intention to give offence, but spoke in a spirit of caution in order that his old friend (Mr Reynolds) might not be so haphazard in his remarks The hon member's arrows flew in all directions, and whether they hit or not was a matter of no certainty with the hon member himself, and he (Mr Burford) was sure was a matter of chance with anybody else As to the House being taken by surprise after the manifestations of feeling on the previous day, when there was only a majority of one against the motion in a tolerably full House of some 25 members, he thought that circumstance a fair ground for supposing that a motion would be made for the recommittal When he compared this work with another—a practice which at the same time he condemned—it would bear the comparison as regarded its usefulness, not to the Port merely, but to the colony at large, as soon as we had the mails coming direct to Adelaide

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had no objection to give a pledge that if he could not carry out the work for £5,000, he would not go about it at all The plans originally prepared comprised matters such as rails and a crane, which would not be necessary for a boat jetty, and these would be dispensed with He thought his position as a member of the community, ought to give some weight to this assurance, but when a member of the House gave a distinct pledge as the head of a department, he thought the House should accept it as conclusive As to only fifteen members of the Chamber of Commerce voting for this jetty, there were many members in favor of it who did not vote He was a member, and if present would have supported it The House would not be justified in refusing the money ("No no ") Reference was made to country members being absent, but he saw many in the House Were all the country members who were in their places that day not in the division of the previous day, or were all these members in favor of the recommittal, or were they all 'beaten up?" If they were, he was no party to such a proceeding He only asked for money which was wanted, and he hoped hon members on calm consideration would reconsider the vote

Mr TOWNSEND had not spoken on the previous day, and he now wished to say a few words in justification of the vote he then gave He was sorry this motion had been made, as during the session previously there had been an absence of strong feeling, and there was nothing in his judgment so much calculated to embitter their debates and excite ill-feeling as that, simply because a small majority carried a vote it should be recommitted the next day Anxious as he was that the Legislature of South Australia should stand high in the colonies he hoped this was the last time such a course would be pursued The hon member (Mr Burford) had said in reference to the hon member (Mr Reynolds) that that hon member had left the domain of reason, and if lightness in the treatment of a subject and brilliancy and ability could be taken as proofs of such being the case it might be true, but nobody would suppose this in reference to the hon member (Mr Burford) is that hon member's heaviness in debate, and assertion of abstract principles proved him to be in the domain of reason (A laugh) He had voted as a commercial member on this subject after he had received a circular asking him to support the item He had given the subject all the attention at his command, and had listened carefully to all the arguments and then gave his vote against the jetty because he believed it was not necessary, and that £5,000 could be laid out better If the hon members, Messrs Hart and Solomon, had brought forward any new arguments, he would say it was right to recommit the item, but these hon members only repeated their previous arguments The arguments were that this was the best place to land mails and passengers, and then there was that touch of pathos that the hon member (Mr Solomon) had been capsized, and had to swim (Laughter) There was scarcely a steamer arrived from Melbourne but he (Mr Townsend) found that passengers landing at Glenelg were in town two hours before those coming by the Port It was for this reason, and because there was sufficient accommodation for landing the mails in the bay, that he voted against the item The Hon the Commissioner of Public Works said he felt that his character was almost at stake when he gave a pledge that the cost would not exceed £5,000 If the hon member gave his guarantee as a private individual that he would construct the work for that sum, on plans approved by the House, he (Mr Townsend) would accept it But the plans of to-day were not the plans of yesterday The Government intended at first that there should be rails, but when they were fairly beaten, they said, "we must not ask so much we must get up simpler plans, and place them before the House, and say, 'I give my word I will not ask for more'" But the journals of the House showed that there was no instance in which a work was completed for the money voted ("Oh, oh!" from the Treasury benches) Believing that the passengers and mails could be landed in the Bay—("No, no!" from Mr Scammell)—the hon member said "No!" but he (Mr Townsend) had no land either at the Bay or at the Port, and as he represented a country district, it was his desire to have the money spent in the country He was, therefore, disinterested in the matter He deeply regretted that this subject should be revived, and if the amendment were carried, he should move that the vote for the verandah at the Port, be reconsidered for if this course were to be persisted in, the business which could be done in three months, would occupy nine or ten months, and they would embitter their debates by party spirit and party strife

Mr DUFFIELD found a difficulty in judging when the advocates on both sides told such different tales One argument of the hon member for the Port was, that if the people got a jetty they would have stone from Yorke's Peninsula for building, but now the hon Commissioner of Public Works said there would be no rails or crane He (Mr Duffield) asked how were people to raise the stone from boats to the pier without a crane or something of the kind Hon members in favor of this vote did not take sufficient care to make their tales tally He thought with the hon member who spoke last, that the question having been so fairly considered should be allowed to rest, but hon members differed with him, and he supposed they had a perfect right to bring the matter forward again He opposed the motion because many districts wanted such a sum of money as this, more than the locality for which it was proposed to vote it He, like many hon members, had never heard of a serious accident from want of this jetty The only accident he had heard of was the hon member, Mr Solomon, was frightened there (A laugh) Other hon members might have got their feet wet, gentlemen living in country districts in crossing rivers or going along the roads Again when he looked at figures he found they were trenching on the surplus revenue They had already voted away the revenue within some 40,000*l*, and in referring to previous years, he found the House had not voted to so near an amount, as the balance left at the end of each year was more than 40,000*l* He thought they had gone as far as they ought in voting money, as there were some small matters and incidental expenses in all the departments, and seeing that there were still three months of the present year to run

Mr BARROW would vote for the recommittal He had voted for the item, though he did not express any opinions in justification of his vote He did not vote for the Semaphore because he considered it a better place than Glenelg, inasmuch as he would not discuss the question on that ground at all Let justice be done to Glenelg and to the Port also It would be very unfortunate if they could not discuss a question without also considering a rival one, and it would be equally unfortunate if legislation were to be carried on between rival interests and local parties The jetty at Glenelg had cost a large sum, and he did not see why a small sum should not be spent on one at the Semaphore Would an American city attain its majority without making any provision for the landing of women and children except the carrying of them on shore by those wild men who rushed into the water to receive them (Laughter) It was all very well for the hon member for Barossa, coming from his well watered plains, to tell the House that the residents in that district sometimes wetted their feet in crossing the creeks, but he (Mr Barrow) was sure the hon member would not complain of such an occurrence It was not, however, very pleasant to fall into salt water and have to swim for one's life, even though one should save it He believed they should have a landing-place at the Semaphore, considering they had the money to construct it, considering that they had a pledge that it could be economically done, and considering that they need not take the money from the country districts, inasmuch as they had just voted £20,000 extra to the Central Road Board, and that the House was always disposed to vote money for the country districts But they should also do justice to the Port and the city There were a large number of persons out of employment now, and he thought that whilst giving employment to those persons, we could now have the work done at a much lower cost than at any other period (Hear, hear) Of course there was a question of opinion, and also one of interest, as some hon gentlemen were interested in Glenelg He agreed to some extent with the hon member for Onkaparinga, that a question for re-committal should be brought on in such a manner as not to take the House by surprise, it would be better to make arrangements that hon members desirous of bringing such questions under consideration, should give notice of that intention

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the House divide

Mr PEAKE seconded the motion

The motion was put and carried

The amendment (for the re-committal) was then put and carried

Mr HART rose to explain He wished to name a day which would suit hon members, in order to avoid the accusation of attempting to take the House by surprise He would state also that if he had not moved the recommittal of the item on that day he could not do so at all He was quite content to have the item recommitted on Tuesday, 12th inst

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill,

Mr PEAKE asked the Government whether they had in the House any legal adviser to whom the House could refer in case of any doubt arising as to the reading of the clause

Mr STRANGWAYS said that on any future occasion when there was no law officer of the Government in the House he would take the first opportunity of moving a substantive motion to the effect, that the Attorney-General should not allow his private practice to interfere with his public duties, or that His Excellency the Governor should prorogue Parliament until the Attorney-General was in his place

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS asked whether this discussion was in order

Mr PEAKE moved that the consideration of the Bill be postponed until the Attorney-General was in the House. (Hear, hear)

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, as the Bill contained many clauses, even supposing a difficulty arose, which he did not apprehend, and which he presumed the hon member himself did not apprehend either, the House could easily, as was done in other Bills which came before them, postpone the clause in doubt.

The TREASURER said the hon member for Encounter Bay took a view of the question not warranted by the position of the Attorney-General, who was not the legal adviser of the House but of the Government He might add, that on more occasions than one the hon the Attorney-General had stated distinctly to the House that it was impossible for him to be in his place always without giving up his private practice This he was allowed to retain under the Constitution Act With the allowance made under that Act it would be impossible to induce any gentleman for a tenure of office of perhaps three or six months, to relinquish his private practice

Mr, STRANGWAYS moved that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again

The motion was negatived without a division

Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 were agreed to without amendment

On clause 5—"Notification in Government Gazette to be evidence of appointment or removal of a pound or pound-keeper"—

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to ask the Chief Law Officer of the Crown how much of a previous Act would remain unrepealed, in the event of the Bill passing, as this would materially affect the construction of the Act He wished a legal opinion on that point

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the question should have reference to the special clause under consideration

Mr HAWKER could not see the object of inserting announcements in the Government Gazette, which was scarcely read in the country districts It would be more for the benefit of the community to insert them in the colonial papers, which were taken by almost every man in the country districts If the announcements were made in the two weekly papers, it would be sufficient

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said it was necessary, in order that there should be some legal authority for the appointments that they should be notified in the Gazette

Mr LINDSAY agreed in what had been said respecting the Gazette But there was an exception in the clause in the words "not within the boundary of any constituted district" He moved that these words be struck out

Mr HAY agreed with the hon member for Victoria that appointments should be made as public as possible, but they should also appear in the Gazette to give them the requisite authority The charges for the Gazette were high, and that was not the worst, but on every Gazette sold there was generally from 6d to 1s added to the price. It was said in Punch that if a man wanted to advertise in a newspaper where nobody would see the advertisement he should put it in the Morning Advertiser, but he (Mr Hay) thought he should put it in the Gazette

The Treasurer agreed with the hon member who had just sat down, that the Gazette was a bad vehicle for conveying information, but that was not the object of the clause The object was that the courts of law should have a document to refer to, in order to see whether a man was a Poundkeeper or not The Gazette was always filed in the Courts and the newspapers were not

The clause was then agreed to

Clause 6 was also agreed to

On clause 7, "Pound to be fenced, enclosed, and kept clean and in repair,"

Mr Hawker pointed out that it was necessary that in the summer means should be found of sheltering the cattle from the sun In a country district this might be accomplished by placing them in paddocks so that the cattle could take shelter beneath the trees Where there were no trees sheds should be constructed, no matter at what cost

Mr Duffield agreed in the suggestion but did not see how to carry it out If the Government and District Councils would set apart paddocks of 80 acres, or a section or two it would be an act of great humanity

Mr Lindsay stated that in some instances District Councils had proclaimed paddocks as Pounds

On the motion of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again next day

The House rose at twenty minutes to 5

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Thursday, October 7

The President took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon Mr Morphett, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon the Surveyor-General, the Hon Captain Hall, and the Hon John Baker

COMMENCEMENT OF ACTS

The Hon Mr Morphett gave notice that on Tuesday next he should ask leave to introduce a Bill to fix the time at which all Bills passed by the South Australian Parliament should come into operation where the time from which they should take effect was not mentioned in the Act itself

JOINT STANDING ORDERS

The Hon the Chief Secretary gave notice that on Tuesday next he should move the Joint Standing Orders of the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly be referred to the Standing Orders Committee for consideration

STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The Hon Captain Bagot wished, before the Orders of the Day were called on, to call the attention of the House to the motion introduced by him on the previous day in reference to steam postal communication with Great Britain, and upon which an address had been adopted to His Excellency An oversight had taken place in introducing the various amendments which had been proposed, and which had been adopted by him Hon members would recollect that the last amendment included New South Wales in the arrangement, but in the motion, as passed, it was stated that Hobson's Bay was to be the Australasian terminus of the route It was very evident, however, that if New South Wales joined in the proposition for the establishment of postal communication jointly with the other colonies, Sydney would most likely be the terminus The Hon the President of the Council had, therefore, withheld the presentation to His Excellency of the address which had been adopted by the Council, until the oversight had been set to rights Perhaps the better way would be to ask leave of the Council to withdraw the resolution of the previous day, and to substitute another introducing all the amendments which had been proposed and adopted

The President stated that it would be necessary for the hon gentleman to ask the leave of the Council

Leave having been granted,

The Hon Captain Bagot proposed to move the suspension of the Standing Orders, but the hon gentleman ultimately moved that the resolution of the previous day be rescinded, and this having been carried, gave notice that on Tuesday next he would move a resolution, embracing all the amendments which he had adopted, including that by which the steamers would be required to call at Port Adelaide each way

THE HON JOHN BAKER

The President announced the receipt of a letter from the Hon John Baker, stating that he was about to visit England, and that as he would probably be absent for 12 months, he requested to be excused from attending the Council during that period

Upon the motion of the Hon H Ayers, seconded by the Hon Major O'Halloran, the leave asked for by the Hon John Baker was granted

ADELAIDE AND GAWLER TOWN RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the Chief Secretary, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and directed to be carried to the House of Assembly, with a message informing that body that the Legislative Council had agreed to the Bill, with amendments, with which they desired the concurrence of the Assembly

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and directed to be conveyed to the House of Assembly, with a message intimating that the Legislative Council had agreed to the Bill, with amendments, with which they desired the concurrence of the Assembly

The Council adjourned at 20 minutes past 3 o'clock till 2 o'clock on Tuesday next

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Thursday, October 7

The Speaker took the chair at 10 minutes past 1 o'clock

PETITIONS

Mr Strangways presented a petition from settlers in the district of Myponga, with respect to providing shipping accommodation by means of a jetty A sum having been previously voted by the House, but not expended, the petitioners prayed that the House would take such steps as would cause justice to be done.

Mr Lindsay presented a petition with respect to the opening of certain Government roads which had been illegally closed

The petition was received and read, but as it was subsequently found out to be informal, it was rejected by the Speaker

LANDING JETTY AT THE SEMAPHORE

Mr Mildred asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether he would have any objection to laying the plans, specifications, and estimates of the proposed landing jetty at the Semaphore on the table of the library of the House It would give hon members an opportunity of examining them, and forming an opinion before the item on the Estimates for that purpose was discussed on Tuesday next

Mr Strangways asked the Speaker whether it was in order for any hon member to call for papers to be laid upon any other table than the table of that House

The Speaker ruled that the hon member for Noarlunga (Mr Mildred) was in order

The Commissioner of Public Works was quite willing to submit the plans and specifications already prepared, but if hon members waited until Tuesday next, they would get the amended specifications, which were now in the course of preparation

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The Treasurer proposed that the second reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill, which was the first Order of the Day, should be postponed, and the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill proceeded with in its place As the Matrimonial Causes Bill was an important one, it was desirable that they should have the benefit of the presence of the Attorney-General, who was not then in the House

Mr Strangways remarked that there was another instance of the Attorney-General being absent, and of the House being asked to postpone an important measure simply because that hon and learned gentleman was not present The action of the Government was this, "We know nothing about this Bill, the only one amongst us who does know anything about it, is the Attorney-General, who is not present, and we must therefore postpone it" The Attorney-General had not been in his place scarcely once during the last fortnight, and when the Assessment on Stock Bill was brought on, he was not in his place until 4 o'clock in the afternoon He wished to ask the Attorney-General, if he had been present, what effect some of the clauses in the Bill would have upon the law as it at present existed, but there was no member of the Ministry who was able to answer the question if he were even to put it Would the Treasurer do so? Who was the Attorney-General's deputy that the question might be put to him? He thought they had only two courses to pursue—either to pass a resolution condemnatory of the absence of the Attorney-General, or adjourn the business of the House until such a time as the convenience of the Attorney-General would allow him to attend to his duties He would move that a resolution should be passed requesting the Attorney-General not to allow his private practice to interfere with his public duties

The Speaker ruled that Mr Strangways was not in order in moving any such resolution The question before the House was the postponement of the Matrimonial Causes Bill

Mr Bakewell said it would be only fair on his part to make some explanation on behalf of the Attorney-General in his absence The Attorney-General had often told them that he would not allow his Attorney-Generalship to interfere with his private practice, and therefore they could not expect him to do that which he had not pledged himself to do That hon and learned gentlemen "had other fish to fry" (Laughter)

Mr Peake moved as an amendment that the House do now adjourn

Mr. Strangways seconded

The motion was put and lost

The SPEAKER then put the original motion, when

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he thought it was exceedingly unreasonable for hon members to find fault because this Bill was asked to be postponed in the absence of the Attorney-General. There was plenty of business to occupy the attention of the House for the whole of the day, without the Matrimonial Causes Bill. It was unreasonable to object to the Government conducting Government business in their own time. There was one argument in favour of the postponement of the Bill until after the other business had been disposed of, and that was, the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) would then have the opportunity of putting the questions to the Attorney General which he was desirous of doing. He did not think the Attorney General had at all bound himself to relinquish his practice though it might occasionally clash with his public duties. The Attorney-General had never led them to believe that he would do so, and therefore it could not be expected of him. If he had led them to suppose that his private practice was to be entirely subjected to his duties as Attorney-General, then they might have had some cause of complaint. Notwithstanding that the Attorney-General had been accused of being absent from his place, the business of the country had nevertheless been satisfactorily carried on. If they had an Attorney-General in that House who had no private practice he did not think the House could have that confidence in him that they would have in a gentleman whose time and abilities were constantly in requisition. It would be presumed such a person would not fill the office of Attorney-General with equal satisfaction to the public. He was bound to say that according to the present law of the land there was nothing to compel the Attorney-General to attend any more regularly than he had done. They all knew the Attorney-General had frequently left important cases to come down to that House to give them the benefit of his opinion. On these grounds, therefore, he thought it was unreasonable to raise any complaint against the Attorney-General.

Mr MILNE moved as an amendment "That the Matrimonial Causes Bill be postponed and made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next." In doing so he had not intended any reference to the absence of the Attorney-General. It was purely from a selfish consideration on his own part, as during the last two or three days he had not been able to give that consideration to the Bill which, as he took a great interest in it, he was desirous of doing.

Mr DUFFIELD seconded the amendment, and perfectly agreed with what had fallen from the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands. The House must be well aware of the fact that the Attorney-General had intimated to them, that if pressed, he would be compelled to give up his seat on the Ministerial benches, rather than resign his practice. He (Mr Duffield) would have taken a different view of the matter if he saw a sum of £3,000 or £4,000 on the Estimates for the Attorney-General—(hear, hear)—but as the case stood it was far different.

Mr TOWNSEND did not quite agree with the previous speaker, as, though they might not have a gentleman of the same ability as the Attorney-General, they might have one who would be able to pay greater attention to his duties, and who would thereby make up for any deficiency in talent. He considered that the Ministry were considerably weakened in their position by the absence of the Attorney-General when the Assessment on Stock Bill was first called on. That Bill, he believed, would have passed its second reading if the Attorney-General had been in his place.

The TREASURER supported the amendment on the original motion, viz, for a postponement until Tuesday next. It was not likely that the Attorney-General would be present in the House to day, as this was the last day of the term. It was also important that other legal gentlemen placed in the same position as the Attorney-General should have an opportunity of attending. In justification of the Attorney-General he might say that if he had fixed upon this day for the second reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill he would have been present in his place. He (the Attorney General) had nothing to do with placing the Bill on the notice paper. The Bill had come down from the Legislative Council and he (the Treasurer) so that the Bill might not be lost sight of, placed it on the notice paper.

The question was put and carried—"That the second reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill be postponed until Tuesday next."

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

In Committee.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the following new clause be added to the "Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill"—

"It shall be lawful for the Governor to distinguish as suburban any land offered for sale which is situate within such distances as the Surveyor-General may deem necessary for the nearest limit, either of any existing township especially named and described, or of any locality designated as the site of any townships to be thereon erected, and to fix as the upset price of such suburban land a price higher than the lowest upset price of waste lands within the said province."

The TREASURER seconded.

The clause was then read and passed.

Mr STRANGWAYS asked the Speaker what course he should pursue to take the Bill out of Committee, so that they should be enabled to take a further expression of opinion by the House on the clause just passed. Any motion affecting in any way the regulations pertaining to the waste lands of the province should be carefully and not hurriedly discussed. If it were admitted that it was competent for any hon member to get up and move in that House for an alteration in the upset price in land, they would find some fine morning, perhaps, that the upset price of the Crown lands had been reduced to 5s. (A laugh.)

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said it was out of the power of Government to alter the upset price of the Crown lands, as it was permanently fixed in the Waste Lands Act. He objected to the Bill not being taken out of Committee, as it would cause delay and he was desirous that the Bill should pass as soon as possible, as there were important matters connected with his department which he was waiting to set in motion by the powers which the Bill would confer.

The preamble and title were then passed as printed.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the Bill be now reported, when

Mr HAY moved that the clause be recommitted in order that he might move the contingent notice of motion standing in his name, viz.—

"That all the words after 'grant,' in the eleventh line of the first clause, be struck out, and the following inserted – 'to the former lessee the right of depasturing within the said hundred such number of large or small cattle as the commons in the said hundred may be considered capable of depasturing, over and above the right of pasturage reserved to the holders of purchased land therein, the said former lessee shall be subject to the same regulations and payments in all respects as settlers on purchased land, and it shall be lawful for the Governor at any time, on receiving a satisfactory memorial from settlers on and holders of purchased land within any hundred on giving six months notice to parties concerned, to withdraw all right of depasturing stock within the said hundred, except to the settlers on and holders of purchased land therein.'"

The hon gentleman said the very intention of declaring hundreds was to define the boundaries between the squatters and the settlers. Owing to the encroachment of the squatter there was less dairy produce, as the flocks of the squatter encroached on the commonage of the farmer.

The motion was then put, when the SPEAKER declared the noes had it.

A division was called for, and the following was the result:—

AYES, 13—Messrs Milne, Rogers, Shannon, Cole, Neales, Glyde, Townsend, Solomon, Mildred, McEllister, Harvey, Lindsay, Reynolds.

NOES, 8—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Burford, McDermott, Strangways, Duffield, Wark.

Making a majority of five in favor of the ayes.

The clause was then recommitted, and Mr Hay's amendment was put, when

Mr STRANGWAYS opposed the amendment, as it would have the effect of placing all the commonage at the disposal of the lessees of any given hundred. The owner of a few sections within that hundred might be able to run a certain number of cattle, and not only have his own commonage, but would monopolise that of the squatter, and perhaps eventually turn him off his own run of which he had been granted a 14 years' lease. He had heard no argument from Mr Hay in favor of the amendment, except that the owners of sections of land did not get so much for their money as they would like to get. If a person bought land in a settled district he got no commonage, why then should those at a greater distance have that boon conferred upon them?

Mr SOLOMON supported the amendment. There was a large amount of dairy produce imported into this colony. He thought the amendment would have the effect intended—that of benefiting the farmer, and of making them exporters of such produce instead of importers as at present.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, however desirous it might be to manufacture their own dairy produce, that was no argument for their breaking faith with the squatter. The leaseholders had a legal right to the pasturage after the privileges and rights of purchasers of lands had been accorded of them. The 14 year leases had only six or seven years to run and as the House was now about to place an assessment on stock, it was the more necessary to keep faith with the annual lessees. (Question.) He maintained it had everything to do with the question, for the squatter would have to pay so much per head on his stock, but the farmer who had the right of commonage would go free. He hoped the House would not agree to any breach of faith with the leaseholders. As to the squatters trespassing beyond their boundaries, as had been implied, he could only say if they did, they subjected themselves to the usual penalty of the law, as the farmers had the power to protect themselves.

Mr McELLISTER supported the amendment, because the farmer was not properly protected at present. He had heard of frequent complaints from Port Lincoln in this respect, where the stockholder had brought in his sheep and interfered with the pasturage pertaining to the farmer. There had been other cases nearer Adelaide. It was highly necessary to protect the farmer, who, not like the squatter, could not afford to lose.

Mr MACDERMOTT opposed the amendment He wished hon members to recollect that stockholders had leases The amendment proposed would deprive them of a just right

Mr TOWNSEND supported the amendment because the present system had led to a great deal of ill feeling between the squatter and the farmer The whole of the commonage, he thought, should be open to all alike When a hundred was declared, and the commonage was granted, there was no injustice attempted to the squatter, but it was an act of justice to the farmer

Mr HART would oppose the amendment, because it was one of such importance that they could not discuss it with the slight evidence which was at present afforded He looked upon this amendment as affecting the squatters to a much greater extent than would the assessment on stock It would in his opinion, be a death-blow to them Hon members might say there was nothing in the clause to warrant this strong expression of opinion, but he would show them that it was perfectly warrantable He presumed that the object of this clause was to exclude the squatters from the hundreds altogether (No) The effect of the clause, however, would be this, that an individual possessing a solitary section of land within a hundred, perhaps with no other settler near him, could, by presenting a satisfactory memorial get the entire quantity of commonage His memorial would, of course, be deemed satisfactory, as he would be the only settler in the locality He was perfectly clear that every landowner would memorialize to get the entire amount of pasturage, that is, if human nature was followed out Were the House prepared to sanction such a course of proceeding? How were the hundreds declared? Why, with one stroke of the pen Sir Henry Young had declared a hundred of two miles on each side of the Murray without one single acre of land having been purchased (No, no, and hear, hear) And, moreover, so small was the quantity of land sold since that there had been a loss to the Government of 1,000*l* He ventured to say that the entire amount of sold land would not cover the loss sustained by the revenue Was it not a fact that the Executive could always declare any amount of country, a hundred, in fact for that matter they could declare the whole country a hundred If they wanted to give a death-blow to the squatters this was the way to do it He stood in that House and supported the Assessment on Stock Bill, therefore he could not be charged with being biassed in his remarks He would not assess the squatters and then subject them to this injustice He trusted the House would not under any circumstances agree to this clause without first being submitted to a Select Committee To carry the clause would be tantamount to saying there should be no squatters

Mr REYNOLDS had no idea of the amendment just read by the Chairman being in existence, and though he voted for the recommittal of the Bill, he considered that it would to a great extent accomplish the objects proposed by the hon member in his amendment Had that not been the case he would have voted for the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha

Mr NEALES hoped the hon member would not press the the clause, for if carried it would completely finish the squatters (No, no) If the Ministry of the day were inclined towards the agriculturists the clause giving the Government power on giving six months' notice to withdraw all right of depasturing stock might be worked to their advantage, and the squatters would be sent out from the country should however their successors be a squatting ministry, the squatters would attempt to regain their privileges If on the other hand the Government endeavored to steer between the two, the runs might be diminished so much that they would be of no use He believed with the hon member for Gumeracha that people went a distance into the country in order to obtain greater facilities to carry on their operations To that he had no objection, but the proposed measure would be such a death-blow to squatting that an assessment would be useless and he should vote against any assessment on stock It was in fact giving an unfair advantage to one interest to ruin another He voted for the recommittal of the clause purposely to hear what could be said in its favor, and also because he considered a motion for the recommittal of a Bill something in the light of a petition which the House ought not to refuse He considered that several alterations might be advantageously introduced into the Waste Lands Act before the House The statement made with regard to the districts near the Murray was correct almost to the letter, with the exception that one or two small purchases had been made, but the proportion of the unsold land to the sold was as the Adelphi Theatre to a China orange In fact there was an attempt to get some working men to take ten acre allotments in the midst of a squatter's run He considered it the most unfair Act ever done by a Governor It was injustice to the squatter to stretch the right of pasturage equally to purchased and unpurchased lands He thought the man who purchased land should have double what the lessees had, but hoped the amendment would not be pressed

Mr GLYDE when voting for the recommittal of the clause had not made up his mind whether he should vote for the clause or not He should vote for the amendment unless the clause gave something like equal advantages The Commissioner of Crown Lands stated, that if the amendment passed it would be a breach of faith with the squatters He (Mr Glyde) would be the last man to advocate a breach of faith but he could not see it The clause said, "the lease of the squatter having been determined " When that took place the Government was at perfect liberty to enter into any new arrangement whatever, and in laying down new regulations the House had been passing regulations that so soon as the leases fell in those leases should be submitted to public auction, why then should those squatters go on at the same rent instead of their runs going to public auction He thought the hon member for Gumeracha meant pretty much the same thing as the Government did, namely, that the lessees should share the right to depasture as many cattle as the run would depasture, subject to the rights of the holders of purchased land, but the amendment put the point with more force than the Government clause He thought the last part of the amendment would be better struck out The words "it shall be lawful for the Governor at any time" do not imply that it shall be necessary for the Governor to withdraw the right of depasturing stock It only gave him the option of doing so He thought the last five lines should be struck out If the hon member would do that, he would support the amendment, but he could not support the clause in its present state

MESSAGES FROM THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

The SPEAKER reported that he had received messages from the President of the Legislative Council requesting the House to take into consideration certain amendments introduced by them into the Adelaide and Gawler Town Railway Further Extension Bill and also in the Customs Amendment Bill

The TREASURER moved that the Bills, as amended, be printed, and that the consideration them be an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

Mr HART moved that a message be sent to the President of the Legislative Council requesting permission to examine the Hon Major O'Halloran by the Select Committee on the National Defences

Agreed to

DEBATE RESUMED

In Committee

Mr BARROW, in resuming the debate, said that the last speaker had advised the hon member for Gumeracha to strike out the last four lines of his amendment He (Mr Barrow) went with him in that recommendation and the more so because if those four or five lines were struck out, the others would be unnecessary (A laugh) He intended to have voted for the recommittal of the clause, and was at the door of the Chamber, but the lock was turned, and vote taken before he could gain an admittance He had desired to support the hon member in his amendment as far as he could, but the question was not really between the printed clause as it appeared in the Bill, and the printed amendment of the hon member, but between the amended clause in the Bill and the printed amendment That clause, as amended in the Speaker's copy, really included the first half of the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha and if the first half was embodied in the amended clause, it was of course needless to introduce it in another form In fact, the first was surplusage and the second a mistake (Hear, hear) He had always considered that as the claims of the agriculturists advanced, the squatters must recede He was prepared to carry out that principle, but not to treat the squatters as enemies who ought to be opposed and thwarted and resisted by every possible means (Hear) He did not understand such to be the real meaning of the hon member (Mr Solomon), but it was certainly implied in the expression made use of by the hon member, who, when replying to the hon member for Encounter Bay, said he would support the amendment because it was opposed to the squatters All the interests in the colony—the farming, the mining, the agricultural, and the squatting interests—formed a united community, and although one interest might have more importance attached to it than another, and although that which was inferior should give place to that which was of the most consequence, no steps should be taken to depress any branch of industry whatever Taking into consideration the fact that when the 14 years leases were determined, the annual leases would only be granted, subject to those rights of commonage then existing in the newly proclaimed hundreds, and also to those that should be afterwards declared, the whole of the first part of the amendment was provided for in the amended clause, and the last part was objectionable and unnecessary He agreed with those hon members who thought that His Excellency would not consider a memorial received from a solitary person owning a section a "satisfactory memorial " But it was possible that an agricultural or an anti-squatting Ministry might be in power, and that which might be satisfactory to them, might not be satisfactory to a pro-squatting Ministry It would be better therefore to have those questions set at rest by specific legislation, than to leave them to the discretion or indiscretion of the Ministry in power for the time being, and more especially when charges were from day to day made against the Ministry that they were prepared to do anything and everything that the feeling of the House suggested If Ministers were made of such plastic materials as that such power ought not be entrusted to them If the hon member for Gumeracha would leave the amendment so as fairly to meet the requirements of the agriculturist, and not to make a direct attack upon the pastoral interest, he (Mr

Barrow) would go with him, but he would not raise the cry of "wheat versus wool," or "wool versus copper" All the great staple interests were essential to the prosperity of the colony, and it was a mistaken policy to assail one to advance another (Hear)

Mr STRANGWAYS called for a division whereupon the question was put and the amendment negatived

The House having resumed the SPEAKER reported the Bill, and the report of the Committee was agreed to be taken into consideration the following day

EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved the second reading of a Bill, intituled "an Act to regulate the Execution of Criminals" It would be recollected by many in that House that he had brought the subject of the Bill prominently before that House on a previous occasion, which resulted in their presenting an address to His Excellency, praying him to introduce such a measure as was then before them He considered the Bill was much required, in order that the practice of South Australia, in the execution of criminals, should be assimilated to that of the other Australian colonies They had all with the exception of Western Australia with which we had little sympathy, adopted the plan of private execution He considered the question totally distinct from that of the abolition of capital punishments, although that question had been mixed up with it Eminent persons who had written on the subject had condemned public executions, as tending to demoralize those who witnessed them, and he appealed to the experience of those hon members who had attended those unfortunate spectacles to confirm that opinion They were attended by a greater proportion of the female portion of the community than of the male, and even children and infants were taken to view them He had carefully avoided the question of the abolition of capital punishment, for he considered there were cases of murder and deliberate assassination which could only be punished in that way He could not sympathize with those who would have given Palmer anything short of death, but that punishment should be limited to cases of deliberate murder Such executions should be carefully guarded and take place in the presence of competent witnesses, and a coroner's inquest should sit on the body, to see that the punishment was carried out, and thus the necessity of a public execution would be avoided

Mr STRANGWAYS regretted that the Commissioner of Public Works should have undertaken such a motion, but he presumed that executions of criminals being great public works, he considered it his duty to do so He supposed that there had not been more than half a dozen executions in the colony altogether, except occasionally one in the Port Lincoln District The Act would entirely prevent the execution of the aborigines in the usual manner If any of the white population committed a crime, it was perhaps desirable they should be executed under the provisions of that Act, but it had hitherto been considered necessary in the case of an aborigine that he should be executed in the place where the crime was committed, in order that the associations connected with the crime should be connected with the punishment If that Bill were passed, however, he supposed sentence of death on aborigines would be practically abolished One objection to secret executions was the probability of persons, by means of money, obtaining substitutes for their own bodies In China there was a price paid for substitutes, according to a regular scale of charges, and money could do anything He would hold himself open to make any objections which might occur to him on the third reading

Mr TOWNSEND would support the second reading of the Bill, for he had seen nothing objectionable that could not be altered in Committee With regard to the effect of the example of public executions Mr Hill the Recorder of Birmingham, in his evidence before the Executions Committee in the House of Commons, stated that out of 169 persons executed, 154 had been present at public executions One young man named Collins had paid 5s to see an execution, and he himself was the next victim At the town of Lewes, one Hayes was tried for murder and executed His brother was present at the execution Two hours afterwards he was drunk and boasting of having been to see his brother hanged. In public executions if the man who was to die went up to the scaffold with courage he was a hero, his likeness was taken, and his form was embodied in waxwork for the public gaze Mr Dickens, who was present at the execution of the Mannings, gave such an account of the scene as would satisfy any one that public executions were not necessary The question was, did that Bill provide for the identity of the persons who were executed It would be seen that the 4th clause required that a jury should sit on the body under the Coroner of the district That would be sufficient to prove the identity of the criminal, and he did not believe anyone would be found to forfeit their lives for a sum of money The hon member who stated that such things took place in China did not say whether the substitutes spent the money before they died or not That hon member was ready enough to put himself forward on many occasions, but he (Mr Townsend) did not think he would do so on such as those There was a clause in the Bill to the effect that the Sheriff the gaolers, the Medical Officer, together with Justices of the Peace and ministers of religion might be present on those occasions He thought the Sheriff and officers of the Gaol and perhaps a minister of religion, if he chose, might be present But the gaol must not be crowded—no more persons ought to be there than were necessary

Mr BARROW would support the Bill He did not apprehend any danger from those contingencies which had been suggested by the hon member for Encounter Bay, for he thought the monied classes generally would not be anxious to place themselves in the grasp of the hangman, and therefore he could not see the force of the illustration drawn from the practice of China, the very mention of which was a sufficient refutation of the argument, as everything there was in so exceptional a state, as not to be likely to obtain here He had no wish, on so solemn a subject, to speak with levity It was a question whether the expedient of capital punishment should be continued or not, but being recognized, every means should be taken to prevent it being a means and occasion of immorality, for there was little doubt of the demoralizing tendency of all such exhibitions He hoped that Bill would pass into law, so that South Australia would no longer be disgusted by the horrors of public executions He should hold himself open to conviction with regard to the public execution of the aborigines, from any arguments that might be brought forward with regard to them, but he would not jeopardise the passing of that Bill They were so far below ourselves in the scale of civilization, that striking lessons might be necessary for them, in their case, public executions might be necessary He, when in London, had noticed immense crowds assembled at the Old Bailey, to see a poor wretched trembling fellow being hanged, and while the bells of the neighbouring churches were tolling solemnly, oaths and curses, and ribald jests were in the mouths of the crowds gathered together to witness the execution He agreed with the hon member who had just spoken, that it was inexpedient to crowd the gaol The Sheriff and officers of the gaol, and the Jury who tried the criminal, and perhaps a minister of religion, would be sufficient to prevent a fictitious person being substituted for the criminal The idea of a criminal escaping by means of a substitute, was so improbable that it might be regarded as morally impossible, and therefore no extra precaution was needed by filling the gaol with spectators He trusted the House would pass the Bill, and in such a way as to prevent either public or semi-public executions

Mr PEAKE condemned those disgusting and disgraceful exhibitions enacted under the name of law He agreed with the hon member who had last spoken, and need not recapitulate his arguments He thought a public execution was not a place for a minister of religion, and that some would not go unless compelled The Coroner and Jury present at the execution could testify to it, and thus ensure that the criminal had been properly executed, and the sentence of the law carried out He thought if public executions were abolished, the taking of casts of men's heads should be abolished too (No, no) He scarcely need remark the love of notoriety and the pride of dying game would be done away with by that Bill Such false feeling had prevented many from receiving their punishment in a proper spirit He thought that a great point attained

Mr BURFORD would prefer going into Committee at once, as the House appeared to be unanimous, but as he was on his legs, he would follow the example of hon members and express his views on the matter He thought on consideration, that it would be better to make the executions as private as possible, and, in accordance with this general feeling it would be better to have a gaol set apart where executions should take place, and that they should not be conducted in the presence of prisoners He proposed this idea that the minds of the prisoners might not be injuriously affected, and also, that witnessing it might be regarded as a degradation of which the prisoners were not deserving He was of opinion, also, that a much smaller number of persons should be present than were allowed by the clause

The motion that the Bill be read a second time was then put and carried without a division

The House immediately went into Committee

The preamble was postponed

On clause 1, "Execution to be carried into effect within the walls of the Gaol,"

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether the Government intended to include in this clause aboriginal natives, who might be condemned to the punishment of death At present it was the practice to take these offenders to the scene of their crime, and execute them on the spot.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that it was his intention as far as possible to prevent executions taking place in public, those of natives as well as of others He agreed with the hon member who had said that such scenes did no credit to our civilization in the eyes of savages

Mr SOLOMON proposed as an amendment to strike out the concluding lines, "or place which the Governor by writing, under his hand may direct" He did so in order that the Governor might, should he think fit in the exercise of his discretion, order criminals, for the purpose of deterring others from the commission of crime, to be executed in places in the remoter districts

Mr GLYDE presumed the Government did not intend that the executions should be carried out by the Sheriff in person He would therefore propose the insertion after the word

"Sheriff" of the words, "or by some person to be duly appointed by him"

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the words were taken from the Victorian Act

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Sheriff had the power now of appointing a substitute As to the amendment of the hon member for the city, there would be no use in inserting the words proposed by that hon member, if the intention of the House and the Government was that private executions should be adopted But if the words were inserted they might find a man, for the benefit of the community, hanged in the theatre (Oh, oh, and laughter)

Mr REYNOLDS thought, notwithstanding all that had been said of the superior civilization of strangling the natives privately instead of publicly, it would be better not to strangle them at all until we had brought them to a higher state of enlightenment As the clause now stood natives would be hanged in private as well as Europeans, and he questioned whether private executions of these people would have any effect on the native population

Mr GLYDE withdrew his amendment

Mr BURFORD moved that after the word "of," in the tenth line, the word "the" be struck out, and the word "a" be inserted, that after the word "gaol," the words "to be provided for the purpose" be inserted, that the words "of Adelaide, or of such other gaol as the Governor may," be struck out, and that for the word "his," in the last line, the word "the" be inserted, and that after the word "hand," the words "of the Governor" be inserted His object was that a gaol should be specially set apart for the execution of criminals, in order not to run the risk for contaminating other prisoners

The TREASURER opposed the amendment It was necessary and proper that a place intended for the execution of criminal should be a building of strength, or in a case of tumult or excitement there might possibly be a rescue of the prisoner, and for this reason, amongst a large population such as ours, it would be necessary to incur a great expense in putting up a sort of public slaughterhouse He thought it would be most indecorous and improper to have a building of this kind, and, besides, it would be necessary to have them in other places besides Adelaide as soon as the Judges commenced going circuit These reasons alone would be sufficient to deter him from supporting the amendment

The clause was then agreed to, without amendment

On clause 2, "Sheriff's officers of gaol, &c, to witness executions,"

Mr TOWNSEND moved that all the words after the word "occasion" be struck out, with a view to insert the words "together with the Jury summoned to sit upon the body or bodies, the ministers of religion, and such persons only"

Mr MILDRED—"And the necessary guard"

Mr STRANGWAYS opposed the amendment In this case the jury would have to be witnesses as well as jurors The only effect of the amendment would be to limit the number of witnesses, and thereby to lessen the security to the public that the sentence had been carried into effect As the clause stood, a considerable number might be present, and all these, if there were 100, 200, or 300, could be examined if necessary

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS preferred the clause as it stood It would admit the Medical Officer, who should be present the gaoler, and such officers of the prison as he pleased, and the ministers of religion With respect to the latter, he was sure the hon member for Onkaparinga would be the last to exclude them as there could be only one reason for their being wishful to attend Hon members would not surely wish to make the duty of the jurors more painful than it would necessarily be

Mr REYNOLDS said however painful it might be to believe, there might be relatives of the prisoner who would wish to be present

Mr TOWNSEND said what he wished was that the Sheriff should not issue orders of admission When he found hundreds of pounds given for casts of the heads of criminals, and ladies hiring carriages and going to purchase locks of the criminals' hair (Cries of oh, oh, and laughter) He (Mr Townsend) was speaking from the records of the House of Commons He lamented that it was a fact but he spoke of the system of things actually existing

Mr STRANGWAYS said he gathered from one word of the hon member's what class of ladies he referred to It appeared they were ladies who hired carriages (Laughter) But the study of the structure of the human head was one of the points to which persons in England devoted much of their time He did not say whether it was a valuable study, but he would not prevent persons from obtaining casts for scientific purposes

The clause was then agreed to without amendment, as were also clauses 3, 4, and 5

On clause 6, certificate and declaration to be recorded and published,

Mr TOWNSEND said it would be well that these records should also be published in the other papers, as few persons saw the Gazette, and too much publicity could not be given to the fact that the criminal had been executed He moved the addition of the words, "and at least two other papers" (Oh, oh)

Dr WARK had not spoken yet, though had he seen the Bill in time, he would have done so (Question) There were a number of hon members who were always speaking, and he thought those who seldom spoke, when they did get up should be heard

The CHAIRMAN reminded the hon member that the clause before the House was the 6th

Dr WARK agreed that too much publicity could not be given to the announcements in question, but matters of much less interest were published in the papers, and it would be an insult to them to suppose that they would pass over a matter of such importance as the execution of a criminal

The clause was then agreed to without a division

In reply to Mr STRANGWAYS, the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the interment of prisoners was already provided for by the Gaol Act

The schedules A and B, and the preamble, were put and passed without amendment

Mr GLYDE thought it would be well to know whether any distinction was to be made between the aborigines and others His own views on capital punishment were known, but as the object of punishment was to deter others from crime it would be wrong to insist on the aborigines being executed privately If the aborigines committed crimes on the Murray, for instance, where there were no gaols, it was questionable whether they should not be sent to the scene of their outrages for execution He was not prepared at present with an amendment He hoped the Government would not under these circumstances take the Bill out of Committee.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS thought it strange that an hon member whose views as he himself said, on capital punishment, were well known should adopt such a course He did not know whether it would be ever desirable to subject the aborigines to capital punishment, but he was sorry to hear hon members fall back on the old exploded idea that public executions could produce a good effect even upon the natives With respect to taking the Bill out of Committee he would place himself in the hands of the House

Mr REYNOLDS hoped the hon member would not take the Bill out of Committee as the suggestion of the hon member for East Torrens was worthy of consideration He hoped the Government would, on this as on other occasions, yield gracefully to the will of the House (Laughter) He moved that the House resume, and that the Chairman report progress

The motion was agreed to, and the House resumed accordingly

THE WATER COMMISSION

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid on the table a report from the Commissioners of Waterworks relating to the laying down of the main pipes in the centre of the streets in reply to a petition presented to the House He moved that the report be printed

Agreed to

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that the report of the Committee on this Bill be adopted

Mr MILNE inquired whether it was competent for him to move the recommittal of the Bill His object was to move that the preamble be recommitted, and if that were agreed to, to move that the Central Board of Main Roads be exempted from the operation of the Bill He did not take part in canvassing the propriety of including the Board in the Bill, as from his being a member of it, his object in doing so might be misconstrued But upon coming into contact with members of the District Councils, he found an unanimous feeling against including the Board, and therefore he waived all private feeling, and resolved to perform his public duty He admitted that the constitution of the Board might be modified, and the Board rendered amenable for its acts to the Commissioner of Public Works, but it would be much more satisfactory to the country that the course of action in respect to main roads should be open in the same manner as it was at present to the inspection of the reporters of the press, the Chairmen of District Councils, and gentlemen from distant parts of the colony, who might wish to take the views of the Board on certain subjects If the Board were included in this Bill, these persons would not have such opportunities, as everything connected with the main road would be done in the office of the Commissioner of Public Works The theory of the Constitution was that the Commissioner of Public Works was responsible to the House for the management of the roads as well as for the other public works of the colony, but the Board should co-exist with the Commissioner The Central Road Board should not be included in this Bill, but a measure should be introduced dealing with the main roads separately It would be more satisfactory to the public to have access to the Board He would not say much respecting the Central Road Board as it was admitted by almost every hon member that the operations of that Board were satisfactory The payment of the members was very trifling indeed, so that it could not be urged on the score of economy that to abolish the Board would be of much advantage He moved that the Bill be recommitted

There being no seconder to the amendment, it lapsed, and the original motion was agreed to

The third reading was made an Order of the Day for next day

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The House went into Committee on this Bill

On clause 7 "Pound to be fenced, enclosed, and kept clean, and in repair"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that he was not prepared to make the alteration suggested by the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker) on the previous day, for covering in pounds It would entail great expenses which were generally beyond the means of persons who established pounds

The clause was then agreed to

On clause 8 being put

Mr LINDSAY wished to insert before this clause clause A, as follows —

"There shall be a constant supply of pure water in every pound, supplied either by troughs or in any manner that shall afford the animals impounded free access to the water at all times"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had no objection to the clause

Agreed to

On clause 8 being again put,

Mr LINDSAY moved that before clause 8, the following clause (B) be also inserted —

"There shall be a paddock of not less than 20 acres in connection with every pound into which all animals in the said pound shall be turned for exercise for at least three hours in every day, unless the poundkeeper shall be able to show cause to the satisfaction of any two Justices of the Peace, or to the District Council (as the case may be) before he may be brought to answer any charge of neglect of duty why this law shall not in any particular case have been complied with"

This would partially meet the views of the hon member for Victoria and was not liable to the objection of the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands to the proposal for finding shelter, more particularly as the system was already in operation in many Hundreds

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS objected to the clause on the same ground as he had opposed that relative to the erection of sheds

The amendment (new clause) was then put and lost, and Clauses 8 and 9 were agreed to without dissension

On clause 10 "Justices to have a table of charges for food and estimate rates of ordinary damage, subject to allowance, of governor"

Mr HARVEY moved that the words Government Gazette be struck out and the words "local papers" be put in It was advisable to give the information through the papers, as if it were not for them people would know nothing of the cattle being impounded until after they were sold

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said it would be better to allow the name of the Gazette to remain in the clause, and leave the question as to whether the notices should be published in other papers till a future occasion

Mr REYNOLDS called attention to the fact that there was not a quorum present

Counted out at 10 minutes to 4 o clock

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o clock

MESSRS BORROW & GOODIAR

Mr NEALES presented a petition from Messrs Baker and Waterhouse, assignees to the estate of Messrs Borrow and Goodiar, asking the House to determine by resolution whether the sum of £16,000 voted to Messrs Borrow and Goodiar had been voted in recognition of a debt to that amount to Messrs Borrow & Goodiar, or as a free gift?

PORT LINCOLN

Mr MACDERMOTT presented a petition from 19 of the principal inhabitants of Port Lincoln, praying the House to present an address to His Excellency the Governor requesting that a sum of money might be placed on the Estimates for the construction of a jetty at Port Lincoln

THE UNEMPLOYED

Mr J M SOLOMON presented a petition, signed by the Mayor of Adelaide, on behalf of about 1,500 persons in public meeting assembled, praying the House not to sanction a sum of money on the Estimates for 1859 for the purposes of emigration from the United Kingdom, and that public works might be immediately proceeded with

The SPEAKER remarked that the petition could only be received as the petition of the person by whom it was signed Subsequently the Hon Speaker, upon inspecting the petition, stated that it could not be received as it was informal, and Mr Solomon consequently withdrew it

CAMEL CARRYING COMPANY

Mr SOLOMON stated that a notice appeared in his name upon the paper on the previous day for printing the petition of the Camel Carrying Company, but it had lapsed in consequence of the House being counted out He wished to know whether he had the privilege of bringing it forward again

The SPEAKER said the rule in reference to lapsed motions, was to bring them forward when no other business was before the House if there was no opposition

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr REYNOLDS, as Chairman of the Committee upon Railway Management, brought up a progress report

The report and evidence were directed to be printed

TAXATION BILLS

Mr STRANGWAYS moved—

"That it is a rule and order of this House (founded on the rules and orders of the Commons House of Parliament) that no Bill for imposing a tax shall be proceeded with by this House unless such Bill shall be founded upon a resolution of a Committee of the whole House That if, at any stage of the proceedings, upon any Bill for imposing a tax, on objection and inquiry being made, it shall be found that such Bill has not been founded upon a resolution of a Committee of the whole House, all orders relating to such Bill shall be read and discharged, and the Bill shall be at once withdrawn by the member having charge of the same"

The House would remember that a short time since he called the attention of the Speaker to a point of order, and although he did not agree with the hon gentleman s decision on that point he bowed to it He believed that in tabling this motion he had adopted a strictly parliamentary course Hon members, no doubt, upon first reading the motion would consider it almost an unnecessary matter of form but if they would look more deeply into the matter they would find that the power of levying a tax upon the people was one of the most important powers of that House, and the manner in which that taxation should be considered was amongst the most important matters which the House had to consider In considering any matter imposing taxation upon the people it was necessary that there should be the fullest discussion upon every point bearing upon the case On referring to "May," page 367, he found that the Commons were as strict in levying a tax as they were in granting money He submitted that the proper course under the Constitution Act of this colony, when it was in contemplation to tax the people, was to table a resolution and take the sense of the House as to the principle upon which that tax should be founded The Honorable the Speaker had decided that the Governor had power to introduce any Bill to that House, but whether the Governor had that power or not was not material The question was what course the House should adopt when His Excellency s message was received, and in what manner they should proceed to consider the Bill The proper course, as laid down by "May," admitting that the Governor had the power to introduce a Bill, was for the Government to move that on a future day the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole to consider the Governor s message When that message had been fully considered in Committee and had been agreed to, then it was competent for the Government to move the first reading of the Bill But he contended that by the Constitution Act, the House was not bound to take into consideration and read a first time any Bill sent down by His Excellency He submitted that the Government in any case in which they might advise His Excellency to send a Bill to that House, in requiring the House at once to read the Bill a first time, were not acting in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons and consequently not in accordance with what should be the practice of that House Hon members in referring to "May" could not have any doubt that the rule of the House of Commons was what it had been stated to be, and that House had adopted the Standing Orders of the House of Commons so far as they were applicable There could be no doubt that the rule of the House of Commons in reference to any Bill imposing a tax upon the people had been adopted by that House If the House agreed to the first part of the resolution, there could be no difficulty in agreeing to the second portion, in fact, the whole matter appeared so clear to him that no further comment was, he thought, necessary

Mr PEAKE seconded the motion If the House had adopted a course at variance with the custom of the House of Commons he hoped they would reconsider their decision and revert to the more constitutional course adopted by the House of Commons The House of Commons had ever been zealous in upholding their undoubted privilege of granting aids and supplies to the Crown and they were equally zealous to guard against hasty legislation in connection with the taxation of the people The rule which had been referred to by the hon mover had been in force for centuries, for, in a work which he held in his hand, he found it laid down so far back as 1667 that due and sufficient notice must be given of any proposition for the taxation of the people, and that such proposition must be discussed in a Committee of the House The commentator said that this regulation was wise and prudent, as it enabled every member to express his opinion as often as he thought proper The language of the regulation affecting the House of Commons was so plain and unmistakeable, and the policy was so wise and had been so well considered, that it had been acted upon for centuries with great benefit to the country Upon a precedent so ancient and valuable it was unnecessary for him to make any further comment He thought that the principle had a few days since been infringed by discussing the Assessment on Stock Bill, when the House was not in Committee If the discussion which then took place was in conformity with the present Standing Orders the House had better retrace its steps and fall back upon the course of action which long experience had shewn to be so wise and valuable

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to say a few words Before proceeding he would remark that the question after all was one of fact The resolution affirmed that it was the practice of that House, following the practice of the House of Commons that no Bill imposing a tax should be proceeded with by the House unless such Bill were founded upon a resolution of a Committee of the whole House. He would, however, venture to express an opinion that the assertion contained in the motion was altogether erroneous. ("No, no," from Mr. Strangways.) He could quite understand the hon. member saying "No, no," as he did not suppose that the hon. member would have placed his name to a motion which he believed to be erroneous. He did not expect the House to take his assertion as proof, but would proceed to shew the grounds upon which in his opinion, the hon. member was wrong in the assertion which he made in his motion. In the first place that House was not the English House of Commons nor had that House the powers of the English House of Commons, except so far as they were conferred by the law which gave them existence. He did not indeed want a stronger argument to show that they did not possess the powers of the House of Commons than those which had been brought forward by hon. members opposite. If they attempted to arrogate to themselves those powers when the question came to be tested in a court of law, it would be found that in reality they did not possess those powers. He submitted that if persons out of doors were called upon to do certain things, and declined, it would be found that the House did not possess the powers of the House of Commons. That House had no powers but those which were conferred upon it by the Act which gave existence to their body. If the Standing Orders and the provisions of that Act in any way clashed, as the Standing Orders themselves derived their authority from the Act, it was clear that they must give place to the Act from which they derived their authority. It was absurd to suppose that the Standing Orders could override the Act from which they derived their authority. One of the great aims of the old Constitution Bill was to free the Legislature of the country from every trace of subordination, and a law was prepared for that purpose which it was assumed would be passed, by the English Government. It provided that they should be free from the power of the Queen to refuse her assent to laws. The powers which that Bill would have secured were not secured, and the former Legislature was expressly told that it was necessary to keep themselves within the powers conferred upon them. The Constitution Act professed to be founded on the powers given to the then existing Legislature by two Acts from one of which he would quote. It was the New South Wales Act, but identical powers were given to South Australia. It stated that "It shall be lawful for the Governor to transmit to the Council for consideration the draft of any Bills necessary to introduce, and the same shall be considered by the Council in like manner as if the Bill had originated therein." The Governor had a right to send a Bill imposing a tax to the Council, and the Council was bound to consider it in the same way as if the Bill originated therein. (Signs of dissent from Mr. Strangways.) The hon. gentleman shook his head, and no doubt meant that as a very emphatic dissent; but he was at a loss to understand how the English language could be so shaped as more clearly to convey the view which he had stated. Whilst he agreed that the course which had been stated was the practice of the House of Commons he did not agree with the eulogiums which had been passed by the seconder of the motion, for it was notorious that during a series of years there was no country in which taxation was so oppressive and unjust as in England. All the safeguards which had been adopted did not prevent the Excise laws, nor duties upon the necessaries of life, which were a disgrace to England and were only swept away during the last administration of Sir Robert Peel. He must therefore dissent from the eulogium of the hon. member for the Burra and Clare. He agreed that the rule of the House of Commons was what it was stated to be, that no Bill could be introduced unless founded upon a resolution of the House, but it did not say that it should be read a first time. No member here had a right to introduce a money Bill unless it had been first discussed. The Governor had power to introduce a Bill, and it was then incumbent on the House, if they wished to entitle themselves to respect, to respect the law to which they owed their origin by taking the Bill into consideration. He must oppose the motion in its present form, but if the hon. mover would so alter it as not to question the power of the Governor, but simply to state that the House considered it inexpedient that such power should be exercised he should have no objection to it. There were two ways of doing a thing—a right one and a wrong one; and the hon. member for Encounter Bay, with his usual felicity, had hit upon the wrong one. It was quite in accordance with the feelings of the Government that any rule which would secure the fullest deliberation upon measures introduced to that House should be observed. The measure asserted as a fact what was not a fact, and if it were carried it would deprive the Crown of its prerogative. If the hon. mover would say that it was inexpedient such power should be exercised by the Governor, he should be quite prepared to acquiesce, but the Government must oppose a resolution which was erroneous in point of fact and if carried, would be a direct attack upon the rights which were reserved to the Crown in the Act which gave the Colonial Parliament its power. If the motion were amended as he had suggested, he had no objection to agree to it, there being no desire on the part of the Government to introduce any measure for the taxation of the people in any other way than would secure the fullest deliberation. The Government, indeed, could not have given a better guarantee of their desire than by referring the whole question of taxation to a Select Committee. He repeated that in its present form the Government could not agree to the motion, as, if carried it would amount to an interference with the rights of the Crown.

Mr. Neales hoped the hon. mover would adopt the suggestions of the Attorney-General in altering the motion. If the objects of the hon. mover were what his speech professed, he could have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Attorney-General; but if it were a question between the hon. mover's view of the law and that of the Attorney-General, no doubt the hon. mover would obstinately stick to his motion, and if so, the hon. gentleman would be served as he frequently was in that house—outvoted. (Laughter.)

Mr. Reynolds had listened attentively to the Attorney-General, but must say he did not think the hon. gentleman had thrown much light upon the subject. At first he was rather opposed to the principal portion of the motion, but after the statements of the Attorney-General he was disposed to support a great portion of it. (Laughter.) He was glad to find that the Attorney-General was at last in his place to throw some light upon the practice of the House of Commons and what should consequently be the practice of that House. The Attorney-General said that the assertion of the hon. mover was not in accordance with fact, and he believed the hon. gentleman was right in saying so, for in many instances he found the rules adopted by that House were directly the reverse of those adopted by the House of Commons, and the question was whether under such circumstances they were right in adopting the Standing Orders, or was the hon. gentleman right in allowing the Standing Orders to pass without pointing out to the House that those Standing Orders were different from the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. (In support of the view taken by the hon. mover the hon. member referred to the debates upon the Church Temporalities Bill in 1833.) If they were bound to adopt the Standing Orders of the House of Commons it was necessary that many of the Standing Orders which had been adopted should be modified, to render them in accordance with the Standing Orders of the British House of Commons. The Attorney-General had remarked that that House was not the House of Commons, but he (Mr. Reynolds) had always understood that they were to be guided by the practice of the British House of Commons. On the question of privilege they all stood up for the privileges of the British House of Commons, and he was sorry now to learn that they had not those privileges, particularly after the eloquent address which had been delivered upon that question by the Attorney-General. He would suggest, however, that the hon. mover should amend his motion, so that it would merely have prospective and not retrospective effect.

Mr. Burford quite agreed with the suggestion that the hon. mover should adopt the proposition of the hon. the Attorney-General so as to give it prospective and not retrospective effect. They could not too strictly adhere to the practice observed in the British House of Commons. He was induced by the Constitution Act to believe that the intention was that they should enjoy the privileges of the House of Commons, but should not go beyond them. He thought they should protect their position to that extent. There should, however, he thought, always be a distinction drawn between Acts imposing taxation and those which did not. Although he had no objection to His Excellency introducing a Bill which did not impose taxation, he was not so confident that he should approve of Bills being introduced imposing taxation, considering that the peculiar province of that House which should be jealously watched. In former times, advantage was taken, from the Monarch on the throne to the Executive, to abuse power and levy imposts on the people without their concurrence. The Executive in those times frequently concocted schemes for erecting a monopoly; and although we might or might not be exposed to this, they should, he thought, rigidly observe the practice of the House of Commons.

Mr. Solomon agreed with the principle of the motion, but preferred the wording of the hon. the Attorney-General. He believed the resolution was not founded on fact, as it started by asserting that it was a rule and order of this House, whereas it was not, nor could it be, until a resolution was taken thereon. By the first chapter of the Standing Orders, he found that they were to resort in all cases, not otherwise provided for, to the rules and orders of the House of Commons. But they had not the same powers or privileges as the House of Commons. For instance, they could not claim freedom from arrest for debt—(question)—as it appeared from the Constitution Act that a member on being unable to pay his lawful debts, should cease to be a member. In England members claimed freedom from arrest during the session, and at the close of the session went across the Channel to avoid it. He could not support the motion in its present shape, but would do so if it were amended according to the suggestion of the hon. the Attorney-General.

Mr. Strangways said as the Attorney-General was wrong in his premises, it was no wonder that he was wrong in his conclusion If hon members had ever seen a whirlwind in King William-street collecting a quantity of dust from all quarters, it bore some resemblance to the hon the Attorney-General's speech (Laughter) The hon member stated that the fact set forth in the resolution was only an assertion But the hon. member would find that the rules and orders of the House of Commons were to be adopted in all cases not otherwise provided for, and if there was any Standing Order on this point the Attorney-General would have referred to it but he had not done so Therefore the rules of the House of Commons were applicable The rule mentioned in the resolution he found in "May," and the hon the Attorney-General would admit it to be a rule of the House of Commons The hon member referred to the oppressive taxation of England under the rules and orders which he (Mr Strangways) had mentioned, and therefore the hon member appeared to him to argue that if the House did not adopt those rules, there would be no chance of oppressive taxation The hon the Attorney-General also said, that under the 5th and 6th Vict, the Governor had a right to transmit any Bill for the House to take into consideration But whether that Act was in force now or not was quite immaterial, as the question at issue was not whether such Bills could be entertained, but the manner in which they should be entertained He maintained that it was the duty of the House as the representative of the people to ensure full and free discussion of all questions involving facts and figures, which could not be fully brought out when the Speaker was in the Chair and hon members could only speak once There was nothing in the hon the Attorney-General's arguments or rather assertions, for they were nothing more, to alter what he had said, viz, that it was competent for the House to declare the manner in which it would entertain a Bill Did the hon the Attorney-General dare to say that the House was bound to read a Bill sent down by the Governor a first time? If he could say so he would, but not being in that position, like a good tactician, he would persist in saying

" Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise "

(laughter,) and if the hon member knew that anything was to be said, he would have said it He (Mr Strangways) contended by this resolution that it was the duty of the Government and the House, immediately on a Bill being received from the Governor —and the Attorney-General himself admitted that the course proposed by the resolution was expedient, so that it was clear the hon member had taken an inexpedient and therefore a highly improper course, and one which he would not follow again—but he (Mr Strangways) contended that the House should either, by its rules and orders, or by passing this resolution or one similar to it, provide against such a state of things The object of the hon the Attorney General was to avoid the chance of a discussion upon a resolution in Committee, as without such a discussion he might have a Bill read a first or second time But if the Bill were discussed fully and fairly in Committee, if it was unjust in its nature or operation, the chances were much greater that it would be thrown out The Attorney-General, as the head of the financial department, had introduced this unjust measure, thinking the Treasurer not fit to be entrusted with it, and after hearing all the arguments and assertions for and against it, the hon gentleman said, "I need not advance any arguments, but simply say, "It is not so, nothing of the kind, what I say is law" That was the way the Attorney-General dealt with the matter In this resolution he was doing nothing more than asking the House to declare what the rule was at the present time The hon the Attorney-General said that the House had no privileges It was strange how the hon member had been enlightened in 12 or 15 months The hon member formerly said the House had privileges, and obtained a large majority on the occasion, and it was only when Her Majesty's Privy Council had the presumption to differ with the hon gentleman that he altered his opinion It was not until he (Mr Strangways) combatted the hon member's opinions on the Standing Orders, that he got the hon member to admit——

The SPEAKER said the hon member was not in order in referring to a debate of the present session

Mr STRANGWAYS—The House would remember what he had stated, namely, that the hon the Attorney-General's opinions only very recently had undergone a change It occurred, in fact, within the last three months The hon the Attorney-General said that if he (Mr Strangways) pressed his motion to a division, he (Mr Strangways) would find himself in a minority, as he usually was He would go to a division, and, as to the minorities in which he was usually found, if the Attorney General referred to the records of the House he would find that, whether in a minority or in a majority, he was usually on the side of Government, so that if there was anything in the statement of the hon the Attorney-General, he presumed he would have the support of that hon member and his colleagues He therefore called on the Ministry to support him though he felt that the call would not be responded to He would now leave it to hon members to say whether they would support their rights and privileges or not

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained He had not said a word about the hon member being in a minority The hon member mistook something said by the hon member for the city for a statement of his (the Attorney-General's)

The question was then put and the House divided, when there appeared a majority of six against the motion, which was therefore lost

The numbers were—

Ayes, 6—Messrs Strangways (teller), Burford, Peake, Hawker, Hallett, and Andrews

Noes, 12—The Commissioner of Public Works Attorney-General (teller), the Treasurer, Messrs Solomon, Mildred, Macdermott, Neales, Milne, Hay, Cole, McEllister, and Townsend

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, this Bill was read a third time and passed

THE ABORIGINES

The ATTORNEY GENERAL laid upon the table a return to a resolution of the House, showing the amount received from aboriginal reserves during the year, and the amount expended on the aborigines during the same period

SEARCH FOR GOLD

Mr REYNOLDS rose to move—

"That this House will, on Wednesday, the 13th October, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to place on the Estimates a sufficient sum for the purpose of examining the Barrier and Grey Ranges, with the view of testing whether gold exists in paying quantities in those quarters"

There were not many matters more legitimate th in the object he had in view at the present moment Few discoveries could be made in the colony which would more immediately benefit it than a gold-field Whatever might be said of a gold population or of the discovery of gold affecting the morality of a country, still wherever gold was found population collected, for gold was so attractive that nations might be said to follow in its wake Men would go far in the search for gold, and when it was found in sufficient quantities to be remunerative population quickly flowed Much had been said of the want of population in South Australia, but if gold could be found they would have population flowing in, and a great accession to the consumers of their products, whilst at the same time they would save their immigration fund Thus if they found a gold-field the advantages would be great, whilst the disadvantages of a gold-field being some distance from Adelaide would amount to nothing at all The very fact of Echunga being so near hand induced parties to run out there and pick about the ground instead of fixing themselves on the spot and really testing the place He believed if the ground there were properly tested by men sticking to it as they did at Ballarat or the other gold-fields it might prove much more remunerative If we found gold 100, 150, or 200 miles from Adelaide, it would be a great advantage to us This was a matter not at all new to him (Mr Reynolds) His first thoughts were turned to the Barrier ranges by reading Sturt's travels through the Barrier and Grey Ranges, and no person reading that work and examining the character of the specimens given in the work could doubt that a gold-field existed in the district When the Victorian gold-fields attracted the population away from this colony, he had frequently referred to this subject and he believed the people in going over the ranges at that time would have found it well worth while to have examined them He found his opinion was strengthened by Mr Sturt, who being acquainted with the Barrier Ranges and also with Bendigo, and having a knowledge of geology, was strongly of opinion that gold would be found in this locality He also heard a friend of his on the very day of the great gold discovery at the Bendigo becoming known in Adelaide say that gold would be found in South Australia, though whether this gentleman referred to the Barrier and Grey Ranges he did not know, but from a knowledge of the geological structure of the country there, he believed such to be the case When he found also men who knew both the Victorian gold-fields and the Barrier and Grey Ranges of the same opinion, he thought the circumstance should go a long way in inducing the House to vote a sum of money for the purpose Moreover the geologists, diggers, and journalists of Victoria were of a like opinion, and when our own opinions were fortified by all those he had mentioned he thought it well worth while to vote a sum to test the matter He might be asked what the distance was? From Adelaide, taking the Burra as a starting point, he thought the Ranges could be reached overland in about 180 miles, so that the distance overland would be about 280 miles He thought the Government could send a party from the junction of the Murray and the Darling He was told by a gentleman in the Murray trade that he had offered to take 10 diggers free of charge to the Junction that they might test the Barrier Ranges for gold It was certain if gold were found there the Murray must be made use of to a great extent, for even if the gold-field were out of South Australia the diggers must have their supplies from us The principal, perhaps the only objection to his proposal was that the Ranges were out of the South Australian territory, but he did not see that that was any objection, as we were expending money now in trying to discover new country beyond the South Australian boundary There might be some consideration as to the amount which would be required for the purpose but he believed £500 would be amply sufficient, and that a leader could be found with six men to go for six months to test the matter It was of great importance now when people were talking of going to Port Curtis, that our working men should have some inducement to stay amongst us He hoped the motion would pass without opposition

Mr NEALES seconded the motion, and thought that persons looking to the map would see that the Barrier Ranges were not as hot as Port Curtis The reason of people not remaining at Echunga was not that it was too near Adelaide, but that there was not room, the place being surrounded by private sold lands This had the effect of preventing anything like a rush Otherwise the place would have been settled, and would have proved as good a piece of gold raising land as Bendigo or Ballarat If we could get over this difficulty by finding gold at the Barrier Ranges, it would be a great advantage With regard to the Barrier Ranges being a little beyond our boundary, we might throw that objection over, not only with regard to gold-fields, but to squatting stations Our object should be to find a market for our produce in or out of the province Even should the search prove unsuccessful, nobody could object to its being made, when the cost was only £500, and the chances of success so great

Mr SOLOMON supported the resolution It would be admitted that a great advantage would accrue to the country from the discovery of a good workable goldfield, and the discovery at Echunga went far to prove what was previously denied, viz, that gold existed in the colony With respect to the advantage which would arise to the colony he need hardly express his views That it would give an impetus to trade, would enhance the value of the land, and cause a large increase in our population, must be admitted He thought with the hon member, Mr Neales, that finding gold at a distance of 250 or 280 miles would be near enough as long as this was the market to which the diggers should send for what they required The hon member for the Sturt said that six men would be sufficient for the search, and he (Mr Solomon) had gone into a calculation referring to the number which the hon member fixed He found that £500 would be sufficient for six men for six months with a superintendent—not a theoretical man, but a practical gold-miner who had made all he possessed by gold-mining He (Mr Solomon) knew at this moment a man of this description, who would undertake the duty more for the honor than the sake of reward, and so great was the anxiety out of doors to carry out the object of the resolution, that he believed persons could be found to provide the horse-flesh necessary for the purpose free of charge Indeed he was sure, for he had heard statements that day which convinced him of it The proper time to attempt such discoveries was now arrived, when there were many hands out of employment, and when explorations might not prove as abortive as recent explorations into the interior had turned out Indeed, he believed a number of men could be found for their rations to carry on the search For there was no denying, however anxious men out of work in the colony might be to get to Port Curtis or any other place which offered a better chance of work than South Australia did at present, yet such was the love for South Australia amongst men who had been engaged here for years, that they would rather work for five shillings a day here than in Victoria or any of the other colonies for six shillings He would say no more at present, but would reserve his arguments for a future occasion should they be necessary

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not rise to oppose the motion, but thought that the sum fixed should not be exceeded

The SPEAKER—The sum will be fixed in Committee

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said no opposition would be offered to the motion by the Government There were but two matters to be considered One was the fixing of the amount to be expended, and the other that it should be made part of the resolution that the Government should be requested to put itself in communication with the Government of New South Wales in order to prevent any unfriendly feeling arising In fact, the same course should be pursued as when the Government resolved upon deepening the channel of the Murray

The motion was then put and carried

STRATHALBYN AND MILANG TELEGRAPH

Mr ROGERS asked the hon the Commissioner of Public Works if he will be prepared to place a sum on the General Estimates for 1859 sufficient to construct a branch line of telegraph from Strathalbyn to Milang

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that when the Government had further information they would decide upon what steps to take in the matter

STRATHALBYN

Mr ROGERS moved—

"That the petition of the inhabitants of Strathalbyn be printed"

Agreed to

RIVERTON AND CLARE TELEGRAPH

Mr HAWKER moved—

"That the House will on Oct 15 resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, with a view to adopt an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Supplementary Estimates of 1858, for the purpose of extending the electric telegraph from Riverton to Clare, by way of Auburn and Watervale"

The House had already affirmed by a vote the principle that the electric telegraph was beneficial to the country at large The distance for which he now asked this description of communication was only 25 miles, and the line passed through one of the most thickly populated agricultural districts in Australia—so much so that he believed hon members were not aware of the extent of the population in question. There were many rising townships and an increasing population, and several large steam flour mills in the district Once the telegraph was in working order and thoroughly understood there would be a great saving to the settlers, as it would frequently save them the necessity of coming to town, and thus they could get information for a few shillings which now cost them £5 The line would also decrease the cost of the main line from Riverton He had consulted before coming to the House that day with Mr Todd, the Superintendent of Telegraphs on the subject, and the plan met that gentleman's approval, and he (Mr Todd) thought it would be a benefit to the revenue.

Mr MCELLISTER seconded the motion

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would not oppose the motion, but it appeared to him that the question could be reopened when the Supplementary Estimates again came before the House. He believed the importance of the locality was such as it had been represented by the hon member (Mr Hawker), and he was aware that the Superintendent of Telegraphs believed that a considerable revenue would be derived from the line He had already told the House that the cost of telegraphs was about £60 per mile It never exceeded that amount, but generally fell short of it

Mr REYNOLDS would not oppose the motion, but would like to see the hon member agree to an addition to it It was that Adelaide and Glenelg should be united, though it was true that one line was to the north and the other to the south There was a wire already half way, reaching within about three miles, and Glenelg was a very important place As it was the wish of the Government to grant telegraphic communication to centres of populations he hoped the hon, member and the Government would not object to this addition

Mr STRANGWAYS would also suggest the addition of a line from Port Adelaide to Port Lincoln or some other place, as the line from Port Adelaide to Port Lincoln had quite as much to do with the motion as the line from Adelaide to Glenelg He did not object to telegraphic communication in a country where roads were so bad and expensive, but he would suggest that the Government should adopt some rule according to which they would grant this communication He believed that in England there were rules as to where postal communication should be granted, and that it depended on the number of letters Some such plan would render it unnecessary for hon members to be constantly making these applications He hoped the Government would consult the Inspector of Telegraphs as to some general regulations.

Mr LINDSAY also wished for some general plan, in order that hon members might not be constantly playing what an hon member had called "the game of grab" With respect to the cost of the telegraphs, they had hitherto been constructed with saplings, which could not be expected to last very long, and they would probably soon require to be renewed Unless the telegraphs were made of a more durable character they would be found more expensive than was supposed, or what was termed "cheap and nasty"

Mr MCELLISTER thought they were fortunate in getting as representatives for Encounter Bay two hon members who were determined to obstruct everything

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had given way to the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Lindsay, with whom the Attorney-General had risen simultaneously when the former hon gentleman addressed the House), because he was always anxious to hear what that hon member had to say on a question of this kind He always felt bound to refuse his assent to a proposition by which the Government were to lay down a plan for telegraph and railway for all time to come, for that was what the hon member evidently had in view But the Government had one intelligible, and he thought reasonable plan in such matters which was that whenever the people of a district wanted such facility, and applied for it, the Government considered whether the project would pay, but if the people did not apply the Government took it for granted that they did not want any such facility

Capt HART wished to know whether they were to understand that the Government had ascertained the facts in this instance, as hon members were unacquainted with the locality required such information The only advantage of putting the motion into the shape of going into Committee on a future day seemed to be that the subject was to be discussed twice over He considered the new order in this respect an inconvenient one

The motion was then put and carried

COLONIAL DEFENCES

Capt HART asked an extension of time to the Committee on Colonial Defences for bringing up their report

The Bill was read a third time and passed

LAPSED MOTIONS

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the lapsed motions be proceeded with

Agreed to

TRAMWAY BETWEEN GUICHEN BAY AND MOUNT GAMBIER

Mr HAWKER moved, that the House on Friday the 15th of this month, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the purpose of considering an address to his Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting His Excellency would take such steps as might be necessary for the immediate survey of the country between Guichen Bay and Mount Gambier, for the purpose of constructing a tramway between those localities He believed that it was known to hon members that the district mentioned in his motion was one of the most extensive in the colony It extended from the Murray to the Glenelg, a range of nearly 300 miles It was a district that could not be connected with Adelaide except by the seaboard With the exception of two or three sections, previously disposed of, the quantity of land sold at three sales realized £90,000, and the only outlay in the district had been at the harbor in Guichen Bay The inhabitants, therefore, considered they had a claim on the Government to do something for them In advocating a survey the inhabitants had come to the conclusion that a tramway on that line was the best that could be adopted As to the comparative merits of tramways and railways, that was a matter for future consideration, the point was whether a survey was required He desired a survey to be made, so as to find the best route to that particular district That tramway would accommodate nearly the whole of that district, and a branch from Mount Gambier to Penola would accommodate the whole of the country from the Mosquito Plains to 60 miles beyond it It was a peculiar district for in it there was a good quantity of stone and plenty of timber for either a railway or tramway Already the population was increasing, and he never saw better crops than he had seen in that district The soil was volcanic, which in all parts of the world denoted a very rich character He would advocate it on another ground If the line were made, he was quite certain sufficient land in that direction would be sold to pay the expense of making it It would also give employment to large amount of unskilled labour, the supply of which was at present in excess of the demand, and he thought such works would be of the greatest use to an over-populated place, because of all classes of work that could be suggested, that would be the greatest good to the greatest number At present, from there being no road from Guichen Bay to the Mount Gambier District, the produce of that district was taken to Portland, and the Government of Victoria were carrying a tramway towards that district to within 60 miles of the borders of this colony He understood, in fact, that the loss to the revenue in dutiable and excisable articles from stores going to Portland instead of to Guichen Bay was about £4,000 annually He had no doubt the proposition would meet the approval of the House, for it was a part of the country from which a large land revenue would be derived

Mr HAY rose to second the motion with great pleasure, for he considered the large quantities of land sold about Mount Gambier and the prices which it fetched justified such a course It was an evidence that the land was of a superior quality, and much sought after by intending settlers The accounts published weekly of those districts showed that a very rapid advance was being made in population and production He was not personally acquainted with the district, but a short time ago there was a discussion in the House respecting placing a Custom-House in Rivoli Bay He would ask, could not a survey of Rivoli Bay be included in that motion? Although he would not move an amendment to that effect, he thought a survey should be made in both places, but if any hon member took that course he should support it He was sorry the hon mover had mentioned the term tramway in his motion, for he thought a tramway 80 miles long would never be of any great use. In fact, it would be a better course to make a road to enable the settlers to get on the best way they could until a railway was made A survey should, however, be made

Dr WARK would support the motion of the hon member for Victoria, and would corroborate the statements he had made With regard to the nature of the country over which that survey must pass, it was not calculated for a macadamised road for it was flooded in the winter season He thought the claims of Rivoli Bay equal to those of Guichen Bay as a port He considered it in fact a pity that that port had not been taken advantage of instead of Guichen Bay It would cost a large sum of money, and he thought people should know the cost, but he considered the two places were for two different purposes He thought Guichen Bay was a squatter s country, and believed that was a country which would be a long time before it was settled The Mount Gambier district was adapted to the growth of cereals and fruit trees and grass, and from thence to Rivoli Bay the distance was only half the distance to Guichen Bay In Guichen Bay stores were already erected and considerable business was done, and in a short time, with a tramway, the same would be done at Rivoli Bay He thought from two or three years after opening Rivoli Bay as a port, it would become a place of great resort

Mr LINDSAY had great pleasure in supporting the motion, for he thought that by taking the matter up at the present time, there would be a considerable saving in the purchase of the private property required The hon mover spoke of considerable amounts having been received for land sold in that district, he (Mr Lindsay) thought that much of that land ought to have been reserved for the railways that must pass over it From the nature of the country it was impossible to make an ordinary road He regretted the hon mover should have used the word tramway, for a horse-tramway would cost as much as a railway ought to cost There were many railways in America passing over a similar country, which had not cost more than 1,100*l* or 1,200*l* per mile, but if such railways had a horse-track attached to them they could not have been consructed at less than double the actual cost He thought if instructions were given by the Government, lines could be constructed, the cost of which, and the lowness of fares, would approximate to the cost of those American lines

The SPEAKER reminded the hon. gentlemen he was going beyond the question

Mr LINDSAY saw no harm in including Rivoli Bay in the surveys, and the House would have the means of judging whether Rivoli Bay or Guichen Bay would be the best port to select

Mr REYNOLDS rose to move an amendment, and presumed here would be no objection made to it when it was stated Believing it was the object to connect Mount Gambier with the seaboard, he would therefore move that the words "Guichen Bay" be struck out of the 4th line, and that after the words "Mount Gambier" the words, "and the sea-board" be inserted His object in suggesting that alteration arose from the fact, that having visited that district he found the inhabitants of Mount Gambier unanimous in proposing Rivoli Bay It would give the Government an opportunity of surveying the line from Mount Gambier to Rivoli Bay, as well as from Mount Gambier to Guichen Bay, and thus of adopting the best line As it was, there was a good natural road from Mount Gambier to Rivoli Bay, there being only a few miles of sandy beach to cross, but the construction of a tramway 75 miles long would cost a serious sum, which would, perhaps, be hardly warranted under present circumstances At the same time it would be as well to have the line surveyed, for the shorter the line was the more likely was it that a tramway would be constructed He considered it a matter of serious consequence to the agriculturists whether they would transport their produce 40 miles to Rivoli Bay or 75 miles to Guichen Bay He hoped the hon member for Victoria would agree to the amendment he proposed

Mr HAWKER would not object to the amendment provided the intention was not to shelve the question of Guichen Bay The hon member stated that the inhabitants were unanimously in favor of Rivoli Bay being the port He (Mr Hawker) thought it strange under these circumstances that they should have sent a petition to him in favor of Guichen Bay He believed Rivoli Bay was 60 miles from Mount Gambier, but a farmer might lose more by sending wheat to Rivoli Bay than Guichen Bay, as it might go to the bottom He thought a survey of Rivoli Bay necessary

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would suggest that when the question went into Committee the term used should not be "immediate survey," but an "immediate examination" of the country as that would enable a surveyor to point out the most favorable route without incurring the expense and time of a minute survey To survey minutely two lines of that length would be inexpedient altogether

The motion as amended was carried

CAMEL TROOP CARRYING COMPANY

Mr SOLOMON regretted that the motion standing in his name was not in the hands of some one who understood the subject better than himself He was totally ignorant of the necessity of camels in the country Many persons who understood the subject, however, expressed their opinion of their usefulness, and he would therefore move—

"That on Wednesday, the 13th October, the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, for the purpose of considering an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place the sum of £1,200 on the Estimates in aid of the Camel Troop Carrying Company, with a view of enabling that Company to import camels into South Australia, in accordance with the prayer of their petition to that House."

He considered that evidence could be adduced as to the applicability of the animal for the express purposes of the exploration of the interior Sufficient proof had been given by Mr Babbage that horses did not answer the purpose Major Wain had been instructed by the Government of the United States to select camels for State purposes, which proved their belief of their usefulness From the accounts he had read, he believed they were capable, in case of emergency, of living without food or water for seven days, and of carrying burdens of 350 to 600 lbs weight, according to breed That account was confirmed by a statement of Lieutenant Beale, in the New York Tribune of the 29th June last, who started with camels and mules a journey of 1,000 miles They had to carry water for the mules for a-week, but the camels never had even a bucketful given to them He considered those advantages sufficient to induce the House to take the matter into consideration The Company, it was true, was a private Company asking assistance from the Government They asked £1,200, and as an inducement to grant the amount, they would be prepared to permit the Government to select a certain number of the camels, on their arrival, at cost prices He did not know whether he was in order in reading a letter which His Excellency the Governor had written on the subject The hon member was proceeding to read it, when—

The SPEAKER said the hon member must not read any letter from His Excellency in that House

Mr SOLOMON had received a letter from a gentleman in the country, who had had more experience than any other man in the colony as an explorer It was from Mr Arthur Hart, who said he had no objection to his name being placed on the Provisional Committee, but he could not take a share until after harvest (Laughter) That letter showed he was in favour of the scheme. [Several members explained that the hon member was mistaken in the name of the party He was evidently meaning Mr Horrocks] He admitted his mistake, but yet he had evidence from persons really able to judge, who had explored deserts with camels for thousands of miles, and they stated that the camel would be useful in this country, and from their evidence he believed it would be one of the best steps accruing to the colony

Mr NEALES seconded the motion merely because many parties wished the question to be brought before the House. He would, however, reserve his opinion at present

Mr HAWKER opposed the motion, for he could not see the least good likely to result from the introduction of the camel into the colony It was a useful animal in certain parts of the world, but thought it would be no use in exploration, for he had asked Mr Gregory's opinion, who stated that when exploring, had he had camels instead of horses, the party would have lost their lives in consequence of the floods to which the interior was subject For any other purpose than that of exploration he thought it would be nonsense to have the camel in the colony He saw enough in the north when that brute was there belonging to Mr Horrocks As soon as a horse came near it, the smell was enough—he required no spurs—the bit was of no use—no matter what came in the way, stones, or logs, or stumps, or trees, away he went In fact, all in the north considered whether they could not indict Mr Horrocks for a nuisance. If the camel troop marched into King William-street, every coach and every dray would be off They could not hold the horses, and the camel company would have to keep the wives and families of all the drivers who were killed He spoke from what he saw He saw a team of eight bullocks run away, and he, himself, was frightened and ran up a narrow street to escape, for in addition to the dismal noise the nasty brute made, unless you had a thick stick in your hand to defend yourself with he would give a most unpleasant bite In fact an unfortunate blackfellow going along was grabbed at by him Therefore to introduce that species of animal was nonsense The elephant he believed was of great use in India, but he did not know whether he carried a supply of water in his trunk or not The gentleman to whom the hon member (Mr Solomon) alluded was not an explorer, being unfortunately lame, and only able to move about in a spring-cart, but the person he meant was the owner of the camel he (Mr Hawker) had spoken of, and lost his life by it

Mr STRANGWAYS was not opposed to the introduction of camels, but the House must not forget the Company It was a Camel Troop Carrying Company But were the camels to carry the company, or the company to carry the camel troop? When he first saw the notice in the paper he could not understand it, he could make neither head nor tail of it, and could not think that any hon member had got up a company for the purpose of carrying camels But however ignorant the hon member was of camels he was not ignorant of companies He (Mr Strangways) thought if the £1,200 were advanced before the camels arrived, it might all be absorbed in that item common to all companies "preliminary expenses," and the camel would probably never be introduced into this colony by them He had seen camels used in Egypt—they were strange animals, and if imported in large numbers there would be many accidents, for the colonists being unacquainted with their nature and habits many would be lost The camels used in conveying the mail across the Isthmus of Suez carried each six small boxes weighing 60 lbs each, and they performed the journey of 85 miles and back without water, but not without food He thought no such company existed and should oppose the motion

Mr BURFORD said as his name had been used, not by his authority, but by his permission, which amounted to much the same thing, he felt bound to say something, Although he might regret he had not had a little more of the fun that had been going on he had enjoyed what he had witnessed But he wished to know how it was that these animals were so useful in other countries and were yet not likely to be useful in the colony If they were useful in sandy deserts, and if so much sandy desert existed in this colony, he thought they must be useful here Neither did he agree that because horses were frightened at the sight of a solitary camel they would be so when they became common What ought to be considered should be that which was beneficial to the country, and he thought that the object of some hon members was rather to prevent good being done (No no) He saw no reason for alarm, but if it was proved that those animals could not be made useful to the country he should go with those hon members and oppose their introduction

Mr SOLOMON, in reply said, in reference to what had fallen from the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker) as to the unsuitability of the camel for travelling where there was much water, that these notions would be completely dispelled by a quotation he would read from Lieutenant Beame's writings, who might, he considered, be perhaps a better authority on those matters than Mr Gregory (The hon gentleman read the extract which he considered refuted the assertions referred to)

Mr HAWKER had made no allusion to water in his remarks, but to mud (A laugh) What he said was, that Mr Gregory had stated that his horses were up to their bellies in mud, and that if camels had been used, they would have surely lost their lives

Mr SOLOMON had misunderstood him then, but he certainly heard him use the word flood, and where there were floods there must, of a consequence, be water He thought the extract read was a sufficient answer (Laughter) He was glad that the member for Encounter Bay had assented to the expediency of the introduction of the camel, though it were not by the said "Camel Troop Carrying Company" ("No," from Mr Strangways) (Laughter)

Mr STRANGWAYS explained that what he said was, that he opposed the present motion, but that the expediency of introducing the camel might form a separate question for enquiry at another time

Mr SOLOMON—With respect, then, to this "wonderful Company" begged to assure the House that he had no interest in it whatever That the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had exhibited a certain degree of facetiousness at the expense of the Camel Troop Company, and that he had also managed to get the laugh on his own side he could not doubt, and he could very well laugh with him so far as regarded any interest he had in the Company, but this was no argument against the question He thought he could very well leave the matter in the hands of the House to determine as to the validity of the motion All he asked for was enquiry, and he thought the House would be consulting the interests of the country by granting that enquiry

The SPEAKER put the question, and declared the noes had it

Mr SOLOMON called for a division, of which the following is the result —

AYES, 11—The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs MacDermott, Neales, Wark, Bakewell, Burford, Lindsay, Glyde, and Solomon

NOES, 10—The Commissioner of Crown Lands Messrs M'Ellister, Hawker, Cole Young Mildred, Reynolds, Strangways, Townsend, and Duffield

Making a majority of one in favor of the Ayes

Mr STRANGWAYS called the attention of the Speaker to some hon members having voted with the Noes and now appearing in the division list on the other side (The Attorney-General appeared to be one of the gentlemen referred to)

The SPEAKER—Then I will ask them severally (Addressing the Attorney-General)—Did the Attorney-General vote with the Noes?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—I voted on neither side, Sir

REWARD FOR THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD

Mr NEALES, in moving pursuant to notice, "that this House will on Wednesday next, 13th October, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to revive the reward for the discovery of a gold-field, on terms likely to induce a greater number of persons to proceed with an efficient search for the same," said he would not detain the House long, as the motion had been, in some respect, anticipated by that which had been discussed at an earlier period of the day There could be no two opinions as to the beneficial effect which the revival of the reward would have in inducing a greater number of persons to prosecute the search for gold As to the terms those he left for the Government to determine The Commissioner of Crown Lands must be well aware from his extended experience, that the inducements held out for the discovery of gold by reward had not been put on that popular footing which would go far to ensure success

Mr HAWKER seconded the motion cordially There were however so many motions for the House to resolve itself into Committees—the applications for this were so numerous—that he thought the best plan for them to adopt would be to resolve themselves into a Committee at once and never come out of it (Laughter) He fully agreed with the motion of the hon member for the city, and thought it much better that a reward should be offered than that explorations should be made at the public expense

The motion was then put and carried

FERRY AT THE GOOLWA

Mr STRANGWAYS would with permission ask the question of the Commissioner of Public Works which appeared on the notice paper with respect to the House complying with the prayer of the petition of the District Council of Port Elliot and Goolwa for the establishment of a ferry

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that the question had frequently been before the Government on former occasions, and the result of their deliberations was, that whatever sum was subscribed by the inhabitants of Port Elliot and Goolwa in furtherance of the objects of the petition would be doubled by the Government He could only repeat that the Government was still willing to adopt the same course

CAMEL TROOP CARRYING COMPANY

On the motion of Mr SOLOMON, the petition of the Camel Troop Carrying Company was ordered to be printed

SURVEY OF THE VALLEY OF THE STURT

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether he was prepared to support the address to the Governor for a survey of the Valley of the Sturt, as embodied in the lapsed motion which appeared on the notice-paper of yesterday, viz —

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause a survey to be made with a view of ascertaining whether a practicable line of railway may not be found from the east and south-eastern districts down the Valley of the Sturt, so as to make the Glenelg Jetty available for the shipment of the produce of those important districts "

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had no objection, provided that that portion of it were omitted which referred to the Glenelg Jetty

The motion was amended as suggested, and carried

The House then adjourned

WASTE LANDS BILL

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY the Waste Lands Bill was read a first time, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for Wednesday, 20th instant

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

The CHIEF SECRETARY moved the first reading of the Public Works Bill

The Hon Major O HALLORAN stated that he had a petition to present in connection with this Bill, and wished to know whether that was the proper time to present it

The PRESIDENT stated that it was customary to allow Bills transmitted by the Assembly to be read a first time before petitions against them were presented

The Hon Capt SCOTT stated that he understood there were several petitions about to be presented to the House against portions of this Bill, and perhaps under such circumstances the Chief Secretary would put off the second reading for a fortnight or three weeks, in order to enable the country people to present petitions against it

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said if it were the wish of the House that the second reading of the Bill should be postponed he had no objection to accede He therefore moved that the second reading be an Order of the Day for that day month

Carried

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN presented a petition from the Chairman of the Association of District Councils, praying that the second reading of the Public Works Bill might be deferred for some weeks in order to afford the District Councils an opportunity of discussing its provisions The petitioners objected to the Central Road Board being altogether abolished, but as the Chief Secretary had consented to a postponement of the second reading till a reasonable period he would merely move that the petition be received

The Hon Mr MORPHETT seconded the motion, which was carried

The petition was read by the Clerk It dissented from the proposition contained in the Bill to place the Central Road Board under the sole control of the Commissioner of Public Works It was urged that the Public Works Bill had been hastily passed by the Assembly and that a sufficient time had not been allowed for the expression of public opinion in reference to the measure. The memorialists concluded by praying that the second reading of the Bill should be postponed till a sufficient time had elapsed for its consideration

The Hon A FORSTER presented a petition from Francis Duffield, the Chairman of the District Council of Onkaparinga, the prayer being that the Council would not alter the constitution of the Central Road Board

The petition was read by the Clerk of the Council, and stated that although the memorialists approved of the general principles of the Bill, they suggested that there should be no alteration in the constitution of the Central Road Board, such Board carrying out its operations in a highly satisfactory manner, and would probably do so still more if they were supplied with sufficient funds The petition set forth that if the Public Works Bill were passed the requisite publicity would not be afforded to the proceedings of the Central Road Board by the admission of the reporters of the public press The petitioners prayed that there should be no alteration in the constitution of the Central Road Board

The petitions were ordered to be printed

STANDING ORDERS

The Hon Mr MORPHETT gave notice that on the following day he should move the Hon Captain Bagot be elected a member of the Standing Orders Committee in the absence of the Hon John Baker who had been granted leave of absence to proceed to England

COMMENCEMENT OF ACTS

The Hon Mr MORPHETT moved that he have leave to introduce a Bill to fix the time at which Acts passed by the Parliament of South Australia should come into operation The Bill was a very short one, and was very similar to one which had been passed by the Council last session, but which had lapsed in the Assembly He believed it would be admitted that the present Bill was an improvement upon the one introduced last session, the latter portion of which, relating to mere verbiage in Acts of Parliament, had been left out The present Bill simply provided that upon Acts receiving the Governor s assent they should come into operation The Bill was almost a transcript of one which had been passed by the British Parliament and prevented Acts from having retrospective effect

Leave having been granted, the Bill was read a first time, the Hon Mr MORPHETT stating that as the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill by passing a similar measure last session, he would merely move that the second reading be made an Order of the Day for the following day

Carried

JOINT STANDING ORDERS

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved—

"That the Standing Rules and Orders of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, forwarded to this Council by Message from the House of Assembly, be referred to the Standing Orders Committee for their consideration "

The Hon Mr MORPHETT seconded the motion, which was carried

STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The Hon Captain BAGOT moved—

"That the resolution of this Council, passed on 6th October, adopting an address to the Governor on the subject of postal communication with England, be rescinded, and that the following resolution be substituted viz —That it is the opinion of this Council that in consequence of the failure of the contract entered into by the British Government with the European and Australian Mail Company for the conveyance of the Australian mails, it is desirable that the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia should unite in recommending to the Home Government that an arrangement be entered into for the conveyance of a monthly mail to and from Great Britain and Australia, calling off Port Adelaide each way, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to communicate with the Governments of the aforesaid colonies with the view of ascertaining how far they may be disposed to join in such a measure, and, also, that he will take whatever other steps may be found advisable for perfecting this important matter "

The hon gentleman remarked that it was unnecessary to make any remarks upon the motion, as it had been previously assented to by the House, but it had been found necessary to amend it

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN seconded the motion, which was carried

COLONIAL DEFENCES

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, the message of the House of Assembly requesting that permission might be given to the Hon Major O Halloran to give evidence before the Select Committee upon Colonial Defences, was complied with

The latter was read, and ordered to be printed

EAST TORRENS DISTRICT COUNCIL

Mr BARROW asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the correspondence between the East Torrens District Council and the Government was ready to be submitted to the House

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that in consequence of a previous notice by the hon member for Noarlunga he was prepared with the correspondence in question and would lay it on the table

Mr MILDRED said that when he postponed his request for the production of the correspondence on a former occasion it was from his having been given to understand that it was not completed, and he thought now its use would be considerably lessened if it were in the same state.

PETITION FROM THE INHABITANTS OF MITCHAM

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands what course the Government intended to take with respect to the petition from the inhabitants of Mitcham, regarding the withdrawal of a certain section of Government land from sale by auction

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that the section in question had not been thoroughly withdrawn, but withdrawn only for further enquiry

This Bill was, on the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS read a third time and passed

PRINTING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr MILDRED asked that the correspondence between the Government and the East Torrens District Council should be printed, which was agreed to

RECOMMITTAL OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES,

The TREASURER moved that the Speaker do leave the chair, and that the House do go into Committee for the reconsideration in Committee of item No 3 (Public Works, &c) on the Supplementary Estimates for 1858, with a view of considering the question of re-inserting the sum of £5,000 for a Boat Jetty at the Semaphore

Mr REYNOLDS hoped some better reason for the reconsideration of this item would be given before the House consented to it Certainly there had been some plans and estimates laid upon the table, but as this had been a "cooked-up affair" it was not enough to convince him to the contrary If the House voted this sum of £5,000 it would be just another illustration of the practice of inserting the "thin end of the wedge," and instead of the boat jetty costing £5,000 as was estimated, it would swell up to £20,000 If the House agreed to vote the money for this jetty, it would soon be called upon to vote a sum for the construction of a tramway across the Peninsula and then for a further sum to make a stronger bridge than the one now in the course of construction, a bridge which was to cost £4,800, and if they had a tramway, they must of course have a bridge, perhaps at the expense of some £50 000 A great deal had been said about the "threshold of South Australia," and the difficulties which new-comers experienced when they first landed But he wished to know which was the "threshold of South Australia, their South Australian forefathers considered Glenelg rather to be the threshold of South Australia, and was not the commemoration of the colony's twenty-first anniversary celebrated at Glenelg? (Hear) Be that as it might, however, if a person wished to reach Adelaide from the sea, which place offered the greatest convenience? Glenelg of course Why, at the Semaphore there was the difficulty in landing, then if the passenger did not choose to walk through the sand, he had to pay 1s 6d to ride and when on the other side of the Peninsula, he had to pay a further sum to cross the Stream, and, lastly, some 1s or 1s 6d more to get to Adelaide. He would ask them whether it was not much cheaper to land at Glenelg As to the mails being landed at the Semaphore, and that being made an argument in its favor, all he could say was, that if they were landed at Glenelg, they would get them in Adelaide several hours earlier Hon members had argued as if the Semaphore was the only landing-place on the coast, and they also called upon the House to vote a sum of money to provide for the convenience of a few persons who, instead of taking the usual course of coming round to the Port by water, found it pleasanter to land at the Peninsula It was not fair nor just to the country (Hear, and a laugh from the Commissioner of Crown Lands) The Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands laughed The subject no doubt was pleasing to that hon gentleman, no doubt he would like a jetty at the Semaphore and a tramway to reach it, and a bridge at the end of it He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) laughed no doubt "in his sleeve" at the prospect of getting all this—(continued laughter from the Ministerial benches)—but country members must remember that the cost now was not what was to be considered, but the probable cost hereafter The Colonial Architect's estimates, and he had had some experience of them, were not worth much On these grounds he protested against the recommittal of the item

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said this was the third time he had risen to speak on this question, and whether it was to be the last, or the last but one, he could not say The hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) opposed the granting of this sum for a jetty, and instanced it as an illustration of the practice of inserting "the thin end of the wedge," but he assured the House that it could not be considered as the commencement of any attempt to evade enquiry for the purpose of getting a greater amount of money than could be spared He had told the House before that if the jetty could not be constructed for the sum stated it should not be constructed at all, and if they did not take the estimate of the Colonial Architect, they would, he supposed, take the assurance of a Minister of the Crown They had the estimate of the Colonial Architect, that officer generally erred on the other side—that was over-estimating the expense of works - which he considered a very good failing It was so in his estimate for the Court-Houses at Salisbury and Woodside, in fact in most of the works the estimate slightly exceeded the expense Again, the House was told by the hon member for Sturt that the bridge building across the Stream at the Port was too weak, then why, he would ask that hon gentleman, was it not made stronger? (A laugh) Upon whose shoulders did this blame rest? As to the remark about "their forefathers" he (Mr Blyth) landed on Torrens Island, and he believed his forefather landed at the old Port At present the steamers generally came in in the night, but notwithstanding the difficulties which attended the landing of passengers at the Semaphore, involving loss of life (no, no), still it was risked rather than submit to the alternative of going round by the stream He considered there was no place on the whole coast where a jetty was so much required as in this spot and he hoped the House would consent to reconsider this item

Mr REYNOLDS rose to explain with reference to the remark of the Commissioner of Crown Lands that he (Mr Reynolds) had said that the bridge at the Port was too weak What he said was not uttered on his own authority, but on the authority of the hon member for the Port (Mr Hart)

Mr HART had not been converted by the arguments of the hon member for the Sturt, and would therefore support the reconsideration of the item With reference to the bridge, all he could say was, that long before it had been carried to its present extent, he stated that it was not suitable for the purpose But the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) who was then Commissioner of Public Works, maintained that the bridge was sufficient for all purposes, and he (Capt Hart) had every confidence in the then Colonial Architect He considered the great difficulty in connection with this bridge consisted in the fact that the foot of the bridge was placed on private property With respect to the question before the House, he was satisfied a jetty could be erected for the sum named (No, and hear) If it could not there was the pledge of the Commissioner of Public Works that it would not be proceeded with The House had all the information on the subject which it was possible for them to have, and unless the views of the House were those of the hon member for the Sturt, they would see the necessity for this jetty Would any hon member pretend to say that there was a greater, if so great, a traffic on any other portion of the coast as at the Semaphore? If it were so, then he could understand the opposition to the item The hon member for the Sturt had stated the difficulties which had to be overcome in landing at the Semaphore Station, but instead of that being an argument against the construction of a jetty, he thought it was in its favor as it was clear that facilities were needed. But admitting that these difficulties existed, they were increased as respected Glenelg. He remembered when they were days without being able to obtain communication with vessels in the Bay. It was a fact that £40,000 had been spent in land on the Peninsula, which had gone into the public coffers without one shilling having been laid out in return, and would the hon. member for the Sturt talk of Glenelg? Why, the jetty at Glenelg had exhausted more money than was received in the purchase of land within a circuit of a mile of it. On the Peninsula, however, not one shilling had been spent for local purposes. There was the flagstaff, certainly, and the telegraph across the Peninsula, but these were not for the benefit of parties resident on the spot, but for the benefit of Adelaide by the prompt transmission of news from the beach. He would not enlarge, he considered that he had made out a case that he might leave to the good sense of the House.

The SPEAKER then put the recommittal and declared the noes had it.

A division was called for, of which the following was the result:—

AYES, 15—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Treasurer (teller), Messrs. Scammel, Hallett, Hart, Hawker, Solomon, Glyde, MacDermott, Lindsay, Collinson, Shannon, and Burford.

NOES, 10—Messrs. Reynolds (teller), Strangways, Duffield, Peake, Townsend, Wark, Dunn, Cole, Rogers, and Milne.

Making a majority of five in favor of the ayes.

In Committee.

The TREASURER moved the item, viz., £5,000 for the construction of a boat-jetty at the Semaphore.

Agreed to.

The House resumed, the SPEAKER reported, and the consideration of the report was deferred until the next day.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to move the second reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill. He did not know that it was necessary for him to go into an explanation of the provisions of the Bill at length, and he would only make a brief statement, because he believed that the general principles and particular details of the measure were understood, and had met with the cordial concurrence of the House. It had long been a matter of reproach to British jurisprudence and to the laws of this colony, that so great an inequality existed in point of law between the husband and the wife, as also other difficulties in connection with the dissolution of the matrimonial tie. The Legislature of England had brought the matter forward, and had lately adopted a Bill to meet this defect in the law, substantially the same as that he now presented to the House. A copy of that Bill had been forwarded to the Legislature of this colony by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with a recommendation to adopt it. This recommendation did not involve anything imperative upon them; it did not make it absolute upon them to receive it; it was merely a suggestion as to the expediency of having a uniform code of matrimonial law throughout the British colonies. The particular form in which this Bill was presented was to be accounted for by the desire of the Government not to risk the measure by too great emendation, and to thereby secure the immediate assent of Her Majesty to it if passed by that House. Then there were principles in the Bill on which a difference of opinion might exist, that was the different circumstances under which divorce could be obtained. But he looked upon the Bill in this light, that seeing there was a certain amount of good in it, and that there was no certainty of the Bill passing in a greatly altered form, they should be content with it in its present shape. Any alteration made in the Bill should be of such a nature as not to affect the principles of the Bill. The reason that the Government adopted the Bill in its present form was that they did not wish to risk the measure. The Bill on the whole was a decided improvement, but whether that improvement was as great as could be effected was another question. The object of the Bill was to give the Supreme Court power with regard to causes matrimonial, a power which was previously possessed by no Court, but by the Legislature only. This Bill provided that as regarded the wife, adultery only would establish a claim to a divorce, and as regarded the husband, adultery in connection with other aggravated circumstances would constitute a claim for divorce on the part of the wife. The Bill also provided for a judicial separation, in which the wife and her property was protected from the husband by the Court. Under this provision, a wife had the right of judicial separation and the protection of a magistrate for herself and children. Then there was another great improvement in the law in this Bill which did away with that disgrace to the English law—actions for crim. con., by which the husband was vested with the power of trying a question involving the honor of his wife, and in which both the wife and the children might be innocent subjects, whilst they were denied the privilege of being heard in self-defence. It was a means by which a scoundrel devoid of human emotions made a traffic in the honor of his wife merely for the sake of the damages which would be involved in an action, and in which in some cases judgment was allowed to go by default to secure that result. The present measure swept away entirely all this blot upon the law, but although it protected the wife, it did not leave the husband without redress when really deserved. He had not referred to details thinking they might more appropriately come under consideration in Committee. He moved the second reading of the Matrimonial Causes Bill.

Mr. MILNE felt it to be his duty to oppose the Bill, as he thought it was uncalled for. They had been told by the Attorney-General that a recommendation had been forwarded for the adoption of this measure, in order that the matrimonial code throughout the British possessions might be assimilated as nearly as possible, but the House must remember that although a similar law had been passed by the English Parliament, it was confined to that country alone. No other part of the British empire was included, as both Scotland and Ireland were exempt. When this Bill was before the House of Commons, there was a great deal of scriptural argument introduced. He would not, however, in the remarks he was about to make pursue this course, for although he did not hold with the Roman Catholics, that marriage was a sacrament, and indissoluble, still he looked upon it as a question of civil policy whether it should be so or to what extent it should be so. He was inclined to look upon the marriage tie as one for life, and that it would be prejudicial therefore to interfere with it. The English law had hitherto looked upon marriage as to a great extent indissoluble, or how was it that difficulties were presented in the way of divorce, and that special Acts of Parliament were required to be obtained before a separation could be legal. It had been objected to the system that it gave an undue licence to the wealthy. This was a very specious argument, but with respect to the Bill now sought to be introduced, he would ask if the facility given for divorce was likely to improve public morality. Let them look at home and compare the character of those who took advantage of this licence with that of the humbler persons out of whose reach it was, and say whether they did in the point of morality give the preference to the latter. It was a well established fact that the increase of facilities for divorce was productive of evil results. History and continental experience went to prove this. In Prussia, which was a country celebrated for the great facilities which obtained there for divorce, the principle had acted very prejudicially. He would read an extract in support of this. Lord John Manners had said in the House of Commons on this subject:—"What was the case in Prussia. This was the statement of a Roman Catholic priest, who said:—'An act of adultery previously committed forms the ground, almost without exception, of those divorce cases the pleadings in which I have had the perusal of. In consequence of the divorce granted by the Court of law, and of a subsequent remarriage, the adulterous element is successful, and, being for a time followed by no unpleasant consequence to the parties, it obtains, to my great regret, a sort of outward respectability. Cases of second divorce, followed by a third marriage, are not uncommon.'" Then as another illustration he might give the lessons deduced from history. In France, in 1789, incompatibility of temper alone was sufficient to suffice for a claim for divorce. In 1803, this fatal facility was restricted, and in 1816, it was finally abolished and marriage was declared to be indissoluble. A nation retracing its steps was ominous, and that legislature might well consider before they reinstated a law which was found to be prejudicial. Again, in the United States, not only was adultery the subject of divorce, but many circumstances tended to establish a valid claim to divorce, such as physical incapacity, consanguinity, fraudulent contract, idiotcy, and insanity, either party being under age, husband or wife absent three to seven years (which differs in the various States), extreme cruelty, besides in many States applications were frequently made to the Legislature for divorce in cases not provided for by the laws. This was sufficient to show that the Bill would increase the crime for which it provided dissolution of marriage. It would in the event of a married couple not being exactly happy in their lives smooth the path to them for immediate divorce, if they have the boldness to set the laws of God at defiance and violate their marriage vows. It also provided the means for a guilty husband to rid himself of an innocent wife. Although the right of divorce was confined to adultery and aggravated digressions from morality, yet these facilities for divorce would so increase eventually, that like the Spartans of old, they would be able to put away their wives because of their barrenness—or as with the Cretans, because of their fruitfulness. He considered the passing of this Bill would be a serious blow to our social happiness. England had hitherto been looked upon as a country in which the domestic virtues were held in great respect. The word "home" denoted many ties of affection. No doubt many instances of hardship had come under the notice of hon. members, in which either the man or the woman had been badly used. Hon. members had therefore been led away by their feelings. But he looked upon it as a question affecting society at large, and which they must deliberate upon without respect to individual cases. He thought the Bill was uncalled for in a small community like this. There had been no demand for such a measure out of doors. They should wait and see the result of the present Act. He certainly admired those portions of the Bill where redress was given to deserted wives, and relief held out under the judicial separation clause. He thought that in a small community like this it was all that was required. In conclusion the hon. gentleman read the following extracts of speeches made in the House of Commons, in which the opinion of Lord Stowell is quoted as it appeared in the first report of the Royal Commissioners:—"For though, in particular cases, the repugnance of the law to dissolve the obligations of matrimonial cohabitation may operate with great severity upon individuals, yet it must be carefully remembered that the general happiness of the married life is secured by its indissolubility. When people understand that they must live together, except for a very few reasons known to the law, they learn to soften by mutual accommodation that yoke which they know they cannot shake off; they become good husbands and good wives from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives, for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties which it imposes. If it were once understood that upon mutual disgust married persons might be legally separated, many couples, who now pass through the world with mutual comfort, with attention to their common offspring, and to the moral order of civil society, might at this moment have been living in a state of mutual unkindness, in a state of estrangement from their common offspring, and in a state of the most licentious and unreserved immorality. In this case, as in many others, the happiness of some individuals must be sacrificed to the greater and more general good." Was the House prepared to say that all the Divorce Bills, or half of them, which had been passed, had been passed wisely, or that it would not have been better for the parties if there had been no means open to them of obtaining a divorce? How many evils were there in the marriage state which no legislation could touch? He knew a gentleman—one of the most amiable men in the world—whose wife after one or two years of marriage, without any reason whatever, ceased to live with him. No doubt this was a form of insanity, but no Act of Parliament could meet such a case. The question was whether, taking an extended view of human society, it was not for the happiness of the greater number that marriage should be regarded as indissoluble. Suppose a woman preferred another man to her husband, if there were no possibility of divorce she would know that by giving way to that attachment she would condemn herself to disgrace and misery for the rest of her life. But by this Bill and eyed under the present system the prospect of divorce was open to her, and she knew that by going through a certain process she might become the wife of the man whom she preferred to her husband. Under the present system the process was tedious and expensive, and it was just because this Bill proposed to render it more easy that he objected to it. With his objections to divorce he could not bring himself, without much more consideration than time was allowed for, to support the second reading of the Bill. The Government had certainly no reason to be satisfied with the course which this debate had taken, for out of the seven hon. members who had preceded him six had opposed the Bill, and the seventh had only spoken of it with faint praise. (Hear, hear.) The subjoined had been quoted as the testimony of Chancellor Kent:—"Important testimony had been borne against the dissolubility of marriage by Chancellor Kent, the learned commentator upon the laws of the United States. He said it was doubtful whether divorce upon the ground of adultery would not lead to fraud and corruption, and that he had had to deal with many cases where there was reason to believe the sin of adultery had been committed by the husband in order to a divorce. (Hear, hear.) Experience had taught that increased facilities of divorce only increased the tendency to divorce, and the House would do well not to break hastily in a few weeks the most precious link in the chain of social order that bound society together. (Cheers.) In France, in 1789, the revolutionary authorities abolished the old laws of France relative to marriage."

Mr. Lindsay opposed the Bill, but would not agree to the whole of the objections urged by the last speaker. He considered that instead of being a better law than the laws of France and Prussia, it was not so good a one, at least as that of France. Prussian laws he was not so well acquainted with. This Bill, he considered, by the easy means of divorce which were given, offered direct inducement to the committal of adultery. The hon. member for Onkaparinga had referred to the laxity of the law in other countries, but he considered this Bill was infinitely more lax in its principles. By the law under the French Consulate, adultery was punished; but in this Bill, no punishment was provided for it. The adulterer or adulteress there were not permitted to marry each other, but in this Bill there was no such restriction. The French law would not allow any man who kept a mistress in the same house with his wife to sue for a divorce on the charge of adultery; but in this Bill, there was nothing to prevent such a state of things. By the French law fine and imprisonment were inflicted in certain cases, but here there was no punishment whatsoever. In 1816, however, the law of divorce was abolished, and nothing but judicial separation was allowed until 1835. He was not aware that the law had been altered since. With regard to assimilating the laws with those of Britain, that had some weight with him; but they must remember that this law was one confined to England alone; and therefore the Attorney-General's argument was considerably weakened by this fact. If this Bill were withdrawn, and another submitted providing for justice both to man and woman, he should probably support it.

Mr. Strangways opposed the second reading of the Bill. He objected to the principle in it which enabled a Judge to grant a divorce. It had not been explained that this Bill had been called for, or that there was any demand for it out of doors. Under such an Act as that sought to be introduced a difference between man and wife might constitute grounds for divorce. In a country like this he considered it was highly injudicious to throw facilities in the way of increasing that crime which this Bill was intended to do away with. The Attorney-General had stated that one advantage this Bill would possess was this, that no action for crim. con. could be taken, and that scoundrels who had trafficked in their wives' honor would find no facilities under this Bill. He maintained that there were equal facilities under this Act for a great immorality like that referred to. The only difference was in the way in which it was accomplished. This Act would to a great extent interfere with the Roman Catholic creed as to marriage. The members of that creed considering marriage to be indissoluble, would refuse to put themselves under its operation. There was one clause in the Bill which he would like to see passed as a Bill by itself. That was the 6th clause. (Read sixth.) That clause provides that a wife deserted by her husband might apply to a Special Magistrate for a remedy. He believed the Attorney-General had introduced the whole Bill simply because he had heard from hon. members and others out of doors that many cases of hardship had occurred, but he thought that clause enabling a wife to retain possession of her property ought to be adopted. There was another question in regard to the time likely to be necessary in going through the forms of proof of the judicial proceedings required by the Bill. The Attorney-General had not stated that, but had left hon. members to gather what they could from the clauses of the Bill. But any hon. members who could form an idea of the length of the proceedings to obtain judicial separation must be far better acquainted with law than nine-tenths of hon. members were. He had heard that the proceedings would occupy one year and a-half, which, unless in particular cases where disputed issues required the decision of juries, he thought a long time. With regard to the costs, he hoped the Attorney-General would give some idea. He thought the cost of a special Act in each case would be far less than the cost of obtaining a dissolution of marriage under the provisions of the proposed Bill. And one advantage of having to go to that House to obtain a special Act for dissolving a marriage would be that persons would be far less willing to do so than to apply to the Supreme Court; for in the Supreme Court the only publicity of the proceedings would result from the operations under one action, but in the case of an appeal to the Legislature the particular features of all the cases that had been previously decided would be gone into, and that constant recurrence to the particulars of each case would tend to prevent the commission of the crime to which that Bill was intended to give relief. The 12th clause enabled the husband to obtain judicial separation in case of his wife's adultery, but the wife could only obtain a decree of divorce against the husband in case of incestuous adultery, and although a good deal might be said why one law should be made for the husband and another for the wife, the Attorney-General had not given, though no doubt he could give, satisfactory reasons why such a clause should be allowed to pass. He (Mr. Strangways) could not see why the crime in the one case should not be equal to the crime in the other, nor why, if a man was enabled to obtain a divorce from his wife for the crime of simple adultery, the woman might not obtain a divorce from her husband on the same ground. He thought the moral effect of the passing of that Bill would be worse than was generally imagined. It would afford an easy means of dissolving the marriage tie, and was hostile to the religious feelings of a large mass of the community. On those grounds he would move as an amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Peake, with a view of expressing his opinion of the Bill, would second the amendment of the hon. member for Encounter Bay. He would do so because in what he was about to say he should express the feelings of thousands of Roman Catholics—his co-religionists in the colony. He regretted the Bill had not been divided into two portions, and made the subject of two separate Bills, for in that case he could have supported the remedial clauses provided in the Bill for cases of the judicial separation of married persons. Such measures had been long called for, and were simply acts of justice that had been too long delayed, but he was obliged to reject those remedies because of the principles inserted in the Bill, and the damage the passing of it would bring down upon society at no distant date in the colony. He gathered from the Attorney-General that the chief reason why he had introduced that Bill was, that they were invited to follow in the wake of the British Parliament, but was the wisdom of the British Parliament to undo the experience of nineteen centuries of Christian experience in regard to the indissoluble nature of the marriage contract? If they were induced by such argument to do so, the House would act imprudently, and would repent of its precipitate action. Every one must see that the marriage contract was the centre round which the social system revolved, and he for one would hesitate before he allowed that centre to be removed, or the securities by which it was guarded to be withdrawn. At the first institution of marriage man and woman, the Creator proclaimed them to be one flesh, and Christianity in after ages said "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder," but now in the nineteenth century man was assuming the right to do that which Christianity forbids—to separate man and wife For his part, he would never allow any person to dissolve that contract, because he believed nothing less than death ought to have that power He need not quote Lord Stowell's judgment on that subject, the hon member for Onkaparinga having already done so Any Legislature introducing a measure for dissolving the marriage tie was retrograding, and was worse than the ancient legislatures of Greece and Rome In this Bill, one clause empowered a woman to marry three months after being divorced, but in ancient Greece such a step on her part would have stamped her with infamy during the remainder of her life In fact, he considered that Bill would be a step backwards to the follies of ancient Rome, in which marriage in many cases was little better than legal prostitution He would ask what would be the effect of that Bill on society, if passed? Would it tend to increase the sanctity of the marriage contract, or keep families together, or preserve order and good government in those families? He thought those parties, if such existed in England, who expected such results, would be grievously mistaken In the Mauritius, within the last 20 or 30 or 40 years, there had been no less than five different laws of divorce enacted He thought it was Montgomery Martin who said he had been present in a party where there were three wives divorced from one husband, sitting side by side He did not want to see anything of that sort in South Australia, but if an excuse was found for divorcing one, excuses would not be wanting for divorcing two or three more He considered the Bill, if passed, would tend to moral laxity, and give occasion to scandal of all kinds What would be the end if the idea were admitted that married people should be separated if they could not live happy together They would soon find out dislikes and troubles of all kinds, and many would readily grasp at those vicious courses which would enable them to free themselves from the irksomeness of married life He trusted no alteration would be made in those laws under which the domestic relations of Englishmen had grown up and been preserved A man might be divorced from his wife, and a wife from her husband, under this Bill but when the children of such persons went forth into the world they would be considered as bastards by other Christian states, and the parents adulterers throughout the rest of their lives

Mr Bakewell would cordially support the Bill, as it was called for by the condition of the country Most persons knew cases in which great misery existed in consequence of the impossibility of dissolving marriage after crimes had been committed, which rendered it impossible for the parties to live together peaceably afterwards The Bill came recommended by the British Legislature It had passed through that Legislature, in which it had been fairly canvassed by parties more competent than parties in that House to estimate its provisions, it had passed the Commons and the House of Lords and received the Royal assent He thought therefore regard ought to be paid to it on that account, and being generally British people, our habits and social relations did not differ materially from those of England He thought the hon members for Onkaparinga and Encounter Bay had misunderstood the purport of the Bill. It was not to afford facilities to dissolve the marriage contract, for marriage could only be dissolved by the wife on charge of adultery, and on its being proved that the husband had not forgiven the offence—that he went immediately into Court, and that there was no collusion on his part with her paramour Would any man tell him that it was right that a man should be compelled to keep a wife who had been untrue to him? It was shocking! With such a man he could have no common ground of argument The Bill offered no facilities for dissolving the contract for infirmities of temper The only grounds were adultery on the part of the wife, and adultery, with degrading circumstances, on the part of the husband Would it be said that a woman was bound to live with such a man, and to look up to him as a protector? He could have no common ground of argument with such persons It seemed to him that another ground of mistake had been assumed The hon member for Onkaparinga had said that the British law was altogether adverse to divorces, but, in point of fact, that Bill only enabled the poor man to obtain what, before its passing, the rich alone could obtain If a man were prepared to pay £3 000 as the price of a divorce he could always obtain it that was no new law, but the object of the present Bill was to apply the existing law to the case of poor persons, and he said the poor ought to have equal advantages with the rich in that respect The hon member for Encounter Bay had remarked upon the costliness of the process He (Mr Bakewell) thought it probable that for £20 or £30 the suit might be completed The hon member for Burra and Clare spoke as if the Roman Catholic religion did not sanction the dissolution of the marriage tie, but it was well known that the Pope of Rome always arrogated to himself the power to dissolve marriages A hundred cases might be cited from history in support of that assertion, he need only instance that of the Empress Josephine, who was divorced from Napoleon Buonaparte by the Pope In fact, in Roman Catholic countries, marriages were more speedily dissolved than in any other countries in the world Although it was as well to take the Bill in its integrity, there were one or two alterations which would improve it For instance, the Bill did not give power to the Court to secure alimony In many cases, a wife would be fully entitled to judicial separation, and he thought that the Court should have the power to direct a portion of the property of the husband to be secured in payment of alimony In a case that had occurred beneath his own eye, a man and woman had come to the colony and begun life by working hard They got rich and the husband left his wife and lived with a young woman He was living in a prodigal style, and in two or three years the property which the wife had assisted to obtain would be dissipated He thought therefore in cases of judicial separation the Court should have the power of causing the husband to be examined as to his property, so that proper provision might be made for his wife There was also another omission in the Act It only secured to the wife the property that she might acquire after her separation from her husband It only applied to the future It would not protect the wife in the possession of what she had previous to their separation He wished a Bill to be brought in to amend that clause and to render it effective in its operation in the present as well as the future The Act had been passed in Tasmania, it was before the Legislature of Sydney, and was under consideration of the Victorian Parliament, and if the House rejected it, he believed the South Australian would be the only Legislature in the British dominions that did so

Mr Solomon believed the Bill, if passed, would afford facilities for destroying the marriage bond, which ought not to be given He thought, with the hon member for Barossa, that the wife's property, acquired through her exertions, should be secured to her But he thought, if he understood the hon member, he (Mr Bakewell) should have opposed the Bill. Seriously speaking, the Almighty declared that the marriage bond should not be dissolved He thought the Bill was not demanded by the colony, and, if passed, would prove dangerous to its morality It would be an inducement to persons to get up disputes with their wives, and wives with their husbands, for the purpose of obtaining divorces He did not consider that the Bill having passed in Van Diemen's Land, was any recommendation for South Australia, which was much higher in the scale of morality than any of the other colonies He called upon the House to throw the Bill out, and prove, by doing so, the high estimate they had of the morality of the colony

Mr Glyde would support the Bill, for it was not an alteration in the law, but only the bringing it down to the reach of the poor man, whose feelings might be as acute as those of his richer fellow countryman As to the religious scruples of some parties not permitting them to avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill, they had no occasion to do so He thought the 9th clause secured alimony to the wife and he considered it sufficient for the purpose He should object to clause 22nd, which provides that any question might be put in writing by the Judge in any form he liked to put it to the Jury, and should move in Committee that it be struck out He had seen sufficient inconvenience in the colony from such a course Reserving to himself the right to move any amendments that he thought advisable, he should support the second reading of the Bill

Dr Wark had not intended to take any share in the discussion, for he thought the Bill more adapted for consideration by members of the legal profession than by other hon members, for such cases necessarily came more immediately under their notice than under that of others But he was disappointed that the Attorney-General had not advocated the second reading of the Bill with one of those bursts of eloquence with which he sometimes delighted the House Most probably he thought that the Bill having passed the Legislature at home there would be no opposition The hon member for Onkaparinga had said that the provisions of the Bill did not apply to Scotland But there divorce could be obtained by application at the quarter sessions It was therefore only applying the law of Scotland to South Australia so far as that went, but it was doing more It was protecting unprotected women, who might now be abused to any extent whatever, so long as the husband did not violate outward decency In this colony, more than elsewhere, the wife did more than the husband towards obtaining a competency Many persons now possessing many broad acres began with only a small pittance The wife began with a cow or sow, and by washing and hard work she enabled the husband to get a section or two The medical profession which knew the worst secrets, which, although hidden from the world, were the best judges and they could understand the necessity there was for that Bill He was adverse to the Sacred Volume being dragged into discussions, but when it was done, it was essential to quote it correctly The Saviour said, "No man shall put away his wife except for adultery, and if any one put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement in her hand, that she may go and marry again," but by many members, the Supreme Court would be denied that power Such persons would keep persons living in a state of mutual dislike and utter distress, that would never be anything than a source of mischief to them, and a bad example to their children

Mr Barrow, in also supporting the second reading of the Bill, would only address two or three observations to the House. It had been stated that the passing of the Bill would be opposed to the views of the Roman Catholic portion of the community, but it was a sufficient answer to that to say that they were not bound to avail themselves of its provisions But if the Bill dissolving marriage were not to pass because it opposed the views of one class of the community, the House ought not to pass Bills legalizing marriage, unless also in accordance with the views of that portion of the community If there should be uniformity of opinion before a Bill could be passed for dissolving marriage, it was equally requisite in the case of a Bill to celebrate marriage He considered that only where divorces ought to take place would that Bill enable them to be effected The hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) thought it would have been better to effect divorces by means of Acts of the Legislature, but hon gentlemen should recollect that the Governor was prevented from giving his consent to Acts of that description, consequently great delay expense would be necessary before those Acts could be ratified He (Mr Barrow) would like the Attorney-General to state what amendments could be introduced into the Bill, for he thought some amendments might be advisable He thought the 12th clause an unjust one No doubt good reasons might be given for retaining that clause as it was, but yet he believed better could be rendered for altering it, and he should like to see the clause so altered as to place the wife on an equal footing with her husband He considered greater power should to given to the Court to secure payment of alimony than had been made in the Bill with regard to the clause respecting the protection of the property of married women, if there were no other reasons than that for passing the Bill, he should support it It was in evidence before the British Parliament that there had been such heartless cases of desertion and robbery, as to render necessary such remedies as the Bill provided He did not anticipate any immoral effects from the passing of the Bill, and with regard to the protection of the wife's property, he thought it suited to the peculiar condition of society in the colony

The Attorney-General said that in moving the second reading of the Bill he had not anticipated any opposition whatever to its provisions and principles He had, however, presumed too much on the accordance of the experience of every individual with his own, for he knew innumerable cases in which the absence of some such law had been productive of great injustice and cruelty The hon member for Encounter Bay said he (the Attorney-General) had not shewn that any complaint existed with regard to the present law, nor had he shown even an individual instance of suffering He had not done that, and he thought it would not be practicable for anybody to do so without violating that confidence by which he had become possessed of the reasons of the complaint and the desire for a remedy It was not an evil that persons would proclaim to the world—it was one of those matters which, as far as possible, would be concealed in their own breasts, unless compelled to bring it forward, in order to obtain redress for an intolerable injury But he recollected at that moment that in the course of his professional experience in three separate instances he had been asked if it was possible to obtain a Bill of Divorce, and he had been compelled in each case to say that, without an alteration of the law, it was perfectly idle for any person to seek relief or redress in such a matter, because the instructions to His Excellency the Governor positively forbade him to give consent to any Bill that would have the effect of dissolving the marriage between two individuals But when it was said that it would be better for that House, on occasions of that sort, to pass a Bill for dissolving a marriage, and that in order to do that, a person should be compelled publicly to detail the injury he had received, and thus to subject himself to the remarks which might be made in an Assembly like that, the hon member proposing such a remedy would impose upon persons in the colony a burden as heavy to be borne as the peculiar burden from which they sought relief Many persons, under such regulations considering the uncertainty attending such a Bill—for the Legislature would have to discuss each individual Bill on its merits, and according to the circumstances of each individual case and the evidence brought before it—would shrink from seeking redress by such a course In such an enquiry each member of that House must decide according to the circumstances of each particular case He would be bound not to regard general rules, for in any particular case the application of them might not be justified, and therefore persons would seek with reluctance a remedy which he was not sure he might obtain He thought it much better that the conditions on which relief could be attained should be stated, and he thought the right course was to lay down the rules and principles on which it should be granted The hon member who led the opposition on that occasion referred to the laxity of morals which it was alleged prevailed in Prussia He (the Attorney-General) had always great difficulty in availing himself of that class of argument, for although the inhabitants of South Australia were in their own eyes the most moral people in the world, it was possible other people might imagine themselves the same In the same way England, it was said, was the most moral of all countries in the eyes of its own people, but the people of the Continent had a very different idea Their idea was, that the impediments placed between the sexes was productive of much open and concealed vice and was associated with much domestic uneasiness He did not himself believe it, but that was the belief that existed on the Continent and he only named it as the prevalent opinion there But Prussia was a Protestant country, yet facilities of divorce existed there The hon member for Burra and Clare had said that in every country the sanctity of the marriage tie should be fenced round by the difficulty of obtaining a divorce Unfortunately tried by that test, in no countries was that tie so little regarded as in those Prussia had not the reputation of being very moral, but he had heard that such a thing as a breach of the marriage tie was almost unknown But Italy was far otherwise He had a tolerably extensive acquaintance with works describing the state of society in both those countries, and was able therefore to say that Italy was far less moral than Prussia, and therefore testing the moral condition of a country by that one circumstance, the argument would be in favor of granting facilities for divorce, for where those facilities existed, a greater degree of morality existed also With regard to the state of the lower classes in England, every one knew that in innumerable instances wives had been deserted by their husbands, and that in consequence they had been compelled to live in conscious adultery during the best part of their lives, and to bring up families of bastards by law, subjected to the legal and social disabilities that such persons laboured under in England And in South Australia, were there not many persons who, when the gold diggings broke out, left their wives a fortnight or three weeks after marriage and never returned again? And was it to be supposed by any one who had any acquaintance with human nature that such women would live without forming some ties, sanctioned, it might be, by some form of marriage, but still rendering them subject to the consciousness of having broken the law of society Such cases this Bill would provide for, and give an opportunity of freeing them from thraldom, and of beginning again honestly and honorably as free women It was an enactment that no one who was acquainted with the circumstances of the country could doubt of being adapted to them Had he believed he should have found it necessary, he should have been willing to have discussed the subject With regard to the details, anything that could be suggested for the purpose of amending the remedy the Bill was intended to effect and complete he should be glad to discuss and agree to, unless it should appear likely to jeopardize the success of the measure He could agree to a great extent with the hon member for East Torrens, but not in looking at adultery in the husband and wife as equal in its consequences to society or to the feelings of the parties themselves, and while in 99 cases out of 100, a woman from mere adultery would not seek for divorce, he would say in the few exceptional cases it would be a practical injustice for them to be compelled to live with men who had dishonored them He would, however, be sorry to see such a change in the Bill, as might jeopardize its passing And he would, therefore, ask the hon member not to press his opinions He should not object to amendments, but desired that the leading principles of the Bill should be retained He did not know that if altered it would be refused the consent of the Crown, but it might be on the ground of discrepancy of South Australia and the law of England

The House divided on the amendment, when there appeared—

Ayes, 9—Messrs Milne, Peake, Lindsay, Dunn, Andrews, Solomon, Cole, McEllister, and Strangways

Noes, 20—Messrs Mildred, Wark, the Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Burford, Duffield, MacDermott, Glyde, Reynolds, Hallett, Bakewell, Hawker, Hart, Collinson, Hay, Shannon, Rogers, and Barrow

The amendment was consequently lost

The House then went into Committee on the Bill

On clause 1, Act to come into force on the 1st January, 1859

Mr Strangways called attention to the instructions sent by Her Majesty to His Excellency the Governor, which he contended would prevent His Excellency from assenting to the Bill, and therefore would hinder the Bill from coming into operation by the date specified Amongst the Bills from which His Excellency was directed to withhold his assent, were Bills to allow of a divorce between persons united in holy matrimony The hon the Attorney-General would have to tell His Excellency whether this was a Bill of the kind in question, and if so, whether there was any urgent necessity for passing it The hon gentleman had already admitted that there was no urgent necessity

The Attorney-General—All I can say is, that I would advise the Governor to assent to the Bill, and I think the Governor would do so

Clauses 2 3 4, and 5 were agreed to without amendment

On clause 6, wife deserted by her husband may apply to—

Mr Milne said this was a part of the Bill which many hon members besides himself were friendly to He would like to see similar relief afforded in some other cases also, as for instance in a case where a woman had a very drunken husband He was sure there was quite as much hardship entailed in cases of that kind as in cases of divorce

The Attorney-General agreed with the hon gentleman as to the expediency of a law for the purpose of which he had spoken, and he should explain why it was that the Government did not make the Bill as perfect as it might have been Their object was rather to secure a great practical good without any risk of the royal assent being refused because of the

Bill containing any new principles not sanctioned by English legislation, though there were many cases in which a wife should be protected in the possession of her property, which she had perhaps done far more than her husband to accumulate Such cases should, he thought, be met by special legislation, and he therefore trusted the hon member would not press any amendment for the purpose he referred to

Mr Strangways took exception to the words "nearest to the place where the wife is resident" If these words were not explained, they would lead to an immense deal of litigation, which was to be considered the nearest Court—was it the nearest by the road, or the nearest as the crow flies It was essential that the manner in which this point was to be decided should be explained in the Act, for if different judges, lawyers, and magistrates were to settle the matter, they would each give a different decision Again, if a woman could not get to the Local Court within ten days, a thing which might often occur in the outlying districts, she would be deprived of her privilege

The Attorney-General said that when the word "nearest" was used in a legal sense it meant the nearest as the crow flies There might certainly be cases in which two Courts would be equidistant and then he presumed that either of them might be said to be the nearest (Laughter) As to the second objection of the hon member, special magistrates were always appointed with reference to Local Courts of full jurisdiction, so that wherever there was a special magistrate, a Court of this description would also be found

Mr Glyde enquired if a drunken man came home after leaving his wife and being absent for a time, and attempted to take possession of the property by force, what steps the wife could take to protect it

The Attorney-General said the wife would be in the same position as with respect to any other drunken person who might attempt to take the property by force, she could call a policeman and give her husband into custody

The clause was then agreed to, as were also clauses 9, 10, & 11

On clause 12, "On adultery of wife, or incest, &c, of husband, petition for dissolution of marriage may be presented,"

Mr Strangways moved that the clause be struck out He contended that a clause providing for the dissolution of a marriage was uncalled for The hon the Attorney-General had said in his reply that cases in which such a necessity existed occurred, but he had not said so in moving the second reading when hon members could have met the assertion He had great doubt whether there were any cases, or at all events many cases in which a decree for dissolution of marriage should be obtained, and he had no doubt that if the House passed the clause it would create a desire for such a dissolution in cases where no such desire existed now He concurred in what had been said as to the danger of passing this clause, and he believed many hon members had only voted for the Bill because it enabled the Courts to make decrees of judicial separation, although these same gentlemen were opposed to the granting of a divorce a vinculis matrimonii

Mr Peake seconded the motion The sixth clause was necessary and just, but he could not see the necessity of this one He did not see that because they provided a remedy for those married persons who got involved in disagreements and difficulties of that kind that they should endorse the opinion that a marriage was to be dissolved

Mr Lindsay also supported the striking out of the clause but upon different grounds He considered the clause one-sided and unjust, and also imperfect In speaking of such cruelty as without adultery would have entitled her under the ecclesiastical law as heretofore administered in England, it referred to matters which in the colony they would have great difficulty in deciding How were they to ascertain what was the amount of cruelty They should go back to the ecclesiastical law of England to decide the point, but why could they not make laws for themselves and not be compelled to consult those which were kept in some obscure places in England, and of which there was not, perhaps, a copy in the colony

The clause was then put and carried

Mr Reynolds said he had intended to move an amendment for the purpose of putting the woman on the same footing as the man

The Speaker said the clause had been carried

Clauses 13 and 14 were carried without discussion

On clause 15, "dismissal of petition"

Mr Milne called attention to a paragraph of the English Act, which he found was omitted in the Bill He referred to the words "or shall have condoned the adultery" In the following clause also, the same words were omitted

The Attorney-General explained—The reason of the omission was, that by the English Act, a condonation amounted to an absolute pardon, and there had been cases where adultery having been committed by the husband, the wife had on the faith of promises of amendment condoned the offence, and the husband immediately afterwards commenced a course of the greatest cruelty It occurred to him, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that the Bill would be incomplete if a condonation were made an actual bar to proceedings, instead of being made so only in the event of the Court thinking proper that it should be considered so

Mr Milne was not at all satisfied with the explanation

The clause was then put and carried

Clause 16 was agreed to without remark

On clause 17, "alimony"

Mr Glyde thought something was necessary for the protection of men in this clause In the case of men marrying women who possessed property, why should there not be some allowance made to the husband in the event of the wife turning him off? (Much laughter) If all the property, as was common in such cases, was settled on the wife, there should be some provision for the husband in case of separation

The Attorney-General said it was presumed in reference to the relation of husband and wife, that the husband was able to take care of himself (Laughter) He thought that in cases where the property was settled on the wife it was usually done in such a way as to give the husband some reasonable advantages, and he could not see in cases where by agreement between the parties, the property was to be left in the hands of the wife, the House should introduce any novelty into the law

Mr Hay thought the case referred to by the hon member (Mr Glyde) was provided for by the 29th clause

Mr Strangways did not think the explanation of the hon the Attorney General satisfactory The hon member said that where the property was settled on the wife it was usually done in such a way as to give the husband some reasonable advantage Such might be the case in the colony, but in England the property was generally settled on the wife for her life, and the husband only had a life interest in it after her death The hon member (Mr Glyde) had spoken of men who married merely for money, and he (Mr Strangways) thought the hon the Attorney General should give some reason why persons in the unfortunate circumstances of the husbands referred to should be suddenly disappointed

The clause was then put and carried

Clauses 18 to 28, both inclusive, were carried without amendment

On clause 29—"Court may order settlement of property for benefit of innocent party and children of marriage"

Mr Strangways contended that under this clause the Court could only settle the property of the wife upon the children He suggested that the Court should have power to settle the property of the husband also

The Attorney-General replied that it would be hard when a decree was pronounced on account of the adultery of the wife that the husband's property should be settled for her benefit Clause 20 gave sufficient power to the Court [Here the hon member read clause 20] It was only as affecting the children of the marriage that the question became important

Mr Strangways said if the Act was to be only for the benefit of the husband, the explanation would be satisfactory, but where the husband was the guilty party and the wife innocent, the Court would have no power to make a provision for the children

The clause was put and passed

On clause 37, "liberty to parties to marry again"

Mr Milne moved that the words "respective parties" in this clause be struck out, and the words "innocent party" be inserted in their place

Mr Lindsay seconded the amendment It would not be allowed even by the French law of 1803, that the adulterous persons should marry each other Under the French law Dr Lardner could not have married Mrs Heavyside, but by this Bill he could

The House divided on the amendment, when there appeared—

Ayes 6—Mr Strangways, Mr. Dunn, Mr Cole, Mr Lindsay, Mr Glyde, Mr Milne.

Noes 16—The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Dr Wark, Mr Hawker, Mr Hallett, Mr Collinson, Mr Hay, Mr Shannon, Mr Reynolds, Mr Burford, Mr Mildred, Mr Rogers, Mr Barrow, Mr Macdermott

The amendment was therefore lost

The clause was then put and passed without alteration

The remaining clauses were passed without discussion, as was also the preamble

The Attorney-General said he would not at that moment move that the Chairman bring up the report as Mr Bakewell wished for an opportunity of considering what would be the effect of the amendments introduced in the Bill He would therefore not take the Bill out of Committee, but would move that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again, and that the consideration of the report be made an Order of the Day for Thursday next

The motion was agreed to and the House resumed accordingly

Mr Reynolds gave notice that on the recommittal of the Bill, he should move an amendment with the view of striking out the word "incestuous," and one or two other words in clause 12, in order to place the married woman on an equality with her husband

The Treasurer said that as the amendments introduced in this Bill by the Legislative Council were of an important character, he proposed to postpone their consideration until Thursday

Postponed accordingly

EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS REGULATION BILL

The Commissioner of Public Works said the House would remember that at the request of some hon members

the report of the Committee of the whole House on this Bill had not been brought up in order to allow time for the consideration of certain matters connected with the carrying out of the last sentence of the law in the case of the aborigines He (the Commissioner of Public Works) could see no reason for altering his opinion on the subject, as the proposed amendment would only tend to perpetuate a system which he had always looked upon with horror and disgust.

Mr GLYDE said that as it was at his request that the Bill was not taken out of Committee, he should now state that he did not mean to move the amendment of which he had spoken, for he thought his views would be better carried out in another way He thought the members of the Executive could scarcely make up their minds to hang one of these people within the prison walls of a gaol, for the object of punishment was not revenge but to prevent the commission of crime Private executions of the aborigines would not have the effect, and therefore he should not move his amendment

Mr BURFORD, the more he reflected on the matter, the more strongly he felt that there was a decided impropriety in causing those who happened to be inmates of a gaol to be necessarily the spectators of executions It was adding insult to the misfortunes of these men The House knew well that there were a number of short sentenced prisoners in our gaols, and that the fact of their sentences being short showed that their crimes were of a comparatively light character, It was not because they were placed in that unfortunate position —for we were all creatures of circumstances, and these men had not the same education which others enjoyed The men were, in consequence, led into misfortune, and to say that, on that account, they should be compelled to witness executions was not upon moral grounds at all justifiable They were not to be insulted and degraded by such exhibitions As to what the hon the Treasurer had said as to the expense of erecting prisons for the carrying out of executions, it would not be so very great as that hon member supposed There were no gaols at present in the districts to which the Judges would go on circuit and when these gaols were being built, it would not be a great additional expense to build a room in which the executions should take place There might be greater expense incurred in Adelaide, but what was the expense compared with the moral grounds upon which this Bill mainly rested They should consider the prisoners, because they were prisoners, and not attach to them a stigma which they did not deserve He would move that the place of execution be apart from where the prisoners are confined

The SPEAKER—The hon member must move that some clause be recommitted

Mr BURFORD moved that the first clause be recommitted

Mr REYNOLDS had looked at the first clause, and found that it did not bear upon the question Perhaps his fancying so arose from his not being insane as the hon member (Laughter) He (Mr Reynolds) saw nothing in the Bill about the prisoners being spectators of the executions Persons could only be present for that purpose by permission of the Sheriff

Mr PEAKE thought the idea of these public abattoirs for the execution of criminals very disgusting He saw nothing to compel the attendance of prisoners

Mr BURFORD could not see if the executions were to be within the walls of the gaols how the prisoners were to be prevented from witnessing them He knew what it was to be in a prison—(great laughter)—and he knew the prisoners would esteem it rather a treat than otherwise to be allowed to come up to the bars of their cells and stare at the demoralizing exhibition

The motion that the clause be recommitted was then put and lost, without a division

The report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day

Mr PEAKE moved that the House adjourn

Mr ROGERS moved that the notice of motion be proceeded with

Carried

POSTAL COMMUNICATION

Mr ROGERS was about to put the question in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) to lay on the table of this House the average number of letters conveyed weekly betwixt Adelaide, Echunga, Macclesfield, and Strathalbyn , also, between the former place, Woodside, and Mount Torrens "

When the SPEAKER intimated to the hon member that the question was informal No hon member had a right to ask the Attorney-General to lay papers on the table of the House The hon member should move that certain papers be laid upon the table

Mr ROGERS having amended the motion —

Mr MILNE said that he did not rise to oppose the motion, but he thought it only right that some explanation should be given, as it appeared to him that certain parts of the colony were placed in antagonism, and he should like to hear the reasons which had prompted this course

Mr ROGERS said that the residents of the districts asking for the last portion of the returns, he wished to shew that other places not of greater importance enjoyed daily postal communication The residents had memorialised the Postmaster General upon the subject, and he believed the Postmaster had latterly established a daily mail by a branch from Mount Barker, by which the residents got the Saturday papers on Monday but what they wanted was that there should be direct daily communication The hon member referred to the number of stores and public houses at Strathalbyn Macclesfield and Echunga, in support of his argument that they were of sufficient importance to warrant a daily post to them being established

The motion as amended was carried, and upon the motion of Mr MILNE the House adjourned at 25 minutes to 5 o clock till 1 o clock on the following day

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

WEDNESDAY OCTOBER 13.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Mr Morphett, the Hon S Davenport

STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION

The PRESIDENT announced that he had presented to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, the address adopted by the Legislative Council upon the 12th October last, upon the motion of the Hon Captain Bagot, in reference to monthly steam postal communication

THE HON MAJOR O'HALLORAN

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the Clerk of the Council was directed to carry to the Assembly the resolution of the Council giving the Hon Major O Halloran leave to attend a Select Committee of the House of Assembly, for the purpose of giving evidence

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

The Hon Mr MORPHETT moved that the Hon, Captain Bagot be appointed a member of the Standing Orders Committee, in the room of the Hon John Baker, who had obtained leave of absence It was customary to elect members of Committee by ballot, but where a vacancy was created by leave of absence being granted to a member, he believed it was usual to fill up the vacancy by moving that some special member be elected If it were the wish of the Council that the election should take place by ballot, he was quite prepared to assent to that course He might mention to the Council that the Hon Captain Bagot had consented to act as a member of the Standing Orders Committee

The Hon H AYERS seconded the motion

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY had no objection to the election of the Hon Captain Bagot, but did not know whether there was any precedent for the course proposed to be adopted by the hon mover , but if there were no precedent, he should prefer the usual course being adopted

The Hon Mr MORPHETT had not the slightest objection to resort to the ballot if the Hon the Chief Secretary wished , but he assured the hon gentleman that there was a precedent, and that the Council on a former occasion had adopted the mode which he had suggested of filling up a vacancy

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY would offer no opposition if there were a precedent

The motion was carried

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Hon Mr MORPHETT moved the second reading of a Bill to prevent Acts passed by the South Australian Parliament from taking effect prior to the passing thereof The sole object of the Bill was expressed in very succinct language Hon members were doubtless aware that it was the custom of the British Parliament that Bills passed containing no special provision as to the date at which they should take effect, took effect from the first day of the session in which they were passed Some difficulties arose in consequence of this custom, and to get over the difficulty the English Parliament passed a short Act similar to that before the House The Legislative Council of South Australia had got over the difficulty by introducing in each Act a clause stating from what period the Act should take effect When, however, the Bill before the House had been passed, the necessity of introducing a special clause into every Act stating when it would come into operation would be removed The Bill provided that all Acts should come into operation from the date of their passing, unless it were specially mentioned in the Act itself at what date it should come into operation The object of the Bill indeed was so plain, and the Bill itself so simple, that he thought the House could have no difficulty in agreeing to the second reading Hon members would recollect that a similar Bill was introduced last session and passed by the Council, but in consequence of the lateness of the session the Bill lapsed in the Assembly The present Bill was precisely for a similar purpose to that of the preceding Bill, but it was shorter and confined to the one object namely, to provide when all Acts passed by the South Australian Parliament should come into operation The hon the Chief Secretary had come to him to state his views upon one portion of the Bill, upon which he believed the hon gentleman intended to move an amendment, but he (Mr Morphett) would defer his views upon the point till the Bill was in Committee

The Hon Captain SCOTT seconded the motion for the second reading of the Bill, which was carried, and upon the motion of the Hon Mr Morphett the House went into Committee

Upon the first clause being read the Hon Mr Morphett moved that it stand as printed, but stated that the Chief Secretary had suggested an amendment to him by which Bills introduced in the Assembly would be endorsed by the Clerk of the Assembly, and Bills introduced by the Council would be endorsed by the Clerk of the Legislative Council Not being disposed to accede to the proposed amendment he hoped the hon gentleman would not press it Great inconvenience would probably arise if the responsibility of endorsing the Bills were divided between two officers, a division of responsibility was always bad It was the duty of the Clerk of the Upper House to make the endorsements on all Bills, and that practice had been adopted by the British Parliament and by the Legislatures of New South Wales and Victoria In both of the colonies he had named the Clerks of the Legislative Councils made the endorsements It would be much more convenient and secure that there should be only one responsible officer

The Hon the Chief Secretary said the hon mover was in error in supposing that he intended to offer any amendment He believed that the wishes of the Assembly were to the effect that the Clerk of the Assembly should endorse all Bills originated in the Assembly, and that the Clerk of the Council should endorse all Bills originated in the Council It was not usual, he believed, for the Clerk of either House to endorse Bills at home, but the Clerk of the Parliament There was no such office here as Clerk of Parliament

The Hon Mr Morphett remarked that the Clerk of the Parliament was Clerk of the Legislative Council He thought it would be better to let the Bill go in its present form to the Assembly, and if they objected to any of its provisions, the Council would then consider the reasons of the Assembly, and it was possible that those reasons might be so cogent as to induce the Council to give way

The clause was passed as printed, also clause 2, providing that Acts reserved for the royal assent should take effect from the date at which they were so assented to

The Hon Captain Scott quite agreed with the first two clauses, but pointed out that by the third clause there appeared to be a discrepancy between the title of the Bill and the clauses

The Hon Mr Morphett did not think there was any discrepancy, as where the time was fixed in the Act for it to come into operation that provision would of course overcome the provisions of this Bill

The clause was passed as printed, and the Chairman then reported the Bill The report was adopted and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next

The House adjourned at 20 minutes past 2 o'clock till 2 o clock on Tuesday next

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Wednesday, October 13

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

PETITIONS

Mr Neales presented a petition from John Finnis, having reference to the completion of the first volume of the "South Australian Hansard," the prayer of which was that the House would instruct the members of the Administration to take such steps towards an enquiry and an investigation into the case as would ensure substantial justice to the petitioner

The petition was received and read

PRIVATE MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT

Mr Milne, in moving pursuant to notice—

That he have leave to bring in 'a Bill to remove doubts respecting the title of the lessees and purchasers of certain lands and hereditaments situate in South Australia, formerly belonging to Matthew Smillie, Esq and comprised in a certain settlement made on the marriage of William Smillie, Esq, with Eliza Jane Farquharson, and to facilitate the carrying into effect the purposes and intentions thereof,' due notice of which has been given in the Government Gazette'—

Said that all the preliminaries required in such cases had been complied with The property to which this motion referred formerly belonged to Matthew Smillie, Esq, and was comprised in a settlement made on the marriage of Wm Smillie, his son, with Eliza Jane Farquharson A portion of this property formed a great part of the village of Nairne It had been sold under the powers professedly given by the marriage settlement, but when the land was required to be conveyed to the purchasers it was found that there was a legal impediment to the objects contemplated by the settlement The object of his motion now was to carry out the intention embodied in that settlement and it would do an act of justice to a large number of persons who had purchased the land on the faith of having a legal title It was not necessary for him to say more then, as all the allegations contained in the Bill would have to be proved before a Select Committee of the House

Mr Solomon called the attention of the Speaker to the fact of there being "no House"

The hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Mildred) who was entering at the time, completed the quorum

Leave was given to Mr Milne to introduce the Bill

TRANSMISSION OF PRISONERS FROM MOUNT GAMBIER

Mr Peake in moving—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return of all prisoners (the nature of their offences and their sentences) sent from Mount Gambier, Mosquito Plains, and Guichen Bay, from 1st January, 1855, to 1st August, 1858, also, a return of the expenses incurred in the transmission of such prisoners (including police expenses and expense of witnesses) in any case that was committed to Adelaide for trial"—

said he asked for the return because he had authority for believing that there had been a serious waste of public money in the transmission of prisoners in the localities referred to, and that a great amount of crime and injustice was frequently tolerated by the settlers, rather than they would submit to expenses and loss of time attending a prosecution The return would be a useful one, and the object of it was that substantial justice might be done He hoped, therefore, the House would consent to the return being furnished

The Commissioner of Public Works said there could be no objection to the return asked for The attention of Government had been drawn to the matter, and action would be taken to secure what was asked for as soon as possible

SUPREME COURT PROCEDURE AMENDMENT ACT

Mr Strangways moved according to notice—

That he have leave to introduce a Bill to further amend the Supreme Court Procedure Amendment Act, No 5 of 1853."

And said he would simply point out the clauses which he proposed to repeal, and the effect of such repeal In the Supreme Court Procedure Act, No 5 of 1853, he proposed to repeal clause 182, which vested in the Judges of the Supreme Court a power to direct a Jury to find a special verdict, also clause 183, which conferred an arbitrary power upon the Judges to refer any case to arbitration He had referred to the English Common Law Procedure Act, and could find there no similarity in this respect to the law of this colony The effect of the repeal of these clauses would therefore be to assimilate the law in this colony to that at home The Jury would then be compelled to give a verdict in every case, except where the consent of the counsel was obtained, when the Judge might then direct a special verdict to be given This law worked well in England, and, consequently, he could not see why it should not work beneficially here As to clause 183, which referred to the arbitration of cases, this he proposed to repeal and to make provision in its place that where cases arose for arbitration, they should be arbitrated only with the consent of both parties interested He supposed there would be no opposition to the Bill in its present stage and that any objections made to it would be raised at the second reading

Mr Burford called the attention of the Speaker to there being "no House"

The Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was in the visitors' seats, returned to his chair, and formed the quorum

Mr Peake seconded the motion of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways)

Leave was given to introduce the Bill It was read a first time, ordered to be printed, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday, the 20th instant

ROAD BETWEEN CLARE AND MOUNT REMARKABLE

Mr Peake moved—

"That it is desirable that the main road between Clare and Mount Remarkable should be defined as early as possible"—

and said that he tabled the motion in accordance with the request of various inhabitants of Burra and Clare, who were anxious to have the road between those places defined Many persons had purchased lands in those neighbourhoods, and in consequence of the roads not having been defined they were unable to fence their property in He (Mr Peake) had been given to understand on competent authority, that the definition of these roads would involve but little trouble or expense, and he therefore trusted that the Commissioner of Public Works, the Surveyor-General, or whoever the duty devolved upon, would at once take action and get the roads defined as soon as possible

Mr Lindsay supported the motion, and thought it was very extraordinary that such an application should have been found necessary Why the main lines of road were not laid out was perfectly inexplicable Years ago the survey of main roads was deemed so important that the Surveyor General was required to consult the Governor on the subject

The motion was agreed to

EDUCATION ACT

Mr Mildred, pursuant to notice, asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands 'If it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to repeal or amend Act No 20 of 1852, intituled 'An act to promote Education in South Australia'" He said the present Education Act was not of that satisfactory nature to promote education in this colony His Excellency in his address to the House, had told them that an Act to amend the present Education Act was then in the course of preparation. That promise had not been realised as yet. He (Mr. Mildred) was of opinion that the present system, under which education was carried out, was sadly defective; and in proof of this he had heard that the Board of Education had completely discarded the old Act as being perfectly inapplicable. As the present Act was inoperative, he hoped the Government would see the necessity of introducing some better system.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, that whatever defects existed in the Education Act, they were not of that serious nature to have been brought as yet under the notice of the Government. The Government therefore had no intention to introduce any amendment of the existing Act. He considered the Education Act had hitherto worked very beneficially, and that the defects were not of that magnitude as to require a new Act to be introduced.

OFFICE-BEARERS OF MAGILL INSTITUTE.

Mr. WARK said that as the following notice—"That the petition of the office bearers of Magill Institute be taken into consideration, with a view to grant its prayer"—was not correct, he would ask leave to withdraw it, and would give a new notice the next (this) day.

RETURN OF INSOLVENCIES.

Mr. STRANGWAYS, after making, with the permission of the House, some verbal alterations in the following resolution, moved pursuant to notice:—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a numerical return of insolvencies from the 1st of October, 1856, to the 30th September last, showing the date of each insolvency, name of insolvent, occupation, secured liabilities, unsecured liabilities, total liabilities—secured assets, unsecured assets, total assets, gross amount of assets realized by Official Assignee—auctioneer's charges, legal charges, charges paid to accountant out of estate, charges paid accountant out of unclaimed dividend fund, commission and Court fees, net amount realized for division amongst creditors, property re-assigned to insolvent, total amount proved on estate, amount of dividend declared, when dividend declared, remarks (if any). Also, a return of the aggregate amount of cash, bills, and other securities in the hands of, or at the disposal of the Official Assignee on the occasion of the last audit of the accounts of the Commissioner of Insolvency, or other properly authorized officer of Government, showing in what manner the same have been invested, and containing also a detailed account of the several balances to the credit of each estate under the jurisdiction of the Court, forming portions respectively of the aggregate amount so invested. Also, a similar return made up to the 30th September, 1858."—

He said if the House agreed to this return they would have some very valuable information. It was to be inferred that the officers of the Insolvent Court kept their accounts in such a manner that no difficulty would be found in giving the return. In fact he had been informed by persons competent to judge of such matters that no difficulty would arise in preparing the return asked for.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no objection to furnish the return, but he had conferred with the Official Assignee, and he had found that it would take six months to prepare the return asked for, at an expense of £100 in additional salaries. If the House thought it advisable to incur this expense, and thought the value of the return would be commensurate he would offer no opposition.

Mr. STRANGWAYS thought the statement of the Attorney-General, that the return would take six months to prepare at an expense of £100, was a proof of the unsatisfactory manner in which the accounts had been kept, and therefore that there was a necessity for the return. He (Mr. Strangways) had been told that very little difficulty would arise in preparing the return. He hoped the House would not be deterred from consenting to the return on account of the statement of the Attorney-General. He was sure they might get it in a far less time than six months.

Agreed to.

PETITION FROM PORT LINCOLN.

Mr. MACDERMOTT's notice of motion "That the petition of the inhabitants of Port Lincoln be considered, with a view to grant its prayer," was withdrawn as informal.

OFFICERS IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. McELLISTER's motion—"That he will ask the Hon. the Attorney-General (Mr. Hanson) whether there are any regulations in force governing the procedure in investigating charges against subordinate officers in the Civil Service of this colony; and whether these regulations have been acted upon in the case of Sergeant Nolan, recently dismissed from the police force?" lapsed, as that hon. gentleman was not present.

BRIDGE OVER THE REEDY CREEK.

Mr. ROGERS asked the Hon. the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Blyth) the reason why the bridge over the Reedy Creek has not been constructed, for which a sum of £2,000 was voted last session?"

When the money had been voted he thought it should be expended, especially at a time when there was a scarcity of employment.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the work could not be proceeded with except in the summer months, and that was the case of delay hitherto. The time was approaching when they would be in a position to commence it.

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

In Committee.

Clauses 10, 11, and 12 were passed as printed.

Clause 13 was passed with the following amendment, viz., leaving out the words, "and not less than five pounds," in the fifteenth line.

Clause 14, "cattle impounded to be taken to the nearest pound."

Mr. HARVEY moved an amendment in this clause, which should not make it imperative upon a person to take the cattle to the nearest pound in the district. The amendment proposed was to leave out after the words "nearest to the said land," the words "whether such pound be situate within the boundary of the said district or not, or, at his option, at the nearest pound within such boundary."

Mr. YOUNG and Mr. ROGERS supported the amendment.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said this clause had been carefully framed with the view of obviating those difficulties which had prevailed in the former Act. A copy of the Bill had been forwarded to all the Chairmen of the District Councils. The Bill had been considered at a meeting of the Associated Chairmen, and had met with general approval.

Dr. WARK would support the amendment. He had taken the opinion of several District Chairmen, and the only reason they could give in favor of the clause remaining as it was was this, that the District in which the cattle were impounded would then have the benefit of the impoundage fees. He considered the cattle should be impounded at the nearest pound, and he would leave it to the discretion of the Magistrate to decide in cases of dispute.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in preparing this Act the Government had deemed that the best sources from which to obtain information were the Magistrates and the Chairmen of District Councils, who were acquainted with the working of the Act. By both of the foregoing, this measure had been approved, and they were in favor of the clause as it stood at present. If hon. members believed the clause was not an improvement, the Government could have no objection to the amendment proposed.

Mr. MILDRED saw the practical difficulty involved in the clause as it stood. The first part of the clause was sufficient for all purposes. Under this clause an ill-natured man might drive the cattle two or three miles more than he would have any need to do, and in some cases he might be actuated in his motives by the belief that the owner would not be able to recover them before they were sold.

Mr. YOUNG said the amendment was such as would meet the requirements of the country people. There had been considerable difficulty experienced already, but this clause, he considered, rather increased the difficulty than otherwise.

Mr. HARVEY said the majority of his constituents were opposed to the clause in its present form.

The amendment was carried, and the clause was passed as amended.

Clause 15 was passed with the insertion of the words "Municipal Corporation or" in the 2nd, 40th, and 54th line.

Clause 16 was carried.

On clause 17 being put,

Mr. MILDRED proposed to strike out the words "less than two pounds nor"—leaving any penalty under five pounds to the discretion of the magistrates.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it better to fix the minimum as well as the maximum penalty.

Mr. MILDRED considered that sometimes magistrates felt embarrassed at inflicting the minimum penalty when the offence did not deserve so heavy a fine.

Mr. HAY thought the clause better as it stood.

Mr. STRANGWAYS proposed to increase the penalty to ten pounds.

The clause was then carried as printed.

On clause 18 being put, several amendments were proposed, to avoid the necessity of cattle being kept in the pound all night.

The clause was carried as printed.

Clause 19 was carried.

Mr. HAWKER moved that clause 20 be struck out, and the following clause, taken from the Victorian Act, be inserted in its stead:—

"It shall not be lawful for any person to drive any cattle from the land, and out of the herds of any other person, without first giving notice to such last-mentioned person, his overseer or bailiff of the time he intends to drive away such cattle; and any person who shall fail to give such notice as hereby required or who shall enter upon any other person's lands for the purpose of driving any cattle, or shall attempt to drive any cattle without giving such notice, or shall drive away any cattle other than his own, or his master's or employer's from the land, and out of the herds of any other person, shall, on conviction of every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of not less than five nor more than twenty pounds."

That clause applied more especially to runs. Every one knew the detriment that arose from persons driving cattle off a run along with their own. The clause in the Victorian Act prevented what was called "planting." That was driving cattle on to some other run and keeping them there until some reward was offered for them. Hon. members must be aware how detrimental it was to fat cattle to be driven about, and he thought they would agree with the proposition which he had made

The ATTORNEY GENERAL had no objection to the amendment As he understood that proposition it was that no person should drive the cattle of another person off a run without giving notice to the owner of the run He thought it a reasonable proposition He believed that a remedy at present existed, but probably the remedy proposed by the hon member would meet the case better

The amendment was adopted

Mr HAWKER wished to introduce the following clause to follow clause 20 —

Party using cattle without consent of owner

"Any person who shall, without the authority or consent of the owner thereof, work or use any horse, mare gelding, bull, bullock, steer, or heifer, shall for each such offence forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than £1 and not more than £20, together with such sum as the Court at the hearing of the complaint shall adjudge just and reasonable to be paid to the prosecutor or complainant for his compensation and costs in that behalf"

He had given notice of that clause which, under the first draught of the Bill, would have followed clause 17 but in the Bill as amended it properly followed clause 20 He had been requested by his constituents in the south-east districts to introduce it, and he had letters from several parties highly approving of it, because it met what was a serious cause of complaint in the colony Many persons finding horses or cattle, instead of putting them immediately into the pound, took them to work Both stockholders and magistrates wished the clause to be introduced that cattle stealing might be abolished, and that persons making use of cattle not their own, should be punishable

The proposition was carried

On clause 21, giving power to destroy goats pigs, fowls &c, being proposed,

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed that "prohibiting the destruction of those animals by concealed traps," should be added after the word 'poison' in the 20th line for he knew many that had had valuable poultry destroyed by that means He also would propose that in the 25th line, the words, "advertised in any two or more public newspapers," should be added

Dr WARK thought the clause an excellent one He thought a notice on a board might be sufficient

Mr MILDRED proposed that a notice of intention to destroy the animals mentioned in the clause should be posted on the road-side

Mr YOUNG thought the clause very stringent, in fact, too much so It might be applicable to property near the towns, but not to the outlying districts

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the clause had worked well He had had communications with different parties in the colony with reference to impounding cases He thought, if a man kept pigs it was his duty to keep them in a proper place He had heard no complaints except the expense of advertisements, but those who had advertised had found so great advantage to result from it that they did not complain afterwards

Mr GLYDE would ask the Attorney-General a legal opinion without offering him a fee If a neighbour had pigs and he (Mr Glyde) shot them, could his neighbour demand the carcase?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said there was no question but that the neighbour could demand them, but whether he could compel them to be given up he could not say He knew, however, that it would not be lawful for the party shooting them to roast them (Laughter) He (the Attorney-General) had never shot any, but on one occasion he had felt a very strong inclination to do so, for any one having a garden, and seeing 50 or 60 pigs known to be owned by persons who daily turned them out for the purpose of being kept at the expense of their neighbours, could sympathise with his case He thought it better to allow the clause to stand

Mr STRANGWAYS said as the clause stood it would be necessary to advertise in six papers

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL agreed to any two or more being sufficient

Mr HAY thought six hours ought to be allowed after shooting an animal before burying it, to enable the parties owning it to claim the carcase

Mr BARROW scarcely considered it pleasant to leave unburied carcases for six hours in the hot summer sun As to the proposed written notice, it might perhaps be written in German on a slip of note paper Such a publication would be of no use whatever, and thought the clause might stand as printed

Mr NEALES considered concealed traps the best way of taking trespassing animals

The clause with some amendments was carried

Clause 22, prescribing forms of security to poundkeeper on releasing cattle, was carried as printed

On clause 23 being proposed,

Mr BARROW said he was not aware that there was any provision in the Act against mis-describing the marks and brands on cattle

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS would make a note of the suggestion

The clause, to the effect that poundkeepers should post notice at the pound of all cattle under his charge, then passed

On the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the House resumed, and the further consideration of the Bill was made an order of the day for Thursday

GOLD IN THE BARRIER RANGES

Mr REYNOLDS rose to move—

"Consideration in Committee of an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to place on the Estimates a sufficient sum for the purpose of examining the Barrier and Grey Ranges, with the view of testing whether gold exists in paying quantities in those quarters"

The matter was so fully discussed before that he would now only ask the hon the Attorney-General to submit the amendment, of which he had given notice He was afraid £500 might be too small a sum, and he would therefore propose that it be altered to "a sum not exceeding £1,000"

Mr STRANGWAYS asked the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands as to the probability of water being found in sufficient quantities to enable diggers, if they found a goldfield, to wash the earth, for it would be practically useless to discover good auriferous country unless there was sufficient water for this purpose He believed there was, as yet, no information before the House as to whether there was water in the Barrier Ranges, or whether they were in a perfectly barren locality
