Mr GLYDE referred to question 142, in which Mr Baker stated that according to what he understood at the time, the imposition of an assessment would be a breach of faith

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said they must not adopt persons' opinions, unless those opinions were justified by facts Mr Baker said that he understood this rent was to be paid in lieu of the assessment then paid, and so it was, but he had already shown to the House that the assessment might have been altered at any moment by the Legislature Although Mr Baker had said the assessment proposed by the Bill would be a breach of faith, the term was used he presumed as it was often used in that House, when the Government was accused of a breach of faith, it was one of the habits of the Opposition to make such statements, but they had no effect in the absence of any definite argument Mr Jacob said nothing about these pledges from Mr Bonney, neither did Mr Torrens The House did not appoint a Committee in order that such Committee should surrender their judgment to the judgment of others, but the Committee had been appointed that they might collect facts The Committee were not asked to get opinions in reference to inferences from alleged conversations but what they were required to do was to collect facts All that Mr Torrens said was, that from a conversation with Sir Henry Young, certain impressions were created

Mr GLYDE could not allow the Attorney General to dispose of Mr Torrens' evidence in this summary way

The SPEAKER reminded the hon member that he was not in order in interrupting the hon the Attorney-General

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would be sorry to prevent the hon member from pointing out any portions of evidence which he (the Attorney-General) had misunderstood, as if the evidence were different from what he understood it his remarks would, of course be different

Mr GLYDE drew the attention of the hon gentleman to question 191, to which Mr Torrens replied, that he had no hesitation in stating the understanding between the Government and the squatters was, that the rent was to be substituted for the assessment and that the squatters were to be subjected to no other charge except that which was spread over the country at large for the opening up of communication If such evidence were brought forward in the Supreme Court would it not be conclusive?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said no advocate would have a right to bring such evidence before a Jury, as it was based on nothing and consequently could have no weight Mr Torrens formed certain opinions from certain circumstances and that might be a satisfactory reason for his being of the same opinion still, but there was no reason for the Committee agreeing with that opinion unless they ascertained the grounds upon which it was framed The duty of the Committee was to enquire into facts to enable them to form an opinion, but he would say now that no person could have come to the conclusion at which the Committee had arrived with regard to the existence of any such agreement between the Government and the squatters, as alluded to in the report, if they had been familiar with the rules of evidence which should have guided them to a conclusion He had never charged the Committee with any dereliction of duty He differed with the conclusion at which they had arrived, and had attempted to shew the House reasons for that difference, and the House appeared disposed to agree with him in the opinion which he expressed Looking at the result he regretted that other evidence had not been called by the Committee, but there was nothing on the face of that which they had heard which could lead any person to the conclusion that the assessment proposed by the Bill was anything but just and expedient, and warranted by the terms of the lease and the Orders in Council With regard to the alleged compromise he would remark that he thought the present arrangement was one which did not secure the public a fair return for the waste lands of the Crown which were the property of the public, but he believed the assessment which the Government now proposed would secure a fair return, and it was proposed that all those who had taken leases under the Orders in Council should be subject to such assessment during the term of their leases, and he had prepared a clause for that purpose, which he had laid upon the table of the House With regard to the other matters, when, as was proposed by the hon member for Victoria, the valuation of the squatters' runs should be made by officers of the Government, responsible to the Legislature for the time-being the squatters were, he thought, sufficiently guarded against being turned out at the termination of their leases, and the public were secured in having a fair valuation placed upon the runs He should be prepared to support the amendments of the hon member, though not in all their details but in their general spirit, thinking they had been conceived in a candid and just spirit Every hon member would have an opportunity of stating where and to what extent he considered they required amendment This he repeated, that the Government of the day had a desire to secure a fair compensation to the public for the land occupied by the squatters, and would secure the squatters a right of renewal if a guarantee were given that the public would have a fair value for the land at the end of the present term

Mr STRANGWAYS said the Attorney General had stated that the squatters did not contribute such a revenue as ought to be derived from the waste lands, and that of itself he thought was an admission that an arrangement had been made Yet, notwithstanding this, the Attorney-General called upon the House to say that it was expedient that arrangement should be set aside to enable the country to derive a fair and proper revenue from the waste lands of the Crown That, however, was not the question, but the question was, whether there was ever such an arrangement made between the Government and the squatters as was alleged by the squatters had been made, and which the Government did not directly deny had been made They were told that Mr Bonney was "a tool" of the Government, and that he was consequently worth nothing, as "bad workmen always blamed their tools" It was true that Mr Bonney was a subordinate officer, but his statements in that House showed that there was an understanding between the Government and their executive officer, Mr Bonney There was proof of an understanding, that there should be no assessment on stock except for local purposes The House was now called upon to declare by this Bill that it was expedient there should be an assessment on stock, but he thought not The view he took of the case was that a bargain had been made by the Government on the one hand and the squatters on the other A valuation was made which was fair at the time, but circumstances had since changed and what was fair then was not considered fair now He believed that for runs in the immediate neighborhood of Adelaide 10s or 20s per square mile was an inadequate rental, but for many runs in the interior this would be the full value He believed that a bargain had been made, and whether good or bad it should be adhered to On that principle he opposed the Bill and should continue to oppose it, unless the clauses suggested by the hon member for Victoria, as the representative of the squatters and which he believed the majority of the squatters desired to accept, were acceded to so that no imputation of repudiation upon any member of that House would be involved He had great doubts, however, as to the advisability of many of the amendments, and he should like to hear the hon member for Victoria explain their full nature and effects At present he did did not think they would prove beneficial either to the squatters or to the country, but he looked for information, and he wished the Attorney-General would state distinctly what course the Government intended to pursue with reference to this Bill Was the hon gentleman, as he frequently was, open to conviction, and, after ascertaining the views of hon members, did he intend to mould the Bill accordingly? Were the Government prepared to state what portion of the amendments of the hon member for Victoria they would adopt or introduce In fact, would the Government state what their views were, and what shape they wished the Bill to assume before it was taken out of Committee

The ATTORNEY GENERAL felt almost ashamed at being called upon to reply to such remarks The hon member had stated that there was an admission of an arrangement between the Government and the squatters, why, of course there was, for there was the lease That was the arrangement The whole basis of the argument was that arrangement The present Bill indeed was merely carrying out that arrangement The Government would consider any amendments which might be proposed, and when they had considered them, they would state what their views were respecting them

Mr BURFORD said he had no opportunity on a recent occasion, when the subject of a compact and compromise was under discussion, of expressing his views, but this was the first time in his colonial life that he had caught the Government endeavoring to form a compact with one branch of the community for the purpose of carrying out a favorite measure This, however, was evidently the case in this instance The question was most momentous, and there was a diversity of opinion upon it, some proclaiming the proposed assessment just, and others unjust The Government determined to carry their point, and had resorted to the most unconstitutional course of forming a compact between themselves and the particular branch to be affected by this Bill Would not this be quoted against them on a future occasion? If they allowed a compact with a solitary branch of the community for the purpose of accomplishing certain ends would they not be laid open to the charge in reference to future legislation? With reference to the rent being a substitution for the assessment, that was a course which had been suggested, and there must have been some reason for the suggestion that the rent should act as a commutation of the assessment He could not imagine any other reason than that the assessment was found to be burdensome, and that the rent would be much more easily borne From what he had heard in reference to years gone by he believed that the assessment was found intolerable, but he should like to be informed upon the point by those more cognizant of the matter The question then was whether they would be acting wisely by going back to the assessment, which, it would be observed, was to be in addition to the rent Although there were many rich squatters, there were, he believed, many poor ones, who found enough to do to make both ends meet He was quite sure that this assessment would be found as hard to bear by many squatters as it had been by those of former days It would not operate equally in all directions So great a difference was there in the quality of runs that some would bear four times as much stock as others The House had an important duty to perform in looking closely to this matter Although the Government had succeeded in carrying the second reading, they had done so by entering into a compact with the class who would be affected by this Bill, and the House would not be doing its duty unless it scrutinised this contract in all its bearings It was a most important question, for it should be remembered that the runs were not to be subjected to an annual valuation The House had great responsibility, and the more he thought upon the subject the greater the responsibility appeared in connection with this suggested compromise The House would not be discharging its duty unless it went carefully into the matter

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the House had spent four or five days in discussing the principle of this measure, a good deal of acrimony had been displayed in the discussion, and the whole subject had been torn to pieces and thoroughly sifted He therefore thought that at present the House were engaged in a most unprofitable waste of time The discussion could lead to no useful result The House had assented to the second reading of the Bill, and had therefore declared an opinion that the Bill should be proceeded with The object of the Bill was to derive a more adequate return from Crown Lands than had hitherto been derived, and as to the serious responsibility which had been spoken of by the hon member for the city (Mr Burford), that responsibility should be grappled with This, however, could not be done by profitless discussion, but if the House got into the clauses they could then grapple with the difficulties as they presented themselves He hoped there would be no further waste of time

Mr, STRANGWAYS said if the law upon this subject were so clearly distinct there was no necessity for any further legislation upon the subject, and he was surprised that the Attorney-General who was so opposed to superfluous legislation, should have introduced a clause professedly for the purpose of settling the question

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member probably knew that different parties looked at the same subject in different views He believed the hon member could raise a question upon anything, and it was therefore desirable that the clause referred to should stand for the purpose of removing all doubts

The first clause was assented to, being amended at the suggestion of the Attorney-General, by the words after "constituted" being omitted, and the insertion of the words "assessment in manner hereinafter provided"

Mr HAWKER said he had a few amendments to propose on the clause introduced by the Attorney General [The hon member here read the amendments] He had not taken part in the previous debate, as he understood it was the intention of the House to proceed to a final settlement, and pass a Bill which would be satisfactory alike to the squatters and the public at large Since the second reading, he had given his most careful attention to the Bill, and he thought he would be able to show that the amendments which he proposed would offer a more satisfactory mode of getting at the value of the land, and bring in a larger rent than the clauses of the hon the Attorney-General

Mr SOLOMON said some alterations which could not be understood had evidently taken place since the House last met to discuss this subject—(hear, hear)—and he should, therefore, move that the House report progress, and that the Chairman ask leave to sit again He could not conceive why those hon members who were favorable to the assessment should be called upon to enter into an arrangement, the effect and force of which they could not possibly know without further consideration

Mr STRANGWAYS would support the postponement He merely rose to suggest that the hon the Attorney-General and the hon member for Victoria, who appeared to have taken charge of the Bill on behalf of the squatters—(a laugh) —should agree to an amended print of the Bill which should be laid before the House as soon as possible There were now three sets of amendments before the House, —one by the hon the Attorney-General, another by the hon member for Victoria, and the third a combination of the two, and it was impossible for hon members in consequence to make head or tail of the Bill

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had intended to propose that the amendments pro forma should be agreed to, and that the whole should be then printed and brought before the House on a future occasion By that means he hoped to obtain many valuable suggestions during the discussion The alteration proposed by the hon member for Victoria would not affect the principle of the clause in any way; it was merely an alteration of phraseology. Before the Bill assumed the form in which the assent of the House would be asked to it, it was better that it should be discussed and that hon. members should see the new clauses.

Mr. Townsend said that whilst the hon. member might be conscious that the newly proposed clauses were similar, the House was not so, as hon. members had no copies of the proposed amendments. For settling this question everything should be laid before the House in print.

Mr. Barrow said it appeared that the House was at that moment in the hands of the hon. the Attorney-General and the hon. member for Victoria. He (Mr. Barrow) could not understand the matter, and was therefore unable to vote in favor of either proposition. It would be well if the hon. the Attorney-General and the hon. member for Victoria could come to an understanding, so that those hon. members, seeing that the settlement of the matter was undertaken by themselves, might not appear to be in opposition to each other. The House would then understand what was the business before it. As matters stood, amendment after amendment was proposed, until hon. members really found it difficult to know what they were discussing.

Mr. Solomon said that, in moving that the House resume, he had no object in view, but that hon. members should understand what was before them. He acknowledged that he was stupid upon the matter, and he believed every other hon. member would do the same. They had now a new clause before them, moved by the hon. the Attorney-General, with which he (Mr. Solomon) was satisfied, and on this, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Victoria which he could not understand, and which he believed was the case of every hon. member present. It might turn out that the amendment of the hon. member for Victoria was as good as that of the hon. the Attorney-General, but the House could not do justice to the propositions unless they had them in print.

Mr. Macdermott would have no objection to the postponement, provided the print of the new Bill would be accepted in lieu of the present Bill, and that the new Bill would not have to go through all the stages already passed through by the present measure, which would involve a great loss of time. He admitted the force of the objections against the amendments, the whole of which could not be understood unless they were seen in print. With the understanding that the print of the new Bill should be accepted in lieu of the present measure, he would support the postponement.

Mr. Strangways asked whether the hon. the Attorney-General could not act in this case as he had done in the case of the District Councils Act, viz., to bring in an amended print of the Bill, in which the hon. the Attorney-General and the hon. member for Victoria could introduce any amendments they pleased, and which would take the place of the present Bill.

The Attorney-General said the Government did not think it desirable in the first instance to introduce the clause proposed by the hon. member for Victoria, though they were, themselves, prepared to propose clauses and to construct others. He thought the better way would be not to go into the clauses proposed by the Government until the House had disposed of those of the hon. member (Mr. Hawker). There were some portions of that hon. member's amendments which he (the Attorney-General) was not prepared to agree to, as for instance, the allowing of compensation for the value of improvements (hear, hear), although at the same time he was prepared to discuss the point. He believed the clause on the whole was a good one for the public, and that it secured their rights; but there were details in it which the Government were not prepared to support. What he proposed was that the opinion of the House should be taken on all these points, and the Bill, with its amendments, printed and discussed.

Mr. Hawker thought there was great force in the objection of the hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon). The only reason why his (Mr. Hawker's) amendment, and that of the hon. the Attorney-General clashed, was that he (Mr. Hawker) had not seen the clause prepared by the Attorney-General until just before the House sat. He believed the proposition of the hon. member met his (Mr. Hawker's) objection. It was better than his own first and second amendments, and on going through the latter he found there were many points in which they required alteration. He would therefore gladly assent to a postponement, and would have an amendment ready on the following day, or if the House considered that too soon, on Tuesday.

Mr. Glyde would support the adjournment. There appeared to be some bargaining going on between the Government and the squatters, and if so he wished to have the bargain made fairly, and to let the House see and be prepared to discuss the amendments. He did not wish to see the hon. member (Mr. Hawker) and the Government laying their heads together and bringing up amendments of which the House knew nothing. If the Attorney-General and the hon. member for Victoria were to make a bargain, let it be done openly, and let the House see it in print.

The amendment, "that the Chairman report progress, &c." was then put and carried without a division.

The House accordingly resumed, and the Chairman having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again on Wednesday.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES BILL.

The Attorney-General moved that the Bill entitled "An Act to define the privileges of Parliament" be read a second time. It would be in the recollection of hon. members that while the Standing Orders were under discussion, a great many questions were raised with regard to the possession by the House of privileges which would enable it to deal with matters not taking place within the walls, nor during the sitting of the House. It was then requested of the Government that a Bill defining the privileges of the House, and conferring such as were requisite, should be prepared and laid upon the table. In accordance with that request he (the Attorney-General) had prepared the present Bill. He had done so for the purpose of including all matters within the range of the privileges which the House should possess and define carefully, and he believed it would be found that if the Bill erred at all it was in including more than was necessary for the House, or rather for the Parliament to confer upon itself, rather than in any privilege being left out which it was important the House should possess. One of the most important functions of the Legislature—one upon the due exercise of which its usefulness in a great degree depended was the appointment of Committees from year to year, for the purpose of instituting enquiries into all matters affecting the public interest, and taking such evidence, verbal and documentary, as was necessary to guide the House in legislating upon the various subjects which might come before it. Under both aspects this power of taking evidence, whether by examining witnesses or inspecting documents, was of the last importance. The particular occasion occurring in another province, which showed the necessity of passing this law, arose out of a desire on the part of the Legislature of that province to enquire into certain great abuses which existed in the public service. The Legislature of that province—Tasmania—attempted to obtain evidence on the subject, and the attempt was met by a refusal to produce certain books and papers which it was necessary to obtain. Subsequently, the assertion by the Legislature of what it conceived to be its inherent privileges, resulted in a decision of the Privy Council that no such inherent privileges existed. It was of the utmost importance that that House, which was the ultimate protection of every member of the community against abuses, and the guardian of the public purse and property, both of which were likely to be embezzled or abused, should possess those privileges which the Bill sought to confer. He was not unaware of the necessity that such great privileges as the House required should be so defined that they did not interfere with personal liberty, and he would be happy to listen to suggestions from any quarter calculated to secure this object; but that such powers should be possessed by the House there could be no doubt. In all matters upon which the House conceived that it was necessary to have information, either with a view to remove abuses or to improve the general legislation of the province, all the evidence which it might require should be placed at its disposal. The Legislature should therefore have the power of compelling the attendance of persons possessing information. It should have the power possessed by every Court of Justice in the colony; and there was no Court which decided even the smallest matters between two individuals which could not compel witnesses to attend and bring to Court such documents as the Court might require. Whether such documents should be produced was a question for consideration, as there were circumstances which freed a person from producing them. The Courts had certain rules on this point, but he (the Attorney-General) imagined that these rules would be recognised as well by the House or the Committee which it might appoint. But there should be a power of punishing every person who disobeyed the order of the House. He presumed no person would dispute that it was necessary that the House should possess the power of compelling witnesses to answer relevant questions, and it would be strange, indeed, if a Committee were to call a public officer before it, and in consequence of there being no power to compel him to give evidence, he should remain mute. With regard to many other matters in the Bill, it might be that there was no reasonable prospect of a necessity for exercising the powers conferred. The colony might be very far from the day when any attempt would be made to increase the Legislature. But even the most peacefully disposed people might be turned aside by party violence, or promises of bribes or rewards. But, whilst relying on the good sense and good feeling of the people of this colony, that they would not avail themselves of any means of the sort to influence their representatives, still a time of excitement might arise, when this most peaceful and orderly community would be brought to a state in which violence would be resorted to which would be shrunk from in calmer moments. He did not anticipate any objection with regard to the principle of the various classes of offences which it was proposed to give the Legislature the power of punishing. It might be considered necessary to guard these powers in a way which was not provided for, or to limit the power of the Legislature or the Committees, but there was one safeguard provided that except for offences committed in the House in the sight and presence of the Speaker, and which disturbed the House, there was no means of punishment except by resolution of the House obtained in the ordinary way. There was therefore no fear of impulsive action on the part of a Committee or of the House itself, because whatever had to be done in order to punish the individual guilty of any one of these offences, could only be done by resolution of the House properly moved and agreed to. With regard to the manner in which the powers should be carried out he fancied no discussion would arise. He did not know that it was necessary to say anything more. He believed hon members generally would agree in the expediency of including all the offences named in the Bill, and he (the Attorney-General) on the part of the Government was prepared to listen to and accept any suggestions which might appear calculated to guard the rights of individuals whilst maintaining the privileges of Parliament.

Mr STRANGWAYS thought there were many provisions of the Bill which with slight modifications would prove very useful, but he had a strong objection to confer upon the House a power by which any offence which was considered a breach of privilege, however small the offence, would be summarily punished. The offences were enumerated in the fourth clause, and he (Mr Strangways) was of opinion that no person should be punished for those offences by the House, but should be handed over to the regular tribunals to be dealt with in the ordinary manner. As the hon the Attorney General had observed, troublous times might arise, and to give power to punish any individual merely, perhaps, because he might be opposed to the Government—(a laugh)—and to incarcerate such a person in a common gaol would be unreasonable. He (Mr Strangways) might get into a scrape in that way himself. Again, in the 3rd clause it was provided that the Speaker's order was a sufficient return to a writ of habeas corpus. In this young community he (Mr Strangways) objected to such a provision. Then both Houses of Parliament had the power of punishing in a summary way any person, whether a member or otherwise refusing to attend on an order of either House, so that if an hon member refused to obey a call of the House he might be incarcerated in the common gaol. He found in "May" that though the power of imprisonment for non-attendance existed it had never been exercised, and he would ask whether that House should have a power which was not exercised by the House of Commons. (The hon member here read a few lines from "May" in corroboration of his statement.) He presumed there was no compulsory process here by which a member could be made to vote. The 11th clause, which referred to a Suspension Act, was very important, but with some others would be more properly considered in Committee. But a Privilege Act should refer to other matters than these. Some 15 or 18 months ago a very important discussion took place in the Legislature on this subject, and the hon the Attorney-General then laid down as the basis of his argument that all the privileges of the House of Commons existed in that House (the Assembly) by analogy. (Laughter from the Attorney-General.) He did not remember precisely what the hon the Attorney-General said, or what the reports in the press made the hon member say.

The TREASURER enquired whether the hon member was in order.

The SPEAKER replied it was in order to refer to a debate of a previous session.

Mr STRANGWAYS knew he was in order, as he was referring to a matter which appeared in a Blue-book, and if the House took the extraordinary course of having all its debates printed in Blue books, hon members would be entitled to quote them. The question last session was whether that House had the sole authority in money votes, and the House decided that it had, but a case was afterwards decided in the Privy Council, and doubts arose as to the correctness of the previous decision. (No, no.) His (Mr Strangways') own opinion was that the powers of the Assembly and the Council were co-extensive, and would continue so until they were limited by a privilege Act. ("No, no.") The 30th clause of the Constitution Act was very clear on the point ("No, no," from the Attorney General.) He (Mr Strangways) knew the construction which the hon the Attorney-General put upon the clause, but his (Mr Strangways') view of the matter was that the power of the Legislature in defining its privileges was analogous to the powers of District Councils or Corporations in making bye-laws, and that until the bye-laws were made the Councils or Corporations had no powers under them. He would, therefore, ask the hon the Attorney General whether it would not have been desirable to introduce clauses defining what were the privileges of one House of the Legislature with respect to the other, and so prevent the difficulties which were likely to arise on money matters and on money matters only. He presumed the hon the Attorney-General would have no objection to assimilate the Act with the practise of the House of Commons. As he objected to the House having a power of incarcerating any person in a summary manner, if the Government did not press that portion of the Bill he should support the measure, otherwise he should oppose it.

Mr BURFORD must confess his astonishment at not seeing the matters which had been mentioned by the last speaker introduced in the Bill. There was so strong a feeling on the part of the Legislature that the privileges of both Houses should be defined, that he was astonished it had not been noticed. Whatever might be the feeling of other hon members, he thought that the necessity was not less now than it was last year for a clear statement of the privileges appertaining to both branches of the Legislature, and this could not be given unless in a Bill. It was distinctly laid down that there should be an Act whereby the privileges of each House should be laid down, and the necessity for this was recognised by all parties. The House might perhaps be called to another battle unless such a step was taken. They had been in a quiescent state for some time, because one branch of the Legislature had yielded to the other, and that as a matter of courtesy rather than of right. He hoped some such clause as he referred to would be introduced, so that the Legislature might have no disagreeable clashing.

Mr SOLOMON had objections to various clauses in the Bill, although he believed it highly proper that the privileges of the House should be defined. He regretted that the hon member who had spoken last had referred to the vexed question of privilege—(hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches)—for although there was no law by which the privileges of Parliament were defined, still the members of the Upper House had tacitly admitted the Assembly's superiority, and therefore it was a pity that the subject should be reopened. There was one clause in the Bill which he (Mr Solomon) considered very objectionable, unless it was better defined than it now appeared to be. The first clause compelled the attendance of any person summoned, together with any books, documents &c, in his possession which might be required, and as this clause affected individuals he objected to it. It might be that there were inquisitive gentlemen on a Committee, and that they would like to see his (Mr Solomon's) private ledger, and they might call on him to produce it. He did not think the House had any right to call for papers unless they related to matters affecting the public interest. He would propose the addition of words to that effect. Otherwise private letters, documents, and papers might be called for to which the House had no right at all. He hoped the hon the Attorney-General would define what was meant by books, papers, and documents, and then he (Mr Solomon) would support the second reading.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that what he had stated in introducing the measure was, that he was quite prepared to consider any suggestions calculated to reconcile the privileges of the House with the rights of individuals, although he was of opinion that the present Bill was not opposed to the rights of the subject. With reference to the observations of the hon member for Encounter Bay when that hon member said that the Bill claimed privileges not belonging to the House of Commons, inasmuch as it claimed the privilege of imprisoning in Gaols, did that hon member remember the case of Sir Francis Burdett when the Sergeant-at-Arms under the authority of the Speaker's warrant and assisted by the soldiers, broke into his (Sir F Burdett's) house, arrested him and confined him in the Tower.

Mr STRANGWAYS explained that he spoke of members being called to attend in their places in the House.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said if the hon member alluded to a call of the House, the Bill did not propose to give the House any privilege in that case as it was provided for in the Standing Orders. When the hon member said the Bill did away with the Habeas Corpus Act, he (the Attorney-General) replied that a Speaker's warrant of the House of Commons was a sufficient return to a writ of habeas corpus. With regard to dealing in a summary way, surely the supreme Legislature of the province ought not to be in an inferior position to an inferior court of law, and every court of law in the province had the power of dealing with a contempt of its own authority.

The motion for the second reading was then put and carried without a division.

The House then went into Committee on the Bill.

On clause 1, authorizing either House, or a Committee, to send for persons or papers.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if any means could be found of limiting this power in such a way as not to prevent the power being exercised where a necessity arose he would agree to it. But the House was not legislating for to-day or to-morrow, but they trusted for a series of years. He would remind the Committee that cases had arisen in England where charges were made of private firms being connected with large frauds in the Custom-House, and in such cases a Committee would have the right of calling for books. It would of course be very improper for a Committee or for the House, under the guise of a public procedure as it would also be for the Supreme Court, to pry into private matters. But the Supreme Court could compel persons to attend with books or documents, and if the persons objected to the books or documents being looked into, it would be for the Judge to say whether they should be examined or not, and the courts would not require a disclosure of matters not affecting the public interest. He thought they might safely trust to the Legislature and its Committees to exercise the same discretion. He would not press the clause if any suggestion was made for limiting in a harmless way the power proposed to be conferred. But it was no more than that of any of the courts of justice, and there was no more fear of its being abused than there was of that of the courts of justice.

Mr SOLOMON agreed that the Supreme Court had the power of calling for books, but only where the person was interested in the cause. He would propose the addition of the words, "relating to any matter in which the public interests are concerned."

Mr STRANGWAYS would like to be informed how a Committee summoning a person to produce books could know whether the public were interested or not They must have the documents to show He would propose to amend the clause in a separate clause, protecting persons giving evidence, and enabling them to refuse producing documents on giving some specific reason, upon which the Chairman should report the reason to the House, and then it would rest with the Speaker, on the instruction of the House, to order the production of the documents A Committee might be composed of inquisitive persons There might be another Wine and Beer Licence Committee, whose enquiries would be of no public benefit, though amusing to the members of the Committee (Laughter) With regard to the remarks of the hon the Attorney-General, that the power was only the same as that exercised by the Supreme Court, the difference was that the Supreme Court was presided over by a Judge, who was in the constant practice of deciding questions of relevancy or irrelevancy, whilst Committees were composed of members of the House who had only sat four or five times, unless, indeed, they were like the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) who was desirous of being 'used up' on Committees and consequently, they forgot in one session all they had learned in a former one

The Commissioner of Public Works thought the House would on reflection find the wording of the clause not so objectionable as hon members supposed Difficulties had arisen in compelling persons to attend on matters in which they could give information If the House exercised its power to the injury of individuals plenty of members would always be found to take the matter up so long as such cases as those of John Finnis and John Duff were attended to

The Attorney-General felt compelled to object to the view of the hon Commissioners of Land and Works, as the clause was open to the objection of the hon member for Encounter Bay There was no person who could judge whether books should be examined except the Chairman of the Committee or the House But when the objection was written and the grounds of it brought before the House, it was an additional security He was preparing a clause in accordance with the proposal of the hon member for Encounter Bay, and he thanked that hon member for the suggestion

Mr Solomon accordingly withdrew his amendment

Mr Strangways suggested the addition to the new clause of the words "or witness refusing to answer any such question"

The clause was then agreed to

Clause 2, "Orders to attend to be by summons," was agreed to, the blank being filled with the word "five"

The following was the clause submitted ultimately by the Attorney-General and carried —

"If any person ordered to attend or produce any papers books, records, or other documents, to either House, or any Committee of either House, shall object to answer any question that may be put to him, or produce any such document on the grounds that the same is of a private nature and does not affect the subject of enquiry, the Chairman of the Committee, or the Speaker, or President, as the case may be, shall report such refusal, with the reason thereof to the House, which shall thereupon excuse the answering of such questions, or the productions of such documents, or order the answering or production of such document, as the circumstances of the case may require"

Clause 4—"Houses empowered to punish summarily for contempts"

The Attorney-General moved the insertion of the words, at the end of first paragraph, "unless excused by the House in the manner aforesaid"

Mr Glyde presumed that it was not intended that the Upper House should have power to punish a member of the Lower House, or on the contrary that the members of the Upper House should be amenable to punishment by the Lower House, for any of the contempts referred to

The Attorney-General said no punishment could be made where an order was not given, the word should be taken distributively

Mr Milne suggested that the words "or giving a wilfully false answer," should be introduced into this clause as an offence liable to punishment He thought also the publication of any scandalous matter reflecting upon a member of the House, and which in England was visited with severe punishment, should be constituted an offence also

Mr Strangways agreed with the hon member for Onkaparinga so far as such libellous matter reflected on any one in his capacity as a member of that House but that it should not extend to him in his private capacity As to giving a wilfully false answer, that should be dealt with by the person being convicted of such offence being deemed guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury

The Attorney General agreed that it was desirable that a libel upon a member of that House in respect of his conduct as member should constitute an offence liable to punishment As to a witness giving a false answer he should, he thought, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be left to be dealt with by the Supreme Court

The amendment of the Attorney-General was then put and carried

The Attorney General then moved the addition of the following to clause 4 "The publishing of any false, scandalous, or derogatory libel of any member, touching his conduct as a member"

Carried

Mr Glyde said that last session it was decided that one of the privileges of members of that House should be "freedom from arrest," and he thought it proper that it should be provided for in this Bill

Mr Strangways asked what course he should take to obtain the sense of the House as to how the offences enumerated in this clause should be dealt with, whether by that House or a legal tribunal The hon gentleman thought that in many cases it would be desirable that the punishment of offences, sometimes of a political nature, should be left to the ordinary tribunals

The Attorney-General said it would be at variance with the inherent rights of all Legislatures, that they should not be able to punish offenders against their own privileges

The clause was then passed

Clause 5 "Members liable for disobedience, whether summoned or ordered to attend"

Mr Strangways thought this clause was quite superfluous as its contents were provided for in another clause

The Attorney-General said it was not so, as it had regard to persons who were not members of that House

The clause was passed as printed

Clauses 6 to 10 inclusive were passed without comment

Clause 11—"Warrant or verbal order plea no bar to action"

Mr Strangways moved that the first three lines should be omitted, viz, 'It shall in all cases be a valid and conclusive return to any writ of habeas corpus to bring up the body of any person, that such person is detained by virtue of any such warrant as aforesaid" He thought it was not desirable in a small community like this that such arbitrary powers as that conveyed in the commencement of this clause should be held by any Legislature

The Attorney-General did not see why that House should be placed in an inferior position to other tribunals and he thought the answer that a person had been imprisoned on an order of the Speaker would be a sufficient reply

Mr Strangways—How would the warrant bear upon the face of it that it was an offence against this Act? Was the person incarcerated to apply for liberation to the persons who had incarcerated him?

The Attorney-General replied to the effect that he did not see the force of the objection, and with regard to false returns being made there were abundant ways of punishing such offences without sacrificing the privileges of the House

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 12 "House may direct the Attorney-General to prosecute contempt mentioned, instead of proceeding summarily Punishment on conviction

Mr Reynolds thought two years' imprisonment was a very severe punishment

The Attorney-General said it might be in some cases but in others the hon member must admit, it would be far from unmerited, and he thought therefore it should be left to the discretion of the Judges

Mr Townsend called the hon member for the Sturt's attention to the fact that one of the offences was "wilful and corrupt perjury"

Mr Reynolds was not aware of that when he made the remark

The clause was passed, with the blank filled up with "£100"

Clause 13 "House may direct Attorney-General to prosecute for other contempts"

Passed as printed

The Attorney General moved the insertion of the following new clause to stand after clause 13, as printed "Every member of either House shall be free from arrest upon civil process during the Session of Parliament, and for the week before the commencement and after the termination of each session"

The clause was agreed to

Mr Strangways said as "freedom from arrest" was made one of the privileges of the House, he thought "freedom of speech" should constitute another (Laughter)

Mr Townsend—The hon member, I am sure, daily exhibits that he has freedom of speech (Laughter)

Mr Strangways thought the clause should be amended by making a member liable to arrest on leaving the colony, and he should prepare a clause to that effect

The Attorney General moved the following new clause, to stand as clause 16, "If any person examined before either House, or before any Committee of either House, shall give a wilfully false answer to any lawful or relevant question which shall be put to him during the course of any examination, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable on his conviction thereof, to be punished in the same manner as though he had been guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury"

The clause was agreed to

The title of the Bill and the preamble were then passed

Mr Strangways having previously proposed a new clause, to the effect that a member should be liable to arrest when leaving the colony, which was lost, asked now whether he could put his amendment as a proviso to the clause He should like to know what the nature of the objection was to his amendment, and the opinion of the Attorney-General on the same

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the clause was founded on the basis of confidence in the members of the House If they were not worthy of that confidence, as might be implied by the hon member's amendment, then the sooner they were deprived of their privileges the better But as he (the Attorney-General) had confidence in the members of that House, he should not object to granting them such immunities

The House resumed, the Speaker reported the Bill, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for next day

CLERKS' SALARY ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to move, pursuant to notice, "That he have leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the Clerks' Salary Act, No 9 of 1852"

He said it would be within the recollection of hon members that during the course of last session it was proposed to recast the salaries of the various clerks in the Government offices, for the purpose of adapting them to the altered state of the times, as they were up to that period based on a law passed in 1852, which regulated the salaries as suited to that particular time The Legislature, to meet the altered circumstances of the colony, had added 50 per cent to the salaries up to a certain amount, and after that 25 per cent That continued until last year, when it was proposed to recast the salaries, but as it was found this would place the clerks in a different position from what was contemplated, it was determined to alter the good-service pay A majority of the House then agreed to retain the good-service pay if made a basis for a scheme for providing a superannuation fund which would free the House from any further liability to provide for retiring officers in the service The Bill carrying out this principle was thrown out, but the House adopted the Estimates, which were framed on the supposition of the Bill being passed, and the clerk's salaries had consequently been paid on the increased scale Another Bill had been introduced this session, but, as they were already aware, that had been thrown out That Bill provided for the repeal of the Good-Service Act, and the establishment of a Superannuation Fund, and in the Estimates before the House there was a certain amount of good service pay, according to the classification, attached to the salaries of the clerks Now that that Bill had been rejected it was for the Government to consider what course should be adopted, and they had come to the conclusion that, under the present circumstances of the colony, they were not justified in continuing the salaries at the increased scale If they had not determined upon this course some contrivance would have been required to meet the contingency—that of introducing new Estimates for instance—in order that some provision might be made in lieu of that which would be done away But this the Government had not thought it desirable to do, and considering the circumstances of this colony, they had come to the conclusion that the salaries as they appeared on the Estimates were adequate payments He could easily imagine a time would come when it would be expedient to make some alteration, but he believed at the present time such was not required At the same time, he would not pronounce against the principle involved, but would merely say that the salaries, as at present placed on the Estimates, were sufficient With these remarks he would move that he have leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the Clerks Salaries Act

Leave was given

STUART'S LEASE OF WASTE LANDS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved the second reading of this Bill, and said there was only one clause in it and that was in strict conformity with the resolution passed by that House

Read a second time, and the House then went into Committee on it

In Committee

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether the first (the only) clause was precisely in the terms of the resolution

Mr HAY asked if Mr Stuart had marked off his claims?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that he had not

Mr HAY understood that Mr Stuart said he was in a position to do so within a week It was important that he should do so, or otherwise it would prevent other persons from securing claims

Mr REYNOLDS supposed it was understood that Mr Stuart could not appropriate any of the new country or the valuable springs which had been discovered

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said every care would be taken that he should not do so

Mr HAY moved in the 20th line of the clause that the word "discovery" be inserted instead of "exploration"

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said in answer to Mr Cole, that Mr Stuart's map was in the possession of the Surveyor-General, and that it would remain so

Mr DUNN called the attention of the Commissioner of Crown Lands to the variation of 25 miles as alleged by Mr Babbage, in Mr Stuart's calculations This might possibly lead to some dispute

Mr GLYDE proposed as an amendment, that in the 19th line, after the word "Government" the words "and mark" should be inserted (Hear)

Mr MILNE hoped that if the amendment were passed no advantage would be taken of any mistake made by Mr Stuart

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had spoken to Major Warburton and he had said the variation was not so great as was alleged They could not mistake the position of Stuart's Creek, and that would enable them to form a close approximate of the adjacent discoveries

Mr DUFFIELD could not agree with the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Milne) Mr Stuart had handed in a map, and that, he thought, should form the title of Mr Stuart to his claim He should be bound by that, the same as any one else would be in taking up runs

Mr MILDRED thought Mr Stuart should be called upon to select his claim within the limits of his track in going and coming

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought they should deal with Mr Stuart in a fair spirit He would not limit him because a country supposed to be more valuable was discovered in the vicinity They should allow him to claim on what he might fairly be supposed to have discovered, or known to him, though he might not have visited it

Mr Hay's and Mr Glyde's amendments were then put and carried The preamble was passed The House resumed the Bill was reported, and the consideration of the report was made an Order for the next day

CLERKS' SALARIES ACT

The Bill to repeal this Act was read a first time, when

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the second reading be an Order for the next day, when he should move the suspension of the Standing Orders, that the Report, on the Bill being passed through Committee, might be adopted the same day They would then be able to send up the Bill to the Legislative Council on Tuesday and, if agreed to, go on with the Estimates without interruption But if it was not agreed to, it would be the duty of the Government to recast the Estimates

The motion was carried

ESTIMATES

In Committee

Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, £726

Mr GLYDE asked how it was there was an increase of £100 in this department

The ATTORNEY GENERAL—From the appointment of additional officers as the population increased

Passed as printed

Medical, £1,223 12s 6d

Passed as printed

Hospitals, £3,233 10s 6d

Passed as printed

Lunatic Asylum, £1,818 4s 6d

Passed as printed

Destitute Poor, £2,858 3s

Passed as printed

Colonial Stores, £350 0s 6d

Mr GLYDE objected to going through the Estimates in this manner He thought it was the duty of the Treasurer to explain, as each separate item was introduced

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said they were only following out the general practice, and that was, if there was any material change in the departments, explanation should then be given

Mr TOWNSEND thought where there was an increase some explanation should be given, as otherwise it only led to useless discussion, and to the item being eventually recommitted

Mr REYNOLDS asked if it were not possible to do without the department of Colonial Storekeeper? He saw no absolute necessity for it, and when the item was put he should vote against it He would suggest that the duty might be attached to the department of the Commissioner of Public Works

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS assured the hon member that he had quite enough to do without it

Mr REYNOLDS—Then, if the hon Commissioner of Public Works has too much to do, other departments may not be similarly situated

Mr SOLOMON was rather surprised at the remark of the Commissioner of Public Works that he had quite enough to do, because on a former occasion that hon gentleman had declared himself able to undertake very great additional duties As to the passing of the Estimates they had got themselves into a serious difficulty Although it was affirmed by the House that retrenchment was necessary, yet there was no appearance of retrenchment, and he was afraid when they got to the end of the volume that all the reduction that would be effected would be some paltry few hundred pounds He must protest against this When the Government knew the feeling of the House they should withdraw the Estimates and recast them, instead of endeavoring to pass them, by what he could only call a "side wind" It was not too late to withdraw them even now If they could not close the session at Christmas let them go beyond it If they could not do their business by sitting until 5 o'clock let them sit till 12 o'clock He believed that at the end of the year, at the way they were going on now, they would find they were considerably short of the proposed expenditure

Mr DUFFIELD would vote against the item of Colonial Storekeeper Hon members might remember the famous "Estimates Committee,' which recommended this department should be abolished It was abolished, and he believed they found no inconvenience from it The principal duty of the Storekeeper was to take charge of the stationery and he believed this would be better managed by submitting the supplies to tender

The TREASURER said the question was not whether a general reduction should be made on the Estimates, but whether the Colonial Store Department was required, and he thought it was the duty of the House to point out any alteration that it might deem necessary ("No, no," and "yes ") In 1855 the "Colonial Store" was struck off, but what was the consequence? it had to be replaced. The duty devolved on one of the clerks in the Audit Office, and it engrossed his whole time, so that it was as broad as long But not only was it the duty of the Storekeeper to take charge of the stationery, but he had charge of the furniture in the offices and in Government House A very large amount of property was in his charge and if the department was struck off now, the whole time, or more than that, of one clerk would be taken up in attending to the duties of it The Government had in view in compiling the Estimates, every possible reduction and they had created establishments only where absolutely necessary

Mr REYNOLDS could not agree that it was not possible to dispense with the Storekeeper's department altogether It might be quite true that, before a Storekeeper was appointed, the duties occupied a good deal of the time of a clerk in the Audit Office, but surely that was no reason why they should create a department

Mr TOWNSEND said the effect of not reducing the Estimates in a lump, but considering each item, was that, when hon members suggested that an item should be struck out, the Government said that was just the very particular item which could not be dispensed with He would draw the attention of the House to the fact that it cost £470 a year to take care of some stationery There were merchants in Adelaide at the present time doing a large business, and with branch establishments at the Port, who conducted agency business, and got all their stores taken care of, for a less sum

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the question appeared to be whether they would have a person to take care of the stores, under the title of Colonial Storekeeper, or whether the stores should be taken care of by a party nominally paid for something else, as was formerly the case There had always been a storeman, and the only question was whether the Colonial Storekeeper was to be a clerk nominally paid for doing something else, because, whatever department was charged with the care of the stores, an additional clerk would certainly be required in addition to the storeman

Mr REYNOLDS contended that another clerk would not be required He had had charge of nearly the whole department for a considerable time, and his opinion had long been that the Colonial Storekeeper's Department ought not to be kept up, as he could have continued to look after the department The Government knew his views upon the subject

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had always understood the hon. member's views were that the appointment was a necessary one

Mr REYNOLDS said if the Attorney-General looked through the records of the Public Works department he would find to the contrary

Mr DUFFIELD, after all he had heard, was as dissatisfied with the vote as when he said he should vote against it He could understand the necessity for the appointment, if all the stores connected with the public departments were taken charge of by the Colonial Storekeeper, but this was not the case, and independently of this, it was clear that the storekeeper did not attend to goods at the Port as there were several items in the Government accounts for Port agency If the House sanctioned the department he felt satisfied it was one which would grow very fast

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS wished the House to understand what was before it He thought it would be admitted, whatever was done, that some of the items must be assented to, for instance, they must have a storeman as there was a large quantity of valuable goods in the store and there would be no one to take charge of them unless this item were passed The House had consented to there being a store by voting money for it, which was being judiciously expended and it was therefore necessary there should be a storeman He would state that the Colonial Storekeeper exercised a check upon the consumption of stationery in every department, and in that small matter alone effected a considerable saving He would state again that the persons connected with his department were fully employed, and seeing the arduous and multifarious duties which they had to perform, he considered a Colonial Storekeeper absolutely essential If the item were struck out, what the Government would do would be exactly what had been done before, bring it on again for reconsideration

Mr REYNOLDS considered the duties of Storekeeper could be very well discharged by the Sergeant Armourer

Mr MACDERMOTT said the department of Storekeeper had been done away with, but the Government found it necessary to restore it It appeared to him a little inconsistent on the part of those hon members who voted money for the erection of the store that they should seek to break up the department as soon as the store was built He should leave the matter to the responsibility of the Government, and if they thought the appointment necessary, he should vote for it

Mr GLYDE admired the course pursued by the Commissioner of Public Works, who a short time ago asked for £1,000 for a store, and told the House they must vote it, because they had voted for a storeman, and now he told the House they must give them a storeman as they had given him a store He should vote against the item

Mr TOWNSEND would put it to the Commissioner of Public Works, as a commercial man of high standing, whether he could not get a little stationery and a few guns taken care of for less than £750 a year He believed the whole might be done for £250

The TREASURER said the duties of the Storekeeper appeared to be greatly misunderstood. The Shipping Agent at the Port only attended to the shipping and discharging of goods, but the goods were brought up by the Storekeeper The stationery which he had charge of was in itself a formidable charge, as the printing done by the Government Printing Office for the various departments amounted to £3,000 per annum and there were fifty departments which were supplied with stores by the storekeeper Not only stationery, but fuel had to be distributed, and when the duty was performed by a clerk at the Audit Office, there was no sufficient check exercised

Mr DUFFIELD believed the Government would be savers by adopting, in reference to stationery, the course which they pursued in reference to every other articles call for tenders If the Government thought they got their supplies cheaper by importing them from England he differed with them He believed that private individuals got goods cheaper than the Government If the Government adopted the same course in reference to ironmongery and other articles, that they did with regard to stationery, they would want three or four stores

Mr TOWNSEND moved that the £350 be struck out, and £200 substituted

Mr HAY suggested that the "Sergeant-Armourer" should be struck out, and that the Colonial Storekeeper should be called upon to discharge his duties As they had an Agent-General to whom they could apply for a supply of goods, he believed that the Government could get goods as cheap as any one else

Mr MACDERMOTT remarked that the colony had accepted from the British Government a present of valuable arms, and that the whole time of the Sergeant-Armourer was devoted to them

Mr BARROW had not felt called upon to take part in the debate, feeling satisfied that under the present system every item would be voted as it appeared upon the Estimates If the Government said they wanted £95,000 and the House said we'll give you £85,000, they would, no doubt, have been again told by the Attorney-General, as they had previously been, that the Government would endeavour so to appropriate it that retrenchments would be effected in those departments which the Government deemed most susceptible of retrenchment That was a sentiment which was loudly cheered when the Attorney-General, a few days since, gave utterance to it, and he (Mr Barrow) wished the House had adopted it Whatever item was objected to by that House the Government would no doubt shew unexceptionable reasons for retaining it It was not that the House were unwilling to discuss these matters, but persons not officially experienced could not say what items could be best spared For instance, there were large sums under the head of contingencies and sundries, and as the House did not know what these consisted of, if they refused to vote them, they might deprive a department something which was absolutely essential to its working The Government and the Government only should appropriate money placed at their disposal He would move that the £350 be reduced to £200, but he knew that the Chairman would say that the particular way in which this reduction was to be effected must be indicated, so that on the one side the House was met by the Attorney-General, who said that it could not be done, or, if they said it should be done, then the Chairman said it shouldn't be done (Laughter) He would suggest the insertion of £200 for £350, the striking out of all the particulars, and that the Government be left to fill up the blanks

The various items in connection with the Colonial Storekeeper's department were then put and negatived

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL remarked, in reference to the proposition that the duties could be performed by the Sergeant Armorer, that if stationery and other stores could distribute themselves, it required special knowledge to take care of guns The Armorer was not a person qualified to act as Colonial Storekeeper

Mr BURFORD thought the hon gentleman had made a mistake, for "stationery" would keep its place,—(Oh!)—but guns would "go off"

Mr BARROW was of opinion that provided a bond was executed for their safe return, the Government would act wisely in distributing the guns amongst the people of the colony

Upon the next item, "Sergeant-Armorer and Magazine-keeper, quarters and clothing, £95 0s 6d" being proposed

Mr REYNOLDS suggested the addition to the description of the appointment of "and Keeper of Stores"

Mr DUFFIELD intimated he should support the vote and £50 for an assistant.

Upon an increase to the pay of the Sergeant-Armorer being suggested,

Mr BARROW pointed out that that officer already had £190 per annum, and quarters and clothing He did not know whether his duties were of that peculiar nature which would warrant his being placed in a higher position in point of pay

Mr MILDRED wished to know whether the armorer was at all connected with the police He observed, in addition to the pay there was an item of £20 for quarters

The TREASURER said the Armorer was not connected with the police, but he had quarters adjoining the Police Barracks He was formerly a sergeant of police, and his pay was the same as a sergeant of police, but in order not to burden the Police item with a charge which did not belong to it he was placed upon the Store Department. In addition to Armorer he was Keeper of the Powder Magazine, and there were very few men who were fit for the appointment, as it was requisite the holder of the office should have been in the Royal Artillery It would be absurd to leave 2,000 stand of the best arms in the world in the charge of an incompetent party or without any one to look after them Having accepted the arms they were bound to make the appointment

Mr BARROW wished to know if the Sergeant-Armorer had quarters in the police-barracks, as, if so, it would be unnecessary to vote him an allowance in lieu of quarters

The TREASURER said he formerly had quarters there but not latterly He would only receive the allowance till the Government could provide him with other quarters

Mr REYNOLDS said the Government had better bring in a Bill for the distribution of the arms and they would then be enabled to dispense with an Armorer

The TREASURER said if the arms were distributed they would be sure to be destroyed, and it would be better to return them to the Home Government

The items were then agreed to, together with £50 for an Assistant Storeman making a total of £165 0s 6d, and upon the motion of the Treasurer, the Chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following Tuesday

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

Mr BAKEWELL moved the second reading of this Bill One object which would be accomplished by the Bill would be to cut off a large amount of revenue from the profession to which he had the honor to belong, and that, he thought, was a great recommendation (Hear, hear) The Bill did not profess to deal with trading associations, but religious and scientific societies—societies established for a useful and beneficial object He would proceed to describe the mode in which the Bill proposed to effect its object It was well known that the societies to which this Bill had reference required to hold land The religious societies had their chapels or places of worship and their burying-grounds, and Oddfellows and scientific institutions had their halls The difficulty which had been hitherto felt had been that trustees had been required to hold the lands in their names, and when these were removed, or died, or became lunatic, or unable to act, great inconvenience arose, as the property could not be dealt with The Bill before the House proposed to remedy this defect, as the companies or associations would be incorporated, and the properties would be vested in the various bodies by their corporate name After the passing of the Act, religious or scientific associations would give notice of their desire to be incorporated, and the society would fix upon some person whose name would be registered, and who would be entitled to affix the corporate seal This being done, and a memorial signed by the person fixed upon the Supreme Court would then have the power to issue a certificate incorporating the association, and another simple memorial being signed the property would become vested in the corporation by the corporate name, and ever afterwards there would be no difficulty in dealing with the property The Bill was very simple, and he believed it would be found easily worked, it had the advantage of having been passed by the other House

Mr MACDERMOTT seconded the motion, which was carried, and the Bill having been read a second time, passed through Committee, with verbal amendments, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for the following Wednesday

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the House went into Committee for the consideration of this Bill

Clause 171 related to legal procedure and evidence, and provided that no writ of quo warranto should be allowed to try the title to any office

Mr STRANGWAYS objected to the clause, considering it injudicious that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court should be entirely ousted, as it was by this clause If it were thought desirable that Justices of the Peace should try the cases in the first instance, well and good, but there certainly ought to be an appeal from their decision Great evils would, he believed, result from passing this clause, for the most knotty points of law arose in connection with District Councils elections assessments, &c Under the clause, as it stood, all cases would have to be decided by Justices who had very little knowledge of the law bearing upon the case He wished to ask the Attorney-

General whether he was desirous that the clause should remain as it was at present, or whether he would provide a new clause giving the Justices jurisdiction in the first instance, and an appeal to the Supreme Court He thought the Attorney-General, from the experience which he had had in such matters, would be of opinion that it was not desirable the whole matter should be left to be decided by Justices of the Peace

The Attorney-General would correct a misapprehension An appeal was provided to the Local Court at Adelaide in its full jurisdiction He referred to the 180th clause, and by the 198th clause it would also be found that the Local Court might state one or more special cases for the opinion of the Supreme Court He thought it was expedient not to oust the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but to diminish to the greatest possible degree the number of cases which it was now necessary to bring before it in reference to District Councils and Councillors There had been several proceedings of this nature in the Supreme Court, and the result had not been altogether satisfactory to the parties interested, though he did not say they were not in accordance with law, and whilst the results were not very satisfactory the costs were very heavy Mr Stow, who prepared the Bill, had consulted with him, and after full consideration it had been thought advisable to frame the clause as it stood, the advantages of referring to the Supreme Court in the first instance being counterbalanced by the great expense It had been thought that if there were an appeal to the Local Court it would be inexpensive, and that the object sought would be attained by the Local Court, if necessary, stating a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court Everything had been done to secure a full and adequate consideration and decision of knotty points of law If the parties were dissatisfied with the decision of the Justices, they could appeal to the Local Court, and if knotty points of law should arise, the Local Court might state a case for the Supreme Court The course suggested by the Bill combined cheapness and security that the law would be administered according to its proper operations

Clause 172 provided that no mandamus should issue from the Supreme Court to compel District Councils to admit, restore, or elect Councillor, &c

Clause 173 provided that no assessment rate or loan should be removed by certiorari to the Supreme Court.

Clause 174 provided that proceedings for trying the title of Councillor, &c, to his office, should be decided by two or more Justices in a summary way

Clause 175 related to legal procedure and evidence and the jurisdiction of Justices

Clause 176 provided that claims by District Councils to moneys not accounted for by officer may be decided by Justices

Clause 177 gave the Justices power to inflict imprisonment for noncompliance with the orders of Justices

These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 178 provided that proceedings against District Councils should be taken within a period of three months

Mr Strangways thought the time too short, and moved that the time be extended to six months

The Attorney-General imagined it would be far better that the time should be limited to three months To leave the District Council in a state of uncertainty for a period of six months as to whether the assessment was to be held valid or not would, he thought, be placing them in an unfair position, as they must refrain during that time from laying out the money, or expend it under the risk of being called on to refund it He thought three months quite long enough

Mr Reynolds believed that in the old Act the time was not limited

The Commissioner of Public Works said it was not.

Mr Strangways urged that under such circumstances no injury could result from the adoption of his suggestion He urged it because it frequently happened that ratepayers knew nothing about the rate till after it became payable. A large majority of the ratepayers never troubled themselves about the matter till they were called upon for payment. He could see no objection to his proposition

The Attorney-General said the argument of the hon member resolved itself into this, that the ratepayers were very careless, and that therefore it was expedient the House should encourage them in their carelessness He did not think that a sufficient reason

The amendment was lost and the clause passed as printed

Clause 179 provided that proceedings before the Justices should be regulated by Act No 6 of 1850

Clause 180 provided that an appeal might be made from the order made by the Justices to Local Courts

Clause 181 provided that the proclamation by the Governor be as heretofore published.

Clause 182 provided that the list of persons qualified to act as constables should be evidence of qualification

Clause 183 provided that the production of the Gazette containing notice should be evidence of election

Clause 184 provided that appeals against assessment or alteration in assessment should be heard before Local Courts

Clause 185 provided that appeals should be heard at the sittings of the Court next after 16 days from notice or alteration appealed against

Clause 186 provided that the production of the assessment-book or Gazette containing notice should be evidence except in certain cases, that the assessment or rate was duly made

Clause 187 provided how the rates should be recoverable, These clauses were passed as printed

Clause 188 provided that rates unpaid ten days after demand might be distrained for

Mr Townsend called attention to this clause, believing that it was exceedingly arbitrary The clerk, collector, or assistant, might without any warrant enter into any part of the premises and distrain the goods and chattles found therein, or might enter into any other house or land occupied by any person liable to the same rates It appeared to him that the better course would be to have recourse to the Local Court in the regular way It was hardly fair to give the District Councils such a power as that which was proposed by this clause, and it appeared to him that it was repugnant to the British law and clearly objectionable

The Attorney-General did not see any reason for an alteration of the clause, as it was merely proposed to give the District Councils the power of distraint which was possessed by a landlord A great deal of money was wasted in these proceedings, and the amount ultimately had to be recovered by a proceeding analogous to distraint with additional costs added After reasonable notice he saw no objection to the distraint when the liability to the rate became absolute So long as the person was able to appeal there was no power of distraint, but when there was no right to do so, he thought the power of distraint might be given

The Commissioner of Public Works pointed out that the Act merely sought to give the District Councils the same power which was possessed by Municipal Corporations and no more

Mr Solomon said the Attorney-General had stated that the clause would merely give the District Councils the same power as landlords, but he would point out that the clause proposed to give them greater power than landlords, as they might distrain not only upon the property upon which the rates were due, but upon property for which no rates were due, so that the power which would be given to District Councils would be far greater than that which existed between landlord and tenant That the collector should have the power of entering, not because the premises were liable, but because the party who resided on them was liable, appeared to him unjust.

Mr Strangways said that in England the rates could not be distrained for except by order of the Justices The hon the Attorney-General intimated his dissent from this, but he knew it to be a fact At the Petty Sessions in England there were 20 or 30 applications frequently for orders He contended that this clause was not necessary, as clause 187 provided that the rates might be recovered in a summary way before two Justices, and why give a still more summary power which might be exercised with spite He should move the clause be struck out

Mr Reynolds pointed out that though the owner might not get the notice, still it was proposed to give the District Council power to enter upon and sell the property He considered this very objectionable

Mr Young must oppose the clause in consequence of its arbitrary character The previous clause was sufficient for all purposes All that ratepayers generally required was a summons, and then they very readily went and paid The clause under discussion was so arbitrary that he regarded it as a retrograde movement in the system of law-making In some of the laws passed in the colony, there appeared a disposition to go back to those arbitrary laws which were now unknown in our fatherland In a new country, it was desirable that the laws should be of the most simple and, at the same time, lenient character He should support the motion that the clause be struck out

Mr Duffield should support the clause, because he believed it desirable to introduce all the simplicity they could in the measure before the House It was certainly quite as simple that the District Council should be enabled to distrain at once, as that they should first go to the Local Court or to two Justices of the Peace Not only was there more simplicity in the mode proposed by this clause, but there would be less expense, and it should be remembered that the expenses would eventually have to be paid by the parties sued

Mr Hay hoped the clause would be allowed to stand as it was, as instead of simplifying the matter, it would only complicate it if the parties in the first instance were compelled to go before the Local Court In the Corporation Act the same power was given, and he had never heard of one instance in which that power had been abused or exercised in an improper manner A great many of the rates did not amount to more than 5s or 6s, and he was sure it would be admitted that by the mode proposed by this clause the amounts would be recovered not only more speedily but with much less expense to the party who had to pay than if an appeal had to be made to the Local Court It was absolutely essential to retain the power to levy either upon the party who owned the land or upon the party who occupied the property Wherever the owner was known and could be got at, power should be given to the District Council to compel him to pay the rate, as it was possible that a man might have 50 allotments but refuse to pay for any but the one which he ocupied

Mr Solomon thought there was one matter which required explanation The last speaker had remarked that a party might have 50 allotments and refuse to pay for any except the one which he occupied There had been instances of the collectors neglecting to apply for the rates to the parties who were really liable, the tenants, until the premises were unoccupied and then they ultimately came upon the landlords It had been shewn in the City Council that a similar clause to this, which was in the Corporation Act, worked badly His attention had been called to clause 189, which provided that lands might be sold when the rates were in arrear, and he considered that clause far better than the one which they were now asked to pass He did not consider that there should be power to enter upon one property for the rates due upon another

Mr DUNN remarked that in many of the country districts the landlords were in the habit of paying the taxes themselves, but if they refused to do so, by the clause under discussion the poor man who occupied the cottage, perhaps for which the landlord had engaged to pay the taxes, might be distrained upon

Mr MILDRED had seen for years past the great loss and inconvenience to which District Councils were subjected in consequence of not having the power which this clause proposed to confer upon them He thought, however, that the clause might be modified, for as it stood it appeared to him that a party might be levied upon at his private residence for the rates due upon a property 20 miles off, in reference to the arrears of rates upon which he was in absolute ignorance till levied upon

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member would see that this was provided for by the after part of the clause, as before an entry could be made upon any house or land, there must be a notice served upon the person or left at his actual residence

Mr STRANGWAYS quoted from Lord Kenyon to shew that a summons must precede the warrant of distress which was in the nature of an execution Lord Kenyon had also held it to be an invariable maxim that no man should be punished till he had had an opportunity of being heard, but he would ask if this clause were passed what opportunity would be afforded to the party levied upon of being heard The course of procedure adopted in England was found sufficient to ensure the payment of rates, and that procedure was not substantially different from the 187th clause

The CHAIRMAN put the question, and declared the clause passed as printed, upon which a division was called for, when it was found that there was a majority of four in favor of the clause as it stood, the votes (ayes 13, noes 9), being as follow —

AYES—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Treasurer, Messrs Duffield, Macdermott, Neales, Collinson, Scammell, McEllister, Mildred, Hay, Milne, and the Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

NOES—Messrs Reynolds, Townsend, Peake, Glyde, Dunn, Young, Solomon, Rogers, and Strangways (teller)

Clause 189 provided that the lands might be sold when the rates were in arrear

Mr TOWNSEND suggested that though the power of sale might be given, power should also be given to lease the land from year to year, as it was quite possible that the land could not be advantageously sold, although it might be advantageously leased

Mr STRANGWAYS said that if the clause stood as it was at present, it would be inoperative, as buyers would never be found, and if the property were offered for lease, it would be in the same position No one would take it, for the Council could only sell to the extent of the rates due, which frequently did not amount to more than 3s 6d, and the land could only be let for such a term as would enable the Council to pay themselves the amount due The clause inserted in the Municipal Corporation Act was never enforced, because it was practically useless There were whole columns in the Gazette of rates not paid, but whether application was made to the Judge in reference to them he was unable to state

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was quite true there was a similar clause in the Corporation Act, and that notices appeared in the Gazette In reference to small sums the clause might be inoperative, but as large amounts might sometimes be involved it would, he thought, be better to retain the clause

Mr NEALES thought it would be better to retain the clause, as he had no doubt it would cause a great number of rates to be paid which otherwise would not be It acted something like a Police Act upon the morals of the country He thought it a very useful instead of useless provision, and referred to a special case, in which, as an agent, he had been instructed to pay the rates for the purpose of preventing the estate being sold

Mr MILDRED hoped the clause would be retained He was aware of properties upon which no rates had been paid since 1851, and although in many instances the amount due might be so trifling that it was not worth while to take any steps to recover, the time would come when the amount would have accumulated to an extent which would render it desirable to bring this clause into operation

Mr MILNE thought the suggestion of the hon member, Mr Townsend, that there should be power to lease as well as to sell, very valuable, and he should certainly support it

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether, if the clause were passed, it would be operative If such a clause existed as they had heard in the Municipal Act, and it was found inoperative, he could not see the utility of introducing a similar clause in this Bill

Mr NEALES thought he had clearly shewn that the clause was operative He had quoted a special case, in which as agent he had special instructions to pay the rates to prevent the estate from being sold

Mr SCAMMELL should support the clause as it stood, considering the amendment which had been proposed would complicate the clause to an unnecessary extent During the period that the District Councils had existed, the want of such a clause as this had been severely felt He had known instances in which the rates had gone on accumulating till they had reached upwards of £30 In these instances the properties were unclaimed, but if they were ever claimed it would be found that they had been materially benefitted by the operations of the District Councils, and consequently should in some shape be rendered liable for the rate

Mr ROGERS should support the clause, believing that it would be found one means of getting at the absentee He knew land in many districts for which no rates had ever been received

The clause was passed as printed, with the amendment proposed by the hon member (Mr Townsend)

Clause 190 provided that the rates due under the Act should be recoverable under the Act

Mr STRANGWAYS said this clause was retrospective, and as he did not consider that any such clause should be introduced without good reason being shown, he moved an amendment to carry out his views

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member had better strike out the clause It was quite clear that if, as the hon member proposed, a thing were to be done as though the Act had not passed, there could be no use in the clause Power to recover required to be given by this Act, and it was retrospective in the same way as was the Act to improve the administration of justice, that is, it did not affect the rights of parties, but merely the way in which they were put in force, in the same way, for instance, as the Act recently passed affecting bills of exchange

Mr STRANGWAYS said that if the clause were passed, the District Councils would not be enabled to recover rates, as the Act enabling them to do so was repealed

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 191 provided that a map prepared by a District Council, under the authority of this Act, should be prima facie evidence in every Court

Mr PEAKE thought, if maps were to be taken as evidence, the Bill should prescribe some scale upon which they should be drawn He thought the scale should be not less than four chains to an inch, and would move an addition to that effect

Mr STRANGWAYS said that such a scale would make the maps of many districts 25 or 30 feet square, and not only would the cost of preparation be very great, but the cost of taking care of them would also be great

Mr PEAKE did not wish maps of the whole district to be prepared, nor was he wedded to the scale of four chains to the inch, but there should certainly be some uniform scale

Mr MILNE presumed the object of the hon member was to have an authenticated map, and he thought his object would be accomplished by a copy being forwarded to the Survey Office

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that it was intended one map should be kept by the District Councils, and the other forwarded to the office of the Surveyor-General

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 192 provided that the signature of the Chairman should be attached to the minutes, which should be evidence of proceedings

Clause 193 provided that notice published in the Government Gazette of any proposition having been adopted at a meeting should be evidence thereof

Clause 194 provided that no writ of certiorari to remove, order for sale, &c of water reserve, should issue after three months from confirmation

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that it would be desirable to give more extended time, and moved that the time be six months instead of three

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no objection to six months in this case, but would point out that this did not affect private rights, but merely an exchange of water reserves

The clause as amended was passed

Clause 195 provided that information under No 9 of 1853 may be laid by Chairman, Clerk, or Ranger

Clause 196 provided that fines against the provisions of the Act might be recovered before two Justices

Clause 197 gave an appeal from the order of the Justices to the Local Court of Full Jurisdiction in Adelaide

Clause 198 provided that the Local Courts of Adelaide might, on appeal, state a case for the Supreme Court

These clauses were passed as printed

Clauses 199, 200, and 201 were agreed to

On clause 202—

Mr STRANGWAYS moved as an amendment on this clause that—

'Any summons or writ sent through the post shall be registered, as in the case of the Electoral Act, and a registration fee paid to the postmaster, not exceeding twopence'

His reason for moving this resolution was to provide means for proving that the notice was sent, as otherwise the clerk might say he sent the notice and that it was mislaid

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS had no objection to the amendment

The amendment was then put and carried, and the clause as amended was agreed to

Clauses 203 and 204 were agreed to, as also the schedules, with some trifling verbal amendments in Schedule D

The preamble and title of the Bill were then agreed to

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that the first clause which he proposed to reconsider was clause 104, and if any hon members wished to recommit any previous clauses, they had better do so now The clause provided that all roads in districts should be under the management of the Councils, and that the Councils should be Commissioners of Roads The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde) proposed an amendment, placing all streets in townships and villages likewise under the control of the Councils He (the Attorney-General) then said that though he approved of the object there might be some objection on principle to the manner in which it was proposed to be carried out, but promised to consider the matter He would now propose an amendment which he thought would reconcile the interests of the public as represented by the Councils, with those of the owners of property in villages and townships He would insert after the word "districts" the words "all streets in such townships or villages dedicated to the public of which dedication five years' uninterrupted use by the public shall be considered sufficient proof" This he believed would be doing no more than the law did at present. He (the Attorney-General) could not give an opinion which would be binding on the House, as he was not in the position of a Judge, but he believed, according to the present law, that if any person laid out a township or village, marked upon the map certain streets, and allowed free use of them to the public for a period of five years, it would amount to an irrecoverable dedication to the public, and it would be impossible in any court of justice to sustain a right to interfere with a full enjoyment of the roads by the public The amendment therefore did not contain anything which was not contained in the common law, but it was to prevent the necessity of continually trying the question in courts of law that it was desirable to lay down a clear and intelligent test The principle was founded not merely upon law but upon substantial common sense and justice If a person laid out a township in which there were certain roads allowed to be used by the public, it was clear that any person dealing in the land would do so on the assumption that the public would be allowed the same freedom of passage as they had previously enjoyed, and it would therefore be unjust to allow the owner of the land the right of stopping up the roads

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to know whether the House was to understand from what had been stated by the hon member, the Attorney-General, that, as the law stood, a five-years' "user" of the road would prevent the owner from enclosing the land again Such might be the case in this colony, but he believed it was not elsewhere But if it was the case here, then there was a means by which the Council, if they were desirous of claiming the roads, could do so under the existing law, inasmuch as they need only declare the roads district roads, and the amount of compensation to be paid by the owners of the soil in such cases would be merely nominal The clause as amended by the hon the Attorney-General would tend to alter the Statute of Limitations

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL repeated the opinion which he had previously expressed, and believed it would be held as law in any court of justice in the British dominions

The amendment was then put and carried, and the clause as amended was agreed to

On clause 112,

Mr HAY moved the insertion after the word "slaughter-houses" in the eighth line, of the words "for large or small cattle or pigs"

The amendment was agreed to

Mr. DUFFIELD moved that in the ninth line the words, "which is situate not less than one mile from the boundary of the City of Adelaide," be struck out Hon members who read the reports of the meetings of the Corporation would find that the greatest difficulties of that body arose from the nuisance of the slaughterhouse, and this nuisance was on the increase, inasmuch as the Corporation had to slaughter not only for the City but for many districts or portions of many districts around it Hon members conversant with the subject would also agree that meat slaughtered outside the legal boundary was not improved by being carried such a distance into town in a spring-cart, as was the custom, and under the morning sun He believed the District Councils would be found quite as well able to attend to the sanitary arrangements of their districts as the Corporation of the City of Adelaide. If hon. members went through the districts, they would find the sanitary arrangements as good and the nuisance arising from slaughtering of cattle not so great as in the city

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the words proposed to be struck out applied only to a few Councils, and these were in the vicinity of Adelaide It was not attempted to limit the power of the districts generally If the words were not retained, many butchers in Adelaide having property in the districts around sufficient to qualify themselves for seats in the Councils, would build slaughterhouses on the immediate boundaries of the Park Lands, so that there would be one line of slaughterhouses round the city For his part, he should prefer seeing the word "one" struck out, and the word "three" inserted

Mr SOLOMON had much pleasure in seconding the motion for the striking out of the words The hon the Commissioner of Public Works said that if the words were struck out they would have the whole boundaries of the Park Lands studded with slaughterhouses, but the slaughterhouses now were within the city boundary, and the effect of this clause would be to drive every butcher inside the boundary It would not only commit the injustice of compelling butchers from the districts to come into the city slaughterhouse, but it would also increase the nuisance, which he (Mr Solomon) could not see was less a nuisance, from the fact of the city receiving fees from the slaughterhouse

Mr SCAMMELL said the slaughterhouse was not so great a nuisance as it had been He agreed with the hon the Commissioner of Public Works, that if the words were struck out, the Park Lands boundary would be studded with slaughterhouses If there were an abundant supply of water the matter would be of less consequence, or if the nuisance was confined to the mere slaughtering of cattle. But attached to every slaughter-house there was a large piggery, the pigs in which were generally kept in an abominably filthy condition, so that they poisoned the atmosphere around every slaughterhouse The consequence of this was, that if there were several dozen slaughterhouses round the Park Lands, there would be a stench which would soon reach every part of the city, and render every spot in it almost uninhabitable At present the stench came only from one quarter—the direction of the prevailing wind, but if the Park Lands were studded with slaughterhouses, the city would be the centre of a charmed circle (A laugh)

Mr HAY did not know how the clause would drive every butcher within a mile of the city boundary to the City Slaughterhouse Why could these persons not go to the other side of the boundary? But even if the contrary were the case, he should prefer seeing the butchers confined to one slaughterhouse, where there was a sufficient supply of water, and where means were taken to mitigate the nuisance

Dr WARK concurred with the hon the Commissioner of Public Works as to the effect of lessening the distance Hon. members knew that the slaughterhouse was built for sanitary reasons in order to concentrate in one place the vapours and exhalations likely to be injurious to the inhabitants If they did away with the mile boundary the city would be, as had been remarked, surrounded with a circle of piggeries, and the citizens would be in a charmed circle, by which they would be charmed into a state of loathsome disease If the House would make the distance two or even three miles, he would agree to the alteration, but he would not consent to its being less than one mile

Mr HAY moved, that in the second line for the word "persons" the word "ratepayers" be substituted The House knew that otherwise, persons in the meeting might take up time by nominating others for what was termed "a lark" ("Hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works

The amendment was carried, and the clause as amended, agreed to

In clause 149, a similar alteration was made, on the motion of the same hon member

In clause 154, a verbal alteration was made, after considerable discussion

On clause 191 map prima facie evidence

Mr PEAKE moved that the clause be amended by inserting the words "which map shall be examined and certified to be correct by the Surveyor-General" The hon member suggested that there should be some uniform scale for the maps, say, four chains to an inch

Mr STRANGWAYS said that on this scale the map of the Encounter Bay district would occupy a space of 25 or 30 square feet, and would involve great expense and loss of time The scale would be about 20 inches to the mile

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would concur in the motion if it was proposed to make the maps conclusive evidence, but that was not the case They were only prima facie evidence and it amounted to no more than this, that the duty was to be supposed to have been properly performed until the contrary was shown This would not prevent persons from showing that the map was not properly drawn, but it would be sufficient for the Councils, in cases where the correctness of the map was not challenged Where the accuracy of the map was disputed, a person could call evidence to prove his case The amendment was therefore needless, and it would also have the effect of throwing a great burthen upon the Surveyor-General Indeed, he (the Attorney General) did not see how the Surveyor-General was to decide as to the correctness of the maps Was that gentleman to go and see the whole of the districts mapped, or was the Government to send a surveyor to examine every map and if so who was to bear the expense

Mr PEAKE thought there could be no difficulty in checking the maps, as the bearings and lines were in possession of the Surveyor General

Mr SCAMMELL said if the amendment was passed the House would have to appoint another Surveyor General for the purpose of attending to this duty In many districts, probably not so well known to any other hon member as to him (Mr Scammell), the number of district roads was so great that the Surveyor-General had only perhaps plans of one out of five of them in his office In some districts not more than one or two out of half a dozen were Government roads

Mr STRANGWAYS asked how the Surveyor-General was to act if, as in the case of Encounter Bay, there were four or five original maps Besides, a large number of the old maps were on so small a scale that when—as was the case in many instances—the field-books were lost, it was impossible to ascertain anything from the maps by means of the scale and compass

Mr ANDREWS thought that as the maps were only to be taken as prima facie evidence, the point in question was immaterial

Mr LINDSAY admitted that the maps were only to be prima facie evidence, but the object should be to make them as trustworthy as possible As his hon colleague (Mr. Strangways) had stated in many districts the Government maps did not agree with each other, but there might be a number of errors superadded by the surveyors of the District Councils, which the Surveyor-General would be able to correct if his attention was drawn to the maps. It would be a check against errors, though it could not absolutely prevent error The maps would probably be more incorrect if they did not pass under the supervision of the Surveyor-General than if he had seen them

The amendment was lost, and the clause as printed was then agreed to

The House resumed, and the CHAIRMAN having reported the Bill, the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the report of the Committee on this Bill be adopted

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the 12th clause be recommitted He had not before him the clause moved by the hon the Attorney General relative to freedom from arrest He had intended to move a proviso that "If any member against whom any civil process may have issued shall leave or attempt to leave this province, such member shall forfeit his claim to privilege" But he thought that might be going too far, and, therefore, he wished to alter the proviso, by inserting the words, "on which process such member, but for his claim to privilege, might be arrested" He thought hon members would not view this proviso in the light in which the hon the Attorney General had seen it Hon members must know that he (Mr Strangways) did not move this amendment, because he had not confidence in the members of that House but many hon members were engaged in mercantile pursuits, and persons engaged in large speculations may be worth thousands of pounds to day, and not worth so many pence in a few days It was not because hon members had the privilege of avoiding their creditors here that they were to go down to the Port and get on board the Havilah or the Burra and start off to Melbourne Hon members should be protected from arrest, whilst they continued members of the House and were attending to their duties as such, and remaining in the colony, but if they attempted to leave they should forfeit their privileges and become liable to arrest. As to the other clauses which referred to the writs of habeas corpus, the hon the Attorney-General had admitted that in the event of a habeas corpus being applied for, the Speaker's warrant, or verbal order, should be a good plea in bar to action This appeared in the 9th clause The difference between that House and the House of Commons was, that that House only derived its authority from the special Act now before it, and any person arrested under the Act had a right to a habeas corpus, in order to see whether the provisions of the Act had been complied with He was desirous that all the offences mentioned in the 5th clause should be dealt with by the ordinary tribunals, and he thought hon members, on reflection, would agree that this would be better than that the House should punish such offences in an arbitrary and summary manner He moved that the 5th and 12th clauses be recommitted

The TREASURER opposed the recommittal of the clauses And first with regard to the fifth clause, he considered the reasons given by the hon member for Encounter Bay very inconclusive The hon member said the offences in that clause should be dealt with by the magistrates and not by the Houses of Parliament He (the Treasurer) thought very good reasons had been assigned for the course proposed Indeed he did not know how the Courts could possibly judge of the degree of punishment to be awarded when they did not witness the contempt

The ATTORNEY GENERAL should oppose the recommittal most decidedly With regard to the 12th clause the question for the House to decide was whether the jailor or any other person in authority being called upon to shew the grounds and reasons of his holding in custody a person by order of one of the Houses of Parliament, whether it was a sufficient return for such person to show that the prisoner was in custody by virtue of such warrant as the Speaker or President was authorized to issue, and as doubt might be raised whether such warrant was sufficient, it was expedient to declare that it should be, and thereby prevent the possibility of any such question being raised With regard to the other clause objected to by the hon member, he (the Attorney General) was as far as anybody from wishing that the privileges of the House should be made the ground of evading the payment of a debt He could fancy, too, that there was no individual of any class who might not be at some time in such a position that he owed money which he was not able to pay He could not see that this remark applied to the people engaged in commerce more than to any others But if the House believed that being a member of the House should protect a person from arrest during the sitting of the House, he could see nothing which rendered it inapplicable in the cases referred to

Mr GLYDE inquired whether in the event of the amendment being negatived he would be in order in moving that the 5th clause be recommitted

The SPEAKER replied in the negative

The House then divided, when there appeared—

AYES 14 —The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Andrews, Burford Wark, Duffield, Macdermott, Collinson, Solomon, Hay, Rogers, and Mildred

NOES, 4 —Messrs Strangways, Glyde, Peake, and Lindsay

The report was then adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The report on this Bill was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

CLERKS SALARIES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to move the second reading of this Bill In doing so he did not think it necessary to add anything to what he had said on the previous day, when he explained fully the objects of the Government As there was only one clause in the Bill if the principle of the Bill was approved of, he presumed there would be no difference as to the details

Mr LINDSAY considered this a most extraordinary step on the part of the Government He had always understood that the various pension Bills brought before the House were intended to give to the various clerks and persons entitled to an increase of pay some equivalent for what they would lose by the repeal of Act No 9 of 1852 But after having failed in their object, to pass such a Bill as the present seemed to him very like what was called cutting covenants, He considered that the passing of the Bill would be an act highly dishonorable to the House, and if he stood alone he would oppose the second reading

Mr REYNOLDS said, if he understood the matter rightly, the Government had never been able to carry out the Act of '52 in its integrity, and therefore the sooner the House repealed the Bill the better He should support the Government in this matter Under ordinary circumstances he should oppose the second reading being taken so soon after the Bill was introduced, but as it was a matter hon members were quite conversant with he should not do so in this instance

Mr STRANGWAYS understood the hon the Attorney General to say that it was the intention of Government to strike out all good service pay for the year He (Mr Strangways) wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to provide that there be paid to the clerks such a sum as they received last year—that is to say, whether the Government would take the steps necessary to add to the salaries of Government clerks that portion of pay which would have been payable in case the Civil Service Bill had not been thrown out in the Upper House

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was not the intention to do so for the reasons which he had given on the previous day Last year the Government, with the assistance of the Legislature, recast the whole of the salaries of clerks, these salaries being fixed according to what was supposed to be a reasonable remuneration The Government believing it to be of great importance to have some provision made for superannuation allowances, and being desirous of making provision against being called upon to support decayed public servants, or against being liable to a pressure to retain persons in the Government employment after these persons had ceased to be efficient, had proposed a measure for the purpose Now that the measure was thrown out the Government did not consider this a proper time for adding to the salaries of public officers Hon members did not know the struggle which the Government had to keep down salaries to the point at which they were placed last year All persons were liable to suppose that their services were not remunerated as they ought to be, and consequently heads of departments found claims of this description very much pressed upon them The Government now proposed to pay the salaries without any addition Had the Civil Service Bill passed they proposed an addition in the shape of good-service pay but that Bill was thrown out They now proposed to repeal the old Bill leaving it to the Legislature at a future time, when the prospects of the country might be more cheering, to add something in the shape of good-service pay, if they considered the clerks deserved it

The Bill was then read a second time and went through Committee, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL hoped to have had the reprint of this Bill to present to the House, but it had been delayed If hon members, would, however, agree to consider the amendments, which were merely verbal ones they might go on with the Bill at once, if not, the amended reprint would be ready to lay on the table on Tuesday

Mr STRANGWAYS thought they would economise time just as much by waiting until they had the amended print as hammering away at it now

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that it be an Order of the Day for Wednesday next, which was agreed to

REPORTED DISCOVERY OF GOLD NEAR ECHUNGA

Mr SOLOMON asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether there had recently been any claim made for an alleged discovery of gold in the vicinity of Echunga

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he had heard a rumour of gold having been discovered, and that 17 ozs had been raised from one spot, but that he had had no official information on the subject as yet

GOLD IN THE NEW COUNTRY

Mr REYNOLDS asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether in the correspondence which had taken place on the subject of the claims for the alleged gold discoveries in the North, there was any notification of a claim made by Mr Foster He had heard it stated that Mr Foster had lodged a claim as well as Mr Stuart

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that no correspondence had taken place between the Government and Mr Foster

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether any fresh correspondence had taken place with Mr Stuart since that which had been printed

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had appended a memorandum to the correspondence already before them, to say that no further communication on the subject had been received

The House then adjourned at a quarter to 4 o'clock until 1 o'clock on Tuesday

CLERKS' SALARIES ACT REPEAL BILL

THE DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Hon J MORPHETT, in moving that the amendments made by the House of Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill be taken into consideration, said it would be in the recollection of all hon members that he introduced a Bill into the Council entitled "a Bill to prevent Acts from taking effect prior to the passing thereof" That Bill was passed by the Council and was sent to the Assembly for their concurrence The Assembly considered the Bill and sent it back with certain amendments which they prayed the Council to agree to, but he would at once state that he intended to move the amendments be not agreed to

The PRESIDENT said the amendments had better be read

The CLERK read the amendments, which were to the effect that the date at which Bills were assented to should be endorsed upon them by the Clerk of the House in which such Bills originated, whilst the Bill as passed by the Legislative Council provided that all Bills should be endorsed by the Clerk of the Legislative Council

The Hon J MORPHETT said hon members would see the scope of the amendments proposed by the House of Assembly and, he thought, would readily understand the reason that the Council could not agree to them To give effect to this Bill as introduced, he proposed a practice analagous to that which existed in the Imperial Parliament, where one officer was appointed to affix to the Bills the date at which Her Majesty gave her assent to all Bills passed by Parliament The Bill provided that the Clerk of the Legislative Council should be the officer who should affix the date of assent to all Bills passed by the South Australian Parliament, and he considered it was desirable there should be one officer who should be made responsible for the due performance of this duty It was not an attempt, in making this provision, to assume any superior power or privilege, nor an attempt to give the gentleman named any emolument or honor, but it merely provided that a certain duty, which was a very important one as regarded the South Australian Parliament, should be performed by one officer, who should be held responsible for the work It was, indeed, essentially necessary that the duty should be performed by the Clerk of the Legislative Council, because it would be in the recollection of hon members that the Governor had intimated his intention to come down to the Legislative Council and give his assent to all Bills In the Imperial Parliament Her Majesty, or Commissioners appointed for the purpose, give their assent, and the Governor of this colony, representing the Queen had very properly adopted a similar ceremony, and had expressed his intention of always coming to the Legislative Council to give his assent to Bills——

The CHIEF SECRETARY was sorry to interrupt the hon gentleman, but he was not aware of His Excellency having given any such intimation

The Hon J MORPHETT said the hon the Chief Secretary would have an opportunity of replying to the remarks which he was addressing to the House, but as the hon the Chief Secretary did not rise for the purpose of explanation, he was clearly out of order in interrupting him He repeated that the Governor had expressed his intention of giving his assent to Bills in the mode which he had stated

The CHIEF SECRETARY asked the hon gentleman to state when and where

The Hon J MORPHETT said that His Excellency had so stated in answer to the President, and had given effect to that answer by coming to the Council to assent to Bills The last Bills assented to were assented to by His Excellency, in person, and that was a perfectly constitutional course of giving effect to the Acts of the South Australian Parliament This being the case, it was clear that the Clerk of the Legislative Council was the only proper officer to affix upon the Bills the date at which they were assented to The House of Assembly, however, contended that the Clerk of the House of Assembly should affix the date to such Bills as were originated in that House, but how could the Clerk of the Assembly know, except by hearsay, the date at which Bills were assented to, as he could not come into the Legislative Council, and it was, therefore, practically impossible to adopt the amendments of the Assembly He saw no difficulty in carrying out the Bill as it was passed by the Council It was proposed, as the Bill was passed by that House, that the Bills should be endorsed by a gentleman sitting at his post who received the Bills from the President, the President having immediately before received them from the Governor He did not see that any question or difficulty could arise from this course Seeing, then, that they had passed a Bill perfectly analogous to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, and seeing that they could appreciate difficulties likely to arise from any departure from that practice, he felt that they would not be doing justice to themselves or to the country were they to agree to the amendments of the Assembly He therefore moved that the amendments of the Assembly be not agreed to

The Hon Captain BAGOT seconded the motion, thinking it had been clearly shewn by the hon mover that great inconvenience would probably arise if the Bills were marked by the Clerk of the other House He apprehended the great object was uniformity, and as the Bills were assented to in the Legislative Council it was quite evident that the Clerk of that House was the proper officer to endorse upon them the date of passing He apprehended this was purely a clerical operation, and one which did not in any way affect the privileges of either House

The CHIEF SECRETARY rose in explanation of a statement which had been made by the Hon Mr Morphett, that the Governor had intimated his intention of always coming to the Legislative Council for the purpose of assenting to Bills, but he was certainly not aware of any such intimation having been given by His Excellency, and he would point out to hon members, in order to show them how the case really stood and to enable them to come to a correct conclusion, that there were three courses which the Governor could adopt in giving assent to Bills His Excellency could come personally and give his assent to Bills in the Legislative Council, or he could signify his assent by notice in the Government Gazette, or the Governor could by message intimate his assent He merely made this explanation in order that hon members might understand how the case really stood To the best of his knowledge and belief His Excellency had never stated that he would come to that House for the purpose of assenting to Bills, and consequently, the inconvenience contemplated by the Hon J Morphett might not arise

The President put the question that the amendments be not agreed to, which was carried

The Hon J Morphett said, the Council having determined that they could not agree to the amendments proposed by the House of Assembly, he begged to move the appointment of a Committee to draw up reasons stating why they could not

The Hon Captain Bagot seconded the motion, which was carried

The Committee appointed by ballot were Messrs Morphett, Bagot, Forster, Hall, and the Chief Secretary, with leave to report on the following Wednesday

THE IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon the Chief Secretary, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that since the passing of the Impounding Act, No 3 of 1847 great experience had been derived as to its working, and it was thought expedient by the Government, the more effectually to bring that experience into operation, to repeal the Act, and what was beneficial in it to consolidate with the new Bill Some of the alterations proposed by the Bill were important, and others trivial It was proposed that pounds should be properly divided so as to prevent infected cattle from mixing with those which were in good health, and it was provided that there should be a good and sufficient supply of pure water for the cattle The Bill before the House also enabled the keepers of pounds to enter into recognizances before Justices of the Peace in the immediate neighborhood of the pounds, instead of compelling them at considerable expense as heretofore to come to Adelaide The Bill also fixed a penalty upon any one using in any manner his neighbours' cattle, it being no uncommon thing for parties without any felonious intent, to drive off their neighbours' horses or cattle, or to milk their cows The penalties varied from £1 to £20, according to the nature of the offence It also provided that poundkeepers should be supplied with pound-books, for, as up to the present time poundkeepers had found their own books, inconvenience had arisen when the books were required upon the pounds being broken up, in consequence of the poundkeepers detaining the books as their private property Penalties were provided for incorrect notices being given It was provided that the sale of cattle should take place only at the public pounds by licensed auctioneers, but if the poundkeeper were of good character he could obtain an auctioneer's license The Bill prevented any person interested, even in the most remote degree, becoming purchasers of the cattle at sale Provision was made for the closing of pounds consequent upon the malpractices of the poundkeeper, and there was power if parties felt aggrieved to appeal against the decision of the Justices to the Local Court There were a great many other alterations of a minor character, and he would remark that copies of the Bill had been sent to the various District Councils for their consideration, and that it had been kept back for a considerable time in the House of Assembly, where it had been fully considered and ample time allowed for bringing forward amendments

The Hon A Forster seconded the motion for the second reading, which was carried, and upon the motion of the Chief Secretary the House went into Committee upon it

The Hon J Morphett wished to know why it was proposed in the first clause to repeal Act No 8, which was not an Impounding Act, but No 8 had been passed for good and sufficient reasons, and a very good Act it was, to prevent entire horses above the age of one year running loose. It made the owners liable to a penalty for allowing such horses to run loose and although he observed the provisions of that Act carried out in one of the subsequent clauses of the Bill before the House, it would, he thought, be unwise to repeal it, the Act being perfectly well known as one to prevent bulls and entire horses from being at large The title of the present Bill was to consolidate and amend the law relating to impounding cattle, and he could not consequently see that Act No 8 had anything to do with it, or came within the title of the Bill He thought Act No 8 should be omitted in the list of Acts which this Bill proposed to repeal

The Hon the Chief Secretary said the Act referred to by the hon gentleman, to prevent entire horses running loose, had been passed before there was any Impounding Act in the colony When the old Impounding Act was passed it comprehended the Act No 8, although it did not repeal it It would be observed by the schedule that entire horses were specially alluded to in the Bill before the House, they paid a higher charge than other descriptions of cattle, and consequently the necessity for Act No 8 no longer existed

The Hon J Morphett said that under the Impounding Act, as it at present existed, entire horses might be impounded as well as any other description of cattle, but by the Act No 8 independently of the impounding fees, there was a special fine imposed for allowing the entires to run at large His objection to the repeal of the Act to which he had alluded was that he believed that Act was inconsistent with the title of the present Bill Parties might not be aware that the Act relating to the impounding of cattle referred also to entire beasts running at large, and unless the hon the Chief Secretary were prepared to alter the title of the Bill it would be better to allow Act No 8 to remain as at present

The Hon the President thought if the hon member would consider he would agree that it was within the title The existing Act, relative to impounding cattle, contained a similar clause, but still it never repealed the particular Act which had been alluded to

The Hon J Morphett had no objection if it were within the title

Clause 1, repealing certain Acts, and clause 2 relating to the interpretation of terms, were passed as printed

Clause 3, giving certain powers to District Councils, was postponed

The Hon Dr Everard pointed out a discrepancy between the 3rd clause and the 11th, as by the former power was conferred upon the District Councils, whilst by the 11th it appeared that the Justices had power to do everything, both as regarded the impounding fees and the sustenance fees He thought the 3rd clause might be struck out

The Hon the Chief Secretary said clause 3 gave power to the District Councils to carry out the Act, but clause 11 gave the Justices power to alter the schedule

Clauses 4 to 7, relating to the appointment of pounds and poundkeepers, providing that notification in the Government Gazette should be evidence of the appointment or removal of a pound or poundkeeper, prohibiting any ranger from being at the same time a poundkeeper, and providing that the pound should be fenced, enclosed, and kept clean and in repair, were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 8 provided that a constant supply of water should be maintained

The Hon Dr Everard wished "pure" to be inserted before "water"

The Hon Major O'Halloran said cattle generally preferred muddy He would point out that no penalty was provided by this clause, in the event of its provisions not being carried out

The clause was passed as printed

Also, clauses 9 and 10, relating to the fees to be paid to poundkeepers and the rates for trespass

Clause 11 provided that the Justices of the Peace of the province should have a table of charges for food, and estimate rates of ordinary damage, subject to the allowance of the Governor

The Hon Major O'Halloran pointed out that this clause did not in any way dovetail with the 3rd clause He thought it much better that there should be a general meeting of Justices from all parts of the province to decide what would be a fair scale of charges, say for six months It would be impossible to please all parties unless there were some such arrangement as that He thought that Justices should be specially invited from all parts to attend the meeting.

The Hon the President said that notice of the meeting to determine upon a scale of charges was published in the Government Gazette

The clause was passed with verbal amendments, also clause 12, providing that poundkeepers should enter into recognizances with sureties

Clause 13 provided that the party aggrieved might impound on his own land cattle trespassing

The Hon Captain Bagot, in reference to this clause, remarked that in 1826 an amended impounding law was introduced in Ireland, its object being to prevent vexatious impounding, and one provision was that whenever the owner was known the person whose property was trespassed upon should send the cattle to the owner and demand the accustomed charge for trespass, upon which he should restore the cattle, or if the amount were not paid he had recourse to the usual proceeding before the Local Court He resided in one of the country parts of Ireland at the time, and had full cognizance of the benefits which were conferred by the introduction of this measure Such a provision might, he thought, be introduced here with great advantage, giving at the same time power to parties to impound upon their own premises He was satisfied that the introduction of such a clause in the present Bill would be attended with most beneficial effects, as there could be no doubt that vexatious impounding was carried on to a great extent If the Council were prepared to consider such a clause, perhaps the best course would be to postpone the clause under discussion

The Hon J Morphett was of opinion that such a clause would be found inoperative, unless the action proposed were made compulsory To make it compulsory might be to inflict greater injury upon the party trespassed upon than the trespass itself Vexatious impounding could not be prevented unless the clause were compulsory He had no objection to make it optional that parties should either give a written notice or drive the cattle to the owner He perceived that the clause rendered it necessary that notice should be given to the owner, but as it was possible that the owner could not be found, he thought it should be sufficient if the notice were left at the last known place of abode, and would move an amendment to that effect

The Hon Major O'Halloran seconded the amendment

The Hon Captain Scott remarked that a person might impound cattle and not know the owner

The Hon the Chief Secretary said in that case after the cattle had been impounded for three days upon the property of the party trespassed upon, they would be sent to the pound

The Hon Captain Hall said the clause appeared to him to relate specially to impounding cattle the owner of which was known, but where the owner of cattle was unknown, the duty of the party trespassed upon was to send them to pound at once. The clause was, in fact, merely to enable a man to act in a neighbourly manner, but if there were no known owner, certainly his duty was to send the cattle at once to pound

The Hon J Morphett suggested that although a person might know the owner of the cattle he might not know where to find him, there was, therefore, the greater necessity for the amendment which he had suggested

The Hon the Chief Secretary did not see any objection to the proposed amendment If the Hon Mr Morphett liked to press it he did not see it could do any harm

The clause was ultimately postponed

Clause 14, relating to the mode of impounding cattle trespassing and the duty of the person sending them to the pound, was passed as printed It also provided a penalty for impounding contrary to the provisions of the Act

Clause 15 provided that when any cattle were found trespassing upon land within the bounds of any constituted district such cattle should be impounded in the public pound nearest the said land

The Hon J Morphett remarked that whilst this clause said that the cattle should be driven to the nearest pound, the 13th clause said that the party trespassed upon might impound the cattle in his own stockyard and give notice

The Hon A Forster suggested the alteration of "shall" to "may," which he thought would meet the difficulty

The Hon Dr Everard certainly considered that this clause made it imperative upon the individual who found cattle trespassing upon his property to send them to pound, but the party trespassed upon might not be disposed to do so, but disposed rather to put up the gap which the cattle had caused and turn them out As the clause at present stood it seemed to him that if the party trespassed upon did not drive the cattle to a pound he would be liable to a penalty He moved that the clause be struck out

The Hon the Chief Secretary said the clause must be read with other clauses It was not imperative that the cattle should be impounded, but if they were they must be sent to the nearest pound

The Hon A Forster imagined the intention was that the cattle should be sent to the nearest pound in the district He thought his former suggestion that "may" should be substituted for "shall," would meet the difficulty

The Hon H Ayers saw no necessity at all for the 15th clause, as the 14th provided for impounding cattle in the nearest pound to the land trespassed upon, irrespective of the district He should support the amendment of the Hon Dr Everard that the clause be struck out

The Hon Captain Hall would like to hear from the hon the Chief Secretary whether there was not some special meaning in this clause, and whether it did not refer specially to a district in contradistinction to the clause which preceded it Whether it might not be intended for the purpose of giving District Councils power to impound cattle from public lands, the previous clause referring to private lands In the district of Mitcham cattle were constantly trespassing upon the roads of the district, and he believed the District Council had no power to interfere

The Hon the Chief Secretary proposed to strike out the word "District" and insert "District Councils" He believed the object of the clause was merely that cattle should be impounded in the nearest pound irrespective of the district

The Hon H Ayers could understand the new light thrown upon the question by the Hon Captain Hall, but the clause did not say anything of the kind suggested by the hon gentleman If the object were merely that the cattle should be impounded in the nearest pound that was sufficiently provided for by the 14th clause

The Hon Capt Scott took the same view as the Hon Capt Hall, that the clause was intended to give District Councils the power of impounding cattle trespassing upon public lands, although it was not so expressed, but he thought it was intended to have that effect, from the circumstance of the previous clause referring to private property

The Hon Capt Hall suggested the insertion of the words "roads or public lands" That would give the District Councils the power of impounding cattle from such spots, and would define where they should be impounded He was perfectly aware of the great nuisance arising from cattle straying upon public lands, and it certainly struck him that this clause was inserted with the view of giving District Councils the power of impounding

The Hon J Morphett pointed out that if this amendment were introduced it would entirely alter the character of the Bill The Bill introduced by the Chief Secretary was to protect parties from the trespassing of stray cattle, but the amendment proposed by the Hon Captain Hall gave the Bill quite a different character, and he thought the Council should hesitate before they adopted it This was quite clear, that if the amendment were carried any poor man's goat, cow, or horse, which happened to be astray upon the road side would be liable to be driven to the nearest pound That was a very different proposition from the Bill as introduced by the Chief Secretary, which was merely to protect the owners of land from the trespasses of their neighbours' cattle He should not be disposed in this indirect way to introduce an entirely new element in the Bill, but if the hon the Chief Secretary thought fit he could introduce a separate measure upon the subject

The Hon Dr Davies remarked that the Council were making but slow progress with the Bill, which he believed might be attributed to hon gentlemen not having made themselves acquainted with all the provisions of the Bill, for clause 40 contained all that the Hon Mr Morphett had been talking about,

The Hon Major O'Halloran fully agreed with the Hon. Captain Hall as to the nuisance arising from stray cattle upon public lands No doubt they did an infinity of harm. Some idea of the real meaning of the clause might he thought be gathered from the 6th clause by which it could be seen that Rangers were appointed He should be sorry to see the clause struck out

The Hon A Scott considered the 15th clause merely a repetition of the first four lines of the 14th clause, and he could not understand why they wanted it in duplicate He should vote for the clause being struck out

The Hon A. Forster thought the intention was to give power to the District Councils to impound cattle, and if there were no other clause than No 14, he questioned whether that public body would have the power The former District Council Act provided for the impounding of cattle from public lands, and the Brighton District Council took that power and others throughout the colony No doubt this clause was intended to carry out that intention He thought if the words "Municipal Corporation and District Council" were introduced, all difficulty would be removed

The Hon H Ayers remarked that full power to impound was given to the District Councils by the 40th clause, as hon. members would see on reference to it

The clause was retained by a majority of one, the votes on a division being Ayes 6, Noes 5, as follow -

Ayes—Messrs Forster Davies, O'Halloran, Hall, Captain Scott, Chief Secretary (teller)

Noes—Messrs A Scott, Everard, Bagot, Morphett, Ayers (teller)

Upon the motion of the Hon the Chief Secretary, "Municipal Council" was inserted for Constituted District

The Hon J Morphett wished to move a further amendment As the clause at present stood, parties would be obliged to impound cattle trespassing upon public lands, but the amendment which he wished to introduce would make the clause consonant with the 13th

The Hon A Forster reminded the hon gentleman, that the 13th clause had been postponed

The Hon J Morphett said it was so, but it would be remembered that the 13th clause provided that the party trespassed upon might put the cattle in his own stockyard, whilst the 15th rendered it imperative that the cattle should be sent to pound He wished to insert "public" before lands, so as to exempt private lands altogether from the operations of this clause.

The Hon Major O'Halloran hoped a proviso would be introduced with the view of protecting burying-grounds and graveyards, which were shamefully trespassed upon

The Hon H Ayers remarked that in such cases the Trustees had power to impound

The Hon the Chief Secretary thought if hon members would refer to the 40th clause they would see that it met all objections He did not see that there should be any limitation as to the description of property The 15th clause must of course be read in connection with other clauses, and it merely intended to convey, that when cattle were impounded at all they must be impounded in the nearest pound

The Hon J Morphett said clause 40 could not override clause 15, and certainly, according to the grammatical construction of that clause, there would be an obligation on the part of any individual whose lands were trespassed on, to send them to the pound The clause distinctly said, "shall send them to the pound "

The Hon Captain Bagot thought they were departing altogether from the true meaning of the clause The clause was merely to show that the cattle must be impounded in the nearest pound, the object being, he presumed, to prevent vexation to the owner by the cattle being impounded a long distance off The clause, however, did not convey this meaning as clearly as it ought, but it could easily be altered to show what was its true meaning He would suggest that instead of "found," the words "impounded for trespassing" be inserted

The Hon J Morphett said the views of the Hon Capt Bagot so entirely agreed with his own that he should be happy to withdraw his amendment, and second that of the Hon Capt. Bagot.

The Hon Captain Hall hoped the Hon Mr Morphett would not withdraw his amendment, as he was satisfied the clause had not been inserted without some intention He took that intention to be different either from the 13th or 40th clause The 13th referred to private property, and the 15th to public lands In the 40th clause there was no provision beyond the Ranger having power to impound cattle. He did not think the clause could be improved beyond the proposition of the Hon Mr Morphett, by the insertion of the word "public" before lands

The Hon Dr Davies pointed out that if the clause were worded "If upon cattle being impounded for trespass" it would be implied that they might be impounded for something else

The Hon Captain Scott feared that the amendment of the Hon Captain Bagot did not meet the case The 13th clause gave power to private individuals to impound cattle upon their own premises for a certain time, but the clause under discussion, if amended, as was suggested by the Hon Captain Bagot would take away that power The amendment of the Hon Mr Morphett would leave parties at liberty to impound upon their own lands if they thought proper to do so

The Hon Captain Hall believed if the Hon Mr Morphett would adhere to his amendment every difficulty would be done away with

After some further discussion,

The Hon H Ayers suggested that hon members should withdraw their amendments, and that the Chief Secretary should consult the framers of the Bill as to the true meaning of the clause.

This suggestion was adopted, and, the clause was postponed

Clause 16, providing that the poundkeeper should have a copy of the Act, and also a pound book form, and the requisites of the latter, was passed as printed Also, clauses 17 to 20, providing that the poundkeeper should keep a board of fees and charges, and rates of ordinary damage, defining the duty and responsibility of poundkeepers, that cattle should only be delivered between sunrise nad sunset, and that the party impounding should not be liable for fees

Clause 21 provided that stray cattle should not be taken away without notice to owner of run where they were

The Hon H Ayers opposed this clause on account of its arbitrary character It was particularly objectionable here, where most of the communications were by bullock-drays He believed the object of the clause was to prevent people from going upon runs, and driving off cattle, and making improper use of them, but this might be done by restricting them from driving any cattle other than their own The hon gentleman moved an amendment to that effect

The Hon Capt Bagot seconded the amendment, believing that if the clause were passed as it stood it would prove most vexatious, particularly to bullock-drivers He believed the clause was originally introduced for the protection of the squatters, but for the protection of another class it had been shown that the amendment was most necessary

The Hon the Chief Secretary feared that the amendment would be found impracticable If the hon gentleman had ever ridden after stock he would know the difficulty of cutting out a particular beast from 20 or 30 It would be found necessary to drive the whole lot to the stockyard in order to get the particular one However desirable the amendment might be in theory, it would be found impracticable, and would leave the squatters without that protection which they were entitled to People made a trade of preying upon the squatters by driving off their cattle, having a few head of their own by way of a blind Although the amendment might prove beneficial to the bullock-drivers, it would be found against the public interest

The Hon H Ayers denied that it was impracticable, and stated that the Government in granting leases to the squatters made a reserve in favor of bullocks travelling upon the roads

The Hon Captain Bagot had every commisseration for the poor and oppressed squatters, but feared this clause would prejudicially affect a very meritorious class

The Hon John Morphett was disposed to support the clause as it stood, feeling it was necessary to give protection to a very important class—the squatters Great injustice would be done to them by giving permission to persons to cut out their own cattle It was incalculable what mischief was done to the squatters by the present system, as their cattle were scattered all over the country, and many of them were never recovered

The clause was passed as printed, with verbal amendments

Clause 22 imposed a penalty upon parties using cattle without the consent of the owner It was verbally amended and passed

Clause 23 gave power to the parties trespassed upon to destroy by any means except by poison any goats, pigs, poultry, or rabbits trespassing

The Hon Captain Bagot thought this clause rather severe Pigs were quite as valuable as large cattle, and it would be a great hardship upon the owner to give a party the power of destroying a pig worth several pounds, because it had done damage to the extent perhaps of a few shillings He should move that pigs be struck out

The Hon the Chief Secretary said if pigs got into a valuable garden the probability was they did damage to the extent of many pounds The animals, however, could not be shot at once as due notice must be given

The Hon Dr Everard thought the clause should stand as it was, as pigs were very easily confined, and there was no excuse for their being at large

The amendment of the Hon Capt Bagot was not seconded

The Hon J Morphett suggested that rabbits should be excluded from the operations of the clause, as it might be expected they would shortly be viewed as wild animals, such as opossums In several parts of the province they had burrowed, and the injury which they did to young trees was very great He thought that, whenever rabbits were met with, they ought to be shot without notice He did not see how any notice could be given, as, if the animals belonged to private individuals the probability was that they would be kept in hutches, and not allowed to go at large He was much troubled himself with rabbits, which had originally been tame, but had been turned out and become wild

The Hon the Chief Secretary said the clause referred to valuable fancy rabbits, but those referred to by the hon member came under the description of game animals, and might be shot by anyone

The clause was passed as printed, and the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave sit again on the following day

The House adjourned at five minutes to 5 o'clock, till 2 o clock on the following day

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Tuesday, December 7

The Speaker took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

MR B H BABBAGE

Mr Barrow presented a petition from Mr B H Babbage, praying the House to grant such enquiry into all the circumstances connected with the expedition to the north as might be satisfactory to the public on the one hand, and to Mr Babbage on the other

The petition was received and read

ENGINEER TO THE WATERWORKS

Mr Reynolds gave notice that, on the following day, in addition to the question which he had intimated his intention of putting to the Commissioner of Public Works, he should ask whether the late Engineer to the Waterworks Commissioners had been employed by the Government upon any railway, and, if so, when he ceased to be employed.

MR B H BABBAGE

Mr Barrow gave notice that, on the following day, he should move the petition presented by him from Mr Babbage be printed

THE REAL PROPERTY ACT

The Attorney-General gave notice that, on the following day, he should move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Real Property Act

THE RIVER WEIR

Mr Reynolds asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the Commission appointed to examine the River Weir had yet reported A Council Paper upon the table of the House showed that the engineers appointed to examine the Weir had not, at the date of that paper, concluded their examination of the structure He wished to know whether they had since done so, and, if so, whether they had reported upon the subject

The Commissioner of Public Works said the report upon the table was the only one which had been made No report had been made upon the Reservoir

JETTY AT MYPONGA

Mr Strangways was desirous of asking the Commissioner of Public Works a question in reference to the Jetty at Myponga. A sum of money had been voted for the purpose two years since, and the settlers were desirous of availing themselves of the jetty for the purpose of enabling them to ship their produce Was the hon gentleman prepared to state whether the settlers would receive the accommodation during the ensuing season?

The Commissioner of Public Works could only repeat the answer which he had given to the hon member on a previous occasion to a similar question, that until he had personally visited the spot he could not give a definite answer as to the course which the Government would pursue

THE RIVER WEIR.

Mr Reynolds asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether the House were to understand that the only report of the Commission appointed to examine the River Weir was that which was before the House? Would there be no further report?

The Commissioner of Public Works believed that there would be no further report from the gentlemen who had been appointed

MR B H BABBAGE

Mr Barrow gave notice that on the following Friday he should move the petition presented by him from Mr B H Babbage be taken into consideration with the view of granting the prayer thereof

BOARDS OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr Reynolds said perhaps the hon the Attorney General would answer the question of which he (Mr Reynolds) had given notice for the preceding Friday, but which he had postponed to meet the convenience of the Attorney-General —

"That he will ask the hon the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present session, any measure to bring the various Boards of Public Works into more direct responsibility to the Government"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would state, in reply to the question, that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a short Act for the purpose of bringing the various Boards of public works into more direct responsibility to the Government

Mr REYNOLDS wished to know whether it was likely that the Bill would be shortly introduced

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would probably be introduced during the current week, possibly on the following day

LANDS TITLES COMMISSIONERS

Mr STRANGWAYS wished again to ask the Attorney-General whether it was true that Mr Belt one of the Solicitors to the Lands Titles Commissioners, had resigned his appointment, and whether at the time the question was previously answered Mr Belt had not substantially resigned his appointment

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in answer to the first part of the question, stated that he knew nothing officially upon the subject, but he would make enquiries, and give the hon member a precise answer In reference to the latter part of the question, the answer which he read was the answer which he received from the Registrar-General, and he had no reason to suppose that it was otherwise than the direct and simple truth

RUMOURED LOSS OF MR MACDONALD'S SHEPHERD

Mr BARROW asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether the Government had received any information relative to the alleged loss of one of Mr Macdonald's shepherds, whilst coming with sheep from the Elizabeth to the settled districts, and if so whether the police at Port Augusta had taken any steps in the matter?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said he had not the slightest information upon the subject

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the District Councils Act Amendment Bill was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following day

THE HON H AYERS

Upon the motion of the TREASURER a message was directed to be sent to the Legislative Council, requesting that permission might be given to the Hon H Ayers to give evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Assembly upon the subject of taxation

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES' BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL having moved the third reading of the Parliamentary Privileges Bill,

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that it be recommitted, his principal object being to take into consideration amendments which he had suggested when the Bill was previously before the House It was, he considered, most desirable to prevent members of the Legislature from availing themselves of the privileges conferred upon them by this Bill, by which they would be enabled to leave the colony to the prejudice of other persons Another objection which he had to the Bill was that it conferred upon that House powers of punishing offences which they would not otherwise possess He had, however, so frequently alluded to his objections to the Bill, that he would not take up the time of the House by further alluding to them, but would merely move that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of taking the sense of the House upon the amendment which he was prepared to submit, to the effect that any member against whom any civil process had issued should forfeit his privilege if detected in an attempt to leave the colony

Mr REYNOLDS seconded the motion for the recommittal of the Bill, as he confessed that upon further looking through it, he found it not satisfactory to his mind He must take blame to himself for not having previously opposed certain portions of the Bill The Bill was in Committee, however, and progress had been made in it to some extent before he entered the House, and he was, consequently, precluded from making those observations which he now felt called upon to make It might look like factious opposition that he should oppose the Bill at the third reading, but he trusted the Government would exonerate him from that, as he could assure them that he was not actuated by any such feeling He thought there was a great deal in what had been said by the hon member for Encounter Bay that parties might take advantage of the privileges conferred upon them by this Bill, and absent themselves from the colony, thus preventing arrest He thought that members of the Legislature should be as liable to arrest as any other members of the community He did not like any member of that House to possess such privileges as this Bill proposed to give him, because he thought members could do very well without them A great number of the members of that House were connected with commerce, and they ought not to be placed in such a position upon their privileges that they could absent themselves from the colony and set their creditors at defiance Again, he would ask how were the contempts which it was proposed by the Bill the House should deal with to be proved? Was the mere statement of a member that he had been assaulted or insulted on his way to the House to be held sufficient? Were parties to be arrested on the mere statement of any hon member? He could not understand how it was proposed to give effect to the Bill, so vague was the 5th clause It would be much better that the Bill should be recommitted, in order that amendments might be made, otherwise he feared they would be giving the other branch of the Legislature more work with this Bill than any other which had been sent to them That would be a calamity indeed, and he therefore hoped the Bill would be made as perfect as possible before being sent to the other House

Mr HAY was something like the members who had previously spoken, for he had been absent during a portion of the time that the Bill had been under discussion, and had not had an opportunity of observing its various provisions He had not until recently observed that the Bill conferred upon members of the Legislature freedom from arrest but when he saw by the 15th clause that members were to have freedom from arrest for seven days before and after the House meeting, and whilst the House was in session, he felt bound to oppose such a provision He had always been opposed to such a provision, and had opposed it when it was under discussion on a former occasion He trusted the Bill would be recommitted, and that any such clause would be struck out To give such privileges to members of that House would be placing them in a position different from other members of the community and he did not think this ought to be If this privilege were conceded, it was impossible to say what might be the consequences, for, although he hoped the House would never be so disgraced, it was quite possible that a member might one week buy 50 or 100 tons of flour, promising to pay for it during the ensuing week, and after putting off payment from time to time, absent himself from the colony, and though his creditors saw him on the wharf, ready to take his departure by the steamer, they would be afraid to have him arrested, indeed, he could not be arrested if this Bill were passed in its present shape He was also desirous of moving amendments in reference to the clauses relating to contempt The Bill had been but a very short time before the House and hon members really had not had time to study its provisions Having got on very well so far without any such provisions as the Bill contained, he trusted it would be recommitted

Mr MCELLISTER supported the motion for the recommittal of the Bill remarking that he had been always opposed to conceding to members of the Legislature freedom from arrest If a member of that House incurred a debt, he was bound to pay it in the same way as any other member of the community would be bound He was also opposed to the clause which inflicted punishment upon any one assaulting or insulting a member whilst coming to that House He meant that he was opposed to any power being given to the House to inflict punishment for members had the same law to protect them as others He had no objection to make the law as stringent as possible to protect members whilst inside the House, but he objected to members having any further protection outside than that which was enjoyed by every member of the community He hoped the Government would assent to the recommittal of the Bill

Mr GLYDE supported the motion for the recommittal of the Bill for various reasons It would require numerous alterations to make it perfect It had been passed through its various stages with alarming rapidity, and it was not until very recently that he had an opportunity of carefully perusing it The second clause he thought required alteration, as it was desirable that the notice or summons to attend should be served personally To leave the summons at the last known place of abode was he thought not sufficient It was also desirable to alter the fourth clause, so as to provide for the case of a party refusing to attend That at present was not provided for, provision being made merely in the case of his refusing to answer questions In the fifth clause he should like also to see an alteration, although it had not been thought necessary by the Attorney-General, but as he read the clause it certainly appeared to him that the Upper House could punish any member of the Assembly for not attending There were numerous objections which he entertained to the Bill, but he principally objected to the 15th clause, and if the opponents of that clause were not strong enough to strike it out, he should move in addition to it by which members would forfeit their privilege if they were detected in the act of bolting Those were the sins of commission in the Bill, but it appeared to him there were also certain sins of omission He could not see why the Attorney-General should shrink from the responsibility of trying to define the relations between the two Houses of Legislature Numerous discussions had taken place upon the subject, and he considered that the Bill before the House was a proper one in which to define what was a Money Bill, and how Money Bills should be treated by both Houses in relation to each other He should support the motion for the recommittal of the Bill

Mr SOLOMON was certainly present on the previous Friday upon the second reading of the Bill, but was in a great hurry and had not had an opportunity of considering the various provisions of the Bill. He had since looked carefully through it, and although he had voted for the second reading of the Bill, he had on reconsideration, thought there were many portions which were clearly not necessary, and therefore ought not to be passed. He should consequently support the motion for the recommittal of the Bill, which he considered a most important one, but which, in its present shape, he believed would be found opposed to the interests of the entire community. He did not think, from the manner in which members of that House were usually selected by the different constituencies, there was any necessity to guard against the incarceration of members by giving them freedom from arrest during the session. The amount of respectability appertaining to gentlemen usually returned to that or the other House rendered it, he thought, almost superfluous to have a clause of this description upon the laws. He had great pleasure in supporting the motion of the hon member for Encounter Bay, feeling that the House had very hurriedly assented to the second reading of the Bill, and that it was one which should not be passed without due and proper consideration.

Mr LINDSAY also supported the motion for the recommittal of the Bill. The House too often hurriedly assented to measures which were consequently afterwards found defective. He was not quite satisfied with the arguments of the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) relative to freedom from arrest, who thought it quite possible that no great harm might arise, no material injury to the interests of the colony generally, from the incarceration of one or two hon members. (Mr Solomon said what he had stated was that he did not believe occasion would arise for their arrest. He was misrepresented—quite unintentionally, he was sure—by the hon member.) In the various political changes which took place, it was perfectly possible that even this free country would merge into despotism. Any unprincipled Ministry, might consequently arrange the arrest of half a dozen members, and in their absence pass some obnoxious measure. It was by an ingenious contrivance of this kind that the Emperor of the French obtained the position which he at present held. If he had not been able to arrest persons who were obnoxious to him, he would not have been Emperor at the present time.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said as no other hon member appeared disposed to address the House, he would make a few remarks. It would be remembered that this Bill had been introduced in accordance with what he might say was the distinctly expressed wish of the House. The House had expressed a wish that some measure should be introduced to define the privileges of members of the Legislature. The Bill was read a second time, and the particular question now raised was discussed, and the principle of the Bill affirmed by a full House. On the motion for the adoption of the report, the question was again discussed, and again in a full House was the principle embodied in this Bill affirmed. He therefore felt compelled to oppose the recommittal of the Bill for the same reason which had induced him to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for East Torrens—to embody such a clause in the Bill, and to support it when the adoption of the report was under consideration. The clause which had been referred to as giving freedom from arrest was not for the protection of individual members, the Government having nothing to do with the protection of individual members in their private character, but what they had to do was to take care that those who were elected by a constituency to represent their interests in the Legislature of the colony should be saved against any interference with the discharge of their duties, such as would deprive their constituents of their services at a critical juncture. That was the reason that this clause was introduced. It was not introduced to enable any hon member to avoid payment of a just claim, nor would any hon member of that House, by his vote, enable any one else to have such a privilege for such a purpose. It was not a question between A and B merchants and C and D creditors, but a question between a constituency and their representative and to enable the representative to exercise a power at a particular time, which it was most important for those who sent him to that House that he should exercise at a particular juncture. It was of the utmost importance that he should be enabled to record his vote upon a particular question, upon which it was equally important to others that he should be prevented from recording it. That was the only reason that such a clause had been proposed, and that he believed was the only reason that the House had for assenting to it. Looking at it in that light the question was whether the amendment which was proposed would not defeat the object with which the clause had been introduced. The object was that no representative at a particular conjuncture should be prevented from recording his opinions because he had been arrested upon some civil matter. If that were the object, how would it be secured if the amendment proposed were carried? If it were said that a member was to have no protection at all in the event of attempting to leave the colony, a person had only to make affidavit that so and so was about to leave the colony, and immediately the writ would issue. The member would then be deprived of an opportunity of recording his vote upon the question of such vital importance to the constituency who elected him, and the matter in reference to which the writ had been issued could not be enquired into until after the difficulty had arisen. Upon the writ issuing the member would be deprived of his privilege, the inconvenience to the public would have been occasioned, and it would be altogether useless to enquire whether there had been sufficient grounds for the assertion that he was about to leave the colony or not. He opposed the recommittal of the Bill upon that point, and with regard to others which had been suggested he would remark that House stood in the same position as a Court of Justice. If parties who had been summoned to attend a Court of Justice as witnesses were assaulted or menaced with the view of preventing them from obeying the order of the Court, the Court upon being informed of such a procedure could deal with it in a summary way. The question was, whether the House in matters of that sort would act for the vindication of their own rights or remit the vindication to another tribunal. If the House decided that they were not the proper judges of their own privileges, which were held inherent in the constitution in all other parts of the world—if they decided that they should not punish breaches of those privileges—if, in fact, the House desired to abandon their claim to do so, then they could negative the third reading of the Bill, and leave their rights and privileges upon the same footing as those of every other member of the community. The powers conferred by this Bill did not strengthen the Government at all. If, however, the House were still of opinion that their privileges should be defined, and that they should have power to protect them, they should pass the Bill in its present shape. After the question had been twice discussed and two resolutions had been arrived at by decided majorities of the House, he felt it his duty to oppose the recommittal of the Bill.

The SPEAKER put the question "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question," which was carried by a majority of two, the votes—Ayes 13, noes 11,—being as follow. The effect, of course, was that the Bill was read a third time:—

AYES, 13.—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Townsend, Burford, Macdermott, Cole, Scammell, Milne, Hallett, Rogers, Collinson, and the Attorney-General (teller).

NOES, 11.—Messrs Reynolds, Lindsay, Peake, Glyde, Hay, Hawker, Barrow, Solomon, Shannon, McEllister, Strangways (teller).

Mr STRANGWAYS was desirous of moving without remark that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

The SPEAKER said this could not be put, and the Bill was then passed, and ordered to be transmitted by message to the Legislative Council, desiring their concurrence therein.

STUART'S LEASES OF WASTE LANDS BILL

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS this Bill was read a third time and passed, and ordered to be transmitted by message to the Legislative Council, desiring their concurrence therein.

CLERKS SALARIES ACT REPEAL BILL

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL this Bill was read a third time and passed, and ordered to be transmitted by message to the Legislative Council, desiring their concurrence therein.

THE CENTRAL ROAD BOARD

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table a return, shewing the proposed application of £25,000 by the Central Road Board during the first half-year of 1859. Ordered to be printed.

THE ESTIMATES

The House then went into Committee on the Estimates.

Mr SOLOMON objected to going over the same ground which had been traversed before, but as the Ministry appeared to put the onus upon members of suggesting where retrenchment might be made, he would now move that the salary of the Government Printer be reduced to £175. He did so as he believed that it was mere mechanical skill which was required, and he considered that there was an injustice in the disproportion between the amount paid to this officer and the Clerk and Reader.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Government Printer was not merely a person of very great experience and ability—a fact which he believed was known to many hon members, and to every person acquainted with that officer—but that upon him depended the whole organization of the department over which he presided. The printing department was one of the most costly in the Government service, and merely depended on the arrangements carried out by the printer, so that it was essential to have the services of an efficient person. Persons who knew the nature of the duties must know that the sum proposed was not more than would secure the services of a qualified person, and if an inefficient person was employed, the department would cost perhaps four or five times the amount proposed.

Mr SOLOMON said that hon members were again met by the same arguments with which every member who proposed a retrenchment had been met. He believed the salary was sufficient for the duties. He was sorry to be compelled to adopt the course which he was now compelled to take, but when hon members attempted to make a general retrenchment, they were met by being asked to point out where the retrenchment should be effected, and when they did this they were met by a representation of the high character of the gentleman who filled the position under consideration, and the necessity of having a competent person to fill it He believed that every hon member would agree that they should have competent persons, but whatever amount of abuse he might incur out of doors, if he stood alone, he should oppose this item. He believed that persons equally competent with this gentleman could be procured for a smaller amount than that on the Estimates, and that the work could be done more economically by tender He would move that the sum be reduced to £175

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS quite agreed with the hon member that, if he thought the sum too much, he should stand up against it, even though he stood alone, but he could not agree with that hon member that any undue onus or burthen rested on him in the consideration of the Estimates When he (Mr Blyth) was a private member of the House the same onus rested on him (Hear, hear) There was no onus thrown upon any hon member which was not imposed upon him when he became a member of that House If the hon member had the advantage of a little experience of printing by tender, he would not have said that the work could be done cheaper by that means There had been a considerable part of the Government printing done in private establishments, and it was found that in the Government office the work was done much more economically With regard to the item before the House, he felt that he need not eulogise the gentleman who filled the office of Government printer, whose qualifications he believed were as well known to the hon member (Mr Solomon) as to any person, but he considered the salary a moderate and fair one and should, therefore, vote for it

Mr LINDSAY could not see how the House was to go on reducing the items separately If there was to be a retrenchment he would prefer a per centage commencing with the heads of departments, and going gradually downwards, as he presumed that the salaries were at present in a fair proportion

Mr HAY would support the item—(" hear, hear" from the Commissioner of Public Works)—as the salary was not above what a person competent for the duties ought to be paid The printer was not like an ordinary clerk, as the person who filled this office must have served an apprenticeship, must know the department, and must see that it was properly conducted He (Mr Hay) believed the Government Printer was competent for his duty, and that, if he had remained in private establishments he would receive more than the sum set down, and that other persons, with less responsibility, received as much Whilst desirous of cutting down the expenditure, he (Mr Hay) would not deprive any individual of the remuneration which he deserved He believed that this officer fulfilled his duty If any statement to the contrary were made, he (Mr Hay) should dismiss the printer but, unless that officer did neglect his duty, he (Mr Hay) considered the salary not too large

Mr REYNOLDS believed the printer to be one of the most efficient officers in the Government service, and was therefore disposed to pay that officer well, as otherwise there would be a number of drones to maintain He felt the inconvenience of dealing with the items separately, as whenever it was proposed to reduce the pay of an officer, the House found that that officer was one of the most efficient or indispensable men in the service (Laughter) He thought they would have to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for East Torrens, or the Burra and Clare, for it had been made by so many hon members, that he could not say which, and that the House would have to deal with the totals after all It would be just as well to oppose the items in a lump sum when the Appropriation Act came before the House, and if hon gentlemen on the other side then said they could not get on with the amount, they must give way to those who could make it answer (Laughter) Then, if heads of departments said "we cannot make reductions," the Government would have to say "you must," and matters must come to that point before the Estimates were reduced to a proper amount There was another idea which he (Mr Reynolds) had thrown out before, though the House had not taken hold of it, and he would now throw it out again It was necessary to increase the working hours of Government clerks, and without any serious detriment to these persons, the hours should be made from 9 to 5 instead of from 10 to 4, by which means the country would obtain a third more work This would be paying men well for working them a little more, and this he (Mr Reynolds) considered a very important matter

Mr STRANGWAYS approved of the suggestion of the hon member (Mr Reynolds), but preferred that of the hon member (Mr Glyde), who proposed to adopt the Melbourne Audit system, which would enable the Treasurer to put as much money in his pocket as he liked (Laughter) The proposal would relieve the Government of one of their most obnoxious duties—that of apportioning money The Treasurer would go into the cheapest market without any regard to efficiency, for under the new system there would be no means of checking him, and an audit would be quite superfluous He (Mr Strangways) was not in the habit of supporting the Government, but he should do so in this instance If hon members were to object to each item of expenditure, some one would have to prepare fresh Estimates and ask the House to adopt them This would be the duty of a new Treasurer, but he (Mr Strangways) did not think that any hon member was prepared to bring in fresh Estimates as he had no doubt that some hon member had an objection to almost every item Hon members would find that the present item was about as low as it should be, having due regard to the efficiency of the public service He (Mr Strangways) did not wish to cut down officers in the Government service to the lowest possible point, or to over work them, but he considered six or eight hours' hard work—and, notwithstanding all that had been said, many Government officers had that amount—was as much as any ordinary man could accomplish He thought it better to pay a fair day's salary for a fair day's work than an unfair day's pay for inefficient work As to the Government printing, an immense deal of work was occasioned by votes of the House He believed the majority of the salaries were as low as it was possible to bring them

Mr BARROW congratulated the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) on his humorous speech, but thought the hon member had substituted bad jokes for good arguments He (Mr Barrow) could not tell why the hon member had such a "down" upon the audit system of Melbourne In Melbourne persons would scarcely be of the same opinion There was at least one advantage connected with the Melbourne audit system, viz, that the result of the audit was published quickly (No, no) The hon member might cry "no, no," but he (Mr Barrow) said emphatically "yes, yes" (Hear, hear) He had seen the accounts published in January down to the 31st December, and had pointed this out to the Auditor-General here

The TREASURER asked whether the hon member was in order

The SPEAKER ruled that he (Mr Barrow) was

Mr BARROW was sorry that he should have said anything which could discompose the hon the Treasurer (Laughter) The hon member for Encounter Bay had referred to the obnoxious duty which devolved upon the members of the Government in the apportioning of the salaries No doubt it was an obnoxious task to any person to say to an individual that he must be content with a little less than he received, but the duty was less obnoxious when performed by the Government than when performed by the House If the members of the House made individual retrenchments, they would become obnoxious, but nothing was easier than for a member of the Government to say "The Government were prepared to advance your salary, but those confounded radicals in the House insisted upon curtailing it" and by this means throw the whole blame on independent members (Laughter) That was what he (Mr Barrow) thought would be the amount of the obnoxious duty The hon member for Encounter Bay had referred to the prospect of his (Mr Strangways) filling the office of Treasurer—(laughter)—and had indicated the steps which would lead to that result The hon member said that if the House could not agree to the Estimates some hon member must prepare fresh Estimates and that the framer of the new Estimates should become Treasurer in the place of the present Treasurer The hon member for Encounter Bay had evidently studied the whole course between the seat he (Mr Strangways) then occupied and that of the hon the Treasurer (Laughter) The hon member for Gumeracha had stated that there were persons in printing offices who received as large salaries or larger than that now proposed, but that depended on the amount of service rendered No printer received £400 a year for working during Government hours If the printer worked early and late, he (Mr Barrow) could understand the proposed salary, but for working during Government hours, the salary was such as would not be given in any private office With reference to the compositors in the Government office, he might remark that as printing was generally paid for by "piecework," a man might earn £3, or £4, or £5 per week, but he always got exactly what he earned He believed the printing-office was one of the most efficient departments in the Government service, and he made that statement on the authority of persons who possessed much information on the subject

Mr PEAKE supported the motion, considering that the Government officers were shorn of their good-service pay He congratulated the Hon the Treasurer on the probability of that hon member's holding office for some time (laughter), inasmuch as the plan laid down by the hon member for Encounter Bay was so singular that that hon member was not likely to reach the Treasurer's bench for a long time (Laughter) The hon member (Mr Strangways) had stated that some hon member should prepare counter estimates, which seemed to him (Mr Peake) a very strange and novel motion He had previously deprecated discussing the Estimates item by item, and every step that hon members took the greater difficulty they found in dealing with the subject If the revenue was not, in the opinion of the House sufficient to meet the expenditure proposed by the Hon the Treasurer let it be reduced, but hon members would find that they would never make any retrenchment dealing with the items seriatim

Mr TOWNSEND supported the item, believing that the salary was not too high With regard to a remark of the hon member (Mr Barrow) whether the Government printer worked Government hours or not, hon members knew that documents frequently took until 8 or 9 o'clock in printing, and any person going through Victoria-square must know that the office was open until these hours He regretted that he was not in the House to hear the easy manner in which the hon member for Encounter Bay proposed to make his way into the Treasury (Laughter) He (Mr Townsend) had not the least doubt that that hon member believed that he could fill any office—(laughter)—and the next surprise which he (Mr Townsend) could have felt to that caused by hearing the hon member speak of attaining the position, would be that of seeing him do it (Laughter)

Mr SOLOMON said he would withdraw his motion, but with a full determination of moving on a future day that a certain sum should be deducted from the sum total on the Estimates

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the hon member who had last spoke must have seen the practical impossibility of the course which he proposed The hon member withdrew his motion because he was satisfied that it was unjust to the Government printer, and incompatible with the interests of the public, that the salary should be diminished, for if the hon member did not think this he would have pressed his motion The hon member therefore confessed that the reduction was unjust and inexpedient ("No, no," from Mr Solomon) Then he (the Attorney-General) could not understand why the hon member should withdraw his amendment He believed the salaries proposed were not excessive either with regard to the character of the individuals employed or the nature of the duties The hon member (Mr Solomon) had said, that whenever hon. members proposed reductions, they were met by the same arguments This reminded him (the Attorney General) of the individual who complained that when he said that two and two made five, or two and two made three, he was always met by the same argument, that two and two made four (Laughter) When hon members repeated precisely the same arguments, they must be met by the same replies The Estimates had been framed on the one hand with a due regard to economy, and on the other with a due regard to the necessities of the public service The Government did not propose any increase in expenditure, as they did not think the exigencies of the public service would justify them in doing so The House might believe that it was possible to get the work done at a lower rate, but it was not possible under the present organisation The Government had considered each individual case, so that the matter had not been done without due consideration If the House objected to any individual or office, of course they could do so, but the Government considered that the service was satisfactorily performed and with such a degree of economy as would not allow of reduction The hon member for the Burra himself admitted that no reduction could be made without reorganization of the service The whole subject had been considered by a Committee of the former Legislature, and no essential amendment was made by that Committee, or by the Commission appointed by the succeeding Legislature He should, therefore, support the Estimates substantially as they stood, though if any hon member should make a suggestion as to the inefficiency of any officer, the Government were prepared to consider it

The item was then put and passed

The next item, £569 10s, was agreed to

On the next item, Public Cemetery, £287 10s

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired whether the Government proposed to close the present cemetery and to establish a new one less likely injurious to the public health

Dr WARK said that during the last session he had called attention to this matter, and that the Attorney-General then stated that during the recess the Government would take the matter into consideration, and would bring in a measure during the present session to meet the evil, yet no alteration had been made as yet It was too bad for members of the Ministry to make pledges of such a character as this, and allow a whole session pass away without carrying them into effect

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Government had had the matter under consideration, but during the past 12 months no complaints had been made on the subject, nor had any suggestions been made that the public health would be benefitted by a removal Considering the great expense attending a removal, and the difficulty of getting a place equally convenient, the Government would not feel justified in effecting a removal unless some very strong grounds were shown in favour of such a step, and from enquiries which had been made, the Government did not believe that such grounds existed

The item was then agreed to

On the next vote, Ecclesiastical, £275

In reply to an enquiry,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he could not tell how the sum of £75 for religious instruction at the Dry Creek Labor Prison was expended, but it was expended in accordance with a scheme approved by the Government He (the Attorney-General did not know precisely what the scheme was

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether any complaints had been received from the convict department or the gaols, respecting the non-attendance of any clergyman of the Church of England He had heard last year a proposal that the pay of the Colonial Chaplain should be divided amongst the various denominations He had also heard that formerly there used to be a very large attendance at the services of the Colonial Chaplain, but that when the arrangements were altered it was the opinion of the prison authorities that the change was not beneficial

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL believed that the first result of the change was not satisfactory, and that there had been a failure in the attendance of clergymen of the Church of England

Mr TOWNSEND said that he understood that a communication had been made by Mr Hare to the clergy, and that none of the clergy would agree to the plan proposed He believed the Rev Messrs. Packard and Mudie were the only clergymen who attended the prisoners

Mr BURFORD moved that the item be struck out From what occurred during the last session, he had anticipated that men whose professions were so good would attend to their duties, and it was not until some time after that he found that the clergymen who used to attend to these duties ceased to attend, because the stipend ceased to be paid He then felt it his duty to enquire into the matter, and instantly took action (Laughter) He communicated with many persons engaged in the Ministry of the Gospel, and found that the document referred to by the previous speaker had been referred to three denominations only He (Mr Burford) had communicated with the Hon the Chief Secretary, once and again he received promises, once and again he paid personal visits, once and again—(laughter)—but excuses were continually made At one time, he (Mr. Burford) was told that the Chief Secretary was ruralizing at the Goolwa, and would be back in six weeks The document was forwarded to the Hon the Chief Secretary, and then to the Rev So and So In the meantime Mr Hare was left to act on his own hook, and that gentleman's procedure was such as no person could find fault with, various clergymen had given their services on the voluntary principle, and he (Mr Burford) believed the House would only be doing its duty by striking off the £200 and retaining the £75

Mr MILDRED supported the views of the previous speaker as he had done on a former occasion It was then adduced in argument that the Colonial Chaplain was appointed before the Constitution Act, and that it would not therefore be fair to displace him, but he (Mr Mildred) did not think the House was justified in voting the money when Church and State had been dissevered He regretted that the system of a reduction by a per centage on all salaries was not persisted in

Mr REYNOLDS thought the House should vote a sum for the purpose of supplying religious instruction at the Gaol, Hospital, and Lunatic Asylum, but he objected to the title of Colonial Chaplain

The ATTORNEY GENERAL supported the vote, not because he considered it necessary to keep up anything in the shape of a religious establishment, but because it was necessary that the colony should observe good faith As soon as the gentleman who now held the office of Colonial Chaplain ceased to occupy the position he (the Attorney-General) should feel himself not only at liberty but bound to vote for the abolition of the office

After a trifling discussion the amendment was put and lost

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the amount for the Colonial Chaplain be reduced to 150*l*, the original salary

The House divided, and the amendment was carried

The next item, Military, £1,254 8s 6d, was postponed

The next item, Law Officers, £465, was, after a short discussion, agreed to

The next item, Supreme Court, £1,065, was also agreed to

Magistrates and Local Courts, £4,320 7s 6d

Mr GLYDE asked for some information as to the salaries of the Clerks of Courts throughout the various districts. The Treasurer had stated that a certain system was adopted as to the scale on which the Clerks were paid and the mode of payment, but there were some items which did not seem to be in conformity with this system

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that the Clerks were first paid by fees, which graduated from £50 to £150 per annum After reaching the latter amount, the fees were then appropriated by the Government, and the salaries made distinct payments

Mr STRANGWAYS wished to know whether it was the case that the Police in the various country districts were employed as bailiffs to the Local Court His attention had been called to a case at Morphett Vale, where one of the police acted in the capacity of bailiff, and in the course of the year received large amounts in fees, which, he had been given to understand, amounted to more than the salary of a Stipendary Magistrate He believed this appointment had been made during the diggings times when persons were not easy to be got to act as bailiffs, but the case was different now, and many would be glad of such employment It was not proper that the police should be employed in serving civil processes He hoped the Government would give their attention to the matter, and if it was found that the Police were occupied in those duties it would be immediately be put a stop to

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was not aware that what the hon member for Encounter Bay referred to had occurred He quite agreed that except in special cases the police should not be employed in serving civil processes It had frequently happened that persons could not be got to act in the capacity of bailiffs for the small amount of remuneration that was offered, but he thought that objection could not be made

now The appointment referred to by the hon member for Encounter Bay had, no doubt, been made under special circumstances, but as soon as those special circumstances ceased to exist, this appointment should have been annulled He would take care to make the necessary enquiries

Mr McELLISTER thought there were plenty of persons might be got to perform the duties without resorting to the police, and he was strongly opposed to the continuance of such a system

Mr REYNOLDS called attention to the item "Second Stipendiary Magistrate, also, Inspector of Police £30," under the head of South-Eastern Districts, and he wished to know what it meant

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that the gentleman who acted as Stipendiary Magistrate at Penola, was away on leave of absence, and it was suggested that Mr Scott, the Inspector of Police, should perform the duties in his absence, for which this remuneration was allowed

After some remarks from Mr HALLETT, which were inaudible in the gallery,

Mr REYNOLDS said that as there was £150 down for a Stipendiary Magistrate he did not see the necessity for a second one He thought both the Courts which existed in this district might be attended by one magistrate, and he should, therefore, move that the item of £30 to the second Stipendiary Magistrate be struck out

Mr GLYDE asked why they did not see a decrease in the Estimates on this head, as it was stated that Mr Power, the magistrate at Penola was away on leave of absence

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that Mr Power had performed the duties gratuitously for some time, and (as he was understood to say) that the salary was in consideration of that still continued

Mr HAWKER said so far as his experience went he was convinced that it was impossible for one man to perform the duties of both Courts, at Penola and Mount Gambier, and he considered the way in which the Government had arranged the matter would tend to the more efficient working of the Courts at either of these places

The total item was then put and carried

"Court of Insolvency, £1,055"

Mr STRANGWAYS asked why the returns in connection with this department had not as yet been supplied to the House He had heard that proper and diligent steps were not being taken to comply with the motion carried for that purpose Before he moved for these returns he had consulted two persons on the subject, and had been informed by one that if the accounts in the office of the Court of Insolvency were kept in order, and the books properly posted up, the returns should be furnished within a week The other person he had consulted, and who had some means of judging, said the accounts were in such a mess that it would be impossible to get the returns without professional assistance Six weeks had now elapsed since the returns were called for, and he wished to hear from the Attorney-General the cause of this delay In the meantime, he should move that the item of the "Court of Insolvency" be postponed until the returns were furnished

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could only say in reply to the hon member that he would make enquiries, and that as soon as the returns were prepared they should be layed on the table He could not agree however, to the motion for postponement, which was that the Commissioner should not be paid because there happened to be some delay in furnishing those returns

Mr STRANGWAYS believed if the Attorney-General took steps at once the returns would be forthcoming within a week On the understanding that the Attorney-General would make such enquiries as would lead to the production of the returns—("Hear, hear," from the Attorney-General)—he would withdraw his motion

Registrar-General of Deeds, £3,108 15s

Mr STRANGWAYS moved the postponement of this item until the returns which had been asked for in connection with the Lands Titles Department had been supplied He thought the nature of those returns would astonish some hon members, and they would find that reduction in this department was necessary Under this head they had a Registrar General and three Deputy Registrars Surely two of these offices might be abolished Then they had two solicitors at high salaries, one of whom he believed he was correct in saying had recently resigned As to the working of the principle the Attorney-General had given notice that he would apply for leave to amend the Real Property Act, but it often happened that when you attempted to mend one hole you made two From the opinion generally expressed by the legal profession he believed it would be impossible to amend the Act, at least, that the only amendment would be to do away with it altogether

Mr BARROW thought the two branches of this department might very well be managed under one head at all events he should like to know what inconvenience would result from so doing He had stated on a former occasion that he had heard that the Deeds Registration Department was breaking down under its own weight, and that there were 76 vols of indices This information he had received from a gentleman in a high official position, but he had since heard that the indices were not so bulky as was supposed There were, in fact, only about 16 volumes of index He presumed that his informant had confounded the rough index-books used in preparing the permanent index with the permanent index itself He had, however, correctly stated what he had been officially informed of He had likewise heard that the Lands Titles Office might of itself easily manage all the conveyancing and registration business in the colony, and he therefore wished to know from the Attorney General whether the Deeds Registration Department might not be dispensed with entirely

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) should be called upon to give the name of the authority for the statements he had just made

Mr BARROW said if the hon member would name his authority for the statement of the police having acted in the capacity of bailiffs at Morphett Vale, he should have no objection to comply with his wish (Laughter)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said as far as regarded the Deeds Registration department it cost the country £1,800, and it returned £6,000 a year in fees, or more than three times the amount of its cost He thought this would be a reason why they should not do away with the department. At the present time nine-tenths of the property was subject to the old system It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that the Deeds Registration Department should be kept up, or otherwise it would tend to destroy in value the property of every person in the colony, for they would be prevented from dealing with it As to the proposition to bring these departments under one head, the same service would still have to be performed In bringing it under one roof, not one officer, he believed could be dispensed with, nor one farthing spared He was desirous that the Real Property Act should have a trial But it was also desirable that the two systems should be worked by different machinery and by separate heads to ensure proper efficiency in each department The Deeds Registration Department would, he believed, have to be kept up for some years to come The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had referred to 76 volumes of indices in the Deeds Registration Department, but he (the Attorney-General) would state there were really only 15 volumes The books of memorials were, of course, large and ponderous, and necessarily so It would be found, he thought, that by the time the Real Property Act had existed as long as the system which was now in vogue, and had met with half the success which its friends anticipated, the books would be as numerous and cumbrous as those under the old system The new Act was necessarily imperfect at first, but that should not be urged as an objection against the system

Mr BARROW would like to know from the Attorney-General with regard to the fees which he alleged were received under the Deeds Registration Department, whether those fees were expected in future, or were what had been hitherto realised As to the statement he (Mr Barrow) had made with respect to the 76 vols of indices, he could only affirm again that his authority was a gentleman connected with the Registration Department (Name) He would further state that he ultimately ascertained that though there were not 76 vols of completed index, there were 120 rough folios, and this might account for any inaccuracy in the statement that had been made to him on the subject With regard to the question under consideration if the Attorney-General assured the House that this establishment must be maintained, he should feel bound to vote for the item,

Mr STRANGWAYS again insisted that the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) should be requested to state the name of his authority (No, no)

The CHAIRMAN said there was no Standing Order which would compel the hon member to do so He believed, however, that the usage of the House of Commons was that where persons in official positions were mentioned as authorities they should be named, unless they were in a subordinate position, and would be prejudiced thereby

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether the officer in question was in that inferior position or the head of a department (Laughter)

Mr BARROW said if it were the wish of the House that he should name his authority, he would do so (No, no) But as he found that the wishes of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) were generally diametrically opposed to the wishes of the House, he might, by consulting his (Mr Strangways's) views incur the displeasure of the House at large (Laughter)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, in reply to the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), that the fees of the Registration Department were estimated for the next half year, and would probably continue at that rate for the next three or four years For 12 months at least there would certainly be no diminution

Mr REYNOLDS would have been glad to hear the authority on which the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had made his statement, as it might have influenced his (Mr Reynolds's) vote (Laughter) He surmised that the gentleman referred to was Mr Torrens, the Registrar General, and that, if it were he, he had been cramming the hon member for East Torrens as to the defects of the old system If Mr Torrens could take charge of both departments, by all means he should have them, and it would be still better if they could reduce the total expenditure by £1,000 or £1 500 They had heard that nine-tenths of the work was performed by the old department, and if that could be done for

£800 or £900, there was surely some excess under the Lands Titles Department It was very well to give the new system a fair trial, but while that was being done they were spending £4,000 or £5,000 a year in attempting to carry out that which was impracticable (No, no) Well, he should like to know what property had been brought under the Act They could only form an inference from what had already been done He was disposed to curtail the salaries in this department, and he should begin with the Registrar-General That gentleman, he thought, was not entitled to £1,000 a year for the piece of patchwork he had presented to them, and he should move that it be reduced to £800 It had been said that this amount included his pension, but he (Mr Reynolds) maintained that that was not to the point It was with the office they had to do, not the officer, and they might be called upon to deal with the question on the morrow or on any future occasion, irrespective of such personal considerations

Mr BURFORD said it was not fair that the subject should be discussed in the manner it had been by the last speaker He (Mr Burford) had heard a great deal of rant as to the two systems——(A laugh)

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether the hon member referred to him in using that expression

The CHAIRMAN ruled the hon member for the city was out of order, as nothing in the debate justified the use of the term "rant"

Mr BURFORD had not his dictionary there, but he believed he was perfectly in order (Laughter) He would, however, of course be ruled by the Chairman It was an ominous fact that the last speaker had studiously avoided any reference to the design of the measure, or the benefits which would accrue to the public from it That hon gentleman had carefully kept this point in the background He (Mr Burford) thought if they wanted any proof of the advantage gained under the new system they had it in the fact that a conveyance which in some cases formerly cost £30 could now be executed for 30s They should be ready to take a fair view of the defects of a new measure But what were the hon members who opposed the measure doing? Why, they would not give it even six months' trial (No, from Mr Strangways) The fact was they did not like the creature, and therefore they wanted to smother it (A laugh) But fortunately they could not have their own way in this He rejoiced to find that it was the intention of the Attorney-General to introduce certain amendments which would increase the efficiency of the measure and he was sure they should be enabled to carry them through, notwithstanding the opposition of the small craft (A laugh) He deprecated the conduct of the hon member for the Sturt, and the hon member for Encounter Bay in depreciating that which would be of such service to the country

Mr STRANGWAYS was quite surprised to hear the hon member for the city (Mr Burford) say that he rejoiced that the Attorney-General was about to amend an Act which only the last session he (Mr Burford) had declared to be perfect

Mr BURFORD explained that he did not say the measure was perfect but that the principle of it was so

Mr STRANGWAYS believed the hon member had said what he had attributed to him As to the economy of the new system of registration, he would say that a person under the old system of registration could procure his land grant at the cost of £1 1s But under the new, which was deemed so perfect and economical, he had to pay the £1 1s, and an additional sum to the assurance fund He would state a case in point within his own knowledge A gentleman—not a public officer—(a laugh)—was leaving the colony, and wished to leave a power of attorney behind to manage his affairs during his absence He first went to the Lands Titles Office to get this power of attorney, but he was told there that he could not get it, but must go to his solicitor He thereupon goes to his solicitor, and finds that the expense will be £4 4s He returns to the Lands Titles Office, but to his astonishment, finds that he will have to take out no less than 54 separate powers of attorney, as he had 54 distinct properties Then again he could not see that because the Registrar General was the father of this measure he should therefore be paid more liberally than others, the Commissioner of Insolvency for instance The Deputy Registrar-General under the old system was a very efficient officer and yet he was receiving only £400 a year, while in the new department where there was nothing to be done, the salaries were so much out of proportion with the former He objected also to the item of "solicitor" He did not see why one solicitor should not be enough He saw no reason why they should have a Deputy Registrar-General The whole work might be performed by one head Again, there was a Secretary to the Commission That office, he thought, might be dispensed with, as he could have next to nothing to do, and then he would leave two, instead of three clerks, at £200 per annum He saw there was £50 down for drafting certificates of titles which was one of the most important duties in the office, but he supposed the Registrar-General had valued the service at this in order that he might have an extra £500 for doing it himself

Mr GLYDE would support the postponement of the item, not because he wished to depreciate the Real Property Act, but in order that the returns might be furnished, and he thought neither the opponents nor the supporters of the Bill could object to this on reasonable or interested grounds

Mr HAWKER thought it would have been much better that the items of "Deeds" Registration and "Lands Titles" should have been separated No one could doubt that the former was required to be maintained to ensure the efficiency of the whole They had been told by the hon the Attorney-General that nine-tenths of the business passed through the former department, and that would be a good reason for not curtailing it Notwithstanding the perfectitude of the new measure which the hon member for the city (Mr Burford) had spoken of, they now required to introduce, he understood, 93 new clauses to, make it workable Considering the late period of the session he did not see how these amendments were to be accomplished The very fact of there being 93 new amendments or clauses was evidence of the hasty mode of legislation He should vote for the item of Registrar-General of Deeds, and for the postponement of the Lands Titles Department until it had been ascertained it was in efficient order

Mr MCELLISTER said nine-tenths of the property passing through the old department might be attributed to the continued opposition of the legal profession It was also a fact that the land grants up to a certain date had to pass under the old Act But despite all this, however, the public voice would have the measure, notwithstanding the opposition of its detractors

Mr SOLOMON regretted that the opposition had not been quieted down before this He should vote for the item as it stood, because he believed the Real Property Act was designed to do a great deal of good No single reason had to his mind been advanced as to why the item should not be passed All that the friends of the measure asked for was a fair trial But had this been accorded? Certainly not What would be the effect of postponing the item? Was it supposed that the amendments proposed to be introduced would be carried this session? (The Attorney-General "Yes") He thought it impossible at that late period of the session and the result would be, if they did not pass the item, that the Lands Titles office might shut up It was an ascertained fact that the people would have the measure—("no," and "hear, hear,")—and if not workable now they would make it workable hereafter The whole of the legal profession were against the measure almost to a man, and that was sufficient proof that it tended to deprive them of large emolument, and to place it in the pockets of the public Therefore it was that those gentlemen took every means to thwart the success of the measure He hoped the amendments would be passed and that the measure would not be allowed to be burked for want of a trial

Mr LINDSAY saw no objection to postponing the item, and said that imperfections might be urged against the Real Property Bill, but it was the case with every other Bill which was passed by that House (A laugh) From what the Attorney-General had said, he (Mr Lindsay) was under the impression that that hon gentleman would be prepared to bring in a new Bill, if necessary, and he believed if he (the Attorney-General) had applied himself to the amendment of the measure when it was first introduced, they should have had a perfect measure now

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would say with regard to the postponement that he was not aware that any information which could be placed before the House would have any influence on the votes of hon members He thought it was very unfair to complain of a measure because certain imperfections had been discovered on the first attempt to work it But this was not an exceptional case, it was the same with every other measure, and he was persuaded that there was no supporter of the Bill who was not aware that there would be defects perceptible when the theory came to be put in practice It was the case in other pursuits that there were temporary failures which did not affect the ultimate usefulness or the principle of the improvement But he was bound to say, in reply to what the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) had said as to the opposition of the legal profession to this measure, that the gentlemen composing that profession had to regard the interests of others besides their own feelings Every professional man had to study the opinions of his clients, and that was a reason why they should not be harshly accused of personally interested motives He (the Attorney-General) had said a great deal in favor of the Real Property Act, but he had also said there were grave defects in it. He was one of those who acted for himself, and was, singularly enough, disposed to wish to do what he liked with his own He had not brought his property under the operation of the Act, and he had thought it right that other persons should be placed in the position of exercising the same freedom of will The amendments however which would be introduced would do away with the grounds of objection and that which formed the topic of opposition They should, he would suggest, be prepared to discuss these amendments and pass them during the present session Some of them affected very seriously the working of the measure, and it was, therefore, necessary that such obstacles should be removed at once

Mr MILNE would oppose the postponement, and vote for the items as they stood He hoped hon members would watch narrowly the safety of a measure which they had pledged their faith to the country to carry through members, it might be supposed he was an opponent of the measure, but he assured them on the contrary he was amongst its warmest supporters (laughter), that was, to the principle of the measure, and there was no one more anxious to see it carried out.

Mr. BAGOT would not agree to the postponement of the item, because he thought it so absolutely necessary to amend the measure, that they should sit night and day, if possible, to do it. It would be sufficient to state, in support of this, that no less than 93 new clauses would be introduced, and 76 clauses of the old Act repealed. It was highly necessary that immediate steps should be taken to place the measure in a workable state. The House were beginning to see now, no doubt, that the objections of the legal members of the House during the last session on the passing of this measure, and which were met then with the cry of "Oh! they are interested parties," were deserving of more attention than they had received. If the motion for postponement had been to enquire into the salaries of the department, he should have had no objection to it, but as it was, he should vote against the postponement.

Mr. HAY vindicated the course taken by the introducer and supporters of this measure from having opposed factiously any justifiable amendments introduced by the legal profession. He trusted the amendments which would be made in the Bill would be such as to make it completely successful, and that they would see the majority of the property in the colony brought under its operation. It was the desire, he was assured, of the people generally that the measure should be carried through.

The CHAIRMAN then put Mr. Reynolds's amendment for reducing the Registrar General's salary from £1,000 to £800, and declared it lost.

A division was called for by Mr. REYNOLDS, with the following result:—

AYES, 4.—Messrs. Glyde, Strangways, Barrow, and Reynolds (teller).

NOES, 25.—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Townsend, Scammell, Burford, Peake, Mildred, Wark, Macdermott, Hallett, Hawker, Milne, Shannon, Duffield, Harvey, Bagot, Solomon, Cole, Collinson, McEllister, Rogers, Lindsay, Hay, and the Treasurer (teller).

Making a majority of 21 in favor of the Noes.

On the second item, Solicitor, £500, being proposed, a discursive conversation followed, as to whether the division called for was in reference to the vote for the whole department, or for the first item in that department. The Chairman ruled that it was for the department as a whole, and that he would put the various items seriatim, which members could affirm or negative as they pleased; but that no further discussion could take place upon any item in that department. The Chairman remarked that he was willing to take the sense of the House, if required, but that he believed his present ruling to be in conformity with the Standing Orders.

Mr. GLYDE moved that the whole department be postponed.

Mr. REYNOLDS's amendment was first put, "that the salary of £500 to solicitor be struck out and £400 substituted in its place."

The CHAIRMAN declared the Noes had it.

Mr. REYNOLDS called for a division. The following was the result:—

AYES, 5.—Messrs. Bagot, Hawker, Reynolds, Strangways, and Glyde (teller).

NOES, 23.—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Barrow, Burford, Cole, Collinson, Duffield, Hallett, Harvey, Hay, Macdermott, McEllister, Mildred, Milne, Peake, Rogers, Scammel, Shannon, Solomon, Townsend, Wark, the Treasurer (teller).

Making a majority of 18 in favor of the Noes.

The CHAIRMAN then put Mr. Glyde's amendment for a postponement, on which there was a division called for, with the following result:—

AYES, 9.—Messrs. Bagot, Barrow, Duffield, Harvey, Hawker, Mildred, Reynolds, Strangways, Glyde (teller).

NOES, 18.—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Burford, Cole, Hallett, Hay, MacDermott, Milne, Peake, Rogers, Scammell, Shannon, Solomon, Townsend, Wark, Collinson, the Treasurer (teller).

Making a majority of 9 in favour of the Noes.

The item was then put in the total and passed.

The House resumed, the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Thursday.

IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The House went into Committee for the further consideration of this Bill.

Upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY the 3rd clause, relating to the powers of District Councils, was amended by striking out that portion which provided that "recognizances might and should be taken by and before, and in case of forfeiture to be put in Suit by the Chairman of the District Council of such district for the benefit of the party aggrieved, or in aid of the funds of such district as the case might be." The hon. gentleman observed that the same end was accomplished by clause 12, and the clause as amended was passed.

Clause 11, which provided that Justices should have a table of charges for food and estimate rates of ordinary damage, subject to allowance of Governor, was, upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, recommitted, the hon. gentleman remarking that the object of the clause was to give a majority of Justices meeting in Adelaide the power of altering the schedule outside the boundaries of municipalities, but it was not very clearly expressed. He therefore amended it by the insertion of the words "so far as concerns those portions of the said province which are not within the bonndaries of a Municipal Corporation or District Council," and the clause as amended was passed, the Hon. Major O'Halloran remarking that the amendment was precisely what he required.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT called attention to the 7th clause, which provided that the pounds should be fenced, enclosed, and kept clean and in repair. He had just had placed in his hands, by a member of the other House, a communication which that member had received from a District Council, with regard to the provision for feeding and watering the cattle. The words used in the clause were "a sufficiency of wholesome food and water." That, however, was not thought sufficiently explanatory, and the Council suggested that the clause should be amended, by stating at what hours the animals should be fed and have water given to them. The reason given for this suggestion was that if the hours were mentioned, the owners would be enabled to see that the animals were properly attended to, but as the clause at present stood, it merely stated that the animals should have a sufficiency of wholesome food and water without affording any guarantee that they would really be supplied with such. It was impossible, as the clause stood, for the owner to tell whether his beasts were fed or not, but if the amendment which had been suggested were made, he would then be afforded an opportunity. He mentioned the circumstance of receiving this communication in order that the Chief Secretary might take the question into his consideration, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would assent to the amendment before the Bill was taken out of Committee.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that the 8th clause stated that wholesome water should be provided at all times, therefore the provision referred to by the Hon. Captain Bagot need merely refer to food. He thought it would be well if the suggestion were adopted.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY would be happy to consider the suggestion, but it occurred to him that parties who had cattle in pound would like to get them out as soon as possible.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT said he had merely stated to the House what had been stated to him by a member of the other House.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY asked whether the communication was merely from a member of the District Council or from the District Council as a body.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT said it was signed by the Clerk by order of the Council.

The Hon. Dr. EVERARD said it was quite true that a person whose cattle were impounded would most likely wish to get them out as soon as possible, but still he should have some assurance that whilst there the animals should be properly attended to. He thought a provision that there should be certain hours at which the cattle should be fed and watered, would operate as a salutary check upon the pound keeper, as persons, whether they were interested or not in the cattle, might go to see them fed, and there were sure to be some indications about the place to denote whether the animals had been really fed or not. He believed that such a provision would be a great boon to the owners, and that it would be something binding upon the poundkeeper.

The 12th clause provided that the poundkeeper should enter into recognizances with sureties.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY proposed to amend it by inserting the words "sums payable by virtue of such recognizance shall be paid to the Treasurer."

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that this would entirely do away with the benefits which Municipal Corporations and District Councils had hitherto derived.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said he was going to move an addition which would remedy that, and the clause was further amended by the addition of the words "and for the benefit of such Municipal Corporations or District Councils if it shall have occurred within the boundaries thereof."

The clause as amended was agreed to.

Clause 13 provided that the party trespassed upon might impound on his own land cattle trespassing. It was amended upon the motion of the Chief Secretary, by the insertion of a proviso suggested on the previous day by the hon. Mr. Morphett, that notice should be given to the owner.

Clause 14 provided that it should be lawful for the bailiff, &c., of any person trespassed upon to impound cattle. The clause was amended by giving the ranger the same power as the bailiff, and it was also rendered compulsory that notice should be given.

Clause 15 provided that cattle should be impounded in the nearest pound.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said that on comparing this clause with the clause as it originally stood, he found that it had been so cut down in the Assembly that there was in fact nothing left of it. (Laughter.) It now appeared surplusage, and he should therefore move that it be struck out.

The Hon. H. AYERS seconded the motion, which was carried.

The Hon. H. AYERS moved that the 21st clause, which provided that stray cattle should not be taken away without notice to owner of the run which they were on, be recommitted. He wished to add a proviso for the purpose of meeting a difficulty which he had pointed out on the previous day. The proviso would he believed be deemed less objectionable than the proposition which he made on the previous day. It was "That nothing herein contained shall prevent any carrier depasturing any cattle whilst actually employed for the purpose of traffic, on any of the waste lands of the Crown." This amendment was agreed to.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT moved that the 7th clause be recommitted, for the purpose of moving an amendment to the effect, that the poundkeeper supply cattle impounded with a sufficient supply of wholesome food and water, at least twice a day between the hours of 8 and 9 in the forenoon and 4 and 5 in the afternoon.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN seconded the amendment, which was agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 31, relating to the form of security to be given to poundkeepers upon releasing cattle, providing that the poundkeeper should post notice at the pound of all cattle under his charge, providing that poundkeepers should give notice to the owners of cattle impounded, that poundkeepers should charge for the service of notice 1s. per mile for the first ten miles, and 6d. per mile beyond, providing how pound fees and charges should be accounted for, providing for the release of cattle impounded on payment of the sum of money or amount of damages claimed, imposing a penalty on poundkeepers for taking more than they are authorized to take, or neglecting to account for amounts received, and defining the proceedings of poundkeepers respecting unclaimed cattle prior to sale, were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 32 related to the time and mode of sale of impounded cattle and prohibited purchasers.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that by the clause, as it stood, no member of that House would be enabled to purchase any impounded cattle, as it prohibited any member of Council, but he presumed it meant District Council.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said he intended to alter the expression to Municipal Corporation or District Council.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT called attention to the stringent provisions of this clause to prevent parties supposed to be interested in the sale from becoming purchasers. That provision, however, would very easily be evaded, as a disinterested party might become the purchaser and a few hours afterwards effect a sale to some of the prohibited parties mentioned in this clause. He would ask the Chief Secretary if the clause could not be so modified as to prevent cattle from passing into the hands of those parties. As the clause stood the cattle might be sold at noon, and although purchased apparently by some disinterested party they might within a short time afterwards pass into the hands of parties prohibited by this clause. Could it not be so modified that if the cattle were to find their way into the possession of these parties within a certain period, or indeed at any time, that they should still be liable to the penalty?

The Hon. the PRESIDENT suggested the introduction of the words "directly or indirectly purchase," might meet the difficulty.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said that the clause already provided that the cattle should not be purchased by any prohibited party, or his agent, or any person on his behalf.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that if the prohibition were to continue, a person might unwittingly become liable for the penalty five years afterwards. There would be no end to it. It appeared to him to be impossible to prevent the cattle ultimately finding their way into the possession of parties who by this clause were prohibited from purchasing.

The Hon. H. AYERS thought that the proposed addition "directly or indirectly purchase" would give the requisite protection.

The Hon. Captain BAGOT suggested the words, "or shall hereafter become possessed thereof."

The Hon. H. AYERS thought the amendment proposed by the Hon. Captain Bagot would not meet the case, the object of the clause being to prevent certain parties from becoming the purchasers of cattle at the pound sale. The object was not to prevent them from ever becoming possessed of the cattle at a future period.

The clause was agreed to with the amendment suggested by the hon. the Chief Secretary.

Clauses 33 to 39, providing that poundkeepers should not act as auctioneers unless licensed, that the purchasers should not be bound to prove regularity of sale, relating to the application of money arising from the sale of cattle impounded, application of surplus proceeds of sale where the pound is within a district, providing that the Governor, Municipal Corporation or District Council may close pounds, relating to pound rescues and breaches, and providing penalties upon any bull or entire horse at large, were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 40 provided that the Ranger appointed by Government or District Councils might impound cattle off Crown Lands or roads in the District.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that it appeared to him this clause was repealed by the proviso which had been moved by the Hon. Mr. Ayers, and that the Ranger had no longer power to impound cattle found on public roads within the district. He should like to hear the opinion of the President upon that point.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY said the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Ayers only extended to working bullocks actually engaged in traffic.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN said the stray cattle nuisance was one of the greatest with which the inhabitants of the district in which he resided had to contend. Stray cattle were continually on the roads, belonging to parties who fed them at the expense of their neighbors.

The Hon. Dr. EVERARD considered that the amendment of the Hon. H. Ayers only referred to outlying districts, and not where the roads were fenced in. It did not apply to the more settled districts.

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN would like to have the opinion of the President upon the point.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT, as a member of that House, would be happy to give the hon. gentleman an opinion, but hoped he would not consider it part of the duty of the Chairman to do so. Clause 21 was applicable only to bullocks actually engaged in traffic.

The clause was passed as printed.

Also, clause 41, relating to cattle trespassing after notice.

Clause 42 imposed a penalty upon parties for taking down rails or opening gates, to let cattle into fenced land.

The Hon. Capt. BAGOT pointed out that the wording of the clause was, "remove or take down any rail or slip pannel, or open any gate." There were three distinct circumstances detailed. He thought the clause too minute, and that it would be better merely to say "shall open any fence."

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN thought the minuteness of the clause was one of its advantages.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY thought it would be better to let the clause stand as it was, as the fence might be a wire one, and consequently no rail would require to be taken down.

The clause was ultimately amended so as to read "any fence, rail, or slip pannel."

Clauses 43 to 50, providing that cattle should not be allowed to stray in the streets of towns or villages, that the driving of cattle along customary lines of road should not be prevented, that two Justices of the Peace should have jurisdiction in all matters arising out of the impounding of cattle in causes under £20, that if excessive damages are claimed, the owner may pay under protest, relating to the delivery of cattle on payment of sum claimed for damage by trespass, relating to the order for delivery of cattle on recognizances without payment of damages, relating to actions for full compensation for trespass, and the effect of the judgment or conviction under the Act, were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 51 defined the word "fence."

The Hon. Major O'HALLORAN said the definition of a good and sufficient fence caused more annoyance to every Bench of Magistrates than any other question. He thought that too much latitude was given to Justices of the Peace in this matter, and that the Bill should better define what a good and sufficient fence was.

The Hon. the CHIEF SECRETARY thought the Justices

might be left to determine whether a fence was good and sufficient It was impossible to satisfy all parties, but he believed that in 99 cases out of 100 the Justices arrived at a correct conclusion

The clause was passed as printed Also the remaining clauses of the Bill relating to the recovery of penalties, the mode of distribution of fines, appeals, &c

Additions were made to the schedules, by which poundkeepers were prevented from charging for sucklings under six months old, and the highest penalty was imposed upon cattle trespassing upon any public enclosed cemetery

The CHAIRMAN then reported progress, the report was adopted, and the third reading of the Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

The Council adjourned at half past 4 o'clock till 2 o clock on the following day

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

BRIDGE AT ONKAPARINGA

Mr MILDRED presented a petition from Wm Grey, praying the House to direct an examination of a line mentioned in the petition, with the view of determining the best site for a bridge across the Onkaparinga.

The petition was received and read

LACEPEDE BAY

Mr HAWKER presented a petition from a number of residents in the neighbourhood of Lacepede Bay, also from a number of bankers and merchants of Adelaide, praying that there might be a survey of Lacepede Bay and its approaches, and that it might be declared a port of import and export

The petition was received and read

THE HON THE CHIEF SECRETARY

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on the following Wednesday he should move, in the opinion of the House the position held by the Chief Secretary as a member of the Harbor Trust, which department was under the department of the Commissioner of Public Works, was anomalous and might prevent that wholesome check upon the operations of the Trust which it was desirable should be maintained

THE ESTIMATES

Mr PEAKE gave notice that on the 10th inst he should move, in the opinion of the House it was essential that the Estimates should be laid before the House within fourteen days of the meeting of Parliament

THE COST OF BILLS

Mr REYNOLDS gave notice that on the following Friday he should ask the Attorney-General why the return ordered by the House on the 12th January last relative to the cost of Bills had not been laid upon the table of the House

LACEPEDE BAY

Mr HAWKER gave notice that on the following day, he should move the petition presented by him from residents in the neighbourhood of Lacepede Bay and others be printed

GREY'S BRIDGE

Mr MILDRED gave notice that on the following day, he should move the petition presented by him from Mr William Grey relative to the erection of a bridge at Onkaparinga be printed

THE HARBOR TRUST

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid upon the table of the House a return showing the manner in which it was proposed to apply the balance of the sum of £100,000 granted to the Harbor Trust, together with a map showing where the works were proposed to be undertaken, a letter from Mr Abernethy, the engineer, and a letter from the Trustees explanatory of the map, &c The documents were ordered to be printed.

THE HARBOR OF PORT ADELAIDE

Mr PEAKE said, as the returns which he had moved for in connection with the harbor had just been laid on the table and would be printed, he would, with the leave of the House, postpone the following motion standing in his name until the following Wednesday —

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to instruct or recommend to the Trustees for improving the Harbor of Port Adelaide, to advertise for tenders for deepening the Inner Bar to a depth commensurate with the depth already attained by steam dredging at the Outer Bar, the contractor to have the use of the principal steam dredge, with its machinery and appurtenances, to be returned in good order on completion of the contract, the contractor to find all fuel and wages

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that probably hon members would permit him to move the third reading of the District Councils Act Amendment Bill He had consulted several hon members who had notices of motion upon the paper and they had consented to postpone them until after the District Councils Act had been disposed of, it being very desirable that the Bill should be transmitted to the other branch of the Legislature as quickly as possible

The House having assented,

The SPEAKER put the question that the Bill be read a third time

Mr LINDSAY wished before the question was put——

The SPEAKER said the question had been put

Mr TOWNSEND thought if that principle were to be carried out, it might prevent members who had valuable suggestions to offer from making them, if they were not at liberty to address the House

The SPEAKER said he was merely carrying out the practice of the House of Commons, that after the question was put and the voices heard on it, no one could speak The hon member had full time to rise before the question was put

The Bill having been read a third time,

Mr LINDSAY said he wished to recommit the Bill

The SPEAKER said the hon member could not do so, and proceeded to put the question that the Bill do now pass

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS argued that upon the question that a Bill do now pass there could be no debate

The SPEAKER said that members could speak to all questions, and that although it was not usual for there to be a debate upon such occasions, but a precedent had been established in England in connection with the motion for the passing of the Ecclesiastical Stipends Bill upon which there was a long debate An hon member could not move the recommittal of the Bill, but might negative the passing of the Bill

Mr LINDSAY presumed, if that were the case, that all he could do would be to move that the Bill be thrown out.

The SPEAKER Yes

Mr LINDSAY did not wish to throw out the Bill, but merely to amend it It appeared to him that, from the Speaker's ruling, he was not at liberty to speak at all upon the Bill

The SPEAKER said the hon member could speak to any amendment

Mr LINDSAY then moved that the Bill do not pass His intention had been to move the recommittal of the Bill in order that the 114th clause might be amended for as that clause had been passed by the House a few days since it merely applied to one particular species of animal The amendment which he wished to introduce would include all animals which it was at all probable would be found at large in any district No matter whether the animals were camels or neat cattle, if they were at large, and there were no owners for them, they should be taken possession of by the District Council and sold Act No 5 of 1 Victoria, which this Bill referred to, and which it would seem it was wished to bring again into operation, spoke of branding in such a manner as clearly showed that any animal not having the registered brand of the owner, would be considered for the purposes of the Act an unbranded animal Under the Act to which he had alluded, all animals not bearing the registered brand of the owner were considered unbranded cattle, so that they would become the property of the District Council, and he did not think this was ever intended He was prevented by the rules of the House from saying what he had intended, and therefore he would merely move that the Bill do not pass

Mr SHANNON wished to say a few words in reference to the 114th clause, which had been referred to by the previous speaker That clause stated that any cattle found at large above the age of one year, and unbranded, should be liable to be sold by the District Councils This might prove a great hardship in many instances, for as hon members were aware there were very valuable animals in the country which were unbranded—imported bulls for instance, and if any of these should get at large a malicious person might impound them and the owner would not be able to claim them again He did not see the necessity of compelling persons to brand in all instances, as an ear-mark would frequently answer the purpose He would move that after the word "brand"——

The SPEAKER said that the hon member could not move that the Bill be amended in any way, and the question that the Bill do pass was then put and carried

POWDER MAGAZINE

Mr COLE put the question of which he had given notice—

"That he will ask the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) if the Powder Magazine, now in course of erection near the North Arm, is intended to be the principal depot for that hazardous commodity, and whether the same is near, and how near, to the wooden viaduct recently completed at a large cost by the Government, also, how near the said Magazine is to the nearest purchased or selected land, how near to the nearest portion of the South Australian Company's harbor Section 1, and how far from the intended residence built for the Keeper of the Magazine

The reason of requesting answers to these questions was that he had received certain information upon the subject, though how far it could be relied upon he could not state, but he should be better able to judge after he had heard the answer He had been partly induced to put the question by noticing recently in an English paper an account of the almost total destruction of a harbor in the Caspian Sea, and half of the inhabitants of the surrounding district, by the explosion of a powder magazine adjacent The mischief, indeed, unfortunately did not end there, for some burning timbers which were blown a distance of three miles fell upon a barge laden with powder, which also exploded, causing great loss of life and property These facts showed that it was highly imprudent on the part of any Government to construct a powder magazine in a locality so dangerous If the Government deemed it proper for the better security of life and property to abandon the present site and building, he was authorised to state that there were parties who were willing to rent the building at such a rate as would amply compensate the Government for the outlay which they had already made If the answers to the questions which he had put were such as he anticipated, he hoped the Government would make overtures to the parties to whom he had referred as willing to become the lessees of the building They must not in carrying out public improvements do so at the imminent risk of life and property

The SPEAKER reminded the hon member, that in putting a question he must not argue it

Mr COLE had been prompted by humanity to put the questions It was possible that such occurrences as those which he had alluded to, as having happened elsewhere, might not happen, but it was the duty of the Government to take every precaution to prevent them Those were the feelings by which he had been actuated, but independently of what he had urged, he would state that there was a large amount of private property in the neighbourhood, indeed closely adjoining the magazine, and an expensive wooden viaduct had been recently constructed by the Government which in the event of any accident occurring to the magazine must fall a sacrifice He had thrown out the remarks which he had in reference to the willingness of parties to rent the building in order that the Government might select a more suitable site for the magazine He certainly could not commend either the judgment or foresight of the parties who selected the present site

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS would state, in reply to the first question of the hon member for West Torrens, that the Powder Magazine, in course of erection near the North Arm, was intended to be the principal depot for that hazardous commodity It was situated 60 feet from the end of the wooden bridge The nearest purchased land was the South Australian Company's Section 1, the distance being 27 chains In reference to the last question the magazine was situated a distance of 75 chains from the keeper's cottage He thought these answers would prove satisfactory to the hon member

Mr COLE said perhaps the hon gentleman would have no objection to state, without notice, whether it was the intention of the Government to continue and complete the building for the purpose of a magazine

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it certainly was, and that the contract had been let

IMPOUNDING BILL

The following notice in the name of Mr Lindsay lapsed in consequence of the absence of that hon member —

"That he will ask the hon the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) (1) Whether, by the law of England, it is or is not felony to shoot another person's pig, even though the pig at the time be trespassing? (2) Whether clause 23 of the Impounding Bill of 1858, which authorizes the destruction of certain animals therein mentioned, is or is not repugnant to the law of England? (3) Whether a by-law of a District Council, imposing a penalty of £10 upon any person who shall destroy another person's pig within the limits of the jurisdiction of such District Council, would be held to be repugnant to any Act of the Legislature of this Province"

NOARLUNGA

On the motion of Mr TOWNSEND (in the absence of Mr Neales) the petition recently presented by the hon member for the city (Mr Neales) from the District Council of Noarlunga, was ordered to be printed

GAWLER EXTENSION LINE

Mr YOUNG brought forward the motion of which he had given notice—

"That there be laid on the table of this House a return showing the number of men employed by the Government as day laborers on the Gawler extension line of railway the nature of the work on which such men are engaged, the amount of wages per man per day, the number of overseers employed, with the amount of wages per day per man, also, the cost per cubic yard of earthwork or other work (as the case may be), as performed by day labor, also, the cost of similar work as performed by contract, should any such be in existence"

The only motive which he had in asking for these returns to be laid upon the table of the House was that before proroguing hon members might be in a position to express an opinion as to the desirability of carrying on public works by day labor When it was proposed to extend the Gawler line, one of the arguments used was that there was an opportunity of getting a number of men at a very low rate, by which means the work could be executed much more cheaply than had previously been the case It was for the purpose of ascertaining how far this impression had been realised that he asked for the information mentioned in his notice When he stated these were his only reasons for asking for the returns he thought no further arguments would be required to induce hon members to assent to the motion

Mr HARVEY seconded the motion

Mr DUFFIELD should be very happy to support the motion if the hon mover would consent to one or two additions He wished to know how many hours per week these men worked, and he also wished to know what had been the cost per yard of the gravel removed from the Gawler River and deposited on Section 2 in the Government Survey If the hon mover would consent to ask for this additional information he should be happy to support the motion, and when the information asked for was laid upon the table of the House he believed it would reveal that some works had been done at enormous expense Why he proposed the first addition was, that on Saturday at midday he had observed a large portion of the men employed upon the Railway works, Section 112, in the neighborhood of Gawler Town, consequently he imagined that they could not have worked at all upon that day On Monday, too, between 9 and 10 o'clock, he still observed them in the neighborhood of Gawler Town He believed the men got a free pass to Adelaide, and it appeared to him that under existing arrangements at least one day in the week must be lost

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the hon mover would no doubt consent to the two additions which had been proposed He merely rose for the purpose of saying that there would be no objection to lay the returns upon the table of the House, and that they should be prepared as soon as possible

Mr REYNOLDS suggested to the hon mover that he should further amend the motion by fixing the period for which the return was required He would suggest from the commencement till the present time, and then the party who would have to draw up the return would know what to do

Mr YOUNG said his only object in asking for the return was to place the House in possession of the fullest information, and he would therefore adopt the suggestions of the hon member, Mr Duffield, and the hon member, Mr Reynolds

The motion was carried.

THE HARBOR TRUST

Mr REYNOLDS moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House—as no provision has been made under the Harbor Trust Act of 1854 for the payment of fees to the members of such Trust—the Trustees have no power to pay themselves fees, nor the Government any authority to allow them, without the direct sanction of this House"

It was no new discovery he had made, that no power was given to the Trustees in the Act to pay themselves fees, nor was the Government authorized to sanction such payments without the sanction of that House If it were intended that Trustees should receive certain fees for the performance of certain duties entrusted to them, he presumed that a clause to that effect would have been inserted in the Act as it was in other Acts constituting Boards, such as the Railway Commissioners, the Central Road Board, and the Waterworks Commissioners In all these Acts, there were clauses authorising payment to the members of the Boards of certain fees for the performance of certain duties In the Harbor Trust Act, however, there was an absence of any such clause He did not say that gentlemen who gave up a large portion of their time in the performance of certain duties should not be paid, but their position was anomalous, for, whilst there was nothing in the Act to authorise payment, they had been paying themselves about £400 a year in fees It was time that the House sanctioned this course, or otherwise Whilst no power was conferred by the Act upon the Trustees to pay themselves, the Government were not in a position to pay them, for there was no provision in the Act by which they could sanction such expenditure without the sanction of that House. Every expenditure of public money had to be sanctioned by that House There was a Bill to authorise the raising of £100,000 for a certain purpose, but there was no provision whatever for the payment of Trustees If gentlemen gave up a considerable portion of valuable time for the purpose of performing certain duties, they were, unquestionably, entitled to be paid, but it should be according to law If the Government intended to keep up the present Bill, they should either amend it, or get some approval from that House of the payment to Trustees If the Government could show that there was any provision for payment of Trustees, he should, of course, bow, but, in the absence of any such proof, he must contend that neither had the Trustees a right to pay themselves, nor had the Government authority to sanction any such payment He did not wish the Commissioner of Public Works to be placed in the position of sanctioning payment to the Trustees, which was not provided in the Bill itself Such an application never came before him whilst he held the office of Commissioner of Public Works, and, therefore, he was not responsible

Mr LINDSAY seconded the motion

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that hon members who carefully read the Harbor Trust Act No 20 of 1854, would find in the 6th clause that the Trustees were prevented from expending any money A statement of the object of expenditure, plan, &c, must be furnished before the Trustees were in a position to expend any money The Harbor Trust had furnished a plan of expenditure to the Government, and although it was not distinctly laid down in the Act that the Trustees should receive fees, that was a matter frequently not distinctly laid down, although it was clearly understood that some small fee should be paid Hon members should be distinctly told what was the precise amount of the fees received by the gentlemen constituting this Board He would state, what he thought should have been stated by the hon member for the Sturt, that the fee received by the Chairman was £2 2s a sitting, and by the other members £1 1s a sitting A sum of £400 to meet this expenditure appeared upon the last statement sent in to the Government showing the proposed expenditure. In that statement, as he had already stated, there appeared an item of £400 for fees to the members of the Board The proposed expenditure of money by the Board, it would be observed, had to be laid before the Government, and that expenditure embraced the payment of members for attending at the Board The statement of proposed expenditure had received the sanction of the Government for the time being, and, in his opinion, that payment was fully authorised Under such circumstances he felt it his duty to oppose the motion

Mr COLLINSON opposed the motion, on the ground that members of the Harbor Trust who were most zealous upon all occasions were generally detained upon their seats for two or three hours upon each occasion that they met, for which they obtained the paltry sum of £1 1s, a sum which ought not to be objected to by the House, and which he trusted would not be

Mr MILDRED supported the motion upon the same grounds that he had supported it on a former occasion, that the Act authorising the borrowing of a certain sum of money contained no provision for the payment of Trustees It was exceptional in that respect It appeared that the Harbor Trustees were mostly, if not all, members of the Trinity Board, who were entrusted with the expenditure of a large sum for the benefit of the Harbor The Harbor Trust were merely entrusted with the money to hand over to the Trinity Board. It was never intended that the members of the Harbor Trust should practically carry into operation the deepening of the harbor, but that they should merely borrow the money and then hand it over to the Trinity Board, under whose control it was placed for the benefit of the Harbor, and whose duties were well defined The simple duty that these Trustees had to perform was to borrow money and hand it over to the Trinity Board for them to carry out the necessary operations He did not expect that after the last discussion upon this question any further payments would have been made to the Trustees, for there was nothing in the statement which was then made by the Attorney-General to justify the payment It was certainly a most anomalous position that members of the Harbor Trust should also be members of the Trinity Board

Mr ROGERS also supported the motion.

Mr TOWNSEND supported the motion. It was no reply for the hon the Commissioner of Public Works to refer to the 6th clause, and he (Mr Townsend) was astonished at the hon member doing so The question was not whether the fee was sufficient He (Mr Townsend) believed that the gentlemen who composed the Harbor Trust did their duty to the best of their ability, but the only question was, whether by the terms of the Act they were justified in paying these sums of money He believed they were not If the gentlemen were worthy of receiving fees, let the House know it, but it was no part of the Act

Mr GLYDE opposed the motion There was nothing in the Act to prevent these gentlemen giving as Trustees money for payment of office expenditure The Government were of opinion that they should receive some remuneration, and every hon member who had spoken agreed in this opinion (No, no) Well, he (Mr Glyde) thought the Trustees should be paid—(laughter)—and that they were right in asking the Government and the Executive Council to pay them, and therefore he should oppose the motion

The TREASURER also opposed the motion He was much struck by the arguments of the hon member for Onkaparinga that the Act did not confer upon the Board the power to spend money but only to raise it, and hand it over to the Trinity Board The Act was quite to the contrary, and its wording was very clear He had no doubt that the object was to authorise the Board to raise money and pay it Could hon members ask these gentlemen to perform their duties without any payment? There must be some means of inducing private gentlemen to give up their time for the public benefit, and what other inducement could be held out except payment? The House could not impose duties upon gentlemen and refuse to remunerate them There was nothing to restrain the Government from paying these gentlemen The payments were not made by the gentlemen themselves, but they recommended that certain officers and other persons should be paid, and the Government acceded to these recommendations There was nothing in the Act to restrain the Government from doing this As to the expediency of the payments he considered this clearly shown by the facts of the case

Mr SOLOMON thought that all monies expended should be paid by authority of that House The only clause which gave the trustees power to expend money was the twelfth [The hon member read the clause] No part of the Bill gave the trustees authority to name the rate of their own remuneration He regretted being compelled to vote for the motion, as he believed these gentlemen were entitled to payment, but that was beside the question, which was simply as to the legality of making the payment

Dr WARK was very much struck by the observations of the hon the Commissioner of Public Works, which seemed to him calculated to strike at the root of all Governments, and to place a despotism above our free institutions The hon member said there was nothing in the Act to prevent these payments, but that was not the point The Act should authorise the payments Why did not the Government introduce a Bill authorising the payment of these gentlemen instead of keeping up a system which it was high time to abolish This was one of the means of tampering with the public purse which the sooner it was done away with the better

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS opposed the motion If he could perceive that the gentlemen of the Trust had appropriated the money without the knowledge or sanction of the Government, there would be a good cause for considering the motion, but as he saw that the Ministry of the day were duly put in possession of the mode of appropriating the money, including the fees paid to the Trustees themselves, and as the Government had sanctioned the appropriation, he could see no other course left him but to oppose the motion He considered it unreasonable to expect persons to give up their time to the Trust without receiving some slight remuneration (" Hear, hear," from Mr Solomon) No one had complained that the fees were excessive, or stated that the duties were such as could well be performed by non professional men It was desirable to secure the services of nautical men, and if the House carried this motion it would have the effect of disgusting these gentlemen, who were not very numerous in the colony Perhaps it would have been better if the Act declared that the Board should have fees (Hear, hear) He could not consistently vote for the motion, as the Government of the day knew of the intention to appropriate a small sum for fees He wondered that the hon member for the Sturt had never discovered this matter when that hon member was Commissioner of Public Works —(laughter)— or that he had never before drawn attention to it He (the Commissioner of Public Works) thought it was rather late now to make the discovery, and to find out that the members of the Trust were breaking the law He could not recollect having heard the hon member refer to the matter before

Mr REYNOLDS said the hon member (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) did not know his (Mr Reynolds s) mind on matters of law, as he (Mr Reynolds) never consulted the hon. member on such points He did not go to the hon member to ascertain the bearing of any law—(laughter)—but it was quite possible that he might have consulted the hon the Attorney-General without the fact coming to the knowledge of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands He had consulted the Attorney-General upon this point One of the falsest and lamest pleas he had ever heard was that of the Commissioner of Crown Lands when he cited the clause in reference to plans and specifications, and took shelter under it saying that it gave power to the Trustees to pay themselves The hon the Commissioner of Public Works might be a very good engineer—(laughter)—or a very good Commissioner of Public Works, but he (Mr Reynolds) did not know that the hon member was a good lawyer— (laughter) He thought, however, that if the hon member had a little more common ordinary sense—(laughter)—he would not have spoken as he had done of plans and specifications. He hoped the hon member would give some more intelligible and common sense interpretation of the clause The hon member said it would be unreasonable to expect that gentlemen would give up their time without receiving some remuneration This was the paltry plea under which the Government sanctioned the proceedings of the Trustees If this principle was to be carried out, the District Councils could remunerate themselves He (Mr Reynolds) was quite prepared to sanction the fees which the Trustees at present received, but let it be done legally No lawyer could say that under the Act the Trustees could pay themselves

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said he had quoted the whole clause, and not merely the portion which related to plans, estimates, and specifications

The House divided, when there appeared—

AYES, 15—Messrs Cole, Duffield, Harvey, Hawker, Hay, Lindsay, Mildred, Milne, Shannon, Solomon, Strangways, Townsend Wark, Young, and Reynolds (teller)

NOES, 10—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Bakewell, Burford, Glyde, Hallett, MacDermott, Rogers, Collinson, and the Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

THE RIVER WEIR

MR REYNOLDS asked the hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether it is the opinion of the Government, after the serious mismanagement in the construction and oversight of the River Weir, that the late Engineer to the Waterworks Commissioners is considered worthy of employment in the Government service, and whether the late Clerk of Works at the said River Weir is not considered equally worthy of further employment by the Government, in any capacity for which he may be qualified, if not, why any distinction should be made between the officers in question? Also, whether the said late Engineer has been employed by the Government on the railway, and when he ceased to be so employed? His object in putting the question was that, from information which had reached him, he believed that a distinction was made between the late Engineer of the Waterworks and the Clerk of the Works, and that the former was considered quite worthy of employment in the public service, whilst the latter was not

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that in the opinion of the Government the failure of Mr Hamilton in hydraulic engineering does not disqualify him for employment in the public service in other branches of his profession for which he may be qualified, and that no distinction will be made between the Engineer (Mr Hamilton) and Clerk of Works as regards their future employment in Government service No distinction had been made between the Engineer and the Clerk of Works The only application for employment made by the latter which had reached him (Mr Blyth) was for services for which there had been a more favorable offer, as the matter was decided by public tender With respect to the Engineer, as had been already stated in the House, he was employed in staking out the continuation of the railway, but this engagement terminated on the 3rd instant

Mr REYNOLDS still wished to know whether the Clerk would be considered eligible for any employment under the Government

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that in the event of any application for employment being received from either of the persons referred to, the whole of the circumstances would be taken into consideration

THE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Mr BAKEWELL asked the Hon the Treasurer (Mr Finniss) whether the Government intend to make any and what arrangement with regard to the repayments which have been made from the fund established under the authority of the Superannuation Act of 1854, contrary to the tenor and provisions of the Act?"

The TREASURER replied that the Government had not yet decided as to the course they should pursue in reference to the Act of 1854, but they would consider the subject during the recess

PETITION OF MR BABBAGE

Mr BARROW moved that the petition of Benjamin Herschel Babbage be printed

The motion was agreed to

REAL PROPERTY ACT

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, in the absence of the Attorney-General, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Real Property Act

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS seconded the motion

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether the amendments proposed to be made were those prepared by the Solicitor to the Lands Titles Registration Office, whether the Bill embraced the whole of these amendments, whether the Bill had been altered by any person connected with the Lands Titles Registration Office, and whether any clauses were omitted from the Draft Act, which the hon the Attorney General was desirous of introducing

Mr TOWNSEND believed it was usual, in introducing a Bill, to state the nature of its provisions He, therefore, hoped the hon the Commissioner of Public Works would state the character of the proposed amendments

The SPEAKER enquired whether the hon Commissioner of Public Works had been requested by the hon the Attorney-General to move that the Bill be read a first time and on that hon member replying in the negative, ruled that the question could not then be entertained

Agreed to

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the report of the Select Committee on Railway Management, be read

The motion was agreed to, and the report was accordingly read by the Clerk

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the report and evidence be printed

Agreed to

LICENSED VICTUALLERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Mr BAKEWELL moved that this Bill be read a second time, Its object was to do away with licences for the sale of wine and beer If the Act came into force, there would henceforth be only one class of public-houses, viz , those bound to entertain travellers with food, drink, and lodging He had not met a single person in the House or out of it who doubted the propriety of the Act It was admitted that the granting of wine and beer licences was a mistake In fact, the houses to which wine and beer licences were granted should be even more under police surveillance than those belonging to the respectable class of persons who held general licences

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was accordingly read a second time

The House then went into Committee on the Bill

The preamble was postponed

On the enacting clause being put,

Mr PEAKE asked the Committee to agree to an additional clause Its object was to guard the owners of public-house property from a source of serious loss, by means of which such property was seriously deteriorated, viz , the possibility of the business of a house on which a person had spent a large sum being entirely stopped It frequently occurred that the tenants of such houses became insolvent or deserted their houses or occupations and in such cases the landlord had no way of opening the house for business until the next licensing day This was an anomaly which he thought hon members would agree should be removed He would not detain the House with any further remarks, but would read the clause [The hon member here read the clause, which was of very great length, and excited some laughter in consequence The marginal note was "Transfer of licence in certain cases provided for "]

THE ESTIMATES

At this stage of the proceedings a message was announced from His Excellency the Governor

The House resumed, and the SPEAKER announced that His Excellency had caused to be placed upon the Estimates a sum of £700, for the erection of a Court House, Custom House, and residence for a Custom House officer at Port Augusta

The House again went into Committee

Mr TOWNSEND suggested that the Bill should not be taken out of Committee, as the clause was so long that hon members had not time to ascertain its nature

Mr STRANGWAYS also hoped that the hon member had no intention of taking the Bill out of Committee, as there were several clauses which he intended to move, some of which the hon the Attorney-General was to have looked over , but that hon member had not made his appearance in the House that day

Mr BAKEWELL had not the slightest intention of taking the Bill out of Committee He cordially supported the new clause, having known the greatest possible inconvenience to arise from the want of such a proviso He would mention one case In a late insolvency of a licensed victualler the Official Assignee was in possession of the premises, and the person in charge of the house supplied travellers with refreshments, but an information was laid against him, and he was held liable. The clause proposed to be added was similar to one in the English Act, in fact, it was nearly word for word with a clause in the 9th George IVth , and if the Committee who prepared the Bill had had the matter brought before them, he had no doubt they would have proposed the insertion of such a provision.

Mr SCAMMELL suggested that it would be proper to alter the title of the Act

The CHAIRMAN replied that this could be done afterwards.

Mr LINDSAY suggested the addition of a clause not quite so long as that proposed by the hon member There were many districts in which it was desirable that an inn should exist, but where the traffic was not sufficient to enable a house to pay the licence fee now charged , he therefore intended to propose an additional clause, which would enable District Councils or other competent authorities to reduce or remit the licence fees in certain cases

Mr STRANGWAYS said that the first clause which he intended to introduce was one to meet the case put by his hon colleague The marginal note was "Governor may remit licence-fee in certain cases " [The hon member here read the clause] His object in moving this clause was that if there were not licensed houses there would be sly grog-shops, and it was better to encourage licensed houses than others

Mr SOLOMON could not see how this would meet the justice of the case If such a clause was necessary, it would be better to confine the amended Act to the city and its immediate neighborhood, and leave country houses in possession of the wine and beer licenses If the intention was to give the country publicans the power of selling wine and beer it would be unjust to charge them £12 10s and the city publicans £25 If a country publican could not afford £25 it was a matter for his own consideration, and he might decline applying for a license at all He hoped that no distinction would be made in the general licences The hon member for Encounter Bay had not shown that the authorities had any right to go through the country and say who could pay and who could not The same principle might be applied to auctioneers (Hear, hear, and laughter) There were some auctioneers' firms which paid £125 a year for licences He contended that the new clauses were not based upon a just principle.

Mr PEAKE thought that as a general principle it was undesirable to deviate from the fixed principle, but there were special cases in this country which should be met There were many districts where the roads passed through barren country, which was not likely to be occupied for a long time yet, through which travellers must pass , and in these cases there should be some power in the hands of the Executive to grant special licences at fees different from those charged in populated districts He would take, for instance the road to the Tatiara country, where it might be very useful for travellers to have a house for refreshments There was also another case in the south at the Square Water Holes—(hear, hear)—where there there had been a great cry for accommodation, and where no licenced house was likely to exist for a long time

Mr LINDSAY said that the hon member for the city had remarked that where a license would not pay it would not be applied for, and that was the case. But to show the necessity of such a clause as that proposed, he (Mr Lindsay) need only refer to an inn which existed for years at Mypongà. It was highly desirable that there should be a house of accommodation in that district. There was one, but it could not pay a licence, and the wine and spirits were sold without any authority. The house was frequented by Justices of the Peace and members of the police force—(laughter)—and others, who ought, from their official position, to take notice of the fact that the house had not a license. But the injustice of interfering was so manifest that the magistrates and police inspectors who frequented the place never had an information against the house. The consequence was that it existed as a sly-grog shop for ten years before it obtained a licence, which it ultimately procured.

Mr YOUNG supported the amendment. Seeing it was guarded by the restriction that such a remission could only be granted on the recommendation of the Board which granted the licences, he considered it quite safe.

Mr BAKEWELL also supported the amendment. He considered 10s a week too much to pay for a licence in many cases, and that such a charge would encourage slygrog shops.

The clause was then agreed to.

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed another clause, to the effect that the Government might make regulations for public-house lamps, in accordance with the advice of the Trinity Board. He had been informed that at Glenelg some time since a ship had been nearly lost in consequence of mistaking the public-house light, and he had also heard that similar mistakes occurred on various occasions. He had heard also that a publican at Glenelg had received a communication from the Trinity Board which he believed justified him in leaving his lamp unlighted, but one day a policeman laid an information against him (the publican) and the magistrates considering that he had not sufficient justification for leaving the lamp unlighted fined him. [The hon member concluded by reading the clause.]

Mr REYNOLDS objected to the practice of inserting clauses in a Bill without giving notice. (Hear, hear.) The usual practice was to give notice, so that the hon member in charge of the Bill could say whether he would admit the clauses or not. One hon gentleman had introduced a clause a yard long—(laughter)—and the House, for all that hon members knew, might be stultifying itself by adding this lengthy clause to the short and pithy one which the hon member (Mr Bakewell) had moved as the only clause.

Mr STRANGWAYS said he had prepared the clauses on the previous day, and it was his intention to have them printed and laid on the table of the House that day. He had shewn them to the hon the Attorney-General, who said he would look over them and return them; but he (Mr Strangways) had not got them back in time to have them printed. His intention was that the clauses should be introduced more pro forma than anything else.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS hoped that the hon member for Barossa would not only consent to a recommittal of the clauses, but would himself move it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr BAKEWELL said he was aware that the clauses would be moved, and he fully approved of them, with the exception of one of those of the hon member for Encounter Bay. With regard to the remarks of the hon member for the Sturt, he agreed that it was a bad practice to introduce fresh clauses without giving notice, but the grievance under which the publicans labored was one which should be removed.

Mr SOLOMON supported the clause, believing it necessary that some regard should be had to the lights on the sea coast.

The clause was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS, the preamble was amended by adding the words "and the Act as amended in certain particulars."

The title of the Act was then agreed to.

The House then resumed, and the Chairman having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again on Friday.

KAPUNDA RAILWAY

Mr SHANNON rose to move, pursuant to notice, "That the petition of the inhabitants of Kapunda and the surrounding districts be taken into consideration, with a view to granting the prayer thereof." The prayer of the petition, he said, was that the terminus of the Kapunda line of railway should not be placed on Section 1411 until surveys had been made to determine whether the line might not be continued to the township of North Kapunda. The proposed terminus would be at a distance of one and three-quarters of a mile from the township, and double that distance by following the line of road, or three and a half miles. As a great amount of traffic passed through Kapunda there could be no doubt but that it should be connected with the railway terminus either by a macadamized road or by railway, otherwise it would necessitate the construction of a new township at the terminus. This latter would act very prejudicially to Kapunda, where a large amount of money had been expended on the faith of the railway being carried into the township. Kapunda was second to no township in the colony, with the exception of Port Adelaide and the Burra Burra, and it would not be the inhabitants of the township alone that would suffer, but also those residing to the north of Kapunda. He might also state that in any extension of the line northwards it must pass close to Kapunda. The petition had been signed by 569 persons in the neighbourhood, which was a proof that there was a general feeling against the proposed terminus. At the suggestion of his hon colleague he would move, in place of the original motion, "That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause surveys and estimates to be made for the extension of the railway from Section 1411 to the town of North Kapunda."

Mr BAGOT seconded the motion.

Mr McELLISTER opposed the motion, as he thought it would tend to bring about a great waste of public money. It had been always understood that the terminus would not be placed further north than the proposed site, and with regard to the extension, he could confidently state that there were three drays went through Riverton for one that went by way of Kapunda. The Kapunda people had had for some time past the lion's share, and he thought it quite time that the advantages they possessed should be shared by others.

Mr LINDSAY supported the motion, because he believed a mistake had been made in placing the Gawler Town Terminus where it was, and that it was necessary in this case to guard against what would be a very similar mistake if carried out. They must recollect that in railway extension they had no Upper House of Commissioners, and that what was done could not be undone.

Mr YOUNG was adverse to the principle of carrying out public works by petition. He was not prepared, however, to discuss the question; but he presumed the surveyors had adopted the best line and the best locality for a terminus. He could not conceive from the way in which the petition had been introduced that a sufficient case had been made out. (Mr McEllister—"Hear, hear.") He would agree with the petitioners so far as that no considerable expense should be incurred in the erection of a station at the proposed terminus. It had been stated by the hon member for the Light (Mr Shannon), that Kapunda was second to no township in the colony with the exception of the Port and the Burra Burra, but he thought that being the case, the petition being only signed by 569 persons was not greatly indicative of the popularity of the scheme.

Mr STRANGWAYS said, if the House adopted the amendment of the hon member for Light they would be substantially negativing the views embodied in the report of the Railway Management Committee, which were, that any extension northward should be carried by way of the Valley of the Gilbert. That was his interpretation of that portion of the Report—(Read extract from the report)—and he could not therefore support the resolution before the House.

Mr MILNE would like to have some explanation from the Government as to the reason why the terminus was placed at Section 1411 instead of at Kapunda. There must surely have been some engineering difficulties that the line stopped short of the centre of communication, although within a short distance of it. With regard to the remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) as to the finding of the Committee on Railway Management he would say, as he was on that Committee, that there was no declared expression on the part of the Committee that the line should be extended by way of the Valley of the Gilbert, but its desirability rested entirely on on a careful consideration of the whole matter. The Committee never intended in whatever direction the extension might be made, that such a short distance should be a bar against carrying the terminus into Kapunda.

Mr BAGOT was one of the Committee referred to, and his impression was that the extension should be made by way of the Valley of the Gilbert. The extension of the line northward, however, would not interfere with the carrying of the terminus into Kapunda, for they must come to Kapunda before they turned off to the Valley of the Gilbert, and no matter which way the railway went it must go within a very short distance of Kapunda. He regretted to see the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) and the hon member for Noarlunga (Mr Young) objecting to this survey, because when those hon members had called for surveys on former occasions the House had invariably granted them, and he thought they exercised very bad taste in objecting to what was now asked for. If the township were not connected with the terminus by rail a macadamized road would be necessary, and the expense of that would be almost as great as connecting the two points by rail. He hoped the House would agree to the motion.

Mr MILDRED asked whether the line from Section 1411 to Kapunda had not already been examined.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it had been examined but not surveyed. He should not object to the motion for the present survey.

Mr MILDRED would support the motion, and he hoped the survey now going on in the Valley of the Gilbert would prove that it would be more economical to make the main trunk line from the Gawler, and that the Kapunda Railway would be only a branch line.

The TREASURER said the hon member for Onkaparinga had asked if there were any engineering difficulties which prevented the extension of the line to the township of Kapunda, and he would, in reply to that hon member, read the evidence which had been taken in Committee on that point (Read extract from page 16 of report, in which Mr Hargrave's evidence was to the effect that the cost of a bridge to enable the terminus to be carried into the township, would be £4 000) It would be perceived by this that the Government were desirous of carrying the terminus into Kapunda, and they were so now, if it could be shown that the expense of so doing would not outweigh the advantage to be derived from it But while he said this, he would remind the House that they had been struggling two sessions to carry out the extension to Kapunda, and that no step should be taken which would have the tendency to delay the work With regard to the survey asked for, he should have no objection to its being granted

Mr DUFFIELD wished that the motion should express that the survey should be made to the Kapunda Mine instead of to the township of North Kapunda, which it would be found was situated at a higher elevation than the mine, and therefore less accessible He looked at the question not as the northern railway, but as the railway to Kapunda He was in favor of this terminus being carried to the township or to the mine, and, with the alteration he had suggested, he would support the motion

Mr PEAKE would support the motion He had been on two of the Committees, and had always expressed a wish that the terminus should be carried into the township of Kapunda He believed from the evidence of Mr Hargrave that it was probable that the terminus would have to be even now placed further northward He agreed with the motion, because it would have the effect of settling a vexed point

The motion was then put and carried

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL.

The further consideration of this Bill was postponed until Thursday

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

In Committee.

Mr MILNE, in the absence of the hon member for the Port (Captain Hart), moved an addition to one of the clauses of this Bill, which was agreed to

The clauses were all passed through Committee

The House resumed, the Bill was reported, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for Thursday

NORTHERN EXPLORATION

THE COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid on the table further correspondence relative to the Northern Explorations including a full report from Major Warburton, and sundry maps, the former of which was ordered to be printed

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

In Committee

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS laid the amended print of this Bill on the table, and on his motion it was substituted for the former one

Clauses 4 to 32 inclusive were passed as printed

Clause 33, "Penalty for refusing to fix, &c, fire-plugs, or occasional failure of supply of water"

Mr STRANGWAYS called attention to the circumstance that the Commissioner was made liable for the penalties in certain cases, and he suggested that, as it was not a dignified position for him to be placed in, the penalty should be enforced only on the officer in charge of the works

Mr BAGOT was of the same opinion, and thought it was a very anomalous position for a responsible Minister of the Crown to be placed in to be subject to such penalties

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would say that it was always recognized as a true principle that where power was possessed there also should there be responsibility Certain powers were conferred on the Commissioner of Public Works, and it was only proper that he should be subject to the responsibility In the case of the old Commissioners the same course had been pursued It would be a question as between the Commissioner of Public Works and the person appointed by him to carry out the duties of the office, which latter would of course be called upon to make good any penalties to which, through his neglect, his superior had been subjected to As to placing a Minister of the Crown in an invidious position, he could only repeat that where there was power there should be responsibility, and it would be for such Minister to take care to secure himself from the penalties which should fall upon those whose personal failings they arose from

The clause was passed as printed

Clauses 34 to 43 inclusive were passed as printed

On clause 44 being put,

Mr STRANGWAYS asked if it was the intention of the Government to prosecute any system of drainage before the water was brought into the town, otherwise, he thought, the water without the drainage would have an unwholesome effect

Mr LINDSAY was about to ask the same question, and he would like to know also whether, when the supply pipes were being laid house drainage pipes might not be also laid with less expense

Mr BAKEWELL said in Melbourne there was a large water supply with no underground drainage, and no inconvenience had been felt from it In fact, some persons had considered the underground drainage to be prejudicial to health

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the Legislature had provided no funds for the drainage of the city, and until that were done, there was no point to be gained in discussing the question

Clause passed as printed

Clauses 45 and 46 were passed as printed

Clause 47 "Rates payable by owner when tenements, &c, unoccupied, or annual value is under £20"

Mr STRANGWAYS thought hon members should now be in a position to say whether they would place the Government in a different position than they would a private company If it was to be a general tax only to enable the Government to pay back the debt and interest on the loan, then the clause would do, but if it were a water rate it should not apply to unoccupied land or where the water was not laid on

Mr SOLOMON said it was not usual in any part of the world to charge for water where it was not used. He should certainly oppose the power given in this clause to levy rates on unoccupied tenements

Mr. BURFORD said this clause was intended to apply to houses where water was laid on, at least he so gathered from the next clause If it were not so he should certainly protest against any one being compelled to pay the rate who did not use the water

Mr SOLOMON moved that the words "or tenements" be struck out, and perhaps that would meet the question

Mr STRANGWAYS moved, "That the whole clause be struck out" It would be very hard to compel persons who had gone to the expense of constructing water tanks to pay the rate while the value of their property would not be increased one penny Such a system was diametrically opposed to all systems of rating in England He would therefore move that the clause be struck out

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said this was one of the most essential clauses of the Bill, and that if it were erased the Government would have to consider whether it would not be necessary to fall back upon the old Act It was not at all fair, he considered, that those who had tanks should be exempted from contributing to that which would increase the value of their property The rates under this Bill were more reasonable than under the former Act, in which there was also a construction rate He hoped the clause would be retained

Mr COLE would support the clause Contingencies might arise, fire for instance, when a water-supply would be of great advantage That was a reason why those who even did not use the water should pay the rate

Mr HAY supported the clause, because all property would be benefitted alike Insurance rates would be lower, and other advantage would be derived In Schedule Class 3 it was provided that vacant lands should be rated at a less rate, and he thought the same plan might be adopted with vacant tenements

Mr STRANGWAYS said that, in other parts of the world, water companies were compelled to supply water to fires gratuitously

Mr BURFORD thought Mr Coles's reference to fires was far-fetched, as in those cases water was never charged for

Mr MILDRED called attention to the 39th clause, in which the Commissioner was empowered to cut off service pipes, but, notwithstanding this, the occupiers of the tenement would still be liable for the rate.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, if the House adopted the amendment for striking out the clause, the Government would feel it to be their duty to withdraw the Bill, because it would go to establish the principal that those who did not use the water, or, perhaps, did not wash themselves (a laugh) should be exempted from paying the rate, and they did not know how far this might be carried In the former Act there was a construction rate as well as a water rate, but in this the scale was so graduated that it would be far more advantageous to vacant places In fact, in rating, the change was directly in favor of that class who had vacant houses and lands If the clause were not adopted, it would be so great a departure from the principle recognized by the Legislature in carrying out the work that the Government would not feel justified in going on with the Bill.

After a motion for the postponement of the clause, by Mr STRANGWAYS, it was passed as printed

Clauses 48 to 56 inclusive were passed as printed

Clauses 57 to 59, relating to the rights of inspecting city assessments, the appointment and powers of assessors and collectors, and providing that collectors may sue, were passed as printed without discussion

Clause 60 provided that annual accounts should be made up by the Commissioner and sent to the Commissioner of Public Works and be open for inspection

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said this was a mistake

Mr STRANGWAYS thought this clause as nice a specimen of the circumlocution office as had ever come under his observation or could be devised The Attorney-General said it was a mistake, but unfortunately the Bill was full of such By this clause the Commissioner was to make out an account and then hand it to himself Here was a specimen of red-tapeism

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the clause had afforded the hon member for Encounter Bay another opportunity of distinguishing himself The clause would have been quite appropriate if the Commissioners had been retained

It was amended to meet the altered state of circumstances and passed

Clause 61, relating to the recoveries of damages and penalties, was passed as printed

Clause 62 provided that all fines, penalties, and arrears of money levied or recovered under the Act should so far as not otherwise specially appropriated be paid to the Colonial Treasurer on behalf of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, for the public uses of the province and support of the Government thereof

Mr SOLOMON moved an amendment to the effect that the money be carried by the Treasurer to the credit of the Waterworks Commissioners He believed this was the usual course, at all events, he considered it only right that the penalties should go to the fund from which penalties were paid, and that a debtor and creditor account should be kept

Mr STRANGWAYS believed that the course proposed by the Bill was the correct one. It was not usual that the fines should be paid to the Commissioners, nor could he see any reason that they should be paid to them

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL agreed with the amendment The principle had been recognized in reference to District and Municipal Councils The question was whether the fines, &c, should go to the general revenue, or to the funds for this particular undertaking He thought the amendment a reasonable one

The clause was passed as amended

Clauses 63 and 64, relating to tender of amends and protection of persons, and as to proceedings against persons acting under the act, were passed as printed, and the Chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following Friday

THE NORTH-WEST COAST

The TREASURER laid on the table a paper prepared by Mr Douglas illustrating the report and survey of the north-west coast.

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL

Upon the motion of Mr. BAKEWELL the report of the Committee of the whole House upon this Bill was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day

THE REAL PROPERTY ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL intimated that on the following day he should ask leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Real Property Act.

The House adjourned at half-past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Major O'Halloran, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Captain Bagot, and the Hon A Forster

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

The Hon Capt HALL, in moving the second reading of the Smillie Estate Bill, said that the object sought to be attained by the Bill was to remove doubts respecting the titles of lessees and purchasers of certain lands in the township of Nairne Certain sections of land had been laid out as a township, the object and purpose being to effect a sale of the allotments Certain powers of attorney had been granted, and sales had been made under them, but doubts had arisen as to the validity of the titles granted under these powers of attorney This bill was to remove those doubts, and enable the Trustees to carry out the original intention in selling and granting titles in the township of Nairne. The Bill had passed through a Committee of the other branch of the Legislature and of that House, and the Committee had found the preamble proved but had recommended the introduction of a clause whereby the proceeds of the lands would be secured Having shortly stated the objects of the Bill, he would move that it be read a second time

The Hon H AYERS seconded the motion, which was carried, and, upon the motion of Capt HALL, the House went into Committee upon it, when a clause proposed by the Hon H AYERS was introduced as the 6th clause, rendering it compulsory upon the Trustees to invest all moneys received for the sale of land either in the British funds or in South Australian Government Securities The various clauses having been agreed to, the Bill was reported, the report adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, said that no one looking at the map which had been furnished by Mr Stuart, or reading that gentleman's journal, could avoid being struck by the indomitable perseverance, energy, and pluck evinced by him in his arduous exploration undertaken at private expense Mr Stuart left the settled districts accompanied by a black man, a white man, four horses, and six weeks' provisions, springing into the wilderness to the north-west of this province, and he might say thoroughly exploring between the west side of Lake Torrens and the western boundary of South Australia He was absent a period of about two months, returning to the settled districts on September 14, and during his absence had been subjected to nearly every description of physical privation, exposed to the rains and storms without shelter For weeks together he and his companion were on an allowance of 2½ lbs of flour per week, occasionally varied by a bandicoot, or a rat, or a mouse, added to their limited bill of fare The result of this arduous exploration was the discovery of a country adapted for pastoral purposes, containing nearly 15,000 square miles The particulars of this discovery Mr Stuart offered to develope in consideration of getting a lease of a certain portion of this country for a number of years free of rent On reference to Council Paper 124, hon gentlemen would find the correspondence which took place between Mr Stuart and the Government on the subject, containing all particulars. To carry out those conditions modified in some measure, the House of Assembly had passed the present Bill and invited the concurrence of the Council By referring to the Waste Lands Regulations, in Council Paper 225 of last session, it would be seen that persons who discovered and made known country adapted for pastoral purposes were entitled to receive a lease of any portion not exceeding 200 square miles, at the rate of not less than 10s per square mile The discovery of Mr Stuart, however, did not merely embrace 200 square miles, which he might have had at once upon obtaining a lease, but by his energy he had added to the pastoral interests of the colony to the extent of 15,000 square miles Mr Stuart had indeed accomplished what had never before been done by any exploring party, either public or private. The result of his discoveries would add a large annual amount to the public revenue of the colony, and he thought hon gentlemen would only deem it wise and expedient in this particular instance to deviate from the Waste Lands Regulations and agree to what was proposed by the present Bill, so that the reward to Mr Stuart might be commensurate with the discoveries which he had made He would only further remark that Mr Stuart had not claimed any pecuniary compensation, but it was proposed to give him by this Bill a lease of about a tenth of the land which he professed to have discovered, so that the Treasury would not be out of pocket, and the value to Mr Stuart would only be pro rata to the public interest of the colony

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN seconded the motion

The Hon J MORPHETT rose to oppose the motion of the Chief Secretary He did so after a full consideration of all the circumstances of Mr Stuart s case He did not oppose it from any disinclination to reward enterprise, so far from that he considered it most desirable that energy, skill, and enterprise, should be fully rewarded not only in the case of Mr Stuart, but many others, but he opposed the motion, because he saw nothing in the case of Mr Stuart to take it out of the ordinary category There were many besides Mr Stuart who had shown considerable energy, skill, and enterprise in the discovery of new country, yet no such reward had been proposed for them as that which was now proposed for Mr Stuart It had not been considered expedient to reward them in any other way than was provided by the regulations to which the Hon the Chief Secretary had referred Those regulations had been made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, No 5, 21 Victoria, and under the 12th clause of those regulations the Governor had power with the consent of the Ministry to make any regulations for the leasing of Crown Lands The regulations which the Chief Secretary had referred to were made by the present Governor Sir R G MacDonnell, and were signed by Wm Younghusband It was under those regulations that parties who went out upon exploring expeditions at their own expense sought their reward, and those regulations which, as he had before stated, were signed by Wm Younghusband, showed how parties who had been successful in exploring might obtain runs without their being submitted to auction But the Hon the Chief Secretary thought now that these regulations were a little too stringent, and he was inclined to agree with the hon gentleman that they were a little too stringent, and did not present sufficient encouragement to parties to leave the civilized portions of the province and go in the bush upon exploring expeditions But to make such a jump from the regulations to which he had referred, and the Bill which was before the House, did appear to him most extravagant and incomprehensible The difference between the regulations and the Bill was this — Under the regulations a successful explorer might claim, as he had stated, not more than 200 square miles, but before he obtained a lease he was called upon to pay 10s a square mile to the Government, and he was bound to stock the run within 12 months That was thought sufficient inducement 15 months ago for parties to explore, and Swindon, Hack, Bald, and many others had done so with no other inducement But now the hon the Chief Secretary said "Give Stuart 1,500 square miles, give him eight locations instead of one, and instead of calling upon him to pay 10s a square mile, give him the land rent free for seven years, and give him four years to stock it in instead of one" Giving Mr Stuart every credit for his energy, his tact, as a bushman, and his desire to do the best he could for his employer, he doubted whether there was anything in Mr. Stuart's exploration to entitle him to such extraordinary advantages as were proposed by the present Bill. He doubted whether there was anything which could justify the introduction of a Bill which was the highest honor which could be paid to any one. If a second Leichhardt had explored to Port Essington and back, they could have done no more than was now done in the case of Mr. Stuart—introduce a Bill. The hon. gentleman, the Chief Secretary knew that he had only to advise His Excellency to alter the regulations, to accomplish all that was proposed by the present Bill, but then the responsibility would rest with the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, consequently, the hon. gentleman would not do that, but left the matter to Parliament. This course was objectionable, for Parliament could not, as a body, investigate a particular claim, but the Government could. If the Government acted upon their own responsibility, if they were wrong the country would blame them but if they were right they would be honored. The responsibility naturally fell upon the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and he must object to it being cast upon Parliament. He trusted the Council would not be called upon to consider the merits of the Bill, because he trusted the Council would see that it would be far better to throw the responsibility where it naturally rested, upon the Ministry. Let the Ministry recommend the Governor to alter the regulations, and the Ministry might then, if they pleased, give Mr. Stuart such lands as they pleased, at a farthing a square mile. No. 5, of 21 Victoria, clearly shewed that such was the case, the 12th section shewed that there was no limitation as to the price which the Governor might be advised by his responsible Ministers to fix. If after an investigation of Mr. Stuart's claim the Government considered it was one which would justify them in giving him as much land as was included in the present Bill, and on the easiest terms, they could do so, and the hon. gentleman and his colleagues would no doubt be prepared to justify their conduct to the country. He trusted they would not be called upon to go into the Bill, but, at the same time, he would call the attention of the House to the fact that the quantity was excessive. He was informed upon the best authority that the whole extent of country discovered by Mr. Stuart consisted only of 1,500 square miles, and that every acre beyond that was worthless. If that were the case the Council, by the present Bill, was actually asked to give Mr. Stuart the whole of the country which he had discovered. Even if some of the outlying portions of the country were good, they might be sure, if this Bill were passed, that Mr. Stuart would secure the whole of the water frontages, for it should be remembered that two hundred square miles were twenty miles by ten and it was proposed to give Mr. Stuart seven of these dimensions and one of half the size, so that he would ask whether these stretched as a bushman could stretch them, might not readily be made to take in all the water. There were many explorers who were equally deserving of respect and consideration as Mr. Stuart. Mr. McKinlay, for instance, was, in truth, the discoverer of that portion of the northern country which led to subsequent discoveries, he discovered Mount Serle, and stocked runs thereunder the then existing regulations, at great expense and trouble, and what did he gain? Why, nothing, not even a lease of the runs which he stocked. He did not retain an inch of the country which he discovered. He did not see that the Chief Secretary had shown such particular features in the case of Mr. Stuart as should justify such an extravagant exception as he wished in his favor. His objection was founded upon principle, and had no reference to individuals. The proper mode of remunerating any explorer he contended was to give him what he could properly claim under any regulations in existence at the time. If the regulations were not sufficiently liberal, it devolved upon the Government to make them so, and as he had shown they might at any time be altered by the Governor with the advice of his Ministry. If that course were adopted the advadvantages would then be extended not only to Mr. Stuart, but to other explorers. His object was to encourage explorers generally, and he should be glad if such regulations could be made as would enable them to enjoy a portion of the country which they discovered for seven years, if the Government liked, provided that every one enjoyed the same privilege. He objected, however, to this wholesale, reckless, and unjust way of giving away the lands of the people as proposed by this Bill, and should, therefore, move that it be read again that day six months.

The Hon. A. Forster felt placed in a position of difficulty in reference to this Bill, as he did not wish to deprive Mr. Stuart of any reward which he was entitled to for the energy which he had displayed, and the sacrifices which he had made, in the exploration of the northern country, but he felt that this Bill was intended to confer a special advantage and privilege upon an individual which was not conferred upon others, even rateably, who stood in the same position as explorers. He was sure that he should be found happy at any time to reward Mr. Stuart to the extent of his legitimate claims, but he would also state that he would not be a party to any measure adopted by the Government of an unusual character, and which placed other parties in an unfair position with regard to Mr. Stuart. He was sorry that it was attempted to pass an Act for the purpose of rewarding Mr. Stuart, he was sorry, because the law at present in force, and the general power of the Government, would have enabled them to offer a proper and suitable reward to Mr. Stuart for his discoveries. He should have thought that the existing regulations would have met the case, but he wished to ask, supposing the Council were to pass this Bill, would the Chief Secretary be prepared to introduce a Bill to reward others, the first discoverers of the country in a similar manner, for if not he must oppose, other claims as valid as those of Mr. Stuart not being recognised. He could only be induced to support the measure upon the assurance that others would not be placed in a less advantageous position. He did not anticipate from a perusal of Mr. Stuart's journal that the large amount of country had been discovered by that gentleman, which had been represented by the hon. the Chief Secretary, for he had a letter in his possession, addressed to Mr. Swinden by Mr. Stuart's fellow explorer, George Foster, and though he did not vouch for its accuracy, he had every reason to believe it perfectly correct. The letter was as follows:—

"November 18, 1856.

"Sir—I beg to inform you that I started out with Mr. J. M. Stuart, to the N.W., on condition that I received £2 per week, and a share in the country found.

"We found about 1500 miles of good country, on a large creek 100 miles from the Elizabeth. All the rest of the country we went over is of no use whatever.

"I am, &c., &c.

"George Foster."

"C. Swinden, Esq."

That letter was from the party who accompanied Mr. Stuart, and although he did not wish to depreciate the claims or representations of Mr. Stuart, he felt bound to read that letter to the House, it having come into his possession. He thought the Government before granting what was proposed by the Bill should have taken steps to ascertain that the representations of Mr. Stuart were correct. They should have done so before alienating so large a part of the country for a period of 14 years, for seven of which, Mr. Stuart was to pay nothing, and for the remainder of the term to enjoy it without competition in violation of the existing regulations. He objected again to the course proposed, because there was no consideration whatever shewn for Mr. Stuart's companion. Mr. Stuart had been sent out by Mr. Chambers, and now claimed 1,500 square miles, which the Government appeared disposed to give him, without in any way considering the person who accompanied him. He knew it would probably be stated that Foster was a mere servant to Mr. Stuart, and no doubt he was a servant to some one, but he presumed they had both been sent out by Mr. Chambers, and were in fact both servants. But supposing that Foster had been servant to Stuart, and had gone out without any arrangement that he should participate in the discovery, was he entitled to no reward from the Government? The Chief Secretary had eloquently and pathetically expatiated upon the hardships to which the party were exposed, the party originally consisting of two white men and a black, but the black deserted. The hon. gentleman stated that they were exposed to every description of physical suffering, that they lived on opossums and so on, and that for days and weeks their sustenance was most precarious. He agreed with all that had been said upon this point, but Foster was as much exposed as Stuart, and surely where there was a community of danger there should be a community of reward. The Government should certainly have given some consideration to Mr. Foster. But what was the fact? Why, Foster came to town, and claimed 200 square miles, under the regulations which had been referred to by the Chief Secretary, and the Government received the rent, but when he came in, without taking any steps to ascertain whether the statement were correct or not, the Government said the money had been received in error, and that the land belonged to Mr. Stuart, by virtue of his discovery, concluding by stating that Mr. Foster must come and take back the money. He did not know if the money had been returned, but he considered the course taken by the Government an ungenerous one. Mr. Swindon discovered the country next to Lake Torrens, and opened up the way to the country discovered by Stuart and Foster, who went through Swindon's Country, but Mr. Swindon was not permitted to take 200 square miles. He took 400, however, at 10s. a square mile, but it was not stocked, and the money was sacrificed. He should support the Government in rewarding discoverers of new country, believing that the utmost encouragement should be given to exploring operations, and if the Government would come forward with some broad principle so as to reward all alike, he should join in supporting it. But if this Bill were assented to, they would be continually called upon to pass such Bills. That would be the effect, the country would be opened up in all directions, and they would be called upon to give others a similar reward to that which it was proposed to give Mr. Stuart. To save the Council the trouble and inconvenience of considering special Bills, he would suggest the adoption of some general principle. The Government should adopt a principle which would save them from trouble, and, at the same time, they should take steps to ascertain that the alleged discoveries were true. In reference to gold-fields, it would be remembered, it was proposed to give discoverers a certain proportion of the money received for leases within a certain time, and if the same principle had been adhered to in reference to the discovery of new country, Mr. Stuart would have had his reward. Let it be said that he should receive a tenth of the amount received for leases within one, two, or three years No doubt the House would have sanctioned such a course had it been proposed by the Government but they had done nothing of the kind They had blindly accepted the report of Mr Stuart, without taking any steps to ascertain its correctness, and then generously proposed to give him 1,500 square miles He felt that he must vote against the Bill, and support the amendment that the Bill be read again that day six months He did so not with the view of preventing him from receiving his just reward, but to relieve the Council from the disagreeable position of passing Bills to reward discoveries when there might be some broad principle laid down for the reward of all explorers

The Hon Captain SCOTT would be sorry to oppose any motion for the purpose of giving Mr Stuart a fair remuneration for the risk and labor which he had incurred No doubt that gentleman had risked his life and had been exposed to great hardship, but at the same time he felt it his duty to vote against the Bill The Council were called upon to give Mr Stuart 1,500 square miles, on lease for 14 years the country alleged to have been discovered by Mr Stuart being of the extent of 16,000 square miles although as had been remarked by the Hon Mr Forster there was no evidence of this discovery, and two men riding rapidly along for the last few days it appeared they were riding for their lives, could form but a very imperfect idea of the extent He should like to see some evidence before the House to shew that 16,000 square miles of available country had been discovered, but under any circumstances, he could not see that they were called upon to vote Mr Stuart 1,500 square miles as a reward Whilst the House were quite in the dark as to the amount of available country, it was very explicit as to the quantity to be granted to Mr Stuart for the alleged discovery of a country, but whether it existed or not they could not tell It was proposed that the 1,500 square miles should be in seven blocks, and any one acquainted with such matters would know that there would be very little difficulty in so arranging matters by securing the water that Mr Stuart might command 4,500 square miles By holding the water he might virtually hold two or three times the quantity of land which it was proposed he should have Was this Bill to be a precedent? Was every one who discovered country to come to that House and ask for a similar grant? If so, they would soon alienate the whole country altogether, and instead of the rents going into the Treasury they would go into the pockets of the explorers If the lands mentioned in this Bill were given to Mr Stuart for seven years for nothing, he would have no difficulty in selecting them in such a way that he might make a handsome profit of them at once by letting them It would be doing a great injustice to carry out the principles of this Bill, as it would be establishing a monopoly The annual rent of 1,500 square miles at 10s per mile would be £750, and for 14 years this would amount to £10,500 Only half of this amount would go to the Government, £5,250—an amount not sufficient for the survey of the land and other expenses connected with it But supposing that Mr Stuart selected the land in such a manner that, instead of 1,500 square miles, he got 3,000, the rental in 14 years would amount to £21,000, and as he would only pay £5,250 to the Government—that being the rental upon 1,500 square miles—he would have an amount of £15 750 for his labor in discovering the country But suppose Mr Stuart, from the way in which he selected the country, got three miles for one, the rental would amount, at the end of 14 years, to £31,500, and, as he would only pay to the Government the sum of £5,250, he would have a sum of £26 250 for his trouble in discovering the new country Besides this, it should be remembered that Mr Stuart would not be bound to stock more than 1,500 square miles When the right of selection was given to Mr Stuart, it was not too much to assume that he would so select it as to secure himself all the advantages he could The country had not been surveyed, and he presumed there would be considerable expense in surveying it It was not as if the country was pressed for this, the cattle were not starving, and although it was desirable that the country should be opened up, it was not a matter of immediate necessity It might be said that Mr Stuart might have kept his secret, and no doubt he might, but what good would it have been to him? The attention of the Government had for some years been directed to the spot at which these discoveries were made, and a party had actually been sent out in that direction, but had not proceeded so fast as Mr Stuart had been enabled to If Mr Stuart had kept his secret the country would have lost nothing, as the country discovered by Mr Stuart would eventually have been discovered by some one else They were dealing with the subject as though Mr Stuart had saved something from destruction, as if he had discovered something which would never have been discovered but for him He should be prepared to give him a fair reward, because he happened to be the first who discovered the country, but he could not consent to giving him 1,500 square miles under circumstances which would in fact enable him to select 4,500 If this were to be a precedent there would be a fresh Bill introduced for every few miles of country which were discovered, and there would be no end to such Bills If it were not to be a precedent then it was unjust and impolitic If there were to be no similar reward to others this Bill would put a stop to exploration Let Stuart be well and fairly rewarded, and let it be known that whoever discovered new country would be rewarded, and that would be the surest way of getting the country opened up

The Hon Capt BAGOT said that in the conscientious discharge of his duty he felt it imperative to vote against the Bill He considered it a most monstrous departure from the regulations which were laid down, and had been acted upon for so many years It was altogether uncalled for A former Government had thought it advisable to establish regulations in reference to the discoverers of new runs, and why those regulations should be set aside to the monstrous extent which was proposed by this Bill he was at a loss to conceive If it were desirable to reward Mr Stuart, and he admitted it was, and if the existing regulations were not sufficiently extensive, let them be altered, and let him have the first benefit of the alteration, but let the regulations also be for the benefit of all future explorers Even in that act there would be some injustice to those who had gone before When, last year, two men encountered much greater hardships than had been encountered by Mr Stuart in the discovery of new country, they sought no other reward than that contained in the regulations The danger, difficulties, and privations encountered by Mr Stuart, during an absence of six weeks, had been forcibly dwelt upon by the Chief Secretary, but there was a gentleman, Mr Bald, who had been as many months exploring in the north, and was not accompanied by a white man, but left the settled districts with a black, who deserted him He lived with the blacks and encountered almost unheard of hardships, yet he demanded no other reward than that provided by the regulations, a demand was made for the rent of the country which he claimed, and it was paid at the moment Why should there be a departure in the case of Mr Stuart? as he was well aware that a large and expensive party had been fitted out by the Government to explore in the same direction, and that that party was in the frontier advancing towards the country discovered by Stuart, who took advantage of his light equipment and forestalled them If he were deserving of any reward he believed there was full power under the existing regulations to reward him, and if not let them be extended A statement had been made by the Chief Secretary as to the country which Stuart had discovered, and the hon gentleman had produced a map, but on looking to that map it would be seen that the extent of available country travelled by Stuart was about 100 miles, and consequently it he saw 15,000 square miles of available country he must have seen 75 miles on each side of him, presuming that he went through the very centre This was an impossibility, and when the hon gentleman made the statement which he had to secure the votes of the House, he should be prepared to substantiate it, and he trusted he would do so in his reply

The Hon H AYERS felt it his duty to oppose the second reading of the Bill but as no argument had been used in support of the measure, except a few words which had fallen from the Chief Secretary, the discussion having been all one-sided, he would not trouble the House with any lengthened remarks The Council had no reliable evidence before it as to the quantity of country discovered by Mr Stuart, but they were asked to give a certain quantity—1,500 square miles That was one objection which he had to the Bill, and the other was making Stuart's an exceptional case He had no objection to support a modification of the general rule in reference to the discovery of new country, so that all might participate in the benefit

The Hon Captain HALL felt bound to oppose the second reading of the Bill, without the Chief Secretary could vouch for the statement that 15,000 square miles of country had been discovered Even if the hon gentleman could vouch for that, he should not be disposed to support the present Bill, although it would materially affect his views upon the subject The House were entirely in the dark as to the nature of the country He had the warmest desire to reward all the discoverers of new country, and an earnest desire to see the resources of the country developed and stocked, but still there must be a limit to these rewards and such a wholesale alienation of the country as was proposed by this Bill, was certainly not warranted He had long been of opinion that instead of fitting out expeditions, the proper plan was to offer rewards to private individuals The regulations already admitted of a grant of 200 square miles of country being made to discoverers and he thought this sufficient He did not consider the case of Mr Stuart so exceptional that such a departure should be made in his favor, as at the time he went out he must have known that an expensive party had been fitted out to explore in the same direction, and that consequently he had something to fall back upon He did not agree with the Hon Captain Scott, that it was unimportant whether this discovery was made now or at a future period, as every thousand added to our flocks increased the wealth of the country, and if they could offer leases of pastoral lands to residents in Victoria and New South Wales the country would soon be stocked, and its wealth would be increased He felt sorry to be obliged to go with what appeared to be a majority of the House, and throw out the Bill

The CHIEF SECRETARY having replied, the House divided upon the question that the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question, that is, that the Bill be read a second time, which was lost by a majority of four, the votes on a division being Ayes 3, Noes 7, as follows —

AYES—Messrs Davies and O'Halloran, and Chief Secretary (teller)

NOES—Messrs Bagot, Captain Scott, Everard, Ayers, Forster, Hall and Morphett (teller)

THE IMPOUNDING ACT

Mr LINDSAY asked the Attorney-General—

"(1) Whether by the law of England it is or is not felony to shoot another person's pig, even though the pig at the time be trespassing? (2) Whether clause 23 of the Impounding Bill of 1858, which authorises the destruction of certain animals therein mentioned, is or is not repugnant to the law of England? (3) Whether a by-law of a District Council, imposing a penalty of £10 upon any person who shall destroy another person's pig within the limits of the jurisdiction of such District Council, would be held to be repugnant to any Act of the Legislature of this Province"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was sorry that he should be compelled to decline to answer the first and last question He did not consider it to be part of his duty to give an opinion upon the law of England to any hon member who might choose to call upon him to do so, although he was always willing to give an opinion upon any matter under the consideration of the Legislature Clause 23 of the Impounding Act was not according to his opinion repugnant to the law of England The last question he must decline to answer, as he could not be expected to give an answer upon a supposititious case When any case came before him he should be happy to give an opinion upon the point, but he could not go through the whole of the cases which came within the range of possibility and give a specific answer to every one

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS the consideration of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill, was made an Order of the Day for the following Thursday

THE REAL PROPERTY ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, would ask the leave of the House to introduce a a Bill to amend the Real Property Act It would be in the recollection of hon members that during last session what was known as the Real Property Act was introduced and passed by very considerable majorities in that branch of the Legislature, and by decided majorities in the other branch That Bill had become the law of the land, and as might have been expected, when an attempt was made for the first time to introduce a system novel not merely in details but in principle for which there was no precedent, and in which every difficulty had to be seen and guarded against without the lights of experience—it was to be expected, when such a system was practically applied, that unforseen and unanticipated difficulties should be found to arise, that some things were omitted, that some were provided for in a way not most convenient or most expedient and that other matters would be found to require amendment in other ways The fact that in realising a measure of this nature errors and omissions were discovered, as they had actually been discovered in this Act, reflected no discredit upon the framer, as it was no more than what must almost inevitably occur to any one who undertook a task of this nature He had entertained serious doubts as to many portions of the Bill, and felt it his duty at the third reading to express those doubts So strongly, indeed, did he feel upon the point that he voted against the third reading of the Bill. But now, as he had before stated, the Act had become the law of the land, and he, therefore, conceived it to be the duty not only of those who originally supported the measure, but of those who opposed it, to do all they could to free it from those defects which interfered with its practical working, and make the Act as beneficial as they could So long as the measure had not been determined upon, every one was at liberty to oppose it by all constitutional means, but having been passed, another duty devolved upon them, and that was to concur as far as possible in carrying out those amendments which experience had shown were necessary for the successful working of the measure He said this, because he should ask the House to pass the amendments, upon the faith of their being recommended by the Lands Titles Commissioners, and their solicitors who had been employed to carry out the measure Not having had practical experience of the working of the measure, he was not aware of the extent of the difficulties and impediments which had arisen in carrying out the measure, and was consequently unable to say whether the amendments suggested by the Lands Titles Commissioners were the particular amendments which were required but he accepted them as requisite, on the faith of their being recommended by those entrusted with carrying out the Act, having merely done what he considered his duty by looking to the amendments to see that they in reality contained no such alteration in the principle of the measure as would justify him in refusing to be the medium of introducing them The Bill which he now asked leave to introduce, was to amend the details of the working of the existing Act, and he should ask the House in going through the matter to pass the Bill substantially in its present form, on the faith of it being recommended by those entrusted with the carrying out of the measure, and so accept it as deserving the confidence of the Government and the public He should, however, have to indicate some points upon which he entirely differed in opinion with the Bill But he should not suggest any amendment, because he thought a measure of this sort should be judged, not by the view which any one standing aside might take, but by the persons entrusted to carry it out after they had had practical experience of its operations He only mentioned this for the purpose of guarding himself against being supposed to give his individual approval of all the clauses When he moved the second reading he would indicate more precisely the points upon which he still differed, but he believed the general effect of the amendments would be to improve the law in a very high degree He believed that they would render the Act much more practically beneficial, and that they would to a great extent remove the objections of the members of the legal profession, and tend, consequently, to secure their co operation in carrying out the Act The Bill would, in fact, not merely amend the existing Act, but would tend to secure its being more usefully and speedily brought into operation than otherwise He thought he had said enough to induce the House to give him leave to introduce the Bill

The TREASURER seconded the motion, which was carried, and the Bill was read a first time and ordered to be printed

The Attorney-General moved that the second reading be an Order of the Day for the following day

Mr Solomon trusted that the hon gentleman would not name so early a day for the second reading but afford hon members an opportunity of looking through the various amendments He thought the least the hon gentleman could do would be to postpone the second reading for a week

Mr Reynolds considered the request that the Bill should be read a second time on the following day so extraordinary and unreasonable that he was sure the House would see it and ask the Attorney-General to postpone the second reading for at least a fortnight He understood that there were 93 clauses in the Bill, and that 70 of the clauses of the existing Act were repealed Did the hon the Attorney-General expect that hon members setting aside all other matters, would sit up all night in order to study this during Bill as he might term it, in order that the second reading might be hurried on, particularly after what the hon gentleman had said that he thought many of the clauses might be beneficially altered He hoped the House would not pledge itself to the second reading of the Bill at so early a date In saying this much he was pleased to find that in the amended Bill there was no alteration in the principle of the old measure, and he should be as ready as any one to perfect the principle of the Bill of last year

Mr Barrow said that if the following Tuesday were named for the second reading of the Bill it would probably accommodate hon members as well as though the second reading were postponed for a week On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday there was the current business to attend to, and though he thought it undesirable that the following day should be named for the second reading of the Bill, probably Tuesday would meet the views of hon members

The Attorney-General had no objection to postpone the second reading till Tuesday, but had been told what he believed was true that it was of great importance that this Bill should be passed at once If hon members thought that they were bound to make themselves masters of the various clauses before they assented to the passing of the Bill, he thought the better plan would be to put off the measure till the next session If the House were not prepared to pass the amendments upon the belief that those who had been entrusted with the working of the Act were capable of pointing out what amendments were required, and might be trusted to make them under the supervision which he, as a member of the Government, thought proper to exercise, the better way would be to defer the consideration of the measure till next session

The second reading was postponed till the following Tuesday

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

Upon the motion of Mr Milne the report of the Committee of the whole upon Longbottom's Patent Bill was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The Attorney-General suggested that the House should proceed with the consideration of the Assessment on Stock Bill

Mr Reynolds was sorry to oppose the Attorney-General, but the Estimates appeared upon the notice paper before the Assessment on Stock Bill, and it was very likely that many members who wished to take part in the discussion upon the Assessment on Stock Bill were absent from the House, expecting that the Estimates would prevent that Bill from being brought under discussion till a late period of the day He and other hon members were prepared to go on with the Estimates, and he thought it most undesirable that the order in which the business appeared upon the paper should be so frequently changed

Mr Solomon must oppose the proposal to proceed with the Assessment on Stock Bill in the present state of the House It was a most important measure, and he should like to see a full House when it was brought under discussion

Mr Hawker suggested that the House should proceed until 3 o'clock with the Estimates He should not like the Assessment on Stock Bill to be proceeded with in so thin a House, lest it should be said that the compact said to have been made between himself and the Attorney-General was of such a nature that they were afraid to go on with it in a full House

Mr Lindsay said if it were universally understood that the business should be taken out of the order in which it appeared upon the paper, it would only be in accordance with the practice which it appeared to be desired to pursue in that House, but he had always understood that unless there were some special reason for adopting a contrary course, the business should be taken in the order in which it appeared upon the paper It was no uncommon thing for members to come down to the House for the express purpose of taking part in the discussion upon certain measures, but when they arrived, they found that they had been disposed of, having been taken out of their turn

The Attorney-General said if hon members thought the thinness of the House arose from hon members taking no interest in the Estimates, whilst at the same time they took a deep interest in the Assessment on Stock Bill, he did not wish that which was considered the most important to be taken out of its turn He was quite sure that if he had made a suggestion to take the Estimates out of their turn some hon members would at once have cried out against their being proceeded with in so thin a House, but he had no objection to proceed with the Estimates if the House desired to do so

Office of Treasurer, £210

Mr Reynolds observed an increase of one clerk, and wished to know if such increase was necessary

The Treasurer would state the reasons which rendered such increase necessary It was well known that he was obliged to be at that House all day during the session, his time being nearly wholly occupied in Committee business The work in the Treasury would consequently devolve entirely without assistance upon one individual In the money branch it was desirable that the clerks should not be disturbed or taken away from the books for the purpose of attending to correspondence The clerks in the money branch were fully occupied in the matters connected with books, consequently without the assistance now asked for, the correspondence must be delayed or hurried through from undue pressure, to the discredit of the department and of the Government When the Supplementary Estimates were under discussion, he explained fully the position of the department when the House voted a sum for temporary assistance He had then stated that he did not ask for the vote permanently, as he wished to see how far he could get on with temporary assistance, but when he found the session lasted the greater part of the year, and when he found that they would be called together in April, and that during the recess it would be necessary to prepare various financial returns, he saw no hope of being able to do without the assistance asked for It was inconvenient to some extent not to have a permanent officer who might become thoroughly acquainted with the duties much better than one not permanently attached to the department He saw nothing before him in the prospect for next year to enable him to carry on the business without this additional assistance. There was but one Secretary, and the correspondence without additional assistance would have to be conducted with undue haste, and it was of an important character, having reference principally to the Agent-General in England in reference to the sale of bonds, &c In fact there was a great deal of correspondence, and under the circumstances he felt bound to ask the House to make a permanent addition to the department

Mr Reynolds remarked that the Treasurer had an Assistant-Treasurer as well as a Secretary, and he thought it quite possible those appointments might be blended so as to prevent any actual increase He did not like to see an increase in the number of officers nor could he see that an increase was necessary, as it was impossible that the business could have increased to any great extent for the last six months Whenever, however, an objection was raised to the appointment of any officer, the Government represented that appointment as being indispensable On a former occasion when he wished to reduce a department which he considered extravagantly conducted, he found no sympathy, and he had arrived at the conclusion that it was of very little use attempting to make retrenchments in any department

The vote was agreed to

Mr Milne asked if the house for the Collector was not an addition?

The Treasurer said that the salary which appeared upon the Estimates for the Collector of Customs was the same amount as was paid to his predecessor, £700 a-year, but the house was certainly an additional accommodation There would, however, be considerable advantage to the public by giving the Collector a house at the Port, as it would ensure his constant attendance there, and sometimes it was important that reference should be made to him immediately That was an advantage which the public would gain, and when they required a Collector to reside at the Port, as he thought the Collector should do, there was an obligation upon the Government to find him a residence, or to give him an allowance in lieu of it By way of compensation, however, for the residence the Collector had been required to give up all fees and allowances except his salary. That was made a condition when the residence was granted The late Collector received fees from the Harbor Trust and the Trinity Board, but the Government thought upon granting the present Collector a residence, a fair opportunity was presented of carrying out the expressed wish of the House, that the Collector should receive nothing but his pay

Mr Solomon observed that the Collector was also termed naval officer Was that intended to apply to his being the Harbor Master, as he did not find any Harbor-Master mentioned in the Estimates?

The Treasurer said the Collector of Customs had nothing to do with the Harbor department beyond the duties which devolved upon him as Chairman of the Trinity Board The Harbor department as a department of the Government was abolished altogether, and a saving had been effected in the salary of the Harbor-Master. The title "naval officer" was retained merely to indicate that in matters connected with shipping and harbors on the coast, there was some one through whom the correspondence with the Government should be conducted. There was no pay attached to the office.

Mr REYNOLDS had yet to learn that the present Collector of Customs was more efficient than his predecessor. He believed that Lieut Dashwood was a very efficient officer, and his salary was only £700 per annum without fees and without a house. Under these circumstances on what principle should £700 a year and a house be given to the present Collector, when it must be known that gentleman was not so efficient, and could not be as his predecessors. Why should the House be called upon to give him £700 a year and a house besides? He would revert again to the circumstances under which the salary of the Collector of Customs was voted last year. It was voted on the distinct understanding that there should be no fees attached to the office. He did not know whether the hon member (Mr Milne) intended to move that the house be struck out, but if not, he (Mr Reynolds) certainly should, as several public buildings were required at the Port, and no doubt the house occupied by the Collector would be rendered serviceable. The Treasurer had said there was an advantage in having a Collector resident at the Port, because he could always be found, but it was a singular circumstance that he had noticed the Collector in town more frequently during the last six weeks or two months than he had ever seen a Collector before, and he did not see how the Collector could be referred to at the Port if he were in town. It was rather unfortunate that the Treasurer had made such an allusion.

Mr ROGERS asked if the present Collector was not called upon to discharge other duties than those which were performed by his predecessor? He had understood that the present Collector was called upon to perform duties in connection with the harbor and the survey of the coast.

Mr MILNE knew perfectly well when he asked the question, that the house was additional, but all he wished was to afford the Government an opportunity of entering into an explanation respecting it. He was not satisfied that the present Collector was entitled to this extra allowance. The hon member, Mr Rogers, had stated that the Collector was liable to be called upon to perform other duties, and he believed it was so, but it was quite clear that when he was absent from the Port he could not be performing the duties of Collector of Customs. His opinion was that for 700*l* a year they should be entitled to the entire services of this officer. That remuneration was ample, and he should move that the house be struck out.

Mr BARROW would like to hear the Government state whether they considered 700*l* a year sufficient for the officer whose case was under consideration. He did not exactly like this method of dealing with officers, as it was eminently calculated to gain for the Government credit for being liberal while the House had the odium of being niggardly. The Government proposed to give the Collector a house, and the Government by so doing achieved additional popularity, but the House were called upon to strike it out, and were subjected to odium for so doing. He should like to hear from the Government whether the salary without the house would be sufficient, and a fair recompense for the duties which this officer had to perform. With regard to the observation made by the hon the Treasurer, that if they required this officer to be at the Port they ought to find him a house, that was as feasible as it would be to say that if he were required to dine at the Port, the Government would be bound to find him a dinner. Every officer should live in convenient proximity to his duties, but if it were held that the Government were bound to find houses for their officers, no doubt there would be a great many other applications for free residences. The Treasurer had stated that the Collector merely received a salary without fees, now he (Mr Barrow) was not behind the scenes and did not profess to understand the system in reference to official remuneration, though he had heard of waifs and strays, but when it was stated in reference to this officer that he had no fees, he wished to know if any other officers were entitled to fees. He should be pleased to hear that no other officers were, and if he heard that he should like to know why the Collector of Customs had been singled out, and that the remark had been made in reference to that officer, that he had no fees if no other officers had fees. He had felt convinced of the absurdity of attempting to reduce any of the items as they were set down upon the Estimates, and the last few days had confirmed the impression that the only proper way to secure retrenchment was for the House to say to the Government, at the outset—"we think you have fixed the scale too high, or you propose to ask too large a sum, you must revise the Estimates and apportion such an amount as we give you, as your judgment may dictate." It was not right of the Government to put down unnecessary items of expenditure, and say to the House—if you think them unnecessary you can strike them off. The Government should be prepared to adhere to the items as they appeared upon the Estimates, and to divide upon them.

Mr HAWKER would give the hon the Treasurer the credit of saying that whenever an item on the Estimates was disputed, that hon member was the worst advocate he (Mr Hawker) had ever seen to support it. (Laughter.) He (Mr Hawker) would point out how he believed this arose. The Collector of Customs, when he was Harbor Master and Naval Officer, was in possession of this house. He believed that Captain Douglas had spent a considerable time in making surveys which would be creditable to any officer, and as he was already in possession of the house, for which no rent was paid by the Government, he (Mr Hawker) did not consider it too much to ask that he should not be disturbed in possession of it.

Mr STRANGWAYS considered that the hon Treasurer should give some reason for the Collector being allowed a house, inasmuch as the former Collector was not allowed one. It amounted to this, that the one officer was to receive larger pay than the other. He had heard the hon the Attorney-General say that it was not desirable at present to increase the salaries of subordinate officers, and why should the House be called upon to pay increased salaries for superior officers? He found there was a sum set down for a post office in Port Adelaide, amounting to £4,000, and he believed that this house might be made to answer for a considerable period for the purpose. There would only be a balance of £9 000 or £10,000 remaining in the event of the assessment on stock not being settled to the satisfaction of the Ministry, and taking this fact in connection with the statement of the Attorney-General, that it was not desirable to increase salaries, he should, unless some special reasons were given for the increase, move that the words "house and" be struck out.

Mr COLLINSON would support the item, considering the onerous character of the duties performed, and the immense advantage of the Collector residing at the Port, which could only be known to persons residing there and constantly availing themselves of the services of the Collector of Customs. The duties were manifold and very onerous. As Naval Officer, Captain Douglas had prepared many valuable plans, and was Chairman of the Trinity Board, of which he was the master spirit, of the Marine Board and Harbor Trust (the duties of which he performed without pay), and also of the Immigration Board, all which duties he was enabled to perform by the fact of his residing at the Port. He was very frequently at his office at 7 or 8 o'clock in the morning preparing plans from the surveys, and was often detained there until 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening, so that if any public officer deserved consideration it was Captain Douglas.

Mr REYNOLDS said it was very clear to him, after the enumeration of duties which hon members had heard, that the time of Captain Douglas must be occupied in other matters than his duties as Collector of Customs. Instead of being always engaged as Collector, as the hon the Treasurer had stated, it appeared that he was a member of four or five Boards and if, as had been stated these Boards occupied four or five hours each at a sitting, the Collector of Customs should be relieved from these extraordinary duties in order that he might attend to the duties of his office. It was only on the previous day hon members heard that the Harbor Trust used to sit three hours, and he presumed hon members would admit that if the other Boards occupied a similar time, the Collector of Customs must have his time occupied in other duties than those of the Custom-House.

The TREASURER said, with respect to the remarks of the hon member for the Sturt, that that hon member had alluded to the frequent visits of the Collector of Customs to town, and had assumed that that gentleman must spend much time at the Port. But the presence of the Collector in Adelaide was expressly occasioned by that gentleman's official duties. He (the Treasurer) had to consult that gentleman on various matters in the appropriation of the tariff, and especially with respect to the duties on the River Murray. He (Captain Douglas) came up by the train, and sometimes when the train was not returning at a convenient time he had been present in the House to witness what was going on. He was not, however, in Adelaide upon any occasion for mere pleasure, but came solely on official business. The hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow) had spoken of the popularity which the Government gained by proposing high salaries and leaving the odium of reducing them to the House. But he (the Treasurer) thought if the hon member was behind the scenes that there was little official popularity to be gained by these means, and that the Government were exposed to great pressure, not only for an increase of offices, but to an increase of salaries, and were continually pressing their claims on the Government, each individual considering his own claim paramount to all others. He assured the hon member that the official popularity which he had spoken of existed rather in imagination than in reality. (Laughter.) The hon member asked whether this was a proper salary, and he (the Treasurer) could assure the hon member that the Government did consider the salary a fair one or they would not have proposed it. They considered that Captain Douglas being called upon to give up the waifs and strays which he used to receive from the Harbor Trust and the Trinity Board, they should give him some equivalent, and also on the ground that he was called upon to live at the Port. The Board sat at the Port in close proximity to the Custom-House, so that, whilst attending there, Captain Douglas could be immediately called away if any matter of urgency required it. With respect to the remarks of the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), who had said that he (the Treasurer) was a bad advocate for the Collector of Customs (a laugh), he should thank that hon member for reminding him of one point, viz, that the Collector was a good naval draughtsman and had furnished a great many maps and plans, upon which he was engaged when Harbor Master, and there might be times when, if his services could be spared from his Custom-House duties, he might give valuable aid in surveys

Mr LINDSAY said the difficulty which the House experienced in deciding upon salaries would be materially lessened if the Commission appointed last session upon the subject had attended to their duties ("Hear, hear," from Mr Strangways) He preferred trusting to the judgment of the Government in the matter rather than to that of the House

Mr PEAKE supported the item, seeing that there was a retrenchment of £1,530 effected in the department over which Capt Douglas presided last year

Mr STRANGWAYS said if the hon member had referred to another part of the Estimates he would find that the Coast Harbor Service had been transferred to the Trinity Board, and at a future period the House would be asked to vote a sum to cover the expenditure, the saving of which the hon member for the Burra so highly approved of The hon member would find on going through the Estimates that he had discovered "a mare's nest" The hon member (Mr Collinson) said that Captain Douglas was frequently at home from 7 or 8 o'clock in the morning till 7 or 8 in the evening—(a laugh)—but that was no reason for voting him an increase of salary There might be cases in which it was desirable to pay the man and not the office, but he had heard no reason in favor of doing so in this instance The salary of the Collector of Customs should be fixed, though, if for the sake of the honor or power which it conferred upon him to sit on various Boards, he wished to do so, he (Mr Strangways) had no objection But that this should be used as an argument in favor of paying extra salaries was absurd The hon member for Victoria had alluded to the surveys If Captain Douglas had any special claim on account of them, let the Government apply to the House, and if he (Mr Strangways) approved of the said claim he would not oppose it But it was not because Captain Douglas was an able surveyor that his salary should be increased now, inasmuch as he would not henceforth be able to attend to the duties The House had just been told that Captain Douglas could not go to Lacepede Bay because he was engaged at his duties as Collector of Customs ("Hear, hear" from the Treasurer)

The ATTORNEY GENERAL would first address himself to an observation of the hon member for East Torrens, who, he thought, had misconceived an observation of the hon the Treasurer as to fees The fees referred to in this case were not fees arising out of the office of the Collector of Customs, but special fees for the performance of specific duties, neither the Collector nor any other officer, with the exception of those whom he would mention presently were paid by fees for performing the duties of their office The only exceptions were members of Boards and clerks of Local Courts He considered the system of fixed salaries, supplemented by fees, so objectionable, that he should be sorry to have it supposed that the Government pursued any plan of the sort When Lieut Dashwood resigned, the Government had to look out for a person who would perform the duties of that gentleman's office, and they came to the conclusion (which he believed was ratified out of doors,) that the Naval Officer and Harbor-Master was the most competent person for the purpose There were certain duties to be performed by the Naval Officer in connection with surveys The hon member (Mr Strangways) had said that Captain Douglas could not act as Naval Officer because he could not go to Lacepede Bay It was true he could not do that, but he had given very valuable advice and assistance in organising the expedition which went there, and it would also be his (Captain Douglas's) duty when these persons came back with their surveys and plans to collect them and put them in form, and it was on that gentleman's corrected surveys that the Government would have to come to a conclusion in framing their Estimates The Government felt that it was necessary to retain an efficient person as naval officer though they did not keep up the office as a separate establishment, and it was but reasonable when a gentleman was appointed to a new office, and held the old one in addition that he should receive an allowance The proposal which Captain Douglas himself made was that he should retain the house, and the Government thought it best to accede to this proposal The money-remuneration of the present Collector of Customs was smaller than that of his predecessor, whilst the duties were much larger The Government felt, and he thought the House would agree with them, that they had done well in making a saving of £550, whereas if they wished to increase the salaries, there was no reason why they could not have appointed another person to the collectorship of Customs, and allowed Captain Douglas to retain his position

Mr BARROW observed that the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had stated that the house would make a good Post Office He thought that hardly possible, for if the Government subsequently asked for money for a Post Office under such circumstances, there would be so much the less probability of their getting it, and that was a prima facie argument against the assertion He would like to know from the Government whether the House would answer for a Post Office He thought it would be wrong to lay down too rigidly the principle of confining officers to the strict line of their duties It would lead to a multiplication of offices inconsistent with economy What he objected to was the plurality of salaries, not the plurality of appointments—(hear, hear,)—and if the Collector of Customs could perform other duties also, he (Mr Barrow) would not object, so long as there was not a plurality of salaries as well as a plurality of work The hon the Treasurer had said that, if he (Mr Barrow) were behind the scenes, he would find that there was less official popularity to be secured than he imagined, and that there was a great pressure from the Government officers for increase of salaries This would be reasonable enough if, with the increase of public business, there was no increase of officers, but when they heard on one day that the increase of business warranted an increase of officers, and on another day that it warranted an increase of salaries, he (Mr Barrow) did not think the double increase was what the House would sanction (Hear, hear) He should be sorry to see the House divide upon anything so small as this item, unless it could be shown that the Collector would occupy a house which would make an efficient Post-Office

Mr COLLINSON said he thought he might venture, as knowing something of the matter, to offer an explanation (Hear, hear) There were only two rooms in the House which could be used for a Post-Office, and these were used for the tide-waiters department, and the long room The other rooms were at the back of the building, and could not therefore be used for a Post Office

Mr HAY thought that this explanation should make the House careful how it acted If two of the rooms were now wanted for the Custom-House, the whole building would probably be wanted by-and-by, and then the House would be told that the Collector of Customs should be compensated for the loss of his residence He did not know what the house was worth, but he would assume £80 a year, and he thought if a deduction of this amount was made from the salary it would meet the case

Mr McELLISTER supported the salary believing the Collector to be an active and efficient officer, and that for the sake of a house he should not be interfered with (Laughter)

Mr PEAKE said the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had chidden him for finding a mare's nest He (Mr Peake) did not know what kind of nest the hon member had found, but he thought it was next door to a mare's nest (A laugh) He (Mr Peake) had said that there was a saving of 1,530*l* in the Coast Harbor Department But the hon member pointed out that this apparent saving was included by a dexterous manipulation of the hon the Treasurer in another part of the Estimates He (Mr Peake), however, still contended that he was right The hon member should, therefore, be more careful in telling hon members that they had found mares' nests

Mr REYNOLDS asked the hon the Treasurer whether the sum of 1 530*l* would be saved or not

The TREASURER said he could explain the matter on the next item as any explanation at present might force on an irrelevant discussion He could however state that there was a considerable saving in the Harbor department not only in salaries and in the keeping up of the Government vessels, but also in the general management of the coast surveys

Mr REYNOLDS said he had asked the question because he found the Government had taken out of the hands of the House an item which should remain under the control of hon members They had placed in the hands of a Board a sum which should be in the hands of the House In 1855 the House fixed the salary of the Collector of Customs at £500, in 1856 they added £25 per cent to it, making it £625, and after knocking off this 25 per cent again, it was now raised to £700 The Government could not allow even one session to pass without raising this salary £100 a-year, whilst the salaries of other officers were not raised The matter was well put by the hon member for Gumeracha, that if this house were given to the naval officer if they deprived him of it subsequently, they would on that account have to vote him another £100 to his salary as compensation for the loss of his residence He had yet to learn that Captain Douglas was worthy of this increase in his salary That gentleman might be very well fitted for his post, but he (Mr Reynolds) had yet to learn that Captain Douglas was more efficient than his predecessor The hon the Attorney-General said that Captain Douglas had additional duties to perform, but was it because he was a member of some Boards that he was to receive increased pay? The House would find that by-and-by he would have so many Boards to attend, that his Collectorship of Customs would become a sinecure This was a clear case of favouritism

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that when the Collector of Customs was a naval officer he had £500 a year, and now that he was a Naval Officer and Collector of Customs also he was entitled to something more But this was what in the estimation of the hon member for the Sturt amounted to favoritism It was easy for hon members to suggest that the Collectorship of Customs might become a mere sinecure, but they should remember that the last Collector, who did not live at the Port, and to whose efficiency he (the Attorney-General) was happy to bear his testimony, was a member of all these Board If that gentleman resided at the Port where there was no house provided for him, he could have performed all the duties attended to by the present Collector. Of course if the House said that the present Collector should only receive a salary as Collector, that gentleman might also say he would only perform the duties of Collector. He concurred to a great extent in the remarks of the hon. member for East Torrens as to the multiplication of offices and salaries.

Mr. STRANGWAYS thought the statement of the Attorney-General that the former Collector did perform all the duties efficiently without residing at the Port was conclusive.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had not said that the former Collector performed all the duties fulfilled by the present holder of the office.

Mr. STRANGWAYS might be wrong in his impression. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) This was a matter affecting not merely the Collector, but, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. member (Mr. Collinson) the fact of the Government having granted this house to Captain Douglas would be made one of the excuses for asking for £4,000 for a Post-Office. With regard to what fell from the hon. member for the Burra he (Mr. Strangways) had no doubt that when some future Estimates came under consideration that hon. member would frankly admit that he had discovered a mare's nest, and that, although it appeared from the Estimates that there was a saving of £1,530, yet that that expenditure would be kept up at the same rate of salaries as last year, but the items instead of being voted by the House would be handed over to the Trinity Board. He gave notice that he would ask the Government for a detailed statement of this proposed expenditure when the item came under discussion. The hon. the Attorney-General had borne testimony to the efficiency of the Collector of Customs, and he (Mr. Strangways) endorsed the hon. member's statements, and he had certainly never meant to say anything which could reflect on that gentleman, either as an officer or an individual. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. DUFFIELD regarded the assumed saving of £1,530, which had been referred to as a proof that the Harbor Master's department, which had been abolished, was wholly unnecessary. He believed if the Government continued to direct their attention to such matters, they would find that many large savings could be effected.

The House then divided on the amendment, that the words "house and" be struck out, when there appeared:—

AYES 10.—Messrs. Townsend, Milne, Strangways, Harvey, Burford, Duffield, Glyde, Hay, Solomon, Cole, Reynolds (teller).

NOES 16.—The Treasurer, the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs. McDermott, McEllister, Bakewell, Rogers, Collinson, Hawker, Hallett, Bagot, Barrow, Lindsay, Mildred, Peake.

Mr. MILNE moved that an amount equivalent to the value of the house be deducted from the salary. Taking the value of the house at £80 a year, he moved that the salary be reduced to £310.

The House again divided, when there appeared:—

AYES, 12.—Messrs. Townsend, Milne, Burford, Reynolds, Duffield, Harvey, Glyde, Solomon, Barrow, Cole, Hay, and McEllister.

NOES, 15.—The Treasurer, Attorney-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Strangways, Mildred, Macdermott, Rogers, Bakewell, Bagot, Collinson, Lindsay, and Hallett.

The item was then passed.

Mr. REYNOLDS wanted to know what was the necessity of a Sub-Collector at Port Elliot, as he believed the returns from that locality for some time past had been nil.

Mr. STRANGWAYS had been told, when this officer was about two months in office, that he had had to perform the important duty of receiving from a coaster and handing over to the authorities of the Goolwa, the cover of a camp oven (laughter), and that that was the whole amount of duty he had to perform. The article was sent out of bond and the officer had to pass the entries upon this cover of an oven. (Laughter.) He was informed that the office was merely nominal, and he suggested that the duties should be performed by the Deputy Harbor-Master at a nominal salary.

Mr. BARROW said the House would see, by a Council Paper, that although the business of this port was not very extensive, still during the year ending 30th June, 1858, there was something more passed through it than a camp-oven, inasmuch as the exports up to that date amounted to within a fraction of £50,000 though the imports were not quite so valuable. He would ask the hon. the Treasurer whether in face of the apprehended deficiency in the revenue, he could not dispense with a few of the landing waiters? It required some practical knowledge to decide the point, but he thought he was not unreasonable in asking the question.

The TREASURER replied to the hon. member (Mr. Strangways) that this officer collected a very small amount of duties for South Australia, his duty being to pass goods for the other colonies. The Murray duties paid to the other colonies for 1856 and 1857 amounted to £3,209, and there were large exports also which required a Custom-House Officer to look after them. The reduction in the number of tide-waiters spoken of by the hon. member for East Torrens was not recommended by the Collector of Customs, and though the amount of duty received might be less than formerly, it did not follow that the work would be lighter. There was nothing in the revenue to show that the colony could dispense with these officers, and the collection of the Customs revenue at present only cost 5 per cent. Although the House had already voted in favor of the appointment of an officer at the Goolwa, the Government had tried to meet the expense in the outports.

Mr. REYNOLDS recollected that, in 1857, the Sub-Collector at the Goolwa applied for an appointment as wharfinger upon the tramway, on the ground that his time was not fully occupied. He did not, therefore, see the necessity of another Sub-Collector.

Mr. COLLINSON thought it would be dangerous to the revenue to reduce the number of these officers by a single one. If anything the number should be increased.

Mr. STRANGWAYS believed that one Sub-Collector at the Goolwa could discharge the duties. It was only when three or four steamers arrived at one time that a detention took place. If the Government were desirous of economising they would make the Deputy Harbor-Master at Port Elliot a Sub-Collector, giving him £25 a year additional pay.

Mr. SOLOMON said the House was called on to vote £400 a year to Port Elliot, whilst the amount of duty received for the quarter ending June 30, 1858 was only £22 10s., and in 1857 it was a few pounds less. This did not agree with the statement that the revenue was collected at 5 per cent., though in the aggregate this might be true. But even if so, that was no reason why when something could be saved it should not be struck off. The hon. member concluded by reiterating the conviction he had on previous occasions avowed that the revenue of the colony for the current year would show a great falling off as compared with last year.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL remarked that it was necessary to keep up Customs officers not only where large duties were to be collected but also in order to prevent the evasion of duties. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Encounter Bay that £25 should be added to the salary of the Deputy Harbor Master, and the duties of the sub-collector transferred to him, the Harbor-Master in question, though a very efficient person for his office was not one whose habits or education fitted him for a sub collectorship. When the question was formerly under discussion the House by a decided majority approved of the conduct of the Government in this matter.

The TREASURER stated that the officers in question paid over to the neighboring colonies of New South Wales and Victoria upwards of £8,000 since 1857. Upon this the Government received 5 per cent. for collection, so that they received upwards of £400 or a full equivalent for the services of the officers.

Mr. LINDSAY said that if revenue officers were removed from the outports because of the smallness of duty collected, dutiable goods might be landed at those outports without paying. A vessel of 200 tons had just left Rosetta Harbor with wheat, and that vessel might have landed dutiable goods as payment, had there been no Custom House Officer.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said the hon. member for Light did not seem to understand the question in discussion. There might be great traffic, but the Customs duties would not be necessarily increased. He would repeat that the only duty-paying article which had been passed by the Customs Officer at Port Elliot during the time mentioned, was the lid of a camp oven. As to the statement of the Attorney-General that the Deputy Harbour-Master at Port Elliot was not a suitable person, from his position or education, to perform the duties of Collector, and that that was the reason another person had been appointed, he would say in reply, that no such reason could be assigned, as he learnt from the fact of the case that the Deputy Harbor Master had intimated he could not attend to the duties of Collector and his own too, and that the Government had forthwith sent some one else down. That officer had never had any intimation from the Government that he did not perform his duties in a satisfactory manner, and he thought the course adopted had been a very harsh and unjustifiable one.

The TREASURER testified to the correctness of the statement of the Attorney-General, which was substantially true. The officer in question did not understand accounts, and was therefore not fitted for the office of Collector of Customs. With respect to the lid of a camp oven being the only duty-paying article which passed through the Customs officers hands during a certain period, he would reply that the returns before the House would disprove that statement, for they would find on referring to that return that the duty paying articles included apparel, slops, &c. amounting to £22. Therefore the assertion of the hon. member for Encounter Bay must be taken for what it was worth.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said the figures and facts of the Treasurer did not impugn his statement in the least. With respect to the Harbor-Master at Port Elliot, it was a fact that whatever opinion the Collector of Customs had expressed, no complaint had been made of the Harbor-Master as to the way in which he performed his duties, and he thought in the absence of that, the statement of both the Attorney-General and the Treasurer was hardly justifiable.

Mr. BARROW was in favour of making a reduction under this head, and suggested whether some of the tidewaiters might not be dispensed with. He would like to know, however, whether this would endanger the revenue, as of course, if it would, it would be false economy, but if two or three of the tidewaiters could be struck out, and still sufficient remain, he, as an advocate of retrenchment, would vote for it.

Mr Burford thought they had to consider there was such an institution as police in the district referred to, and that they would be very proper persons to see that no goods were smuggled He must confess that to employ officers at the expense of £400 a year to collect £90 was very bad policy He did not see the policy either of employing persons to collect duties for the other colonies

Mr Townsend called the attention of the House to the fact that the Sub Collector of Port Elliot was appointed on the motion of Mr Torrens, and, if not required, he (Mr Townsend) should vote that the item be struck out

Mr Reynolds was quite prepared to vote that one of the landing-waiters be struck out

Amendments for the omission of one tide waiter, fourth class, and the Sub-Collector at Port Elliot were then severally put and negatived

The item in the total was then put and carried

The Attorney-General moved that the House resume

Mr Reynolds thought before that the House should have some information as to the coast and harbor service He found that there was no Naval Officer and Harbor-Master now at Port Adelaide, but that there was only a Deputy Harbor-Master He would like to know whether a considerable saving had been thereby effected

Mr Strangways wished to know how the coast and harbor service was to be carried out in future—whether by the Government or the Trinity Board He had heard that it was the intention of the Government to place the whole control of this department in the hands of the Trinity Board, and he would ask whether there was any intention of dismissing the officers now holding situations in that department, without a sufficient reason being given for so doing If the Government intended to take the course he had adverted to, there should certainly be a detailed account of the expenditure placed before the House

The Treasurer said the hon member could not have seen Council Paper, No 30 or he would have found the details he referred to

The Chairman said the paper in question had not been laid on the table

The Treasurer said it was amongst his Council papers, and he was under the impression it had been He would state that the saving to be effected would be this that the office of Harbor-Master would be done away with, and that the reduction in the expense would be £660 Under this system all the outports would be placed under the Trinity Board As to the officers now engaged in the department referred to, instead of their being dismissed, he was sure the Board would be too glad to retain their services

Mr Reynolds hoped there would be some expression of opinion as to the course adopted by the Government in depriving the Legislature of the power to vote the salaries of this department without taking the sense of the House upon it

The Treasurer said the hon member was mistaken, as the House still had the power of voting the supplies

Mr Reynolds—But only in a lump sum, the details being in the control of the Government would throw considerable patronage into their hands

The Treasurer maintained still that as the details would be placed before the House, they would have the control sought for

The House then resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on Friday

DETAILS OF TRINITY BOARD EXPENDITURE

The Treasurer laid upon the table a printed paper of the details of the expenditure of the Trinity Board

POONINDIE MISSION

The Commissioner of Crown Lands laid upon the table papers connected with the above

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL—IN COMMITTEE

The Attorney General said that when the House resumed on the last occasion of this Bill being under consideration, he had moved that the following clause be inserted as clause 2, to stand after clause 1 in the Bill

"A If any person to whom a lease of the waste lands of the Crown, for pastoral purposes, shall have been granted, under the authority of the said Orders in Council, shall surrender the same, it shall be lawful for the Governor to grant to the person making such surrender a lease of the lands originally demised by the lease so surrendered for the residue of the term thereby granted, and which lease shall be subject to the same conditions of forfeiture and resumption as were contained in the lease so surrendered, and shall contain a covenant on the part of the lessee to make the returns, and to pay the assessment, by this Act required and imposed, and also a proviso that such assessment being duly paid, according to the tenor of such lease, shall be in full of all taxes, rates, or impositions upon the land included in such lease, or on the cattle depastured thereon, to be imposed by the said Parliament aforesaid, save and except any general taxes or impositions which may be imposed upon all lands, or cattle within the said province "

Upon this Mr Hawker had moved an amendment that the following be inserted as clause A, to stand next after clause 1—

'A Anything in the 'Waste Lands Act' to the contrary notwithstanding, if any person to whom a lease of the waste lands of the Crown, for pastoral purposes, shall have been granted, under the authority of the said Orders in Council, or the assignees of such lease, shall, on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, surrender the same, it shall be lawful for the Governor to grant to the person making such surrender a new lease of the lands demised by the lease so surrendered for the residue of the term thereby granted, at the rent previously payable under such lease, and subject to an additional rent of twopence per head per annum for sheep to be assessed as hereinafter provided, and which lease shall be subject to the same conditions of forfeiture and resumption as were contained in the lease so surrendered, and shall contain a proviso that such additional rent shall be in full of all taxes, rates, assessments, or impositions upon the land included in such lease, or on the cattle depastured thereon, to be imposed by the said Parliament, save and except any general taxes or impositions which may be imposed upon all lands or cattle within the said Province "

Mr Strangways rose and suggested that the amendments on either side should be formally agreed to, and that before the third reading the Bill should be recommitted for the purpose of discussing the propriety of the amendments

The Attorney-General apparently assented to this course, and proposed the first clause, with the understanding that the Bill should be recommitted before the third reading

Mr Strangways said if there was to be any discussion he should take no part in it at the present time His idea was that they should agree to the amendments pro forma, and when a reprint of the Bill was placed before them they would be in a position to discuss their merits

The Attorney-General explained that he was disposed to agree to the principle of the amendments of the hon member for Victoria (Mr Hawker), but that the details of those amendments would require modifications

Mr Strangways again expressed his disapprobation of discussing the amendments before the reprint of the Bill was introduced, so that then they might be able to discuss the Bill in the whole as a Government measure

Mr Hawker, after a few remarks, in which he said that he thought they would economise time more by discussing the question at once, withdrew his former amendment by leave of the House, and proposed to substitute for it a series of amendments from 1 up to 4 Ultimately he moved the first of these, which was as follows —

"1 If any person to whom a lease of the waste lands of the Crown for pastoral purposes shall have been granted under the authority of the said Orders in Council, or the assignee of such lease shall, on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, surrender the same, it shall be lawful for the Governor to grant to the person making such surrender, a fresh lease of the lands demised by the lease so surrendered, for the residue of the term thereby granted at the rent previously payable under such surrendered lease, and an additional or further rent of twopence per head per annum for sheep, to be calculated in respect of the demised land upon or according to the assessment hereinafter provided for, and which fresh lease shall be subject to the same conditions of forfeiture and resumption as were contained in the lease so surrendered, and shall contain a proviso that such rents being duly paid according to the tenor of such lease, shall be in full of all taxes, rates, assessments, or impositions upon the land included in such lease, or on the stock depastured thereon, to be imposed by the said Parliament, save and except any general taxes or impositions which may be imposed upon all lands or stock within the said Province "

Mr Solomon should be compelled to support the clause moved by the Attorney-General in preference to that of the hon member for Victoria The one was definite and the other was indefinite The one referred to both sheep and cattle, and the other to sheep only As to the question of assessment, he believed the proper method would be to take the actual quantity of sheep the land would carry He considered, if they agreed to the amendments of the hon member for Victoria, they would put the squatters on a better footing than ever they were before He could not see the justice of the hon member for Victoria coming forward and asking for a much greater concession than was contemplated by the House They might purchase the concession of the squatters at too high a price He was surprised to find the Government yielding so calmly to the amendments of the hon member for Victoria, for it appeared to him the squatters sought to obtain by these amendments more than they were entitled to

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the hon member for the City had stated that he was opposed to several of the amendments proposed by the hon member for Victoria, and he might say that the Government also had faults to find with them But they must recollect they were dealing with clause 1 only at the present time, and on that clause they had alone to determine It was whether an annual declaration of stock, or the grazing capabilities of the run as proposed by Mr Hawker, should form the basis and mode of assessment In the other colonies the assessment had been made on the former of these plans but this plan had always been objected to on account of the inquisitorial nature of such a mode of assessment He thought when they found the squatters coming forward in a liberal spirit to pay a higher contribution towards the revenue, the House should meet their views in a conciliating manner. With regard to assessing on the basis of the capabilities of the runs, he thought the House might very well agree to that principle, as he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) had studied the question, and believed the country would be a gainer by the bargain. The squatters did not ask to appoint their own valuators. The amendment of the hon. member for Victoria proposed that this should be done by a Government officer, and so long as that important duty was placed in the hands of the Government the country would be safe in agreeing to it, and he could assure them of his belief that the alteration would have the effect of adding to the revenue. Under the system of declared returns there was a considerable doubt as to the correctness of those returns, especially in the case of cattle, which could not at all times be mustered. He had carefully gone into the matter, and had come to the conclusion that the country would be gainers by the alteration proposed. The hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon) had made a mistake in alluding to cattle and horses not being assessed by this plan, if the grazing capability of a run is assessed at a certain number of sheep, and rent paid accordingly, it does not matter what description of cattle the squatter puts on it.

Mr. HAWKER was rather surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon), who had canvassed the merits of the amendments as a whole. He (Mr. Hawker) understood that they were to confine themselves to the first clause. It seemed to be the opinion of some hon. members that the Attorney General and himself had been putting their heads together in order to "do" the public. Now, he could assure the House that the only conversation he had had with the Attorney-General on the subject was as to the shape in which he (Mr. Hawker) should put his amendments. After referring to the general bearing of the clause, the speaker said that the hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon) had said the squatters were asking more than they had a right to demand. In reply to this, he would go to figures. His (Mr. Hawker's) proposal was that there should be a general classification throughout the colony, as follows:—The 1st class to comprise all runs north of the Gawler, in a parallel of latitude with Mount Brown, and in this the situation of the run should be considered as well as its carrying capabilities. The 2nd class would be the whole of the country north of Mount Searle, and the 3rd class would be the new country taken up only lately. The reason he had made no mention of cattle in the amendment referred to was that by taking the grazing capabilities of the runs, it mattered not to the public how they were stocked. He considered 200 sheep to the square mile was a fair average and test of the capabilities of a run. With this basis he had taken the area of the runs occupied by himself and his brother, which was 267 square miles, and allowing 200 sheep to the mile, they would have 53,400 head. He had recently got a return of the number of head of sheep on these runs, and he found it was 44,000, so that if the assessment were made on the annual declaration of the number of sheep, he should have returned 44,000, but according to the amendment proposed by him (Mr. Hawker), that the runs should be taken at their grazing capabilities, he would, in such case, have to pay the assessment at the rate of 53,400 for the area mentioned. Taking this number as a basis they found that the first class runs would pay £1 13s. 4d., the second £1 5s., and the third 16s. 8d., and taking the area of the whole of the occupied runs in the colony at 24,000 square miles they would have, he considered, 7,000 miles first class, 12 or 13,000 second class, and the remainder third class, making the average the second class, and, thus he considered would give an annual revenue of £30,000. An important advantage to be gained by this mode of assessment would be that a person taking out a run would be compelled for his own interest to stock it or transfer it, those who would do so, and by this provision they would do away with that which too frequently occurred where there were extensive tracts of country which were lying idle from the indisposition of those who rented them to stock them, and which of course tended to decrease the exports of the colony. He would point out that in coming to the valuation of the grazing capabilities of the run he asked nothing which could be considered in favour of the squatters. In the valuation of these runs the Surveyor-General, who had a knowledge of the localities and capabilities of the various runs would have a hand, and the Inspector of Scab would be enabled to check the carrying capabilities of each run as he would be fully acquainted with their nature from the duty he performed. Another proposition was, that the runs be revalued and open to acceptance at the expiration of the term, to the tenant under certain conditions. He was aware that some objections to the clause which embodied this, had been made, but so long as the principle was carried out he should have no objection to the details being modified. In answer to the hon. member for Light, he would state that this clause would be of benefit to the country. In the South-Eastern District, where the scab was prevalent, and there was the liability of the sheep to stray, there was a great desire on the part of the settlers to fence in their runs. But there was no inducement to do this unless an allowance were made on the expiration of the term of their leases for the improvements made. The Crown, he considered, was in the position of a landlord, who would be called upon to make an allowance in a lease for the improvements which might be made on his property. He thought the Government were entitled to pay for such improvements, and if it were so, provided that the tenants should be allowed for them. The country would considerably gain in the end by it, as the owners of runs would improve them for their own sake in order to increase the value of their stock. His wish was as expressed in the amendment that the runs should be periodically valued and offered to the tenants at such valuation. No object would be gained in turning out the present tenants, for by such, he believed, a loss would result to the country, as the tenants in possession would be better able to develop the resources of the runs than new occupiers. As long as the principle of these amendments was adopted, he should have no objection to any reasonable modification.

The TREASURER pointed out that the House might agree to the clause before it without committing itself to any ultimate decision.

Mr. HAY had no objection to the clause before the House, but he would point out that in the 2nd clause it was proposed that the Inspector of Scab should be the valuator, and he thought that officer should be the last person selected for that purpose, as from his connection with the squatters, they could not ensure disinterestedness. With regard to the classification, he thought the calculation of the hon. member for Victoria, of 200 sheep to the square mile was considerably under the mark. The speaker pointed out at some length other objections which he had made to the amendment.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the hon. member for Victoria had now had an opportunity of explaining his views. The Government had not previously thought it incumbent on them to withdraw the Bill until the amendments had been submitted to the House, but if the principle of those were agreed to, they would be prepared now to introduce an amended reprint.

Mr. BAGOT would protest against this, as he was not at all satisfied that the amendments of the hon. member for Victoria were better than those of the Attorney-General, and at the proper time he should be ready to state his views in detail.

The House then resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and leave was given to sit again on the following day.

The House adjourned at 20 minutes past 5 o'clock, until 1 o'clock next day.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10.

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

THE STEAMER MARION.

Mr. MACDERMOTT presented a petition from the owners of the steamer Marion, praying the House to take such steps as would enable the petitioners to avail themselves of the vote of the House of £1000, as gratuity for the encouragement of steam communication between Adelaide and Port Lincoln, and Port Augusta. The petition was received and read, and Mr. Macdermott gave notice that on the following Tuesday he should move it be printed.

HARBOR TRUST.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS gave notice that on the 15th inst., he should move an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to appoint Henry Simpson, Esq., a member of the Harbor Trust, in the room of Mr. Collinson, M.P.

THE COLONIAL CHAPLAIN.

Mr. MACDERMOTT gave notice that on the following Tuesday, contingent upon the Estimates being brought under consideration, he should move the ecclesiastical vote be reconsidered, with the view of striking out the allowance of £300 for the Colonial Chaplain, and a larger sum being inserted, £300 being a lower salary than the Colonial Chaplain had hitherto received.

WASTE LANDS OF THE CROWN.

Mr. REYNOLDS gave notice that on the 17th instant he should move that in order to enable the House to form an accurate opinion of the quantity and value of waste lands held by the squatters under lease, it was desirable that returns affording such information should be laid upon the table of the House prior to the passing of the Assessment on Stock Bill.

HINDMARSH ISLAND.

Mr. STRANGWAYS asked the Commissioner of Public Works whether plans had been prepared for a ferry to connect Goolwa with Hindmarsh Island. He wished to know because it was his intention to move that an address be presented to His Excellency praying that a sum be placed on the Estimates for the purpose, and could not do so until the plan and estimate of cost had been laid on the table.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the plan was not yet ready or he would have placed it on the table of the House. He would ascertain when it would be prepared and answer the question on Tuesday.

CLASSIFIED OFFICERS.

Mr. HAY, in introducing the motion of which he had given notice—

"That a return be laid on the table of the House of the number of classified officers in the Government Service, the date at which each officer was appointed, and the amount of salary paid to each when appointed, also, the date at which any increase of salary was made to each officer, and the amount of such increase, also, the amount of salary paid to each officer during the present year, stating the amount of good service pay and all other allowances paid to each officer " with the permission of the House amended the motion by inserting the words "at present" after the word "officers" in the second line and added to the end of the motion "annually since appointed" He had been induced to place the notice upon the paper from finding, since it had been determined to do away with the good-service pay statements had repeatedly been made that officers had been for a length of time in the Government service without any increase of pay If the return now asked for were laid upon the table of the House, it would be seen at what moment various officers entered the Government service, and whether promotion had been given, or an increase of salary in such a ratio as was equitable and just If it were found that such had not been the case, members would of course be influenced in voting the salaries upon the Estimates which would probably be brought under consideration in May or June next

Mr MILNE seconded the motion which was carried

THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr REYNOLDS brought forward the motion in his name—"That in the opinion of this House, the position held by the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth), is a member of the Central Board of Main Roads, whilst he is a member of Government, is anomalous, not contemplated by the provisions of the Act No 17, 1852, and not likely to secure a proper check over the affairs of the Road Board Department"

There was an old saying that a man could not serve two masters and do justice to both He was once placed in the position of employing a legal gentleman who thought he could serve two masters, and the consequence was that he (Mr Reynolds) was bitten to a serious extent Since then he had been particularly careful to avoid parties who thought they could serve two interests not identical From the Act of 1852 it appeared perfectly clear to him that whilst the Commissioner of Public Works held the position of a member of the Government, and also of a member of the Central Road Board, he must compromise his position either as a member of the Government or as a member of the Board In the first place he would remark that the Board was composed of a certain number of members, elected by various districts, and two members of the Board were appointed by the Governor and Executive Council Another element had however been imported into the Board, for, as he should be able to show the Commissioner of Public Works for the purposes of the Act was the Governor himself separate and distinct from the Board itself That would be admitted He was quite sure that the Commissioner of Public Works was familiar with the idea that an elected member was independent of the Governor and the Government, but an elected member was responsible to those districts by which he had been chosen He knew that was the opinion which was held by the hon gentleman himself, and he was rather surprised at the hon gentleman, considering his high and dignified position, as an independent member of the Central Road Board, a position not to be intimidated by the Government, should so far forget his position as to sacrifice his independence as an elected member and make it subservient to his position as a member of the Government, or that he should so far compromise his position as a member of the Government, to hold the position of member of the Central Road Board If the hon gentleman, before being appointed to the office of Commissioner of Public Works were independent of the Government is a member of the Central Road Board, he could not see how the hon gentleman could still remain an independent member of the Central Roads, and at the same time, hold a position of dependency upon the Government There was an anomaly in the case, although these were days in which anomalies prevailed He would point out to the House that the hon gentleman as Commissioner of Public Works was the head of the Road Board, that department was placed under his supervision, so far as supervision was requisite, yet he found that the hon gentleman was a simple member of the Board, not even Chairman of the Board, but subordinate to the Chairman, whilst the Chairman was subordinate to the Commissioner of Public Works as the head of the department He believed that the Commissioner of Public Works could not take his position at the Board or take part in the discussions at the Board without compromising his position as a member of the Government A question arose a short time ago in reference to opening a road at the Gawler end, and what then did the hon gentleman, the Commissioner of Public Works, do? Why the hon gentleman would not express an opinion, he took no part in the discussion, and would not commit himself to a vote, because he was a member of the Government Yes, the hon gentleman compromised his position as a member of the Board, for fear he might compromise himself as a member of the Government, and he was, perhaps, right in doing so, because many questions might arise at the Board which would have to come before him in another capacity, and in reference to which he would not be justified in acting upon his own responsibility However the hon gentleman might vote at the Central Road Board, when he came to consult with his colleagues he might find himself in the position of having voted one way, but being compelled to act another As a member of the Central Road Board, the hon gentleman was not responsible to that House, but as the Commissioner of Public Works he was But the greatest anomaly had yet to be pointed out and he was sure that the Attorney-General would bear him out in what he was going to state, that under responsible Government the Governor was the Commissioner of Public Works So far as approving or disapproving the acts of the Central Road Board was concerned, he contended that under responsible Government the Commissioner of Public Works was the Governor How, then, could the Commissioner of Public Works hold a seat at the Road Board? Could the Governor hold a seat at the Board under either the former or present form of Government? and if the Governor could not, how could the Commissioner of Public Works? He was sure that the Attorney-General would say that by the Governor as named in the Act was meant the Commissioner of Public Works, who was only responsible to that House, and not to the Governor in-Chief Then he would refer hon members to the various powers given to the Governor under this Act, and which were clearly intended as checks upon the Central Road Board Under the 23rd clause the Governor had the approval of all officers, the approval of all salaries, the security to be given by various officers &c The Central Road Board accounts could not pass till they had been sanctioned by the Commissioner of Public Works How singular that the hon gentleman should be placed in this anomalous position How could the hon gentleman be called upon to check accounts which came from himself, as a member of the Central Road Board, to himself as the Commissioner of Public Works? This arrangement must clearly prevent that check being exercised which ought to be He recollected when the hon gentleman, before holding the office of Commissioner of Public Works, was Chairman of the District Council of Mitcham, and the hon gentleman gave up that office when he was appointed to the office of Commissioner of Public Works, because he found that if he held both offices he would have to approve his own accounts If the reason assumed for giving up the office of Chairman to the District Council of Mitcham were solid and good, it would also hold good in reference to the hon gentleman holding the two offices of member of the Central Road Board and Commissioner of Public Works No man could serve two masters, and no man should be called upon to approve his own accounts The hon gentleman clearly ignored his position as a member of the Government if he held his seat as a member of the Central Road Board, and violated the spirit and intention of the Act He would call attention to the 4th clause of the Act, to which he had previously referred, by which it would be seen that the Central Road Board was to consist of six members, four of whom were elected by District Councils, and two appointed by the Governor He wished to ask whether the hon gentleman had been appointed by the Executive Council a member of the Central Road Board He presumed the hon gentleman held a seat at the Board with the approval of his colleagues and that he presumed would be considered tantamount to being appointed by the Executive, so that there were in fact three members of the Board instead of two appointed by the Governor and Executive Council Did the hon gentleman receive fees, to which he was entitled as a member of the Central Road Board, as if the hon gentleman did so he had no right to be a member of the Government If the hon gentleman did not receive them, was it not tantamount to saying that he had been appointed by the Executive Council, and had no right to receive them In conclusion he urged that as under responsible Government the Commissioner of Public Works was the Governor, and as the Governor could not occupy a seat at the Board, neither could the Commissioner of Public Works

The motion having been seconded,

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS wished to make a few remarks upon the subject before taking what he considered a proper course by retiring from the House until a vote had been arrived at upon the question He should do so although not bound to do so, he had no great interest in the matter—no personal interest, but after a few remarks he should retire from the House until the question had been disposed of He would in the first place take up what the hon. member for the Sturt had concluded with, namely, the fees which were received by members of the Central Road Board The hon member appeared to have been very careful in going through the Act, but still he overlooked one provision, which was, that any member of the Central Road Board holding office of emolument under Government was prevented from receiving the fee of £1 1s per month allotted to members, no matter how often they might meet during the month That clause in the opinion of the Board was stretched to its fullest extent in the case of his predecessor, Mr Babbage, who was held to be in the receipt of public money as Engineer of the City and Port Railway, and consequently was not entitled to receive fees That gentleman had not received fees, nor did he (the Commissioner of Public Works) intend to, nor had he done so He had not been appointed by the Executive Council to the seat at the Central Road Board, which he had held for the last three years, but he had been elected to that seat, and felt it very flattering that such should have been the case, by the unanimous vote of every District Council in the province He duly appreciated such a mark of approbation, and when he accepted the office of Commissioner of Public Works, he did not feel disposed to retire from the Board, but he mentioned publicly at the Board, knowing that the reports were published and circulated through the province, his willingness immediately to retire if an intimation that it was considered desirable he should do so were conveyed to him by any of those bodies who had elected him No such intimation had, however, been received by him from any of the District Councils, and it appeared to him that the hon member for the Sturt was either too late or too soon with his resolution, inasmuch as there would be only three more meetings of the Central Road Board prior to a general election of representatives at the Board On the 21st January the new members of the Central Road Board would take their seats, and though he must retire, as by the provisions of the Act every elected member was compelled to he might be re-elected, though he could not devote the same time and attention to matters in connection with the Board, which he felt proud to give prior to holding the appointment of Commissioner of Public Works It was very likely, however, that he should retire and devote his time to the numerous other matters which demanded his attention He could not allow such remarks as had been made by the hon member for the Sturt to pass without notice The hon member had said that he (the Commissioner of Public Works) had compromised his position either as a member of the Government or as an elected member of the Central Road Board, he had stated that no man could serve two masters, and had specially referred to one case in which he (the Commissioner of Public Works) had refused to vote at the Central Road Board He believed that no member of that House believed him to be a man who was likely to compromise his position, and in the matter referred to by the hon member for the Sturt, he was very far from saying that he should not have taken precisely the same course which he did, had he not held the office of Commissioner of Public Works, for it was a matter which was as closely and nicely balanced as could be, and there were many disinterested parties who were unable to say which of the claimants was right and which of them was wrong He felt under the circumstances that the best course for him to pursue would be not to vote at all, and he repeated that if he had not held the office of Commissioner of Public Works, he believed he should have adopted precisely the same course He believed that the bodies who elected him to the seat at the Central Road Board which he had the honor to occupy, were the best judges of this matter, and not that House He would, however, leave the House to settle the question, and retire during the discussion (The hon gentleman then left the House)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would say a few words upon this question, but would state at once that he intended to oppose the motion He must beg to congratulate the hon member for the Sturt upon his new-found zeal for the public service and the removal of anomalies The hon member had been a member of the Legislature for several years, and during that period an anomaly similar to that which was now pointed out had existed without calling forth the reprobation of the hon gentleman He said this deliberately, because the anomaly pointed out in this motion was, that a member of the Government was a member of the Central Road Board, yet a member of the Executive Council had been a member of the Central Road Board ever since his appointment as a member of the Executive Council, and a member of the responsible Government, Mr Bonney, was a member of the Central Road Board from the time he accepted office as a member of the Government till he left the colony so that this anomaly had existed for years but had never been noticed before When the hon member said it was impossible to serve two masters, he should like to know to what two masters the hon member alluded Hon members of that House served the public, and members of the Central Road Board had precisely the same duties to perform the same masters to serve, in the one case as in the other The duty of a member of that House and of a member of the Central Road Board was to see that the interests of the public were properly considered and protected, there were no conflicting duties, there was nothing required from a member of the Government which was incompatible with the duties which he would have to perform as a member of the Central Road Board There was no conflict between the duties of a member of the Central Road Board and of a member of a responsible Government, such as was implied in the remark of the hon member for Sturt in reference to serving two masters He was not aware that there had been any intimation of dissatisfaction at the Commissioner of Public Works holding a seat at the Central Road Board, unless indeed the hon member for Sturt could be taken to represent the public No complaint had been made of the manner in which the Commissioner of Public Works had performed his duties as a member of the Central Road Board, nor did he now hear in reality that the Commissioner of Public Works had at all failed in his duty to the public, no suggestion of a practical breach of duty had been made in introducing the subject The only other question which he would refer to was, that the Act itself from which the hon member for the Sturt had quoted expressly recognised the possibility and probability of salaried officers of the Government being members of the Board It was clear that the Act contemplated this, because it provided that those officers should not receive fees When the Act was passed it was known there were two salaried officers at the time members of the Board, and it was contemplated that salaried officers would continue to be members of the Board, but of course the Act did not contemplate a system which was not introduced till five years afterwards Although there was nothing in the Act to show that it was contemplated a seat at the Board should be held by a responsible Minister of the Crown, neither in that Act nor in the Constitution Act, was there anything to prevent such a thing occurring The Act provided that members of the Board should be elected in a particular way, and a member of that House having been elected who was subsequently called upon to fill an important office in connection with the Government, the question was whether he should resign his seat at the Board He had already shown that there was nothing conflicting in the duties, and that there was nothing to call upon the hon gentleman to resign, so long as those who elected him a member of the Board were satisfied That, he thought, was the test It was not contended that the hon gentleman was less efficient as Commissioner of Public Works by being a member of the Central Road Board Those who were elected members of that House were interested in one set of duties, and those who were elected members of the Central Road Board were interested in others Not one of the bodies who had elected the Commissioner of Public Works a member of the Central Road Board had expressed dissatisfaction at his holding the two offices, otherwise the hon gentleman expressed his willingness to resign He should be compelled to vote against the motion, though it was perfectly true that it did not appear to be contemplated by the Act that a responsible Minister of the Crown should be a member of the Board

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the hon. the Attorney-General had made out a very bad case The hon gentleman admitted it was true that it was an anomaly that the Commissioner of Public Works should be a member of the Central Road Board, and with his usual consistency said he should therefore vote against the motion The hon the Attorney-General had congratulated the hon member for the Sturt upon his zeal for the public service, but he questioned whether the hon member for the Sturt could return the compliment so far as the hon gentleman's zeal was evinced by his vote on the present occasion, because the hon gentleman admitted that the motion was substantially correct that it was not contemplated by the Act that a responsible Minister of the Crown should hold a seat at the Central Road Board, and yet he should vote against the motion The Attorney-General had alluded to the fact of a member of the Executive Council under the old system of Government having held a seat at the Central Road Board, but there was no analogy between the old and new systems Under the old system of Government the Governor was substantially the Governor and Executive Council It was quite immaterial what advice the Executive Council gave to the Governor, as the Governor was not bound to adhere to it Under the old system the Governor merely acted upon that advice which he deemed it expedient to follow, but under the present responsible Government it was absolutely expected that the Governor should follow the advice of the Executive Council The hon the Attorney-General had alluded to the case of Mr Bonney, who, when a responsible Minister of the Crown, held a seat at the Central Road Board, and although the hon gentleman had admitted that such a state of things was not contemplated, he had endeavoured to draw the inference that holding the two offices by the Commissioner of Public Works was not more anomalous than Mr Bonney It was quite immaterial whether one case was more anomalous than the other, but there was a difference in the cases, the one presenting what the Attorney-General was particularly fond of—a fine specimen of the circumlocution office—which the other did not The Commissioner of Public Works had to transact certain affairs and give his vote at the Central Road Board, and then handed the account of what he had done to the Commissioner of Public Works to approve of, but the case of Mr Bonney, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, was different, because the road department was not under the control of the Commissioner of Crown Lands The Commissioner of Public Works, however, might place his veto on his own acts as a member of the Central Road Board and on those of other members of the Board This did appear anomalous The House in regarding the question ought not to take into consideration who was the holder of the office, but they should look to the office, not to the officer If they took that view he was sure there was no one—on the admission of the Attorney-General that such a state of things was not contemplated by the Act, and who had also admitted that such a position was anomalous, and consequently was going to give an anomalous vote—who would not support the motion

The TREASURER should oppose the motion, because he did not think the position of the Commissioner of Public Works was anomalous It was quite clear that the Act contemplated

Government officers being members of the Board, as had been stated by the Attorney-General That inference was clearly derivable from the statement that Government officers were not to be paid fees His object in rising was chiefly to correct a statement which had been made to the effect that the Governor could act without the Executive Council Such was not the case, as the Governor's instructions expressly required him in every case of importance to consult the Executive Council

Mr MILDRED must vote with the resolution, holding that this was in some degree a most anomalous position for a Minister of the Crown to hold He had indeed seen great inconvenience arise from it when it fell to his lot as Chairman of a District Council to regularly attend the Central Road Board Not only in the case already alluded to, but in others, he had seen inconvenience and incompatibility arising from the circumstance referred to in the motion In the first place, after the hon gentleman had accepted the office of Commissioner of Public Works, the Board never had the advantage of his time as it had before his appointment to that office Previous to that the hon gentleman was most punctual and regular in his attendance, and it was not merely his time of which the Board were deprived of the advantage, but of his advice also He referred to one particular case which he thought would sufficiently shew that the motion at present before the House was justified There was a dispute in reference to a road leading to the bridge at Gawler Town South, and great injustice was nearly done to the purchasers upon the main line, who had bought upon the pledge of the Central Road Board that it was a main line The Chairman of the Board and a member of that House were the only members of the Board left to decide that important question, but if the Commissioner of Public Works had not held that office, he would in all probability have been present As it was, as he had previously stated, the question was nearly decided by the Chairman of the Board and a member of that House, whose property would have greatly benefitted by the road taking a particular direction The Chairman proposed that the direct line should be in a certain direction, which was seconded by the owner of the property, and would have been carried by the casting vote of the Chairman, but for the timely arrival of another member, who prevented a great piece of injustice from being done. This simple fact he thought was quite sufficient to enable the House to decide upon this important question

Mr TOWNSEND felt reluctantly compelled to support the motion, though he believed the Commissioner of Public Works had discharged his duties as a member of the Central Road Board in so satisfactory a manner that he would be quite sure of being re-elected at any time There could be no doubt that it was a great anomaly for the Commissioner of Public Works to be called upon to revise acts which he had performed as a member of the Central Road Board Suppose for instance a case in which a District Council was interested, and which, after being determined by the Board, it was found necessary to refer to the Commissioner of Public Works, who had also voted upon the question at the Board meeting, would it not lead to a want of confidence if the Commissioner of Public Works had to revise his own acts? Would it not be thought that he would be influenced by the vote which he had given before? He should like to correct an error into which the hon member (Mr Mildred) had fallen, in reference to a road at Gawler West being carried through the owner's property The member of that House whom the hon member had alluded to was the hon member for Barossa, Mr Duffield, but that hon member had very little interest in Gawler West beyond the property which he occupied, although the original owner of the property which had been referred to The Commissioner of Public Works failed to vote on that occasion, because, as he stated, the case was so nicely balanced and the hon gentleman had also stated that he followed precisely the same course as he should if he had not been a member of the Government Such might be the case, and, indeed, he believed the Commissioner of Public Works to be incapable of acting in any other way, but others might take a different view, and in the history of political warfare there had been such things as, perhaps, some thought possible to arise from the anomalous position held by the Commissioner of Public Works He believed the fees referred to in the Act had relation to parties nominated by the Government, and not to those who were elected

Mr BARROW thought that on his side of the House a very good rule had been laid down, and that on the other side a very excellent exceptional case had been made out, that is, if exception were admissable at all He would say it appeared anomalous that a gentleman should occupy a position which involved the examination and passing of accounts which were afterwards subjected to his own approval He found it impossible to divest his mind of the impression that this was an anomalous state of things He admitted that the Commissioner of Public Works had made a many and admirable defence in vindication of his position as a member of the Central Road Board So far it was very satisfactory, and the Attorney-General had said as much for the hon gentleman as under the circumstances he could The hon member for Noarlunga had remarked that the House ought not to take up the question in connection with the particular gentleman who filled the office, but that the House should look at it as embodying a general principle He (Mr Barrow) agreed with the hon member, and must therefore object to the resolution before the House, because it referred to a particular member of the Government The resolution stated that in the opinion of the House the position held by the hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth), as a member of the Central Road Board, whilst he was a member of the Government, was anomalous He agreed in the principle which was embodied in the resolution (Mr Reynolds said he had not mentioned the name) But the name certainly was mentioned in the resolution of the hon member He (Mr Barrow) believed that he and the hon mover meant the same thing but he should adopt a different mode of expressing his intention Instead of selecting a particular case it would be better that the House should affirm a general principle, and he would therefore, move an amendment—

"That in the opinion of this House it is not conducive to the public interest that any member of responsible Government should be at the same time a member of any Board or Commission entrusted with the expenditure of any portion of the revenue of the colony "

Mr GLYDE seconded the amendment, which met his views, but he felt compelled to oppose the original motion, as it was clearly aimed at Mr Blyth The first part of the original motion appeared a truism difficult to contradict The position of the Commissioner of Public Works as a member of the Central Road Board unquestionably was anomalous, but the hon member for the Sturt might have said that it was equally anomalous that the Treasurer should be called upon to pay himself his salary Whilst the first part of the resolution was a truism, the second part was entirely untrue The Commissioner of Public Works had been unanimously elected by the District Councils of the province to a seat at the Central Road Board and as the Attorney General had stated, the hon gentleman was called upon to serve, not two masters but the public He believed that all would agree the hon the Commissioner of Public Works did use his best exertions to serve the public in the best possible manner The difficulty in supporting the resolution was removed by the amendment, which he had great pleasure in seconding

Mr MILNE should oppose both the original motion and the amendment, his reason for doing so being that he objected to picking up these little matters in Acts which had passed previous to the advent of responsible Government, in order that fault might be found with them as being inconsistent with responsible Government With regard to the original motion he would remark that there was a certain Act of Council in existence constituting the Central Road Board, and he found nothing in that Act to prevent the Commissioner of Public Works from being a member of the Central Road Board If the original motion were passed he could not see what was to prevent the same thing being done at the ensuing election in two months hence He could not see why the Commissioner of Public Works might not be re-elected Although it might be desirable that a responsible Minister of the Crown should not be a member of this particular Board, he objected to the time of the House being frittered away by these sort of motions, and if the amendment before the House were not carried he should move that it was desirable to revise the Acts constituting Boards, with the view of bringing them into more harmonious action with responsible Government No doubt many faults could be found with Boards constituted before the advent of responsible Government

Mr PEAKE could not see any objection to the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens Though he was favorable to the discussion of the idea of the amendment he could not see that if carried it would be of any practical use The people had elected the hon member (Mr Blyth) to be President of the Road Board, in that gentleman's capacity of private citizen, and the course of political events had thrown Mr Blyth into the position of Commissioner of Public Works The people by their silence at present intimated that Mr Blyth should retain the position in which they first placed him and no resolution of the House could prevent them from electing whom they pleased He could not see of what use the amendment of the hon member (Mr Milne) would be, unless it should be in procuring such amendments of the law as had been referred to He had no objection to affirm the principle, but he could not see the practical value of it

Mr REYNOLDS said that though the hon member did not see the value of affirming the principle involved in the amendment, he thought that in the early part of the session the hon member had affirmed the principle as if he considered it of great importance In order to show that his (Mr Reynolds's) feeling was not at all personal towards the hon the Commissioner of Public Works, to whom he was quite willing to award credit for attention to his duties as member of the Board and for his indefatigable exertions and great independence whilst a private member, he (Mr Reynolds) was quite prepared to adopt the amendment of the hon member for East Torrens (Hear, hear) In referring to the hon the Commissioner of Public Works as an independent member of the Board, he might state that he (Mr Reynolds) had had occasion to be in communication with the Board, and that no one could be more determinedly desirous of showing his complete independence of the Government than the hon member, so much so, that he (Mr Reynolds) thought, from the tone of the hon. gentleman's remarks that the two interests might possibly be antagonistic, and that the interests of the Government at one time might not be the interests of the Board. The hon. the Attorney-General had congratulated him (Mr. Reynolds) upon his new-found zeal for the public service. (Laughter.) He was very much obliged to the hon. member for doing so, and wished, as the hon. member for Encounter Bay observed, that he could return the compliment. (Laughter.) The hon. member had not any new found zeal. (Laughter.) If he had any it was very old, but it did not show itself much, or if it did he (Mr. Reynolds) and other hon. members must differ greatly from the hon. the Attorney-General in their estimate of it. (Hear, hear, from the Attorney-General.) But there was one point upon which he had challenged the hon. the Attorney-General, and he (Mr. Reynolds) was sorry the hon. member did not accept the challenge, as he thought the point to which he referred the strongest in his case. He (Mr. Reynolds) had said that under responsible Government the Commissioner of Public Works was the Governor, and the hon. member had not disproved the assertion. He had also asked, could the Governor under the old state of things take his seat upon the Road Board, or whether under the new state of things he could do so. The hon. member had not accepted his (Mr. Reynolds's) challenge, and such silence implied that he agreed in the proposition. The hon. member only said that these anomalies existed for a series of years, but the hon. member himself showed that they did not, for he admitted that the present state of things was not contemplated, and therefore the anomalies could not have existed. The hon. member for Encounter Bay had proved that the case of Mr. Bonney was not a case in point, as that gentleman had not the approving of the accounts to perform, whereas the present Commissioner of Public Works had, and was therefore in the anomalous position of having to approve his own accounts. He would adopt the amendment, as it would affirm the principle which he (Mr. Reynolds) wished to establish, and would save him the trouble of taking action on other matters which might be considered personal by some hon. members.

The motion that the words (in the original resolution) proposed to be omitted stand part of the question, was then put and lost without a division; and the words were struck out accordingly.

Mr. MILNE said that the resolution commenced with the words "That in the opinion of this House." To these he would propose to add "it is desirable to revise the Acts constituting all Boards with the view of bringing them into harmonious action with responsible Government."

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the Government whether it was not their intention to introduce a Bill to bring all Boards under greater responsibility than at present.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL supposed he must apologise to the hon. member for the Sturt for not having noticed what that hon. member considered the strongest point in his argument. (Laughter.) But just as they differed with regard to zeal for the public service, and as what he (the Attorney-General) considered very warm and zealous attention the hon. member regarded as indifference, so, also, might they differ as to the force and weight of an argument. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) And so what the hon. member considered his strongest argument he (the Attorney-General) considered a mere verbal quibble not worthy of notice. (Laughter.) The Commissioner of Public Works was not the Governor. The Commissioner had a right to exercise certain functions in the name of the Governor, but he was not the Governor, and it was mere quibble to say he was the Governor, as the representative of Her Majesty in the colony could not be a member of a board for executive purposes, but a member of the Legislature, who represented substantially the Legislature, and not the Crown, was in no such position either legally or as regarded the nature of his duties as would prevent him from holding such a position. The Governor was unable to do so because he was the representative of the Queen; but to say that because the representative of the Queen could not do a thing a representative of the Legislature could not do, it, seemed to him (the Attorney-General) a mere play upon words, which, if he had been aware of the weight which the hon. member attached to it, he should have answered as he did now.

Mr. REYNOLDS was obliged to the hon. the Attorney-General for the light which he had thrown upon the subject.

Mr. SOLOMON rose to order. The question put by the hon. member to the Attorney-General had been disposed of.

The SPEAKER—The hon. member for the Sturt has not yet spoken to the amendment.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he had risen to reply to what the hon. member, Mr. Reynolds, had said.

Mr. SOLOMON asked whether the hon. member for the Sturt, or any other hon. member, was not bound to confine himself to the matter before the House.

The SPEAKER presumed the hon. member was going to speak to the amendment. Of course he could not anticipate what the hon. member was about to say.

Mr. REYNOLDS was not so accustomed to travel from Dan to Beersheba as some hon. members. The hon. the Attorney-General said that he would have replied to his (Mr. Reynolds's) quibble if he had noticed it. This was very condescending of the hon. member, who sometimes made a quibble himself. (Laughter.) But the hon. member himself said that the Commissioner of Public Works had all the powers of the Governor under the Road Act.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained. He had stated that the Commissioner exercised some of the functions, but not that he had all the functions of the Governor.

Mr. REYNOLDS did not mean to say that the hon. Arthur Blyth was Sir Richard Graves Macdonnell—(laughter)—and, therefore, this was a great quibble on the part of the Attorney-General. It would have been absurd to have confounded these two personages—(laughter)—but it was a very unworthy quibble on the part of the hon. the Attorney-General, after admitting that the Commissioner possessed all or most of the powers of the Governor, to tell the House that the Commissioner did not exercise most of those powers. The hon. gentleman had misled him (Mr. Reynolds.) As to the amendment, he believed the Government would introduce a Bill for the purpose of bringing the various Boards under more direct responsibility, and therefore he thought it useless to move the amendment.

Mr. BARROW hoped the House would not adopt the amendment, which he believed would shelve the whole question. His (Mr. Barrow's) proposition affirmed something, but the hon. member's amounted to nothing at all. He agreed with the hon. member for the Sturt, that the Bill to be introduced by the Government would embody the views of the hon. member for Onkaparinga, so that if that hon. member's views were adopted, the House would have wasted the whole of the time consumed in discussing the question that afternoon.

The amendment of Mr. MILNE was then put and negatived, and the amendment of Mr. BARROW was put as a substantive motion and adopted.

GREAT EASTERN-ROAD.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved—

"That this House will on Wednesday, 15th December, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the petition from the residents near the Great Eastern or Magill Road (presented on 11th November), with a view to granting the prayer thereof."

The motion was agreed to and the petition read by the Clerk.

Mr. TOWNSEND said that in asking the House to go into Committee on Wednesday, 15th, he would not detain them with any remarks, beyond stating that in 1853 the road was declared a main road, and on the faith of that declaration, land was purchased and houses were built on the line, yet he was told up to the present time not a farthing had been expended upon the road. The distance to Lobethal by this route would be 25 miles, or 4½ miles less than by the other route. He was informed that there were between 30,000 and 40,000 acres of Government land which could be brought into the market by the improvement of the road, and he believed that purchasers were already waiting for this land. He need not detain the House, further than in stating that this was one of the nearest roads to the Murray, the distance being some 49 miles, and he understood that some surveyors had already recommended it, and that the settlers felt that a great injustice was done them by the manner in which the road was neglected. He also believed that the Road Board had agreed that the line should be opened as soon as they were in funds. It was proposed to make a 12-foot road from Magill to Lobethal.

The SPEAKER suggested that the hon. member should alter his motion in such a manner as to move for an address to the Governor praying that a sum of money be placed on the Estimates for this purpose.

Mr. MILNE seconded the motion. The road having been declared a main road and the land sold upon that understanding, constituted a claim to consideration; and this claim had been recognised by the Road Board. He found that the Road Board in 1856, when sending in an estimate for the roads for 1857, stated that it was necessary to have £182,000 to carry on the work for the year, and part of this sum, as would be found on reference to the Council Papers, was to be set apart for the opening of the road between Magill and Lobethal, the amount to be so expended being £10,000. The Board were, however, under the necessity of rejecting the idea of carrying out the work, inasmuch as, instead of £182,000, they only received one-half that amount. He regretted that lately the Road Board—whether because the sum at their disposal was inadequate for carrying on the necessary works, or from some other cause—had refused to recognise the claims of this road. He objected to the Road Board assuming any such power, inasmuch as the road was down in the schedules of main roads, and was, therefore, entitled to a share of the money. Any person acquainted with the country must see that the expenditure of this money would be very economical, as it would open up land through the tiers, which would be certain to bring money into the Treasury to double or treble the amount expended. The land was alluvial soil of the best quality for growing vegetables, and it abounded with timber suited for all purposes. Thus the road would be a benefit not only to the public, but to the Treasury, and besides opening up the tiers, it would open a way to the Murray. There were vast districts between Lobethal and the Murray available for sale, if the road was made, but which were utterly useless for want of it.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that this was a matter which would be much more properly considered in Committee. A good deal could be said and no doubt would be said—(a laugh)—upon it, and he had therefore no objection to the motion. He had no desire to oppose the consideration of the question in Committee, but on the contrary would be better pleased that it should be so considered. The hon. member who spoke last said that probably the funds at the disposal of the Road Board were inadequate. They would always be inadequate so long as the present system was in existence. He (the Commissioner of Public Works) certainly did not expect to hear the hon. member say that because this road was down in the schedules of main roads, therefore it was entitled to its share of the money, especially as that argument might be used for other roads—the Port-road, for instance. When the House was in Committee he would endeavor to lay before it the levels of the road and any other information which he could procure. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. STRANGWAYS had no doubt that he could make out as good a case for £105,000 for roads in other parts of the colony as the hon. member had done for £5,000 for this one. The sum of £25,000 had been voted for roads for the first six months of next year, and why should this road receive a fifth of the entire sum. There was a Board of Main Roads to attend to these matters, and it was not right for the House to interfere in them unless under some special circumstances which had not been shown in this case. He (Mr. Strangways) had voted against the sum for the Port-road, for which a better case was made out, on the ground he had just stated. If the House went into Committee upon this subject it would no doubt be made a precedent, and he (Mr. Strangways) should then move for the construction of a road from Willunga or Noarlunga to Encounter Bay, and the House would have applications from all parts of the country for other roads. If the House was to make roads wherever there was land to be sold they should make one to Stuart's Creek. He hoped the hon. the Treasurer would state his views on this matter, as it was quite as much in that as in any other hon. gentleman's department.

Mr. LINDSAY would not oppose the motion for going into Committee, but he thought there was a great deal of force in what some hon. members had said on the question generally. It seemed that we were dealing with our roads, railways, and telegraphs in the same manner—allowing a general scramble for them—without any system to go upon. The Road Bill, which he and other hon. members expected would have been brought in, would have settled the question better than these motions. A better case could be made out for other roads. If the House was to go on in this way it would be better, instead of voting a sum for the Road Board, to let every hon. member who had a claim for a road bring it in and have a sum voted for it. The present plan was the worst plan, but the best plan would be to define the main roads and adopt a better system for keeping them in repair.

Mr. SOLOMON supported the going into Committee. It did not follow because it was believed that at a future time hon. members might bring in motions respecting half-a-dozen roads, that this motion should be rejected. If the claim was really just the House should not be deterred from entertaining it, because other claims might be preferred with an equal amount of justice.

Mr. BARROW moved that the House divide.

The question was accordingly put and agreed to.

PETITION OF MR. BABBAGE.

Mr. BARROW rose to move "That the petition of Benjamin Herschel Babbage be taken into consideration with the view of granting the prayer of the same." He would say little on the subject, because it was near the time at which the Orders of the Day were called on (3 o'clock), and besides, as he had just moved that the House divide, it would be injudicious for him to make a long speech. (A laugh.) He moved that the petition be read.

The petition was accordingly read by the Clerk.

Mr. BARROW again rose and said, he did not rise on that occasion as the advocate of Mr. Babbage, nor as the opponent of the Government or of Major Warburton, who had been sent to supersede Mr. Babbage. He merely asked on behalf of a superseded or rather a suspended public servant, that that gentleman should have that justice to which under similar circumstances every public servant was entitled. Mr. Babbage considered that he had been harshly treated. He (Mr. Babbage) maintained that he adhered to his instructions, and he believed that he had been recalled at the precise juncture when his labours were about to crowned with success. Whether Mr. Babbage could make good all these statements it was not for him (Mr. Barrow) to say; but he thought the House should give that gentleman an opportunity of vindicating his conduct or retrieving his character as an explorer. He also thought it but fair that an opportunity should be afforded to the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands of justifying himself in the matter, and to Major Warburton of explaining his reasons for writing those very strong letters, reflecting upon the conduct and operations of Mr. Babbage. As to what course should be pursued—whether the House would agree to the appointment of a Select Committee, or whether some other method should be adopted of granting Mr. Babbage the prayer of his petition, it was for the House to say. He would rather leave this point to the House than propose any specific course. The petition did not ask for a commission of enquiry, though that would appear the most obvious method of attaining the object in view. He did not know whether the House would follow the course of the House of Commons, and hear Mr. Babbage in person at the bar or hear him by counsel, or grant a Select Committee. But he thought that when a public servant stated that he had been unjustly treated, and that he was ready to vindicate himself, and called for enquiry, it would not be fair to refuse him an opportunity of proving his statements. Mr. Babbage could not be ignored. That gentleman stood before the House as a person who in an arduous and difficult position had been censured by the Government. It was not for him (Mr. Barrow) to say that that censure was unmerited, but Mr. Babbage alleged that it was. With these few observations he would leave the matter in the hands of the House, especially as he could say a word in reply if a reply seemed necessary.

The SPEAKER said the motion should be more specific.

Mr. BARROW under these circumstances would move pro forma that a Select Committee be appointed.

The SPEAKER said the hon. member could not move it pro forma. If he made the motion he must support it, as otherwise he would be converting the House into a debating club.

Mr. BARROW—Then it appears I cannot move the proposition in the form in which it stands.

The SPEAKER—The hon. member can move it, but he will see there is nothing in it.

Mr. BARROW would, under these circumstances move for a Select Committee. The only reason he had not done so was that he did not wish to commit the House to the appointment of a Committee if any other course could be devised.

Mr. TOWNSEND seconded the motion. If any amendment was proposed upon it, it would perhaps be competent for the hon. mover and himself to withdraw their proposition.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that so far from opposing, he would very cordially support the motion. The Government, acting upon the best information they could obtain, and the best opinions they could form, had taken the step of recalling Mr. Babbage. Undoubtedly the recall implied a very severe censure, and it was quite right that Mr. Babbage should have an opportunity of vindicating himself by an enquiry before a Committee. But although he believed this, he thought it impossible that anything could arise which would show that the Government had not acted properly. It was possible Mr. Babbage might show that the Government had not accurate information, and nobody would be more pleased than he (the Attorney-General) if that gentleman could show that there were circumstances which justified him, and which would relieve him from the censure involved in his recal.

Mr. STRANGWAYS, before the motion was agreed to, would like to hear what was the object of appointing the Committee—whether it was to censure the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, or to allow Mr. Babbage an opportunity of vindicating himself. So far as he was aware there was no imputation made against Mr. Babbage except that of general incompetency; but if it was the intention of the hon. member for East Torrens to censure the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, then he (Mr. Strangways) would most cordially support any motion (loud cries of "no," in which Mr. Barrow joined) which directly censured the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands. That hon. member most richly deserved censure, for what was his conduct? Why Mr. Babbage was everything that could be desired—the most competent man for his command—until the hon. member for Encounter Bay tabled a motion condemning him, and then the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands cast him off like an old shoe. The Commissioner wrote him a letter and did not even observe common courtesy in the matter, inasmuch as he (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) published a letter before he sent it to Mr. Babbage. (No, no.) If the hon. member did not publish it it was made public in Adelaide before it could by possibility reach Mr. Babbage, in fact, in such a manner that it could be communicated to Mr. Babbage's subordinates as soon as the letter was delivered to himself. The only reason alleged against Mr. Babbage was that he carried out his instructions. He would not detain the House further.

Mr. SOLOMON said the last speaker had stated that if the motion was one for censuring the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands, he would heartily support it; but he (Mr. Solomon) did not look upon it as a motion of that kind. It was a motion which would enable a gentleman who might or might not have been rightly withdrawn from the public service to attempt his own vindication. What might arise from the enquiry remained yet to be seen, but he thought the hon. member for Encounter Bay was rather too fast in jumping to a conclusion.

The motion for the appointment of a Committee was then agreed to, and the following hon. members were elected to the Committee:—The hon. the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Milne, Neales, Peake, Strangways, Hawker, and the mover (Mr. Barrow).

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL.

On the motion of Mr. MILNE, this Bill was read a third time and passed.

ASSOCIATIONS INCORPORATION BILL.

On the motion of Mr. BAKEWELL, this Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Bill was ordered to be sent up to the Legislative Council.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Mr BAKEWELL moved that the second clause of this Bill be recommitted

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee accordingly

The clause was verbally amended by the insertion in two places, after the word landlord, of the words, "or his agent"

The clause as amended was then agreed to

On the third clause, authorising reductions in the licence fee in country districts, in cases where houses of refreshment were required by travellers in localities where the population or traffic would not enable such houses to pay a licence fee of £25, considerable discussion took place Finally, the clause was struck out, on the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Clause 4 was struck out, and a new clause regulating the exhibition of public-house lights on the sea coast inserted in their place

The House then resumed, the Chairman reported the Bill, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

THIRD JUDGE AND DISTRICT COURTS BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he considered it necessary to offer but few remarks, because the principles of the Bill had been already sanctioned by the vote of that branch of the Legislature and circumstances which had transpired since then would, no doubt, tend to convince hon members the more of the expediency of the measure It would be remembered that last session a Bill was introduced into that House for the appointment of a third Judge and the establishment of Circuit Courts That Bill was opposed on the ground of the excessive expenditure which it was believed it would involve, and from a want of concurrence on the part of some hon members in the mode of establishing the Circuit Courts Notwithstanding this, he (the Attorney-General) had not changed his views, but, in deference to the opinion of hon members, he did not in this case introduce the principle referred to in the Bill now before the House but he proposed, instead, to give certain powers to the Governor to issue a Commission for the holding of District Courts, and who would exercise that power when he was made satisfied of the necessity for such, either in meeting the convenience of suitors or reducing the costs of action This Bill did not provide for a continually recurring expense, but that Courts might be held when and where necessary His own opinion was, that it would be found requisite to issue a Commission for trying prisoners and civil causes in many districts before long, perhaps towards the north at once The result of such an experiment, he imagined, would prove successful, and he could not see what objection there could be to a trial of Circuit Courts at the same time they appointed a third Judge He might have said a great deal on this subject, had not the principle been assented to already, and he would, therefore, in moving the second reading, content himself with these prefatory remarks

Mr REYNOLDS said, from this Bill it appeared that Circuit Courts were made quite of secondary consideration, and from the opinions he had formerly expressed he did not know how he could support it He thought however, when leave was asked to introduce a Bill of this nature, the districts where the Courts were required should have been described as affecting the necessity for the appointment of another Judge

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the hon member for the Sturt did not understand the nature of the Bill, as he (Mr Strangways) had understood him to say that it should be regulated on the same plan as the assizes at home Now this Bill would confer on the Governor the same power as that possessed by the Queen of England, for the holding of assizes at certain periods. He admitted that the Circuit Courts Bill of last year was a most monstrous measure, but the same objections could not apply to this Bill There was one omission in it however, to which he would call the attention of the Attorney-General, and that was that there was no power given of granting to Her Majesty a further Civil List If it were intended to place the salary connected with the appointment each year on the Estimates, he should most certainly object to it The Civil List did not provide for the payment of a third Judge, and therefore it would have to be provided for by an Act of the Legislature or otherwise He thought the best plan to adopt would be to exercise the powers given in the 38th clause of the Constitution Act, providing for an extension of the Civil List There was another matter he might mention in connection with this Bill—the necessity there was of dividing the year into terms, adopting as in England a long vacation, and so managing the sittings of the District Courts that thay might not clash with the sittings in Adelaide This would be absolutely necessary both for the convenience of the profession and for other reasons The most important assizes in England occurred during the long vacation, and he thought such an arrangement here would facilitate the transaction of business There was another point he would mention, the difficulty there was of obtaining writs, from the irregular manner in which the sittings were held now This he thought might be remedied by a Supplementary Bill

Mr BAGOT said the necessity for a third Judge was so generally acknowledged that no arguments were required to be adduced in favor of it In respect to the District Courts and the time and place of their being held, he thought it much better that the Bill should remain as it was, than to place any definiteness upon this portion of it, and for this reason, that what they might consider suitable places for Courts to be holden now might not be so some short time hence There was one improvement he thought might be made in trying civil and criminal cases- that of doing with a smaller number of jurors In the country districts there was always a difficulty in getting a suitable choice of persons ("No, no," from Mr Burford) The hon member for the city said "no," but that did not change his (Mr Bagot's) opinion He thought they might manage with equal safety and greater convenience in many cases with five or seven jurors only With regard to the Civil List he should not like to see that extended, but the salary could be provided for by special legislative enactment He thought some improvement might be made in having longer terms, and for the sittings of nisi prius to be oftener than they were at present He would support the second reading of the Bill as a matter of grave necessity

Mr ANDREWS said that where there was not a sufficient number of jurors to be found, it was evident there was no necessity for the holding of Courts He was opposed to reducing the number of jurors as tending to get rid of juries altogether, As to a third Judge it was so necessary that he need not remark upon it

Mr BAGOT explained that what he said was that the number of jurors should only be reduced when the consent of the Judges of the Supreme Court had been obtained

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that every hon member would agree with the importance of the remark of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) that no Judge should be placed in such a dependent position as to have his salary voted year by year There could be no doubt that a Judge should be free from any such dependance, as nothing could be more opposed to the interests of the community or tend to interfere more with the due administration of justice than such a dependance If it was thought the provisions of this clause did not offer a sufficient security against this, he should be glad to modify them The intention he could assure them was that the salary should be paid by authority of the Act itself With regard to the terms and long vacations, he would say, that at present there was one term commencing on the 4th December and ending about the beginning of February The Judges however, had the power to alter such terms as they might think fit as tending to meet the convenience of suitors. Therefore it was not necessary to include any provision in this Bill to meet that which was already provided for If the Bill were passed, it would be the duty of the Judges to so alter the arrangements, in this respect, as to make them fit in with the Courts held under the authority of this Act With regard to jurors, his feelings were that in the country districts a smaller number would be sufficient. But all that was required to settle this point was that the parties interested in the proceedings should consent to place themselves under a jury composed of a less number There might be special cases in which this might not be desirable, but, perhaps, in the majority of instances, a great saving of time would be effected

The Bill was then read a second time, and the House went into Committee

The preamble was postponed

On the 1st clause being proposed, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved an amendment which he thought would meet the objection of the member for Encounter Bay, as to the payment of the salary of the third Judge, viz, that in the second last line the words "be paid" should be struck out and substituted by the word "received"

Mr STRANGWAYS proposed that after the word "Governor" should be inserted the words "in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, in answer to Mr Strangways, that it would be as well not to touch the Civil List All they had to do was to make the third Judge as independent as other Judges were.

Mr STRANGWAYS contended that by the course proposed by the Attorney-General the third Judge would not be placed in that position, as his office would be liable to be abolished

The amendments of the Attorney-General and the hon member for Encounter Bay were then put and carried, and the clause was passed as amended

Clauses 2 and 3 were passed as printed

On the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS the following addition was made to clause 4—"and such salary shall be paid to such Judge on the warrant of the Governor, which he is hereby authorised and required to issue on the same terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Constitution Act, with reference to the salaries of Judges"

Clauses 5 to 9 inclusive were passed as printed

A new clause was added to the Bill, viz, "That this Act take effect from the passing thereof"

The House resumed, the CHAIRMAN reported the Bill, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for Tuesday

In Committee

The Commissioner of Public Works moved that schedule A stand as printed

Mr Strangways moved an amendment that 30 feet be struck out and 100 feet be inserted in its place, as the size of the rooms on which the rate should be made

The Attorney-General said the original Bill was based on the annual rental, but as this, it was considered, would be in Adelaide a bad test, the plan now introduced in the Bill had been adopted The amendment of the hon member for Encounter Bay would tend to encourage the building of small rooms which would be so destructive to the health of the city

The amendment was then put and lost

Mr Strangways moved that clause 1 of schedule A be struck out, as he thought the rate should be made on the annual value.

After a few remarks from Mr Hay, the amendment was put and lost

Mr Hay moved that in clause 3 of schedule A, after the words "annual value," the words "estimated on rent of £8 per annum for every £100 estimated marketable value of such vacant land"

Mr Bakewell said it was contrary to the principles of common justice that vacant lands should be taxed at all He should support the schedule as it stood

Mr Townsend moved that in clause 3 before "stores," the word "houses" should be inserted

Mr Solomon would support the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha, because all vacant lands should pay the rate as they would be increased in value

Mr Strangways opposed the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha, because it proposed to fix the annual value by the actual value without describing how the actual value was to be got at

The Attorney-General said the practical effect of the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha would be to diminish the amount to be received by the assessment He would support the clause, therefore, as it stood

Mr Cole supported the amendment of the hon member for Gumeracha, as being more equitable

Mr Townsend's amendment for the insertion of the word "house" was then put and negatived A division was called for, with the following result—

Ayes, 4—Messrs Strangways, Lindsay, Mildred, and Townsend (teller)

Noes, 14—Attorney-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Treasurer, Messrs MacDermott, Hawker, Harvey, Solomon, Hay, Cole, Burford, Rogers, Collinson, Bakewell, Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

Making a majority of 10 in favour of the Noes

On the suggestion of Mr Mildred, an amendment was made rendering vacant lands not liable to be rated

After an amendment from Mr Strangways, to strike out the word "lands," which was lost,

The hon member for Gumeracha's amendment was divided upon with the following result —Ayes 6, Noes 12, as follow, and the clause was passed as printed

Ayes, 6—Messrs Mildred, Harvey, Cole, Rogers, Solomon, and Hay (teller)

Noes, 12—The Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Attorney-General Messrs Townsend, Strangways, the Treasurer, Messrs Hawker, Bakewell, Macdermott, Burford, Collinson, Lindsay, and the Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

The schedules having been agreed to, the House resumed, and the adoption of the report was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

The Hon the Chief Secretary said the session was fast drawing to a close, and he preferred that the second reading should be made an Order of the Day for Thursday, but would take the sense of the House upon the point

The Bill was ordered to be read a second time on the following Thursday

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES BILL

The Hon the Chief Secretary, in moving the second reading of this Bill, reminded the House of the question of privilege which arose some time since in Tasmania, and upon an appeal being made to the Privy Council, an opinion was expressed to the effect that local Legislatures had no inherent privileges beyond the precincts of the House He thought, however, that hon members would agree it was desirable that the Legislature should possess privileges such as the House of Commons The first four clauses of the present Bill gave power to the Houses of Parliament to summon witnesses, and if there were one function of Parliament more valuable and important than another, it was that of the appointment of Select Committees for the purpose of obtaining evidence upon subjects affecting the interests of the country before those subjects were brought before Parliament Under the existing law, it was competent for the Houses of Parliament to summon witnesses, but it was quite optional with the parties so summoned whether they attended or not, and thus it was quite possible that by their non-attendance they might interrupt the business of the country That was provided against in the present Bill The fifth clause gave each House power to punish summarily in certain cases, and members were protected by it from insult in the discharge of their public duties There was no Court of justice which did not possess within itself power to punish contempts of its authority, even inferior Courts had this power, and he thought it would be admitted that if such were the case Houses of Parliament ought not to possess inferior privileges Clauses 5 to 14 provided in what manner proceedings should be taken against parties, and clause 15 provided that members should possess freedom from arrest in order that constituencies might be protected against vexatious interference with their members whilst discharging their public duties The 16th clause provided that any witness wilfully giving false answers before a Committee should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor He was not aware that there were any other clauses to which it was necessary to direct the attention of hon members, and would move that the Bill be read a second time

The Hon J MORPHETT seconded the motion, thinking it highly desirable that some Bill should be passed by Parliament to define in some measure not only what were the privileges but the powers of Houses of Parliament There were clauses in the Bill which when in Committee he thought it very likely he should dissent from, but in the main he thought it desirable that such a vexed question should be set at rest, so that what had arisen in a neighbouring colony might not occur here It was very desirable that Parliament should have full power to make the fullest enquiry into all matters affecting the public interest, and it was also desirable that members should have the greatest freedom of action whilst pursuing their career as members of the Legislature, that they should have full power to express their sentiments unbiassed and unshackled He believed the Bill before the House would enable them to do so He did not, however, think it desirable that there should be freedom from arrest for members in this colony, but he thought that members of Parliament should be secured in expressing their opinion in the fullest and fairest manner upon all matters debated in Parliament

MESSAGES FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of Message No 3 from His Excellency the Governor, in reply to Address No 5, of the Legislative Council, transmitting copy of Despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, upon the subject of the Insolvent Act, and the report of the Attorney-General thereon Also, Message No 4, transmitting copy of Circular of 16th October last, from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, intimating the acceptance of the P and O Company's contract for carrying on the mail service between Great Britain and Australia.

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the despatch upon the subject of the Insolvent Act, and the Attorney-General's opinion, were ordered to be printed

Upon the motion of the Hon J MORPHETT, the despatch from the Secretary of State upon the subject of Steam Communication was read, and was to the effect that an arrangement had been made with the Peninsular and Oriental Company to carry on the contract for a period of seven years, commencing with the February mail from Sydney, the contract embracing Mauritius, King George's Sound, Kangaroo Island, Melbourne, and Sydney—branch services being only necessary for Tasmania and New Zealand The subsidy, £180,000 annually, exclusive of £24,000 paid by the Mauritius, the time to be occupied out or home between Sydney and Southampton being 55 days The communication stated that the question of a second monthly communication via Panama had been carefully considered, and that tenders for such would be called for so soon as the necessary arrangements could be made

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGES BILL RESUMPTION OF DEBATE

The Hon A FORSTER said he should be compelled to oppose the second reading of the Bill The hon the Chief Secretary had stated that the necessity for this Bill had arisen from circumstances which had occurred in Tasmania, where a matter had been referred home to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and their decision had been unfavourable with regard to the privileges of Parliaments, the opinion being, in fact, that Parliament had no privileges beyond the limits of the House The difficulty in which the Legislature of Tasmania was placed was that they could not summon Dr Hampden to give evidence before a Select Committee of the House upon a question affecting the interests of the colony No doubt it was undesirable that Parliament should be placed in that position, and so far as that particular privilege was concerned he concurred with the Chief Secretary It was necessary that Parliament should have power to summon witnesses before a Select Committee, but the Privy Council thought it undesirable to concede to Colonial Parliaments such privileges as were desired by the Parliament of Tasmania, because it was thought that the Courts of Law would be sufficient to meet any difficulties which might arise Having carefully read and considered the case he felt satisfied that Her Majesty would not be advised to assent to any Bill extending the privileges of the local Legislatures, so as to deal with cases which the Courts of Law in the various provinces could deal with The Chief Secretary had stated that it was desirable the Parliament should possess the same privileges as the House of Commons, but did the hon gentleman suppose that this Bill would give the Parliament the same powers? If it were deemed desirable that the Parliament should possess the same powers as the House of Commons, he apprehended that a Bill, consisting of a single clause, would do that It might not be undesirable, if it were thought desirable, that this Parliament should have enlarged privileges—that it should have privileges similar to the House of Commons, so far as applicable He would suggest that course, because there might be a hundred privileges which were not alluded to in the Bill before the House, and he thought that the Bill would rather restrict their privileges than enlarge them If the Bill were passed, the privileges of that House would be confined within the limits and definition of the Bill The Bill contained privileges, in his opinion, too extensive with regard to persons outside the House, but it did not deal with the relative privileges of the two Houses A difficulty had never occurred in reference to persons outside the House, but differences had arisen between the two Houses Why should it provide for matters such as had never occurred and entirely omit any provision relative to matters respecting which a considerable question had arisen He regarded the Bill as an ill-considered scheme, and it conferred powers which ought not to be exercised with regard to persons outside the House, but omitted matters which ought to be included He thought a Bill to provide for the privileges of Parliament ought to be comprehensive and a well considered scheme He was sure that any Bill claiming extended privileges for local Legislatures upon questions which might be dealt with in Courts of law would not be approved by Her Majesty

The Hon Captain SCOTT was also opposed to many of the provisions of this Bill It appeared to him to be a very arbitrary and despotic measure in many respects He fully agreed that the Houses of Legislature should have power to summon witnesses, but hitherto there had been no difficulty upon this point, and it was quite clear that the evidence which was elicited by this means was essential to enable the Parliament to come to a wise conclusion He had no objection to power being reserved to summon witnesses, and to compel them to give evidence, providing it did not interfere with their own or any private interest The 5th clause, however, appeared to him so extraordinary that he could not support it It proposed to give the House most arbitrary, despotic, and altogether unnecessary power He objected to the President or Speaker having power to commit an individual to Her Majesty's gaol, and by the wording of that clause an individual might be transferred to a stable, and there kept during the remainder of the session He did not think such power ought to be vested in the Houses of Parliament, for there were courts to take cognisance of such matters The power conferred by this Bill was, he thought, altogether too great and unnecessary Then, again, he would refer to the clause relative to members being insulted Any person insulting an hon member was liable to be apprehended but he presumed that the law upon the point as it at present stood was quite sufficient The police could be appealed to if a member were assaulted or insulted, but by this clause it appeared that that House was to be constituted judge, jury, police officer, and gaoler He regarded that clause as altogether unnecessary, arbitrary, and despotic Then, again, to send an insulting letter to a member was by this Act rendered a misdemeanor, but if a man were so silly as to send an insulting letter, he thought it would be quite sufficient punishment to the writer to publish it in the newspaper Then again, it was a misdemeanor to send a challenge to a member, but that was an unnecessary provision, for duelling had gone out of date, and if a man sent a challenge, perhaps the best way to shame him would be to publish his letter in the paper The Bill also contained a provision in the event of any person offering a bribe to a member, but that clause was surely unnecessary, for a person who would be base enough to offer a bribe to a member would be likely to do so in such a manner that there could be no evidence against him, he would neither reduce his offer to writing, nor make it in a public company Such a man would most likely get the member by himself and then make the offer, and all the member could say was, that such an offer had been made, or he might even be afraid to do that lest he should subject himself to a prosecution for libel There were a great many other questions to which the Bill referred, with which he considered members really had nothing to do Provision was made for punishing the publication of any false, scandalous, and malicious libel relative to a member, so that editors might look out, but it should be remembered that the proceedings of that House, and the other branch of the Legislature, were faithfully reported by reporters paid for doing so, so that there was a check against any misrepresentations, and therefore he considered the provision unnecessary Unquestionably hon members ought to have freedom of speech so long as they kept within limits and did not traduce the character of other people He thought the clause had better be struck out, for by including it in the Bill the public would be very likely to say, see what they would do if they could There were some objectionable points in the 6th and 7th clauses, but he had a most decided objection to the 15th clause, which provided that members should enjoy freedom from arrest If a member were liable for a debt or to the law, was he to shelter himself by skulking within the doors of that House? If he were ever so unfortunate as to do anything to render him liable to arrest he should regard it as an aggravation of his offence to endeavor to shelter himself under his privileges as a member of that House, and he trusted the House would scorn the idea of adopting the clause He should like to see the House possess the power of summoning witnesses, and if they gave false evidence they should be liable to punishment Witnesses should also be compelled to give evidence upon any subject which did not involve their own or any private interest He thought there should also be some provision in reference to refractory members, for it was possible that one member might express himself in an insulting and provoking way to another (The Hon the Chief Secretary referred the hon member to the 8th clause) That clause did not make any provision for the expulsion of a member whose conduct was offensive to another member He did not go so far as to say that he should oppose the second reading but he should certainly oppose the clause relative to freedom from arrest, and also two or three other clauses which appeared to him unnecessary The Bill appeared to him to have been concocted in the dark ages, or at a period when rotten boroughs were in their glory, but times had altered, the people were awake, and would not submit to be dictated to as was proposed by this Bill

The Hon Captain BAGOT supported the second reading of the Bill, believing it to be a measure which it was very desirable to enact He could not agree that the Bill was of the character which had been attributed to it by the last speaker The hon gentleman had particularly dwelt upon the 5th clause, which referred to various offences for which persons might be subjected to imprisonment, but he would remind the House that every Justice of the Peace, if acting in a magisterial capacity, had similar powers, nay even every constable had the power of interfering and imprisoning any party guilty of personal violence, so that he thought the clause was quite as mild as it could be drawn With regard to the 15th clause, which conferred upon hon members freedom from arrest, he regarded that as a very proper provision, and would remind the House that parties attending Courts of Justice as jurors or witnesses, were similarly protected He could not see therefore why a member of that Legislature should not have similar protection The object of the clauses was not to provide members a cloak to save them from arrest, but to prevent their usefulness from being destroyed Suppose for instance it was known that upon a certain question of considerable importance to the country, there was likely to be a close division, unscrupulous parties might take measures for removing one or two members, known to be adverse to them, and thus carry their point The members would be arrested, and the object of those who had caused their arrest would be gained He contended that the clause was necessary, in order to afford members an opportunity of discharging their duties faithfully precisely the same as it was necessary for jurors and witnesses He thought, however, that the clause might be amended by doing away with the protection of a member if detected in the act of leaving the colony without satisfying his liabilities, and would move an amendment to that effect

The Hon H AYERS supported the second reading of the Bill, but must at the same time beg to correct the last speaker, in reference to some of his statements relative to freedom from arrest and vexatious arrest As the law at present stood vexatious arrest was altogether impossible It would have been possible, he admitted, 20 years ago, upon an affidavit being made that the party to be arrested was indebted to the extent of £20 and upwards, but was not possible at the present time, because no arrest could take place unless there were reasonable grounds for believing that the party was about to leave the colony, or there must be judgment confessed or obtained He had yet to learn that witnesses or Jurors attending the Supreme Court were free from arrest When within the precincts of the Supreme Court he admitted they were free from arrest, but that was from respect to the Court, not to the person He was decidedly opposed to the 15th clause, but should support the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the right of opposing the clause to which he had alluded in Committee He thought the Hon Captain Scott had drawn a much more gloomy picture of the probable operation of the Bill than he was justified in doing, and that on many points he had been ably answered by the Hon Captain Bagot

The Hon Captain HALL should support the second reading of the Bill, although he did not agree with all of its provisions It contained in fact something more and much less than he had expected from what he heard of the Bill in the first instance, but having since read the Bill carefully through he really saw nothing objectionable in it, but the 15th clause He admitted, however, that it was necessary members of that House should be protected in every possible way, and that they should be able to express their opinion freely without fear of insult, directly or indirectly As members of that House they sunk their individuality, and became the representatives of the people The Hon Captain Scott, had ridiculed the idea of there being any challenges sent, any bribes offered, or of members being directly or indirectly coerced, but such things had been, and he, since he had been a member of that House, had been jostled, no doubt with the view of coercing him Some years ago, when the question of labor was under discussion, he and the hon John Baker were jostled near the Gresham Hotel, when on their way to that House by a number of misguided men, and if they had not taken a determined stand they might have been materially influenced and perhaps become afraid to come to that House Such things having occurred might occur again, and the Council should have power to guard against any undue influences being brought to bear upon members of Parliament It had been stated that a question had arisen in another colony as to the power and privileges of colonial Parliaments, and that circumstance appeared to him to be a great feature in favor of the present Bill It was the duty of the Council to prepare for any contingency which might arise by defining what its powers and privileges were Circumstances for instance might arise which would render the Council unable to obtain that information which the good of the country demanded, and he fully agreed, in reference to the power to summon witnesses, that they should be enabled to demand as a right what they were now only enabled to obtain as a favor In Committee he should certainly oppose the 15th clause, because conceding that if at a critical junction a member were arrested, it would be the constituency who would suffer, still it was the fault of the constituency for returning a person liable to arrest, such a man must be a mere adventurer or placehunter, and could not be in a position to devote that time to public duties which their importance demanded, nor should he be enabled to shelter himself from his lawful engagements merely by being a member of that House With this exception he saw nothing in the Bill from which he dissented It was desirable, perhaps, that the relative privileges of the two Houses should be defined, but this he thought had better be done in a separate Bill

The motion for the second reading of the Bill was carried, and the House went into Committee upon it

Clauses 1 to 14 were passed with verbal amendments

Upon clause 15, giving members freedom from arrest being proposed,

The Hon Captain SCOTT moved that it be struck out

The Hon H AYERS seconded the proposition

The Hon Captain BAGOT was desirous of moving as an addition or amendment, "providing, nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall interfere with the law in force relative to persons quitting the colony"

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that this clause was not for the protection or benefit of individuals, but for the benefit of the constituencies in order that their representatives might not be vexatiously apprehended In the absence of this clause it would be quite competent, upon an affidavit being made before a Justice of the Peace, that any member was about to leave the colony, to arrest him upon his way to the House, or the arrest might take place upon an affidavit made before a Judge in Chambers The object of the clause was that constituencies should not lose the services of their representatives at a particular juncture

The Hon H AYERS pointed out that there was not much to fear if the clause were struck out, for the Hon the Chief Secretary had stated that a man could only be arrested upon affidavit that he was about to leave the colony, but the constituency would lose the services of their representative just as much if he left the colony, as if he were arrested He did not think there could be anything like vexatious arrest, for not only must the creditor swear that the member was indebted to him, but he must also swear that there were reasonable grounds for believing he was about to leave the colony, and must state what those grounds were

The Hon Captain BAGOT could not assent to the clause being struck out, believing that members should be in a position of independence whilst going to or coming from that House

The clause was struck out, and the subsequent clauses having been assented to, the CHAIRMAN then reported progress, the report was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following day

DATE OF ACTS BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon J MORPHETT, who brought up the report of the Select Committee, assigning reasons for the Council declining to assent to the amendments made by the Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill, the report was agreed to, and ordered to be forwarded to the Assembly

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated that the Association of District Chairmen had devoted much time and attention to it, and that such portions of the existing Act which long experience had shown it was desirable to preserve, had been embodied in the present Bill The Act was so arranged that parties connected with District Councils would readily be enabled to refer, under distinct and separate heads, to those matters upon which they required information The principal novel features in the Bill were that the Executive had greater power to construct, arrange, and distribute wards, and the recovery of rates, and the general management was simplified and cheapened The power conferred of recovering rates was similar to that possessed by Municipal Corporations

The Hon Captain BAGOT seconded the motion, which was carried, and the House went into Committee upon the Bill

Clauses 1 to 57 were passed with verbal amendments

Upon clause 58 being proposed,

The Hon Captain BAGOT pointed out that it gave power to the Council to devote the rate for educational purposes, and considering the handsome sum contributed by the State for that purpose, he could not consider such a power necessary, or if it were given it should be to raise a special rate for the purpose

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the rate would be raised from amongst the residents of the districts, and surely the Legislature would allow them to expend it in any way they might consider most conducive to their interest If the members of the District Council were not fit to be entrusted with the expenditure of the rate the ratepayers would not have elected them

The Hon H AYERS had been surprised to find power given to District Councils to levy a tax for education, considering how large a sum the State contributed towards that object, and he would point out to the Chief Secretary that if the clause were passed the District Council would not be dealing with their own money but other people's The District Council after raising a rate annually for roads and bridges might expend it upon education

After some further discussion the clause was postponed, and the Chairman reported progress and obtained leave to sit again on the following day

The Council adjourned at half-past 4 o'clock till 2 o'clock on the following day

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

SERGEANT-MAJOR PERRY

Mr COLLINSON presented a petition from Sergeant-Major Perry praying for compensation as Sergeant-Major of Militia

The petition was received and read

ARTESIAN WELLS

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS gave notice that upon consideration in Committee of His Excellency's message No 21, Council Paper 146, relative to artesian wells, he should move the addition of the words "or sinking wells where required"

LAND GRANTS

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that upon the following day he should move for leave to introduce a Bill to remove doubts respecting the validity of the titles to certain land-grants, and to regulate the fees payable thereon

THE BARRIER RANGES

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table a paper showing the steps which had been taken relative to the proposed search for gold in the Barrier Ranges

Ordered to be printed

NORTHERN EXPLORATION

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table of the House papers connected with the Northern Exploration

PREPARATION OF BILLS

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table of the House a return which had been moved for, shewing the sums which had been paid or were payable during 1857, for the preparation of Bills, also a return, shewing the actual cost of printing The hon gentleman stated that those returns had been prepared ever since the preceding February, and that he would have laid them upon the table before, but they had entirely escaped his recollection The moment the hon member for the Sturt brought to his mind that the returns had not been furnished, he had them looked up

TELEGRAPH TO VICTORIA

Mr HAY asked the Commissioner of Public Works if there was any truth in the statement, attributed to Dr Evans, the Postmaster-General of Victoria, to the effect that the delays in connection with the Intercolonial Telegraph occurred upon the South Australian side, and that there had been no longer delay on the Victoria side than 45 minutes, whilst on the South Australian side there had been delays of 28 hours

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was very glad that the hon member for Gumeracha had put the question In the first place, he would state that there was no truth whatever in the statement to which the hon member had referred which had appeared in the public papers—the only means he had of knowing what had been really said, and which was attributed to Dr Evans, the Postmaster-General of Victoria So far from there being any truth in the statement, there had been frequent occasions for complaint at the delays which had taken place on the Victorian side, and since he had come to the House that day, he had received a message from the Superintendent of Telegraphs, stating that messages from Adelaide to Melbourne which reached Mount Gambier—the extreme point of the South Australian Telegraph—on the preceding day, were only being forwarded to Melbourne that morning He believed that the remedy for the delays which had hitherto taken place would be found in the statement, which was also said to have been made by Dr Evans, that it would be necessary to erect a second wire on the Victorian side Steps, indeed, were being taken to do so, and he believed that the complaints which had hitherto been made in reference to the delays upon the Victorian side would then cease From his own experience and knowledge he was enabled to state that there had been no delays on the South Australian side, but that all the delays which had taken place had occurred upon the Victorian side

Mr MACDERMOTT asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands what steps, if any, had been taken with regard to the resolution of the House relative to boring for water?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that in anticipation of the vote which appeared upon the Estimates for the purpose being assented to, he had been in communication with various parties with the view of obtaining information as to the best means of expending the amount He had received a report from the Surveyor-General upon the subject, and also from another gentleman whose opinion was valuable He had also been in correspondence with Mr Babbage upon the subject, and the result might be summed up that it was not desirable to incur great expense in sinking for water upon the artesian principle, without a geological survey of those portions of the country where it was most likely that the artesian system could be usefully and successfully applied In consequence of the information which he had received in connection with the subject he had that day given notice, that when the item was under discussion, he should move the addition of the words "or sinking wells where necessary"

Mr MACDERMOTT asked whether, when the correspondence was complete, the hon gentleman would place it upon the table of the House?

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that he would do so

LANDS TITLES REGISTRATION DEPARTMENT

Mr STRANGWAYS asked the Attorney-General when the returns which had been moved for, in connection with the Lands Titles Registration Department, would be laid upon the table of the House One reason for asking the question was that he believed the returns could have been furnished at once, if it had been deemed expedient that they should be He wished to know whether the hon gentleman would be prepared to produce the returns before the Real Property Act was brought under discussion, and, if not, would he stir up the Registration Department a little

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no idea of the reasons which the hon member had for believing that the returns could have been furnished more speedily He had no reason to believe that there had been any needless delay He had that day seen the Registrar-General upon the subject, who had informed him that the return would probably be forwarded to him in the course of the day, and he had no doubt that on the following day he should be enabled to lay it upon the table of the House.

THE THIRD JUDGE AND DISTRICT COURTS BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Third Judge and District Courts Bill be agreed to

Mr STRANGWAYS did not wish to oppose the adoption of the report, but wished to know if the Attorney-General had considered the suggestion that the appointment should be made by the Governor in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty? The hon gentleman had on a previous occasion stated that such a provision was not necessary, but there appeared to be great doubt whether under the Act of 1855 the Governor had power to appoint a Judge except in pursuance of instructions from Her Majesty

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was quite satisfied there was no necessity for the insertion of the words He did not mean to say that there would not be as between the Governor and Her Majesty, though upon that he pronounced no opinion, but he was quite clear that it was not necessary that the Legislature should insert words defining the mode in which the power conferred by the Act should be exercised, as such instructions were not binding upon the House

Mr PEAKE was desirous of addressing the House, but the Speaker ruled that he could not do so, the Attorney-General having replied

The motion for the adoption of the report was then put and carried

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would be convenient, and indeed was important, that the Bill should be read a third time in order that it might be sent to the other House, and he wished to know whether he would be in order in moving the suspension of the Standing Orders It was important that matters which had to be sent to the other House, should be sent as early as possible, in order to give the other House as long a period as possible for considering them The hon gentleman concluded by moving the third reading of the Bill

Mr REYNOLDS should certainly oppose the third reading being hurried on, unless the hon gentleman could show there was urgent necessity for adopting such a course

Mr STRANGWAYS said perhaps the hon member for the Sturt would withdraw his opposition if the Attorney-General would state what specific object he had in view in desiring that the Bill should be read a third time It appeared to him to adopt this course looked like hasty legislation, and as the Standing Orders provided that before such a course could be taken some urgent necessity must be shown, the House had a right to expect that the Attorney-General should show urgent necessity existed All that he had as yet heard from the hon gentleman was that if the Bill were not to be sent down to the other House till the following day the other House would have 24 hours less to consider it than if it were sent down that day, but that could scarcely be regarded as a sufficient reason

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not know that he could offer any further explanation than that which had with his ordinary accuracy been given by the hon. member for Encounter Bay. He proposed to adopt a similar course in reference to the Water Supply and Drainage Bill, and if the hon. member who had charge of the Licensed Victuallers Act Amendment Bill were in his place he should assent to a similar course in reference to that Bill also. The session was not permanent; it must be brought to a close some time, and as there were indications of its being brought to a close in a short time, it was not desirable to delay its termination beyond what would otherwise be regarded as the proper term by delays in Bills reaching the other branch of the Legislature. The hon. member for Encounter Bay had in fact explained with great clearness the object of the Government, and he did not know that he could add anything to it.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Bill be agreed to.

Carried.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said it was desirable that this Bill should also be forwarded to the other branch of the Legislature as soon as possible, and he would therefore move that it be read a third time.

Mr. STRANGWAYS opposed this proposition, stating that he should avail himself of every opportunity to oppose the measure, or any proposition on the part of the Government to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of getting through a measure of this kind. A large number of the clauses of the Bill did not meet the wishes of a number of members of that House, but the portion to which they principally objected was the schedule. The whole Bill had a very narrow slip the other day, and but for the Attorney-General the whole measure must have been smashed, at least it must have been withdrawn. He was opposed to suspending the Standing Orders two or three times a day, and should object to their suspension in this instance, although the Attorney-General had stated that he should not object to their suspension for the purpose of proceeding with the Licensed Victuallers Bill. If the Attorney-General wished to hurry on the business in order that the other House might have an opportunity of dealing with it, perhaps the hon. gentleman would at once state whether it was proposed by the Government that the Parliament should be prorogued before Christmas. Perhaps many hon. members did not wish to meet during hot weather, and would readily consent to such arrangement. He must oppose the proposition to bring on this Bill, as he wished to give hon. members an opportunity of opposing the third reading.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was the intention of the Government, if the state of the public business would permit of such a course, to prorogue before the Christmas holidays. He trusted the House would assist the Government in doing so. He believed there was only one feeling upon the point, and that was that as the Government intended to call the House together in four months, it was not desirable that the House should be kept sitting during that period of the year which was not the most favourable time for the dispatch of business.

The SPEAKER having intimated that the suspension of the Standing Orders must be carried by a majority of the whole House, and there being only 19 members present, as several negative votes were given, the motion was lost.

Upon the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS, the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL intimated that in the event of the House being fuller during the day, so as to admit of a majority of the whole being obtained, he should again move that the Bill be read a third time.

The SPEAKER said that could not be done, the third reading having been already fixed for the following day, and it was not competent for the House to rescind a motion passed the same day.

THE REAL PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that the amendments had been entirely suggested by the Lands Titles Commissioners, and by the Registrar-General, the suggestions having originated in their practical experience of the manner in which the Bill had worked. The amendments which it was proposed to introduce, would directly meet the known practical inconveniences of the present measure as disclosed by the operations of the law which it was proposed to amend. A case existed as appeared to him for the Legislature, yielding a degree of credit to the opinions of the responsible persons entrusted to carry out the law, and a case in which the amendments of those gentlemen might be properly made, and safely adopted by the Legislature. He had previously stated to the House that there were some matters upon which he had doubts; but he had stated also, that as he had seen the whole measure was a decided improvement upon the existing law, and as he was assured by those entrusted with the carrying out of the existing law that a measure of this kind was necessary to enable the Act to work in such a manner as should realise the expectations of its framers, and as he was satisfied no injurious principle was involved in the measure, he felt that he should waive his objection to points of detail in deference to those who had had greater practical experience and knowledge—the gentlemen who had been entrusted with carrying out the measure. He felt that he stood in a different position to the measure to that which he did when it was first introduced to that House. He then opposed the principle and objected to the details where he thought the principle or the manner in which it was proposed to carry it out fraught with danger or inconvenience to the public. But when the measure had received the sanction of the Legislature, and when it became the law of the land and must be administered, whatever defects it might possess, he felt that the position which he occupied was a very different one, and the principle having been approved and the measure in actual operation, all questions with regard to its principle were idle and superfluous. All that they now had to do was to amend the Act as far as possible, unless, indeed, the House were prepared to introduce a measure to repeal the existing law. He was not prepared to propose the repeal of the Act till a sufficient time had elapsed to test the mode of its operation, and till it had been so far amended in accordance with the suggestions of those who had been appointed to carry it out as would satisfy him that the defects were not in the details, but in principle. He stated unhesitatingly that if after these and other amendments which would no doubt be found requisite, the Act were found not to work well, he could only come to the conclusion that the defects were in the principle, and there would be no alternative but to repeal the Act. He did not anticipate, however, that that time would arrive. He believed that the principle might be freed of all those matters which embarrassed the operations of the Act, and that the details might be so simplified as to render the Act extremely beneficial, and freed from the objections which the opponents of the measure had seen and pointed out. That being his feeling he had taken the course which he had, and asked the House to enter at once upon the consideration of the Bill, and go through with it. There was one matter in connection with this subject to which he should perhaps advert. They had been told that doubts existed in reference to some portions of this measure in consequence of a difference of opinion between Mr. Belt and the Commissioners, but it was due to Mr. Belt to state that though he felt some doubts as to some of the provisions, with all the most important provisions he agreed, and had recommended them to the Government as useful amendments upon the existing law, and calculated to free it from many difficulties which surrounded its operations at the present time. He thought, therefore, that the Government were right in proposing these amendments, and that the House would be safe in adopting them. He had previously mentioned to the House that he should indicate two or three particulars in which he thought there would still be defects in the law as amended. He thought it a serious objection in the details that forms should be provided for powers of attorney and leases, in order to enable property to be brought under the Act. Parties might be possessed of property which had been brought under the Act, and of other property which had not been, and it might be desired to include these properties under one lease, but so long as it was necessary to have a certain form for a lease, or a power of attorney, this could not be done, and he thought this was an inconvenience which more than outweighed the convenience of having forms printed. This, however, would in time be forced upon the notice of the Commissioners, who would probably deem it expedient to alter the existing regulation. He believed that something more than was proposed by the present Bill would be required before the Act was found to work harmoniously, but experience would shew whether the view taken by the Lands Titles Commissioners or by himself and other members of the profession was the correct one. There was another case in which he should feel bound to propose an amendment, and that was in clause 62, which provided that an agent holding a power of attorney should receive a certificate of title in the name of his principal. He thought to that extent the Bill was objectionable in principle, as it was compulsory against parties not resident here, and who were consequently compelled to conduct their business through an agent. He had received several representations upon this subject, and it occurred to him that such power as was proposed ought not to be given. Where a party resided in England, and appointed an agent here to whom he gave an authority to sell, and for the purposes of sale it was wished to bring the property under the Act, he thought it was proper that the agent should have the power, which would not then go beyond the fair scope with which he was invested by the proprietor. But any proprietor had a right to say that he would not, as he had the power to say that he would bring his property under the Act. It was very possible that a proprietor might not be disposed to incur the expense of bringing his property under the Act, or to fetter his means of dealing with it, and he did not think that they should put it in the power of an agent to subject a principal to the expenses consequent upon bringing the property under the Act and imposing new incidents in connection with the property, the result of it being brought under the Act. He had that morning had an interview with the Registrar-General, being anxious not to propose any amendment upon which that gentleman had not been consulted, he having been appointed to carry out the law, and the Registrar-General had concurred with him that it was not desirable to give the power which the Bill proposed to give, and had agreed that it would be an amendment if the power were restricted to where a sale of land was intended, but where no immediate transfer was contemplated, he did not think that an agent should have power. A large proportion of the alterations which were proposed were matters of detail—hardly one could be called a matter of principle except those to which he had referred, and those embodied in the clauses which proposed to do away with the old form of bills of trust. The opinion upon this point which he had frequently expressed had met with the approval of the Lands Titles Commissioners. The Government saw the inconvenience of fettering a person as to the way in which he should settle his land in trust, and proposed that the trustees should be indicated upon the title so that security to the persons who were ultimately entitled to the property would be provided for, whilst the proprietor would be able to select the trust in any way he pleased without being fettered by the forms of the old Act. He believed that this was a wise amendment, and that it would do more than anything else to free the Act from the objections entertained towards it by members of the profession and others who prided themselves upon an Englishman's privilege of settling his property any way he pleased, so long as he did not controvert any principle of public policy. He moved that the Bill be read a second time and would ask the House to proceed with it at once, and if possible agree to the report in order that the Bill might be sent as quickly as possible to the other branch of the Legislature.

Mr Reynolds did not rise to oppose the second reading, but to make some objections to the manner in which the House was called upon to legislate in this matter. They had before them a Bill of 95 clauses, and an old Bill of 103 clauses, 70 of which he believed would be repealed by the present measure, besides several parts of sections which would be either repealed or amended. He feared it would require a considerable stretch of intelligence to understand the distinction between the present Bill and the measure of last session, and that presented as it was in this instance, the House would have great difficulty in dealing with the Bill at all. He was afraid that if this measure did not repeal that of last session the House would require more than ever the services of the legal profession to enable them to understand how they really stood. They would have to amend the Act again and again, until they had a whole file of Bills. It was very convenient for the hon the Attorney-General to say that he was not responsible for the Bill.

The Attorney-General said he had not stated that he was not responsible. He had introduced the Bill, and he considered himself responsible for every Bill which he introduced.

Mr Reynolds was very happy to hear it. He had thought that the hon member might ignore the responsibility, as the hon member had found that many clauses would require amendment, and as he (Mr Reynolds) imagined, therefore, that it would be necessary to amend the measure again, he would recommend that the amendments be brought in now. He had no doubt that the hon the Attorney-General if he gave his mind to the subject, could give the House a good practical measure. He was not opposed to the Bill, but to the patchwork system of legislation. What he wished for was a Bill which the legal profession could understand. The clauses proposed to be inserted and those to be repealed should both have been printed, with a cross placed against the latter, in order to enable hon members to understand the amendments and alterations without referring to the Bill of last year at all. There were features in the amendments which, whether intended as sops to the lawyers or not, looked as if they were intended to neutralise the opposition of that body to the Bill. Thus the 95th clause provided that the Judges of the Supreme Court were authorised to regulate the fees of legal practitioners. The spirit of that clause seemed to be "If you don't oppose the Bill we will put as much as we can in your hands." There appeared to be a better state of feeling at present on the part of the gentlemen at the Lands Titles Registration department and of that House towards the lawyers than prevailed last session. He (Mr Reynolds) was pleased at this as he believed if the House gave the legal profession such a law as they could work, these gentlemen would do their best to carry it out, but if on the other hand the Bill was not what it ought to be, how could the legal gentlemen recommend it to their clients? He hoped the hon the Attorney General would on the present occasion make any suggestions he might think desirable for the improvement of the Bill. He must again complain of this hasty mode of legislation. The Bill of last session was passed without consideration, and now, because this measure was recommended by the Lands Titles Registration Commissioners, it was to be dealt with with equal precipitation.

Mr Macdermott said, as to the 70 clauses of the old Bill which the hon member had referred to as being struck out, he would remark that the Bill of last session was drawn by a non-legal gentleman, and was framed in language of ordinary men (A laugh). The present clauses were merely altered into technical language and legal phraseology, but the Bill was virtually the same as that of last session. Even where a single word was found to require alteration, the clause which contained it was struck out—("No, no," from Mr Stranways, and "hear, hear," from Mr Solomon)—rather than insert a new word. He confessed he looked upon the 95th clause with some suspicion, for though the Act was originally intended to simplify and render economical the transfer of real property, if the Judges of the Supreme Court possessed the power here sought to be conferred upon them, it might tend to defeat the object. He thought the scale of fees, when drawn up by the Judges, should be submitted to the approval of the House. He hoped the Bill would be passed with as little delay as was consistent with the forms of the House.

Mr Glyde could not support the the Bill because he was not disposed to open his mouth and shut his eyes and swallow whatever was given to him by Mr Torrens, particularly after the hon the Attorney-General had said that it was likely to disagree with him (Mr Glyde). He objected to the Bill on the threshold, and therefore he had not gone into the details. He objected to the second and third clauses. When he sat down to consider the Bill, with every disposition to be one of those members who should assist in passing the Bill, he was met by this second most formidable clause. It seemed to him (Mr Glyde) impossible for a man of ordinary ability to understand that clause. He thought it a great mistake not to repeal the old Act and pass an entirely new one, and he was surprised that Mr Torrens, who was sincerely desirous of simplifying the law, and that gentleman's legal advisers, had not taken that course, when they found that more than one-half the clauses of the original Act required to be repealed. After reading the third clause he (Mr Glyde) would not go into the details of the measure, but he would say that no man had a right to ask any Legislature to pass an Act containing two such clauses as the second and third of this Bill. Mr Torrens should acknowledge the errors in the first Bill, and begin afresh. He (Mr Glyde) presumed that the Bill would be carried by the strength of the Government, but he would be no party to it.

Mr Burford said that the very fact of clauses 2 and 3 giving the number of every section to be repealed, and also of those to be inserted, and the order of their insertion, had urged him to go through such sections, and he must confess that he was pleasingly surprised to find that the measure was the same as that of last year, the difference consisting only in the verbiage. He could not agree that the Bill should be repealed, as this would entail merely going over the ground again, which he trusted was settled for ever, viz the principle of the Bill, and he should be very sorry that the House should be urged to take such a course again. It was totally unnecessary to do so, especially as they now had the assurance of the Attorney-General that the principle of the measure was one of great value. He could see nothing to hinder the House from going on with the second reading.

Mr Strangways said that the doctrine of the hon the Attorney-General, that as the Bill was sent down by the Lands Titles Registration Commissioners the House must take it and swallow it as a whole, was a very novel one. If it were adopted hon members might as well resign their seats, and allow Mr Torrens to make any real property law he pleased. The hon the Attorney-General had said the amendments were suggested by the manner in which the Real Property Act worked. The hon member might more properly have said, by the way in which that Act did not work. The amendments now proposed would substantially repeal the Act of last session for when that which the hon. member for the city (Mr Burford) called the verbiage, was removed, there would be nothing of the old Act left. There were many of the amendments to which the hon the Attorney-General objected. (Laughter from Mr Burford) He (Mr Strangways) could not expect that the hon member for the city would understand him. The hon. member had just stated that he could not rely upon his own judgment, and therefore he could hardly expect other hon. members to rely on it. The hon the Attorney-General stated that he was responsible for the measure. That hon member would therefore come in for any blame where blame was to be attached, or for any credit where credit was due, but he (Mr Strangways) thought that the hon member might receive much blame and no credit at all. The hon member had said that last session he did not approve of the principle of the Bill, that he thought it might be adapted to the dry legal estate, but to that only. Yet notwithstanding that statement, the hon member came to this House with this Bill of 95 clauses, and asked the House to pass it without any consideration, and leave the blame or credit to be divided, as they pleased between the hon the Attorney-General and the Lands Titles Commissioners. But as a member of the House, he (Mr Strangways) considered himself responsible, and when the House went into Committee, he would call attention to many clauses and parts of clauses upon which he proposed to take the sense of the House. He would not pass a law which would affect all the real property of the colony merely because it had been sent down in this manner. Hon members would recollect that the sole qualification required from the Lands Titles Commissioners was that they knew nothing about the matter in which they were engaged. (A laugh.) It was an essential qualification that they should be totally ignorant of the subject. The hon the Attorney-General, from the knowledge he possessed of real property law in England and other countries, was aware that the laws relating to the tenure—he did not refer to the transfer—of real property was the most complicated portion of legal education which any lawyer possessed. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member knew this, and he also knew that the sole qualification of the Land Titles Commissioners was that they knew nothing of the matter whatever. The hon. the Attorney-General had stated that this Bill was merely an improvement upon the existing law, and hon. members cheered him; but he (Mr. Strangways) believed that the intention of the hon. member was to convey that it was an improvement on the Real Property Act. Now he (Mr. Strangways) had the authority of the hon. member for the city (Mr. Burford) for saying that the Act of last session was perfection. (Laughter.)

Mr. BURFORD said he had not made the statement referred to, and he had contradicted the assertion of his having done so before.

The SPEAKER said the hon. member was out of order in interrupting an hon. member whilst speaking.

Mr. STRANGWAYS said that on the previous occasion when the hon. member had contradicted his statement he had attributed to the hon. member the exact words he (Mr. Burford) had used, but he now simply said, in general terms, that the hon. member stated that the Bill of last session was perfection. If the hon. member did not hold that opinion he had said something so very like it that it was impossible to see the difference. It this was a case in which amendments might be passed, without consideration or information, perhaps the hon. member thought that the Bill would be best explained at 2 o'clock in the morning, or comprehended after two or three glasses of whisky toddy. If the hon. the Attorney-General looked through the Bill, he would find that there was a new principle in it, and a very important one, which affected a large class of persons, viz., that portion relating to trusts. This would greatly affect trustees under marriage settlements. Under the new Bill the trustees were the bona fide holders of the property, and no protection was given to the owners. Yet the Attorney-General said there was no new principle involved. He had lately read, in "Blackstone's Commentaries," a remark as to how unbecoming it would be in a legislator to pass a law when he knew nothing about the law which it repealed. That was Sir William Blackstone's opinion, but the Attorney-General did not think similarly. That hon. member thought, in fact, that a man should always, when he got an opportunity, take a leap in the dark. The hon. the Attorney-General said that all questions of principle were settled, but he (Mr. Strangways) wanted to know whether they were settled to the hon. member's satisfaction? The hon. member said that, as the bill of last session was made law, the House had nothing to do but to make the best of it; and for this purpose the hon. member was ready to bring in amendments every session. The hon. member would give the Lands Titles Commissioners the full length of their tether, and then they would get into such a mess that they could never get out of it. Probably, within a year or two, that period would arise and then he (Mr. Strangways) had no doubt the hon. the Attorney-General might bring in a Bill which would have a principle in it—not such a Bill as this which had no principle at all. Hon. members had been led to believe that this was a Bill for the total abolition of lawyers and the substitution of registrars (laughter), but it did not produce those results, and now they were about to introduce two clauses confirming the practice to members of the legal profession as an inducement to the profession to bring the Bill into working condition. He (Mr. Strangways) did not believe that if all the members of the legal profession were to unite they could give effect to the principle of transfer by registration. (Loud cries of "Oh!") Hon. members might remember when Sir R. Bethell was Solicitor-General of England that at the election for Southampton, when he (Mr. Strangways) was in England in 1854 or 1855, he (Sir R. Bethell) promised to introduce a Bill in the House of Commons which would assimilate the transfer of real property to the transfer of bank stock. The people applauded, and Sir R. Bethell was returned, but the Bill was postponed. On many occasions allusion had been made to the report of the Lands Titles Commission; but there was one paragraph which had not been referred to, to the effect that great care should be taken in any measure introduced to remedy what they considered the evils of the existing system; the remedy was not worse than the disease. There had also been a great cry against the legal profession; but now the Commissioners admitted that they cannot do without the profession. During the last session it was said that the members of the profession were actuated by sordid motives. Nothing was more common than to hear such charges made against the profession, and the persons who made them had no doubt good reason for making them, but he (Mr. Strangways) would leave it to others to find out whether these reasons were correct. When he was in London at a time when there was a Royal Commission sitting on the Real Property Law, he had met many eminent conveyancers, and although these gentlemen said they had no doubt means could be devised by which the transfer of real property could be simplified, still it could not be assimilated to the transfer of stock; and this he believed was what was intended by the registration. The hon. member here briefly compared the distinction between the transfers of real property and stock, when both were held in trust. The theory of the Bill was bad, but the people of the colony did not think so; they believed it was perfection or the nearest approach to it, and they wished to let it have every chance for its life. He (Mr. Stangways) would not offer any opposition to the principle of the Bill, which he understood to be the transfer by registration, provided it was optional with each person, whether he would avail himself of it or not, and that no new clause likely to be injurious in its operation was introduced. The hon. the Attorney-General had spoken of every Englishman in doing what he liked with his own, but if the House were to adopt this legislation he would ask the hon. member how long all persons would enjoy that privilege? It was taken away last session, and surely that was not what the hon. the Attorney-General would call allowing every man to do what he liked with his own. He hoped the hon. the Attorney-General would adhere to that principle, and see that no property were brought under this Act, except with the direct consent of the owner. As to the statement that the Bill of last session was drawn by a non-professional member, he (Mr. Strangways) believed that the amendments were in the same position. He had observed that the hon. the Attorney-General had been particularly cautious in terming them the amendments of the Lands Titles Commissioners, and that the hon. member did not speak of them as the amendments of the solicitors to the Commissioners. He (Mr. Strangways) believed that the amendments differed from those prepared by Mr. Belt. It was his impression not only from their nature, but from their verbiage, that these were not the amendments of Mr. Belt and Mr. Gawler, but of Mr. Belt, subsequently altered by the Commissioners. He was not opposed to what he believed to be the object of a large number of supporters of the measure, viz., to afford to the holders of property the largest facilities and securities for the transfer of property at diminished expense, and he would be quite happy as far as he might be able to give his aid in framing a measure for the purpose.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR.

At this stage of the proceedings a message was brought in from His Excellency, and others from the Legislative Council.

The SPEAKER announced that His Excellency had transmitted to the Assembly a despatch from the Secretary of State in reference to the new arrangements of the Home Government relative to the transport of the Anglo-Australian mails.

The despatch was read and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER announced that the Legislative Council had agreed with amendments to the following Acts passed by the Assembly, viz., Clerks' Salaries Repeal Act, Smillie's Estate Act, Impounding of Cattle Act.

On the motion of Mr. MILNE the amendments on the Smillie Estate Bill were ordered to be considered on the following day.

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the amendments on the other Acts were ordered to be considered on Friday 17th instant.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. BARROW said the question before the House would be a very lengthy or a very brief one accordingly as hon. members followed the course proposed by the hon. the Attorney-General or that of the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways). (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) If the House discussed not only the clauses of the Bill but also those of the old Bill, and if in addition to this they were to go into long discussions as to the merits or demerits of the Real Property Act in principle, then assuredly the House would not adjourn on this side of Christmas. (Laughter.) It was, therefore, for the House to say whether it was necessary for proper legislation to go through all the clauses one by one. Under ordinary circumstances he admitted it would be improper to legislate hastily, but for this Bill a special case could be made out for quietly getting through the measure. The people of the country had approved of its policy, and even the hon. member for Encounter Bay, who did not believe that the vox populi was always the vox Dei, admitted that this was the case. Again, this Bill was brought in to amend defects in a former one, and was the production of a gentleman whose sincere devotion to the cause of Real Property Law Reform was unquestionable. Hon. members might not believe in that gentleman's judgment, but they must admit his attachment to the Real Property Act, and they might, therefore, be sure that Mr. Torrens would not approve of anything which he thought would impede the working of that measure, and that he would not in any way act as a traitor towards it. So far, therefore, they might take the Bill on trust, as the work of a gentleman to whose friendly feeling towards the measure they must add his practical acquaintance with its working. But there was also something more to be considered, for, whilst Mr. Torrens said, "This is the Bill I require to enable me to carry out my measure," the hon. the Attorney-General said, "You may take it safely. I have gone through the clauses. Upon one point or another I dissent from it, but upon the whole, my legal judgment coincides with the Bill." On the one hand Mr. Torrens was undoubtedly sincere, and on the other they had the hon. the Attorney-General's great legal knowledge and judgment; and, therefore, they might be satisfied that in departing from the usual course, which required members to scrutinize every clause, they would not be acting rashly, more particularly as it was a Bill to amend a Bill the principle of which the country already approved He (Mr Barrow) considered that this state of things justified him in what he would not like to do under ordinary circumstances, viz, taking the Bill on trust But if hon members attached so much importance to the usual practice that they would take nothing on trust, and that no clause of the Bill was to be passed without full consideration, then, indeed, there was no fear of the Bill being rushed through the House The hon member for Encounter Bay alone, with his fatal facility of objecting to everything, would keep the House until after Christmas, and then the House might be left until spring to reply (Laughter) It was urged that it would have been desirable to have the Bill introduced in another form, and he (Mr Barrow) agreed with the hon member (Mr Glyde) in his objections to the second and third clauses, for it was hardly fair that an hon member should take two Acts and a pair of scissors to cut them up, in order to make the amendments intelligible (Laughter) Indeed, an hon member would require four Acts for the purpose, as portions of some clauses were printed upon the backs of others But although he did not like this labyrinth of references, still he would not carry his objections so far as to vote against the second reading of the Bill, merely because two clauses were complicated at the outset He thought if the hon the Attorney-General was satisfied that these references were correct, the House might pass over these clauses It had been objected to the present mode of procedure that another Bill of amendment would be wanted, and the House was asked whether it would not be better to bring in a Bill which would not require an amendment But how was that to be done? How were hon members to know what difficulties would arise? The hon member for Encounter Bay had spoken of the difficulties of a lawyer s education, and especially in reference to this branch of the profession, and he (Mr Barrow) believed that it was impossible to produce a perfect Bill The best plan would be to remedy the evils as they discovered them The country was in favor of the Act, the Act was the law of the land, the gentleman in charge of these amendments was most deeply interested in them, and the hon the Attorney-General had said, with a manliness which did him credit, that through respect for the law of the land, for public opinion, and the opinion of the Legislature, he was desirous of making the measure perfect One hon member had said that the measure was in the hands of gentlemen whose chief qualification was their total ignorance of the matters on which they were engaged But the hon member for Encounter Bay did not surely mean to say that Mr Belt and Mr Gawler were ignorant on those matters? When the Commissioners were chosen on the one side, because they were not connected with the legal profession, and Messrs Gawler and Belt, because they were on the other, there was a double protection secured Referring to the 95th clause, he would suggest that the scale of fees should be subject to the concurrence of the House or of the Registrar-General, or that some other check upon them should be devised, as the public would not be satisfied if after achieving a victory they should find themselves deprived of one-half the results of it He trusted they would find the members of the legal profession friendly towards the Bill, for though he (Mr Barrow) always approved of the measure, he entertained a respect for the dissentient views of those gentlemen Persons were not in the habit of telling physicians that they were interested in dirt because dirt fostered illness and disease, and he could not see why what would be regarded as a disgraceful libel as applied to one class of professional men should be vindicated when applied to another class

Mr LINDSAY rose amidst cries of "divide" and in a few sentences expressed his belief that it would be better to introduce a perfect measure, or at least one which would require very little amendment, which he thought, with the aid of the Attorney-General, it would not be at all impossible to do

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reply, believed it was not necessary to answer statements which had no foundation in fact, or to reply to arguments which refuted themselves He thought he might trust to every member who heard what he had said to cast aside from their minds the observations of the hon member for Encounter Bay, who had last spoken, and those of the other hon member for the said district He would trust also to the good sense of the House to discover the fallacies in the arguments of these hon gentlemen With regard to the remark that a perfect measure should be brought in at first, he confessed it would be very desirable (Laughter) If anybody could find anything so suitable to the present, and capable of adapting itself to all future time, it would be exceedingly satisfactory But, in the meantime, they should be content to do the best they could It was only when difficulties, requiring remedies, were discovered, that they could be removed This was the course of legislation in the British Parliament, and in all other Legislatures, and when the necessity for amending laws ceased, the functions of Legislatures would be at an end He did not, however, think that any hon members need fear that their functions would be so speedily superseded in that way (Laughter) He admitted that he thought it better to strike out the third clause, and supply its place in some other way

The motion that the Bill be read a second time was then put and carried without a division

The House then went into Committee, and clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to

Clause 3 was postponed

The succeeding clauses up to clause 19 were carried without discussion

Clause 20 was carried after an expression of dissent from Mr Strangways, who called for a division, but the hon member being the only dissentient, the House did not divide

Clauses 21 to 25 inclusive were passed as printed

Clause 26, "Lands under the operation of this Act, how leased"

Mr HAY asked the Attorney-General if there were a provision giving a lessee power to sell any interest in leasehold property, with or without right of purchase?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that was part of the common law, and, therefore, it was not necessary to include any such provision in this Bill

The clause was passed as printed

Clauses 27 to 31 inclusive were passed as printed

Clause 32 passed with slight amendment

Clauses 33 to 39 inclusive were passed as printed

Clause 40, "Mortgage money may be paid to Registrar-General, if mortgagee be absent from the colony, and mortgage discharged"

Mr ROGERS asked whether it would not be a better and safer plan that the money should be paid into the Treasury

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the House passed a clause substantially the same as this on a former occasion, and no fault was found with the principle of it If the Treasurer were appointed to receive monies it would impose a scrutiny of the affairs of the Lands Titles Office, which might not be expedient

Clause passed as printed

Clauses 41 to 61 inclusive were passed as printed

Clause 62, "Agent holding power of attorney to sell or to dispose of the fee, may apply to bring land under the Act, and receive certificate of title in the name of his principal"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed to amend this clause by inserting in the 17th line, after the word agent, the words "in pursuance of any contract for the sale of such land"

Amendment carried, and clause passed as amended

Clauses 63 to 75 inclusive were passed as printed

Clauses 76 to 87 were, after some slight discussion, passed as printed

In clause 88 the proviso was struck out, and the clause was passed as amended

Clauses 89 to 93 inclusive were passed as printed

In clause 94, in the 16th line, the blank was filled in with the word "fifty," and the clause was passed as amended

Clause 95—"Judges of Supreme Court to regulate remuneration of practitioners"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, to meet an objection of the hon member for the city (Mr Solomon), moved an insertion in this clause, that any scale of fees or emoluments framed by the Judges, should be laid before both branches of the Legislature within 14 days of their being printed, if sitting, and if not at their next sitting, such scale of fees and emoluments to be adopted within 14 days after the receipt thereof The object of the clause was to fix a scale which should not be exceeded

After a few words from Messrs STRANGWAYS and SOLOMON, the amendment was put and carried

Mr MILNE asked the Attorney-General what position would he be in who employed a solicitor to do certain business in the Lands Titles Office and who refused, added to which he would suppose that the profession generally refused

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said very few persons, he imagined, would find themselves placed in such a position, If there should be any combined action on the part of the members of the profession to frustrate the objects of the Act, he could very well suppose that the Legislature would take such steps to deprive them of their monopoly of conveyancing, or otherwise do that which the exigencies of the case might demand The practical effect of the clause was to make the profession responsible for what they did

Mr BARROW was given to understand that the Registrar-General had been in communication with several members of the legal profession, and he would like to know from the Attorney General whether those gentlemen were prepared to act upon the scale of fees as provided for, and, if so, whether there would be any penalty entailed by their charging higher fees than those indicated in the Bill

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he did not know how they could make it a penal offence, but the party so overcharged would have the power of getting the bill taxed, and of receiving back any excess in charge

Clause passed as amended

Schedules E, F, K and I were passed as printed

A new schedule (U) was inserted, being "Scale of Fees"

Mr STRANGWAYS called attention to the fees for copying documents being much higher than at the Supreme Court

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said they were not so, but he believed instead they were lower

Clause 3 was reconsidered and amended on the motion of the Attorney-General, by striking out all the words down to the 37th line, and part of the words in the 38th line

The clause was passed as amended

Clause 2 was recommitted, and the letter E inserted in the last line

The preamble and title of the Bill were then passed

The House resumed, the Bill was reported, and the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

LICENSED VICTUALLERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Mr Burford in the absence of the hon member for Barossa (Mr Bakewell) moved that the report of the Committee on this Bill be adopted

Carried, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for Wednesday

MESSAGE FROM THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

A message was received returning the Date of Acts Bill with the amendments of the House of Assembly disagreed to, for which the following reasons were given —

Reasons of the Legislative Council for disagreeing to certain amendments made by the House of Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill

1 Because it is consonant with the practice of the Imperial Parliament, as exhibited by an Act of that Parliament 33rd Geo III, cap 13, that one officer should affix to all Acts the date on which they receive Her Majesty's assent

2 Because it is essential that the utmost possible accuracy should be observed in attaching the proper date of assent, and that its authenticity should be guaranteed in the most obvious and indubitable manner, inasmuch as the date when attached becomes an integral part of the Act by the express terms of the Bill, and fixes the period at which Acts shall come into operation

3 Because the nomination of an officer of each House to perform this duty would be calculated to induce irregularity and uncertainty

4 Because there would be a practical difficulty in any other than the Clerk of the Legislative Council affirming the date of Her Majesty's assent to Acts to which His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief personally and publicly signified such an assent, as no Clerk of the House of Assembly could be present in the Legislative Council Chamber upon any such occasion, and therefore the Clerk of the House of Assembly could not of his own knowledge be aware of and properly certify the fact.

F C Singleton

On the motion of the Attorney-General the reasons were ordered to be printed

LANDS TITLES OFFICE RETURNS

The Attorney-General laid upon the table returns connected with the above, which were read and ordered to be printed

ESTIMATES

In Committee

Coast Harbor Service, Nil

The Treasurer stated, with respect to this department, that on the present Collector of Customs being appointed, the opportunity had been taken to strike out the Harbor Master, as it was found that the principal duties of that office were performed by the deputy At the same time the naval branch of that office was likewise discontinued From this a saving would appear as follows —At Port Adelaide, in the salary of Harbor-Master, the cost of clerical assistance and contingencies A saving was also effected in not keeping up the Blanche and the Yatala A sale had been made during the half-year to the amount of £855, and the actual saving had been £660 At Port Wakefield there had been no saving, at Port Elliot and Encounter Bay there had been a saving of £15 There had been no saving at Port Robe, Port Willunga, Port Onkaparinga, or Yankalilla At the River Murray there had been a saving of £50 in contingencies, making the total actual saving something over £700 In making the change which he had referred to, the coast service devolved on the Trinity Board, who had full powers given them to act, and who would carry it on much more economically than formerly This Board would have the Lighthouses under its charge It was proposed that the Blanche and the Yatala should be sold, and the amount which it was believed vessels could be hired for to perform the service in which they were employed would be £400 per annum, or £200 for the six months, instead of the considerably larger amount which had been previously voted

"Agency in England and Australian colonies, £650"

Passed as printed

"Office of Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration, £564 5s"

The Attorney-General said, in reply to the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Milne) that the item for printing and advertising was solely for publishing the notices of Crown lands sales in the newspapers He also stated that an arrangement had been come to between the Government and the proprietors of the local newspapers for the publishing of the notices of the sale of Crown lands at one-half of the amount charged according to scale price, the proprietors of the papers being willing to be at one-half of the expense on the public paying the other half

Mr Strangways said it was subsidising the newspapers to do that which formerly they had found it to their interest to do for nothing

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the Government had carefully considered the question, and thought they were only meeting the justice of the case by the arrangement which had been made In the neighboring colony the land sales cost from £3,000 to £4,000 to advertise

Mr Duffield was afraid if the Government took an example from Victoria they would not place the country in a very advantageous position He hoped they would not advance that as a precedent The land sales had hitherto been very well attended, and he did not think it desirable to incur the expenditure proposed

The Attorney-General said hon members could not doubt for a moment that the public derived a great advantage from the publication of the notices referred to, and the question was, should the Government refuse to remunerate the newspapers for publishing them? His impression was that they were only doing an act of justice

Mr Bagot was certainly opposed to striking out the item for advertising, but he moved that the item of £25 for travelling expenses be struck out

Mr Solomon was decidedly in favor of retaining the item for advertising, as it was not just to call upon the newspaper proprietors to advertise for nothing It was well known that the Government Gazette, in which these notices had hitherto appeared, was very seldom seen by persons in the country

The Commissioner of Crown Lands hoped the £25 for travelling expenses would not be struck out Last year the sum voted for that purpose was £50, out of which, on his own account, he had not expended more than from £5 to £6 But in other respects it was necessary, and as the Auditor-General took care not to certify to anything of which he was not perfectly assured, he thought they might vote the item with perfect safety

After a few remarks from Mr Strangways, the item in the total was passed as printed

Survey and Crown Lands Department £8,170 1s 6d

Mr Bagot asked whether from the present state of the Survey of Crown Lands the Commissioner of Crown Lands considered the large staff provided for in the Estimate necessary

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said the staff were required to do a certain amount of work The more land which was surveyed the more opportunity was afforded the public for selection There was always a large quantity of land open for selection but the staff provided for in the Estimate was only sufficient to keep up the requisite balance of land

The item was agreed to

Immigration Department (British) £750

Agreed to

Immigration Department (Colonial) £380

Agreed to

Aborigines Establishment £1,150

The Treasurer said he was desirous of adding £500 to this item, it having been determined to devote that sum to the Aborigines Friends' Association for the purpose of forming an establishment at Goolwa

Mr Glyde asked the Attorney-General whether it had not been distinctly understood, when the House voted £500 for the Poonindee Mission last year, that no further sum should be asked for

The Attorney-General was always reluctant to express a positive opinion when an hon member had a strong impression in a contrary direction, but he certainly had no recollection of any such understanding as that which had been alluded to by the hon member

Mr Strangways did not see how the House could refuse a vote for this mission, after consenting to hand over £500 to a Society for a similar object, to be established at the Goolwa, without having any idea how that money was to be expended

Mr Mildred had a very vivid impression that it was distinctly understood, when the vote was taken for the mission last year, that nothing further should be asked for the institution, that understanding was based upon the grounds that most of those who had gone to the asylum had died, and that, although there was the finest run in connection with the institution of any in South Australia—such as that he had stated, any man in charge of the establishment could not avoid realising a large fortune, still the establishment was not rendered self-supporting, notwithstanding all that had been expended upon it An extraordinary document had been placed upon the table of the House in connection with this mission, in which the Commissioner of Crown Lands actually invited applications for money on account of this institution, shewing it was clearly understood that no more was to be voted after the vote of last session, and it was distinctly understood that if £500 were advanced to get the Trustees out of their difficulties, no more money was to be asked for The hon member proceeded to analyse the document to which he had referred, remarking that it appeared two whites were paid £850 for superintending the dying blacks, and it appeared that, although 6,000 sheep were upon the station last year, they had only, in the course of 12 months, yielded 100, the last return showing that there were only 6,100 He was convinced that the damper and fat mutton upon which the blacks were fed brought on dyspepsia, and drove them to an early grave A large portion of the money voted for the institution appeared to be expended in journeys to and from Port Lincoln If these trips were undertaken at the expense of those who went, he might not so much object to it, although those gentlemen were paid large salaries for other duties, but he objected to the public money being devoted to such a purpose The Superintendent of the institution was so frequently in town that it was impossible he could devote that attention to the Institution which it required

Mr BURFORD had understood that the House had determined upon granting £500 to the Goolwa Institute, for the year, and if so only £250 should appear upon the present Estimates, which were only for six months

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the amount was only £250

Mr MACDERMOTT protested against the unfortunate natives connected with this institution being dispersed in the bush again It had been shewn that the institution, during the last two years had incurred considerable debts, and was unable to pay them, without aid from the Government The private aid which had been given to the institution, far exceeded that which had been given by the Government, and it was only right, he considered, that a fair trial should be given to the institution He hoped hon members would receive with great reserve and caution the remarks which had been made with the view of casting ridicule upon this institution He believed that great zeal had been shewn by the Trustees in the management of the institution, and that everything which could be done had been done, to render it self-supporting

Mr MILNE hoped that the amount which was asked for would not be objected to, but he at the same time hoped that the Government would send some qualified person to report upon the establishment throughout It was quite apparent by the paper which had been laid upon the table of the House, that the Trustees had not done their duty The commercial management of the institution was clearly open to very great improvement, and he thought the Government should satisfy themselves thoroughly as to how the institution was managed, and that the Trustees should be informed unless it were better arranged for the future, the Government aid would be withdrawn

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, that he had not invited application to be made for pecuniary aid, but upon consulting a letter from Mr Bonney, it would be seen that the money devoted to this institution was looked upon as an annual grant, but that it was to be preceded by a report showing the progress of the establishment, and not having received that report, he took measures to obtain it He should be sorry to see the item struck off, for whatever mismanagement there might have been in connection with the institution all must admire the noble and Christian spirit which had induced Archdeacon Hale to found the institution There was nothing like it in any of the adjoining colonies He had recently seen several of the inmates and they were most intelligent, and he believed that a great deal of good had been done by the formation of this institution The aborigines were fast disappearing from the country which we had taken from them, and he thought it only just that the country should add its mite to their support

Mr HAY would not oppose the vote, but was decidedly opposed to voting money for an institution over which the Government had no control There were 6,000 sheep and a quantity of horse stock in connection with this institution, and it appeared that nobody knew to whom the stock belonged Whatever steps the Government might take in reference to the natives he certainly considered they should have the control of any establishment provided for them If this were not the case the Trustees would probably some day break up the establishment and sell off the stock, and to whom would the property go? The Government clearly had no voice in its disposal He should not vote against the proposed allowance for this institution, but he hoped, both with regard to that establishment and the proposed establishment at Goolwa, an organised system which would secure the Government proper control would be adopted In the absence of such a system he confessed he had great doubts as to the propriety of voting the sum asked for

Mr DUFFIELD was, like the hon member for East Torrens, (Mr Glyde), of opinion that when a vote for this institution was taken last session, it was upon the understanding that no further sum was to be asked for He certainly considered that 6,000 sheep, and a number of horses, should yield such a return as would render the institution self-supporting He did not like to oppose the vote, but certainly should feel bound to do so in future, unless some more satisfactory statement in reference to the affairs of the institution were laid before the House

Mr MILDRED moved that the item be struck out

Mr HALLETT moved that the House divide.

The vote was agreed to

Sheep Inspectors, £743 2s 6d

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the House went into Committee upon this Bill.

The 58th clause, which had created some discussion on the previous day, was again postponed

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY directed the attention of the Hon Captain Bagot to the 133rd clause, which he thought would meet some objections which had been raised by the hon gentleman on the previous day

The Hon Captain BAGOT admitted that it did so, adding that he had overlooked the clause in consequence of it not being placed where he had expected to find it.

Clauses 59 to 62 were passed with verbal amendments, without discussion

Clause 73 provided that District Councils might make rates not to exceed 1s in the pound

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN pointed out that there was a discrepancy between this clause and the 75th The 75th clause, in fact, negatived the 73rd, as it provided that a meeting of ratepayers should have power to adopt, vary, or refuse a proposed rate

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY explained that the District Council could levy a rate to the extent of 1s in the pound, and the ratepayers could after that if they thought proper authorize another rate There was nothing antagonistic in the clauses, both of which were copied from the old Act

The Hon Captain BAGOT said the true meaning of the clauses had, no doubt, been pointed out by the Hon the Chief Secretary, but at the same time he must say that he did not think the meaning was at all clearly expressed in the clauses 73, 74, and 75 He believed that the intention of the 73rd clause was to give the District Councils power to levy a rate of one shilling in the pound without the consent or without consulting the ratepayers, but it did not appear so clear to him that it was intended after this had been done, that the ratepayers should levy another rate of a shilling in the pound. Such might be the meaning but he considered that Acts of Parliament should be so intelligible, that there could be no mistake as to their meaning. The objections which he had made to the wording of the clauses would, he thought, be found worthy of consideration, and he hoped the Chief Secretary would consent to postpone the clauses for reconsideration.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY could see no necessity for the postponement of the clauses, which had been in operation for some years, and had been found to work well. The Association of District Chairmen had not pointed out any objections to the clauses, and the observations of the Hon Captain Bagot really reminded him of gilding refined gold.

The Hon A. FORSTER thought the practical working of the Act was that the district ratepayers might decide upon a rate, and if that were not sufficient according to the views of the Council, then the Council availed themselves of the power to make a shilling rate. The object of the Act was that the ratepayers should make their own rate, and the Council reserved to themselves the right of supplementing that rate to the extent of two shillings in the pound. The ratepayers might levy any rate not exceeding two shillings, including the one shilling rate made by the Council. He did not see from a perusal of the clauses, if the intention were such as he had stated, that such intention could not be carried out. If a one shilling rate were adopted by the Council, the ratepayers could only adopt another rate to the extent of one shilling; but if no rate were adopted by the Council, then the ratepayers might determine upon a rate so long as it was below two shillings. He thought there would be no difficulty in carrying out that intention, as the clauses at present stood, but if the Hon Captain Bagot could suggest any alterations which would render the intention more clear, he should be happy to concur with them.

The Hon Captain BAGOT still contended that the clauses were not so clearly worded as they might be. The Chief Secretary had stated that the 73rd clause gave power to the District Councils to declare a rate of one shilling, but that had certainly not always been the case.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN said that repeatedly, without reference to the 75th clause, a rate had been declared under the 73rd clause.

The Hon Captain BAGOT said a farthing rate was frequently declared—in fact a rate of that character became proverbial. The principle was no doubt all very well, but he must still contend that the meaning was not so clearly expressed as it ought to be in an Act of Parliament.

The Hon MAJOR O'HALLORAN had never known a District Council, in the face of a public meeting, afterwards establish a rate, but many rates had been declared without any reference to the ratepayers.

The Hon H. AYERS thought, after the explanation which had been given, that the clause might be assented to, and the clause was passed as printed.

Also, with verbal amendments, clauses to 101.

Clause 102 was verbally amended, to make it perfectly clear that no lands within a municipality were under the care of a District Council.

Clause 103 provided that private roads, although only 30 feet wide, might be conveyed to a District Council.

The Hon Dr EVERARD thought this highly objectionable, as a private road only 10 feet wide might be thrown upon a District Council.

The clause was verbally amended and passed. Also clauses to 105.

Clause 106 provided that District Councils might grant licences to cut timber upon the whole or any part of the waste lands and unsold common lands of the Crown within the district.

The Hon Captain BAGOT said it had been suggested to him by several parties who took an interest in the Act, that the Council should also have the control of the quarries, and he would therefore suggest the addition or insertion of the words, "and to quarry or remove stone therefrom." Frequently stone was raised in one district for use in another district.

The Hon A. FORSTER fully concurred in the proposed amendment, but did not see how it could be accomplished exactly by the proposed addition to the clause under discussion.

The Hon the SURVEYOR-GENERAL pointed out that it would be exceedingly unadvisable to confer any such power upon the District Councils as might prevent the Central Road Board from getting stone. He thought perhaps it was advisable to give the District Councils the power proposed, as he saw by the clause that it would only be subject to such rules as might be made by the Governor, though that possibly might only tend to make the matter more complicated.

The Hon Captain BAGOT said that although the District Councils already had the control of the timber, there was nothing to prevent the Central Road Board from going upon the lands and taking what timber they required.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY saw no objection to the amendment proposed by the Hon Captain Bagot, and the clause as amended was carried.

Clause 107, relating to fees to be charged by District Councils, was postponed.

Clauses to 113 were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 114 provided that any cattle above the age of 12 months unbranded became the property of the District Council within the limits of which they were found.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN thought that under this clause the owners of cattle would be subject to very heavy losses, as designing persons might let the cattle out at night for the purpose of obtaining from the District Council the reward of ten shillings per head.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the remedy rested with the owner, who had only got to brand the cattle.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN said it would be very hard in some cases if an owner were compelled to brand his cattle.

The Hon SAMUEL DAVENPORT said that a great number of valuable animals were imported, the owners of which objected to brand them. Some were in the habit of marking them upon the horn, but that was not deemed sufficient, what was understood by a brand being upon the skin. He thought if the clause were to run, "cattle left at large," the difficulty suggested by the Hon Major O'Halloran would be met.

The Hon J. MORPHETT did not know that it was necessary the brand should be upon the skin. He believed, if the brand were upon the horn the cattle would not come under the operation of the Act.

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought the clause quite unnecessary, as ample provision was made in the Impounding Act. It was quite unnecessary to give these almost despotic powers to District Councils.

The Hon the SURVEYOR-GENERAL remarked that it was merely proposed to transfer the power from the Crown to the District Councils.

The Hon S. DAVENPORT thought in practice it would be found different, as the Crown had rarely made use of the power, but such might not be the case with the District Councils, particularly with the bonus offered. Great oppression and evil might result. The District Councils, under the Impounding Act, had a right to do what a private individual had—impound cattle found trespassing—and he thought this was sufficient. Where cattle runs adjoined districts, great injury might be done to the stock and the owner by the operations of this clause, as there was always a certain percentage of cattle over 12 months' old which escaped branding. As the District Councils possessed all the powers possessed by private individuals under the Impounding Act, he thought this clause unnecessary.

The Hon H. AYERS referred to Act No 5, showing that stray cattle, beyond the age of 12 months, became the property of the Colonial Government.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN thought the clause would be an inducement to parties to drive cattle off during the night, for the purpose of getting the reward of 10s per head.

The Hon Capt BAGOT said that when the Act which had been referred to by the Hon H. Ayers was passed, there were numbers of unbranded cattle throughout the province, and the Act was passed for the purpose of giving them an owner, and not for the purpose for which this clause had been introduced. The best thing that could be done, he believed, would be to strike out the clause, and he would move that it be struck out.

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN seconded the proposition.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY pointed out that this clause was part of the old Act, and it was not merely for the identity of cattle that it was necessary to brand them but there was another object, which was to prevent parties from swearing falsely in a court of justice. The object was to impress upon owners the necessity of branding their cattle. It had long been the law, and had never been complained of as a dangerous innovation.

The Hon Dr EVERARD said that unless the word "registered" were introduced he should certainly vote that the clause be expunged. Cattle at large were frequently taken possession of by parties who really had no claim to them, and who put on a sort of brand which amounted to nothing—a mere sear with a hot iron, yet sufficient to prevent the District Council from touching them, and after a certain time the parties put brands upon them. He should be glad to see the Branding Act, which had never been repealed, brought into active operation.

The clause was struck out.

Clauses to 126 were verbally amended.

A new clause was introduced by the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, providing that clerks to District Councils should perform certain duties under the Electoral Act.

Clauses to 161 were passed with verbal amendments.

Clause 162, providing that persons taking into their possession unbranded cattle and not giving notice, should be liable to a fine, was struck out.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of Message No 5, transmitting copies of two despatches from the Secretary of State, of date 9th October and 2nd November, relative to the special claims of South Australia in connection with the question of postal communication with Great Britain. Also, further correspondence from the Government of this colony upon the same subject.

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the despatch in connection with documents laid upon the table on the previous day was ordered to be printed

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL—IN COMMITTEE

Clauses to 186 were passed without discussion

Clause 187,

The Hon H Ayers pointed out that by this clause, if the rates were in arrear for the period of one year, the land might be sold by the District Council He thought the time too short, and would suggest that two years be substituted for one

The amendment was adopted

Clause 188

The Hon Captain Freeling pointed out that this clause gave great powers to the District Councils, as it provided that every map prepared by a District Council under the authority of the Act should be prima facie evidence in every court, or before any tribunal in reference to any roads or reserves of which the District Council shall have the control and management In many instances he was aware that the maps were most inaccurate, but if they were to be taken as evidence great injury would result to the parties interested The roads and reserves might be erroneously placed on the map There should be some modification he thought of the clause, so as to ensure accuracy in the maps before they were received as prima facie evidence in courts of law

The Hon J Morphett thought that the proper course would be for the District Councils to get their maps certified by the Surveyor General

The Hon the Chief Secretary would have no objection to adopt any amendment of the kind suggested by the Hon the Surveyor-General

The Hon J Morphett proposed an amendment to the effect that the maps should be certified by the Surveyor-General of the province, which was carried

The remaining clauses having been verbally amended, the Hon the Chief Secretary stated that he wished to recommit several clauses, and the Chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on the following day

Wednesday, December 15

The Speaker took the Chair shortly after 1 o'clock

EAST TORRENS

Mr Mildred presented a petition from the Chairman and Council of the District of East Torrens, praying that they might be heard at the bar of the House in reference to alleged malignments by the Commissioner of Public Works, to the effect that the Council had obtained money by fictitious means from the Government The petitioners urged that the works executed by the Council were fully equivalent to the aid which had been afforded by the Government

The Commissioner of Public Works asked if the expression, "malignments by the Commissioner of Public Works," could be considered respectful language

The Speaker said it was certainly not respectful, independently of which the petition was informal, there being no prayer to it, and consequently it could not be received, even if the language had not been disrespectful

The Commissioner of Public Works reminded the hon member (Mr Mildred) that there was a Standing Order to the effect that an hon member, before presenting a petition, should read it, to see that it was respectfully worded, and certify that it was so to the House

The Speaker remarked that hon members should be careful in doing so

Mr Mildred was under the impression that the petition was respectfully worded, so far as the House was concerned, although there might be a word offensive to an individual member of the House

The Speaker said that when the conduct of any member of that House was impugned it must be in respectful language The House was insulted by any member of the House being insulted by the language in which a petition presented to the House was couched

Mr Strangways wished to know whether a petition concerning a member of that House though not in his capacity of member, would be considered disrespectful because it appeared to him that the expression complained of in the petition which had just been presented referred to the Commissioner of Public Works, not as a member of that House, but merely as Commissioner of Public Works

The Speaker said that the Constitution Act provided that the Commissioner of Public Works must be a member of that House All public documents should be in courteous language, but irrespectively of that there was no prayer to the petition under discussion, and consequently it could not be received

BAROSSA

Mr Bakewell presented a petition signed by 200 residents in the vicinity of Barossa, the prayer being that the House would cause a main line of road to be added to the list of main lines in the Land Bill

The petition was received and read

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr Reynolds gave notice that on the following Friday he should move the report of the Select Committee on Railway Management be considered, with the view of adopting an address to His Excellency the Governor, praying him to abolish the Board of Railway Commissioners

MITCHAM

Mr Reynolds gave notice that on the following Wednesday he should move the petition recently presented by him from the ratepayers of Mitcham be taken into consideration

IMPRISONED DEBTORS

The Attorney-General gave notice that on the following day he should move for leave to introduce a Bill for the enlargement of imprisoned debtors who had not the means of paying the fees The hon gentleman intimated that he also intended to move the suspension of the Standing Orders in order that the Bill might be passed through its various stages as expeditiously as possible The subject had recently been brought under his notice, and as it affected the liberty of the subject he thought the House would deem it of sufficient importance to justify them in suspending the Standing Orders

VOTES OF PARLIAMENT

The Treasurer gave notice that on the following day he should move the excesses on the votes of Parliament during 1857 be considered in Committee of the whole House

BAROSSA

Mr Bakewell gave notice that on the following Tuesday he should move the petition presented by him from the residents of Barossa and neighborhood be printed

REGISTRATION OF TITLES

Mr Lindsay gave notice that he should on the following day ask the Attorney-General if an alteration could not be advantageously effected in the law relating to Registration of Titles

MR B H BABBAGE

Mr Barrow gave notice that on the following day he should move the name of Mr Neales be discharged from the Select Committee, upon the petition of Mr B H Babbage, and that the name of Mr Mildred be substituted

BOWDEN

Mr Cole gave notice that on the following Friday he should move the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the expediency of presenting an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, praying that the sum of £300 might be placed on the Estimates for the purpose of constructing a level crossing at Bowden

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS

Mr Milne gave notice, that on the following Friday he should move the index to the votes and proceedings of that House from 1851 to 1856, prepared by the Clerk of the House during the last recess be printed during the ensuing recess

The Speaker said it was already understood that this should be done

EAST TORRENS

The Commissioner of Public Works said that in consequence of the action taken by the District Council of East Torrens, he begged to lay upon the table certain papers and correspondence and moved that they be printed He should have placed them on the table upon the previous day, but he was desirous that another document which had not yet reached him, but which was referred to in the documents, should be printed with them The documents were ordered to be printed, the hon gentleman intimating that when the document to which he had referred reached him he would move that it be printed also

LICENSED VICTUALLERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Mr Bakewell moved that this Bill be read a third time

Mr McEllister seconded the motion

Mr Lindsay wished before the question was put, to call the attention of the House to a very long clause which had been introduced by the hon member for Burra and Clare. He had read the clause three times, but still had great difficulty in understanding it in consequence of it being so unnecessarily verbose Since the Attorney-General had come forward in the character of a law reformer he would suggest to the hon gentleman the possibility of making it more intelligible, and at the same time reduce it into a smaller compass Country Justices he was quite sure would be puzzled by the clause, but if it was allowed to stand as it was, they would have to understand it the best way they could He believed that the Attorney-General could readily reduce the clause to one-tenth of its present length The only argument he had heard attempted in favor of this long clause was, that it had been copied from an English Act, but he did not think it was the duty of that House to adopt clauses merely because they appeared in English Acts If the law could be clearly explained without resorting to such lengthy clauses as that to which he had alluded, the better and more convenient it would be He had looked through the French code of laws, which had been found sufficient to rule thirty or forty millions of persons for the last 50 years, and throughout the whole code there was not a single clause so lengthy and verbose as this He would suggest that the Bill should be withdrawn for the present, for the purpose of affording the Attorney-General an opportunity of curtailing the clause

Mr REYNOLDS said that a motion had been tabled the other day for the appointment of a Parliamentary draughtsman, and he would really advise the hon member for Encounter Bay to offer himself for the appointment, and if the hon member were successful, the House might rely upon having far shorter Bills brought forward than hitherto, that is, if the hon member's speeches were to be taken as a sample of what his Bills would be (Laughter)

Mr BAKEWELL said that the clause which had been referred to had been copied from an English Act which had been in operation for a number of years, and was well understood The fact of such being the law was proof that it was understood He had read the clause carefully, and did not believe that a sentence could be altered It embodied a great variety of subjects, and was a clause of such a character as was exceedingly difficult to draw It was not until after he had compared clauses which had been prepared by several legal gentlemen for the purpose of meeting the difficulties of the case, that he had determined upon adopting the English Act Under such circumstances he thought it would be a pity that the clause should be altered in any way

The Bill was then read a third time and passed

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved the third reading of the Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill

Mr REYNOLDS said that he had one or two motions on the paper before the Bill in question, and if the Government pressed forward Government business upon days not specially set apart for the consideration of such, he did not see how the members on his side of the House would be able to get through the business which they had in hand

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said if the hon member for the Sturt intended to press his objection, he should certainly have raised it in the first instance when the third reading of the Licensed Victuallers Act Amendment Bill was moved

OCEAN MAIL STEAMERS

Mr MACDERMOTT wished, before the notices of motion were called on, to ask the Treasurer if the Government were prepared to take steps to afford facilities to ocean mail steamers to anchor at the Lightship, and for landing mails and passengers

The TREASURER said if the hon member would give notice of the question, he should be prepared to answer it on the following day

COMPENSATION TO MR J M STUART

Mr PEAKE asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands if the Government intended to take further action respecting compensation to Mr J M Stuart for his recent discoveries in the North If the hon gentleman was not prepared at once to answer the question, notice should be given He thought it would be a great relief to Mr Stuart to know what course the Government intended to take now that the Bill to secure him the advantages contemplated by the Government had been rejected by the Upper House He believed that Mr Stuart was staying in town at great loss and inconvenience to himself, with the view of ascertaining the intentions of the Government upon the subject

Mr STRANGWAYS, before the question was answered, would like to hear whether it would not be competent for the Governor to issue a lease to Mr Stuart of the amount of waste lands determined upon by that House in conformity with the existing regulations, and to permit Mr Stuart, in accordance with the resolution of that House, to have four years to stock the runs, and whether the resolution of that House would not be considered sufficient to justify the Government in foregoing the rent for a period of seven years If this could be done it appeared to him that there was no necessity for passing a Bill

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that the Government had the subject of compensation to Mr Stuart under consideration, and were prepared to take such steps as were in their power to carry out in its integrity the original proposition made to Mr Stuart In reference to what had fallen from the hon member for Encounter Bay, he was of opinion, and so he believed was the hon the Attorney-General that an alteration of the existing regulations would effect the purpose by enabling a lease to be granted to Mr Stuart in terms of the original offer made by the Government, but the lease could only be for 14 years, the regulations preventing any lease being granted for a longer period, but by the Bill which had been introduced, and which had been rejected by the Upper House, it was in fact proposed to give Mr Stuart a lease for 18 years, because he was to be allowed four years for stocking the runs, and then to have a lease for 14 years Such a lease could not be granted under the present Waste Lands Regulations without alteration

Mr REYNOLDS, in reference to the motion standing in his name—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the position held by the Honorable the Chief Secretary (Mr Younghusband) as member of the Harbor Trust Board, under the department of the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth), is anomalous, and may prevent that wholesome check over the department that the provisions of the Act of 1854 were intended to secure"

Said, that after the action taken by the House on the 10th December last, when they adopted an amendment proposed by the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Barrow), to the effect that it was not desirable that a responsible minister of the Crown should be a member of any Board entrusted with the expenditure of any portion of the revenue of the province, it was hardly necessary for him to press the motion, as no doubt, after such a resolution as that to which he had alluded having been arrived at by the House, the hon gentleman at the head of the Government would see the propriety of resigning his position in connection with the Harbor Trust He had no doubt that such would be the case after the strong opinion which had been expressed by the House upon the subject The House having affirmed that resolution, had, to all intents and purposes, affirmed the motion of which he had given notice, and he did not, therefore, deem it necessary to take up the time of the House by proceeding with the motion, which he begged to withdraw

Mr HAWKER moved—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to cause a thorough survey to be made of Lacepede Bay and its approaches, in accordance with the petition of the owners of land in that vicinity"

It was only necessary for him to say very few words in support of the motion There was a port upon a portion of the coast which might be made a harbor and a port of import and export All that the petitioners asked was that there might be a thorough survey Already surveyors had been sent down to Rivoli Bay, and no doubt the Government would readily assent to the motion, and the House pass it without opposition

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government felt so strongly the importance of the matter that they had instructed the party who had been sent to survey Rivoli Bay to survey Lacepede Bay also

Mr HAWKER, under such circumstances, withdrew the motion

CONTRACTS FOR WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE

Mr LINDSAY put the question standing in his name—

"That he will ask the Honorable the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether it is true that in the Gazette notice of 25th January, 1855, it was made a condition with the hydraulic engineers invited to send in plans, estimates, and specifications for the water supply and drainage of Adelaide that the 'pressure' should be 'sufficient not only to carry water to the top of the highest house, but also to throw a jet of not less than 100 gallons per minute 50 feet above the highest level of the town,' and whether it is also true that in the general report on the water supply and drainage of the city of Adelaide, in the joint names of the Honorable Captain Freeling and Messrs Hamilton and Hanson, it is stated that under the system recommended 4,200 gallons per hour (equal to only 70 gallons per minute) will be delivered at the extreme end of the 5 inch pipe in Hindley-street, and whether it is also true that the schemes of Messrs Macgeorge, Perryman, and others were rejected because they did not comply with all the 13 conditions of the Gazette notice aforesaid of 25th January, 1855"

He could assure the House that these were not mere idle questions He understood that certain conditions were published in the Gazette, under which plans and estimates were sent in, and what he wished to ascertain was whether these conditions had been adhered to One of the conditions was, that the pressure should be sufficient not only to carry water to the top of the highest house, but also throw a jet fifty feet above the highest level of the town Some of the tenders he understood were rejected, not because there was any particular defect in them, but that they did not comply with the 13 conditions with which he had understood the Surveyor General to state that any engineer could readily comply As the Waterworks question was still in some degree of confusion, and as arrangements might not perhaps be finally made, he wished to ask the questions of which he had given notice, in order that defects might be corrected if possible before matters had gone too far

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the question of the hon member for Encounter Bay might be divided into three heads To the first he replied "yes" To the second, "yes," and to the third "no" His answers would have been much more lengthy but that the answers would be found in the books of the library and on the table of the House

GOLD DIGGING

Mr REYNOLDS moved, the House having resolved itself into a Committee of the whole—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to suspend, for a period of three months, the collection of any fees for the privilege of searching and digging for gold on any of the waste lands of the Crown"

He believed that the licence-fee was very small, only ten shillings per month, but still he had been given to understand that there were a great number of laborers who would be induced to test the existence in paying quantities of gold at Hahndorf and other places, if no licence fee were imposed If for the ensuing three months the fee was remitted, he believed that great numbers would be induced to search for gold who would be deterred from doing so if a licence-fee were demanded He was sure, considering that the session was drawing to a close, that the House were not anxious to hear long speeches, and he would content himself by moving the motion in his name

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS did not think it desirable altogether to suspend the fees payable by diggers, but he should have no objection to reduce the fee for three months, say from 1st January next, to a nominal amount, say one shilling It was absolutely necessary that the officer stationed at the diggings should have some authority to go about and see what the men were doing, and he did not see that he would possess this power if the licence-fee were abolished altogether It was not advisable that men should be allowed to go rooting up the ground in all directions without there being any one on the spot armed with authority to exercise any control over their operations He would suggest an alteration to the effect he had stated

Mr REYNOLDS thought it would be better that no fee should be charged but that licences should be issued He thought the exigencies of the case would be better met by the abolition of the fees at the present time than at a future period If it were thought desirable, however, that the fees should not be abolished until the 1st January, he had no objection

Mr DUNN suggested that the 1st February would be a more suitable period than the 1st January, as the harvest was commencing, and if the fees were abolished the diggings would most likely swallow up a great deal of the labor which was required for the harvest If the fees were not abolished till the 1st February the harvest would be pretty well in by that time

Mr STRANGWAYS saw another objection to abolishing the licence-fee altogether, for amongst the lands known to be auriferous were sold lands, and he believed that a portion of the duty of the officer in charge of the gold fields was to see that private property was not trespassed on by the holders of licences If the fees were abolished that power would also be abolished, and it was certainly not desirable that such should be the case. He thought that it would not be desirable that the licence-fee should be abolished in the neighborhood of Echunga because it was known that there was a paying gold-field there—persons who had been at Echunga from the commencement finding the pursuit sufficiently remunerative to induce them to remain there But as to other localities he thought it was desirable that the licence-fee should be abolished where it was not known that the country was decidedly auriferous, and where it was not known that the precious metal could be obtained in paying quantities It was the opinion of many persons that the gold was not confined to the immediate neighborhood of Echunga, but that it would be found through the whole of the tiers to Mount Jarvis, and not long since he had been informed by Captain Crawford, who had obtained the command of the expedition to the Barrier Ranges, that if he had not obtained that command he intended to fit out a private party for the purpose of searching for gold amongst the tiers to which he had alluded Specks had already been found there, and Captain Crawford believed that it could be found in paying quantities A reduction of the licence-fee would probably induce many to search for gold who would not otherwise, and certain limits might be marked out within which the search could be prosecuted He would suggest that the motion be withdrawn

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS was just going to suggest that if the hon member for Sturt would withdraw his motion he should probably be enabled to meet the wishes of the hon member by causing the necessary steps to be taken to reduce the licence-fee to a nominal amount within certain limits of country In reference to what had fallen from the hon member for Encounter Bay relative to Mount Jarvis he believed there were grounds for believing that discoveries would be made there, and two men who had been sent out were engaged in the search, they having stated that they thought they knew where they were likely to obtain both gold and coal

Mr ROGERS trusted that in the abolition or reduction of the licence fee Echunga would not be excluded, as the general opinion was that there were large deposits of gold near there, and he thought the House should do all they could to encourage parties to go there and discover the lead Echunga was in his opinion the very place at which parties should be allowed to search without being subjected to the licence-fee

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS could not agree with the hon member for Mount Barker, because Echunga was recognised as a gold-field, although it was true that it was not yielding to any very great extent Many families were residing there, and had resided there for the last three or four years, and were making a very good living Where parties had settled down and were getting a good living, if they chose to work for it, he did not think there should be any reduction of the Licence fee The object of reducing the licensing fee was to induce parties to open up new ground

Mr PEAKE thought it would be wise to suspend the licence-fee for some time, in order that gold-fields on a large scale might be discovered, if possible That was the true course, to put no restrictions upon the finding of gold in the first instance It would be very easy when it was found in large quantities to attract a large population

Dr WARK thought that as the country was in a depressed state, every encouragement should be held out for the discovery of gold When people congregated together in numbers and required protection fees could be levied, but then no exceptions should be made as to the amount

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would allow persons in the first instance to search for gold, but when a gold-field was discovered, and persons congregated there and required protection he would exact a fee

Mr REYNOLDS, after the assurance of the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands, would withdraw his motion

Mr ROGERS thought if persons were allowed to search for gold at Echunga free of charge, they would be all the more likely to find a run of gold towards Cape Jarvis He was, therefore, opposed to any distinction being made

Mr PEAKE hoped the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands would not be led to suppose that there was anything very valuable to take care of at Echunga The last time he (Mr Peake) was there there were only a couple of "shanties" to protect, and these a couple of miles from the township. It was a very small affair, and from what he could learn the prospects of the place were not very brilliant nor the earnings very large, indeed the latter only amounted to as much as would keep the persons who were at work

The motion was then agreed to, and the House resumed

THE DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT

Mr LINDSAY, pursuant to notice, asked the hon the Attorney-General (Mr Hanson) whether the English law with respect to "estrays" is not also, as far as it can be applied, the law of this province , and also whether the 114th clause of the District Councils Bill of this session is or is not repugnant to the law of England

The hon member was about to make some remarks upon the question, but

The SPEAKER said the hon member must not argue a question He could only explain his reason for enquiry

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that the common law of England, unless altered by statute in England, or by ordinance, or enactment in this province, was the law here His opinion was that the clause was not repugnant to the law of England

HENRY SIMPSON, ESQ

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS rose to move—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to appoint Henry Simpson, Esq , a Trustee of the Harbor Trust, in the place of E. G Collinson, Esq , resigned "

By the 11th clause of the Harbor Trust, upon any vacancies occurring in the number of Trustees, it was lawful for the Governor, on the receipt of an address from either branch of the Legislature, to appoint the persons named in that address to fill the vacancy Such a vacancy having taken place by the resignation of a gentleman who was now fortunately a member of that House, the Government had selected a gentleman of the highest character for the appointment, whose name he now begged to submit to the Legislature

Mr MILDRED seconded the motion

Mr REYNOLDS asked whether there was not likely to be another vacancy shortly occasioned by the resignation of the hon the Chief Secretary as a member of the Board? If so, would it not be well to nominate some person to fill his place whilst dealing with this motion? He (Mr Reynolds) did not know whether the Trust would suffer if the vacancies were not filled at all There were four members of the Trinity Board besides the Chairman, or five in all, irrespective of the Chief Secretary and Mr Simpson Mr Simpson was a very proper person to recommend, if the vacancies must be filled, but he (Mr Reynolds) did not see the necessity of filling them

Mr STRANGWAYS thought that if vacancies occurred amongst members of the Harbor Trust who were not on the Trinity Board, they should be allowed to remain open The result would be that the Harbor operations would be entirely in the hands of the Trinity Board This Board would in future be obliged to apply annually to Parliament for a large sum, and if they could not account satisfactorily to the Legislature for the expenditure of their previous votes the House might refuse them more money The members of the Trinity Board would in this way be more responsible to the House than the Harbor Trust were

Mr BARROW thought if the Trust were to be abolished, it had better be done by a specific Act on the part of the Legislature and the Government, and not by a side wind The only question before the House was, as to the suitableness of Mr Simpson to fill the position formerly occupied by the hon member (Mr Collinson) , and it was admitted by the hon member (Mr Reynolds) who, at the same time, had doubts as to the desirableness of filling the vacancy, that Mr Simpson was a suitable person He (Mr Barrow) should support the motion as it stood

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that it would be the duty of His Excellency the Governor to receive an address of this kind from either branch of the Legislature, and the Government considered it desirable that the address should emanate from the Assembly If, however, the House could not agree on the point, the Government could not deprive the other branch of the Legislature of its undoubted right in the matter. If the House wished to abdicate its functions in favor of the other House, it was a matter of indifference to the Government, who had done their duty in bringing the matter before hon. members.

The motion was then agreed to.

LAND GRANTS BILL

The Attorney-General moved—

"That he have leave to introduce 'A Bill to remove doubts affecting the validity of certain land grants, and to facilitate the issuing of land grants, and to regulate the payment of fees thereon.'"

It appeared that many grants had been issued from time to time during the last two or three years, without being sealed by the great seal of the province. A lithographed copy of the seal had been substituted in these documents. As it would be scarcely possible to recal these grants, even if such a course was thought necessary, and as certain doubts might be raised as to the validity of the grants, it was thought necessary to bring in this Bill. There had also been various Acts passed imposing fees on the issue of land grants, and a question had arisen whether as land grants were now issued under the Real Property Act, the former Acts still continued to apply. Within a very recent period an attempt had been made to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court on this subject, and it was deemed expedient to prevent so frequent a source of litigation. The Act he now held in his hand provided for this object, and he moved for leave to introduce it.

Leave being given, the Bill was introduced, read a first time, and ordered to be printed, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

THE HARBOR TRUST

Mr Peake, pursuant to notice, moved—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to instruct or recommend to the Trustees for improving the Harbor of Port Adelaide, to advertise for tenders for deepening the inner bar to a depth commensurate with the depth already attained by steam-dredging at the outer bar, the contractor to have the use of the principal steam dredge, with its machinery and appurtenances, to be returned in good order on the completion of the contract, the contractor to find fuel and wages."

The motion arose chiefly in consequence of the declaration by the Harbor Trust of their intention to continue their policy of appropriating the balance of the £100,000 voted for the deepening and improving of the Harbor. He (Mr Peake) thought this determination of the Board was not in accordance with the Harbor Trust Act, nor did it evince so much deference to the implied wish of the House as should be shown. On the motion which he (Mr Peake) formerly tabled on this subject——

The Speaker said the hon. member must not refer to a previous debate of this session.

Mr Peake said the Trust had declared their intention not to expend this money in accordance with the vote of the House. The sum of £100,000 had been voted for certain works in an Act which passed the Legislature, founded on a motion of the 8th December, 1854. [The hon. member read the resolutions, which specified that the money was to be expended in making a channel with 18 feet of water over the outer and inner bars, and also in deepening the channel of the inner harbor.] It appeared to him that these resolutions so clearly expressed the object of the Legislature, that he was unable to see why there should be such a marked deviation from that object as was seen in the conduct of the Harbor Trust. He believed the conduct of the Trust to be wrong in policy and in fact. Of course it was for the House to say whether a policy was to be persevered in, which was in contravention of an Act so very clearly expressed. The Act had already been quoted in the House several times, so that it was unnecessary further to refer to it. It appeared that there was now a balance of some £26,000 in hand, whilst some £70,000 had been expended at the opposite end of the works to that contemplated by the Act, and that, instead of deepening the bars, the Trust had expended this amount in the deepening of the inner port. It appeared now that in addition to what they had previously done, the Harbor Trust intimated that they would not spend anything upon the inner bar, but would go on making a little hole in the outer bar, for all the rubbish loosened in the inner harbor to deposit itself in. He hoped the House would go with him in instructing the Trust to call for tenders for clearing the inner bar, in order that this work might be proceeded with immediately.

MESSAGE FROM THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

At this stage of the proceedings, a message was brought in from the Legislative Council.

The Speaker announced that the Legislative Council had agreed to the Parliamentary Privileges Bill with certain amendments.

The amendments were ordered to be considered next day.

HARBOR TRUST—DEBATE RESUMED

The Commissioner of Public Works said that in a Council Paper of last session, the total length of the inner bar was stated by Mr Abernethy, the engineer of the Harbor Trust. It also appeared from that document that to obtain 14ft. water over the bar would cost £33,475, and occupy 6½ years' time. From the character of Mr Abernethy these statements were entitled to much weight. If the hon. member (Mr Peake) thought that by advertising for tenders, they would arrive at any different results, he (the Commissioner of Public Works) could have no objection to the course proposed, though he was certain that if the plan were tried the estimates of Mr Abernethy would be borne out. But if the intention was that the whole of the £23,000 was to be spent upon the deepening of the inner bar, for which, according to Mr Abernethy, it would not be sufficient by £10,000, he thought it would be spending the money in a very unwise manner. The plan suggested in the Parliamentary Paper to which he (the Commissioner of Public Works) referred was, that the present harbor should be made level by the removal of all its little inequalities, and that the outer bar should be deepened to 16 feet at low water, and the expenditure was set down at which it was believed these objects could be accomplished. To spend the money on the inner bar would do no good, whilst it would necessitate leaving the Port in its present state, and also the outer bar, which was a very serious matter, as it would compel ships to lie in a very exposed position. He should oppose the motion, unless it was intended merely to obtain such information as he had referred to.

Mr Reynolds thought it desirable that the work should be left to public competition. His views upon that point were well known. When the Government paid by the day's work system, the work was very expensive, and this remark applied to Boards and Trusts as well as to Governments. There had been works executed on the railway by day labour, and very little was obtained for the money. He was inclined to think that work executed under a Commission or Trust which met once or twice a week, was very likely to be left to the care of subordinates who would not exercise the supervision or control which would be exercised by contractors. This money was voted in the first instance to deepen the outer and inner bar. That was the object of Mr Hare, and of the Bill passed by the Legislature. It was regarded as a matter of primary importance, and should therefore have been done before spending money upon the harbor itself. He did not say that the Harbor Trust had not done a great deal for Port Adelaide. He said on the contrary they had made the harbor a great deal better than it was, but 70,000 and odd pounds, could not be expended without improving the property on which it was laid out. No doubt the Harbor Trust had improved Port Adelaide, and some portions of the harbor more than others. He did not therefore deny the good they had done, but the deepening of the bar was a primary matter, and should have been undertaken first. He supported the motion, first, because he thought the Trust should carry out the Act, and next, because he believed it would be a benefit to the public that the work should be subjected to competition, for although Mr Abernethy said it would cost £30,000, it was often found that professional men's estimates were too high, and sometimes they were too low. The work might cost the amount set down by Mr Abernethy, but he (Mr Reynolds) did not believe it would.

Mr Cole supported the motion. He thought the more hon. members reflected as to how the management of these improvements should be conducted, the more convinced they would be that the Harbor Trust commenced at the wrong end. He could not arrive at any other conclusion than that the Trust had done wrong, though he did not mean to say that there was anything criminal in the matter. But gentlemen sometimes erred in judgment. He was particularly struck with one statement in the Council Paper, referred to by the hon. the Commissioner of Public Works, that when the amount to be spent was but £23,000, the item of management and office expenses, including fees, amounted to £3,610, or about one-seventh of the gross amount. This seemed to indicate most improvident and costly management.

Mr Mildred also supported the motion. He believed the first consideration of the Trust should be to afford facilities to vessels to pass the bar, as having passed this they were in some degree safe. In the early days of the colony no difficulties were anticipated from the condition of the inner harbor. Looking back to the time when Mr Laurie was engaging in blasting at the bars, hon. members might ascertain the cost of the work. He (Mr Mildred) believed the £23,000 or £24,000 now in hand would go far towards completing the work. Theoretically and practically he believed it better to clear the bars than to clear in front of Prince's Wharf, but as long as they allowed the silt disturbed in the inner harbor to be carried backwards and forwards by the tide, it must deposit itself upon the bars. The proper plan was to keep the embouchure as clear as possible, and allow the silt to pass out over an inclined plain.

The Attorney-General should oppose the motion unless it was made for the purpose of procuring information. He must again express, as he had expressed before, his total dissent from the views expressed by some hon. members. If the Trust had done what it was contended it should have done—if it deepened the bars so as allow vessels to come through them into the harbor, and then allowed these vessels to lie upon a limestone bottom, they would have damaged the port, and defeated the object they were appointed to attain more effectually than they could have done in any other way The first thing the Trust had to do was to take care that every vessel entering the Harbor should be able to lie there safely It was of no use to deepen the entering capacity of the bar beyond what was necessary for vessels which could lie safely inside it The Trust had done their best, and what they were warranted in doing by the Act The hon member for the Burra and Clare, Mr Peake, had referred to the Act He (the Attorney-General) had a most distinct recollection, and hon members who were in the Legislature at the time might have the same, that when the Act was proposed in its present form great objections were made to the principle supposed to be embodied in it It was supposed that it would compel the Commissioners to deepen the bars without making any provision for vessels being safe when they got inside But on full consideration it was found that the language of the Act implied nothing of the sort, that no priority was implied, and the Act was passed in its present form because it was believed that its language would not prevent the Trust from expending the money as they might think right

Mr Strangways was more than ever convinced in favor of the motion by the argument of the hon the Attorney-General, who said that certain parties (of course the hon member did not say who they were,) objected to the Act on the ground that it would compel the Commissioners to commence operations upon the bars But it appeared that the hon the Attorney-General, with his usual facility of drawing up Acts so that any construction could be put upon them, had drawn this one in such a manner that when it was passed it was found that another construction could be put upon it

The Attorney-General said he was sure the hon member would not wilfully misrepresent him, but what he stated was that, while the Act was under discussion—not after it was passed—a certain conclusion was arrived at

Mr Strangways thought the explanation was not the same which the hon member had given before, and that it did not greatly differ from what he (Mr Strangways) had stated One construction was put on the Act at one time, and another at another, whichever construction was most convenient, but he (Mr Strangways) believed it was the intention of the Government of the day—an intention borne out by the hon member for the Burra and Clare, that the bars were to be removed first, but the Harbor Trust spent upwards of £70,000 on the inner harbor, and then complained that they had not money enough to remove the bars Allusion had been made to the blasting operations of Mr Laurie, and he (Mr Strangways) believed that gentleman said the bars could be removed by blasting if the blasts were put down in a line But the blasts were buoyed, and the buoys of course swung with the tide, and the blasts only made holes The impression was that the strong tide would wash away the sand, almost a quicksand, from beneath, and that the limestone crust would then fall in, and could be removed by the dredge Whether that view was correct or not could, of course, only be decided by professional men But Mr Abernethy, it appeared now, considered it desirable to remove the limestone crust by blasting, and this agreed in the opinion held four or five years ago He (Mr Strangways) was certain it would be better to execute this work by private contract than through the Harbor Trust, and therefore he supported the motion

Mr Glyde opposed the motion, as he considered it ridiculous for the House to dictate to Boards upon matters of which the House could know very little, and because, from the little which he knew of the subject, he believed the Harbor Trust were conducting their affairs admirably He could readily imagine that it would be foolish to spend thousands in deepening the inner bar When a ship was once over the outer bar she was in perfect safety and could get into the inner harbor upon any high tide, but it was necessary that when she got inside she should have water to float her He did not profess to know much upon the matter, but it certainly appeared to him that the Harbor Board had acted in the wisest and most proper manner The question was discussed a few weeks ago and decided in favor of the Trust, and he could not therefore understand why his hon friend, the member for the Burra and Clare, should have raked it up again

Dr Wark would go with the motion With all due regard for the members of the Trust, and their honor and integrity, they had not spent the money exactly as it should have been spent, or as the country expected The hon the Attorney-General said it was useless to deepen the inner harbor, and allow vessels of heavy draught to pass over it, and then lie upon the rocks But he (Dr Wark) was not aware that there was any rock, and if so, it must be exceedingly little The Act was perfectly clear upon the point, whatever interpretation it might be sought to put upon it It was high time for the House to take action on the matter when three-fourths of the money was gone, the works having been executed in such an expensive manner that £70,000 had already been expended

Mr Solomon opposed the motion It was said the gentlemen of the Harbor Trust had expended the money where it was not intended that it should be spent It was a long time since the money was voted, but if hon members had ceased to place confidence in the Harbor Trust, the Trust was very easily done away with But although insinuations and innuendoes had been pointed at these gentlemen, and it was said or rather hinted they had availed of that money to improve their own properties, still not one of the gentlemen who imputed these motives indirectly, had even brought forward a case to show that any member of the Trust had acted improperly in the expenditure of this money The House had a right to suppose that these gentlemen (and he believed they always had done so) made it a point to ascertain what should be done from persons who were better able to judge of the matter than the hon member for Encounter Bay, who had treated the House to a long speech on a subject which it was evident he knew nothing about As a proof of this, the hon member had spoken of removing the limestone crust by disturbing the sand beneath it But he (Mr Solomon) believed that it was not known what was the depth of that crust, and therefore it was useless for the hon member to come there and talk upon a matter which not alone he, but the Harbor Trust, were not acquainted He (Mr Solomon) admitted that £3,600 seemed a very large sum for management, but he would not take it upon himself to judge that the amount was excessive, The Trust had done their duty well, and the opening of the inner bar should be left to a future time when the Government could state what amount should be given for the purpose, but at present the money could not be better spent than in completing the work which had been so ably begun

Mr Hay was surprised at some statements of the hon member, especially at that in which he expressed his belief that the thickness of the limestone crust was not known If not, it was high time that it was made known The hon member, whilst making a case out in favour of the Trust, had made one directly against them, as these gentlemen should have known long ago the thickness of the crust, and the probable expense of deepening the bars Deepening the bars to such an extent that vessels of any tonnage could come as near as possible to the landing-places, and then deepening further up seemed to him (Mr Hay) the proper course to pursue He clearly saw the necessity of deepening the inside bar, for however deep the water might be inside the bar, it was useless until the bar was also cut down This was particularly the case now that the mail steamers were about calling here, and when some of them might want to go into the Port He remembered under the old contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, one of the steamers being detained for 24 hours because there was not water to get out over the bar, and this might happen again He believed if the inner bar was deepened the tide flowing out would tend to deepen the outer bar, but whilst on the inner bar at some times of tide there were but eight or nine feet of water, no current through it could affect anything outside at a greater depth If this money was spent on the inner harbor the House would at a future time be asked for a sum for the inner bar

Mr Milne recommended to the hon member's (Mr Solomon's) perusal the report of Mr Abernethy, which showed that the Harbor Trust knew not only what the inner bar consisted of, but also what would be the cost of removing it The hon member would find from that report that the hon member (Mr Strangways) was right in saying that the limestone crust was over sand He (Mr Milne) had said on a previous occasion that it was the duty of the Trust to spend the money on the bar, and he thought with respect to the private interests in the upper part of the harbor, that they should look after themselves The bars were of universal interest to all vessels entering the harbor He supported the motion

Mr Lindsay scarcely knew how to vote (A laugh) He had no wish to throw blame upon the Trust, and yet it appeared to him that the provisions of the Act had not been carried out, as the clearance of the bars seemed the principal thing to be attained in the first instance He objected to deepening opposite private property, but if it was to be done, he would be glad to see the remainder expended opposite his property a little higher up the harbor He must correct the hon member for Gumeracha as to a vessel's having been detained 24 hours for want of water, as there was but a twelve hours' interval between the tides

Mr Duffield did not think asking for tenders would be the best mode of action, inasmuch as if he was the owner of such an expensive piece of machinery as the dredge, he would not like to entrust it to any contractor He would suggest that the motion should merely express an opinion that the money should be expended upon the bar, though this would come so near a previous resolution of the House, that he (Mr Duffield) did not know whether it would be in order From the reports of Mr Abernethy, he thought that nearly the whole of the work on the bar could be done for this £24,000 The least depth of water was at the two ends of the bar, and it appeared that 2 feet 6 inches additional water could be gained by the removing 1,600 yards That might be procured by the end of two years, (though he could not understand why the entire work should require six years,) and would cost £33,000, so that the House might be asked for £10,000 more than the sum now in hand The hon member (Mr Solomon) had brought forward a strange argument, viz, that the money should be spent where (he had taken down the hon member's own words) all that was necessary was done He believed there was great difficulty in the way of vessels getting in and out, and that the Orient, a regular trader here, had been lying outside several days not because she could not lie in the Port, but because she could not get over the bar

The Speaker here said this motion was similar to one which had been negatived a short time since, and could not therefore be proceeded with

Messrs Milne, Peake, and Strangways having expressed their dissent from this ruling,

The Speaker suggested that the sense of the House should be taken on the point

Mr Strangways accordingly moved, "That in the opinion of this House the question now before the House is not the question previously submitted to the House"

Mr Peake seconded the motion

The House divided, when there appeared—

Ayes 15—Messrs Peake, Lindsay, Duffield, Reynolds, Mildred, Barrow, Cole, Wark, McEllister, Hay, Rogers, Milne, Harvey, Townsend, and Strangways (teller)

Noes 11—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Hawker, Burford, Glyde, Macdermott, Solomon, Hallett, Collinson, and the Attorney-General (teller)

Mr Barrow said he had voted with the Ayes because he had no doubt that the question, though connected with the question which was before the House on a former occasion, was by no means the same That question was with reference to the deepening of the bars and this was whether the work should be done by tender or in any other way He mentioned this partly in order to afford him the opportunity of stating that he saw no harm in the motion, even taking it from the stand-point which the Government had adopted If the Board called for tenders, they would of course say that they were not bound to accept the lowest or any tender, and they might leave matters to move on as before (Laughter) There was nothing to compel the Trinity Board to accept any tender, so that the motion if carried, could do no harm, and might do some good He would be sorry to give a vote which might seem to imply any want of confidence in the Trinity Board, and as this was a matter which involved so much detail, and so many questions of practical experience, he was not ashamed to say he did not possess the information which would enable him, in the hasty manner in which the House was called to give its decision, to express an opinion upon it He considered it exceedingly unfortunate that the House had not confidence in the machinery which it appointed to carry out its arrangements, or that that machinery was so unfortunately managed The House appointed and liberally endowed a Harbor Trust, and then they were dissatisfied before the work was completed They sent an exploring party up to the north, and just as triumphant success was about to crown its labours, it was recalled (Loud laughter) They were always setting up some organization or other, and before its object was accomplished, destroying it again If the Trinity Board failed in its duty it should be censured, but he was not at all satisfied upon that point He saw no harm, however, in calling for tenders, inasmuch as if they appeared advantageous for the public service they could be accepted, and if not, the Board was not bound to accept them

Mr Hawker opposed the motion, which he regarded as a vote of censure upon the Board It was quite as much so as the motion brought forward some time since. He could not agree with the hon member for East Torrens, who said the vote could do no harm and might do good The Board had not done their duty in not calling for tenders if they considered that such a course would be advantageous to the public interests He should oppose the motion

Mr Townsend did not look upon the passing of this motion as entailing any want of confidence in the gentlemen composing the Harbor Trust, inasmuch as votes of instructions were very often passed to Committees of that House which no one of course would interpret as want of confidence, He looked upon this motion which would convey an opinion on the part of the House, that the unexpended balance appropriated to the Harbor Trust should be spent in deepening the inner bar, as a vote of instructions, and not as tending in any way to imply censure upon the Trustees

Mr Burford considered the motion as implying a direct vote of censure upon the Harbor Trustees, and as the subject sought to be gained would not, if accomplished, tend in his opinion to bring about any beneficial result, he should vote against the motion

Mr Peake in reply said he did not understand the hypersensitiveness which seemed to haunt the minds of some hon members He could not see how this motion could imply any want of confidence in the members of the Harbor Trust, and he would throw back upon those hon members the insinuations which had been made to that purport In a case such as the present, when it had been so clearly shewn that the expenditure was in contravention of the provisions of the Act by which the supplies were granted, he thought it imperative that the House should assert its views and provide for the intentions of the Act being carried out in their integrity There could be no doubt that the expenditure had not been strictly in pursuance of instructions, and he could not understand why implications of the nature he had referred to should have been indulged in by hon members The hon member for the city (Mr Solomon) had lectured the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) upon his presuming to give an opinion upon what he did not understand, but he (Mr Peake) thought the hon member for the city had betrayed far less knowledge, for he did not even seem to know the Council Paper in which the opinion of the Engineer was set forth The hon member for the city had said it was not necessary to deepen the inner bar, and that preference should be given to the deepening of the harbor, because, if large ships came over the bar, there would not then be a sufficient depth of water for them to lie in, but he (Mr Peake) would call the attention of the House to the fact that there was already 20 to 21 feet of water in the harbor, which would surely accommodate very large sized vessels He had seen some of the largest ships—he might mention the Catherine Stuart Forbes—("No, no," and a laugh, from the Commissioner of Public Works)—lying in the harbor with perfect safety Then perhaps if this vessel were not to be considered as a specimen of magnitude, the Commissioner of Public Works would tell them of much larger vessels (A laugh) An argument had been used by the Commissioner of Public Works, that they should not spend the remaining £23,000 in the manner proposed, because it would not be enough but he (Mr Peake) thought that although Mr Abernethy had said the sum was not sufficient, it would be better to spend it, and come to the House for any balance that might be required He remembered that when the opinion of Mr Laurie was taken on this question that gentleman said he could deepen a channel 120 feet wide for about £7,000 If a width of 120 feet could be deepened for such a sum, they should not, he thought, forego that advantage, because they had not sufficient to carry out the work to completion Then again, Mr Laurie had said that after blasting the limestone crust they would come upon a great deal of silt and quicksands Assuming this to be correct, he could conceive that the deepening of the channel for a width of only 120 feet would result in considerable benefit He hoped the House would agree to the motion

The Speaker put the question, and declared the noes had it

Mr Peake called for a division, of which the following was the result—

Ayes, 14—Messrs Milne, Hay, McEllister, Rogers, Barrow, Cole, Duffield, Wark, Strangways, Townsend, Mildred, Reynolds, Lindsay, Peake (teller)

Noes, 13—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Hallett, Bakewell, Hawker, Bagot, Collinson, Macdermott, Burford, Solomon, Glyde, the Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

The motion was consequently carried by a majority of 1

GREAT EASTERN OR MAGILL ROAD

The House went into Committee on the motion of the hon member for Onkaparinga (Mr Townsend) for the "consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, praying him to cause the sum of £5,000 to be placed on the Estimates for the construction of the Great Eastern or Magill-road"

Mr Townsend said it would be found by the journals of the House that the road in question had been declared a main line, and that the Central Road Board had recognised it as such He asked for £5,000, by the expenditure of which in a distance of 24 miles, one sixth of that distance would be saved If an objection was made to this being a special vote, he would reply that its speciality was very well excused from the fact of the road in question having been declared a main line, and on the faith of which many persons had bought land By opening this line of road, 30,000 to 40,000 acres of land would probably be realized upon by the Government It would equally answer his purpose if the money were handed over to the Central Road Board, to be expended in the manner proposed

The Commissioner of Public Works said, when the question had on a former occasion been discussed, he had promised to obtain information as to the probable cost, and he had since received a report from Mr Alfred Hardy, the Surveyor of the South-eastern District, which was as follows—

"December 14, 1858

"Sir—I beg to inform you for the information of the Commissioner of Public Works, that the estimated cost for opening up the line of road from Norton's summit, to Lobethal is £35,000 In reference to the proposed appropriation of £5,000 for works along the above portion of the Main Eastern Road, I have to state that the sum of £5,000, if employed in continuing on the newly formed road just completed as far as Norton's Summit, would be sufficient to construct about one-seventh of the distance between Norton's Summit and Lobethal, but if the same amount is expended along the whole length of the portion of the road in question, it will enable the Board to cut a bridge track between Norton's Summit and Lobethal, and also to bridge or otherwise make available crossing over the Deep Creek and the other numerous watercourses intersecting the line along this portion of the road, but the works in connection with the making good the crossing of the watercourses can only be looked upon as of a temporary nature, and not as a portion of the permanent works

"I have, &c,

"Alfred Hardy

"To the Chairman of the Central Road Board"

From this it would be perceived that the sum proposed would only be sufficient to construct a mere bridle path from Norton's Summit to Lobethal, and that the bridges, which would be of the most temporary character, would in any future improvement have to be taken down and rebuilt This subject had come before the Central Road Board, and it had been felt, considering the wants of the colony at large—about £250,000 per annum, not more than one-half of which had hitherto been received—that the Board would not be warranted in voting any considerable sum for this line of road, to the exclusion, as it would be, of other parts of the colony where improvements were more imperative. He might state that the gradients on the line in question which were included in the report were in many cases as great as 1 in 10 and 1 in 11, a rate which would involve a very considerable expenditure in construction

Mr MILNE was surprised at the statement made in the report that it would take £35,000 to construct this line He looked upon that as a bugbear to frighten the House out of granting the £5,000 But, instead of wanting a macadamised road from end to end, all the inhabitants asked for was access to the property which they had purchased, on the faith of this line being constructed With regard to the action of the Central Road Board, he was not surprised at it, for if hon members perused the schedule of appropriation of the £25,000 voted, they would find the largest portion of it was for metalling, and while so large a proportion of the money at disposal was appropriated to the maintenance of roads, the Board found it would be impossible to give £5,000 for the construction of this line. It was therefore found necessary to come to that House He was convinced the £5,000 would be spent advantageously, and that it would return double or treble that amount to the Treasury With that view he would vote for the motion

Mr DUNN thought the £5,000 would only be a first instalment, as the gradients were so steep that it could not possibly provide for more than a bridle path It might be recollected by hon members that this subject was agitated before, when Mr John Baker was a member of the Central Road Board, and persons in the country then called this road not the road to Lobethal, but the road to Morialta (Laughter) That gentleman not being able to carry his projects, took huff, and retired from the Board A meeting was subsequently held at Mount Lofty, when it was decided that the road would be useless, except as leading to Mr John Baker's paddock While speaking of this, he might advert to one folly of the Central Road Board—perhaps it might be attributed to the Chief Inspector—it was, that when the Gumeracha line was being laid out, at a great waste of public money, two lines of road, running parallel, were constructed, only three miles apart, and leading to the same terminus If the money asked for were likely to do any benefit to Upper Onkaparinga, where many of his relations lived, he should, of course, have voted for it (Laughter) On this question being agitated before, he had met some friends interested in the subject at a small evening party (laughter), and it was there said " all we want is a good passable road " He should vote against this motion, if £5,000 were spent it would lead to no good result, the road would be as impassable as before, it would only save three miles in 30, and though it might suit the Magill people, and a few persons in the tiers, it would not benefit those living in the district of the Onkaparinga

Mr BARROW did not look upon the advantages to be derived from this expenditure in shortening the distance so much as in the enhanced value of the land which would thereby be laid open The last speaker had instanced a case where he said an injustice had been perpetrated, and, however extraordinary the doctrine might be, he seemed to infer that injustice ought therefore to be perpetrated in this instance. He (Mr Barrow) would vote for this motion, though not to satisfy his constituents as some one had tauntingly remarked, for they were divided upon the point—one portion of them being in favor of this particular line, and another being attached to the line by way of the Greenhill,—so that, on whichever side he voted, he should meet with the approbation of at least one portion of his constituency He was, however, surprised that hon members should be taunted with voting to satisfy their constituents (A laugh) He voted for this motion because the road had already been declared a main line, and faith should be kept with the public It would, as well as shortening the distance, enhance the value of the land along the line

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the question should be left to the management of the Central Road Board, and if it were considered by the House that an extra £5,000 could be afforded, it should be handed over to the Board for disposal He thought, however, that no such money could be spared, and that, if otherwise, no grounds had been shown for making a special vote He would point out that there was a sum of £1,100 on the Schedule of Appropriation of the Central Road Board as being the portion available for the Magill-road

Mr GLYDE moved that the House divide.

Mr DUFFIELD rose to speak, but

The CHAIRMAN put Mr Glyde's motion, and declared it carried

Mr DUFFIELD cried " divide "

There was consequently a division as to whether the question should be then put, which resulted in a tie, the Chairman giving his casting vote with the noes

Mr DUFFIELD would not occupy the time of the House long, and would not have addressed it at all but for a statement of the hon member for Mount Barker, which he (Mr Duffield) as a member of the Central Road Board, thought proper to refer to That hon member had said the Central Road Board declared the road in question a main line, but it would be found this was incorrect, as the Parliament had declared it a main line, the duty of the Board only being to spend such amounts as were voted on the lines previously declared The hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) had referred to a sum of £1,500 on the appropriation list of the Central Road Board, but this was only to be given conditionally on the larger sum being voted by the Parliament, as it would otherwise be perfectly useless He opposed the motion because there would not be such an extent of available country laid open as had been stated, and, what there was, was for the most part inaccessible. There were lines of road leading with little deviation to the same point already He could not see that they would be justified in voting a sum of £5,000 to do that which it was said, and which he believed, it would take £35,000 to do

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he could not see any reason for a special vote in this instance As to the assertion that certain parties had purchased land on the faith of a road being constructed, he could only say that the House had no proof of such being the case If a petition were presented to that effect, he for one, should have no objection to its consideration, but even then he thought it would be far wiser and more economical for the Government to buy the land back than to construct the road It had been said that £35,000 was not necessary, but hon members must be aware how futile the construction of a common bush road would be to any purposes of traffic If the House voted the £5,000 it would furnish vantage ground to the supporters of the scheme, by leading them to apply for further votes of money to prevent the benefits to be derived from this vote from becoming illusory The idea of spending such a sum in order that Lobethal, a small village, should be four miles easier of access to Adelaide, was not to be countenanced, as it would be a waste of money and a dereliction of duty on the part of that House The present road should never have been declared a main line, and he believed if the direction which the road was to take had been properly defined in the first instance, it would not have been declared a main line For these reasons he felt it to be his duty to oppose the motion

Mr LINDSAY was inclined to have voted with the motion, but when he found, as the Commissioner of Public Works had stated, that there were such deplorable gradients as one in ten, he did not see how it was possible to construct a good road, and he should advise if the gradients could be made no better that the line should rather be abandoned

Mr WARK was in favor of the £5,000 being voted, which would enable a good passable road to be constructed The Commissioner of Public Works had referred to the steep gradients on this line, but he had forgotten that on the Mount Barker, the Balhannah, and Teatree Gully roads, the gradients were much steeper, being in some instances as much as 1 in 7 The gradient on the Magill line, of 1 in 10, might be decreased by making the bridge in that place a little higher, and he was convinced that, in other parts of the line, the highest gradient would not be found to be more than 1 in 11 Mr Baker had been referred to as the prime mover in this matter, but although that gentleman had been no particular friend of his, he would defend him from such an aspersion It was Mr Waterhouse who was first instrumental in having this line laid out

The question was then put, and the Chairman declared the the noes had it

Mr TOWNSEND called for a division, which resulted as follows —

AYES, 8—Messrs Barrow, Wark, Bagot, Cole, Milne, Glyde, Hay, Townsend (teller)

NOES, 14—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Collinson, Lindsay, Hawker, Andrews, Macdermott, Dunn, Mildred, Duffield, Burford, Strangways, the Commissioner of Public Works (teller)

Making a majority of 6 in favour of the Noes The motion was accordingly lost

SMILLIE ESTATE BILL

The House resumed, the SPEAKER reported, the report was adopted, and a message was instructed to be sent to the Legislative Council to the effect that the amendments had been agreed to

BOARDS OF WORKS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved the second reading of this Bill, and said that, although its scope was not so great as either that House or the Government might have desired, it was what it was believed the Parliament would sanction. There were only two clauses in the Bill, which he had little doubt the House would assent to.

Mr MILNE asked whether if this Bill were passed, it could allow the dismissal by the Government of members of the Central Road Board.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said certainly not to those constituted members of that Board.

The Bill was read a second time, and the House went into Committee.

In Committee.

Preamble postponed.

Clauses 1 and 2 passed as printed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, in answer to Mr Strangways, with reference to the proposed insertion by that gentleman of a clause defining when the Act should take effect, that he (the Attorney-General) did not consider it necessary. If the Act imposed a penalty, then it might be expedient, but not when it was merely prospective.

Mr STRANGWAYS quoted "May," to shew that the rule was that all Acts of Parliament should take effect from the first day of the session.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL never doubted that, but he doubted whether the technical rule which was adapted to the parliamentary usages of a particular time could be applied to this colony. He was not aware that there was anything to make an Act operative until it had received the assent of His Excellency the Governor.

The preamble and title were passed as printed.

The House resumed, the Bill was reported, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for Thursday (this day.)

THE ESTIMATES

The TREASURER, before moving the House into Committee, wished to know if it were desired to go on with the Estimates for a short time. To test the feeling of the House he would move that they go into Committee.

Mr TOWNSEND said a great many members had left the House under the impression that the Estimates would not be called on in consequence of the lateness of the hour, and as an amendment to the House going into Committee he would move that the House adjourn.

The TREASURER would then move that the consideration of the Estimates be an Order of the Day for the following day.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the further consideration of this Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following Friday.

THE MARION

Upon the motion of Mr MACDERMOTT, the petition recently presented by him from the owners of the Marion was ordered to be printed.

The House adjourned at five minutes past 5 o'clock till 1 o'clock on the following day.

The Hon J MORPHETT, on behalf of the Hon Major O'Halloran, gave notice that, when the District Councils Act Amendment Bill was in Committee, he should move the insertion of a clause constituting Chairmen of District Councils ex officio Justices of the Peace.

THE HARBOR TRUST

The Hon Capt HALL asked the Hon the Chief Secretary if he had any objection to lay upon the table of the House the correspondence which had taken place between the Government and the Harbor Trust during the session, and the plans and particulars, showing how the money had been expended, and how further sums were proposed to be.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY had no objection to lay the correspondence, &c, on the table, but, in order that there might be no mistake, would like the hon gentleman to state in writing what he required.

THE THIRD JUDGE AND DISTRICT COURTS BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY in moving the third reading of this Bill, said that the necessity for the appointment of a third Judge was so universally acknowledged, that it would be merely necessary for him to make very few remarks in support of the Bill. It had long been a cause of great complaint with the public and the bar that causes of vast importance, matters in which great interests were involved, were frequently delayed being brought to a settlement in consequence of a difference of opinion between the two Judges. When a Jury had decided a case upon the ruling of a Judge on a particular point, one of the parties to the suit, who was dissatisfied, appealed to the decision of the two Judges as to the point involved at the trial. If the Judges differed in opinion, and the one who had tried the cause refused to admit that he had made an error, justice remained unsatisfied. Over and over again had this error occurred in consequence of the difference to which he had alluded, but he thought he need merely refer to two cases to illustrate the difficulties which were at present felt. In the case of Hughes v Morris, the Inspector of Sheep, a case in which the pastoral interest were deeply involved, such a difference as he had alluded to had arisen, and also in the case of Anderson v the Morphett Vale District Council. In both of those cases the verdicts were unchanged, and justice was unsatisfied, in consequence of there not being an umpire Judge sitting on the Bench. That was the principal object in appointing a third Judge, but the Bill further proposed, not as was supposed by many—the establishment of Circuit Courts—but it gave power to the Governor, in case of necessity, not otherwise, to issue a commission for holding District Courts. The expense of this would be very trifling, in the first instance probably not more than the salary of a Judge, which was fixed at the same as the puisne Judge, £1,300. There would be some trifling additions when it was rendered necessary to establish Circuit Courts, but he would remind hon members that it was not proposed there should be an annual expense for Circuit Courts, but that these should merely be held if necessity arose for them, not otherwise. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon J MORPHETT seconded the motion, but he must at the same time state that had the Bill been for the purpose of establishing District or Circuit Courts, he should not have done so, as he did not consider the country in a position to bear such an expenditure. The expense entailed upon the country by such Courts would be very great, but the present Bill he understood was merely to enable the Government to appoint a third Judge, and with respect to District Courts, if they were held at all under this Bill, it would only be under such circumstances as would fully justify their being held. The Governor would have power, by the advice of his Ministry, to issue a commission, and the Ministry would be responsible to the country. With respect to the necessity for the appointment of a third Judge, the evils of the present system were so glaring and manifest and decided, that he thought it was the duty of Parliament to give relief to the community. This Bill proposed to relieve the community by the appointment of a third Judge, and the expenditure involved in that appointment would be only £1,300 per annum, though he had no hesitation in saying that for this £1,300 paid by the community, they would save at least £13,000 in increasing and continued litigation. The only grounds upon which he could conceive that the Bill would be opposed were that some additional expense would be entailed upon the country, but although it was true that the country would pay £1,300 per annum, there would be a much larger saving, and it should be remembered that every thing which was saved to the community was in fact saved to the country. If the cost to the community were only £1,300, that would be cheap indeed to secure justice being administered to every member. The Hon the Chief Secretary, in moving the second reading of the Bill, had alluded to two cases, to one of which he would refer, it was that of Hughes v Morris. There had been no final decision on that case, because there were only two judges, and a conscientious difference of opinion existed between them. The consequence was that the original verdict still stood, and the defendant must submit to be mulcted in £175 damages, or involve himself in the costs of an appeal to a higher Court, which would probably amount to between £1,000 and £2,000. Either the defendant in that case must pay £175 damages, which the Chief Justice said he ought not to, or he must involve himself in expenses to the amount of upwards of £1,000. Perhaps the defendant could not afford to do so, or perhaps he might not feel himself justified in doing so; consequently there was in South Australia in fact a denial of justice. They had the character of being a liberal, intelligent, advancing and prosperous community, but it certainly was not a proof of their intelligence that justice was actually denied to Englishmen in maintaining their rights or resisting aggression. He thought the House would not say that justice should be so denied, simply on account of an expenditure of £1,300 for the appointment of a third Judge. The expense he felt was the only objection which could be raised to the proposition, and that certainly was not sufficient to justify such a proceeding. He had every desire to protect the public purse, but he felt at the same time that he would not be doing his duty to his constituency if he did not give his support to the Bill before the House With respect to Circuit Courts, he did not think the country ripe for them, and he believed in addition that they would entail greater expense upon suitors and litigants than if they had to come to Adelaide. Although it might be said that three Judges were too many for a population of 100,000 people, it should be borne in mind that this was a wealthy, progressive, and prosperous community, and from that circumstance litigation was likely to be far more abundant than it would be in a poor but equally large community Men in this colony saved money and acquired land, which was the cause of a great deal of litigation He believed that a greater number of suits occupied the attention of the Courts arising from the acquisition of land than from any other cause The people generally were prosperous, and having acquired land was the reason of there being so much more litigation than in communities where landholders did not constitute so large a proportion

The Hon A FORSTER rose for the purpose of opposing the second reading of the Bill, and thought he should have the concurrence of the House when he stated that no case had been made out by the Chief Secretary for the appointment of a third Judge The hon gentleman had not even attempted to defend the Bill itself, because the Bill was to provide for the appointment of a third Judge and for the establishment of Circuit Courts The Hon Mr Morphett, who seconded the motion for the second reading of the Bill, stated distinctly that if the Chief Secretary had attempted to defend the intention of the Government in reference to the establishment of Circuit Courts, he would not have had his support, therefore he presumed the support of the Hon Mr Morphett was contingent upon the Chief Secretary abandoning that portion of the Bill which related to the establishment of Circuit Courts The question had then dwindled to the simple point whether there was a necessity for the appointment of a third Judge, to bring into conformity the complicated views upon the Bench That was the only reason for which they could go to the expense of a third Judge He did expect that the Hon the Chief Secretary would have honored the Bill which he introduced with his support, but he clearly understood from the conditional support offered by the Hon Mr Morphett, that it would not be given unless the idea of Circuit Courts were abandoned The statement of the Chief Secretary was very important and significant with regard to the constitution and operation of the Supreme Court generally, and it should teach that Council a very useful lesson It was clear that the Judges differed, and that lawyers differed, and it was clear that the Supreme Court of the colony, as administered, was of no benefit to the community It would be better far for the interests of the community if it were swept away, and some other means of obtaining justice determined upon He was surprised that the Government, instead of proposing to appoint a third Judge, did not suggest that some other Court should be established to secure justice to suitors. If they had proposed to sweep away the Supreme Court on the civil side, and to appoint a Court of Arbitration where suitors could obtain justice, he should have supported them in the proposition, but he could not support them when they came to that House simply because two Judges could not agree, and asked the House to go to the enormous expense of appointing a third Judge as umpire There was no necessity for the appointment of a third Judge as far as the increase of business was concerned, for he found that from 1853 to 1858, the causes year by year varied very little In 1853, the civil causes amounted to 69, in 1854, to 114, in 1855, to 149, in 1856, to 187, in 1857, to 198, and in 1858, to 183 Although there had been an increase on the civil side, it had not been in that proportion to justify the appointment of a third Judge Of the 183 cases it should be remembered that a great many—and the same remark would apply to those of previous years—which had been previously tried, in consequence of the impossibility of bringing the two Judges into harmonious action In criminal matters he found that in 1853 there were 106 cases, and there was a decrease for succeeding years, till in 1856, there were 113, and from 1853 to 1858, with one exception, the criminal cases had not exceeded 106, which was the number for the present year If half the adult male population were criminals, there would be plenty of Judges to do the business of the Court if a Court of Arbitration were appointed, instead of the Supreme Court, for civil cases, and he was satisfied that the business could be conducted at one fiftieth the cost which was at present incurred It was the most absurd request that the Government could bring before the House to appoint a third Judge He did not know how to characterize such a request At home there were 22 Judges for a population of 23 millions, or more than a million to every Judge, but here there were two Judges to a population of 114,000, or a Judge for 57,000 population, yet a third Judge was asked for That analogy was accurate as nearly as it could be made, setting the Judges of the District Courts at home against the Local Courts here At home there was a Judge for every million, here there was already a Judge for every 57,000 It was the most monstrous absurdity that ever came before a Legislature, the appointment of a third Judge, and he was satisfied that the House would not be induced to sanction such a proposition But he was informed by undoubted authority that the cost of a third Judge would not be merely £1,300 a year as the Chief Secretary had stated, and as had been asserted by the hon Mr Morphett, but he believed that directly and indirectly the appointment of a third Judge would not cost less than £25,000 per annum If there were a third Judge it was clear they must establish Circuit Courts, for if there were any justice in the claim at all it was that the country demanded Circuit Courts If there were any justice at all in the appointment, the third Judge should go on circuit, and what would be the consequence? Why, in every municipal town there would be a gaol, there would be a bar, and various expenses connected with judicial functions There would be increased litigation, and he stated on good authority that the increased cost to the country would not be less than £25,000 per annum If a third Judge were appointed it was clear they must find employment for him, but at present he denied that there was employment for him But that was not all, for they would have to pension the Judges in the end, and if the Civil Service Bill, as it had been originally introduced to the Legislature, had passed, the Judges would have been able to retire upon £1,000 a year, and even now, no doubt, the attempt would be made to give them a retiring allowance of £1,000 a year Every additional Judge appointed would, consequently involve an additional pension of £1,000 a year Even admitting that £1,300 would be the maximum cost, it would be a far cheaper plan at once to pension one of the Judges at £1,000 per annum There would then be a saving effected of £300, and the remaining Judge would be quite sufficient to dispose of the business The proposal made by the Government in this Bill was a step in the wrong direction Why not come forward and propose to reduce instead of increase the number of Judges, if they wished to secure proper and uniform decisions If, however, it were absolutely necessary to retain two Judges, why not send one on circuit and keep the Chief Justice employed in the Supreme Court in Adelaide The Legislature had repealed the Act of 1849, and had given the second Judge the same status as the Chief Justice, but what the Legislature had done it could undo, and there was nothing to prevent the second Judge being sent on Circuit whilst the Chief Justice attended to the proceedings of the Supreme Court in Adelaide He could not by any possibility support the Bill, and he trusted that hon members would not sanction such a gross absurdity He would again remind them that in England there was only a Judge to every million people, and that here there was already a Judge to every 57,000 He contended that it was utterly unnecessary to appoint a third Judge to bring in harmony the decisions of the two Judges, because one of the two Judges could be sent on circuit whilst the other could be kept in Adelaide In the course of another 12 months, unless some great and unexpected impetus were given to the colony, instead of increasing expenses they would be called upon to reduce them, and he therefore cautioned the House against assenting to the present Bill If they were bound to provide for the two Judges, the best and most economical mode he believed would be to pension one at £1,000 a year, and leave the remainder of the business to the Chief Justice.

The Hon Captain BAGOT rose to oppose the second reading of the Bill He so fully endorsed the objections which had been raised to the Bill by the Hon Mr Forster, that he need not take up much time, as that gentleman had so ably dealt with the subject He considered it was a very great mistake when equal standing with the Chief Justice was given to the second Judge They had had experience of the Chief Justice for a period of 16 years and he believed that before the appointment of a second Judge, the administration of the law in this province by the Chief Justice afforded the utmost satisfaction He thought he might safely say that not an instance occurred in which the litigants were not satisfied with the decision of the Court He recollected that at the time the second Judge was appointed, it was stated the work was too heavy for one but the step which should have been taken was to separate the civil from the criminal business, but he could not assent to the appointment of a third Judge, merely because it had been found that they had made a mistake in appointing two It was quite in the power of the Legislature he apprehended to remedy the difficulty which existed by separating the duties of the two Judges, but it appeared that whenever a difficulty arose the Government could devise no other remedy than by appealing to the people's purse, nothing could be done without an addition to the already exorbitant expenditure The Hon Mr Forster had shewn the absurdity of this Bill by contrasting the number of Judges in England with the population there, and that calculation clearly shewed that the appointment of a third Judge here would be altogether monstrous and uncalled for With regard to the establishment of Circuit Courts he thought that it would be premature to establish them There certainly would be no benefit to litigants, as they would require the assistance of professional men, whose expenses in attending the Circuit Courts would, of course, be larger than in the Courts in Adelaide, and the increased cost would fall upon the litigants Professional men—lawyers particularly—set a high value upon their time, and, though their charges were pretty moderate in Adelaide, if they were called upon to go to any distance from town, no doubt their charges would be increased twenty or thirty fold To propose Circuit Courts as a boon to the country was, he considered, a gross perversion of the term He hoped the Council would be unanimous in opposing the Bill If differences of opinion existed between the two

Judges, he had shown that this difficulty could be got over by separation of the duties The Chief Justice had always given satisfaction in civil cases, and he would suggest that the other gentleman should preside in criminal cases by which means the business of the country would be quite efficiently performed Having said this much upon the question he intended to give the measure all the opposition that he could, and should move that it be read again that day six months

The Hon S DAVENPORT should vote against the amendment of the Hon Captain Bagot He thought there were many fallacies in the arguments of those who had opposed the Bill, which it would be by no means difficult to make plain The Hon Mr Forster had drawn comparisons between the relative number of Judges in England and the population in the colony, but whilst the hon gentleman had referred to an old country why had he not also referred to a new colony? The comparison was in many respects unfair Why had the hon gentleman not stated that in other colonies the appointment of a third Judge had been found necessary for precisely the same reasons that it had been found necessary here There were many respects in which the comparison of a new colony with an old country was unfair In an old country there were facilities for conducting business in consequence of the dense population—the result of vast expenditure upon the locality where the Courts were held The Judges there had opportunities of consulting upon the business likely to come before them, and were consequently able to go through a much larger amount of business than was the case in a new colony Besides this before the comparison was instituted, he thought the hon gentleman should have shown that the same relations existed in reference to the Judges here as in the old country He did not intend any disrespect to the Judges here, but the inducements in the colonies were not likely to attract the highest talent, for the salaries of the three Judges, whom it was proposed to have here barely came up to the salary of a single Judge in England From what had been stated by the opponents of the measure it appeared to be thought that it would be better either to recur to the old state of things, and to have but one Judge, or to divide the duties, so that one should be employed upon circuit and the other in Adelaide That, however, looked to him like a retrograde step, and one which should not be taken in the absence of evidence that it would be satisfactory to the community A few years ago it was affirmed that the business of the Supreme Court was too much for one Judge, and a second was in consequence appointed to assist him in his decisions, consequently some sufficient reasons should be shown for going back to the old state of things He believed that what was complained of by the public was that so long as there were only two Judges it was impossible to bring cases to a final close, and, consequently, the appointment of a third Judge became absolutely essential He was of opinion that the country would greatly gain in a pecuniary sense by the arrangement proposed by this Bill Mr Forster's argument, eloquent and forcible as it was, was without basis when he said that the appointment of a third Judge would lead to the expenditure of £25,000 a year That was an enormous stride from £1 300 to £25,000 a year, and he had certainly failed to follow the hon gentleman

The Hon Mr FORSTER said what he stated was that the appointment of a third Judge would necessitate the establishment of Circuit Courts

Mr DAVENPORT resumed—The Bill merely provided that in urgent cases the Governor had power to appoint a Commission, in order that a Court might be held in a particular district but the necessity for holding such must be shown, and the Governor could only act with the advice of his Ministry He believed that occasional Circuit Courts would prove most economical to the country Altogether the objections which had been raised to the Bill had not been established upon a satisfactory basis, and he should vote in favor of it

The Hon H AYERS seconded the amendment of the Hon Captain Bagot He had to complain, with the Hon Mr Forster, that although they had had the addition of another speaker in support of the Bill, not a single proof of its necessity had been brought forward The Hon Mr Morphett had stated that the evils of the present system were glaring and apparent, but he had pretty good means of knowing, quite as good probably as the Hon Mr Morphett whether the evils were glaring or apparent, and he certainly had never discovered that there were such glaring and apparent evils connected with the system That Legislature had not been petitioned upon the subject not a single memorial had been presented, no persons had complained that justice had been denied them, and he could not help thinking it was rather a severe term to make use of towards hon gentlemen who so well filled the Bench, to say that justice could not be obtained in South Australia He questioned whether the Council was right in stirring up a particular case, but he would refer to one which had been alluded to by previous speakers—Hughes v Morris That case was tried before a Judge and Jury, and it appeared that one Judge differed with the other, but did that shew that the decision arrived at was incorrect, or that the Judge who tried the case was wrong? The Hon Mr Morphett had stated that the cost of an appeal would be between £1,000 and £2 000 He (Mr Ayers) confessed he very much doubted whether it would amount to anything like that sum, but if it would, the first duty of the Legislature should be to endeavour to reduce the cost, for he contended it was disgraceful if the cost to the appellants would be £2,000 If so, the duty of that House was to set to work and endeavour to reduce such costs He had been in South Australia 18 years, and had always considered the people orderly, well-conducted, decent, and peaceable, but if he were to judge of them from the cost in connection with the administration of justice, they would appear directly the reverse There were two Judges and a Commissioner of almost equal standing, a Stipendiary Magistrate another at the Port, another at Gawler Town and Kapunda, and others in the southern district He had been brought up in a town consisting of 80,000 inhabitants, and there was not a paid Magistrate in it It was true there were some very efficient "great unpaid," but they were not wanting in "the great unpaid" here There was a very numerous roll of Justices of the Peace, and with their assistance he thought the whole of the business might be got through without any addition to the staff Exception had been taken to the statement of the Hon Mr Forster, that instead of an expenditure of £1,300 this Bill would involve an expenditure of £25,000 per annum, but the same exception might be taken to the statement of the Hon Mr Morphett, that the Bill would effect a saving to the community of £13,000 per annum Was there any proof that there would be any such saving? None whatever If it were intended, as no doubt it was that District Councils should be established, there could be no doubt that a very large sum must be spent in addition to the £1,300 a year He fully agreed with the Hon Captain Bagot that the time had not arrived for the establishment of Circuit Courts, and that it would be cheaper for litigants to come to town than to take legal gentlemen, whose time was valuable, to distant parts of the country

The PRESIDENT drew the attention of the Council, as he had on similar occasions, to the fact that the first clause of the Bill appeared to him to be for the appropriation of revenue, and as it was not stated that the Bill was introduced by message from the Governor the question was whether it could be entertained

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the same thing occurred last year, but, he apprehended, the Bill having been brought forward by a Minister of the Crown, was equivalent to its having been brought forward by the Governor himself He would address a few remarks to the observations of the Hon Mr Forster, who appeared most enthusiastic upon this Bill The hon gentleman had great stress upon one point, that this was a Circuit Courts Bill, but if the hon gentleman had taken the trouble to read the Bill, he would have seen there was not a word about Circuit Courts in it The first four lines in the second clause would show the hon gentleman that the establishment of Circuit Courts, which he had so much dwelt upon, was not in any way contemplated To show the hon gentleman's consistency, he had stated that he had been informed by parties well informed upon the point that the appointment of a third Judge would involve the expenditure of £25 000 per annum, in consequence of the necessity which there would be for establishing Circuit Courts, but in the same breath he proposed to send one of the Judges upon Circuit, thus incurring an expenditure of £25 000 per annum Another argument, equally unfair, was founded upon the hon gentleman's allusion to England with 23 Judges and a population of 23 millions, shewing that there was only one Judge to every million people, but if the hon gentleman had pushed his argument, he might have urged that there was no ground for the appointment even of one Judge here The object of the Bill was not to establish Judges in proportion to the population, but to secure justice to the community, and uniformity of decisions where differences at present prevailed He would remind the Hon Mr Forster that there was no fear of the extravagant expenditure contemplated by him actually occurring, for the sums which were required if District Courts were established, would have to be placed upon the Estimates and to be assented to by Parliament On the whole, he fully agreed with the remarks of the Hon Mr Morphett and the Hon Mr Davenport, and felt sure a large majority of the House would agree with him that this Bill would effect a large saving to the country, diminish the cost to suitors, and save many thousands to the public at large

The Hon the Chief Secretary protested against such course as obstructive

The Hon A Forster said he felt so strongly upon the point that he should oppose the Bill at every stage

There being an equality of votes the President gave his vote with the ayes, remarking that the Council had adopted the principle of the Bill, and the clause was passed as printed

The various clauses having been passed, a division was called for upon the motion that the report be adopted, which was carried by a majority of 1, the Hon S Davenport having entered the House subsequently to the previous division

The third reading of the Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

DISTRICT COUNCILS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the Chief Secretary, the House went into Committee upon this Bill Clause 58, which empowered the District Council to expend any portion of the rates for educational purposes had been postponed

The Hon the Chief Secretary, in moving that the clause stand as printed, remarked that to strike it out or that portion which had been objected to on a previous occasion would be a direct interference with the ratepayers as to the manner in which they should apply their own money If it were struck out it would prevent the District Councils from getting the amounts which they expended upon schools supplemented by grants from the Central Board of Education as provided for in the 10th Section of that Act In addition to which, to strike out the provision would render the clause inconsistent with clause 117

The Hon Captain Bagot denied that to strike it out would be an interference with the rights of the ratepayers, but if it were permitted to remain, District Councils would be enabled to apply the whole of the rates to the erection of of a schoolhouse, or for other purposes in connection with education He did not think it should be left with the District Council, but he had no objection to leave it to the ratepayers to make a special rate for the purpose of education, if they thought proper

The Hon the Chief Secretary thought the hon gentleman forgot that the District Councils were elected by the ratepayers, who might decline to elect them if their views upon the question of education were not satisfactory, precisely the same as a constituency might decline to elect members of that House, if their views were not in accordance with those of a majority of the constituency

The Hon H Ayers said the Chief Secretary appeared to forget that the remedy would not come till after the mischief had been done He agreed with the Hon Captain Bagot that the clause as it at present stood would enable the District Councils to expend upon education a rate which the ratepayers had contributed for roads and bridges

The Hon Captain Freeling said that it might be argued with equal force that a District Council might expend their revenue upon a particular road or bridge, and so they might before the remedy could be applied, but the District Councillors were elected because it was assumed that they would exercise a certain amount of judgment, and it would be an extraordinary thing if five persons constituting the Council should spend the whole funds in one particular direction—building a school for instance He had had opportunities of judging how schools under the care of District Councils were managed, and was of opinion that they were managed in a very creditable manner and that it was of great advantage giving this power to District Councils

The Hon H Ayers only objected to a rate collected for the construction of roads and bridges being devoted to a very different purpose

The Hon S Davenport supported the clause, and in an eloquent address dwelt upon the advantages resulting from the extension of education

The Hon Captain Scott thought there would not be any danger in passing the clause, as he perceived the Councillors were elected annually

The clause was passed as printed

A new clause was introduced by the Chief Secretary, giving District Councils control over jetties, wharves, and breakwaters, and some verbal amendments having been made in subsequent clauses, the report was adopted and the third reading of the Bill made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

ENLARGEMENT OF DEBTORS BILL

Mr Mildred presented an amended petition from the Chairman and members of the District Council of East Torrens, praying to be heard at the bar of the House for the purpose of relieving themselves from the imputation of having obtained money by fictitious means, or that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee The petitioners contended that the works executed by the Council were fully equivalent to the aid which had been afforded by the Government The petition had been rejected on the previous day in consequence of being informal and disrespectfully worded, but having been corrected, it was received and read

Mr BARROW wished, with the permission of the House, to bring forward the motion of which he had given notice in reference to Mr Babbage's Committee He asked leave to amend the motion by removing the name of Mr Mildred, leaving the House to decide by ballot who should be elected He believed, however, it was quite within the forms of the House to insert the name, and he might mention that the hon member, Mr Neales, was prevented by serious indisposition from fulfilling his duties upon the Committee

Leave was granted and the House proceeded to the election of a member, Mr Mildred being selected

NORTHERN EXPLORATION

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table of the House further correspondence in connection with the northern exploration, which was ordered to be printed

REAL PROPERTY ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL laid upon the table copies of correspondence between the Solicitors and the Registrar-General upon the subject of the Real Property Act

THE IMPOUNDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the amendments made by the Legislative Council be adopted by the House. He had gone through the various amendments, which were very numerous, but there was nothing in them at all altering the principle of the Bill The only point worth alluding to was an addition which had been made to the clause to the effect that carriers should be permitted to depasture working bullocks upon the waste lands of the Crown, whilst they were actually engaged in traffic

The SPEAKER asked if the House wished the amendments read, as they were very voluminous

Mr REYNOLDS suggested that the Commissioner of Crown Lands should give the House an idea of the amendments which had been made

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS had already stated that the amendments did not at all affect the principle of the Bill, the only alteration of any consequence being that which he had alluded to—the permission given to carriers to depasture working bullocks upon the waste lands of the Crown, whilst actually engaged in traffic

Mr REYNOLDS observed an alteration in the schedule from £20 to £100, and should like to know the object of the alteration

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it merely related to the amount of a bond to be given, the amount in which parties were required to be bound

The amendments were agreed to, and a message to that effect was ordered to be sent to the Legislative Council

EXCESSES IN VOTES OF PARLIAMENT

The TREASURER said that there was a notice in his name for the consideration of the excesses in the votes of Parliament during last year, but he begged to amend it by referring it to the consideration of the Committee upon the Estimates

ENLARGEMENT OF IMPRISONED DEBTORS

The ATTORNEY GENERAL, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the enlargement of imprisoned debtors, who were unable to pay the fees which they were required by law to pay before they could obtain their release The preamble of the Act stated nearly all that it was necessary to state to command the assent of the House to the principle of the measure, and provide for the release of those whom the present Bill intended to relieve. The Insolvent Act of the previous session, as it left that branch of the Legislature, imposed on the insolvent the necessity of paying certain fees and doing certain things, and it provided at the same time that in the event of it being made to appear to the Commissioner of the Insolvent Court, that the insolvent had not the means of paying these fees, it should be lawful for the Commissioner to remit the fees, but that Act was afterwards altered, so as to render it necessary to insert certain advertisements in the newspapers and this involved consequences which were not foreseen at the time The Commissioner had power to remit the fees payable to the Court, and the Government could remit the fees to the South Australian Gazette for advertisements, but neither the Commissioner nor the Government had power to compel the newspapers to insert advertisements without payment At the present moment there were two persons incarcerated, solely in consequence of not having means to pay for the advertisements to which he had alluded, they were supported at the expense of the public, and with rations supplied by the public, because they could not obtain sufficient money to pay for these advertisements If such a state of things had been foreseen by the Legislature, it would, no doubt, have been guarded against when the Insolvent Act was passed, but it was one of those things which was not foreseen until practical inconvenience had arisen which it was now proposed to remedy When the Commissioner was satisfied that an insolvent could not pay the fees, the present Bill provided that it should not be necessary to insert advertisements except in the Government Gazette In such cases there would be no property available for the creditors, and the additional publicity which would be gained by advertising in the newspapers would not be of any benefit to any one In all other respects the provisions of the Insolvent Act would remain the same, the alteration proposed by the Bill merely superseding the necessity of advertising in the daily papers in cases where no creditor thought it worth his while to move in the matter, and the insolvent had no means of paying for the advertisements He begged to move for leave to introduce the Bill

Mr STRANGWAYS seconded the motion, and should have been glad to hear that the Bill went further than it did, that its operations were extended and that it abolished absolutely the necessity of advertising in the public papers, but that authority should be given to the Official Assignee or the officer of the Court to pay for advertisements which were ordered by the Court In England it had been found necessary for all general purposes that notices of bankruptcies or insolvencies should be published in the Government Gazette, and he believed such would be sufficient here, but it was at the same time highly desirable to recognise that the notices might be advertised in certain cases, that public notice should be given of bankruptcies and insolvencies, and that authority should be given for the payment of the advertising charges He saw no objection to the present Bill and whilst supporting it he would ask the Attorney-General whether there were not doubts as to the legality of proceedings under the Insolvent Act during the six weeks or two months that there was only one daily paper in the colony The Insolvent Act required that some proceedings should be advertised in two papers, and he believed that doubts had arisen as to the legality of the proceedings during the period that there was only one daily paper published here, and consequently that the advertisements appeared only in one paper He mentioned this as if such doubts had arisen he would suggest that a clause should be introduced in the present Bill to remove all doubts He also begged to ask the Attorney-General if it were not desirable to abolish absolutely the necessity of notices and proceedings in insolvency being published in the public papers, and allow the advertisements to be paid out of the estate where they were ordered by the Court

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that individually he agreed that it was inexpedient to make the advertisements in the public papers compulsory He had never heard during the period that the advertisements were inserted only in the South Australian Gazette any complaint that sufficient publicity was not given to them, but as they must assume that the other branch of the Legislature attached importance to the amendment by which the insertion of advertisements in the public papers became necessary, that amendment having arisen in that branch of the Legislature, he did not wish to encumber the Bill with any provision such as had been suggested by the hon member for Encounter Bay His object was to provide a remedy for what had proved an actual evil resulting in great hardship to two individuals who could not obtain their freedom from prison until the existing law had been altered With regard to other matters it was very possible the Insolvent Act might require amendment He had received various suggestions from the Commissioner of the Court, and questions had arisen between the Commissioner and the Judges with regard to the construction to be placed on portions of the Act, and the power of the Commissioner It was expedient that those doubts should be removed, but the matter would require very careful consideration, and he did not intend to consider it at the present moment. He should not have introduced the present Bill, and still less should he have asked the House to pass it at once, if there were not at that moment two persons in gaol who could not obtain their release, because they could not pay the sum of £2 1s for advertisements

Leave having been granted the Bill was read a first time, and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the Standing Orders be suspended for the purpose of allowing the Bill to be proceeded with and carried through its various stages that day

Mr LINDSAY deprecated this patchwork legislation The statute-books were already so numerous that there was scarcely room for them on the table And if they went on at the rate which they had of late years, in a short time that Council Chamber would not hold the statutes It appeared, however, that in this instance there was no remedy

The Standing Orders were then suspended, the Bill read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

Upon the suggestion of Mr STRANGWAYS, a clause was inserted, giving effect to the Act from the passing thereof

The report having been adopted, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the Bill be read a third time

Mr REYNOLDS objected to the Bill being disposed of so hastily It was said that the Bill was to remedy certain objections, but if those objections existed they should have been seen before and provided against by the Government It appeared to him that the Government, as well as hon members, were determined to enjoy the Christmas holidays He should certainly oppose the third reading

The SPEAKER saw a difficulty in assenting to the third reading at that moment, inasmuch as he would be called upon to certify that he held in his hand a fair reprint of the Bill, which he certainly did not.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought it necessary to state that his reason for wishing to press forward the Bill had no reference either to the Government or the Legislature, but had reference to two persons who were in gaol, from which he thought they should be discharged, but who were unable to obtain release in consequence of the reasons which he had stated If technical objections were raised, those who made them must be responsible A person who had just been enlarged had informed him that there were two persons who were in the position which he had stated, and he had taken steps to relieve them from the difficulty as soon as possible

The SPEAKER said that he did not wish to interpose any obstacle, but as the Standing Orders were suspended this formality must also be omitted and Mr Reynolds having withdrawn his opposition, the Bill was read a third time and passed

The ATTORNEY GENERAL moved the consideration in the whole House of the amendments which had been made by the Legislative Council in the Parliamentary Privileges Bill It would be seen, on reference to the Schedule, that the principal amendment was the striking out of the 15th clause, which provided freedom from arrest to members of both Houses He confessed that his own opinion was, the striking out of this clause had not improved the Bill He could quite understand, however, that hon members who opposed the clause thought they had improved the Bill There could be no question that even as the Bill was, it was of such a useful character, whether rendered more or less so by the alteration, that he did not think there should be any delay in passing a measure which defined the privileges of the House merely because it did not go quite so far as was wished He moved the amendments be agreed to

Mr GLYDE wished to ask the Attorney-General a question as to the position in which hon members would be placed as regarded freedom from arrest now that the clause to which the hon gentleman had alluded had been struck out He believed that circumstances had occurred in which a Judge had declared that a member was free from arrest He wished to hear some rule laid down in reference to the question

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the only rule which he could lay down was to keep out of debt The law remained as before

MR STRANGWAYS had great doubts as to the law upon the point, and it appeared that the Attorney-General did not wish to explain it No doubt a Judge had laid down a certain law, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had reversed it, and the question was which was to be considered the highest authority when the two rulings were entirely at variance With regard, however, to freedom from arrest, he thought there was very little doubt that members were entitled to freedom from arrest in the same way that were witnesses in attending the Supreme Court, that is, they were free whilst in the House, and he should consider that they were also free whilst coming to the House or going from it to their usual place of abode

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that in his opinion hon members if arrested whilst the House was sitting would be entitled to their discharge

The House then resumed, the CHAIRMAN having reported the amendment as agreed to, a message was ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Assembly conveying an intimation to that effect

REAL PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL this Bill was read a third time and passed

BOARD OF WORKS BILL

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that this Bill be read a third time

Mr REYNOLDS regretted that he was not present on the previous day when the Bill was read a second time and passed through Committee When a member left the House now even for a few minutes he found on coming back that a Bill had been read a second time and had passed through Committee If he had been in his place he should have objected to the Bill, and he objected to it now unless the Government would agree to postpone it and make the third reading an Order of the Day for the following day He believed the Bill was brought in to meet the wishes of the other branch of the Legislature, but he had yet to learn that the Legislative Council had any objection to the original measure except on the ground of the Central Road Board being included in its operation He was not aware that the Council objected to the abolition of a Board which certainly did not afford much proof of its ability, viz, the Railway Board He thought the other branch of the Legislature would readily agree to abolish that Board, and take the recommendation of the Railway Committee to place the railways under the Commissioner of Public Works He (Mr Reynolds) had given notice of two motions for the following day, one of which was to the effect that the salaries of all officers employed under the Board should be placed upon the Estimates in order that the House might deal with them, and if that motion were carried, it might be embodied in the present Bill Then there was the report of the Committee on railway management, and if the House agreed to the recommendations contained in that report, they might also be incorporated in the Bill With these views, and not with any intention to delay legislation, he should wish to see the Bill postponed inasmuch as if his (Mr Reynolds's) motion were carried, next day the Government would be bound to bring in a Bill to give it effect The matters he referred to were of importance, and should be dealt with before the Bill went to the other House He moved that the third reading be an order of the day for next day

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would ask the House to read the Bill The only question was, whether they were prepared to carry out the principle embodied in it or not If hon members did not wish to carry out the principle they would of course be quite right in refusing to read the Bill a third time, and then another Bill could be introduced, which would either abolish the Boards or provide for their control by different means Here was an Act which contained two clauses, and the second reading of which was fixed for the previous day The second reading came on in its proper order—("hear, hear," from the Commissioner of Public Works)—and after the hon member for the Sturt had, on a former occasion, objected to business being taken out of its proper order, he should not now complain that the House dealt with the business in the ordinary way, without any delay beyond that occasioned by the forms of the House In the case of this Bill there had been no suspension of the Standing Orders, and he (the Attorney-General) thought no hon member had a right to complain of the Government carrying on the public business as rapidly as the forms of the House would admit He imagined it was the duty of the Government and the House to get through the business as rapidly as was consistent with the expression of opinion by hon members who might wish to express an opinion

Mr STRANGWAYS was not opposed to the Bill On the contrary, he approved of it, but he thought it probable that, when the motions of the hon member for the Sturt (Mr Reynolds) came on for discussion on the following day, some suggestions might be made which even the hon the Attorney-General himself might see the value of He (Mr Strangways) saw no harm which could come of postponing the second reading, as it would only occasion the delay of one day As regarded the postponement of business, if the Government and especially the Attorney-General had been as desirous of expediting business during the first six weeks of the session as they were lately, the business would have been over long ago But during the first six weeks the Attorney-General was rarely to be found in his place at least until the Supreme Court was over Therefore any remarks as to delaying the public business come with an exceedingly bad grace from that hon member, especially as he (the Attorney-General) had only lately received a broad hint—indeed a motion was about being tabled to the effect that he should not allow his private practice to interfere with his public business It was only when that hint was given that the Attorney General began attending that House The hon the Attorney-General should be the last person in the House to complain of delay, inasmuch as all the delay was caused by the hon member himself He (Mr Strangways) also complained of the number of Bills brought in during the last few weeks, seeing that the Government had six months to prepare them, and if they had brought the Bills in in the commencement of the session there would have been ample time to consider them He should support the amendment, not that he was opposed to the Bill, for he approved of it, but to afford time for the discussion of the notices on the paper for next day

Mr GLYDE supported the suggestion of the hon member for the Sturt, considering it but fair and reasonable that the House should have an opportunity of considering the motions before the second reading of the Bill came on

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was sorry to see a habit growing up of opposing the third reading of Bills upon grounds which should be urged previous to the adoption of the report Motions, like the present amendment, were generally made in the hope by a recommittal, of introducing new matter into a Bill He hoped the House would agree to the third reading, as there could be no objection to the principle of the Bill The Legislature of the colony was not entirely compressed into that House, and the arrangements of another place should be consulted If hon members opposed the Bill they must take the responsibility of doing so after being warned by him (the hon Commissioner) (A laugh) With regard to the remarks of the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways) as to the attendance of the hon the Attorney-General he (the Commissioner of Public Works) would ask whether it would not compare very favorably with that of some other hon members There was a record kept of the members present and absent at every sitting, and to that he would refer hon members ("Hear, hear," from the Government benches and ironical cheers from the opposite side)

The House then divided on the amendment, which was lost by a majority of four

The Bill was then read a third time and passed

THE ESTIMATES

The TREASURER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on the Estimates

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired why the Lands Grants Bill was not proceeded with, as he understood it was only postponed until the business already disposed of had been gone through

Mr REYNOLDS also wished some information on this point

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the discussion of the Bill might take up a considerable time, and the Government therefore preferred proceeding with the Estimates He moved that the Bill be further postponed until after the consideration of the Estimates

The motion was agreed to

The House then went into Committee on the Estimates

On the first item—"Total office of Commissioner of Public Works £460"

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the item £50, for travelling expenses, be struck out The Governor was not allowed these expenses, and he could not see why they should be allowed to a responsible minister who was paid for attending to his duty

Mr REYNOLDS thought a larger amount than that set down would be saved by the Commissioner of Public Works travelling about, in order to make a careful inspection of public works

In reply to Mr MILNE

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the sum of £100 set down for professional assistance did not include legal assistance, but it frequently happened that it was necessary to have the opinions of persons unconnected with matters in dispute The sum of £75 was put down for this purpose last year The money would of course not be expended unless it was found necessary

Mr BURFORD expressed his disapproval of the system of voting item by item

Mr TOWNSEND supported the item He hoped the time would never come when the House would refuse to discuss the Estimates item by item

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the item of professional assistance, £100 be reduced to £50

The amendment was carried

On the item, travelling expenses, £50

Mr MILDRED hoped the item would not be struck out His only fear was that the Commissioner of Public Works did not travel about sufficiently

Mr STRANGWAYS repeated his objections to the item The Commissioner was already paid for attending to his duties

Mr SOLOMON said that if the hon member was a merchant he would know that when he sent a clerk travelling in the country it would be necessary to pay him expenses besides his salary

The amendment was put and lost, and the original motion was then carried

The total amount, £410, was then carried

On the item "Colonial Architect, £1,072 17s 6d,"

Mr MILDRED enquired why there was an extra draftsman at £140 a year in the department, when the work of the office was likely to be very light

Mr MILNE objected to this extra officer being placed upon the permanent staff He would prefer seeing the sum added to the item "occasional additional office assistance" When persons were placed upon the permanent staff, they had a sort of claim to be retained, but persons employed as occasional assistance could be dispensed with in cases of emergency

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said this officer was dispensed with in 1857, but it was found the office could not do without him The services of this officer were required in preparing the plans which the House required, and an efficient draftsman was requisite for this purpose

Mr REYNOLDS inquired whether the lighthouses at Cape Northumberland and Cape Borda were completed, as in that case the Colonial Architect's services would not be wanted to superintend these buildings, and an efficient officer would be added to the office staff

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied that the works in question were so nearly completed that the services of the Colonial Architect would shortly not be required upon them

Mr TOWNSEND did not think that the explanations given justified an increase of £280 on the year

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could not make a better case than by assuring the House that he had gone carefully through the department, and he did not believe the officer could be dispensed with

Mr MILNE moved that the item be struck out, with a view to that amount being added to the item "occasional office assistance"

The sum was struck out without a division

After some discussion,

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that the hon the Commissioner of Public Works had stated his belief, founded on experience, that without this assistance the duties of the department could not be satisfactorily performed The question was for the House to decide (Hear, hear) The Government would use the means placed at their disposal, and leave to the House the responsibility of the work not being properly performed

Mr MILNE moved that the sum for occasional office expenses be £190

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the amount be £50

The House divided on the amendment, when there appeared—

AYES, 9—Messrs Strangways, Reynolds, Mildred, Wark, Burford, Duffield, McEllister, Young, and Townsend (teller)

NOES, 15—The Commissioner of Public Works, the Treasurer, Commissioner of Crown Lands Attorney General, Messrs Glyde, Macdermott, Andrews, Milne, Hawker Cole, Hay, Hallett, Collinson, and Solomon

Mr GLYDE moved that the amount be £75

The House again divided, when there appeared—

AYES, 11—Messrs Reynolds Townsend, Mildred, Glyde, Wark, Burford, Duffield, McEllister Hallett, Hay, Young

NOES, 13—The Attorney-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, the Treasurer, Messrs Hawker, Collinson, Rogers, Scammell, Solomon, Andrews, Macdermott, Strangways, and Milne

Mr TOWNSEND moved that the sum be £100

Mr REYNOLDS considered this amount very large There would be no saving in striking an officer off the permanent staff and placing the amount of his salary in the item of occasional assistance The money was certain to be expended

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the amount be £75 10s He had voted with the Government on the last division, under the impression that the Government were voting against their own motion (Laughter)

Mr BURFORD could not see how a saving was to be effected by taking an amount off in one place and putting it on in another He fancied the saving was actually effected, but he found he was not "far enough north" (Laughter)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL rose to order He wished to know whether the practice was to move reductions farthing by farthing

The CHAIRMAN knew of no rule to prevent such a course being taken, but it was for the good sense of the House to decide as to its advisability (Laughter from the Attorney-General)

Mr HAY hoped the hon member for Encounter Bay would withdraw what he (Mr Hay) would not call an insult to the House But he hoped the hon member would consult his own credit, and that of the House by withdrawing his amendment

Dr WARK considered the amendment ridiculous, and an insult to the common sense and decency of the House

Mr STRANGWAYS said the hon member for the Murray was peculiarly sensitive to insult If any person differed with that hon member he felt insulted, and considered the conduct ridiculous The hon member was one of the last who should use such terms He would withdraw his amendment, and move that the whole amount be struck out

The amendment of £100 was ultimately carried

The total amount for the department was then agreed to

The next item, £1,095 "for railway and tramways," was carried without opposition

"Observatory and Telegraphs, £3,913 3s"

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that in certain localities it might be desirable that the Stationmasters or clerks of the electric telegraph should perform, in addition to their present duties, the duties connected with the Post-Office In connection with this, he might say he believed that by a periodical delivery of telegraph messages in the same manner as the post delivery, messages might be sent at a reduced charge and with greater profit than as at present He believed the Superintendent of Telegraphs was favorable to such a scheme

Mr TOWNSEND said the advantage derived from the telegraph was the expeditious manner in which communications were transmitted by it, and that by a daily delivery, such as that proposed by the hon member for Encounter Bay, the value of the telegraph would be diminished

Mr STRANGWAYS explained that he only intended it as an adjunct to the business of the telegraph as now conducted

Mr LINDSAY reminded the House that he had on a former occasion presented a petition from the inhabitants of the Goolwa, praying that the electric telegraph and post-offices in that locality might be connected He could see no objection to such a system which, he believed, would effect a considerable saving in the out districts He also approved of the suggestions made by the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways)

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, when the subject was brought before the House, some ten days ago, he had enquired into the feasibility of the scheme, and the Superintendent of Telegraphs had declared himself favorable to it It was a matter, however, which required consideration In some localities, no doubt, it would be found convenient, and in others not so

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said, in answer to Mr Cole, that arrangements were being made to send messages at all hours of the night, and that there was to be no charges made for overtime

The item was carried

"Good Service Pay and Superanuation Fund, £1,355"

Mr MILNE said, before this item was put he would make a few remarks, although, of course, it was well understood the item would not be passed He wished merely to point out that the striking off of the good service pay would operate as a great hardship to some individuals, and he would in consequence go to the extent of recommending the recommittal of any item where the salaries of officers were unfairly reduced No doubt hon members could call to mind particular instances where such a hardship would be entailed There was one, however, to which he would call the attention of the House, that was the case of the Clerk of the Court at Mount Barker Many hon members must be aware that that gentleman, who had been a faithful public officer, had been in the service of the Government for a very long time, and he wished that the Attorney-General should give the case his attention The gentleman he had referred to it would be found had been in the receipt of a salary of £160, to which there was attached a sum of £10 as good service pay It must be evident that the striking out of this latter amount without adding something to the salary by way of compensation, would be a great hardship This gentleman had been in the Government service for more than 12 years, and his duties were much more onerous than the duties of the clerk to the Bench of Magistrates in Adelaide, who was in receipt of a salary of £200 per annum He would be glad if the Government would take the matter in hand, and see that it would only be just to raise in point of salary the clerk of the Court at Mount Barker, to the position of a third class officer The clerk to the Bench of Magistrates, in Adelaide, was in receipt of £200 per annum At one time the clerk of the Court, at Mount Barker, was in receipt of greater remuneration than that enjoyed by the former gentleman but now their positions were reversed, although the duties of the gentleman, on whose behalf he spoke, were considerably increased of late years What he asked for was, that both should be put on the same footing

The CHAIRMAN put the item, which was negatived, and then called the attention of the Treasurer to the fact that as the good service pay was disallowed there was no necessity for retaining the distinction of first, second, and third class officers

The TREASURER assented

Mr STRANGWAYS thought it not necessary that the classes should be struck out, as it might be convenient for the Government to retain them The classes were not identified with the Clerks' Salaries Act

The TREASURER said it was quite immaterial to the Government whether they were retained or not

Mr GLYDE was in favor of their retention

Mr STRANGWAYS moved a resolution to that effect, which was carried

Pensions, retiring allowances, and gratuities, £4,672 16s 7d

Struck out

Military, £1,254 8s 6d

The TREASURER explained the saving which had been made under this head

Mr REYNOLDS asked if that might not be accounted for in the decreased number of men

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that although the force was less there was more than a corresponding saving effected

The item was passed as printed

Fencing Police Paddocks, £250

Passed as printed

Fencing at Government Farm, £500

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said £500 had been voted last year, £500 was now asked for, and by another grant of a similar amount the work in question would be completed

Mr DUFFIELD would vote against the item If they had advertised for tenders he believed the whole of the fencing might have been completed for £800

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said the Government Farm comprised 1,800 acres, that the fence put up years ago was now in a most dilapidated condition, and rendered the place useless as a paddock for the police horses

The TREASURER said it was for the House to decide whether the Government Farm should be fenced in or not The Government thought it should be The cost of so doing had been estimated according to the market price, and he had no reason to suppose it was excessive

Mr STRANGWAYS said, at £90 per mile, which he believed was as high a price as fencing could ordinarily be executed for, they would have, for the eight miles of circumference of the Government Farm, only £720—not one-half of the amount as estimated by the Government He moved that £500 be struck out, and £250 be inserted in its place

Mr MILNE could see no advantage to be derived from putting a fence of seven or eight miles in length round the Government Farm If they used it only for police horses, they might hire a paddock at a far less expense than in fencing in Government Farm He would be glad to hear from the Commissioner of Public Works what advantage was to be derived from this expenditure

Mr LINDSAY said that the question of keeping up the Government Farm had been discussed before, in Governor Grey's time, and that the same reasons might now be urged for retaining it, yet he thought if there was to be a fence put up it should be a good one

Mr SOLOMON would vote for the item being struck out altogether

Mr WARK thought the Government Farm might be turned to great use, but the sum now asked for was far more than was required

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS found that he had been in error in supposing that it would take another £500 to complete the fencing The last £500 had gone farther than he had supposed, and the sum now asked for would be sufficient to complete the work

Mr TOWNSEND asked the Commissioner of Crown Lands what use the Government Farm was turned to

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied, as a paddock for the police horses and a summer residence for His Excellency the Governor

Mr SOLOMON asked how many police horses there were

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS could not say, but if the farm were not fenced in, the police horses would come under the excellent Impounding Act which had been referred to

Mr DUFFIELD called attention to the enormous sacrifice which had been made some little time ago in the sale of the horses used in the northern explorations, some of which cost £60 and £70, and were sold for about £20 This loss might have been avoided if the £500 voted last year towards fencing at the Government Farm, had been properly applied

Mr REYNOLDS thought the item should be postponed until further information had been obtained

The CHAIRMAN then put Mr Strangways' amendment for reducing the item to £250, which was negatived

Mr SOLOMON moved that the item be struck out

The CHAIRMAN put the question, that the item stand as printed, and declared the noes had it

A division was called for with the following result —

AYES, 13—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Collinson, Hawker, Lindsay, Scammel, Andrews, McEllister, Hay, Macdermott, Hallett, and the Treasurer (teller)

NOES, 10—Messrs Townsend, Strangways, Mildred, Duffield, Glyde, Wark, Milne, Rogers, Cole, and Solomon (teller)

There was a majority of three, accordingly, against the motion, and the item was passed as printed

Planting at Government Farm, £100

Mr GLYDE asked the Attorney-General whether the Farm was public property whether legally and originally it was set apart as a public reserve, or, if not, whether proper steps had been taken to dedicate it to the public

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said there could be no doubt of its being originally set apart as a public reserve Supposing that it were not legally dedicated it still became public property as part of the waste lands of the Crown

Mr STRANGWAYS said in that case it would be liable to be put up to public auction He had understood that Governor Gawler had set this land aside, but that it had never been made a public reserve

Mr HAY said it would be no great loss if the land were dealt with in the manner suggested by the last speaker, as the public would then get some return for the outlay upon it

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS replied to Mr Reynolds with reference to the £1,000 which had been voted for the Governor's cottage on the farm, that the plans for it had been agreed to, and tenders for the work had been called for

The item was then put and negatived

"Planting at Government House, £100"

Mr HAWKER moved that the £100 which had been struck out for planting Government Farm should be added to this item, and that it should then stand thus—"Planting at Government House, and in front of the Police Barracks and Hospital, £200"

Mr GLYDE said the result would be that the whole amount would be spent on Government House

Mr STRANGWAYS said £100 should be appropriated to planting at Government House, and the other for the Police Barracks and Hospital

Mr HAWKER said that was his intention

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said he would see that the money was so appropriated

Mr SOLOMON opposed the item

Mr HAWKER's amendment was then put and carried

Mr GLYDE moved that "planting at Government House" be struck out, and the item be left at £100

Mr DUFFIELD supported the motion of the last speaker, and said that from the probable financial position of the colony, the House would not be justified in voting money for ornamental purposes

The CHAIRMAN then put the item as amended by Mr Hawker, "Planting at Government House and in the front of the police barracks and hospital 200*l*" and declared it carried A division was called for with the following result —

AYES 14—The Attorney General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Scammel, Collinson, Hawker, Andrews, McEllister, Hay, Hallett, McDermott, Wark, Strangways, and the Treasurer, (teller)

NOES 9—Messrs Reynolds, Duffield, Mildred, Townsend, Glyde, Solomon, Cole, Rogers, and Burford (teller)

The item as amended was accordingly passed by a majority of 5

Post-Office, Court-House, and Police-Station, Port Adelaide, £2,000

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said the buildings were urgently required, but he had not the plans and estimates of the proposed buildings

Mr STRANGWAYS said it appeared to him the Government merely said "give us £4,000, and we'll do something with it" The Commissioner of Public Works evidently knew nothing about the matter, and he should, therefore, move the House resume

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL hoped the House would proceed with the Estimates In reference to the item under discussion, if it were thought that the inconvenience of conducting the business in the uncomfortable buildings at present in use, for the ensuing six months, would be smaller than a departure from the rule that plans and estimates should be exhibited when such votes were asked, the House would adopt the smaller inconvenience, and strike off the amount; but he trusted they would proceed with the Estimates, for during the three hours that they had been at them a good deal of time had been wasted.

Dr. Wark was opposed to voting sums for buildings for which no plans and estimates had been prepared.

Mr. Reynolds, notwithstanding the complaint of the Attorney-General about so much time having been consumed, contended that members had a perfect right to scrutinize every item, and battle the Government upon them.

The Attorney-General did not quarrel with hon. members for feeling a deep interest in the Estimates; on the contrary, he rather complained that they did not feel enough, and were desirous of leaving off merely because it was the usual hour.

Mr. Townsend said that the Attorney-General had accused the House of wasting time, and he objected to that term. If the House voted items without plans and estimates the £4,000 put down for this work might ultimately amount to £60,000 or £70,000.

Mr. Strangways compared the Attorney-General to Mrs. Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall. The hon. gentleman offered his brimstone and treacle, and if hon. members did not swallow it readily he gave them a knock on the head with the spoon.

The Commissioner of Public Works said the dilapidated state of the buildings at Port Adelaide had been observed, and it was considered that early attention should be given to them. Plans and estimates for the proposed buildings had been prepared, but it was found that the buildings were estimated to cost £5,000, and the plans were consequently not placed before the House.

Mr. Reynolds would like to know where those plans and estimates could be seen.

The Commissioner of Public Works would lay them on the table of the House.

The item was struck out, the motion for a postponement being lost by a majority of 6, the votes on a division being Ayes 8, Noes 14, as follows:—

Ayes, 8—Messrs. Reynolds, Wark, Burford, Mildred, Duffield, Glyde, Young, and Strangways (teller).

Noes, 14—The Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Attorney-General, Messrs. Townsend, Macdermott, Scammell, Solomon, Milne, Cole, Collinson, Rogers, Hay, McEllister, the Treasurer (teller).

New Government Printing Office, Adelaide, £1,000.

The Commissioner of Public Works stated the plans would be found in the library.

Mr. Milne did not think there was any immediate necessity for this building.

Mr. Strangways remarked that the work was done very well in the present building, although it was not a very handsome one.

The Commissioner of Public Works said the present building was inconvenient, not only from its situation, but it was not large enough. It was intended to erect the new buildings behind the Government offices.

Mr. Reynolds remarked that the spot alluded to had been pronounced not large enough for a colonial store, and if so, how could it be large enough for a printing office? He strongly urged the Government to fill up the frontage opposite the Post Office, rather than put the printing office at the back.

The Commissioner of Public Works said that for a Colonial Store a large yard was required, but such was not the case with a Printing-Office.

Mr. Reynolds was surprised at the Government yielding so readily upon every item; they would take anything the House chose to give them. He objected to such trimming—such shilly shally work. If a building were really necessary, why not say so, and fight it out with the House.

Mr. Solomon condemned the course which some hon. members were pursuing by endeavouring to prevent expenditure upon public works. The result would be, that the revenue would be expended upon establishments, and nothing would be devoted to public works to afford adequate employment to the working men.

Mr. Reynolds did not yield in any one to a desire to reduce establishments, and complained that he had not been supported by the hon. member for the city (Mr. Solomon) when he recently desired to reduce the expenditure upon some extravagantly conducted departments.

Mr. Young thought the zeal of Mr. Solomon to promote the interests of working men led him beyond the limits of prudence. He believed that the best policy would be to offer inducements to working men not to remain in town, but to go into the country.

The Attorney-General explained that the Government saw there were a certain number of public works which it was desirable should be carried out, and that a list of these works and the amounts which it was proposed to devote to them being laid before the House, it was for the House to decide whether the amounts should be devoted to such purposes or to roads or other matters. He did not feel bound to call for a division in every case, although any hon. member could do so, but there were some instances in which he called for a division for the purpose of placing on record the votes of the House.

The Treasurer remarked, in reference to public works, that of the gross amount of £57,000 for public works, £46,000 were for country districts.

The vote was carried by a majority of one, the votes, ayes, 11; noes, 10, being as follows:—

Ayes.—Attorney-General, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs. Townsend, Macdermott, Glyde, Collinson, Solomon, McEllister, Scammell, the Treasurer (teller).

Noes.—Messrs. Burford, Reynolds, Duffield, Mildred, Milne, Wark, Young, Cole, Rogers, Strangways (teller).

Observatory and Observer's House, £1,000.

The Commissioner of Public Works stated that plans of the proposed building had been prepared, and were upon the Library table. A number of astronomical and meteorological instruments were in the possession of the Government, and it was felt that the colony should not be behind hand with others in finding a suitable building, which, it was believed, would prove particularly beneficial to the Mercantile Navy.

Mr. Milne felt bound to oppose the item, as a scientific luxury which could be dispensed with.

The vote was agreed to.

Additions to Lunatic Asylum, £1,250.

The Commissioner of Public Works explained that it was necessary there should be additional yard accommodation for the females.

Mr. Strangways condemned the site of the present Asylum.

Dr. Wark also stated that the situation was particularly unsuited, the coolest and most quiet situation being essential for the treatment of lunatics.

Mr. Reynolds complained that the Commissioner of Public Works could give the House no information as to how it was proposed to expend the money.

The Commissioner of Public Works said that, although it had been understood for new buildings exceeding in cost £1,000 plans and estimates should be laid before the House, the present item did not come in that category, but he would postpone the item rather than it should be refused.

The Treasurer stated that the Colonial Surgeon had reported that it was absolutely essential the proposed additions should be made to afford a fair chance of restoring the unfortunate inmates.

Mr. Reynolds took considerable interest in the subject, and should, on the following day, ask if there had not been some bad treatment recently at the Asylum.

Mr. Burford hoped the vote would not be postponed, as they were bound to do all in their power to soothe the sorrows of the unhappy inmates.

The Attorney-General said the Government were aware the situation was not suitable, and had expended a considerable sum in the purchase of a more eligible site, but the Legislature of that day declined to vote funds for the erection of a building, and the present site was the best which could be selected, having reference to the determination of the Legislature that it should be in the immediate vicinity of the city.

The vote was assented to.

Court House, Tanunda, £500.

This vote was reduced, upon the motion of Mr. Strangways, to £400, on the understanding that the vote was to include a Police Station.

Altering Port Adelaide Court House into a Police Station, £150. Agreed to.

Custom House, River Murray, £100. Agreed to.

Additions and repairs to public buildings generally, £1,250. Agreed to. "Additions and" being struck out.

Alterations to General Post-office, £1000. Agreed to.

Police-station, Blanche Town, £550. Agreed to.

Police-station and Court-house, Goolwa, £800. Agreed to.

Building for South Australian Institute, Adelaide, £2,000.

The Commissioner of Public Works stated that the estimated cost of the building was £5,000, and that the site which had been selected was near the Railway-station, opposite to the little door leading to the Government stables.

Considerable discussion took place as to the eligibility of the site, which was not generally approved of, but the vote was ultimately agreed to.

Exercise yard and racket court at military barracks, £375. Struck out.

The following items were agreed to without discussion:—

Repairs to Port Lincoln Gaol, £12 12s.; Police-court, Mount Remarkable, £120; Court-house at Port Augusta, £700; Roads, &c., at Port Lincoln, £800; Sinking well between Truro and Blanche Town, £300; Boring for water upon Artesian principle, £750.

Mr. Solomon drew the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there was no House.

Two members having entered within the prescribed time the following votes were disposed of:—

Grant for Main Road at Gawler Town, £1000. Agreed to.

Central Road Board, £25,000. Agreed to.

Repairs to Port Road, £1000. Agreed to.

In aid of rates collected by Corporation, &c., £12,500.

Mr. Hay moved that the word "rates" be struck out and the word "monies" inserted. ("Hear, hear," from the Attorney-General.)

In reply to Mr REYNOLDS,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the money would be divided rateably The Government were not prepared to double the amount contributed by Councils, but they would give about 16s to the £1

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said there were no regular rates levied In some districts the rates were only one farthing in the pound The sum on the Estimates, calculating all districts to levy a rate of 1s, would amount to 9½d in the pound

Mr REYNOLDS enquired whether if the sums struck off the Estimates should prove sufficient the Government would give the Councils an equal amount to that collected by the latter

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government would rather increase the vote for the Road Board They thought that any saving which could be effected on the Estimates should be given to that Board As soon as the Estimates were gone through, the Government intended proposing that an address be presented to the Governor, asking that all savings effected, not exceeding a certain amount, be placed at the disposal of the Road Board When a vote of that sort was proposed, the hon member (Mr Reynolds) could, if he chose, move an amendment that only a certain portion should be given to the Road Board and the remainder to the Councils

Mr TOWNSEND moved that the House resume

Mr REYNOLDS said it was the first time since he sat in the Legislature that he had known the Estimates to be passed in so thin a House It was clear that some hon members had agreed to support the Government in the course they were taking There were but 13 or 14 members present out of 36, and they were called upon to vote away large sums If they must get through business before Christmas, they should have been called together sooner He (Mr Reynolds) was always ready to proceed with business, but the Government continually postponed it

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said this was the second time that evening that a statement had been made that the Government were the cause of delay That was the very contrary of the truth, for at least three times when the Government were prepared to go on with the Estimates, the hon member for Encounter Bay (Mr Strangways), supported, on each occasion, by the hon member (Mr Reynolds), postponed them because there was something in the Estimates not quite as these hon members wished It was the desire of these hon members to embarrass the Government, and obstruct the business of the country, which caused the delays they now charged upon the Government When the hon member for the Sturt called himself an independent member, he (the Attorney-General) could say there was not one hon member who was not equally independent, and equally prepared to do his duty, irrespective of all extraneous considerations Indeed it argued great arrogance on the part of the hon member to speak in such terms as he had used

Mr REYNOLDS said there might be great arrogance on his part, but there was also great arrogance on the part of the Attorney General when that hon member presumed upon the gullibility of the House, and expected the House to obey his dictates He (Mr Reynolds) had opposed the Estimates being proceeded with, and he had good reason for doing so, when the Assessment on Stock Bill was in Committee, and other matters were before the House, which made it practically useless to proceed with the Estimates But had he (Mr Reynolds) not been in his place at least as frequently, and had he not devoted more time to his duties than the hon the Attorney General, who was paid for attending in the House?

Mr COLE could not allow the reproach cast on hon members by the hon member for Sturt to pass unnoticed, and he felt obliged to the hon the Attorney-General for his vindication of members Had the hon member not spoken, it was his (Mr Cole's) intention to have done so It was highly indecorous in the hon member for the Sturt to speak as he had spoken He (Mr Cole) was not actuated by anything emanating from the Government benches, but was as independent as the hon member for the Sturt He had pressing engagements that evening, and had left them unattended to in order to do his duty, and if hon members who complained of being kept at business during the hot weather deserted their post, for their own convenience, why should others be taunted for remaining in their places? He (Mr Cole) thought the hon members who remained deserved rather honor than blame He trusted the hon member for the Sturt had only spoken in a hasty moment

Mr TOWNSEND said that before the House sat two hours and a half beyond its usual time some intimation should be given to hon members Many who had left would probably have remained had they known the House would sit so long

Mr HAY said that in the various divisions which had taken place there were as good Houses as they generally had, and there was a very good House during the greater part of the afternoon He could only say that, knowing nothing of what the Government intended he had come to the House every day during the week with the intention of getting through as much business as possible The first division on the question that the House resume took place a little after 5 o clock, when a large proportion of the members were present, so that it was evidently the intention of the majority to continue He had often observed that, when business was adjourned for further consideration, that no further information was obtained He trusted that on the following day, the time would not be wasted in discussions as to whether the House should or should not adjourn

Mr SOLOMON did not expect when he voted for proceeding with the business that half an-hour would have been wasted, not in business, but in throwing out innuendoes which he believed were now withdrawn

The item was then agreed to

On the next item, bridge over Port Onkaparinga (conditionally on £600 being paid into the Treasury), £1,000, considerable discussion ensued

The item was finally carried

On the next item, Bridge over Reedy Creek, Mount Gambier-road, £700

In reply to Mr REYNOLDS,

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said this was not the same bridge for which a sum was voted in 1857

The item was agreed to

Mr SOLOMON moved that the House resume

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not wish to detain hon members if a large number wished to adjourn, and would consent to the motion provided the House would consent to sit on Monday

Mr REYNOLDS would not consent to sit on Monday, but would be prepared to sit until the same hour the following day (Laughter)

After a slight discussion, in which Messrs STRANGWAYS, MILNE, COLE, and MCELLISTER took part, the motion for adjournment was agreed to, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL giving notice that on the following day he would move that the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday

The House then resumed, and the CHAIRMAN having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again the following day

LAND GRANTS ACT

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that this Bill be read a second time

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill read a second time accordingly

The House then went into Committee on the Bill, when all the clauses were agreed to without amendment

The House resumed, and the report having been adopted, the third reading was fixed for the following day

The House then adjourned

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Major O Halloran, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon Captain Freeling, and the Hon A Scott

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

The Hon H AYERS brought up the report of the Select Committee upon Longbottom s Patent Bill The report stated that the Committee found the preamble of the Bill proved The report and evidence were ordered to be printed, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

THE GLENELG JETTY

The Hon Dr EVERARD wished before the business of the day was called on, to ask the Chief Secretary a question in reference to a report which had come to his ears that morning, which gave him unaffected surprise The report was to the effect that it was the intention of the Government to take the Breakwater intended for the Glenelg Jetty and apply it to some other purpose He wished to know if there was any foundation for such report

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said he was happy in being enabled to relieve the hon gentleman's mind by stating that the Government had no such intention

The Hon A FORSTER said that the report had also reached him

THE FEBRUARY MAIL

The Hon J MORPHETT wished, before the business of the day was called on, to ask the Chief Secretary whether the Government had taken steps to provide sufficient means for transmitting a mail to England by the February mail to leave Sydney He alluded to the mail after next which would touch at Kangaroo Island

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Government had the question under consideration, but had not yet taken any decisive action

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY moved—

"That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to appoint Henry Simpson, Esq, a Trustee of the Harbor Trust, in the place of E G Collinson Esq, M P, resigned"

By the Act of 20 of 1854, E, G Collinson Esq, was appointed a member of the Harbor Trust, but that gentleman having been elected to a seat in the House of Assembly, resigned his position as a member of the Harbor Trust The Act to which he had alluded provided that a recommendation from the Legislature to His Excellency was necessary before a member of the Harbor Trust could be appointed, and it was consequently proposed that the Legislative Council should pass an address, recommending that Henry Simpson, Esq, be appointed He was quite sure that the proposition would meet with the support of every hon member acquainted with that gentleman Mr Simpson was an old colonist, well known for his general business habits and for his professional knowledge, and was well adapted for the appointment in the estimation of every individual capable of arriving at a correct judgment upon the matter

The Hon Captain SCOTT seconded the motion, which was carried

THE HARBOR TRUST

The Hon Captain HALL moved—

"That all the correspondence between the Harbor Trust and the Government, during the present session, be laid upon the table of this House, together with all charts or plans of the harbor of Port Adelaide transmitted to the Government by the Trust, also the particulars of the past and proposed expenditure of the funds voted for the improvement of the harbor"

He was desirous of procuring the returns for the purpose of placing the Council in possession of all information in reference to the intromissions of the Harbor Trust Contingent upon these returns being placed on the table of the House, he should move that the whole of the accounts in connection with the Harbor Trust since it was first appointed to the present time, and that accounts of what was intended to be done by the Trust be taken into consideration by the Council with the view of expressing an opinion approving or disapproving of the way in which the Harbor Trust had discharged the trust reposed in them by the Legislature

The Hon Capt SCOTT seconded the motion

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said some of the documents would be found on the table of the House, and that he would take care the others were laid upon the table as quickly as possible

The Hon Capt HALL was aware of this, but what he wanted was the fullest information, so that all the acts of the members of the Trust might be laid bare and open to the public

The Hon H AYERS pointed out that the notice merely asked for the correspondence "during the present session"

The motion was carried

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon H AYERS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it was based upon the report of a Select Committee of the other branch of the Legislature The Bill sought to repeal such portion of the existing law as applied to the issue of wine and beer licences At the present time there were two descriptions of licences, the one for retailing spirits, or rather spirits, wine, and beer, and the other for retailing wine and beer For the former description of licence, £25 were payable and for the latter, £12 10s It appeared to be desirable to do away with the latter kind of licence, and that there should be an uniform licence for which the amount payable should be £25 The Bill also provided for the transfer of licences in certain cases, where the holder had died or become insolvent or in other cases which it was difficult to provide for under the present law There was also another clause to enable the Governor, upon the recommendation of the Trinity Board to make such regulations in reference to the lighting of public-house lamps upon the sea coast as might be deemed necessary He moved that the Bill be read a second time

The Hon Captain SCOTT seconded the motion, which was carried, and the House went into Committee upon the Bill.

The Hon Captain SCOTT remarked that upon one occasion the captain of a vessel mistook the light at the public-house at Glenelg for the Lightship, and the vessel was in five fathom water before the mistake was discovered Such lights should not be so placed as to mislead vessels, but he merely mentioned the circumstance lest some people should think that this was a needless interference on the part of the Trinity Board with the public house lamps

The Hon A FORSTER remembered the circumstance alluded to, but it could not have been the lamp of the hotel which was mistaken for the light at the Lightship, because that faced the north and was entirely screened from vessels coming up He rather expected that one of the windows of the hotel, which were occasionally very bright, must have been mistaken for the Lightship He mentioned the circumstance because perhaps it might be found necessary to make other arrangements than those which were mentioned in this Bill

The various clauses having been passed the report was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

BOARD OF WORKS BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, reminded the House that a short time since a Bill passed the Assembly and was introduced to that House, having for its object to expunge the various Boards carrying on different public works from the functions conferred upon them That Bill was discussed in that House, but hon members did not think that the principle would be conducive to the public interest or the welfare of the colony, and rejected the Bill, but an opinion was at the same time very generally expressed that the various Boards should be brought under the more direct responsibility and control of the Commissioner of Public Works, and that was precisely the object of this Bill

The Hon J MORPHETT had great pleasure in seconding the motion, remembering the discussion which took place upon the occasion to which the Hon the Chief Secretary had referred The Council rejected the former Bill, but he felt that the one before the House would commend itself strongly to their views It was a very short and simple Bill, and accomplished simply what the House desired, that public works should be under the control of the Commissioner of Public Works, who being a responsible member of the Crown, it was thought should have power over the various Boards

The motion for the second reading was carried, and the House went into Committee upon the Bill

The Hon Captain HALL asked if it was intended that the Bill should make the Commissioner of Public Works the executive officer He gathered from it that the Commissioner of Public Works would be able to order things to be done or undone at his will and pleasure

The CHIEF SECRETARY gathered from the Bill, that the different Boards would act under the direct control of the Government, through the Commissioner of Public Works, who would be responsible to the Legislature If it were not so, there would be no responsibility at all

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, a clause was added, giving the Act effect from the passing thereof, and the various clauses having been agreed to with amendments, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an order of the day for the following Tuesday.

IMPRISONED DEBTORS ENLARGEMENT BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said that its object was to provide for the enlargement of imprisoned debtors who were without means By the Insolvent Act, which had been passed during the previous year, certain conditions were imposed with respect to the insertion of advertisements and the payment of fees of Court Where an insolvent was entirely without means the Government could forego payment for the insertion of advertisements in the Government Gazette, and the Insolvent Court could forego the fees, but there was no power to compel the newspaper proprietors to forego their charge for advertising, and instances had occurred in which unfortunate debtors had been detained for several months in gaol merely because they were not able to pay for the advertisements in the newspapers The Bill provided that in cases of extreme poverty, insolvents should not be bound to advertise in the newspapers and as the Government would forego their fees of Court, the insolvent would be enabled to pass the Court or to receive that justice which was due to him He did not apprehend there would be any objection to the Bill

The Hon Capt SCOTT seconded the motion for the second reading

The Hon A FORSTER did not rise for the purpose of opposing the Bill, but the Hon the Chief Secretary had certainly failed to satisfy him of the necessity for the measure The object of the Bill appeared to be to dispense with very important notices in reference to the estates of insolvent debtors, and when an insolvent debtor was not able to pay it was thought by the Chief Secretary that these advertisements might be dispensed with The object of the Legislature in providing that these notices should be published in the public papers was to give publicity to such notices The Chief Secretary thought the publication could be dispensed with if the insolvent were unable to pay, but he should have thought the view of the hon gentleman would rather have been to confirm the view of the Legislature in determining that publicity should have been given Notices might as well be put in the fire as in the Government Gazette, and it was because it was known that that obscure print had no circulation that it was determined the notices should be published in the public journals It was not sufficient that the hon gentleman should say because debtors were unable to pay, that therefore the notices should not be published He should have thought that the hon gentleman might have discovered some means of continuing the advertisements by raising funds from some of those multifarious sources which were available when the Government had some purpose to carry out in reference to the public interest He did not think he should oppose the Bill, but he must say that he did not see any ground for it

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that he had some apprehension that he would not be able to satisfy the Hon Mr Forster, but he thought he had satisfied the House generally Where there was nothing for the creditors to get he thought it would be sufficient to publish the notices in the Gazette without subsidising the newspapers

The Bill was then read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

the Chief Secretary whether the expense which would be entailed by the Bill would be £1000 or only a few shillings He asked the question because he wished to know that they were not engaged in passing a Bill which was uncalled for

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that cases which the Bill was intended to remedy were constantly occurring At present there were two parties in gaol who were maintained there at the Government expense, merely because they had no means of liberating themselves by paying the advertising charges Those parties had been in gaol for months, and he must contend that this was not after all such a small thing, as it affected the liberty of the subject The Government had no money from which they could pay the cost of advertising in the public journals, and it would consequently be much better that it should not be rendered necessary that the expense should be incurred

The Hon Dr DAVIES asked if the Bill was retrospective? If not it ought to be, as expenses already incurred with newspaper proprietors should be liquidated

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Bill would not be retrospective, but there was a provision that under certain circumstances advertisements in the public journals would be no longer necessary

The Hon Dr DAVIES complained that members were called upon to assent to Bills which they really had had no time to consider The Bill under discussion had only been left at his house that morning, and he had not had time to consider it

The Hon A FORSTER said the Hon the Chief Secretary had stated that there were two parties in gaol who had been there for two months, in consequence of being unable to pay for the advertisements, and that they had been maintained at the public expense He wished to ask the hon gentleman what cost had been incurred in maintaining these two parties, and what sum it would have been necessary to advance to secure their liberty

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY thought he could be hardly expected to answer the question off-hand, but he should be happy to answer the question, if the hon gentleman would give notice

The Hon Captain HALL considered the question of the Hon Mr Forster exceedingly pertinent, because it was possible that the men might have been kept at a heavy cost, and that the price of a fortnight's rations would have been sufficient to pay for the advertisements It appeared to him the Bill was much-ado-about-nothing All Governments sometimes expended money without authority, though they afterwards got an indemnity, which would be readily given where it could be shewn that a small expenditure had prevented a necessity for a large outlay

The various clauses were agreed to with amendments, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

STANDING ORDERS

Upon the motion of the Hon Captain HALL the Standing Orders were suspended to enable the Council to dispose of some of the business which appeared upon the paper for the following Tuesday

LONGBOTTOM'S PATENT BILL

The Hon H AYERS in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it had been referred to a Select Committee, who had reported that the preamble was proved The object of the Bill was to secure Abraham Longbottom the right of manufacturing gas from oil and fatty matter

The Bill was read a second time, a clause being added to give it effect from the date of passing, the report was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following Tuesday

The Council adjourned at 3 o'clock till 2 o'clock on the following Tuesday

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS

Mr SOLOMON presented a petition from Captain John Finnis, complaining that justice had not been done him in reference to the publication of the debates of the Houses of Legislature for the first session The petition was received and read

MESSRS YATES'S STATION

Mr BURFORD gave notice that on the 21st instant he should ask the Commissioner of Crown Lands to lay upon the table of the House all correspondence between Messrs J & S Yates and Mr John Haimes, connected with the use of water upon Messrs Yates's station

THE ESTIMATES

Mr PEAKE gave notice that on the 22nd instant he should move that it was desirable the Estimates should be laid upon the table of the House within fourteen days of the meeting of Parliament

CAPTAIN J F DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL gave notice that on the 21st instant he should move that on the 22nd instant the report of the Select Committee upon the petition of Captain J F Duff be taken into consideration with the view of presenting an address to His Excellency praying that the sum of £150 8s might be placed on the Estimates as compensation to Captain Duff, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee.

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS

Mr SOLOMON gave notice that on the 21st instant he should move the petition of Captain John Finnis be printed

MECHANICS' INSTITUTIONS

Mr ROGERS gave notice that on the 21st instant he should ask the Attorney-General what system the Government intended to adopt with respect to supplementing contributions towards Mechanics Institutions

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that on the following Tuesday he should move that the reasons assigned by the Legislative Council for disallowing the amendments made by the Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill be taken into consideration

SALARIES TO OFFICERS OF BOARDS

Mr REYNOLDS said it would be remembered that on the previous day he was desirous of postponing the third reading of the Public Works Bill, but as the Bill had passed the third reading, and had gone to the other branch of the Legislature, he had no wish to proceed with the following notice of motion in his name, and should allow it to lapse—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the salaries of all officers employed under the Harbor Trust Act the Trinity Board, the Central Road Board, the Railway Board and the Waterworks Board, should be voted on the Estimates, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to direct a Bill to be introduced immediately, providing for the alteration of the several Acts in this respect"

WASTE LANDS

Mr REYNOLDS said, with respect to the next notice of motion in his name, he found there was such anxiety to get on with the business, and to bring the session to a close, and as he found that the Assessment on Stock Bill appeared on the paper for that day, he did not think the returns could be furnished in sufficient time to be of any service in helping hon members to a correct conclusion upon the Bill He would at all events, ask leave of the House to proceed with the notice of motion No 3 in his name, before proceeding with motion No 2

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS stated in reference to motion No 2, that he expected the return asked for would be in the House in the course of a few minutes, at least the return which he expected would embrace the greater portion of the information asked for, but there was one portion, the latter part, which would take a very long time to prepare, as it embraced 700 or 800 different items, and would not be of the importance which was apparently contemplated by the hon mover

Mr REYNOLDS should be glad of all the information he could obtain, and formally moved the following notice of motion in his name, which was carried —

"That, in order to enable this House to form an accurate opinion as to the value of the Waste Lands held by the squatters under lease from the Crown, it is essential that the following returns be laid on the table prior to the passing of the Assessment on Stock Bill viz —

I A return of the leases granted in the years 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, to 1st December, 1858, stating the names of the lessees, the number of square miles in each lease, and the rent

II A return, for the same years, of the number of acres resumed by the Crown, also, the quantity sold out of the land thus resumed from each lease, together with the names of the purchasers, and the amount paid for each purchase"

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

Mr REYNOLDS moved—

"That the report of the Select Committee on Railway Management be taken into consideration, with the view of moving—That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to take the necessary steps to abolish the Railway Commission and to appoint other management, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee"

He would not have tabled the motion so early after the report of the Select Committee had been brought up, had it not been that there was so little time left, particularly for independent members, to take action upon any matter upon which they might feel disposed to do so The Committee had sat for a long time, and had amassed a large amount of evidence, they had narrowly investigated the entire management of the railway Very likely he might be met by hon members stating that they had not had sufficient time to consider the report and examine the evidence, but he was quite sure that the Government would not be justified in taking that course, because they had brought forward very extensive and important Bills which they had asked the House to swallow at once, without allowing time for digesting them, and he therefore believed that the Government, to be consistent, would not urge that objection Whilst there had been a great deal of hasty Legislation, the Government had no right to complain that they were now called upon to consider the report. He had been induced to bring forward the motion because he perceived there was great anxiety to prorogue, and this was one of those matters in which he felt personally great interest. His action with regard to the hon. gentlemen opposite, shewed indeed that he felt a deep interest in railway management, or he should not appear upon the side of the House which he did. He might also say that another reason for bringing forward the motion was that he saw no disposition at present on the part of the Government to remove the anomaly to which he drew the attention of the House, by tabling a motion to the effect that the position held by the Chief Engineer of the railway as Chief Commissioner was anomalous, and not likely to give the Chief Commissioner that control over the management of the railway which the country had a right to demand. He felt bound to bring the motion forward, in order that the House might be afforded an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the point, and that the Government might have no excuse for not remedying those anomalies, and present defects in the management of the Railway. The impression which he had about the management of the Railway and the absence of proper control and management amounted now to certainty in his mind, and he was sure in the mind of the country and Committee, though, perhaps not all of the Committee, for it was possible that the Commissioner of Public Works might have formed a different opinion, and that he might have wished to adopt a complimentary report to the effect that he could see no fault or blemish in the management of the railway. If the hon. gentleman did hold such an opinion, he believed that he was the only member of the Committee who dissented from the opinion which he (Mr. Reynolds) had stated that he held. He wished to draw the attention of the House to a few answers which had been given by witnesses who had been examined before the Committee, and he would also quote the question. The House would readily admit that control was necessary in so important an undertaking as the management of railways; but upon referring to question 39 it would be seen by the evidence of the Chief Commissioner (Mr. Hanson), when asked how often the Commissioners met, that they met once and occasionally twice a week, and usually sat from two hours and a-half to three hours. That was the amount of supervision and control. When asked who had the management of the railway in the absence of the Commissioners, it would be found upon reference to questions 167 to 169, Mr. Hanson stated that he could scarcely tell whether the Secretary was responsible for what took place in his (Mr. Hanson's) absence; and further, Mr. Hanson also stated that as Commissioner, he was not bound to attend except upon Board days. Subsequently the Secretary and the Traffic Manager were pointed to as the parties responsible, but upon referring to the evidence of Mr. Borrow (the Secretary) it would be found that gentleman stated his duty was to keep the minute book, to attend the Board, and to do anything which he was called upon to do. Mr. Borrow stated that he had received no definite instructions as to his duties, but that he attended the Commissioners on all occasions and the Board meetings. Again, to questions 482 and 483, the Secretary stated that the management was supposed to be in the Commissioners, but that in their absence he should think each man in his respective position had charge; that he was seldom absent for an hour; that he saw that others were at their work, and he considered it his duty, in the absence of the Commissioners, to take notice of what occurred; that he considered he should be liable to censure if he did not do so; and that, as he occupied a position close to the platform, he could see all that was going on. That was Mr. Borrow's evidence; and as the Committee were informed that the Traffic Manager was also responsible, it would be well to see what he said upon the point. In answer to questions 1,079 and 1,080, as to what were his duties, the Traffic Master stated that they were not defined when he accepted his appointment; that they were not defined by any orders or documents; that he had received no instructions; but that he had arrived at a conclusion as to what were his duties from his experience on other lines. That was the loose state of responsibility which existed in reference to railway management. The Committee were informed that the superintendent of the locomotive department, the superintendent of the carriage department, and others were responsible, but they stated that they had received no written instructions, and that their duties had never been defined. It was strange, but if hon. members would refer, they would find that printed instructions were issued to every servant upon the railway, and yet it appeared, that no one at the head of a department ever saw them. At the last moment it was ascertained that these documents did exist, but not one of the officers upon the railway had ever received definite instructions. With regard to the heads of the various departments he would remark that although there were many heads, they were heads without responsibility. With regard to the Traffic Manager, Mr. Cherry, there was a time when he performed the duties of Secretary to the Board of Commissioners in connection with the City and Port Railway, and at that time he had no assistance as Traffic Master, and, independently of these offices, had the management of all the goods department. But now the Traffic Manager had an assistant, although the goods traffic had been let to Fuller and Co., thus relieving him from the traffic department, which formed the greater portion of his duties. He thought it very natural that when Mr. Fuller was examined he should state that he could not see the use of a Traffic Manager. Nor could he (Mr. Reynolds) see the necessity; but at all events if a Traffic Manager were necessary it could not be necessary that he should have an assistant. Cherry, the Traffic Manager, stated that he performed certain duties in connection with the locomotives; but when Clarke, the locomotive superintendent, was examined, he stated that he had nothing to do with Cherry, but that he was responsible for getting the engines out, and that if any accident occurred, he on his own responsibility got out the engines. The Traffic Manager stated that it was his duty to marshal the trains, but the evidence showed that this duty was performed by the Passenger Manager. The duties of Cherry appeared to be performed by other parties, and he believed that a man of energy and business tact could get the railway managed at far less expense, and that thousands a year might readily be saved, and really efficient management obtained. Clarke, the locomotive superintendent told the Committee that he could also take charge of the carriage department with little assistance, and it appeared that the Assistant Traffic Manager was engaged in taking statistics of railway stock. It was found that Clarke, the locomotive superintendent, also kept accounts of the running of the engines, the Assistant Traffic Manager keeping statistics in connection with the running of the rolling stock and Clarke of the wear and tear of the engines, and so on. Now it appeared to him that Clarke, whom he believed to be an efficient man, might have the control of the carriage department, and as he was at present engaged in keeping statistics he might also keep statistics of the running of rolling stock. By such a course they would be enabled to dispense with the assistance of the Assistant Traffic Manager and the superintendent of the carriage department. The latter might be a good mechanic, but he thought it would be admitted from the manner in which he gave his evidence that he was incompetent to be the manager of so important a department as the carriage department. He believed that impression existed upon the minds of other members of the Committee, unless, indeed, it had been removed by the Chief Engineer. He believed that not only the parties he had named but that the storekeeper and timekeeper might be dispensed with. In the locomotive department not only was there a superintendent, but a foreman of the men, a timekeeper, and a storekeeper—a funny lot of officers truly—and yet they were coolly told by the chief engineer, Mr. Hanson, that he could not tell what the engines cost, nor could he see where a saving could be made, as all the cost went into a lump and that there was not even an account kept of the stores, as everything was charged as it was bought. He would ask where was the use of storekeepers in the locomotive and carriage departments? By uniting the locomotive and carriage departments, the servants and officers to whom he had alluded might be dispensed with, and this alone would effect a very considerable saving. He (Mr. Reynolds) thought that he could have pointed out to the Chief Commissioner, who had had 18 years' experience of such matters how thousands per annum might be saved to the public, if he had applied his mind, with his 18 years' experience, to the subject. Then, again, it appeared by the evidence of Mr. Spence, the Accountant, that he formerly performed some of the duties which were now performed by the Secretary; and Mr. Spence stated that, with a little assistance he could perform the duties of both offices. In justice to Mr. Spence, he felt bound to state that there were no grounds whatever for a charge which had been made relative to his accounts not having been properly kept. Having made a statement to that effect in that House, he felt bound fully to exonerate Mr. Spence, and should have been too happy to exonerate every officer in connection with the railway department against whom charges had been made. But he could not do so. The Attorney General smiled, but he repeated that he could not exonerate the Chief Engineer from the charge of serious neglect of duty, particularly when that gentleman stated that he did not know where a saving could be effected. After such a statement it was clear that the Chief Engineer was not competent for the position which he held. Under existing circumstances there was no efficient head to any department; they were merely nominal heads. There was no interest evinced in the management of the railway. He should be happy to acknowledge that what he had previously stated in reference to the mismanagement was unfounded, but it could not be said that the Chief Engineer had performed his duties satisfactorily. He had spoken of a minute-book being kept, and the Committee had reported upon the manner in which that book was kept. He (Mr. Reynolds) stated unhesitatingly that he had never seen the minute-book of any company kept in so loose a way as the minute-book was kept by the Secretary to the Railway Commissioners. He had the highest respect for that gentleman, but he must still say that the minute-book was no credit to his abilities as Secretary. There was another curious thing to which he would allude, showing that had the railway been properly managed, the Commissioners would have seen the necessity of instituting a searching enquiry. He would call the attention of the House to the subject of apprentices in the locomotive department, which would be found referred to in questions 15 and 58. The question of additional rolling stock was another matter which he (Mr Reynolds) felt great interest in and he was anxious to know the cause of the delay in carrying out the instructions of November, 1857, for the construction of waggon bodies On this subject he would refer the House to question 928 in Mr Fuller's evidence [The hon member read the question, and several succeeding it] It was of no use for the Chief Commissioner to say that he had made additional accommodation, so that he would not require so many trucks It was more to the public interest to keep the waggons going, and how any man of experience could put such a plan forward as the Engineer had, he (Mr Reynolds) could not understand He would now refer to Council Paper 139 of last year In that the Engineer said that additional waggons and two engines were wanted, and that damages to the extent of £4,000 or £5,000 had been paid for want of them, which need not otherwise have been incurred The House voted money for the waggons, and he (Mr Reynolds) pressed the matter upon his colleagues But he found that instead of 80 waggons, only 13 waggon bodies were made by the railway authorities, and 40 were made by public tender, the contractors being the Messrs Wyatt At the Bowden workshop, where great facilities existed and the waggons could be constructed better and cheaper than by anybody else, only 13 were made in 12 months, whereas they were wanted on the 12th November, or 12 months previously The House would hear presently what the Engineer had to say for not having constructed these waggons It might be remembered that money was sent to England for 80 pairs of wheels and axles, and when these arrived the waggon bodies were not built Why were these wheels and axles sent for if they were not wanted? He would read from question 3,146, page 98, of Mr Hanson's evidence [The hon member read several questions and replies, the latter to the effect that Mr Hanson did not build the waggons at first because he had not wheels and axles, and that subsequently he had made arrangements which would increase the facilities of the traffic The witness also said that he could not at first estimate the traffic, having been but a short time on the line Now as to cost for it was on that ground that the Government had not more waggons made at the railway workshop, though in consequence of the pressing necessity and the facility of constructing them at the shop, an order for 40 was given there [The hon member here read another extract from the evidence to show that there was no accurate means of estimating the cost of the waggons made at the workshop] He (Mr Reynolds) had made charges of favouritism He believed now that there were strong grounds for a suspicion that the Assistant Engineer had a share in contracts, and that suspicion had not yet been removed (Ironical hear hear, from the Attorney-General) The Assistant Engineer had the control of some £30 000 in 1856, and according to the evidence of the Auditor General, this money was never certified for except by the signature of the Assistant Engineer It was not until a charge was made by a working man, that he did not receive his wages, that the Commissioners insisted on an officer being present when the men were paid Two of the contractors stated that trial holes were sunk along the line to show where ballast could be procured, but Messrs Beveridge & Coulthard went along the line and saw no ballast holes, though if these gentlemen knew that ballast could be procured, where Messrs Jewel & Penyman obtained it their tenders would have been much lower He would now show the large loss which had been sustained from want of proper management There were losses on flour and bran, and other matters, amounting to many hundreds of pounds (An hon member —"Where?") He (Mr Reynolds) saw, for instance, that Harrison Brothers, of Gawler Town lost 136 bags of bran and flour, and that there was still a dispute with them about 60 or 70 bags which had been left to stand over for 12 or 18 months The Commissioners made an offer of submitting the matter to the Local Court, provided Harrison Brothers would pay 8*l* 5s to try the question But afterwards, on the recommendation of their legal adviser, the Commissioners would not take any steps in the matter He would now refer to the coke-shed [The hon member here read another extract from the evidence] A sum had been voted for the buildings which were here shown to be necessary, but nothing was done to them as yet The engines were suffering also, and the cost of additional sheds was estimated at £1,600, which had been voted 12 months ago, yet not a stone had been laid yet £2,000 had also been voted for goods sheds, and nothing was done to them, as after 12 or 18 months consideration the engineer found that the sum was not sufficient He (Mr Reynolds) did not know that anything had been done in the matter yet If any money was wanted for the railway in future under its present management, he should conclude that it was not wanted for 12 months to come, and should vote accordingly It was also found that the water of the Torrens was injuring the boilers but still the engineer did nothing until about April fool's day, or the 1st April, when he took some action in the matter But this was not until the Government drew his attention to the subject, and when a report was made on the rolling stock, and representations sent to the Commissioner of Public Works on the subject Then, instead of ascertaining whether the engines in the locomotive department could raise the water, the Engineer went to Messrs Pybus and Wyatt, and gave them a contract to supply the railway with water He might have done that before, if he felt that interest in the railway management which he was bound to feel but there was an entire want of interest amongst the railway authorities Knowing this to be the case, was he (Mr Reynolds) not justified in asking his colleagues to remove these men as unfit for the positions they held? He now came to the letting of the goods traffic He had before said and the Council Paper said also, that the contract with the Messrs Fuller was so strangely drawn that a mercantile man could not possibly understand it He found Mr Fuller admitting that certain things in the contract required to be explained in order to be understood, and how was it possible for any man to tender unless the specifications were intelligible The contract with Messrs Fuller was unintelligible, as hon members would see by questions 860, 871 and 874 He now came to the specifications of August last, and in reference to this, perhaps he should exonerate the Commissioners, as the Commissioner of Public Works was more responsible for it He (Mr Reynolds) read the specification, and though there was now a commercial gentleman at the head of the Public Works Department, he (Mr Reynolds) could not understand the document It appeared that after tenders were called for it was necessary to make further alteration in the specifications, and there being no response to the call for tenders a different arrangement was made with Fuller & Co, The Government placed themselves at the mercy of these gentlemen, because the specifications were such as he (Mr Reynolds), as a man of business, could not understand The hon member further observed that some of the witnesses examined before the Committee could not understand the contract He now came to another matter, and that was the charge which he had made against one of the Commissioners, Mr Colley, of tendering in the name of another party for tarpaulin to himself, or rather to other Commissioners He (Mr Reynolds) considered that statement fully borne out Mr Colley solicited Mr Allen, of King William-street, to tender for the tarpaulin, not in Mr Colley's name, but in his (Mr Allen's) name The tarpaulins were not of the specified size The Commissioners required them 20 feet by 14 feet, but Mr Colley's were 20 feet by 24 feet, and by cutting them in two they would be nearly of the specified size, being 20 feet by 12 feet The tenders were sent in in the name of Allen It seemed that it would be reasonable to take the cheaper tarpaulins of Mr Michelmore, which were of the requisite size of 20 feet by 14 feet, and which could be got at 72s , whilst the others would cost 63s , a very fair price for 20 feet by 12 feet But there was something more paid than 63s The tarpaulins cost 12s more, or 75s altogether, instead of 72s The reason assigned was that those of Mr Colley were of better quality' and he (Mr Reynolds) would give them the benefit of that But it appeared the Commissioners would not pay Mr Allen 12s each for sewing and eyelets, but only 9s , thus bringing the tarpaulins down to the price of Mr Michelmore's, and Mr Colley had to pay the 3s difference out of his own pocket Even if Mr Colley did not intend to do wrong the matter did not look very straightforward, as Mr Colley should have put the tender in in his own name Besides, other parties might have had tarpaulins of 20 feet by 12 feet Having said this, he thought he had said quite sufficient to show that the present management required alteration , and the Committee had come unanimously to the same opinion, viz "That it was very desirable, in order to secure greater economy and more efficient control and management, that, without further delay, the railways should be placed under one Manager, whose time should be exclusively devoted to them, rather than that they should continue to be managed by a Board of Commissioners "

Mr SOLOMON seconded the motion The hon mover had gone so fully into the complaints against the management of the railway as to preclude him (Mr Solomon) from entering at any length into the subject He would, however, touch upon one point which the hon member had not alluded to, viz —the gross neglect of the Commissioners in having parted with the whole control of the carrying power to Messrs Fuller without retaining over those gentlemen any control If he had the permission of the House, he would prove the facts which he had now stated, by laying before the House the letters which he held in his had He proposed to show that in consequence of the mismanagement and neglect of the Commissioners, the goods which should reach town in 24 hours, were from time to time six or seven days upon the line He alluded particularly to sugars As there were a number of commercial gentlemen members of the House, they must know that sugar was one of the articles liable to such fluctuations, that such a detention might cause a falling off in value of from £8 to £10 a ton That such a state of things should exist the House would acknowledge was wrong , yet he (Mr Solomon) was in a position to prove it, not only by letters from the contractors in reply to others which he would read, but also by cart-notes of the contractors and telegrams, showing the time during which the goods were detained He had also an acknowledgement that this mismanagement existed from the Commissioners themselves, and from the Chamber of Commerce, pointing out that the Commissioners acknowledged that the complaints were just The circumstances were these In February last two vessels from the Mauritius were discharging at the Port—one the Pauline Houghton, and the other the Mary Smith The main portion of the cargoes were to be sent to a store in Adelaide Now it was a well-known fact that on an article like sugar, especially Mauritius sugar, great difficulties existed in separating the marks and numbers, and it was found that the contractors, instead of keeping each cargo separate and sending them up so, mixed them on the trucks and on the drays On the storekeeper demanding to whom they were to be delivered, that individual was asked for a receipt, and told he might separate the sugars himself the best way he could It was naturally to be presumed that over such conduct somebody would have control, and so after frequent verbal requests to Fuller & Co, which were of no avail, the following letter was written to these gentlemen —

"City Auction Mart, Adelaide, Feb 27, 1858

"Sirs—Drays are arriving at our mart, having sugars thereon for ships Pauline Haughton and Mary Smith

"We hereby give you notice that we will not receive any sugars from the Railway unless those by the different vessels are kept separate, nor will we receive any from the Railway after 5 o'clock It will, therefore, be at your own risk and peril if you store them in consequence of our refusal to receive them, in consequence of the shipments not being kept separate on the arrival at our stores after the proper hours of business

"Yours, &c,

"E SOLOMON & Co

"Messrs Henry Fuller & Co, S A R"

This required explanation, but he would show what it meant It was found that while the drays were sometimes employed in carting stone for the contractors during the day, and that it was only towards evening that they were suddenly loaded, and the sugar rushed into the yard, 10 or 12 dray-loads at a time, after proper business hours This up to the time he (Mr Solomon) spoke of was a thing looked forward to, and in consequence the storekeeper remained for an hour or two But when the mixing of the sugar was resorted to, the storeman would not wait any longer Now, if Mr Fuller was, as he was supposed to be a public servant, a courteous reply to the letter which he (Mr Solomon) had read should have been made But instead of that the word "bosh"—(laughter)—was written across the letter, and it was enclosed back leaving it to the writers to take what course they liked This course was most improper, but he thought he could show it was not so much the fault of the contractors as of the Commissioners, who, in giving the contract, did not hold the contractors under control He would presently show that this had not been done The hon member here read the following letter —

"City Auction Mart, Adelaide, February 27, 1858

"Gentlemen—We are constantly in the habit of receiving goods by the drays from the Port Railway and at the present moment are receiving two cargoes of sugar—one per the ship Pauline Haughton, and one from the Mary Smith The contractors of Railway, Messrs Fuller & Co, have, contrary to all usage, persisted in forwarding several dray-loads of sugar, each load having parcels by the different ships, and our storekeepers have in consequence found it impossible to keep correct accounts

"We have sent a verbal message requesting that this course should not be persisted in, but finding our messenger treated with the greatest incivility, we found it necessary to write a letter to Messrs Fuller & Co upon the subject

"We expected a reply from Messrs Fuller & Co couched in terms of civility at least, and you will no doubt be as much astonished as we were when we request your attention to our own letter, returned to us under cover (and which we forward for your inspection), with a remark thereon which none but a most impertinent man could make

"We suppose that Messrs Fuller & Co are in some measure public servants, and as their contract is held from your Board we presume you have some means of punishing them for impertinence and irregularity and for that reason appeal to you with the greatest confidence

"We are, &c,

"E SOLOMON & Co

"To the Honorable the Railway Commissioners, South Australia"

The writers expected an immediate answer to this letter but in vain, for nine days elapsed before they received one, and on the 9th day, as he supposed after duly considering and seeing how they could best reply without committing themselves, and knowing the act complained of was wrong, the Commissioners wrote the following letter, in the last line of which they committed themselves —

"South Australian Railway, Adelaide, March 8, 1858

"Dear Sirs—I am directed by the Commissioners to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th February, complaining that your sugars are not delivered with that observance of regularity which can alone ensure correctness The Commissioners regret this very much, for it is their earnest desire that the affairs of the Railway should be carried on in the best possible manner, and that great respect should be paid to those who favor them with their employ

"In this instance they have not failed to offer their opinion very freely to Messrs Fuller and Co, and they feel assured that what they have said will effectually prevent a repetition of such conduct, but for the present Messrs Fuller and Co are the carriers upon the line

"I have, &c,

"R BORROW, Secretary

"To Messrs Solomon & Co"

If that was not an acknowledgment that they had no control, he (Mr Solomon) would like to know what was They admitted that Messrs Fuller & Co had the contract, and it followed that the Commissioners had no control But there was another cargo of sugar discharged from the Eleanora and this was sent up when sugar was fluctuating, so that some kinds went down from £60 to £35, and every day was an object of at least £5 Yet, in order that the contractors might punish the firm which he (Mr Solomon) spoke of for their impertinence in daring to interfere between them and the Commissioners, the sugar which was landed on the 1st April was delivered on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th He (Mr Solomon) had Messrs Fuller's cart-notes in proof of this Was this proper supervision or a proper hold over the contractors when these gentlemen could, in opposition to the interests of the public, take such time as they pleased to bring up goods, which might be the ruin of many a small shopkeeper Men who could make such a contract were not fit to be Commissioners of Railways This last case was laid before the Chamber of Commerce, and every member of that body admitted the injustice, several complaining that they were subjected to the same treatment The hon member here read the following letter, which he had received from the Chamber of Commerce on the subject —

"Chamber of Commerce, May 27, 1858

"Gentlemen—In the matter of the complaint made by you at the last general meeting of the Chamber against the railway carriers on the Port line, I am directed by the Committee to state that they have ascertained that the contract with Messrs Fuller & Co will expire on the 31st instant, and that the Commissioners have entered into a new arrangement with them, coming into operation on June 1, on terms more satisfactory to the public, the carriers to be in future the Agents of the Commissioners, entirely under their control, and responsible to them

"Under these circumstances the Committee are of opinion it would serve no good purpose to proceed further in the matter the Commissioners appearing to admit in their letter to you that your complaint was just

"I return the correspondence on the subject, and

"Have the honor to be, Gentlemen,

"Your obedient servant,

"D MELVILLE, Secretary

"Messrs E Solomon & Co, Adelaide"

Now he (Mr Solomon) thought that the only point on which the hon member for the Sturt had not touched was the one which he had referred to He thought he had shown the House that, as regarded the carriage on the line—a most important branch—the Commissioners had failed to show their capacity for the task they had undertaken Under these circumstances he would support the resolution of the hon member for the Sturt He trusted it would meet the support of the House, which would show that hon members valued, and appreciated services to the public properly performed, and also how they would deal with them when performed so disgracefully as they had been in this instance

Mr MILNE opposed the motion, not because he did not sympathise in it, but because it would be impossible for the Government to act on it during the present session It appeared to him impossible, if they passed the address in its present form, for the Governor to take the steps called for in it The Commission was constituted by the Act of the Legislature, and it would be impossible for the Government to abolish it without the joint action of both Houses of the Legislature Considering the late period of the session and the very long time which had elapsed since the labors of the Committee commenced, it was too late now to expect the Government to introduce a measure to carry out the request of the address, but he thought it would be competent and very proper for the House to adopt the report He could understand that this would be such an endorsement of the opinions of the Committee that it would act as an instruction to the Government to take care that when the next session commenced, they should introduce a Bill for the purpose of carrying out the report of the Railway Committee He cordially agreed in all that had been said in reference to the superseding of the Commission by one active head in charge of the whole department, but there were many points alluded to which it was not necessary for him to follow up some of which he agreed in, and very many of which he dissented from The House was in possession of the whole of the evidence—("hear, hear," from Mr Reynolds)—and also of the report—a report which he (Mr Milne) was quite prepared to justify, and which contained recommendations that everything mentioned in the motion should be done He thought if the House adopted the report, every good or necessary end would be served which the hon member had in view (No, no, from Mr Reynolds) There was one point he could not help alluding to viz, what the hon member (Mr Reynolds) had said respecting the Chief Engineer He alluded to that because the hon member had expressed himself in very strong language (Hear, hear, from Mr Reynolds) The hon member said the Engineer was negligent, incapable, and unfit to take charge of the railway He (Mr Milne) did not sympathise at all in that opinion, and he was quite certain that in saying so, he repeated the opinion of the Committee (Hear, hear) He did not pretend to maintain that Mr Hanson was infallible, or anything approaching it, but in the line from Adelaide to Gawler Town which that gentleman constructed, the permanent way, and everything connected with the works entitled him to credit instead of blame (Hear, hear) There were some points in which it was possible to find fault with Mr Hanson's management, but the opinions expressed by the hon member (Mr Reynolds) he (Mr Milne) utterly repudiated He moved as an amendment "That the report of the Committee appointed to investigate into the management of the South Australian Railways be agreed to, and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief requesting him to take early steps to carry out the recommendations thereof"

Mr Hawker seconded the amendent, which he believed almost met the views of the hon member for the Sturt ("Hear, hear," from Mr Reynolds) There was no person on the Committee but would admit that mistakes were made, but in the initiation of so great a work as the first railway of the colony, that was what must be looked for (A laugh) But as far as errors were pointed out, they were rectified in as speedy a manner as possible, or would be remedied in the course of time

The Commissioner of Public Works would say a few words, and only a few, partly because of the hour, partly because the subject had been so often before the House, and partly because the amendment could not fail to be adopted The hon mover (Mr Reynolds) admitted that the House had not had time to consider the report, but he (the Commissioner of Public Works) would recommend hon members to take that report home with them, and read, not isolated passages, but the whole report, and they would be better informed on the subject It was unfortunate that the hon mover had had a difference with Mr Hanson, and also that the hon seconder had a difference with Mr Fuller But no allusion had been made to the testimonial in that gentleman's favor from 104 firms, stating that they were fully satisfied with the manner in which the Messrs Fuller had executed their contract Unfortunately the names were not attached to the document, but they were those of the first firms in the colony, such firms as Elder, Sterling & Co, and Levi & Co For his (the hon Commissioner's) own part, he did not stand there to justify incivility, and he did not wish to make of Mr Fuller anything but an able man of business He did not justify the expression written on the letter of Mr Solomon, but he would say there was not an abler man of business in Adelaide or one who could better manage the contract he held than Mr Fuller This of course was only his (the hon Commissioner's) individual opinion It was said the Commissioners had no control over Mr Fuller, but was a deposit of £4,000 worth of deeds no control? The House was told by the hon member for the Sturt that that hon member could not understand the specifications He (the hon Commissioner) was sorry for this He could not explain what seemed to him so very simple, but if the hon member (Mr Reynolds) pointed out the portion, which he could not understand, then he (the hon Commissioner) thought that he could give on the spot an explanation of it However hon members themselves would be able to judge on this point He would remind the House had already taken action on this matter, and introduced a Bill, and if that Bill was thrown out, it was no fault of theirs There was one recommendation in the report, viz, that in reference to the leasing of the railway, which had not been alluded to, and this point would have to be taken into consideration, as well as the points spoken of by the hon member for the Sturt He (the hon Commissioner) therefore preferred the amendment

The Speaker called the hon member's attention to the fact that it was 3 o'clock

Mr Reynolds moved that the Standing Orders be suspended, in order to allow of the debate being proceeded with

The motion was put, when there appeared—Noes, 11, Ayes, 16

Ayes, 16—Messrs Burford, Cole, Glyde, Hay, Lindsay, McEllister, Mildred, Milne, Peake, Rogers, Solomon, Strangways, Townsend, Wark, Young, and Reynolds (teller)

Noes, 11—The Treasurer, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Andrews, Barrow, Collinson, Harvey, Hawker, Macdermott, Scammell, and the Attorney-General (teller)

The motion was therefore lost, and the discussion lapsed

Mr Barrow obtained an extension of time for this Committee for a week

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The House having gone into Committee on this Bill,

The Chairman said the question before the House was that clause A, moved by the hon the Attorney General, be inserted, upon which an amendment was moved by the hon member for Victoria that his (Mr Hawker's) clause No 1 be inserted

Mr Reynolds asked the Hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands for an explanation which he understood that hon member to have made to the effect that one of the schedules was impracticable

The Commissioner of Crown Lands had never said in any words that a schedule of the Bill was unworkable or could not be carried out This was only another instance of the total disregard of candour—he would not say of truth, for that would be unparliamentary—but of candour, which characterised the conduct of the hon member for the Sturt (Laughter) But there was a great difference between what he (the hon Commissioner) had said, and what the hon member attributed to him What he had said was, that in respect to cattle there would be no great difficulty even on the part of the cattle owners themselves in saying whether the returns were correct as the cattle were dispersed far over the country, and it was very difficult to muster them in order to see whether the schedule was correct This was also found to be the case in America What he (the hon Commissioner) said was, that in all Assessment Bills this objection would apply to the schedules With regard to the clause, it was in the identical words used by the hon member for Victoria, which the House had already discussed and the principle of which he believed hon members approved

Mr Reynolds did not think the hon member had thrown much light upon the subject

Mr Milne was very glad the Government had adopted the clause, which was a decided improvement on the Government Bill Hon members were aware that he had opposed the Bill because, although he felt that the squatters had too good a bargain of their runs, still he believed the Government were committed to an arrangement under which no assessment, except for district purposes, could be levied The House decided to the contrary, and the squatters through their representative, the hon member for Victoria, assented He therefore thought that all opposition should be withdrawn ("Oh, oh," from Mr Reynolds) The most obnoxious part of the Government Bill was that which contemplated giving an abatement to those squatters who had bought lands on the runs of one sheep per acre That, he (Mr Milne) considered unnecessary and unjust The squatters purchased land because at the time he felt it his interest to do so, and he (Mr Milne) could not see why such persons should receive a reward now for having consulted their own advantage If the proposal was to grant an abatement to squatters who in future should buy land, he could understand it He would move that that clause be struck out He would also call attention to clause 4 If the House substituted the amendment giving value of improvements—(cries of withdrawn)—as he found that the clause was withdrawn, his remarks were of course unnecessary

Mr Solomon expressed his general approval of this clause, which he would support, with the amendment of some minor portions of it

Mr Reynolds objected to the principle embodied in this clause, which hampered the action of any future Legislature by limiting the assessment to 2d per head

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said that under the provisions of this Bill the public would derive a considerably greater revenue than formerly, and, such being the case, he could not conceive how any one with any spirit of fairness could object to it He believed, however, the majority of the House would agree to the assessment, based on the provisions now embodied in the Bill The colony had always derived great advantages from the pastoral interest, and it had been the endeavor of the Government to ensure a proper contribution from the squatters, without placing any unjust restrictions upon them

The Attorney-General would say, in the first place, that although there could be no doubt that, in point of law, the Government had the right to tax the squatters to any extent, still such deference was paid by the Government to the report of the Committee on this question, and the circumstances under which the leases were granted, that they could not but agree to take them into consideration in framing this measure After the cordial concurrence with which the principles of the Bill had been received by the majority of hon members, he was surprised at the symptoms of opposition which were now being displayed, though not general He felt that it would have been unjust to ignore the moral claims of the squatters, which had been assented to by the Committee, and he believed what the Government had done was a reasonable concession—all that was necessary, and the Government were prepared to stand by it.

Mr Hay hoped the hon member for the Sturt would not oppose the Bill on the grounds he had stated He thought it only just and necessary that the squatters should know what they had to pay Every encouragement should be given to parties to bring stock into the colony, and nothing would tend more to this than absolutely fixing the amount of the assessment He was quite willing that the House should state now what was a fair and just rate of assessment

Mr Peake, to be consistent, must oppose this Bill, although, as the representative of the squatters in that House agreed to it, his (Mr Peake's) opposition would be exhibited in a less prominent form He objected, however, to the provision by which the lessees could surrender their leases, and renew them without limitation, and by which it was attempted to bind any future Legislature. He would like to hear the opinion of the Attorney-General on this point.

Mr GLYDE said the clause ordained that it should only effect leases granted under the Orders of Council, and those orders ceased some twelve months ago. This Bill was the effect of a compromise between the squatters and the Government and he (Mr Glyde) as one of the representatives of the people, could not see that any harm would be done by it. The only thing that might create a difficulty was, if a district rate should be imposed, the squatters, according to this clause, might refuse to pay it, as not being for general purposes.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS confirmed the explanation of the hon member for East Torrens (Mr Glyde), and said, with regard to rates levied for district purposes, these rates would only be levied under the operation of the District Councils Act, in which case that portion of the run within the boundary of the district would be withdrawn, and subject to all the authority exercised by virtue of the District Councils Act.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL again stated, in answer to Mr Peake, that a legal power was possessed by the Legislature to impose the assessment but there was a moral claim recognised by the Committee, on behalf of the squatters, which he thought that House should also recognise. The hon member for the Burra and Clare must be aware that it was a fixed principle that nothing injured the value of property more than the uncertainty of tenure.

Mr MILDRED was surprised at the amended clause containing a proviso which was not in the original clause. What he referred to was the guaranteeing what a succeeding Parliament should do. He would wish all the words after "rendered" in the 14th line to be omitted.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the clause was voluntarily introduced on the part of the Government. It was not forced upon them as had been inferred by an hon member.

The clause was passed as printed.

Clause 2 (clause A substituted), "Governor on surrender of old lease to grant new lease."

Mr LINDSAY hoped such a clause as this would not be passed. It contained all the worst features of the original one. He objected to the privileges which were under this clause conferred upon some portions of the lessees of the Crown to the exclusion of other portions. He suggested that the whole contribution should be in the shape of rent, though the amount were exceeded, and this would obviate the complication attached to an assessment. In the shape in which the clause stood at present he should have to vote against it, because he should be ashamed to belong to any Legislature which would be guilty of passing such a law. (Laughter.) With respect to the assertion of the Attorney-General that the Government had certain powers irrespective of moral claims, he could very well understand that. It was maintained that the King could do no wrong, and that maxim might apply in this case. But kings had been beheaded before now. Whether they had the power to cut off the Governor's head he did not exactly know—perhaps they had. (Great laughter.)

Mr BARROW said if the House should ever proceed to legislate by resolution he thought the hon member who had just sat down was as likely to be selected for decapitation as any one. (Hear, and laughter.) But as the business they were now discussing was not the decapitation of Kings and Governors, he would refer to what was more immediately before them. The Government had introduced a Bill to ensure a proportionate contribution from the squatters estimated to amount to some £20,000. That Bill had been considered. The legal right to impose the assessment had not been disputed but it was considered unfair considering the moral claims of the squatters, and consequently reported against. Now another proposition was brought before the House which would bring in a larger sum to the revenue, and at the same time not be considered as a grievance by the squatters. The question was, therefore, whether they should take the 20,000*l* and incur the displeasure of those who had to pay the money, or consent to accept a larger sum, which would not be considered as a grievance. (Hear, hear.) The Government were satisfied the squatters were satisfied—and if the bargain was fair, there was no necessity to waste time. The Government would get all, or more than they even asked for, and those who had to pay were contented. This being the case, he (Mr Barrow) should certainly vote for the amended clause. Their business now was to unite both parties. The assessment, it must be admitted was just, and the certainty of tenure was necessary to secure the value of the leases. Therefore he should support this clause, and all the clauses in the Bill, without considering it necessary to discuss them. He did not look upon it so much as a compromise, but as uniting the views of both parties.

Mr STRANGWAYS objected to this Bill, as it was a repudiation of existing arrangements. There could be no doubt that the old system of granting leases for 14 years at a fixed rent was not a good system. By this proposed arrangement a person could take a lease for five years and at the end of that term have it valued, and so occupy it in perpetuity. But he would like to know whether the advantages which would be gained thereby would be equal to those which the squatter lost by the assessment. From the permissive nature of this clause he would point out also that there would be three kinds of tenure, and he would suggest whether some alteration should not be made in this respect.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS pointed out that the new leases were under the Waste Lands Act, and would be free of assessment for four years.

Mr YOUNG withdrew his opposition to this Bill, but stated some minor objections to portions of this clause.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, in answer to a former question, that if persons chose to surrender their leases, well and good; but if they did not, they would be liable to any future assessment.

The clause was amended by the insertion of the words "or before," after the word "on," in the fourth line, and passed as amended.

Clause 3 (clause B substituted)—"Waste lands to be divided into several classes."

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said, in answer to Mr MILDRED, that he did not think it would be found desirable to limit the classification of runs.

Mr HAY suggested a modification of the mode of fixing the assessment.

Mr GLYDE had no objection to the principle of the Bill, nor had the Government or the squatters. Looking at the clause, however, he should have supposed it necessary to have three classifications; but as the Commissioner of Crown Lands said no he (Mr Glyde) was satisfied. He thought, however, the size of the blocks should be named. He would suggest that the House should appoint the persons who were to value the runs. (No, no.) The Commissioner of Crown Lands he would propose as one, the Surveyor-General as another, and the Inspector of Scab as the third. He could not agree to cut down the minimum number of sheep to the square mile to 75. Mr Hawker asked that it should be 100, and had expressed himself content.

Mr HAY asked the Attorney-General if this clause applied to the leases under the Orders in Council, or to those subsequently granted or now being granted.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it applied to the leases under the Orders in Council.

An amendment proposed by the Attorney-General, viz., to insert the words "from time to time" after the words "to be" in the 5th line, was carried.

Mr HAWKER wished to make an amendment in the maximum number of sheep to the square mile, and said that though there were some runs in the colony which would carry the maximum number set down in this clause, viz, 250, yet it was not a fair average. He suggested 200 as the maximum, which would be found to be a fair one. The Government had every means of testing the correctness of this by the returns of the Inspector of Scab, and the House would find on reference to these returns that the average first-class runs throughout the colony would not carry more than 200 sheep to the square mile. If this clause were passed in its present shape, it would make an addition to the assessment of ¼d to ½d per head.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS pointed out the usefulness of having a sufficiently high maximum, as it would ensure the runs being stocked to the fullest extent. The Government had every desire to deal fairly with the squatters.

Mr HAWKER could not see what was to be gained by putting a greater number of stock on a run than it would carry; and as to the deciding of the carrying capabilities of the runs being left to those persons appointed by the Government, they would not have that practical knowledge necessary to such a task. He would move that the word "fifty" be struck out and the maximum left at 200 sheep per square mile.

Mr SOLOMON was quite willing to go with the hon member for Victoria, but then he (Mr Solomon) would move that the lowest class be increased from 75 to 100. It was no doubt dangerous to give the power of extreme valuation.

Mr REYNOLDS agreed with the hon member for Victoria, that it might not be desirable to fix the maximum rate so high, and he would suggest that it should be struck out altogether. He could not understand how Mr Hawker could say that the best runs in the colony would not carry more than 200 sheep to the square mile, as he found it was contemplated in the 6th clause that a square mile might carry 640 head of sheep.

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested the striking out of the maximum number altogether, as there were some runs which would carry a much larger number of sheep than that indicated in the clause. He thought it would be desirable also to modify the clause, that all runs hereafter should be valued and the assessment and rent made one payment.

Mr LINDSAY—There was more importance to be attached to fixing the lowest class at such a number as not to prevent poor lands from being taken up. There were some lands which would not carry 50 sheep to the square mile. By fixing the lowest class so high as 100, it would entirely prevent the poorest runs from being taken up.

Mr MACDERMOTT would be glad to see the number reduced to 50.

After some further discussion Mr SOLOMON's amendment for raising the lowest class to 100 was put and carried.

Mr HAWKER's amendment for reducing the highest class to 200 was divided upon with the following result —

AYES, 15—The Attorney-General, the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Public Works, Messrs Andrews, Peake, Lindsay, McDermott Harvey, Solomon, Rogers, Collinson, Scammel, Bakewell, Hawker, and the Commissioner of Crown Lands (teller)

NOES, 12—Messrs Young, Milne Hallett, Hay, Cole, Bagot, Townsend, Mildred, McEllister Glyde, Rogers, Reynolds, (teller)

The amendment was consequently carried by a majority of three

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the words "nor more than two hundred sheep per square mile for the highest class," be struck out altogether

On a division, there appeared 12 for and 14 against the amendment

Mr MILNE moved that the highest classification should be 240 He moved the insertion of the words "and forty," which was divided upon with the following result —

AYES, (17)—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Crown Lands the Treasurer, the Commissioner of Public Works, and Messrs Rogers, Hay Hallett, Bagot, McEllister, Glyde, Cole, Blyth, Strangways, Reynolds, Townsend, Burford, and Milne (teller)

NOES, (10)—Messrs Peake McDermott, Collinson, Harvey, Andrews, Solomon, Rogers, Scammel, Lindsay, and Hawker (teller)

There was a majority of seven accordingly in favor of the ayes

The clause was passed as amended

The 4th clause provided that upon the expiration of the lease, the annual value of the land should be determined for the next five years

Mr HAY wished to insert the words "on the application of the lessee twelve months before the expiration of the lease"

Mr MILNE asked the Attorney-General whether it was intended to carry out the valuation, as he considered it exceedingly objectionable that there should be two systems of taxation concurrently If there were to be a valuation of the annual rent he should think that would answer all the purpose If every five years there was to be an alteration or valuation of the rent, he did not see the necessity of there being an assesment concurrently He moved the addition of the words "and shall be in full of all rent and assessment except for the general purposes of the colony"

Mr LINDSAY considered this proposition must commend itself to every man of common sense, and he hoped that there would be no further discussion upon it, but that it would be at once adopted

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL suggested that an amendment in the 5th clause would meet the views of the hon member (Mr Milne) The rights of parties under valuation would come in under the 6th clause, to which he proposed to add the words, "after such new lease shall be granted, the assessment hereby imposed shall cease in respect of such lands"

Mr BAGOT thought that the House ought not to pledge the Legislature for a longer period than the leases which were now running

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL referred the hon member to the second clause, which it would be seen did not bind the House beyond the term named in the existing leases

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY

The SPEAKER announced the receipt of Message No 25, from His Excellency the Governor, intimating that an additional sum of £250 had been placed on the Estimates for prosecuting the search for gold in the Barrier Ranges Also, suggesting amendments in the Act relative to the validity of Registrations

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, the first message was referred to the Committee upon the Estimates and the second was ordered to be taken into consideration on the following Monday

WASTE LANDS OF THE CROWN

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid upon the table returns moved for that day, in reference to the waste lands of the Crown

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL—RESUMED

Mr MILNE said the suggestions of the Attorney-General exactly met his views, and he would therefore withdraw his amendment

Mr HAY pressed his amendment relative to the application of the lessee within 12 months, which was lost, and the clause was passed as printed

Clause 5 provided that a new lease might be granted for a further term of five years

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that the rent could be increased from time to time in lieu of assessment, and moved the addition of the words "and after any new lease shall have been granted, the assessment herein named shall be determined"

Mr GLYDE repeated that he believed hon members were laboring under a misapprehension in reference to this Bill At all events he could not understand it as it had been interpreted by the Attorney-General

Mr BAGOT understood the Bill to provide that in future there should be no assessment, but that a rent should be charged in lieu of that assessment, that the land should be valued according to its sheep-bearing capabilities, and that the House was pledged to that principle He had scarcely made up his mind whether it would be prudent that there should be no assessment, but he thought the Attorney-General's explanation of the Bill so clear that it was impossible it could be misunderstood

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government did not propose to fetter in the slightest degree the freedom of action of future Legislatures If a future Legislature chose to impose an assessment, this Bill would not prevent them in any way All that the present Legislature did was to propose there should be an assessment during the leases, and at the end of those leases to substitute something else for the assessment So long as the Bill before the House remained in force any person holding a lease of waste lands from the Crown would be entitled to a renewal of it Any existing lease would be eligible for renewal so long as this Bill was not repealed

Mr REYNOLDS asked—After the passing of this Bill, under what regulations would leases be issued?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said any new original lease under the regulations connected with the Waste Lands Act, and any renewed lease, would be issued under this Bill

Mr BURFORD hardly thought it was necessary for him to make any observations, as the hon member for Victoria was present, but it certainly appeared to him that this Bill was playing battledore and shuttlecock with the squatters, and he certainly could not understand how it could be said that this Bill would not bind future Legislatures If it were not to bind them, what security had the squatters?

The clause was passed as printed

Clause 6 provided that there should be an allowance in respect of purchased land

Mr MILNE proposed that this clause should be struck out altogether, because it was notorious that the holders of 14 years' leases—those parties, for instance, who got their leases seven years ago, applied that large tracts of land should be surveyed on both sides of the water, and having secured all the water it was obvious that the lease in the hands of other parties would be totally valueless, in consequence of there being no water He disapproved of the provision by which these parties would be enabled to obtain a reduction in the assessment of one sheep per acre as regarded their purchased lands

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was very much disposed to agree with the hon member, but at the same time he would remark that this clause had originally been inserted under circumstances which would have rendered it a great injustice had it not been inserted in reference to purchased land, so that the owners should be enabled to claim exemption, but now, as it was only proposed to tax in proportion to the grazing capabilities of the run, the necessity for the clause did not exist, and he was disposed to vote with the hon member that it be struck out

Mr SOLOMON must oppose the amendment, thinking that to strike out the clause would be to act most illiberally to the squatters He admitted that he thought the squatters ought to contribute more than they hitherto had, but the House had no right to interfere to prevent them from depasturing sheep upon land which they had purchased and paid for

A clause was introduced by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and passed, in reference to leases not under the Orders in Council, and which had not been surrendered The clause provided that "every occupant under the waste lands of the Crown shall pay the assessment hereinbefore provided" Another clause was also introduced and passed, providing that "any classification of the grazing capabilities of such lands shall remain in force for five years and no longer"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL intimated that, although he wished to take the Bill out of Committee that day, he should not oppose its recommittal, for the purpose of reconsidering these clauses, but he did not expect that hon members would wish to recommit them, as they were precisely in accordance with the expressed wishes of the House

Clause 7, relative to proceedings to be taken in the event of the non-payment of assessment, was passed as printed

Clause 8, providing that there should be no assessment upon cattle depastured on new runs until the expiration of four years from the date of the lease, was passed as printed

Clause 9, providing that the Commissioner of Crown Lands should prosecute offences under the Act, was passed as printed

Clause 10, provided that unbranded wild cattle found upon lands not within the limits of a District Council should belong to the Crown

The various clauses having been agreed to, the consideration of the report was made an Order of the Day for the next day of meeting

LAND GRANTS BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the third reading of this Bill

Mr STRANGWAYS was desirous of recommitting the Bill, contending that one of the clauses amounted to a repeal of the Waste Lands Act

Mr HAY disapproved of the provision by which grants could be issued without the signature of the Governor being attached

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Bill had been drawn by the Registrar-General, and was recommended by him as necessary to procure the issue of land grants as rapidly as they were required. He saw no objection to the Bill, because the grants would be signed by the Treasurer, the person who would be responsible for the money, and the Registrar-General also, and being assured that it was something which was absolutely necessary for the despatch of business, he moved the third reading.

The Bill was read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY SITTINGS.

The Attorney-General moved that the House, at its rising, adjourn till the following Monday.

Mr Strangways, as an amendment, moved that the House adjourn till Tuesday.

The amendment was lost, and the original motion carried.

ESTIMATES.

After some opposition from Mr Strangways, the House upon the motion of the Treasurer, went into Committee upon the Estimates.

Clearing the Channel of the River Murray, 1,000*l*. Agreed to.

Extension of Milang Jetty, £700.

The Commissioner of Public Works stated, in reply to Mr Strangways, that there were no plans and estimates of the work, the amount not reaching £1,000. The amount asked for would not accomplish the whole of the work, but the remainder would be contributed by residents in the locality. In reply to Mr Reynolds, the hon. gentleman stated that the Government would have the expenditure of the amount. The amount asked for was, in fact, "in aid of subscriptions," and having been so described, the vote was agreed to.

Maintenance of jetties, £500.

Mr Hay suggested the expediency of handing over jetties to the District Councils.

The Commissioner of Public Works said that by the District Councils Bill the jetties would be handed over to the District Councils, but it was extremely probable that, before taking charge of them, the District Councils would require them to be placed in good order, and the vote asked for was to accomplish that.

The vote was agreed to.

Wells on overland route to Port Lincoln, £350. Agreed to, the Commissioner of Public Works stating that there was a further sum of £360 available for the purpose, and that it was estimated the cost of the work would be about £710.

Special grant to the Corporation, Frome Road, £300.

Mr Reynolds proposed to strike out this item.

The Commissioner of Public Works said that this was not a road under the charge of the Corporation, but it was proposed that this amount should be given to the Corporation upon the understanding that they should keep the road in repair.

The vote was agreed to.

Surveying new lines of railway, £2,000. Agreed to.

Reporting and printing Debates of Parliament, £650.

Mr Strangways said it was clear this amount was in excess of the sum required by £150, as the House had previously voted a sum of £1,300, of which only £500 were required for the Hansard of last session, and consequently there must be a balance of £800 from that vote, which, with an addition of £500, would make up the £1,300 for the Hansard for the present session.

The Attorney-General stated that £550 were required for the "Hansard" of last session.

Mr Hay objected to the subsidising of newspapers, and would far rather that an arrangement were made for the publication of a "Hansard" merely, without the reports first appearing in the newspapers.

The Attorney-General stated that the Government contract was for the publication of a "Handsard" for £1,300 annually, and that the arrangement was that the reports should be first published in the newspapers, otherwise the cost of the "Hansard" would be much greater.

Mr Reynolds had no objection to sanction a vote of £550 in addition to the item already voted for the present session, but he should object to a similar vote for the future, as he thought they were paying rather too dear for their whistle for having their sayings and doings reported.

The Treasurer said that this vote had nothing to do with the vote which had been previously taken. £1,300 a-year had been voted, and this sum of £650 was for the half-year up to the 1st July.

Mr Strangways pressed his amendment to reduce the amount to £550, which was lost, the votes being, Ayes, 5, Noes, 14, as follows:—

Ayes—Messrs Harvey, Hay, Mildred, Strangways, and Reynolds (teller).

Noes—the Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Burford, Glyde, Townsend, Milne, MacDermott, Solomon, Cole, Collinson, McEllister, Rogers, the Treasurer (teller).

The vote of £650 was then agreed to.

Aid to Trinity Board for lighthouses, buoys, and moorings, £2,935. Carried after a brief discussion.

Stationery, £3,500. Agreed to with an intimation from the Treasurer that the Government had no objection to try the system of obtaining supplies of this description by tender, a plan which had formerly been found very economical.

Fuel, £1,000. Agreed to.

Reprinting Gazette notices in German newspaper, £26. Agreed to.

Electoral charges £1,000. Agreed to.

Subsidy for Steam Postal Communication, £7,000.

Mr Solomon enquired whether any arrangement was being made for the steamers at Kangaroo Island, for if no arrangement was made the colony might be in a worse position when the steamers came than at present.

The Attorney-General replied that the matter was under consideration. Arrangements would be made before the steamers could arrive, which would not be before the end of April. In all probability the advertisements would be issued in a very short time.

The item was then agreed to.

Incidental expenses, including repayments, £700. Agreed to.

Compensation to lessees for improvements on sale of Crown lands, 1,500*l*. Agreed to.

Provision for military defence, £4,500. Agreed to.

Taking the census and statistical returns, £2,000. Agreed to.

Two other items which do not appear on the printed Estimates, including a sum for the exploring trip to the Barrier Ranges, were also agreed to but neither the amounts nor, in one instance, the title of the vote, were audible in the gallery.

The next item was for the introduction of immigrants from the United Kingdom, £20,000.

Mr Townsend opposed the item. Was it wise to expend money for which we would have no return. It was a fact known to those who were familiar with the proceedings of the working class that they went off to Melbourne. He would mention a case. An advertisement appeared lately in the Advertiser for masons to work in Melbourne. Six men applied to know, as their passages were to be paid to Melbourne, how they were to get there. They had not the slightest idea that they were under any obligation to remain here, although they had arrived by the very last immigrant ship. Believing that we had abundant skilled and unskilled labor in the colony, he moved that the item be struck out, unless some portion of it was necessary to pay for nomination orders already sent home.

Mr Solomon said the illustration just given by the hon. member was only one of many. It was next to madness to continue sending home money for immigrants, who merely made the colony a stepping stone, which had always been the case, by means of the Land Fund. The fact was well known to every hon. member as to the great majority of the colonists. To continue this system when the neighbouring colonies voted mere nominal sums, would be throwing the money away—at least a very large portion of it. He believed when last the question of immigration was before the House, the Government had no objection to reduce the sum by one-half. The Government had entered into arrangements for vessels which could not be recalled, and therefore he would be most happy to assist by his vote in giving half the amount—(hear, hear, from the Government benches). He moved that the amount be £10,000.

Mr Milne opposed the amendment. He would strike out the whole with the understanding that the Government be authorized to pay all expenses to which their faith was pledged either through the agent at home or otherwise. But unless the House, signified by its vote, informed the Government that the immigration should cease for a given time, the Government would act as they had already done for the ensuing half-year, before they would again have an opportunity of consulting the House.

Mr Burford supported the amendment, but thought it would be imprudent to negative the entire sum. The House should place some confidence in the Government in the matter. If the vessels were limited to one every two months, well and good, but he would be sorry to strike the whole sum out.

The Attorney-General would agree to reduce the sum by one-half, but would strenuously oppose striking it off altogether. The prosperity of South Australia was due to the labor fund. He knew former times and the hon. the Speaker remembered them when there was a great cry of want of employment, and surplus population, and all that as now. These things would always occur periodically in every civilised country on the face of the earth, which was subject to the fluctuations of population seeking employment and capital seeking labor. It would be suicidal on the part of the Legislature to stop the stream of immigration entirely, though he could quite understand the propriety under the circumstances of the colony of limiting the amount. It would be at variance with the principles on which the colony was founded, and with the practice which gave it prosperity to strike out the entire amount, and withhold facilities from those in the colony by contributing to the sum for immigration for the purpose of bringing out their relations, that they might become fellow-settlers here. He had not heard that the immigrants brought out by nomination orders left the colony, but he believed the great number of them were added to our productive power.

The Commissioner of Crown Lands said, in reply to Mr Reynolds, that at the end of the year there would be about sufficient funds for two ships remaining in his (the Commissioner's) hands. The hon. member dwelt briefly upon the advantages of the nomination system, and the benefits which might be anticipated from the efficient services of Mr Dashwood

Mr SOLOMON, in explanation, said that unless matters improved within the next six months, he should not vote a farthing for immigration of the last half of 1859 His only reason for voting £10,000 now was to enable the Government to carry out arrangments already made

Mr MCELLISTER, in a few words, supported the amendment, and was followed by Mr REYNOLDS, who condemned the immigration system altogether

After some further discussion the amendment for the lesser amount viz, £10,000, was put and carried

Excessess on Votes, 1857—

Mr MACDERMOTT moved, pursuant to notice, the reconsideration of this item, for the purpose of increasing the sum to £350 After some discussion, the motion was negatived

The House then resumed,

The CHAIRMAN reported the resolutions of the Committee, and their consideration was made an order of the day for Monday next

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT

The amendment of Mr Milne and the original motion of Mr Reynolds, referring to the Railway Commissioners were withdrawn, on the Government stating that it was their intention to provide for the railway being vested under the control of a Manager instead of, as at present, under Commissioners

MR RIDLEY

Mr HAY moved—

"That the thanks of this House be conveyed to John Ridley, Esq, as a recognition of his claim to the gratitude of the people of South Australia for his invention of the reaping machine now so generally in use in this country"

The motion was carried unanimously, and the resolution of the House was desired to be conveyed to Mr Ridley in writing through the Speaker

The House then adjourned at a quarter to 8 o'clock until 1 o'clock on Monday next

MONDAY, DECEMBER 20

The SPEAKER took the Chair shortly after 1 o clock

THE HARBOR TRUST

Mr SOLOMON presented a petition from the Chamber of Commerce, praying that the Harbor Trust might be permitted to continue, without interference, the prosecution of the work which it had hitherto conducted in so satisfactory a manner The petition was signed by the President and Vice-President on behalf the Chamber

The SPEAKER said that the petition could only be taken as the petition of the persons signing it, the Chamber of Commerce not being a recognised body

Mr SOLOMON asked if he understood the Speaker to rule that the Chamber was not a recognised body?

The SPEAKER said that it was not, and Mr Solomon, in consequence, withdrew the petition

THE APPROPRIATION BILL

The TREASURER gave notice that on the following day he should move the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Appropriation Bill be agreed to, and that, contingent upon the motion being carried, he should move the Standing Orders be suspended, in order to allow of the Bill being read a third time

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that on the following day he should move the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Assessment on Stock Bill be adopted, and that he should also move the suspension of the Standing Orders, for the purpose of enabling the Bill to be read a third time the same day He proposed to ask to recommit the Bill for the purpose of making one or two alterations

IMMIGRATION

Mr SOLOMON gave notice that on the following day he should move that in the opinion of the House it was not advisable that immigration at the expense of the colony should be continued, after the sum of £10,000 voted for that purpose had been expended

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE

The SPEAKER called the attention of the House to a breach of privilege. He perceived in one of the public journals of the colony what purported to be the report of a Select Committee of that House which had not yet been presented to the House. He could not say how it had got into the printer's hands, but he had ascertained from the clerks of the House that when they sent documents to the papers which were intended for publication they were addressed to the Editor Should, however, the Editor happen to be a member of that House they were simply addressed to the name of the Editor Thus papers intended for publication would be addressed to the Editor of the Advertiser, but papers intended merely for the Editor, as member of that House, would be addressed to J. H Barrow, Esq, M P,

The TREASURER said that upon this question there had no doubt been a breach of privilege As Chairman of the Committee upon Taxation he was in a position to inform the House that the Committee had not agreed to any report whatever upon the subject, and that the report which had been alluded to by the hon the Speaker, as having appeared in that day's Advertiser, was not the report of the Committee He was unable to say how the document had found its way into the paper

Mr BARROW, as the individual unfortunately connected with this most involuntary breach of privilege, felt it his duty to say a few words He had observed with very deep regret and much personal annoyance the publication of the document which had been referred to, and begged to assure the House that he knew nothing whatever of its publication till he saw it in the Advertiser (Hear, hear) The facts were simply these. The Sub-Editor of the Advertiser mistook the report which was intended for his (Mr Barrow's) private perusal for one of the papers ordinarily sent down to the Advertiser Office for publication, and, under this misapprehension, put it into the printers' hands during his (Mr Barrow's) absence on Sunday night It was done quite inadvertently, and he (Mr Barrow) was quite ignorant of the occurrence till he saw the report in the Advertiser It was purely an accident, although it was one which he deeply regretted—(hear, hear)—but having occurred once, steps had been taken to prevent such an accident ever occurring again (Hear, hear) The House would thus see that the breach of privilege was quite unintentional on his part, and he was himself more deeply annoyed at it than any other member could possibly be. (Hear, hear)

CONFIRMATION OF REGISTRATIONS BILL

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, the House went into Committee for the consideration of Message No 26 from the Governor-in-Chief, recommending certain amendments in the Confirmation of Registrations Bill The hon. gentleman remarked that the amendments suggested by His Excellency had reference to one matter only It appeared that since the Bill had passed both branches of the Legislature attention had been called to the circumstance that duplicates had been stamped, not with the public seal of the province, but with a lithographed copy of it A question might arise as to the validity of such registration, and as the Bill related only to registrations which had already been effected, and did not affect future registrations in any way, but was merely to remove doubts in reference to a system of registration which was now at an end, he had no hesitation in asking the House to agree to the amendments He therefore, moved that the amendments be agreed to

The motion was carried, and upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the House resumed, the report was adopted, and was ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Council with copy of the message from His Excellency, stating that the Assembly had agreed to such amendments, and requesting the concurrence of the Council therein

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, before moving the consideration of the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Assessment on Stock Bill, said that there were two amendments which he was desirous of making, one being of a formal and the other of a substantial character because without the latter amendment the intention of the Legislature would not be carried out He therefore moved that the Bill be recommitted The formal amendment had reference to the date of the Orders in Council, which had either dropped out of the print or had never been inserted in the draft, and in reference to the other it related to the sixth clause, which provided for the payment by the lessee of the Crown who had not surrendered his lease, of the assessment imposed by the Act That was inconsistent to a certain extent with the fifth clause, which provided that after a renewed lease had been granted the assessment should cease to be paid He therefore moved the insertion of the words, "not being a renewed lease as aforesaid"

The House having gone into Committee, Mr HAY drew the attention of the House to the 3rd clause, relating to the classification of runs He believed that a great error had been committed in changing the classification or in altering the minimum number of sheep from 75 to 100 Instead of raising the number of sheep from 75 to 100, he believed the House would have acted more wisely by reducing the number to 50 The effect of the clause as it stood he believed would be that no return would be procured from the inferior lands He moved that the third clause be recommitted, with the view of altering the classification as regarded the minimum number of sheep from 100 to 75, as originally proposed by the Government

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that 50 be inserted for 100, and that the highest classification be struck out altogether He did not think that the Bill would be found satisfactory to the Government, the squatters, or the public, and he believed that the simplest way of dealing with the question would be to cancel all leases which were now held, and to provide that new leases should be issued for five years, and that during the first five years to fix the maximum amount of rent that should be charged for any run He believed that the arrangement which he had suggested would give the squatters as great advantages as were taken away from them, and that they would have no objection to the leases being cancelled in this manner Instead of a complicated arrangement by which there would be a classification for rent and another for assessment there would be one classification only That would be the simplest course, and the one which he believed the Government would eventually have to adopt The present Bill was, in fact, not a Bill for the assessment on stock, but a Bill to increase the rental upon runs

Mr GLYDE supported the clause as it was, because the hon member for Victoria had himself proposed 100 as the minimum number, and the hon member was the advocate of the squatters, and was supposed to know what their wants and wishes were He would remind the House also that another clause provided that for a period of four years no assessment should be levied, and he could not believe that any land at all available for pastoral purposes would not after four years carry 100 sheep to the square mile It would be hardly fair to leave so much in the power of the valuers as was proposed by the hon. member for Encounter Bay

Mr PEAKE said the argument of the hon member for Gumeracha confirmed his impression that the House in attempting to make itself the valuer of the waste lands of the Crown had made a mistake He had disbelieved in the Bill from the commencement and did so still Experience would, he was assured, prove that they were making a great mistake in passing this Bill, and he believed the day was not far off when they would have to turn back It would be better, in his opinion, that the screw should be put on at once, and then they would sooner find out the mistake which they had made He should, therefore, support the clause as it stood, simply for the purpose of showing as quickly as possible that the House had made a mistake in passing the Bill

Mr LINDSAY hardly knew whether he should support the last speaker, but he believed that the course suggested by the hon member would have precisely the effect which he predicted, and that the House would be called upon next session to retrace their steps and alter the Bill It would, in his opinion, be far more satisfactory and rational not to attempt to fix any maximum or minimum number, but leave the assessors to determine each particular case

Mr MACDERMOTT thought the reasons which had been assigned by the hon member for Gumeracha were just and it would be remembered that when the Bill was in Committee, he (Mr Macdermott) had recommended that the number should be reduced to 50, because he felt that if the runs would not carry 100, they would not be occupied He would recommend the hon member for Encounter Bay to deal with the minimum number first, and afterwards with the maximum If the hon member would divide his amendment, he would support the reduction of the minimum number to 50

Mr MILDRED said that something like a mutual arrangement having been come to between the squatters and the country, he was prepared to support that arrangement The squatters were satisfied, and the country had a right to be It would be the duty, however, of the Commissioner of Crown Lands to see that lands which would not carry the minimum number were not cut out of lands which would carry double and treble the number The course pursued by the late Commission of Crown Lands was not to allow certain portions of a run to be cut out, but that it should be classified as a whole He certainly thought that a maximum and minimum should be fixed

Mr SOLOMON should support the clause as it stood The calculations were based upon the rental at present paid, of 10s 15s, or 20s per square mile If 100 were taken in connection with the lowest rent, the amount paid would be 26s 8d, if 150, £2 per square mile would be paid, if 200, in connection with the medium rent, £2 13s 4d, and if 240, with the highest rent, £3 He could not conceive that these rates were too high, and he believed the House could not do better for the public and the squatters than by adopting the present scale

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL should support the clause as it stood, and had he not imagined that the House would have assented to the Bill without altering any of its principles, he should certainly not have moved its recommittal, but would have rather allowed mere verbal errors to pass than jeopardise the principle of the Bill He did not deny that what had been pointed out by the hon member for Gumeracha might arise, but as four years must elapse before it could, he trusted the House would not agree to either of the amendments

The amendments were negatived, and the clause passed as printed

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the following words were inserted in the sixth clause —"Not being a renewed lease as hereinbefore provided," and in the preamble "19th June" was inserted

The House resumed, the CHAIRMAN brought up the report, and its consideration in Committee of the whole House was made an Order of the Day for the following day

THE ESTIMATES

The TREASURER moved that the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Estimates be agreed to

Mr PEAKE wished to reduce one source of expenditure which was at present very high He alluded to the item for police, in which he believed that a great reduction might be effected He proposed instead of expending £37,000 per annum upon police, that the amount should be reduced to £30,000, and to begin with he would move that the item which the House had agreed to for police, for six months, £18,378, be cut down to £15,000 He believed the present Executive were not blind to the principle that whilst the metropolitan police should be maintained by the metropolis, it was not fair that the item of £37,000 should any longer be kept as a charge upon the general revenue

Mr STRANGWAYS said that he too was desirous of moving that several items which had been assented to should be recommitted, and after some discussion as to the proper course to adopt to accomplish this object,

The SPEAKER put the question for the adoption of the Estimates as they stood, "that the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question," which was negatived by a majority of four, the votes on a division, Ayes 9, Noes 13, being as follows —

AYES, 9—The Attorney-General, the Commissioner of Public Works the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Messrs Collinson, Macdermott, Hallett, Hay, Milne, and the Treasurer (teller)

NOES 13—Messrs Townsend, Glyde, Burford, Strangways, Mildred, Hawker, Harvey, Barrow, Cole, Solomon, Rogers, Lindsay, and Peake (teller)

Mr STRANGWAYS wished the item of £1,000 for a new Government Printing-Office recommitted, as he believed that the present building was quite sufficient for the purposes for which it was required He should move that item be struck out There was also another item, in aid of rates collected by District Councils He was not opposed to granting one-half the amount collected, but the revenue would not always permit it, and he believed that the balance in hand at the end of the ensuing year would be considerably less than it ought to be The House had voted the sum of £12,500 in aid of District Councils for the first six months of 1859 and he was desirous of moving that that amount be reduced to £10,000 There was another item of £1,500 for military defences, which he thought they might strike out, as, if it were intended to erect a battery for the purpose of preventing Port Adelaide from being shelled, he much questioned whether that was the sort of defence which was required He believed, however, that the Government should have a sufficient amount placed at their disposal to enable them to assist a Volunteer Rifle Corps, by granting them ammunition, and the Enfield Rifles, which were at present in store He believed £1,000 would be sufficient for the half-year The Government had, he believed, had the question under consideration for some months, but they were slow in arriving at a conclusion, as usual, although he believed that they approved of the scheme With regard to the vote for immigration, he was desirous of increasing the vote from £10,000 to £15,000, for, whilst he agreed that, under the present state of the colony, it was undesirable that immigration should be kept up at the rate of one ship a month, but that a ship each alternate month would be sufficient during the next 12 months he did not believe that £10,000 would be sufficient to accomplish this, although £15,000 might do He thought that £15,000 would send out about 850 statute adults, which would be about three ship-loads

The motion for the recommittal of the Estimates upon the following day was carried

LEVEL CROSSING AT BROMPTON

The House having gone into Committee,

Mr COLE with the permission of the House, amended the motion in his name and moved that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor, requesting His Excellency to make such arrangements as were necessary for the purpose of forming a level crossing at East street, Brompton

Mr SOLOMON seconded the motion

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL should not oppose a sum being placed on the Supplementary Estimates of 1859 for the purpose If the House passed the present resolution the Government would take it as an authority to expend the necessary amount to construct the work Up to the present time the Government had not felt justified in assenting to the construction of the work, because it involved continued expenditure for a gate and gatekeeper, but the Legislature having sanctioned such an alteration in reference to level crossings as abolished gatekeepers there was no objection to the work being undertaken

Mr LINDSAY said it was highly necessary to have a crossing at the spot, but as it was a very crowded neighbourhood, he hoped the Government would endeavour to devise some ingenious machine, something like that which was in use in America, for the purpose of catching children as they passed He complained that level-crossings were frequently made where the natural features of the country pointed out that they should be on a different level

POLICE-STATION AT AUBURN

Mr PEAKE, in accordance with notice moved that on the 22nd instant the House go into Committee of the whole, to consider an address to His Excellency the Governor-in Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for the erection of a Court-house and Police-station at Auburn He need say very little in support of the motion, as any one who knew the Northern District must know that what he asked for in the motion was urgently called for There was a Stipendiary Magistrate at the Burra, who could easily hold a Court at Auburn, which was the centre of a very extensive agricultural district, and where it was most desirable to have a police-station It would be a great boon to a large number of settlers in the immediate district to have a periodical Court there The extra work to the Stipendiary Magistrate would be very small, Auburn being only 15 miles from Clare and as a Court was held at Clare the magistrate on his way home could easily call at Auburn [Here the hon member held a short conference with Mr Harvey] He had just been informed that a Court was held there already (Laughter) They had a magistrate and a Court but what they wanted was a police station, that was it—(renewed laughter) and, notwithstanding the blunder which he had made in his first statement to the House, he trusted the motion would be assented to

Mr HARVEY seconded the motion

The ATTORNEY GENERAL should not oppose going into Committee upon the subject in order that it might be fully discussed, but from information which he had received he did not think the expenditure was necessary at present

Mr HAWKER should certainly support the motion, as a Court-house and police station were much wanted at Auburn, which was in the centre of a very large population and as £800 had recently been voted for a Court-house at Goolwa though there was already one at Port Elliot, which was only seven miles off, there was much more reason that there should be similar buildings at Auburn, the nearest police-station to which was 15 miles off

Mr LINDSAY would not oppose going into Committee upon the subject, but in reference to Court-Houses generally, would remark that it was very desirable that Government should have some recognized design for such buildings, as he found that the cost, or sums voted, varied from £200 to £800, although the accommodation required was much about the same

The motion was carried

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the adjournment of the House, intimated that if the Committee came to any decision upon the Estimates on the following day, he should move the suspension of the Standing Orders to enable the report to be agreed to at once

Mr LINDSAY, as there was no other business before the House, begged to put to the Attorney-General the question of which he had given notice—that he would ask the Attorney-General whether in his opinion registration of title is better than registration of assurance if so, why ? Also, whether in his opinion the system of transfer of real property by registration will be workable in all cases under the amended Act of the session, and whether it is likely to be beneficial to the colony, and whether in his opinion a better system could or could not be devised ?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL exceedingly regretted that the hon member should persist in asking questions to which he must be aware that he (the Attorney General) could give no other answer than that he declined to answer them He should have thought the hon member had had so much experience in putting questions which had not been answered as to enable him readily to determine what questions fell within his sphere (Laughter)

The House adjourned at half-past 2 o clock till 1 o'clock on the following day

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said no such appointment had been made up to the present time, but he could not answer the latter part of the question

PROROGATION

The Hon H AYERS, seeing that the Real Property Act was before the Council for that day, would ask the Hon the Chief Secretary when it was intended to prorogue Parliament and when to call it together again

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the Government had no intention of advising His Excellency to prorogue Parliament until the business before the Council had been disposed of In all probability Parliament would be called together in the early part of April.

THE HARBOR TRUST

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY laid upon the table correspondence between the Harbor Trust and the Commissioner of Public Works, together with a number of charts connected with the harbor

JOHN RIDLEY, ESQ

The Hon Major O'HALLORAN, in moving that the thanks of that House be given to John Ridley, Esq , as an acknowledgment of his claim to the gratitude of the colonists of South Australia, for his invention of the reaping-machine now in general use, said that he was not aware there was any individual in the province who was not prepared to eulogize the merits of Mr Ridley in inventing the reaping machine He regretted that no public testimonial had been bestowed upon such merit, for Mr Ridley was the greatest benefactor South Australia had ever seen or was likely to see There were during the present season 175,000 acres of wheat under crop, but if it had not been for Mr Ridley s invention there would not have been half that quantity upon the ground, as there would have been no possibility of obtaining the necessary amount of labor to reap it On one occasion, in 1845, he had the honor of presenting Mr Ridley to Governor Grey, who presented him with a subscription purse, contributed by a few individuals, of 65 guineas, which amount Mr Ridley immediately handed over as a gift to the Mechanics' Institution It would be admitted that Mr Ridley was entitled to much greater praise than had been bestowed upon him, and although it was unprecedented to give a vote such as he proposed, it would be better to adopt that course than to allow Mr Ridley to go unrewarded As a farmer he had kept statistical returns

during the last 20 years, and had drawn up a return, not from the rule of thumb, but from actual documents, showing the extraordinary benefits derived from Mr Ridley's invention In 1839 he farmed in a small way, from 1840 to 1843, he found that he had 327 acres under crop, and the cost for reaping, &c, not including thatching, amounted to £1 18s 1d per acre From 1844 to 1858, he had had 2,063 acres under wheat, which cost him, by using Mr Ridley's machine, including cleaning, only 14s 6d per acre, so that the difference in favour of the machine was £1 3s 7d per acre The saving in 15 years upon 2,063 acres amounted to £2,432 12s If this amount were divided by 15, it would leave £162 3s 6d, the annual saving, and allowing 10 per cent, for the cost of the machine and tear and wear, there would still be a clear saving of £145 per year He was only one out of 4,000 farmers, for the last census return showed that the number of farmers was 2,800, and the present number could not be below 4,000, so that the benefits derived from Mr Ridley's invention were incalculable He therefore moved that the thanks of that House be given to John Ridley, Esq, as a recognition of his claim to the gratitude of the community of South Australia for the invention of the reaping machine, and that the President be requested to convey the same by letter to Mr Ridley If, as he believed, the vote would be unanimously assented to, it would add to the gracefulness of the act if the President were to forward the letter to the Hon John Baker, requesting him to present it, accompanied by some old colonists, such as Mr Stephens, Mr Dutton, and others at present in London He moved that he have leave to amend his motion as stated

Leave having been granted,

The Hon Captain BAGOT seconded the motion, remarking that he could bear full testimony to all which had been stated by the mover He did not think, indeed, that as much had been said in favor of the advantages which Mr Ridley had conferred upon the province as might have been said The hon mover had shown in the most clear and lucid manner the benefits which he had himself derived from the use of this machine by the saving of labor, but he had not shown the enormous profits which had resulted to the colony upon the 175,000 acres of wheat which were under cultivation It was impossible, indeed, to calculate these advantages, for, but for Mr Ridley's invention, instead of there being 175,000 acres under cultivation, there would in all probability not have been one eighth of that quantity The benefits conferred by this admirable implement had during the last six or seven years enabled the colony not only to supply the wants of a wonderfully increasing population amongst ourselves, but also to supply an unheard of rush to a neighboring colony It had been the means of enriching the farmers, and he believed that upwards of a million of money had been expended in the purchase of land, which would not have been expended but for this machine the use of which, he believed, had enriched agriculturists to the extent of several millions Mr Ridley spurned anything like an attempt to put upon him anything like a pecuniary reward and he might remark that when Mr Ridley made the discovery which he did he made a discovery which had never been thought of before Numerous attempts had been made to invent a reaping machine, but Mr Ridley passed them all by and introduced a locomotive thrashing machine, and by doing so established a claim to the deepest gratitude of every individual in the colony The step proposed by the Hon Major O'Halloran was a just and proper one It might be objected that many years had passed by, and that after a reasonable time had been given to test the invention would have been the suitable period at which such a vote as this should have been arrived at, but it was never too late to take a step in the right direction

The Hon the PRESIDENT put the motion, which was carried unanimously

On the motion of the Hon H AYERS, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and transmitted by message to the Assembly, intimating that the Council had agreed to the Bill with an amendment in which they desired the concurrence of the Assembly

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that when the Act of 1855 and 1856 was passed, strong objections were expressed to it on account of the inequality of the rate of assessment That Act provided that there should be a construction rate of two shillings in the pound upon property within the city boundaries, and sixpence for a supply rate, the construction rate being chargeable whether a supply were taken or not The Ministry of that day undertook to give the subject their best consideration at a future time, and the result had been the present Bill, which provided a more equitable mode of raising the necessary amount It had received the careful consideration of the Commissioners of water supply, and he need merely refer hon members to the schedules to the Bill to shew them what alterations were contemplated by the present measure The property within the city was divided into four classes The first class related to private dwellings and offices for business purposes, which were assessed at so much per room, the second referred to stables, stockyards, &c, and there was a provision by which sixpence per week would be charged for every head of cattle or horse using the water The third class had reference to buildings in which water was not consumed, but which would nevertheless be benefitted by the large sum which would be saved in insurance, and upon these it was proposed to charge 2½ per cent upon their annual value The fourth class took in the same class of buildings, in which water was used in contradistinction to those in which water was not used Upon these it was proposed to place an addition to the rate charged upon private dwellings of 2½ per cent Clause 48 gave the Commissioners power to impose an additional rate upon mills, breweries &c, according to the quantity of water used The only other alteration of importance was that in carrying out the Act the operation of the Commissioners would be dispensed with, and the Commissioner of Public Works substituted With that exception the whole scope of the measure was merely to reduce the rate He moved that the Bill be read a second time.

The Hon Captain BAGOT seconded the motion

The Hon Dr DAVIES thought it would have been better if the old construction rate had been continued, and that it had been left optional with parties whether they took the water or not He regretted to observe that, in a sanitary point of view, drainage appeared to be considered a secondary matter, as he felt satisfied that if a Council of medical men had been appointed they would have reported that drainage was more important than water supply If water were brought into the town, and there were no drainage, the result would be that mere deluging the streets and surface would lead to putrefaction and disease He regretted to perceive that the small amount which would remain for drainage after water supply had been obtained would be wholly insufficient for the purpose No benefit would result to the health of the citizens from water supply unless it were accompanied by drainage It had been stated by the Hon the Chief Secretary that this Bill provided for imposing a more equitable rate than the former Bill, but he did not think this was the case in all instances, for washerwomen, scourers, and dyers, used eight or ten times as much water as many who occupied large houses, but as the classes he had named would probably occupy premises containing two or three rooms they would only be assessed accordingly He believed the scale would have to be altered

The Hon S DAVENPORT remarked that the previous assessment was upon the same principle as that of Melbourne being an assessment upon property without reference to the individual benefits derived from the Waterworks He thought the system proposed by this Bill altogether more equitable The Hon Dr Davies had referred to the absence of provision for sufficient drainage, but he believed they were placed in this position, that the drainage of the city would be such an expensive operation that it would be impossible to undertake it, as it was so far beyond their means He believed that much benefit would result, so far as drainage was concerned, from obtaining an abundant supply of water, the volition as contrasted with the force with which water came from a water-cart clearing away many impurities To make channels underground was an antique mode, created much sickness, and was the cause of many deaths He believed that surface drainage was far more wholesome, and that with the balance which would remain in hand after the Waterworks had been completed much might be done in the way of drainage to improve the health of the City of Adelaide The Hon Dr Davies had observed that dyers and others were not taxed in proportion to the water which they consumed, and he (Mr Davenport) had formed the same opinion in reference to the wholesale consumers of water when he first read the Bill, but upon consulting Clause 48 he found that power was given to impose an additional rate in such cases He believed that much benefit to health would result from an abundant supply of water, so that, as in London, the poor man might be enabled to get his warm bath with 54 gallons of water for a penny, or an ordinary sponge bath for a quarter that amount.

The Bill was then read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

The Hon H AYERS drew attention to schedule A, which provided for a rate upon rooms containing 30 superficial feet, that would be only six feet by five, and he would, therefore, suggest that the 30 should be altered to 60

The Hon Captain BAGOT thought this would exclude a great many, as he believed that in the smaller houses there were many rooms occupied as bedrooms which were not larger than six feet by five

The Hon H AYERS said that his proposition had reference to rooms 10 feet by 6, and he did not think there were any smaller

The amendment was lost, and the various clauses and schedules having been agreed to, the House resumed, the report was adopted, and the third reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day

REAL PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill being called on, the Hon the PRESIDENT said he must again call the attention of the Council to a fact to which he had directed their attention before—that this was a Bill containing clauses appropriating revenue, and there was nothing to show that it had been recommended by the Governor There were two clauses in this Bill appropriating revenue, and under the Constitution Act, the 40th clause, neither House could introduce a Bill for the appropriation of revenue, unless it had been recommended by the Governor There was no intimation that this Bill had been so recommended, and, furthermore he would call the attention of the House to the address of His Excellency upon proroguing Parliament, last session, in which he referred to there being a clause appropriating revenue in the former Act, and stated that clause was inoperative. He might also refer to the letter of the Secretary of State to his Excellency upon the same subject

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY asked if he was to understand the objection was, that the Bill had not been introduced in that House, but in the House of Assembly?

The Hon the PRESIDENT referred to the 40th clause of the Constitution Act, showing that it was not lawful to introduce Bills appropriating revenue in either House

The Hon H AYERS was desirous of submitting a motion, with the view of testing the feeling of the House upon the point

The Hon the PRESIDENT said the Hon the Chief Secretary was in possession of the House at present, being about to move the second reading

The Hon J MORPHETT submitted that the Hon Mr Ayers was perfectly in order The Council had been addressed by the President upon an irregularity, and had been cautioned against committing an unconstitutional act, and then the Hon Mr Ayers rose, he presum , for the purpose of moving that the Bill be not passed He thought the hon gentleman was perfectly in order in so doing, and that the Hon the President was perfectly correct in his view, for the 40th clause of the Constitution Act distinctly stated that neither House should pass Bills appropriating the revenue unless such Bills were introduced by the Governor The President had called the attention of the Council to the fact that they were about to do an illegal act, and he thought the Council were indebted to him for so doing, as it was important that the Council should be kept within the bounds of their lawful authority He considered that the Hon. Mr Ayers was perfectly in order in moving that the House could not pass this Bill

The Hon the PRESIDENT understood that the Hon Mr Ayers was about to move for a Committee

The Hon H AYERS said that was not the case, as he considered this a question of privilege

The Hon Captain BAGOT could not see on what ground this objection was raised Just now they had gone through a Bill disposing of revenue and providing for levying taxes That was a Bill to amend a Bill, and so was the one before the House The Council were not called upon to enact a new Bill but merely to amend one He could not conceive that the argument of the hon. the President would hold water

The Hon the PRESIDENT hoped the Council did not think that it was he who objected to the Bill being proceeded with, but he had merely pointed out as a matter of duty, what he had no hesitation in saying was the case, that the Council had no power to deal with the Bill

The Hon H AYERS said he was about to move that the House had no power to proceed with the Bill, as it had not been introduced by His Excellency He need merely refer to the remarks of His Excellency on proroguing the House last session By the 35th clause of Act No 15, known as the Real Property Act, it was provided that for the insurance fund there should be a payment of a farthing in the pound, and in default of this assessment being found sufficient, provision was made to make good the damage from the general revenue That clause was construed by His Excellency into a contingent appropriation of revenue, and in proroguing the Parliament His Excellency remarked that he hoped the alterations made in the laws would realize the best wishes of their promoters, but that he felt the 35th clause of the Real Property Act contemplated a contingent appropriation of revenue, and not having been initiated by himself would have to be rendered effectual by future legislation The 21st clause of the Bill before the House repealed clause 35 of the old Act and enacted another clause increasing the assessment from a farthing to a halfpenny in the pound He found according to the records of the Assembly that this Bill had been introduced by Mr Hanson, and he presumed that the same objection which His Excellency made to the former Bill must exist to the present one He moved that the House do not proceed with the Bill

The Hon S DAVENPORT said that on previous occasions when the Hon the President had called attention to the 40th clause of the Constitution Act, he felt that he should have done the same thing had he been in the President's position, but the ruling of the House had hitherto been that a Bill which had been passed by the Assembly and recommended by the Government was introduced in a perfectly regular course, the Government having exercised their constitutional right of arranging the public purse The clause in the Constitution Act rather referred to the appropriation of revenue, but the Bill before the House referred to the raising of revenue If the conscience of the Hon Mr Ayers were so constitutional, why had it not been equally constitutional on previous occasions, for instance, when the Council passed the Third Judge and District Courts Bill or the District Councils Act Amendment Bill, which the hon member not only agreed to but it was actually at his suggestion that the twopenny fee for registration was struck out

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the question now raised had been set at rest long since. There was this difference between the present Bill and that which was introduced last session, the present Bill being introduced by a responsible Minister of the Crown, and it was always considered that a Bill introduced by a responsible Minister of the Crown was in the same position as a Bill introduced by the Governor The point had been decided over and over again in reference to the Railway Bills and others

The Hon the PRESIDENT said there had been no ruling upon the point in that House

The Hon H AYERS also urged that there had been no ruling in that House upon the subject

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the House had decided the point on several occasions, and he had hoped it would not have been raised again The Hon H Ayers had referred to clause 35 in the Bill of last session, but he would remark that it was not proposed by this Bill to amend that clause in any way, or to touch the revenue of the colony

The Hon J MORPHETT considered this question one of great importance He should have no objection to have the question fully argued whether that Council could pass any Bills appropriating the revenue of the colony, providing such Bills were not introduced to Parliament by the Governor The matter had now come before the House in such a way that it demanded attention The Hon the President had expressed an opinion that the Council could not pass such Bills because it would be in contravention of the 40th clause of the Constitution Act He considered in doing so the President had not merely done his duty, but that it was his imperative duty to act as he had, as it was to him that the Council looked to keep them within the bounds of lawful authority It should be remembered that the Acts appropriating the revenue which had been passed by the Council, though they had not been introduced by the Governor had not yet stood the test of the Courts of Law, and it was never too late to arrest themselves in a downward course if it were found that they had really been led into error He had understood the President to state that he had drawn the attention of the Council to the point in consequence of the Secretary of State having drawn the attention of His Excellency to it, and this made it more important that the matter should be closely looked into The Chief Secretary might determine upon going on with the Bill, but that would not relieve hon members from their duty to themselves and their constituents He should second the amendment of the Hon. Mr Ayers

The Hon the PRESIDENT remarked that there was a certificate attached to the Real Property Bill, to the effect that it had originated in the Assembly, but upon another Bill received from the Assembly—the Assessment on Stock Bill—there was a certificate that it had been recommended by His Excellency the Governor The only legitimate way that the Council could be informed of the fact was by the certificate

The Hon H AYERS in reference to the remarks of the Hon Mr Davenport relative to having taken no notice of such irregularity before, said that he considered this was a most fitting time to do so when the President had called the attention of the Council to the subject The hon gentleman had also alluded to the District Councils Act, and alterations which he (Mr Ayers) had effected in it, but he was not aware that the District Councils Act was not properly introduced to the Assembly, no doubt it was, as the attention of the House had not been called to any irregularity in connection with it In reference to the remarks of the Chief Secretary that the 21st clause of the present Bill did not contain the same provision as the 35th clause of the old one, if the hon gentleman would refer to the 40th clause of the Constitution Act, he would find that neither House had power to deal with Bills not introduced by the Governor which imposed any tax or rate and if levying an assessment of a halfpenny in the pound was not a rate, he did not know the meaning of those words

The Hon the PRESIDENT referred particularly to the 91st clause of the Bill, providing for indemnity out of the Insurance Fund, or the General Revenue of the province

The motion of the Hon Mr AYERS having been lost,

The Hon CHIEF SECRETARY, in introducing the second reading of the Bill said that the amendments had been suggested by the Registrar General who originally introduced the Bill, the Lands Title Commissioners and their solicitors The amendments were the result of their observations upon the practical working of the Act during the last six months, and although they might seem extensive, upon referring to the Act it would be found that they were purely of a technical character to assist in carrying out the measure During the last session the Council fully conceded in the principle of the Bill, and he was sure they would not hesitate to assent to amendments for the purpose of making it more beneficial

The Hon Captain BAGOT seconded the motion

The Hon J MORPHETT scarcely knew how to address the House on the present occasion or how he should be able to answer the arguments in favor of the Bill No doubt those arguments were very good, but seeing they were advanced by parties not in that House, he did not see how he could answer them The Hon the Chief Secretary had not favored the House with the reasons that the Bill should be amended, but admitting that the old Act ought to be, as it was very likely it should be, it was unquestionably their duty to amend an Act which was found to work badly or to contain errors which required amendment He objected, however, to the motion of the Chief Secretary, because no time had been given for the consideration of these amendments, which their duty to their constituents, and the importance of the subject demanded should be given to the matter The Bill he believed, was only in print on Saturday, and it was very probable that many like himself had not received it until the previous day, so that there had been 24 hours to study 96 clauses which the Bill contained to say nothing of the necessary consideration to determine the effect of striking out 76 clauses which the Bill repealed, and four schedules If he could have devoted every moment since he received the Bill to its consideration he should have been unable to arrive at a clear and decided view upon the question Some hon members might be so gifted as to be enabled to study a Bill of such length in so short a time, but he confessed he was unable to do so, and as he considered that no injury or injustice could result to the country at large by throwing out the Bill for the present, and introducing it next session, he should move that the Council adopt that course If the Bill were thrown out now the Chief Secretary would be enabled to introduce it again when the Parliament assembled and the hon gentleman had stated that would probably be in the early part of April He was in hopes that before the Bill was brought forward certain returns which had been moved for in the Assembly would have been forthcoming, but this had not been the case, although a long time had elapsed The Constitution Act had given them two Houses of Parliament, and it had always been held that the advantage of two Houses was that a guarantee was given due consideration would be given to all measures which were introduced The Council had always been referred to as an advantage in presenting a check to hasty Legislation, but he would ask the Chief Secretary if that character could be maintained if the hon gentleman were to introduce a Bill of this important character which had only been in print on the Monday, and on the Tuesday ask that House to pass it into law The Chief Secretary would recollect that when the last Act was passed there was one clause to which particular exception was taken, and that was clause 1, which repealed all other Acts which at all interfered with the Bill Great objection had been taken to that clause, and since that period His Excellency the Governor had received certain instructions not to assent to any Act on the part of Her Majesty, unless all Acts which were repealed by it were specially mentioned If the Bill were passed, which would be unwise, His Excellency could not in the face of those instructions assent to it, His Excellency being specially ordered not to assent to any Act which did not specially mention the Acts which were repealed by it Now he believed the present Act repealed about 40 Acts, containing in all 1500 clauses, so of course it was expected by the Chief Secretary that during the 24 hours which they had had for the consideration of this Bill, hon members would have read these 1,500 clauses, and no doubt hon members would have done so, if they had only known what Acts they were, but as they were not mentioned in the Bill, they could not tell It was the duty of the Chief Secretary to point out in the Bill the Acts actually repealed He was surprised at the course which the Chief Secretary had taken He thought the hon gentleman must have made a mistake in introducing the present Bill without any provision rectifying the error in the previous Bill to which His Excellency alluded in proroguing Parliament The hon gentleman must feel that he had made a mistake in not introducing such a clause, but he would suggest that if the Council threw out the Bill now, the hon gentleman would be enabled to introduce such a provision in the measure which he laid before the Council next session The Chief Secretary had been very concise in introducing the Bill, but he thought the hon gentleman should have stated upon what grounds the Council were asked to double the assessment, and why if a farthing were considered sufficient last season they should now be asked to increase it to a halfpenny When they taxed the community at large they should should show some good grounds for doing so and he contended that this amounted to an increase of taxation upon the whole community, as almost all were purchasers of land He should be happy to consider amendments which were considered necessary to remedy defects in the present Bill, but he must have reasonable time to consider them, and was not prepared to take the arguments of parties not in that Council as sufficient justification for passing an Act which he did not understand He had been sent to that House by a constituency upon the faith that he would carefully weigh and consider every measure which was brought before it, and it would not be a sufficient justification for him to say that Mr This or That said it was considered desirable that such an Act should be passed He wanted to be enabled to form his own judgment, and to be allowed a proper time for consideration He moved that the Bill be read that day six months

The Hon Captain SCOTT was sorry to say that he felt it his duty to second the amendment of the Hon Mr Morphett He should really like very much to see the Bill pass, and in such a manner as would give full satisfaction to those who were entrusted with the working of the measure, and to the country He should like to see it pass in such a way as would be becoming the dignity of that House, but the Bill before the House furnished clear evidence of the evils of hasty legislation, and by calling upon the House to repeal 70 clauses and amend five, furnished 75 powerful arguments to guard them against falling into a similar error on the present occasion The Bill was not yet 11 months old, and the original Bill contained 123 clauses, but by the Bill before the House they were called upon to repeal 70 and amend 5 leaving only 48 in the original Bill, and they were called upon in order to amend these to add 96 new clauses, or 200 per cent upon the remainder of the Bill, on which they were to legislate, and to repeal four schedules and add five Another difficulty appeared to be that the new clauses were to be dovetailed into the old Bill in some way, but where they were to go hon members did not know, except by some red ink marks which had been made upon a Bill which had been placed in the hands of members, but he presumed that these red ink marks would not always remain in the Bill, and consequently if parties went to law under this Bill, who would there be to say where certain clauses should be inserted?—who could say where the red ink marks were? (Laughter) It appeared that clause 2 was part of clause 3 in the original Act, and the succeeding clause was to be clause 4 but whether clause 4 in the original Act was to be struck out, was not stated He confessed he had tried to understand how these clauses were to be arranged but could not for at the end of clause 9 was to be inserted clause 6 of the new Bill, and between clauses 13 and 14 came clauses 7 and 10 to be inserted Between clauses 26 and 27 clauses from 11 to 17 of the new Bill were to be inserted, and in another part there was a memorandum, clauses 22 to 41 to be inserted here Who could possibly understand this? Would it not have been better to have repealed the old Bill, for he would defy any one to understand the two measures as they were placed before the House There was no intimation as to the order in which the various clauses were to be considered When the original Bill was passed they were told that it was to be a very cheap Bill, a people's Bill—and it might be so ultimately, but he confessed he did not think the way to make it so would be to pass the Bill now introduced It might prove very advantageous to the lawyers, but he could not see how a plain man could know how to deal with it if he had nothing but this Bill to guide him It should be remembered that the Bill proposed to deal with every man's hearth, with every man's house, and every foot of land in the colony The Bill was of so important a character that it ought not to be hastily passed It would be well worth their while to take time to pass it, so that it would not interfere disadvantageously with any man, but that it would work smoothly and advantageously to all The Bill had not been in actual operation five months, and yet it had been found that it would be necessary to repeal 70 clauses, and that five would have to be amended, making an average of three clauses for every week that the Bill had been in operation He did not wish to detract from the judgment, intention, and perseverance of the framer of the Act, who had undertaken a most herculean task, and it could not be expected that the first Bill should prove perfect, but that it had not proved so was a greater reason that they should not rush hastily into the present measure, and leave it but an imperfect one after all If they passed the new Bill, it might be found within six months that 20 or 30 other clauses required amendment, and then they would have the same thing to go over again There would then be another set of amendments instead of bringing forward a new Bill till at last the lawyers themselves would become so puzzled that they would require a pretty handsome fee to induce them to have anything to do with the Act It would be more just to the country and to the gentlemen who were entrusted with the working of the Act, and more creditable to themselves, to throw out the Bill before the House, and if a new Bill were introduced early in the ensuing session, he should be happy to endeavor to make it as perfect as possible. The other colonies would laugh at them if, after boasting of having introduced a perfect measure, it were found that within a few months 75 clauses required alteration. He was not opposed to the Bill, which he believed might be made a great boon to the country, but they would be adopting a most unsatisfactory course by agreeing to the Bill before the House.

The Hon Captain BAGOT said the last speaker had mystified himself, and had endeavoured to mystify the House, by comparing the two Bills, but the fact was that the Bill marked with red ink, which had been referred to, had merely been placed in the hands of hon members for the purpose of directing their attention to those portions which it was proposed to amend. He would remind the Hon Captain Scott that no ship had ever yet been built which would not bear improvement, and the House had no right, he thought, to say that they would not proceed with improved Acts of Parliament as often as they were required. The House would bear in mind that this was a new measure, and, as had been stated by the previous speaker, the framer had undertaken a most herculean task. It was not to be supposed that the Bill should be perfection in the first instance; in fact, he was quite prepared to find the Bill require amendment ten times during the time he had a seat in that House. The Hon Mr Morphett had stated that His Excellency the Governor could not give his assent to the Bill of last year, but he would remind the House that there had been no disallowance of the Bill after it had been submitted to Her Majesty's law officers. The hon gentleman stated that he considered he should be doing his duty to his constituents by rejecting the measure; but he (Captain Bagot) had been returned to that House by the same constituency who returned the hon member, and he felt bound to support the Bill, because in doing so he felt satisfied he echoed the wishes of nine-tenths of the constituency who sent him to that House.

The Hon H AYERS did not rise to oppose the principle of the Bill, because if he were opposed to the Bill or the original Act which this Bill sought to amend, he should remain silent, but it was because he wished to see Act No 15 so amended that not only those who were wedded to its principle and practice, but those who conscientiously objected to come under its provisons might have those objections removed, that he should support the motion of the Hon Mr Morphett. From the short time which they had had for the consideration of the Bill he must object, as they no doubt would if the second reading were carried, to proceed with the consideration of the measure clause by clause. The Bill had only been actually in operation five months, and had been only very partially adopted by the public. The Government had the power of showing to what extent the Bill had been successful, but had not done so. The Bill was, in fact, altogether an experiment, and was characterised as such when it was very hastily passed last session by that Council. They could not indeed have any better proof of it having been merely an experiment than being asked to strike out 70 clauses and insert 90 new ones, besides altering and inserting several schedules. Even supposing that hon members had devoted the whole of the time from Friday last, the earliest date at which the Bill was said to have been circulated, to its consideration, still there was not time to enable them to understand it. He had urged the Chief Secretary to put off the second reading of the Bill, but had been told in reply that the Council must take the Bill on trust; that certain gentlemen entrusted with the carrying out of the Act had framed the new Bill, that there was no time for hon members to consider it, and that they must take everything for granted. If the House assented to that principle how very simple would then duties be, for they would have nothing to do but allow the heads of departments to make what arrangements they thought proper and the House would assent to them as a matter of course. The Collector of Customs under such an arrangement would arrange the tariff, and the Surveyor-General would fix the price of waste lands. In fact, the heads of departments would arrange everything, and the Council would have no right to reject any measure that was brought before it, because if they attempted to do so the head of some department would say "That's precisely the sort of Bill we want." He was there to exercise his judgment to the best of his ability, and claimed as a right due time for consideration. He did not object to amend the existing Act, but what he said was that the Chief Secretary had not given them sufficient time to consider the amendments or to set about amending the Bill. No doubt many of the amendments which were proposed were very good, but if as had been suggested by the hon Captain Bagot, that they might be called upon to amend the Bill ten times, why not at once appoint a committee or commission to enquire into the matter and let the House know what was passing and what was required? Why should the Bill be brought forward just upon the eve of prorogation, and members be told "there, that's the Bill pass it." It was monstrous that the highest Assembly in the province should be asked to accept a Bill upon the mere assurance of one of the officers appointed to carry it out. Allusions had been made to the first clause of the Act No 15, which sought to repeal all ordinances in any way repugnant to the Act, but did any one suppose that the Act could alter the Imperial law in reference to real property? that it could alter the common law as had been pointed out in the valuable notes upon the Bill by the Hon the President? At the very threshold of the Act he saw that there had been no attempt to amend it so as to make it a perfect measure. Whatever was worth doing was worth doing well, and as but a short time would elapse before the next meeting of Parliament, that time might be well devoted to an endeavor to bring forward a more perfect measure than that before the House.

The Hon S DAVENPORT felt considerable interest in this measure, and had done so from its first passing. Having seen the working of the measure his opinion was that it was a most valuable one as regarded the welfare of the country. He regretted that the amendments had not been brought before the House at an earlier period of the session as there could be no doubt the question was a most important one and as there was a diversity of opinion upon it, nothing should be permitted to interfere with the due deliberation of the Legislature. He felt when he received the Bill, which he believed was on Friday, that the amendments being so exceedingly numerous he ought not to be called upon to express an opinion upon them at such short notice, but when he came to look at the amendments and to inspect the office at which the Act was brought into operation, and see how simple the process was, he felt that the Government had acted rightly in adopting the amendments, and that the Council would act wisely in consenting to them. The amendments were the result of the deliberations of those who had been entrusted with carrying out the measure, two of whom were legal gentlemen, and the other though not a professional man, from the zeal which he had displayed, and the time which he had devoted to the measure, was fully competent to arrive at a correct conclusion. From the 1st July last, that gentleman had devoted all his energies to carrying out the measure, and he might remark that these amendments had been adopted by a Government who, without exception, were opposed to the measure when it was first introduced. He could scarcely, indeed, wonder at their being opposed to such a mighty change, but, now that it was no longer a theory, but had become law, and had been in action many months, during which period those who were opposed to it were not backward in finding out its faults, it had received the approval of the Government, and commended itself to the Legislature. When he read the various clauses, and saw the object which those entrusted with the carrying out of the measure had, he saw there could be no possible danger in assenting to the Bill. Some hon members asked that the Bill should be delayed for another session, but why lose time? for when a good thing had to be done, the sooner the better. It was true it was reported out of doors that it was probable the House would be called together in April, but he would remind the House, that on previous occasions it had been reported that they would meet for the despatch of business much earlier than they actually had, and that the House were not justified in postponing amendments which were so highly recommended by those who were entrusted with carrying out the measure. He regretted that in consequence of the pressure upon the Government Printing Office the report of the Registrar-General was not in print; but if it had been, it would have been seen that a great deal of business had been done under the Act, and that it was becoming popular—176 applications to bring land under the Act having been made, 30 of which had been refused, four withdrawn, and 158 approved; 80 transfers had also been effected. The hon gentleman concluded by giving a brief sketch of the proposed amendments.

The motion for the second reading of the Bill was carried by a majority of 4, the votes—Ayes, 8; Noes, 4—being as follow:

AYES, 8—The Honorables Freeling, Bagot, Hall, O'Halloran, Davies, Everard, Davenport, Chief Secretary (teller).

NOES, 4—The Honorables Ayers, A Scott, Captain Scott, Morphett (teller).

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, the House went into Committee upon the Bill; and the various clauses having been passed, with verbal amendments, the House resumed, the report was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following day.

The Council adjourned at 5 minutes past 6 o'clock till 2 o'clock on the following day.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 21

The SPEAKER took the chair shortly after 1 o'clock.

THE HARBOR TRUST

Mr SOLOMON presented a petition, signed by Messrs Henriques, Young, and Melville, on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce, praying that the Harbour Trust might be permitted to continue without interference the work which they had hitherto so successfully prosecuted.

The petition was rejected in consequence of an informality.

WASTE LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the consideration in Committee of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill was made an Order of the Day for the following Thursday.

DATE OF ACTS BILL

The Attorney-General, in moving that the reasons forwarded by the Legislative Council for disagreeing to the amendments made by the Assembly in the Date of Acts Bill be taken into consideration in Committee of the whole House, said that he did not consider it necessary to go into detail, but he would merely state that it would be impossible for the House to assent to the amendments without altering its Standing Orders The Bill, as originally introduced into the Legislative Council, involved a course of procedure at variance with the Standing Orders of that House, which having been assented to by the Governor, possessed the force of law The reasons assigned by the Council did not appear to him to be such as should induce the House to assent to what would involve a repeal of the Standing Orders passed by that House, and what he intended to propose was that the Committee do not agree to the amendments, and if the Committee agreed to that resolution he would then move that the reasons assigned by the Council be referred to the Standing Committee upon Privileges to draw up an answer The hon gentleman formally moved that the amendments of the Council be not agreed to

Mr Reynolds asked if this motion were carried what would be the next course? Would it be necessary that there should be a conference between the members of the two Houses?

The Attorney-General was sorry what he had stated had not reached the ears of the hon member What he had stated was that he intended upon the motion before the House being carried, to move that the Committee upon Standing Orders and Privileges be requested to state the grounds upon which the Assembly declined to agree with the amendments made by the Council The chief reason that the House should resist the amendments was that they would in fact repeal the Standing Orders

The motion was carried, and the Committee upon Standing Orders and Privileges were appointed a Committee to draw up reasons, showing the grounds upon which the amendments had been disallowed

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

The Attorney-General moved the report of the Committee of the whole House upon this Bill be adopted, and the motion having been carried, the hon gentleman, in accordance with notice previously given, moved that the Standing Orders be suspended in order that the Bill might be read a third time He was still in hopes that the intention of the Government might be carried out, and that the House might be prorogued before the holidays This would of course depend upon the state of business in the other House, but he had understood that the Real Property Amendment Act, which was the only matter respecting which he had entertained any doubt, was likely to pass the upper branch of the Legislature before Friday next, without such amendments as would involve any difficulty with the House of Assembly, and, consequently, he did not see anything to prevent the prorogation taking place on Friday, if the state of business in both Houses would permit He was not without hopes that all the important measures which had yet to be disposed of would be assented to substantially by the other House, and in order to facilitate business he begged to move that the Standing Orders be suspended, in order that the Bill before the House might be read a third time and sent to the other branch of the Legislature a day sooner than it would otherwise be

The Bill was then read a third time and passed, and transmitted by message to the Legislative Council, requesting their concurrence therein

THE ESTIMATES

Upon the order of the day for the recommittal of the Estimates for 1859, with a view of reconsidering the item for Police £18,378, being called on, Mr Peake, who had given the notice, was not in attendance

The Attorney General said that, although the hon member for the Burra was not in his place, if he had been present, he (the Attorney-General) should have taken the same course as that which he now proposed, and that was, to move that the report of the Committee of the whole House be agreed to If the House believed that any advantage could result to the country from the reconsideration of the Estimates, in whole or in part, he should not oppose such a course, but he would remark in reference to the item for Police, which was the only one under consideration, or the only one which it was competent for the House to consider, he believed there was scarcely any department which would less bear such a reduction as that which was proposed by the hon member for the Burra and Clare Ever since he had been in the colony, and he was not a very young colonist, the admirable arrangements of the police force, and the efficient manner in which that force performed their duties, had been matter of congratulation to the people of South Australia. Notwithstanding the proximity of the colony to the convict colony of Tasmania, and the fact that a number had come to this colony from other colonies who were known to have been sent out as criminals, the criminal population of South Australia had not increased The proceedings before magistrates and the Supreme Court showed that there had been no increase, and this might no doubt be attributed to the efficiency of our police force He did not believe that there could be a reduction in the country districts without imposing upon the public a greater expense than at present for various matters performed by the police, though not strictly police duties If the number of police in Adelaide and at Port Adelaide were to be diminished, then they would prevent the proper check upon the introduction of criminals which at present existed, and diminish the usefulness of a force to which South Australia was in a great degree indebted for the security to personal property which existed Lest the motion for the recommital of the Estimates had been brought forward with any intention to prevent the Parliament from being prorogued before the holidays, he would state unhesitatingly, on the part of the Government, that they had no intention of proroguing unless the Assessment on Stock Bill and the Real Property Act Amendment Bill, which were before the other House, had been finally disposed of If those measures were not disposed of the Government would merely ask the House to adjourn, not to prorogue He could hardly believe indeed that any hon member of that House thought it was the intention of the Government to act otherwise Whilst he admitted the right of the House to reconsider any item upon the Estimates, he had always considered that having once been brought under discussion and received the full consideration of the House, unless it could be shown that an error had been committed it should not again be brought forward There was one item which the House had refused which he should like to have been reconsidered, he alluded to the item of £30 for furniture and contingencies for the Private Secretary, which item had been refused, but he felt it was not the intention of the House that the Governor should not be afforded an opportunity of providing stationery and other articles usually included under the head of Contingencies He felt, however, that the Estimates having been passed, it would be better to allow the matter to go, and if any expenditure were necessary to come to the House afterwards and ask the House to sanction it, than to recommit the Estimates

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR.

The Speaker announced the receipt of messages from His Excellency the Governor, intimating that the necessary steps had been taken to comply with the addresses of the Assembly relative to the survey of the Kapunda line of railway, and the appointment of Henry Simpson, Esq, as a member of the Harbor Trust

THE ESTIMATES—RESUMPTION OF DEBATE

Mr McEllister had no wish to embarrass the Government, but at the same time he wished to place them in possession of some information which would shew that there were abuses in the police force through the instrumentality of the Commissioner, who was not fit for his appointment He wished to bring under the notice of the Government the conduct of the Commissioner in reference to Inspector Reid——

The Speaker said the hon member was out of order in alluding to a matter not under discussion The question was as to the recommittal of a portion of the Estimates

Mr McEllister said he was desirous of moving that the salary of the Commissioner be reduced, and of assigning reasons for doing so When he had an opportunity he should certainly move that the salary of the Commissioner be reduced to £400.

Mr Reynolds said that when the report upon the Estimates was brought up the other day, he gave notice that he wished to recommit them, for the purpose of raising a discussion upon the vote for the snagboat on the River Murray He presumed he would be out of order in moving the reconsideration of the item, having been absent at the time notices of the items to be brought under reconsideration were given He regretted that the hon member for the Burra was not present, in order that the item for police might be again brought under discussion, for he was of opinion with many others that the item for police was a very serious one, and that it might be reduced without prejudice to the country, but the item had been passed with the understanding that the question should receive the consideration of the Government during the recess He hoped that it would be so considered, and that it would not be shelved as many other matters had been The last recess had lasted for eight or nine months, yet nothing appeared to have been done by the Government during that period He hoped the Government would well consider the subject, and be prepared during the ensuing session to come down with something like a scheme He thought the time had arrived when the police should be handed over to the Corporation, and then came the question in reference to the mounted police, who no doubt the squatters would be quite ready to take charge of He repeated that he hoped the Government would be prepared to come down next session with some scheme to reduce the item for police

Mr Strangways said that he also had moved the recommittal of the Estimates, but in reference to the item for police, his own impression was that there was not time before the 1st January, to make the necessary arrangements to enable the city police to be charged to the City of Adelaide. Whether the Government took the police question into consideration or not, appeared to him to be a matter of very little importance, as it was very seldom that anything resulted from their deliberations If the Government did not during the recess make such arrangements as would enable the local police to be charged to the particular localities for whose advantage they were maintained, when the Estimates came up for consideration he should certainly be prepared to move that the item for the metropolitan police be struck out. He was in favor of the mounted police being maintained for the protection of the whole colony, but he considered the metropolitan police, being solely for the benefit of the city, should be paid for by the citizens, and that system should be carried out throughout the colony. The new Police Act, which he trusted would be introduced next session, should provide for all these matters and for the levying of a police rate. He thought the mounted police should be maintained out of the general revenue, as Adelaide being their head-quarters the citizens derived a fair proportion of benefit from them.

Mr PEAKE (who had just entered the House) rose to a point of order. Upon the report of the Committee of the whole House being brought up, it was ruled by the Speaker on the previous day—

The SPEAKER said the hon member was out of order in referring to what had taken place on the previous day.

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the Estimates be recommitted on the following day with the view of reconsidering the items for the new Government printing office, the amount in aid of the rates of District Councils, the vote for military defences, and the vote for immigration. The House had abundant evidence that a new Government printing office was not required. The present office was sufficient for all ordinary requirements, and it was only when a large amount of business required to be done in a short space of time, when, for instance, a number of Select Committees were sitting, that any inconvenience was felt. It was true the present building might not be in accordance with the architectural taste of the present Colonial Architect, but that was no reason that a new building should be erected. It would be quite sufficient for all purposes for a year or two to come. In reference to the amount in aid of the rates of District Councils, they could not year after year pay what they had been paying to such a source, or if they did, the result would be that they would have to levy a special tax for main roads, so that what the Government gave to District Councils, they would have to call upon them to pay in the shape of a special rate. This would be precisely the same thing as reducing the amount in aid. He believed that the course which the House would have eventually to adopt would be, to annually reduce the amount paid to Corporations and District Councils in aid of the rates collected. In order that the amount might be decreased gradually, so that Municipal and District Councils might not feel so great injury as though the amount were suddenly stopped, he should move that the £12,500 be reduced to £10,000. In reference to military defences, for which the House had voted a sum of £4,500, he was prepared to move that amount be reduced to £1,000, which he believed might be judiciously expended upon a Volunteer Artillery Force in the neighborhood of Adelaide. He believed £100 or £200 a year would be sufficient for this, and that it would be money well expended. He thought that £1,000 would enable the Government to do what he believed they were desirous of doing—establish a Rifle Corps in various portions of the colony, and, under certain regulations, to issue the Enfield rifles which were in the Government Store, and provide the necessary ammunition. During the six months £1,000 might be beneficially expended in this way, but it was not in any way desirable that the report of the Committee upon Colonial Defences should be adopted, or that Martello towers should be erected, or a battery at Torrens Island. The other item to which he had alluded was the vote for immigration. Hon members, it would be remembered, had expressed an opinion that half the sum originally proposed would be sufficient, and had voted £10,000 for the purpose but he was of opinion that this reduction was too much, and that it would not pay for half the immigration to which the colony had been accustomed. He should, therefore, move the recommittal of these items upon the following day.

Mr BARROW felt bound to oppose any further postponement of the Estimates. (Hear, hear.) In reference to the Police item, the hon member who had just sat down had stated that it would be impossible to institute any change in the administration of the police force before the 1st January, and that the present system would have to be kept up. That was a strong argument against any delay. He should have liked, if possible, to effect alterations in a few items as they passed through Committee, but he and hon members who had voted with him had been fairly beaten, and must submit to the defeat. He did not expect, however that the hon member for Encounter Bay would ever submit to defeat, for the hon member was gifted with the powers attributed he believed by Goldsmith, to the village schoolmaster—"Though vanquished he could argue still." The hon member was frequently defeated, but was never put to the rout. He did not think they would accomplish any good object by the recommittal, because it was not intended that their reconsideration should be directed to any particular item which had been overlooked in passing, but in which it had been afterwards discovered that there had been an oversight, but it was proposed to go into the whole philosophy of the Estimates, the administration of the police force, colonial defences, the whole question of immigration, and the establishment necessary for carrying on the printing department. They would be called upon in fact to reopen the whole discussion upon the Estimates. Whilst he guarded against giving his approval to every item which had been passed in Committee, still those items had been passed, and as it appeared impossible to effect any alteration in items which had been passed, he could not see how any advantage could result to the public from a waste of the public time. This was in his judgment what a recommittal of the Estimates would amount to, and although disapproving of some items he should deem it his duty to resist any further delay in passing the Estimates.

Mr PEAKE wished to resume his remarks upon the point of order which he had previously raised, and contended that the Speaker's ruling had not on the previous day been in accordance with the Standing Order 138.

The SPEAKER stated that the hon member was out of order in alluding to anything which had occurred on the previous day.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL explained that the Standing Order had reference to a point of order raised at the time. A question of order could not be raised upon a point which had occurred on the previous day.

The report of the Committee of the whole House was then agreed to.

THE APPROPRIATION ACT

The TREASURER laid upon the table the Appropriation Act, and moved that it be read a first time.

Mr STRANGWAYS enquired whether it was competent for the hon member to move that a Bill be read a first time which had not been sent to the House either by message from His Excellency or from the other House, without giving notice.

The SPEAKER replied that the hon the Treasurer had been instructed by a Committee of the whole House to prepare this Bill.

Mr REYNOLDS supposed the House would next be called upon to suspend the Standing Orders, with the view of passing the Bill through all its stages.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the hon member had been a member of the Legislature for some years, and he had always seen the same course followed. He (the Attorney-General), during the eight years he had been a member, had always seen the Appropriation Bill introduced the moment the report of the Committee of Ways and Means had been agreed to.

Mr REYNOLDS—Not when a motion was made for the recommittal of certain items.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—Whenever the report was agreed to.

The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

The TREASURER said he had given a contingent notice of motion on the previous day, in order that the Bill might pass through its various stages that day. He would, therefore, move that the Bill be read a second time.

In accordance with a suggestion from the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, the hon member withdrew this motion, and the second reading was made an Order of the Day for the following day.

THE WATERWORKS COMMISSION

Mr LINDSAY, pursuant to notice, asked the Hon the Commissioner of Public Works (Mr Blyth) whether he intends taking any steps towards compelling or inducing the Waterworks Commissioners to comply with the condition No 4 of the Gazette notice of 25th January, 1855, with the view of rendering the Adelaide water supply scheme effective for the extinguishing of fires.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that the Waterworks Act was under consideration in another place, or would be so that day, but it was the intention of the Government to make the Adelaide Waterworks scheme effective for the extinguishing of fires.

MESSRS YATES AND HAIMES

Mr BURFORD, pursuant to notice, asked the hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration (Mr Dutton) that there be laid on the table as early as possible, all correspondence between the Messrs John and Sidney Yeates, the Government, and Mr John Haimes, connected with the use of water in Beroota Creek, situated upon the run leased to the said Messrs Yeates, including Mr Haimes's application previous to the 18th October, 1856, for a water reserve in the said creek. Also, what were the reasons why Captain Freeling did not grant a water reserve for Mr Haimes's use in Beroota Creek. Also, that there be laid on the table a copy of the memorandum which was submitted by the Bench of Magistrates of Mount Remarkable for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, respecting the document signed C B, together with their reply thereto. Also, how soon the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration will be likely to lay the information asked for before the House. He wished, however, to amend the question by striking out the closing sentence.

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS said that as soon as the notice was put upon the paper he had given instructions for the preparation of the returns. These would be ready to appear amongst the Council Papers of the present session, as he expected to be able to lay them on the table on the following day.

MR. J. F. DUFF.

Mr. BARTWELL moved—

"That the House will, on Wednesday, the 22nd December, resolve into a Committee for the purpose of considering the report of the Select Committee on the petition of J. F. Duff, with a view of presenting an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, to place the sum of £153 8s. on the Estimates as remuneration to the said J. F. Duff for damages sustained by the action of the Government."

This was a formal resolution, by which it was sought to give effect to the opinions of a Select Committee appointed to enquire into the claims of Mr. Duff; but as the whole matter would come under consideration next day, he would ask the House to assent to his motion as it stood.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would not oppose the motion for Committee, as he considered the report of the Select Committee prima facie evidence in favor of Mr. Duff; but he must say that so far as his information extended, he thought it would be his duty to oppose the address when the motion for it came before the House.

Mr. STRANGWAYS would like to know by what process of arithmetic the hon. member and the Committee arrived at the special sum of £153 8s. From the evidence of Mr. Duff himself it appeared (and there was no other evidence to contradict him) that the loss he sustained amounted to £639 11s. He thought either that Mr. Duff was entitled to this amount, or he was not entitled to anything at all.

Mr. BAKEWELL said there could be no doubt that Mr. Duff sustained by the action of the Government a loss of £639 11s. He had clearly proved that; but the Committee were of opinion that he might have by vigilance reduced that loss considerably. The Committee were of opinion that when Mr. Duff found that his seamen had been taken away he should have engaged white seamen for the run to the Mauritius, discharged them on arrival there, and engaged coolies; for though a large sum would have to be paid for this purpose, the seamen were to be had at a price, and by taking this course the damages would have been reduced. The loss he would have sustained in that case would have just been the amount recommended by the Committee to be paid.

The motion was then agreed to.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose to ask the hon. the Speaker a question of order or privilege. The House had voted on Friday a sum of £1300 as a subsidy for a colonial "Hansard," which he presumed was given on the understanding that the "Hansard" was to be considered a faithful record of the discussions and divisions of the House. But in the proceedings of Friday the numbers of a division were given without the names. He believed the practice of the English "Hansard" was to give the names in all divisions. He wished to know whether such was the rule.

The SPEAKER said he hardly knew how to reply to the question, as there was nothing in the rules or orders of the House on the subject. In fact the "Hansard" was not recognised in the rules or orders. The only answer he could give was that a record to be perfect should give the names of those who voted on each side in each division. Such was the case with the "Hansard" published in England, which was however a private publication.

Mr. REYNOLDS enquired what course he should take. The Government had voted in the Noes, and the compiler of the "Hansard" had also voted in the Noes, but whether these facts had anything to do with the omission of the names, he (Mr. Reynolds) could not say.

Mr. BAGOT thought if any hon. member spoke to the editor of the "Hansard" on the subject that gentleman would correct the deficiency.

Mr. REYNOLDS presumed that as the "Hansard" was a record of the House, the Clerk of the House was the proper person to call attention to the omission.

The SPEAKER said the Clerk had nothing whatever to do with the matter.

Mr. STRANGWAYS presumed that the slips of paper which were sent to hon. members for correction were not things which the hon. the Speaker could take any notice of. There was no "Hansard" before the House until the volume itself was published.

Mr. BAGOT said that, upon one occasion, a joke uttered by the hon. member for the city was put down as a joke of his (Mr. Bagot's). (Laughter.) He thought any hon. member in correcting his slips would be justified in inserting the names of a division which were omitted.

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS was quite sure, if the Editor of the "Hansard" were spoken to, the omitted names would be supplied. Personally, he (the hon. Commissioner) had no desire that his name should be omitted.

The matter then dropped.

CAPTAIN JOHN FINNIS.

In the absence of Mr. Solomon, the motion standing in that hon. member's name, "That the petition of John Finnis be printed," lapsed.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTES.

Mr. ROGERS, pursuant to notice, asked the Hon. the Attorney-General (Mr. Hanson) what system the Government intend to adopt respecting the supplementing of contributions towards the erection of Mechanics' Institutes in the country districts. He wished to know whether those institutions which merely rented buildings would be placed on a different footing from those which erected buildings of their own; also whether annual contributions to Institutes in the country districts would be supplemented in the same manner as other contributions.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that a sum of £250 had been voted in aid of Institutes, and the course which the Government intended to pursue was to invite statements from the institutes of their claims, including particulars of amounts subscribed. When this information was received the amounts would be divided in the manner which seemed most just. He could not give a more specific statement; but the Government were quite as well disposed to contribute to institutes which rented as to those which erected buildings provided there was some reasonable guarantee of these institutes being permanent. The Government would not dictate how the institutes should spend their funds.

Mr. BAGOT enquired whether it was usual to supplement the funds of these institutions by giving an equal amount to that contributed in each case. If such was not the case, he should, if he had the honor of a seat in the House next session, move that that system be adopted.

CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES.

Mr. PEAKE, pursuant to notice, moved—

"That this House considers it essentially useful to the exact performance of its duties, as guardians of the public purse, that the Estimates should be presented to this House within 14 days next following the meeting of the Parliament."

The House had made some few attempts to economise during the present session. They had tried various schemes, but he (Mr. Peake) did not see how to arrive at real economy without a fresh arrangement of the Estimates. He would not detain the House by a lengthy speech, but would refer to the practice of the House of Commons, which had passed a vote in 1821 similar to the resolution he now moved. [The hon. member here read the resolution in question.] It was of great importance that the Estimates should be laid on the table on an early day, as many points in which economy could be practised would be then discovered; and he could see no reason why they should be withheld. If 14 days seemed too short a time to allow, let the House fix a later period, but a limited time should be specified. The House laboured under a difficulty here which did not exist at home, inasmuch as in England there was a Committee of Ways and Means, and a Committee of Supply, and both these Committees reported, so that the labor was distributed better than was the case here. One consequence of bringing on the Estimates early would be that if the House ultimately decided on dealing with the totals the Treasurer would be able to take back the Estimates when reductions were made, and remodel them before submitting them again in detail to the House. Notwithstanding the adverse ruling of the hon. the Speaker that day, he (Mr. Peake) did not despair of obtaining some slight modifications of the present Estimates.

The SPEAKER ruled that the hon. member was out of order in referring to a former debate.

Mr. PEAKE would therefore not go further, but would ask the House to fix an early day for going into the Estimates, so that the House would know when to expect that important document, and be enabled to give it full consideration.

Mr. STRANGWAYS seconded the motion.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not know of any objection to the opinion of the House being expressed as to what was necessary for the performance of its own functions. Individually he (the Attorney-General) thought it of little consequence whether the Estimates were laid on the table within 14 days or a little more or less, as the exact performance by the House of its duties as guardians of the public purse, did not depend upon the day on which the Estimates were introduced. But in the manner in which the Estimates were dealt with in this province, it was impossible to place the General Estimates upon the table until the Supplementary Estimates were disposed of. If, however, the House wished that the Supplementary and General Estimates were to be laid on the table together, there could be no objection on the part of the Government. The General Estimates could be ready in a fortnight from the opening of the session, provided the Supplementary Estimates were disposed of within that time. But when alterations were made in the Supplementary Estimates they necessitated alterations in the General Estimates. Thus for instance, if on the Supplementary Estimates there appeared a large sum for the Central Road Board, that would necessitate a deduction from both sides of the General Estimates. If, however, the House believed that it was expedient to have all the Estimates in one, and instead of having the Supplementary Estimates the excesses should be made part of the Estimates for the ensuing year, then the Estimates could be laid on the table in the commencement of the session. On the present occasion the Estimates were prepared before the House met, and the Supplementary Estimates were laid upon the table at an early period, the hon. the Treasurer stating at the time that the only delay in the production of the General

Estimates was that of waiting until the Supplementary Estimates were decided upon The Government had no objection to the motion, as they always considered it their duty to lay the Estimates on the table as soon as possible

Mr STRANGWAYS believed the only objection of the hon the Attorney-General to the proposal of Mr Peake, that the Supplementary and General Estimates should be brought on together was that the House should be kept as much in the dark as possible with respect to the sums voted The hon member said that Supplementary Estimates were laid on the table early this session, and that the General Estimates were ready also, but the latter were not laid upon the table

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had said that the Supplementary Estimates were laid upon the table, and that the General Estimates could not be introduced until the others were disposed of not that it would not be desirable to produce them, but that it would not be practicable

Mr STRANGWAYS said where there was a will there was a way, and if the Government wished, they could lay the Estimates on the table early He could not see any difficulty in the way The General Estimates would be only a continuation of the Supplementary, and any balance on the Supplementary Estimates would also be shown in the year If the balance on the Supplementary Estimates was altered, that on the General Estimates would only have to be altered The advantage of having both sets of Estimates before the House at once would be that the hasty manner in which many items had been lately passed would be avoided If, for instance, the Estimates for the year were before the House, when the hon member (Mr Milne) moved that £10,000 additional should be given to the Central Road Board, the amount would not have been raised to £20,000 without notice It would be known that whatever was added in this way would have to be deducted from the Estimates for the next ensuing period He was aware this would not be a very convenient course for the Ministry, as by the existing system they had considerable sums placed at their disposal which they would not have otherwise, and then hon members found that as they had voted a sum for a new establishment, or for commencing a building, they must vote further sums to continue the establishment, or continue the building The House of Commons having voted a resolution similar to the one now before the House, he could not see why they should not do likewise

Mr REYNOLDS said that one advantage of the proposed system would be, that when an item was negatived on the Supplementary Estimates, there would not be the same opportunity of putting it on the General Estimates as had been done in the present session It would be desirable to have not merely the Estimates, but the whole policy of the Government, provided the Government had a policy at all, before the House in the early part of the session The Bills to be introduced should also be laid upon the table in order that the House might not have to legislate at railroad pace, and that they might not have this hurry scurrying to get their Christmas dinner, and the Government so timid that they were shaking in their seats for fear they should be turned out of office, thinking perhaps there might be a report of a Committee adverse to the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands He (Mr Reynolds) believed that if the House met again after the holidays the Commissioner of Crown Lands might find himself censured From what he could hear that hon gentleman would not be likely to keep his place long unless the House was prorogued, and, therefore, let the House get through the session in order that the hon gentleman might enjoy his salary for another three months (Ironical laughter from the Government benches)

The TREASURER said the Supplementary Estimates were laid on the table within four days of the assembling of Parliament, and the Estimates for the year were also prepared at that time If the House had not passed the Supplementary Estimates great alterations would have been required, inasmuch as the circumstances were peculiar this year, some new departments altogether having been created This rendered it especially desirable that the General Estimates should not be introduced until the Supplementary Estimates were disposed of, and so it would always be when alterations in the departments were introduced The hon member spoke of the rush of legislation, but this was always the case at the end of a session The hon member must be acquainted with the phrase used in England, "the massacre of the innocents" which was applied to the Bills summarily disposed of in the end of a session When a Legislature first met, the members were always cautious, and even though the Government brought in measures, they always said "give us time, we want to consult our constituencies and persons at a distance, we must wait for petitions" (No no) That was the case in every Legislature, and it was the real cause of business being delayed, as was proved by last session The Government of the hon the Attorney General came in at the end of that session, and there was the same rush of business as at present That Government surely could not be said to be afraid of losing its seats, for it was only just come in having been put in by a large majority, and yet it was obliged to rush Bills through Hon members in the early part of a session would speak—(a laugh)—and introduce new motions, though it entailed the necessity of afterwards rushing Bills through the House

After a few words from Mr PEAKE in reply, the motion was put and agreed to

SUSPENSION OF FREE IMMIGRATION

Mr SOLOMON, pursuant to notice, moved—

1 "That this House, having voted the sum of £10,000 upon the Estimates for 1859 for Immigration, does not deem it desirable that immigration at the expense of the colony should continue beyond the time when such sum shall have been expended for such purpose "

2 "That this House request the Government to make such arrangements as will prevent any further contracts being entered into by their agents in the United Kingdom for a continuance of immigration, after the amounts so voted and the balance to the credit of the Immigration Fund shall have been expended "

He would not detain the House by a long speech, especially as the House had just been reminded that it was the long speeches generally made which caused such delays, though he (Mr Solomon) did not believe that this was the greatest or nearly the greatest cause of such delays His object in bringing this motion before the House was to induce hon members to affirm that, at any rate until the House met again, it should not be in the power of the Government to make any further arrangement for immigration purposes He was not prepared to say that the present state of things would last six months, but he thought before any arrangements were made for further immigration the House should be consulted He did not suppose the resolutions would meet any opposition as they merely asked the House that there should be no further immigration until the House had an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject

There being no seconder for the resolutions, they then lapsed

MESSAGE FROM THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

A messenger from the Legislative Council was here announced, and entered accordingly

The SPEAKER intimated that the Legislative Council had agreed to the following Bills with certain amendments, in which they requested the concurrence of the Assembly, viz Third Judge and Circuit Courts Bill, Abram Longbottom's Gas Patent Bill, Enlargement of Imprisoned Debtors Bill, Board of Public Works Bill, Publicans' Licensing Act Amendment Bill, District Councils Act Amendment Bill

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the amendments upon all these Bills be taken into consideration on the following day Agreed to

SELECT COMMITTEE ON TAXATION

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS moved that the bringing up of the report of this Committee be postponed to the following day Agreed to

POONINDIE MISSION STATION

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS laid on the table certain papers relative to this establishment

The House adjourned at 23 minutes to 3 o'clock

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—the Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon Capt Scott, the Hon Capt Bagot, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Capt Hall, the Hon A Forster, the Hon J Morphett, the Hon S Davenport, the Hon Capt Freeling, the Hon Abraham Scott

MINTARO

The Hon A FORSTER wished, before the business of the day was called on, to ask the Chief Secretary a question relative to a letter which had been placed in his hands from several persons resident at Mintaro requesting to know why a memorial which had been presented to His Excellency the Governor, signed on behalf of about 50 landholders of the proposed district of Stanley, had not appeared in the Government Gazette, as other memorials of a contrary prayer had appeared in the Gazette.

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the reason the memorial referred to had not appeared, was to avoid, if possible the expense of inserting memorials having the same object in view Six memorials had already been published, that alluded to by the hon gentleman being the seventh, and if this memorial had been published, there might have been no end to such A letter had, however, been addressed by the Government to the parties signing the memorial to the effect that the Government regretted they could not comply with the request in the shape in which it was made

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the message from His Excellency, suggesting amendments in this Bill, was read, and the various amendments having been agreed to, a message was ordered to be sent to the Assembly to that effect

WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the Bill was read a third time, passed, and transmitted by message to the Assembly, intimating that the Council had agreed to the Bill with amendments, in which they desired the concurrence of the Assembly

REAL PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and transmitted by message to the Assembly, with an intimation that the Bill had been agreed to, with amendments in which the Council desired the concurrence of the Assembly

LAND GRANTS BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that it proposed to accomplish three objects The first was to remove any doubts as to the validity of land grants to which the public seal had not been attached, but merely a lithographed copy Doubts had arisen as to the validity of such grants, but the present Bill would remove them, The second object was to provide that the fees for land grants should be paid to the Treasurer at the time such grants were issued, and the third object was to do away with the necessity for the Governor-in-Chief signing the grants This course was strongly recommended by the Registrar-General as essential for the quick passing of property under the Real Property Act The Bill proposed that the grants should be signed by the Treasurer, who would receive the money, and by the Registrar-General through whom the grants would pass He begged to move the second reading of the Bill

The Hon A FORSTER seconded the motion

The Hon the PRESIDENT suggested whether the three objects were objects which bore a proper relation to each other

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said all had reference to the issue of land grants, all had reference to the same object

The Bill was then read a second time and upon the motion of the CHIEF SECRETARY, the House went into Committee upon it

The Hon H AYERS pointed out that the Bill provided the grants should be signed by the Treasurer and the Registrar-General, and that they should be valid without the signature of the Governor, but what means had the public of knowing that the Governor had actually made the grant if his signature were not attached to it?

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said it would be sufficient that the grant was signed by a responsible officer of the Crown

The Hon H AYERS understood then that the grants were to be made by a responsible officer If the responsible officer signed the grant, the land was not then granted by the Governor

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the grant would be made by a responsible officer under the authority of the Governor

The Hon H AYERS said to make it complete there must be evidence that authority had been given to the Treasurer in every case

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the fact of the Treasurer being a responsible Minister of the Crown was sufficient

The various clauses having been passed with amendments, the report was adopted, and the third reading made an Order of the Day for the following day

THE APPROPRIATION BILL

The Hon the PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message from the House of Assembly intimating that they had passed the Appropriation Bill, and desired the concurrence of the Council therein

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY the Bill was read a first time, the second reading being made an Order of the Day for the following day

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS

The whole of the business on the paper for the day having been disposed of, the Standing Orders were, upon the motion of the Hon Capt BAGOT, suspended for the purpose of enabling him to bring forward a motion on the paper for the following day in reference to the Harbor Trust

THE HARBOR TRUST

The Hon Capt BAGOT moved that this House take into consideration the report of the works proposed to be undertaken by the Harbor Trust and that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief expressing the opinion of the Council that the Harbor Trust should be allowed to carry out the improvement of the Harbor as proposed by it in Council Paper No 153 The hon gentleman remarked that before entering upon the motion he would allude to the circumstances which had arisen which had induced him to ask the House to agree to the motion Hon members would remember that some years back, under a former Legislature, an Act was passed appropriating a large sum for the improvement of the harbor Certain gentlemen were named in that Act, and their places were supplied by the recommendation of the Legislature Acting under that Act, the Governor had appointed certain gentlemen who had been nominated by the Legislature as members of the Harbor Trust, and it might be assumed that the Legislature selected men who were believed competent to conduct very important works in the very best manner There was no limitation of power in reference to these gentlemen, but they were simply to conduct the operations which devolved upon them to the best of their judgment The Board thus constituted had been nearly three years in active operation It would be seen by the returns before the House that the first thing which they did, and wisely too, was to send to England for proper machinery to execute the requisite works, and during the time which elapsed until the arrival of this machine they employed such machines as were at their disposal in deepening the inner harbor, which he had always held to be one of the most important works connected with the Trust At all times there was a capability of bringing large ships into the harbor by taking advantage of the spring tides but when they were in there was not sufficient water to keep them afloat During the time that the inner harbor was being deepened 200,000 tons of silt were removed, and the harbor to an extent of 20 acres was deepened to a depth of six feet, affording ample accommodation for 200 vessels Since the arrival of the dredge imported from England, it had been employed last summer in deepening the outer bar, which was considered, and he thought justly, a work of great importance Sand and silt had been removed to an extent to enable large vessels to pass easily at high water at any state of the tide The Harbor Trust had placed a paper before the Legislature, shewing how they intended to appropriate the balance of £23,000 remaining from the £100,000 which had been entrusted to them They proposed to expend £5,000 upon the outer bar, and it would by seen by maps which were upon the table of the House that if the outer bar were sufficiently deepened large vessels could enter at any time of the tide as far as Light's passage, there would be ample water for vessels of any size, they would be perfectly safe in all weathers, and there was smooth water to enable them to discharge their cargoes in lighters It was proposed to expend £10,000 in deepening the inner harbor, and although it would unquestionably be a great advantage to have the inner bar deepened at some time or another, still it was not of that great importance, as regarded the safety of vessels, as deepening the harbor itself, to enable the vessels to lie there after they had got in It was proposed to continue the dredging in such a direction that it would meet the spot from which 200,000 tons of silt had been removed, and he believed that this would be the best mode in which the funds could be applied, for there could be no doubt that the deepening of the harbor and the outer bar were the first steps which should be taken to render the harbor safe and commodious The reason he had brought this motion forward was, that reports had gone abroad that it was intended to interfere with the mode of procedure proposed by the Harbor Trust, and that the Trust were to be directed as to the manner in which they should prosecute the works He believed that any interference would be unjust to the members of the Harbor Trust, and injurious to the public

The Hon S DAVENPORT seconded the motion, remarking that it explained itself, and after the speech of the hon Captain Bagot, he was sure that the Council would not require further argument to adopt it The question seemed to him to be whether it would not be better to do one thing well than to do two things badly The funds at the disposal of the Trust were as they had heard £23,000, but to remove the inner bar would take at least £10,000 more than the whole of that amount, and after the whole amount had been expended upon the inner bar, it would be found necessary to leave it, the work still being imperfectly performed, and the outer bar still existing as a bar to vessels deriving any advantages from the operations upon the inner bar It was obvious that vessels must pass the outer bar before they could get to the inner one The removal of the inner bar would take at least six years and a-half to complete, all that time no benefit whatever would be derived by vessels, and after the work had been completed there would still be the outer bar to remove The whole question appeared to him a very simple one, and he thought there could be no doubt that the course proposed by the Harbor Trust was the best—to proceed with the outer bar, so that at the lowest spring tide there would be water for vessels drawing 16 feet To complete this, an outlay of only £5,000 was required, and there could be no doubt of the advantages to vessels of a large class, as instead of lying in the vicinity of the Lightship, they would be enabled to come three or four miles further in the harbor in a position near the inner bar, where lighterage could go on in any weather The case appeared so plain that he thought no arguments were necessary to show that the motion was worthy the support of the Council

The Hon Captain HALL supported the motion, and stated that it had been deemed necessary to bring it forward in consequence of an impression having been created upon the public mind that the members of the Harbor Trust had not done their duty, and that it would be more advantageous to carry on the works in connection with the improvements of the harbor in a manner different from that which they had suggested It would be in the recollection of the House that when the Act No 20 of 1854 was passed, certain gentlemen were elected in conjunction with the Senior Wardens to expend £100,000 in deepening the harbor Very soon after these gentlemen undertook this duty they found themselves in the position of the Israelites of old, who were set to burn bricks without straw. They had no machinery with which to carry out the heavy works which were required, and they then applied to the Government for permission to transmit an order to England for the necessary machinery for deepening the harbor. The application was granted, and he might remark that the Trust never incurred any expenditure without first submitting it to the Government and procuring their sanction. The whole of the operations of the Trust had been sanctioned by the Government before they were undertaken. Gawler Reach, where vessels were in the habit of discharging cargo, was very confined and narrow, and the old dredge and spoon barges were at once set to work there, and by means of its operations where ships were unable to swing except at high water, and even then at great risk, they were now able to swing at any time. Immense additional accommodation for ships had been afforded, and the intention was to carry on the deepening till the heaviest ships would be enabled to lie afloat at low water. After getting out the dredge, it was fitted and sent to the outer bar for the purpose of deepening, and exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the Trust. It was necessary to be particular as to the season at which the dredge was set to work, but during the few months which it was employed last summer, it increased the depth to an extent of three feet. The object in removing the outer bar was that vessels, instead of lying at the Lightship for the spring tide, and then perhaps being obliged to lighten, might be enabled at once when they arrived to enter a place of safety. If the Trust were permitted to carry out their operations as detailed in the paper before the House, during the coming summer, the dredge would enable them to remove the bar altogether, as a depth of 16 feet had been attained over the greater portion of Light's Passage. Whilst the Trust had thus deepened the outer bar, they had availed themselves of such tools as were at their disposal to deepen the inner harbor, which was deemed almost as essential as the removal of the outer bar, in order that ships might be placed in a position to be enabled to land goods with ease and without expense, but this could not be done without deepening the inner harbour, as vessels of very heavy draught could not lie afloat there. The Trust imagined that unless there were some expression of opinion on the part of that House, they would not be allowed to proceed with the improvements as detailed in the paper on the Council table, but that they would be obliged to take the dredge from the outer bar, in order that it might be employed upon the inner one. The Trust had had the inner bar sounded, chained, and bored, to ascertain to a nicety its length and breadth, and they found that to obtain a depth of 14 feet at the inner bar, they would have to remove limestone crust more or less to the extent of two miles, and the number of cubic yards which would have to be raised, would, at the cost which had been hitherto paid, amount to fully £10,000 more than the whole amount at the disposal of the Trust. If operations were commenced at the inner bar they would be enabled to get through about two thirds of the entire length and then they would be brought to a stand still for want of funds. To complete two-thirds of the work would take between four and five years, and in the meantime the outer bar would have to remain as at present. After all the funds had been expended, and after a lapse of four or five years, the harbor would be in no better state than it was at that moment. If the Trust were allowed to continue their operations as they proposed, the outer bar during the approaching summer would be removed altogether, and vessels would be enabled to come up at once and anchor in Light's Passage. The Trinity Board were getting a set of moorings to lay down in Light's Passage, for the greater convenience of vessels arriving. Simultaneously it was proposed to carry on operations at the inner harbor, so as to enable vessels to lighter during any weather at night or day at a very small expense compared with what they would otherwise have to pay if lying outside. He would put it to the Council, whether it would not be more for the improvement of the Port, that the outer bar should be cleared away, so as to enable vessels to get into a position of perfect safety whilst they were discharging and landing their cargoes. He maintained though the inner bar was unquestionably an obstacle, it was of very little practical difficulty in navigation, in so far that vessels never lay there, but merely passed across it, doing so by taking advantage of high water, and by the aid of the powerful steam tugs they were very few minutes indeed in crossing. He was satisfied that the improvements of the harbor could not be carried on and that the shipping interest and the interest of the colony would be seriously affected if the Harbour Trust were interfered with. He could not understand the objections which had been raised to the course proposed by the Trust, those objections contemplating the abandonment of useful works to clear away what he admitted was an obstacle, but one so slight and of so little consequence as hardly to be taken into account with other difficulties which the Trust proposed to remove. At first the Trust had been entrusted with certain duties, though they did not consider themselves bound by any special rule. They had been chosen by the Council partly because they were men who had some professional knowledge, and were men of some standing and character. They had endeavored faithfully to discharge their duties, and as he thought he had shown, had done the best they could with the materials at their disposal. They applied to the Government for more powerful machinery, and having obtained it, they had applied it to effect those improvements which they believed would prove most advantageous.

The Hon. Captain SCOTT had much pleasure in supporting the motion. There appeared to him to have been some misunderstanding in reference to the Act No. 20 of 1854, the wording of which had led some persons to suppose that the intention of the Legislative Council was that the Harbor Trust should commence operations at the outer bar, and then proceed up to the limits fixed by the Act. As he understood the preamble of the Act, however, it merely fixed the limits within which the operations of the Harbor Trust should be confined. He did not see how it could be supposed that the Trust should commence at the outer bar, and work upwards, as £100,000 would be nothing for such a work, and when double that amount had been expended the most important portion of the work would have to be done. He alluded to making suitable provision for vessels lying in safety. When a charter was offered to a vessel, the first enquiry of the captain or owner was, "What water is there in the harbor?" and the next was, "Can she lie afloat?" Some vessels could lie aground without injury but others could not. The Hon. Captain Hall had justly said that the Trust had not the means in the first instance to touch the outer bar, unless indeed they had wasted the money entrusted to them by setting to work with the spoon-barges. They had economised the money entrusted to them, and had turned the machinery at their disposal to the best account by deepening the inner bar by the aid of the spoon-barges and the old dredge. The Trust considered that they would best promote the interest of the country and of the shipping by procuring the greatest depth of water in the least time and at the least expense, and they had done so. Having done this they then thought it their duty to deepen the shoal part of the inner bar, so that vessels might pass up or down either to or from the deep water. It had already been stated that to deepen the inner bar would take six years or six years and a half and if the Trust were compelled to undertake that now, not only would vessels have to lie at the Lightship for the next six years to lighter or wait for spring tides to get over the bar, but after that they must stop till the outer bar had been deepened, in order that they might get in. The Trust had been so careful in carrying on their operations, that they had not approached within a hundred feet of any private property, but had merely deepened the stream. Even at the Government Wharf, they had abstained from approaching within a hundred feet, so that it could not be said there had been any expenditure of public money for the accommodation of private individuals or that the value of property had been increased in any other way than by the increased value which commerce must give to property in the vicinity. The importance of deepening the outer bar had been already stated, in order that vessels might get into Light's Passage, where they might lie in safety; but there was another important object, and that was that they should lie afloat when they got to the inner harbour. The first object of the Trust had been to enable the vessels to leave a dangerous position at the Lightship and the next object had been to provide them a place of safety when they got in. The Trust, in fact, had not merely to deepen but to widen, for the upper part was so narrow as to be unavailing, but now the largest class of vessels could lie there in perfect safety, and their object was to enable vessels of any tonnage to lie afloat. What they contemplated was, deepening the channel in the stream to the extent of 200 feet in width, and where the vessels would lie to the extent of 300 feet in width, so that three vessels could lie in tiers, and there would be ample room for another to pass them without risk. It had been stated that the balance left of the £100,000 was £23,000, but it should be borne in mind that the rest had not been expended in deepening the harbor—the plant, steam dredge, and barges having been all paid for out of the £76,000. He believed that £28,000 or £30,000 had been expended in plant, all of which would be available for deepening the harbor. He found by a document just placed in his hands, that the cost of the plant had been 26,300*l.*, besides repairs, amounting to 3,746*l.*, so that the plant had cost 30,000*l.*, making an expenditure of 46,000*l.* upon the works. The object was to get vessels into a place of safety. Vessels frequently took in part of their cargo in the inner harbor, and then went to the Lightship to fill up, but when the outer bar was deepened as proposed by the Trust they could lie at Light's Passage and load to any depth they pleased. The Act provided that a depth of 18 feet should be attained, but the Trust only proposed to go to the extent of 14 feet on the inner bar, as if 18 feet were required, instead of 33,000*l.* being sufficient, 80,000*l.* would not do it. The Trust considered that their plan for future proceedings was the best for the public interest, the most convenient for shipping, and the most economical way in which the public money could be expended.

The motion was carried.

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, the Standing Orders were suspended, for the purpose of proceeding with the Assessment on Stock Bill, which appeared upon the notice paper for the following day The hon gentleman, in moving the second reading of the Bill, remarked that in the leases held by the squatters there was a covenant by which the lessees were liable to be called upon to pay to the Government an assessment on their stock, as well as the rent, and it was thought that the time had arrived when it was desirable that this covenant should be acted upon He believed that the bulk of parties out of doors had no objection to the present measure, although, perhaps, some dreaded that, commencing at the small amount proposed, this Bill was merely getting in the thin edge of the wedge To meet this objection, however, on reference to the second clause it would be found that upon the lessees surrendering their leases a covenant would be made with them fixing the assessment during the existing tenure of the lease, which term would be renewed to them Clause 3 fixed the absolute number of sheep per square mile upon which the assessment should be levied, so as to prevent any question as to the number of stock carried on the run Clauses 4 and 5 protected the squatter from injury, as 12 months before the expiry of the existing leases a new rental value would be placed upon the run, and the squatter would be secured a tenure for five years longer Clause 9 was another protective clause to the squatter, providing that there should be no assessment till runs had been in occupation for a period of four years The assessment proposed was moderate, and as he had stated, the bulk of those affected by it did not object to it He begged to move the second reading of the Bill

The Hon. J MORPHETT, in seconding the motion, congratulated the Chief Secretary upon introducing to the Council a Bill which, whilst it was likely to assist the Government, by adding to their yearly income, was calculated to advance one of the largest interests in the country The squatters were quite willing to pay such an amount as was considered reasonable and fair for the advantages which they enjoyed in the occupation of the waste lands of the Crown, but they considered that hitherto they had not had that reasonable consideration in reference to fixity of tenure and occupation, which they were entitled to He thought that the views expressed by the Government, and embodied in the Bill before the House, would go far to satisfy the squatting interest, and they might in consequence look for the development of that interest to a very great extent Fixity of tenure would enable the squatters to apply their capital to the improvement of their runs to the advantage of the colony Already the export derived from this branch of industry was the most important the colony had, and he scarcely saw any limit to it, particularly with some modifications in this Bill There was a vast extent of land to the north which might be occupied by sheep He thought the Chief Secretary would see that the third clause pressed a little hard upon sheepfarmers, and in some measure detracted from the general merits of the Bill by fixing a minimum and maximum number of sheep to the square mile He believed he could show by most satisfactory evidence that there were many runs which, though occupied, would not carry 60 sheep to the square mile He thought the maximum should be 200 and the minimum 60, and if the hon the Chief Secretary stated it would not endanger the Bill, he would move an amendment to that effect when the Bill was in Committee

The Bill was then read a second time, and the House went into Committee upon it

The Hon Mr MORPHETT thought in reference to the third clause, that there should be four classifications of runs, the maximum number of sheep to the square mile being 200, and the minimum 50, and next session he hoped the Chief Secretary would not oppose an amendment to that effect if he asked leave to introduce a short Bill to amend the Bill before the House in that particular

The Hon S DAVENPORT entertained the same view as the Hon Mr Morphett, thinking that the minimum number of sheep, which was in fact the minimum amount of additional rent, had been fixed too high at 100 He hoped the Government would next session be prepared to reconsider the question

The Hon Captain HALL thought if it were considered desirable to alter the classification that was the proper time to discuss the question, but rather than jeopardise the Bill he should support the greater number He felt that 100 were too many, and would rather see the number reduced to 50, but he should refrain from making any amendment upon the subject if doing so would jeopardise the Bill

The Hon A SCOTT regarded this clause as a money clause, and therefore thought it would not be politic in the present state of the Bill to alter it He wished to record his opinion, based upon 18 years' experience as a sheepowner, that there were a great many runs in the colony not capable of depasturing throughout the year 50 sheep per square mile He was in occupation of a run considered a very valuable one, and frequently quoted as nearly the best in the North, which was not capable of carrying 200 to the square mile all the year round He was laying out about £1 000 upon it to make it capable, but he questioned whether after laying out that amount to make the run valuable he should be subject to taxation upon that outlay The effect of the clause would be that the most valuable portions of land only would be occupied, nothing would be derived from inferior country

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY was glad that no amendment had been pressed, and on behalf of the Government stated that if the numbers were found unequal the Government would be happy to reconsider the question at the proper time On the merits of the matter, he must say that his own experience differed from that of previous speakers, for as a squatter of old standing he did not know any run which had been occupied for four years which would not carry a hundred sheep to the square mile He was not acquainted with many parts of the country, but he spoke as far as he was enabled to judge from experience

The Hon J MORPHETT thought that purchased land should be exempted from the assessment, as it frequently happened that during the currency of the leases parties became purchasers of portions of their runs

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said this was provided for under the Waste Lands Regulations When the land was purchased, the assessment to which it had been subjected ceased

The Council adjourned at 4 o'clock till 2 o clock on the following day

MINTARO

Mr MCELLISTER gave notice that on the following day he should ask the Attorney-General why a petition recently presented from certain residents of Mintaro had not appeared in the Government Gazette

POINT OF ORDER

Mr PEAKE gave notice that on the following day he should move that, in the opinion of the House upon the motion for the adoption of the report of the Committee of the whole House upon the Estimates, it was quite in accordance with the Standing Orders for an hon member to move a reduction in any item, and that in the opinion of the House the ruling of the Speaker to the effect that such a step could not be taken was an excess of the Standing Orders

The SPEAKER drew the hon member's attention to the necessity of always taking the sense of the House on points of order immediately they arose, as unless this was done it was not possible to trust to the memory of parties as to the exact words used, this rule applied to points of order, as also to taking down words of any hon members which might be done at the moment

Mr PEAKE withdrew the latter portion of the motion

MITCHAM

The following motion in the name of Mr REYNOLDS lapsed in consequence of the absence of that hon member—

"That the petition of the ratepayers of the district of Mitcham be taken into consideration"

THE RIVER WEIR

The following motion in the name of Mr REYNOLDS lapsed in consequence of the absence of that hon member—

"The consideration of Papers Nos 19 and 73, in reference to the river weir, with the view of taking the sense of the House on the conduct of the Government with regard to the water supply and drainage of the City of Adelaide"

THE DATE OF ACTS BILL

The SPEAKER brought up the report of the Committee upon the Standing Orders, assigning reasons for dissenting from the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Date of Acts Bill

Upon the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL the report was agreed to and ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Council, as the reason of the inability of the Assembly to agree in the amendments made by the Council in the Date of Acts Bill

STEAM COMMUNICATION BETWEEN PORT ADELAIDE AND PORT LINCOLN AND PORT AUGUSTA

Upon the motion of Mr MACDERMOTT, the House went into Committee for the consideration of the motion of which he had give notice—"That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that the sum of £1,000 may be placed on the Estimates for 1859, to remunerate the owners of the steamer Marion for the conveyance of the mails between Port Adelaide, Ports Lincoln and Augusta, for the year 1858, and also, a further like sum for the same service for the year 1859" The hon member obtained leave to amend his motion by introducing "Supplementary" before Estimates, and divide the amount proposed into two parts

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would state what was the feeling of the Government with regard to the matter, which would perhaps induce the hon mover not to press the motion It would be in the recollection of the House that an address had been adopted to His Excellency, requesting that the necessary steps might be taken for the purpose of inducing steamers to touch at certain ports upon the coast, but the Marion had omitted touching at one of these jetties The owners of the Marion had performed a very useful service, but as £1,000 had been fixed for the whole service, and as the terms of the resolution of the House had not been fully complied with, the Government were not prepared to recognise a claim for the full amount, but were prepared to recommend an amount proportionate to the service rendered, and would place such sum upon the Estimates It would be impossible to give a pledge as to the precise amount at the present time, but it would be for the House to consider whether the amount proposed was fair, when the item was under discussion If the motion for a fixed amount were proceeded with the Government would feel bound to oppose it, but as he had before stated, the intention of the Government was to place upon the Estimates a sum proportioned to the service rendered

Mr MACDERMOTT felt he should be carrying out the wishes of the parties interested by complying so far as possible with the views of the Government, but he would remark that the service had been already performed for 1858, and he would ask the Attorney-General if he was not prepared to concur in the vote for the service already performed, and leave the service of 1859 to be dealt with as the Government thought just The service for 1858 had been performed faithfully and punctually, a trip having been performed every fortnight for more than twelve months The original vote did not include Yankalilla, but merely related to an appropriation from the land revenue of a sufficient bonus to induce steam-vessels to ply every fortnight between Port Adelaide, Port Lincoln, and Port Augusta for a period of twelve months That service had been performed, and he would also call attention to the vote for 1858, as it appeared upon the Estimates —"Steam Postal Service for Port Lincoln and Port Augusta" There was no mention made of Yankalilla The petitioners stated that the obligation to call at Yankalilla would not only have greatly increased the insurance, but the consumption of fuel, and that the amount would have exceeded the vote upon the Estimates and they further stated that the placing the sum mentioned upon the Estimates for the service induced them to purchase a steamer to put upon the line He would also call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the pastoral interest had now been taxed for the general revenue, and was consequently entitled to some consideration in the way of postal communication beyond what it might have expected previously The steamer had performed an important service, as Augusta was the outlet for all the northern runs in the outlying districts, and the Government also derived important aid from the conveyance of the police and the members of the exploring expedition He would ask the Attorney-General whether he would consider the item for the service for the year already performed

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Government were quite prepared to take into consideration the past as well as the future, and to place such a sum upon the Estimates as they considered would be equivalent to the service rendered, having reference to the amount which had been voted for the whole service He did not wish to say anything which would anticipate the decision of the Government upon the matter, as indeed he had not the necessary information before him to enable him to arrive at a conclusion The Government, however, admitted to a great extent the claims of the owners of the steamer Marion, but not for the whole amount, and if the motion were pressed, the duty of the Government would be to resist it, but if it were left in that way that a sum should be placed on the Estimates for the purpose, the Government were quite prepared to give that pledge

Mr STRANGWAYS suggested that the Government should advertise for tenders and pay the owners of the Marion such a sum as they found they would have to pay for the ensuing year If, however, the owners of the steamboats refused to undertake the contract, except at an exorbitant rate, the Government would, he apprehended, adopt the course of employing sailing vessels

Mr SOLOMON should support the first part of the vote for £1,000 for 1858, believing that the service had been performed in such a manner as to entitle the owners of the Marion to that amount Although there appeared to have been some mistake between the owners and the Government in reference to one place of call, it seemed to him that the obligation to call at that place must have been foregone, as the Postmaster must have been constantly in the habit of putting mails on board, and must have known that the steamer did not call at Yankalilla The owners of the Marion were no doubt under the impression that they were performing the full service which they were called upon to perform, and under such circumstances he considered they were entitled to the £1,000 He was glad to find that it had been determined to consider the two items separately, because he believed that it would be found necessary to advertise for tenders, and he had prepared an amendment to the second portion, so that the House should go into Committee to consider the necessity of addressing His Excellency with the view of having an amount placed upon the Estimates to carry out the service which would be necessary for carrying the mails from Kangaroo Island to the Port

Mr BARROW would rather that the matter were left in the hands of the Government, if the understanding were arrived at that they would deal liberally with it Whatever might be alleged, in reference to the steamers not having called at Yankalilla, the postal service between Adelaide and Ports Augusta and Lincoln had been very regular If the Government considered it really necessary to deduct anything from the £1,000, he hoped it would not be a large sum Perhaps it might assist the House to a conclusion if they were informed whether any representations had been made to the owners of the Marion by the Government to the effect that they must not expect the whole amount of £1,000, unless they called at Yankalilla as well as at Port Lincoln and Port Augusta He should not like to subject the motion to risk by dividing upon it, but he should certainly vote for it, unless he thought the Government would deal with the claim in a liberal and generous spirit

Mr LINDSAY should oppose the whole amount being paid, as he did not believe there was any great additional risk or expense incurred by calling at Yankalilla It was true, it might be dangerous for sailing vessels to touch there, but not for steamers, and he should, therefore, vote for only a fair proportionate sum being paid to the owners of the Marion

Mr MACDERMOTT in reply to the remarks of the previous speaker, said that the amount on the Estimates for last year was for postal service to Port Lincoln and Port Augusta, there was no mention of Yankalilla, although that place had been added by the Postmaster-General in the tenders which had been called for Relying upon the promise of the Attorney-General, he would, with the consent of the Committee, withdraw the motion

AUBURN

Upon the motion of Mr PEAKE the House resolved itself into Committee for the consideration of an address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting him to place a sufficient sum on the Estimates for the erection of a Court-house and Police-station at Auburn A petition, recently presented on the subject, was read, and the hon member remarked that a Court was held at Auburn, and that it was important there should be a Court-house and Police-station there, Auburn being the centre of a large agricultural district He was sure the House would agree with him that Court houses and Police-stations were erected in many districts in which the requirements were not so urgent He hoped the Government would not oppose the motion, but would at once consent to place a sufficient sum upon the Estimates

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he should not oppose the motion The Government were quite prepared to place a sufficient amount upon the Estimates, because they considered it expedient as a rule where a Local Court of full jurisdiction was held a Court house and Police-station should exist Of course the Government would place the amount on the Estimates with all other public works which they considered it necessary to submit to the consideration of the Assembly, and it would be for the Assembly to deal with all votes according to their opinion of their relative importance and the necessity which existed for them The Government were prepared to act upon the spirit of this resolution so far as placing an amount on the Estimates for the purpose

The motion was carried

TAXATION

The TREASURER said that as one of the members of the Committee upon Taxation wished to append a few remarks to the report, he would move that the Order of the Day for bringing up the report be postponed till after the other Orders of the Day had been disposed of Carried

THE APPROPRIATION BILL

The TREASURER moved that the Appropriation Bill be read a second time

Mr STRANGWAYS called attention to a point of form in reference to the Appropriation Bill During a former session it had been decided that that House and that House alone had the control of the public purse, but he would call the attention of the House to a difference in the preamble of the Appropriation Act here and that of the House of Commons His object in calling the attention of that House to the point was that if that House and that House alone had power over the public purse it appeared desirable that some form in the Appropriation Act should be adopted which would tend to a recognition on the part of the other House and the Governor of the rights of the Assembly If the Assembly had not sole power over the purse it was a matter of no consequence, but as the preamble at present stood it admitted that the Legislative Council, as regarded the public purse, had power equal to the Assembly

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the form of the Appropriation Act in England recognised the necessity of the joint action of both Houses of the Imperial Legislature as fully as the Appropriation Act here recognised the joint action of both Houses We did not adopt the form of the Appropriation Act in England, because there was nothing in our circumstances analogous to those circumstances which had led to the adoption of the form in question Taxes were imposed by authority of both Houses, sums raised were appropriated by both, and so long as there was a practical recognition of the powers of the House of Assembly to originate, limit, and appropriate the revenue it would not only be idle but inexpedient to make any alteration in the form, which would of necessity involve long consideration and lengthy discussion, and would revive the question of privilege, which had been settled to the satisfaction of that House with a salvo of the dignity of the other branch If there were any amendment proposed to the effect which the hon member for Encounter Bay had mentioned he should most strenuously oppose it, and trusted he should have the support of the House in so doing

The Bill was then read a second time and passed through Committee, when the TREASURER, in accordance with notice, moved the suspension of the Standing Orders, in order that the Bill might be read a third time

Mr STRANGWAYS wished, before the question was put, to ask the Attorney-General what course the Government intended to pursue in reference to the prorogation of Parliament It was generally understood, and he believed it was the intention of the Government that Parliament should be prorogued on the following Friday He wished to ask if such were intended, and whether the state of public business was such that the Government would be justified in recommending His Excellency to prorogue Parliament on Friday If the Attorney-General stated there was a reasonable probability of being enabled to advise His Excellency to prorogue on Friday, he should not object to the Standing Orders being suspended for the purpose of enabling the Bill before the House to be read a third time, but if there were to be no prorogation on Friday he did not see there was any necessity to hurry on the third reading

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the wish and hope of the Government was that they would be enabled to prorogue on the following Friday, but that would be contingent on the action of the other branch of the Legislature with regard to the Assessment on Stock Bill No consideration of mere convenience would induce the Government to leave that measure unsettled If difficulties arose in reference to that measure the Government might be defeated in their expectation of being enabled to prorogue, but there was no prospect of such difficulty arising, and but for that belief he should be as opposed to moving the suspension of the Standing Orders as the hon member could be in assenting to such a course

CLAIM OF MR J F DUFF

Mr BAKEWELL moved pursuant to notice—

"Consideration in Committee of the Report of the Select Committee on the petition of J F Duff, with the view of presenting an Address to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, to place the sum of £153 8s on the Estimates as remuneration to the said J F Duff for damages sustained by the action of the Government"

In moving this resolution he did not consider it necessary to go into any statement of the facts on which the claim was founded, as he took it for granted that every hon member had read the report of the Committee, and had in some degree made up his mind as to the mode of dealing with the question The Committee went into the enquiry with every desire to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, and had examined several witnesses many of whom might be supposed to be adverse to the claim, yet the Committee had found that damages to the amount of £153 8s had been sustained, and recommended the payment of that amount There was no doubt by the action of the Government in putting the seamen of the Anna Dixon on board the Carnatic, Mr Duff sustained larger damages than had been assessed, but the Committee had considered whether it was possible for Mr Duff, by any course of action which he could adopt, to diminish that loss The Committee were of opinion that if Mr Duff had shipped a white crew to take the vessel to the Mauritius he could have reduced the damages considerably, and they acted upon a principle of the Courts of law in estimating the amount of compensation The question now was did the damages arise from the action of Mr Duff or that of the Government He (Mr Bakewell) thought that Mr Duff was in no shape or form the cause of those damages Mr Duff relied upon an undertaking from the Police Magistrate, who was the proper functionary to liberate the men, and Mr Duff was therefore justified in relying upon that gentleman's engagement The loss was occasioned by the Government and by the Government alone The fault of the Government consisted in putting the men on board the Carnatic without making any application to the committing Magistrate Wherever a warrant of deliverance was desirable the committing Magistrate should be applied to, but the men were sent on board the Carnatic without any such communication It was clear that the men could only be liberated in one of three ways either by the expiration of their sentence, by the Crown exercising its prerogative of pardoning them, or by the Police Magistrate issuing a warrant of deliverance It was not pretended that the Governor had pardoned the men, but if he had done so a communication should have been sent to the Magistrate in the same way as a communication was always sent to the Judge who tried a case The Government were, therefore, bound in accordance with natural justice to make amends to Mr Duff

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL confessed he was unable to agree to the resolution He thought it was inexpedient where persons had legal claims on the Government or such as were really borne out, that the Legislature, which had given all such persons redress in the Courts of justice, should interfere to procure payment or compensation for claims, without ascertaining whether such claims really existed It appeared that the persons on board this vessel of Mr Duff's were imprisoned for refusing to perform their duty, and whilst they were imprisoned, after some arrangement between the owner and the Police Magistrate, the vessel sailed from the colony, and there was then no obligation, either legal or implied, upon the owner or master to return and take the seamen on board again The vessel went away without any intimation being made to the Government on the subject, and in that way the owner had made himself liable to a penalty for having left the crew in the colony An application was then made by other persons to the Government to transfer the seamen on board the Carnatic The owner of the Anna Dixon, if the vessel were here, would have had a right to claim them, but when the vessel left, under innumerable contingencies as to whether she would come back or not, then Mr Duff had no right to expect that the Government would retain the men in ignorance of his (Mr Duff's) intentions It was said that the Government did not consult the committing Magistrate The Government might have taken such a course, but there was nothing in the circumstances, in the warrant of committal, or in anything which they were aware of at the time, which would render such a proceeding on their part necessary or expedient The Magistrate would have nothing to do but to issue a warrant of deliverance, and that only for the purpose of putting the men on board the ship from which they were imprisoned, but when the ship was away, the Magistrate could not grant such a warrant The Government had only taken the natural course, the men not being unwilling, of placing them on board another vessel in order to save the cost of their maintenance The whole fault lay with Mr Duff in the vessel's leaving the colony without notice being given to the Government

Mr STRANGWAYS supported the motion The only question in his mind was whether the amount proposed was sufficient compensation for Mr Duff His (Mr Strangways') opinion was that it was not The hon member for Barossa stated on a former occasion, and had repeated it now, that the Committee had ascertained the amount by calculating what Mr Duff would have had to pay for a crew of white men to proceed to the Mauritius, where he might discharge them and obtain Lascars But Mr Duff stated in his evidence that he could not procure in Port Adelaide a crew of white men who would consent to go to the Mauritius and be discharged, or, if so, that he could only get them at a very high rate of wages He presumed the hon member for Barossa had calculated the wages at that high rate, but the hon member had not stated what the rate was If Mr Duff had only to take a crew of white men to an Indian port, and leave them there the loss might be very small, but he (Mr Strangways) gathered from the evidence that a white crew could not be obtained on those terms The fact of Mr Duff's residing at Port Adelaide and the vessel being registered there, placed the matter in a different position from an ordinary case, though the hon the Attorney-General did not think so But as the Attorney-General considered the interpretation of an Act of Parliament a matter of opinion, and put one construction upon it at one time and another at another, he (the Attorney-General) must allow other hon members to differ from him Was the hon the Attorney-General satisfied that Mr Duff could get a white crew at any cost, and if so, would £153 indemnify him?

Mr LINDSAY also supported the motion, believing that if full justice was done, Mr Duff would receive a much heavier sum

Mr COLE believed the hon the Attorney-General had said, that the captain and owner of the vessel allowed her to go away without saying when she would return Now, it appeared from the evidence that the captain intimated to the Police Magistrate (Mr. Newland) that he would return. [The hon. member here read a passage to the effect he spoke of, from the evidence.] It also appeared that the vessel did return, and that an application was made prior to the expiration of the sentence for the restoration of the men. [The hon. member here quoted the evidence.]

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not deny or wish to conceal what had been stated by the hon. member for Barossa, that something was said to the magistrates about the ship's returning, but the magistrate could do nothing but grant a warrant of deliverance, and if the ship returned in time he would have done so; but it was only about a fortnight before the expiration of the term of imprisonment that the ship returned, and during all the time there was nothing to lead the Government to know that she would be here within the time. Had the vessel come 15 days later than the expiration of the sentence, the Government would have had to support the men, and could not then compel them to go on board their own vessel. Moreover the men would have a claim against the Government for having been left behind. Was the Government to wait during the whole 11 weeks or 13 weeks before they recognised the claim of the public to be freed from the support of these men on the mere chance of the vessel coming back.

Mr. MILNE opposed the motion. As to the returning of the ship, Mr. Duff must have presumed things which he had no control over, as through contrary winds, stress of weather, loss of masts, or many other accidents which were liable to occur on the coast, the vessel might be delayed. If once the men were liberated the captain would have no control over them, as having left the colony without them he forfeited all claim to their services. The loss was therefore the captain's own act.

Mr. HAWKER supported the motion, believing that Mr. Duff did everything in his power to make sure that he would have the crew on his return. He applied to the Police Magistrate, and Mr. Newland said that the men would be returned if the vessel arrived before the expiration of their sentence. Mr. Newland also said that it was usual to apply to the committing Magistrates before liberating men, and if this had been done, the Government would have been informed that the captain informed Mr. Newland that he was coming back. Mr. Finniss also said that so long as the captain had applied for the men within the duration of their sentence, his understanding was that the men should be restored to the ship. The hon. the Attorney-General said that the vessel might have left permanently, and that these men would be thrown upon the colony, and would become a burthen on the public. But the vessel was not like one that was not known. The Anna Dixon was a regular trader, and belonged to a very old colonist, and a resident here. He (Mr. Hawker) presumed that if the vessel did not return the Government would have sued the owner for the cost incurred in sending back the men to the port from which they came. (Hear, hear.) It was clear that whether from a mistake of the magistrate, or the fault of the Government, Mr. Duff had sustained a large loss, and the Committee had awarded this sum, including the difference of pay between £18 and £6 per month, the relative amounts given to a white crew and one of lascars.

Mr. BAKEWELL should set the hon. the Attorney-General right upon a question of fact. The hon. member thought the men were committed for three months, whereas they were only committed for six weeks. The hon. member could not have read the evidence with the care which the House had a right to expect from him. (Laughter.) The Committee had also a right to complain that the hon. member, though on the Committee, had failed to attend, notwithstanding that he was frequently requested to do so. He (Mr. Bakewell) thought it was rather a breach of faith with his colleagues for the hon. member to lie by, not setting them right when he could, but reserving his opposition until now. He thought the Committee had some right to feel indignant at such conduct. There had been one important point touched on by the hon. member. The hon. member said that no claims should be entertained except those of a legal character. Now he (Mr. Bakewell) understood that the House was in the habit of considering claims based on natural justice. He did not know whether Mr. Duff had a legal claim but he had cast aside all such considerations when nominated on the Committee. [The hon. member here cited one or two cases in which such claims had been entertained.] The Government could have pardoned the men, but they did not, for the men were put on board the Carnatic by the police; or the men might have been let out of prison on a warrant of deliverance signed by Mr. Newland but not by one signed by anybody else. The Government had therefore acted illegally in taking the men out of prison. It was clear the men were not pardoned, and the etiquette of every Government required that the right of pardoning should not be exercised without communication with the Judge who tried the case. The hon. the Attorney-General had made another strong point. Mr. Duff was residing in this colony, and the hon. member said that if Mr. Duff allowed the vessel to go out of the bounds of the colony without the imprisoned seamen, he was liable for his conduct. But why did the vessel go to Melbourne? At the very moment of the mutiny she was on the point of sailing, and there was no other course but to take the men to the Port, and put them in prison. What was Mr. Duff to do? Mr. Duff said, "I will go to Melbourne, which I can do in two or three days, and I will be back in time." But before going he took a pledge from Mr. Newland, and he (Mr. Bakewell) asserted that Mr. Newland was competent to give one. ("No," from the Attorney-General.) He (Mr. Bakewell) would like to know what functionary was competent if Mr. Newland was not—

The CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. Bakewell (who was looking towards the Attorney-General) to address himself to the Chairman.

Mr. BAKEWELL did not know of any Standing Order by which he was bound to look at the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN.—The hon. member must know that it is usual to address the Chairman.

Mr. BAKEWELL.—Then it is a bad usage. I address the Chairman but I look where I please.

The CHAIRMAN repeated that it was usual to address the Chairman.

Mr. BAKEWELL said that in the House of Commons, where many members were too far off to be seen by the Speaker, he had seen members look where they pleased. To do otherwise would be preposterous. He had been called to order three or four times on this ground, and it was exceeding inconvenient. He considered Mr. Duff justified in the course he pursued.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would not have replied if the hon. member (Mr. Bakewell) had not made a personal attack upon him. The hon. member charged him with a breach of faith because he now opposed a report to which he had never agreed. He could understand the hon. member if having attended the Committee and apparently assented to its proceedings, he (the Attorney-General) came forward now to oppose them. But having to choose between getting the business ready for the House and attending the Committee, he was unable to attend the latter. The hon. member (Mr. Bakewell) himself could not, however, deny that he (the Attorney-General) had told him and other members of the Committee that he (the Attorney-General) dissented from their views, that Mr. Duff had brought the loss upon himself, that either he should not have gone away, or that he should have made an arrangement with the Government, inasmuch as Mr. Newland was not the agent of the Government. He had communicated to the members of the Committee his strong feeling on the matter, and stated that he could not assent to the report. He did not pretend that he had read the evidence throughout, but there were certain essential features in it upon which there could be no dispute, and upon which the whole case rested. The men being imprisoned, the vessel went away without them, and the shorter the term of imprisonment, the greater chance there was of the vessel not being able to return in time. [The hon. member here referred in a few words to some remarks of Mr. Bakewell in reference to claims not strictly of a legal character, which had been entertained by the House.] In the present case, he felt it his duty, as a member of the Government and as a member of that House, entrusted with the guardianship of the public purse, to oppose what he believed to be an unreasonable and improper claim.

Mr. COLLINSON, as a member of the Committee, explained how the sum of £153 8s. was arrived at, which was as follows:—Additional wages of crew for 42 days, to enable the ship to reach the Mauritius, £93; additional labor, £14; delay, £30; additional provisions, £12; grog, £4. Total, £153 8s.

Mr. SOLOMON supported the item, as the Government had not given any reason why the men should have been allowed to leave the Gaol. (Hear, hear, from Mr. Strangways). If the Government had done so, the House might find still greater objections than could be seen now for their liberation. The captain had told Mr. Newland that he would return, and Mr. Newland promised on the vessel's return to give the usual warrant of deliverance, provided the vessel came in time. The Magistrate, of course, was often in the habit of committing seamen; and if there was any law in existence opposing vessels going away without their crews, it was the duty of the Magistrate to compel the captain to enter into a bond that he would return in proper time. There was one reason for his being opposed to the hon. member (Mr. Milne), who said that the men might be cast upon the Government for support—("hear, hear," from the Treasurer)—in case the vessel did not return. One thing appeared to be forgotten, viz., that the registered owner of the ship was a resident in the colony, and liable for any infringement of the Customs laws in the colony or elsewhere committed by the vessel. The object of registration was that he (the owner) should be saddled with any costs or faults which the ship might commit. The fault in this case was, in the first instance, on the part of the Government in undertaking to deliver the men out of the custody of the Gaoler without any authority. The only competent authority was the committing Magistrate, who could by warrant of deliverance have given them up to the ship from which they were taken.

Mr. BARROW said the hon. member for the city had stated that he would vote for the amount sought for, because the Government had not given any reasons for the liberation of the men. He (Mr. Barrow) heard the hon. member for Encounter Bay (Mr. Strangways) cheer that declaration, and as the cheer might have been meant as the prelude to, hoping to dissuade the hon. member from so useless

a course as a grave censure on the Government, he (Mr Barrow) felt called upon to make a few remarks He had heard the hon the Attorney-General say that the Government liberated the men because they did not think the Anna Dixon would be back in time, and in order to save the cost of their maintenance That might be a good reason or it might not, but at all events it was a reason (Hear hear) But when the hon member said the Government had given no reason, he seemed to infer that there was some secret reason for the liberation of the men (Hear, hear) If they were liberated in order to save the public purse—if it was done for some secret reason as might be inferred from the hon member for the city, then he (Mr Barrow) hoped the discussion would be continued until the House found out that secret and mysterious reason (Hear, hear, and a laugh) He (Mr Barrow) did not believe there was anything of the kind On the merits of the case he should go with the hon member for Barossa, as he considered that hon member's arguments more weighty and powerful in favor of paying the money, than those of the Government were against doing so It had been said that the vessel might not have come back, but it had not been said that she could not come, and in fact she had done so It was the duty of the House to prevent any lavish expenditure of the public money, but it was also one of its functions to pay all just debts due by the Government to members of the community Not having personal knowledge of the transaction, he could not but be guided by the balance of evidence, and by what he had endeavoured to gather from the speeches of hon members, and his impression was that the balance recommended by the Committee should be paid for the losses sustained by Mr Duff, through the action of the Government on this occasion

Mr BAGOT hoped the Government would withdraw their opposition He believed the Government had acted bona fide, wishing to save the cost of keeping the men during the remaining period of their sentence, but still it did not appear that they had acted according to the strict letter of the law, and though Mr Duff had not complied with the letter of the law either it appeared he had acted under the advice of a Government officer Under these circumstances it appeared to him only just and reasonable that the Government should withdraw their opposition

The ATTORNEY GENERAL would not withdraw his opposition He believed he had done his duty in giving the Committee his reasons for opposing the proposition, and he would do his duty by voting against it, but if the rest of the Committee adopted the report, the Government would place a sum on the Estimates to carry out the object of the address Still it was his duty to call attention to all the facts The men were willing to take service on board the Carnatic, to which vessel they were sent [The hon member here read a passage from the evidence, showing that Messrs Acraman, Lindsay, and Co were willing to receive the men, and that the men were willing to serve] There was, therefore, evidence for the Government to act on It was not denied that the men were left here by the vessel to which they belonged, and hon members knew that it was not always easy to forward persons of their class to the countries of which they were natives The Sheriff in his evidence showed clearly that it was a provision of the law that no person should be left behind out of a vessel without a communication being made to the Chief Secretary The captain had no right to communicate with any other person, and when he did not communicate with the Chief Secretary, the Government presumed that he had not communicated with any one The Sheriff also said that he never knew a case of a vessel sailing from the Port leaving persons behind and afterwards coming for them, but he (the Sheriff) had known several instances of persons being put into other vessels because the Government were desirous of getting rid of the cost of maintaining them

Mr STRANGWAYS thought the hon the Attorney-General was not right in his law when he said that there was any Act to prevent a master of a vessel leaving any of his crew behind The Act only provided for a master voluntarily discharging his crew If a man was committed to gaol and not discharged by the master or owner, if a man refused duty and was imprisoned, then he (Mr Strangways) thought the hon member for Barossa and other hon members would agree that the case did not come within the meaning of the Act Suppose a murder to be committed by a crew, and the men handed over to the proper authorities surely the master would not be bound either to obtain leave to go away or to remain until the men were tried (A laugh) The intention of the clause he believed was, to prevent men being left behind voluntarily The hon the Attorney-General said that the master acted illegally, because he took the ship away and then the hon member said that the Government were justified in acting illegally also in transferring the men to the Carnatic (Laughter, in which the Attorney-General joined) Again, there was no Colonial Secretary at the time of this occurrence —(a laugh)—and how was Mr Duff to apply to the Colonial Secretary? The words of an Act should be literally interpreted, and surely the Attorney-General would not say that if the Attorney-General was to be consulted, the Treasurer would answer as well If so, he (Mr Strangways) would make the hon the Treasurer the chief law officer of the Crown (A laugh)

Upon the hon member resuming his seat, loud cries of "Question" arose from all parts of the House

The motion was accordingly put and passed, and the House having resumed, the report was adopted

MESSAGES FROM THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Messages 29 and 30 were received from the Legislative Council enclosing the Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill, and the Real Property Law Amendment Bill, as passed with certain amendments, in which the Legislative Council desired the concurrence of the House of Assembly

On the motion of the COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS the House went into Committee for the consideration of the amendments by the Legislative Council in the District Councils Act Amendment Bill

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS moved that the amendments be agreed to With the exception of two clauses relating to unbranded cattle the alterations were merely formal ones

Mr REYNOLDS said it appeared to him that there were other amendments besides those merely formal If they looked at folio 11, line 2, they would find, he thought, several lines struck out

The COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS said that related merely to the exemption in certain cases of auditors from office

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said the alteration simply placed the auditors in the same position as that sanctioned by that House in the case of District Councillors

Mr LINDSAY called attention to the 114th clause having been struck out altogether That was a clause which he (Mr Lindsay) had wished to amend, but he was opposed by the House in so doing He considered the clause would have been very useful, if amended, and if he were wrong in endeavouring to amend it, the Legislative Council must surely have been as much to blame in striking it out altogether

Mr SHANNON approved of the alteration made by the Legislative Council, and he considered if they had made further amendments the Bill would have been materially benefited by it

The amendments were agreed to The House resumed, the Chairman reported the amendments as agreed to, and a message to that effect was ordered to be sent to the Legislative Council

LICENSED VICTUALLERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the motion of Mr STRANGWAYS the House went into Committee for the consideration of the amendments of the Legislative Council in the Licensed Victuallers Act Amendment Bill, which were agreed to

PETITION OF JOHN FINNIS

On the motion of Mr SOLOMON the petition of John Finnis was ordered to be printed

ADJOURNMENT

Mr STRANGWAYS asked whether there was any other business on the notice paper for the following day, besides the consideration of the amendments in the Waste Lands Act Amendment Bill If there was not he should propose that the House adjourn to Friday next, and meet then earlier, say at 11 or 12 o'clock

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL would have no objection to such a course if it were the wish of the House

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the notices of motion standing in his name, and which had lapsed during his absence, be proceeded with He subsequently proposed to defer them until Friday

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it would be better, perhaps, to move their consideration on the following day, as on Friday there were several formal matters connected with the prorogation which would engage the time of the House

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the House adjourn until 2 o'clock on the following day This would give the Select Committee now sitting an hour's additional time

Mr REYNOLDS moved that the House adjourn until 4 o'clock on the following day, which was carried

The House then adjourned at 20 minutes past 3 o'clock until 4 o'clock on the following day

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 23

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2 o'clock

Present—The Hon the Chief Secretary, the Hon H Ayers, the Hon Captain Bagot, the Hon Captain Scott, the Hon A Forster, the Hon Captain Hall, the Hon the Surveyor-General the Hon J Morphett, the Hon Dr Davies, the Hon Dr Everard, the Hon S Davenport

THE HARBOR TRUST

The Hon the PRESIDENT announced that he had presented to His Excellency, the Governor-in-Chief an address adopted by the Council praying that the Harbor Trust might be allowed to carry out without interference, the improvements of the Harbor as proposed in Council Paper No 53

LAND GRANTS BILL

The Hon H AYERS wished, before the business of the day was proceeded with, to ask the Hon, the Chief Secretary a question in reference to the Land Grants Bill which had been brought under discussion the previous day He had then mentioned that as the third clause gave the Treasurer and the Registrar-General power to issue land grants it was necessary that the Governor should give some authority under his hand to enable the Treasurer and the Registrar-General to execute grants He wished to know whether the law officers of the Crown were called upon to make any report upon Bills which had passed both Houses of Legislature prior to His Excellency assenting thereto, or withholding his assent

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said the law officers advised His Excellency upon every Act before his assent was given thereto

THE INSOLVENT LAW

The Hon J MORPHETT wished to ask the hon the Chief Secretary a question in reference to some returns which he had hoped would have been laid upon the table of the House It would be remembered that some time since he had asked a question in reference to the Insolvent Law, and subsequently the Hon Mr Ayers moved for certain returns, which were laid upon the table by the hon the Chief Secretary, and ordered to be printed, but although a considerable time had elapsed, the papers had not been printed, and the Council would agree with him that that it was a great inconvenience to have papers withheld for a considerable period when it was intended to take action upon such papers during the session Such occurrences were not unfrequent He believed that the law officers of the Crown in England had recommended Her Majesty not to allow the Insolvent Law as passed by the Parliament last session As the papers were not printed, he wished to ask the hon the Chief Secretary whether the law officers of the Crown in England had not advised Her Majesty not to assent to the Insolvent Law, notwithstanding that it had been assented to by His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, and he would also ask why action had not been taken by the Government during the present session to remedy the objections raised to the Act

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said that His Excellency the Governor in-Chief had forwarded to Her Majesty's advisers a copy of the opinion of the Attorney-General of the province upon the subject, and had requested a reconsideration of the subject

The Hon J MORPHETT hoped the Hon the Chief Secretary would take steps to ensure the more speedy printing of documents ordered by the House He found that the documents to which he had referred had been ordered to be printed 23rd November and yet they were not in print

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY reminded the hon gentleman that at that particular season there was great pressure upon the printing department, but in cases in which any special wish was expressed that documents should be printed, he always endeavored to comply with that wish He was not aware that, in reference to the documents which had been alluded to, any special wish had been expressed that they should be immediately printed, otherwise he would have taken steps to comply with that wish

LAND GRANTS BILL

Upon the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and forwarded by message to the Assembly, requesting their concurrence in the amendments which had been made by the Council

ASSESSMENT ON STOCK BILL

On the motion of the Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, this Bill was read a third time and passed, and transmitted to the Assembly, with a request that they would concur in the amendments made by the Council

APPROPRIATION BILL

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY, in moving the second reading of this Bill drew attention to the fact that the receipts for 1858 were largely in excess of the estimated amount, whilst the proposed expenditure for the half year ending 30th June, 1859, was much less than the estimated receipts, so that in the event of the revenue falling off, the finances of the colony would not be in any way embarrassed, there being a large balance in hand The cost of general establishments for 1859 was not in excess of the cost for 1858, except in connection with the new office of the Registrar-General, necessary in consequence of the passing of the Real Property Act, and the expenses consequent on the establishment of the Electric Telegraph, which was a reproductive work

The Hon J MORPHETT asked whether the Appropriation Act had been introduced by message from the Governor?

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY believed that the Bill had been introduced into the Assembly in the customary and proper manner

The Hon J MORPHETT remarked that by the Constitution Act all money Bills should be introduced by the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor

The Hon the CHIEF SECRETARY said, not being a member of the Assembly, he could not say whether the Appropriation Bill had been so introduced, but the Estimates upon which the Appropriation Bill was founded were introduced by message from His Excellency

The various clauses having been agreed to, the report was adopted, and the Bill was read a third time and passed

The Council then adjourned till 4 o'clock

THE DATE OF ACTS BILL

The PRESIDENT announced the receipt of a message No 52, from the House of Assembly, intimating that the Assembly insisted upon the amendments made by them in the Date of Acts Bill Reasons for doing so accompanied this message, and were to the effect that the provisions of the Bill as originally introduced to the Council amounted to a violation of the Standing Orders, and that the amendments made by the Assembly were strictly in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons

THE APPROPRIATION BILL AND IMMIGRATION

The Hon J MORPHETT wished to ask the Hon the Chief Secretary a question in reference to the Appropriation Bill, and although it had reference to a Bill which had that day passed the House, he hoped the hon gentleman would have no objection to answer it It struck him in the early part of the day, when they were called upon to pass the Appropriation Bill, that there was one portion of very great importance, although not of sufficient importance perhaps to interfere with the action of the Government, or arrest the business of the colony by moving amendments in the Act itself Still the points to which he alluded were of great importance, and he wished particularly to allude to the vote for immigration It appeared that the Assembly had finally passed a vote for the ensuing six months of £10,000 for Immigration, but he had understood that the Hon the Chief Secretary in preparing the financial statement, had appropriated £20,000 to this purpose and he believed that the hon gentleman had acted wisely in so doing and had displayed a proper consideration for the best interests of the colony He was sorry that the House of Assembly—

The Hon the PRESIDENT said the hon gentleman could not comment upon the proceedings of the Assembly

The Hon J MORPHETT, in making the allusion, merely wished to bring the question more home to the Hon the Chief Secretary He wished to point out how the answer of the hon gentleman could be made most acceptable to the House He wished the hon gentleman to point out how it was that the Government had not maintained their original position in reference to the Estimates by securing the £20 000, which they had originally intended to devote to immigration, because he considered——

The Hon the PRESIDENT said the hon gentleman could not enter into an argument upon the question

The Hon. J. Morphett merely wished the Hon. the Chief Secretary distinctly to understand what answer would be acceptable. He did not wish the hon. gentleman to say that he had been taken at any disadvantage. He considered immigration the life and soul of the colony——

The Hon. the President was afraid that involved an argument.

The Hon. J. Morphett thought it was an axiom which could not be disputed. He would however formally ask why the Government had not maintained their original position on the Estimates in reference to immigration for the next six months. At all events he thought he might say that less than £20,000 would not suffice.

The Hon. the President was afraid that the hon. gentleman could not go into arguments upon an Act which had been passed.

The Hon. J. Morphett was quite within the ruling of the President. He merely wished the Hon. the Chief Secretary to answer the question clearly and distinctly, and if the hon. gentleman would do so, he did not wish to elaborate his question. At the same time he thought immigration highly important to the colony, and that the sum of £10,000 was not sufficient for the ensuing six months. One institution alone at the Burra would take all the supply which could be afforded by such amount.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary, though taken somewhat by surprise, had no objection to answer the question. It was quite within the legitimate scope of the Assembly to revise the Estimates, and though the Government thought it sound policy to introduce the sum of £20,000 for immigration for the first six months of the ensuing year, the Assembly had thought proper to reduce the amount by one-half. At the same time he might remark that he did not think this reduction was a matter of much importance, because the Emigration Agent would have in hand a sum of £10,000 over and above the amount expended for last year, so that the amount at disposal for immigration would actually be £20,000, and he believed it was not the intention of the Government to instruct the Commissioners to ship emigrants during the months of April, May, and June, lest they should arrive here during the months of July, August and September, rendering, as was the case last year, the market overcrowded.

MESSAGES FROM THE ASSEMBLY.

The Hon. the President announced the receipt of the following messages from the House of Assembly:—No. 53, intimating that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Council in the Waste Lands Act. No. 54, intimating that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Council in the Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill. No. 55, intimating that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Council in the Real Property Act Amendment Bill. No. 56, intimating that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Council in the validity of Land Grants Bill.

PROROGATION.

The Hon. the Chief Secretary intimated that His Excellency the Governor would attend the Council on the following day at 1 o'clock, for the purpose of giving his assent to various Bills and proroguing Parliament.

The Council adjourned at 20 minutes past 4 o'clock, till 1 o'clock on the following day.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, December 23.

The Speaker took the Chair shortly after 4 o'clock.

Mr. Reynolds gave notice that he would on the following day move that under Act 27 of 1855 and '56, the appointment of the Engineer-in-Chief of Railways as a Commissioner of Railways, was illegal, and, therefore, null and void.

MESSAGES FROM THE COUNCIL.

The Speaker announced he had received from the Legislative Council the following Bills which had received the assent of that House:—Lands Grants Bill (with amendments), Assessment on Stock Bill, and Appropriation Act.

The Attorney-General moved that the amendments in the Lands Grants Bill be taken into consideration after the Orders of the Day.

Agreed to.

AMENDMENTS BY THE COUNCIL.

The amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Waste Lands Acts Amendment Bill, Water Supply and Drainage Act Amendment Bill, Real Property Act Amendment Bill, and Lands Grants Bill were successively considered in Committee, and agreed to. The reports on the various Bills were likewise adopted, and messages to that effect ordered to be transmitted to the Legislative Council.

MESSRS. HENRIQUES, YOUNG, AND MELVILLE.

Mr. Solomon moved that the petition of these gentlemen be printed.

Mr. Townsend seconded the motion.

Agreed to.

LAPSED MOTIONS.

In the absence of Mr. McEllister, the two motions standing in his name lapsed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Peake moved pursuant to notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, on motion being made for adopting the Report of the Committee on the Estimates, it is strictly in accordance with Parliamentary usage, and not at variance with the Standing Orders of this House, for an honorable member to move the reduction of any item of expenditure in that report, and the same may be at once dealt with by this House."

His desire in moving this resolution was to set at rest a question which seemed at present to be in some doubt. He thought without referring to previous proceedings—which, he believed, would not be in order—that it would be sufficiently in the minds of hon. members that on a recent occasion substantial justice had not been done in reference to the Estimates, in consequence of the practice which he proposed not being observed. He had therefore adopted the earliest means of taking action in the matter. In the House of Commons there were two Committees—one of Supply, and one of Ways and Means. Both these Committees reported to the House, and their reports were taken into consideration, and on this being done, any hon. member could move a reduction upon any item in either report, and this motion would be considered; but it was not competent for an hon. member to propose an increase. As, therefore, the course he proposed was strictly in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons, he had no doubt that the House would agree to it. It might happen in a country like this where the commercial and financial organisations of society were so fluctuating, that an exercise of a power such as he suggested even at the eleventh hour, might prove of great benefit. He need not detain the House with a long argument, but in May, p. 444, hon. members would find the action of the House of Commons in such matters detailed. [The hon. member here read the extract which he referred to.] On a recent occasion he wished to reduce an item of expenditure and it was ruled, probably quite rightly and consistently with the practice of the House, that he could not do so; but it was clear that the practice of the House was not consistent with that of the House of Commons, and that the practice of the House of Commons was much superior. With respect to the general policy of dealing in open sitting of the House with questions of this kind "May" lays down that the House could deal with questions of finance by Bill and without Committees of the Whole at all. He did not refer to diminutions of the burthens of the people generally, but to reductions of expenditure which might be very valuable at particular times. He contended also that there was nothing in the Standing Orders which enforced such dealing with any diminutions proposed on the Estimates as he complained of. No. 370 was the order which seemed to relate chiefly to this point, but if hon. members referred to it they would see that there was nothing in it which should prevent the House dealing with any proposal to diminish any item passed by a Committee of the whole House on the Estimates. [The hon. member read the order referred to.]

Mr. Hay trusted the motion would not be agreed to, whatever the reading of the Standing Orders might be. It would not be in accordance with the good conduct of business in the House, that after adopting the report on the Estimates, a motion for reconsidering any particular item should be proceeded with at once without notice. There might be a thin House and some of the most important business might come on early, and then a large proportion of the Estimates might be cut down which had been well discussed previously in a full House and agreed to. He would cite a case in point in the Waste Lands Bill which had been just agreed to. He had intended to be in the House in time to oppose that measure, but he did not think it would come on so soon. He believed the adoption of that measure would not be for the benefit of the country. He should oppose members having a right on the adoption of the report on the Estimates being proposed to move a reduction of any item without notice, though he agreed that members had a right to move the consideration of any item on a future day.

The Treasurer also opposed the motion. He thought it would be exceedingly inconvenient at a late period of the session, after the various grants had been affirmed, that a resolution should be introduced, when the Appropriation Act was under consideration, to alter the resolutions previously arrived at, without due notice. He thought the hon. member was laboring under a mistake when he read from May, as the remarks quoted applied to Committees of Ways and Means, and not to Committees of Supply. (Mr. Peake—"To both.") He (the Treasurer) found, in page 424 of May, that effect may be given to grants passed by the House of Commons previous to the passing of the Appropriation Act. [The hon. member read the passage in question.] From this it was evident that if the report was to be amended in the manner proposed, it would be quite inconsistent with the practice of the House of Commons.

The Attorney-General thought the question before the House had been well put by the hon. member for Gumeracha, viz., whether, after the lengthy labours of a Committee of the whole House, after the whole matter had been gone through, and all the items had been settled, not by any arbitrary calculations, but with a careful regard to the wants of each department—whether a discussion of questions of finance, which should include every item, was to be brought on again, and the House was without any notice, or referring back to the Committee to rescind the previous decisions He thought it was settled by the Standing Orders that matters of finance should be settled in Committee If the hon member could show that items of the Estimates could be considered without going into questions of finance, he (the Treasurer) could understand the motion, but as that was impossible he must oppose it

Mr PEAKE was aware that the Standing Orders asserted the general principle that matters of finance should be considered in Committee, but he apprehended that it was quite competent for the House to review in open session what was done by its own Committee There was nothing so outrageous or monstrous in that, but something very valuable, he was sure, would come of it He believed if the system he advocated was in force, the reduction which he proposed recently in the Police Department would have been carried He believed the Government were not adverse to that reduction, but the mode of effecting the object was not apparent, and so the vote was carried against the judgment of the majority of the House, because hon members could see no way of dealing with the question It was ruled that the matter could not be entertained under the Standing Orders, and this was the reason of his (Mr Peake's) taking the earliest opportunity of bringing this motion forward Personally, he cared very little whether the policy was adopted or not, but the policy of the House should be consistent with the policy of the House of Commons, and notwithstanding the quotations which the hon the Treasurer had amused the House with—for the quotation referred to the Appropriation Bill, which was altogether beside the question—it was not so at present His (Mr Peake's) quotation was from "May," and referred both to Committees of Ways and Means and of Supply

The SPEAKER put the question, and declared that the noes had it, whereupon Mr Peake called for a division, but immediately afterwards withdrew his demand

The motion was therefore lost

PUBLIC RESERVES IN MITCHAM

Mr REYNOLDS, before moving the resolution standing in his name for the consideration of the petition of the ratepayers of the District of Mitcham, wished to ask the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands whether Sections 884 and 1093 in the District of Mitcham had been sold, as the reply would affect his (Mr Reynolds's) motion

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS replied that section 884 had been granted to Mr Torrens, in virtue of a land order The rest of the hon. member's reply was inaudible, owing to the noise of conversation which prevailed

Mr REYNOLDS would now make some remarks, and this was not the first time he had taken action in reference to these reserves In Colonel Gawler's time these sections were reserved, because Colonel Gawler was of opinion that they constituted the only place from which the people of Adelaide could procure water Subsequently it appeared that Messrs Hanson, Babbage Hawmes, and Freeling reported on the desirability of retaining the place as a source of surplus supply, and 50 acres were then reserved for that purpose During the administration of Sir H Young, it appeared that Mr Torrens laid claim to one of the sections by virtue of a land order, but in consequence of the strong expression of public opinion and of certain questions put to the Legislature of that day, the Government were induced to prevail upon Mr Torrens not to claim the section, and the consequence was that the sections were reserved, as he (Mr Reynolds) understood, as public reserves The quarries were marked off at the same time as quarries and marked public reserves, yet now the House was told that these had been sold Notwithstanding the expression of opinion of the District Council and ratepayers of Mitcham, the Government had allowed Mr Torrens to claim one section by virtue of a land order Yet it appeared there was not too large an amount of reserved land around the city, for the Government had been obliged to pay £50 an acre for land as a site for a Lunatic Asylum After that it appeared a great pity that the Government should, to please Mr Torrens or any other gentleman, allow these reserves to be taken up by virtue of a land order Looking to the conduct of the Government after they had been requested to reserve this land for quarries, by which means the District Council of Mitcham could let them out for the purpose of procuring road metal from them, and considering that the Government had allowed persons to monopolise the land he thought that instead of the address which he had intended to move, he would move "That the conduct of the Government in alienating certain lands at Mitcham, is deserving of the censure of the House"

The SPEAKER said the hon member should ask leave to amend his motion

Mr REYNOLDS intended to amend it His first intention was to move, "That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-in-Chief, requesting that he will be pleased to give instructions to carry out the request of the District Council and others of Mitcham, in the matter of reserving certain quarries and certain roads necessary as approaches to water, as contained in their memorial to the Government of October last"

The TREASURER thought it hardly right to give the hon member permission to alter the motion in the way in which the hon member sought to alter it He (the Treasurer) thought an amendment involving a censure on Government required a notice to be given He should be fully prepared to go into the discussion of the question raised by the original motion

The SPEAKER—There was no rule to prevent an hon member's obtaining leave to amend a motion The nature of the amendment was before the House, and it was for the House to say whether it would give leave or not

The question being put, the hon member obtained leave to amend his motion

Mr REYNOLDS said, as the Government were so anxious not to have a vote of censure passed upon them, that he would not press it Whilst he thought the Government richly deserved the censure of the House for alienating this land after the expression of public opinion, still he had so much respect for the Government (laughter), and especially for the hon the Commissioner of Crown Lands that he would like to give that hon member an opportunity of mending his ways (laughter), and seeing whether he could not manage his department better, that he (Mr Reynolds) would move the address which he had put be read

The motion was then put and negatived without a division

Mr STRANGWAYS moved that the House adjourn

The COMMISSIONER OF CROWN LANDS asked leave to say a few words in explanation In the first place the Government had nothing to do with the right, or otherwise of persons exercising the privileges conferred by land orders If the hon member was of opinion that the rights conferred by outstanding land orders should not be exercised by the parties holding them he should bring in a separate motion to that effect He (the Commissioner of Crown Lands) could only see that the privileges of the orders were exercised in the legitimate and legal manner in which they had been always exercised The land at Mitcham was comprised in four sections, and they had never been reserved He wished hon members clearly to understand that in no map in the Survey Office were these sections declared reserves In a recent map they were colored red, but they were not described as reserves They were only colored red to intimate that they were not for sale at present The reason of their being so colored was that, until the site of the Waterworks was fixed, the Government wished to keep back this land in order, that if the engineers declared the water of Browhill Creek to be the best, the Government might have it in their power to reserve that water The engineers had fixed upon another place, but even now there was sufficient land reserved at both sides of the creek at Mitcham which never would be sold These sections under the consideration of the House comprised only a portion of the reserves, so that even if the Government should think it necessary at a future time to establish a supplementary reservoir for water, they would have an ample supply for the purpose, and two miles of reserved land With regard to the roads being required, these sections were, for the most part, so precipitous that it would be impracticable to make any roads through them, except those marked on the Government survey, and surely the Surveyor-General, a gentleman who had so ably filled the office he held for many years, must be as competent to point out what roads should be made as a few interested residents at Mitcham With regard to land having been bought at great expense for the site of the Lunatic Asylum, none of the sections now in question could be used for the purpose, as they were so steep, being situated on the brow of a hill, that they could not be made available. Section 884 was the only one which could have been used, and that was claimed by virtue of a land order, which the Government, in accordance with the practice of the colony at all times, could not legally refuse to recognise If the House thought the holders of land-orders should not be entitled to claim under them, they should say so by a distinct motion The Government knew there were five of these orders yet outstanding, and some day, no doubt, the land under these would be claimed The quarry alluded to was not a road-making quarry at all, but one of freestone —a material which no one would recommend for road metal But there were no less than three quarries on the other side of the creek which would be reserved, and which contained enough road stone to supply the colony for a century He could easily fancy that some residents of Mitcham who were allowed for years past to graze their cattle on these sections, should prefer, as most persons would in such circumstances, that the land should not be sold at all, that they should still be allowed to graze their cattle on it But he had yet to learn that any part of the colony should exercise a claim of this sort, to which it had no right, and the mere fact of these persons residing in Mitcham had not given them a right to run their cattle on the Sections He thought he had now answered all the questions of the hon member (Laughter)
